Oh, moon! Surely our society ought to bear some of the responsibility for all this? We are like simpletons as far as sex is concerned! Even mentally we are unprepared—we are so naïve about sex for people of our age! Surely we should have been taught something about it, as part of our general knowledge?

I remember my mother once telling me about these special colleges that were set up in Japan a long time ago, to teach young unmarried women a few basic facts about married life, and a girl wasn't allowed to marry without a certificate from one of these colleges—it wasn't a bad idea! But we learned nothing about sex, either from our parents or from our schools. The very mention of the word was something shameful and immoral, almost a crime. All of us women are going to experience that night, so why should any understanding of it be kept hidden and secret from us? Why should a motley collectIon of men be left to teach us instead, each in his own particular fashion?

Surely there is a more decent, a more pleasant way? Surely, instead of feeling ashamed and cheapened by men, it should be possible for us to recall happy memories of their tenderness and nobility when we speak of that first night?

Since Liberation, there's been no "sex education" whatsoever—worse than that, we've not even had enough of the most ordinary education, enough food for our most basic spiritual needs as human beings.

Those leftist fanatics, their heads full of one thought only—never-ending struggle.

What have they given to the people?! …

… Suddenly, the outer door opened. It was strange that our white dog wasn't barking, considering the reputation he had in the village for fierceness.

I pushed back the small stool and stood up from my bowl of washing; and looking out through the window, I saw our white dog in the yard, facing the outer door and wagging his tail.

Two men came in, and close on their heels the snowflakes, driven in by the biting north wind. From the kind of padded coats they wore, of a faded blue cotton, you could tell that they were Urblings\fn{Young school-leavers from urban areas; a category of unemployed young people, whose economic needs were not satisfied by the Communist system and who were accumulating in the urbanized parts of China. The Party dealt with them by at first strongly encouraging—and then, in the early stages of the Cultural Revolution, by forcibly resettling—them "up mountain or down country" to learn about life from their country cousins—a policy which largely failed, since both peasants and city-dwellers looked upon it as an unwanted imposition contrary to their fundamental natures} from some neighbouring village.

"Is this where Zhao Zhiguo lives?" asked the young man in front. He had quite a dark complexion, large darting eyes like a goldfish, and a thick top lip which curved up at the corners in a smile. The other man, whose face was hidden from view by his yellow padded hat, was stamping his feet to get the snow off his shoes.

"Yes, it is. Please come in," I called out to them. They came on into the room, bringing with them a rush of cold air.

"It's nice and warm in here," said the young man with the dark complexion. He took off his padded hat, walked up to the kang, and sat down. He took a look around the room and went on:

"We just about froze to death on our way here! And then half-way we ran into this blizzard!"

The other young man, as soon as he'd come in, had grabbed an old copy of the Reference News\fn{A digest containing summaries of news not appearing in the public media, including translations from the foreign press, previously restricted to Party members and bureaucrats holding administrative or similar positions of responsibiliity and power, but gradually becoming more widely available} which was lying on the kang, and sat down and started reading it without looking up, totally forgetting that he hadn't even taken off his hat.

"Would you like some water?" I put a thermos flask and two glasses on the small table between them on the kang, and then took a handful of fruit-drops out of the cupboard.

"Have some sweets."

Urblings had the habit of constantly dropping in on one another, so there was no need to stand on ceremony; I sat down and carried on doing my washing, chatting to them at the same time.

"Where's Zhao Zhiguo?" asked the dark young man. "He's been away now for a couple of weeks." I thought for a little while:

"It's the fourth of January today, isn't it? He went back to Peking as soon as we'd been paid for the year."

"Oh, did he? Then aren't you going back this year?"

"Us married people are not as free as you are! If I don't stay and look after things here, how do you suppose we'll manage this coming year? Anyway, which village are you from? And what brings you here?"

"We're from West River. We just came out for the walk," the young man said. "Do you know who we are?"

"Mmm, let me think, West River …" I put down my washing for a moment. "All the people there have been round to see us, except the W ei brothers."

"That's us! Got any tobacco?"

I handed him Zhiguo's tobacco pouch. He took a small piece of crumpled paper out of his pocket and began skilfully rolling a cigarette. Soon he was breathing out a pale cloud of smoke with the relish of a seasoned smoker:

"I'm Wei Li. And he's my elder brother, Wei Ying."

"Wei Li and Wei Ying?" As I scrubbed at the clothes, I thought to myself what a lovely ring the names had. "They're nice-sounding names."

The man who had been reading the newspaper suddenly looked up as though something had caught his attention, and gave me an apologetic smile, kind and slightly rueful. It struck me how soft and intelligent his face was, and how calm he seemed. Seeing his face was like suddenly pushing open the window of a smoke-filled room and catching sight of a silver crescent-moon hanging in the clear dark-blue canopy of the heavens. It was like a gust of cool refreshing air. Something about him reminded me of my elder brother, Luoke. Was it the oval shape of his face and his glasses with their clear plastic frames? Or was it his fair skin, his gentle features and quiet manner? It was hard to say.

"Actually," he took a close look at me and smiled shyly, "we first heard about you a long time ago."

"When?" I looked at him with great curiosity.

"In '66." His voice was so pleasant, so like my brother's.

"Do you still remember Wei Lan?" he asked.

"Wei Lan? Yes, I do!"

"She's my elder sister."

"Really?"

He smiled, and then lowered his head bashfully. My brother :was never so shy.

"Wei Li and I already knew about you then."

"But that's eight years ago!" I put down my washing for a moment and turned to him: "What did she say about me, your sister?"

"She told us that you once wrote her a poem singing her praises, and she said it made her feel so proud! And she gave us quite a detailed description of what you looked like." He smiled kindly.

"Oh yes," Wei Li laughed.

"So you see, we're really old friends!"

"How extraordinary!" I remembered her quite vividly. She had always stood out from the others. I could picture her clearly in my mind's eye. She had just graduated from university when I came to know her. It was '66, just at the beginning of the Great Cultural Revolution,\fn{Wenhua dageming; which the author attempts to cheapen by abbreviating it to "Cultrev", doubtless because her beloved brother had been shot for being critical of the Party and because she and countless people she loved and admired were tortured and killed by squads of illiterate, rampaging youths for no other crimes than honestly criticizing Party policy, or adopting Western dress or listening to Western music or reading Western books—or, heresy of heresies, openly disagreeing with Mao Tsetung Thought} and she had been sent to our toy factory as a member of a Squad.\gn{A temporary group of political personnel sent to a particular place by a Party Committee or organizaiton, basically to esure that local practice is in line with higher policy, to mobilize and to explain official policy to local people} I had graduated from art school in '65 and was then working as a trainee at this factory, and Wei Lan was put in charge of our carpentry workshop. All the other workers in my section were old men, and none of them ever said a word at meetings. I was the one who took the minutes, and since I was the only other young person there, Wei Lan was always trying to encourage me to speak up. Her efforts were in vain (after all, what could anyone find to say about the capitalist roaders,\fn{Zouzipai, which the author calls "Kroads"; "capitalist roader" was an expression introduced in 1965 to describe those politicians (especially Liu Shaoqi and Deng Xiaoping) who were adopting Soviet-style reforms, and who qwere therefore considered guilty of taking the "capitalist road"— moving the country away from Communism by introducing material incentives (profits and bonuses in industry; privatly owned plots of land on the communes) to correct a flagging economy, the result of failed Communist industrial and agricultural policies of the 1950s} but I came to like her a lot all the same. We mostly just chatted about very ordinary things. She was interested in hearing about my family, and I told her a lot about what had happened to them all. She seemed to like me. In fact, I thought how nice it would be if my brother could get to know her, because he never had any girl-friends. She too had the same kind of glasses as Luoke, with clear plastic frames. She often wore a black and white checked silk blouse with short sleeves, and she had short hair; she was attractive though, not at all ordinary-looking. But her Squad left our factory soon afterwards, and I never saw her again. The mention of her name made it seem as though there was an invisible thread joining my fate to Wei Ying's, something very intimate and natural, something almost sweet.

"What did I write in that poem?" I asked, still trying to think.

"I've quite forgotten."

"You compared my sister to the sun." Wei Li drank some water, and laughed. "Once my brother went to your factory to take her some clothes. When he came home he was so disappointed he hadn't managed to see you."

"Is that true?" I was very flattered. But Wei Ying was embarrassed and looked down.

"How the time has flown!" Wei Ying finally took off his padded hat. His forehead had an intelligent look about it and his hair was soft and black. "Those eight years have gone by in a flash. Such great changes …"

Yes, the changes had certainly been great. Seeing Wei Ying today, I began to feel very nostalgic. But what was the good? I was no longer a little girl. His sister might not even like me now, if she were eager to see me again. I rubbed at the clothes, trying to banish these gloomy thoughts. I looked up at them both and asked,

"Are you really brothers?"

"Yes."

"But you don't look like you are."

"That's what everybody says," Wei Ying laughed.

"I'm the big, black oaf of the family, and he's the pale-faced scholar. Is that what you mean?" Wei Li's words made us all laugh. …

… In the Great Northern Wilderness,\fn{The vast undeveloped are of noarthern Heilongjiang Province, so-called because of its harsh climate and sparse population. Together with Jilin and Liaoning Provinces, and a north-easteraly extension of the Inner Mongolian Autonomous Region, it was once part of an enormous area called Manchuria, the ancestral homeland of the last dynasty to rule China (1644-1911)} the winter days are short. And at that season of the year, when farming was slack, people usually only ate two meals a day. As it was now time for the afternoon meal, I asked them to stay and eat. They accepted without any feeling of awkward- ness, and in no time at all, I brought out the steaming rice and a couple of dishes to go with it.

"Mmm! You eat pretty well here!" Wei Li picked up his chopsticks with obvious pleasure.

"Maybe a bit better than you do." It was not the first time I'd received this compliment,

"Better than us? What do you know about the way we live?"

He almost seemed to be disagreeing with me. But he was gulping down his food all the same. We sat around the small table on the warm kang, eating the good rice which had been distributed by our work-team.\fn{Sheng-chandui; the commune was divided into brigades, and the brigades were further divided into work-teams} It was that time of winter when every family had just killed its pig—so we had shredded meat with our pickled vegetable, and sliced meat with our potato; and we also had a soup made from turnip and shredded dried bean curd. The room was filled with these mouth-watering smells; and the good food made us more talkative and relaxed. The golden lamplight seemed to bring us closer together.

"How much has your work-team been giving you for a day's work over this past year?" asked Wei Li, chewing loudly. Even in his way of eating, Wei Ying was the exact opposite of his brother, and chewed slowly and carefully without making any noise.

"Less than the year before," I said. "One kuai\FN{A more colloquial word for yuan, the basic Chinese unit or currence, each one of which is equal to 100 fen} seventy."\fn{I.e., one kuai and 70 fen; in 1986 when this book was published this was the equivalent of about 35 New Pence Stirling}

"About the same as us."

"How much did you get this year, the two of you put together?" I wasn't expecting the embarrassed smile they gave me.

"Fifty kuai or so," said Wei Li with a shrug.

"Why so little?"

"We didn't get back from Peking until July," Wei Li explained. 'We've only been working for the last few months. Besides, if you include our ration of six hundred pounds of grain, plus a summer's supply of muskmelon and watermelon, plus firewood and oil and so on, we were lucky to get fifty kuai."

"Aren't you going back to Peking this winter?" I asked.

"Yes, we are," Wei Li said cheerfully. "I'm leaving the day after tomorrow. He'll follow later. My mother's been wanting us to go back for ages."

"This place of yours is so out of the way!"

Wei Ying had finished eating and put down his bowl. He leaned over and melted a little of the ice on the window-pane with his breath, then craned his neck to look out at the pitch black yard.

"It's such heavy snow, still hasn't stopped yet! There must be three mu of land round the house. Are those trees yours as well?"

"Yes, they are." When Wei Li had also had enough to eat, I got up off the kang to clear away the dishes.

"It is very out of the way here. That's why we got it so cheap. And I suppose that's how come the three people who lived here before were murdered by that Drossnik."\fn{Liumang; literally "layabout," "hoodlum"}

"You've really got guts living here! When that story reached our village, everybody was scared stiff." Wei Li grimaced, shaking his head.

"All by yourself in this lonely place—aren't you afraid? Nobody would even hear you screaming! No wonder they'd already been dead three days before the villagers knew anything about it!"

"We've nothing to be afraid of. She was loose, the woman who lived here before—that's how that Drossnik got away with it."

"But your Domper's\fn{Hukouben, literally "domicile-permit registration book"} with the First Team, isn't it?" Wei Ying asked. "That's more than half a mile away from here. So why did you buy a house here in the Second Team?"

"Our old house was so dilapidated. We were just thinking about building another when this murder happened here; nobody dared buy the place. Zhiguo and I came to have a look. It's got two big rooms—both facing south—and a storeroom, and three mu of land with more than a hundred young willow trees all round it, which we thought would provide plenty of osiers for making baskets … and then there's a walled yard with sixteen crabapple trees and a wild cherry, and there's a river running in front of the house. Of course, it is right at the edge of the village, and a little bit out of the way; but still, at two hundred kuai it was cheap. And anyway, Zhiguo's got a bicycle so it isn't too inconvenient for him to ride to the fields. It's only half a mile."

"Is that land round the house counted as Ownplot",\fn{Ziliudi, literally, "land reserved for private use," to cultivate and keep or sell the resulting produce on the open market. The existence of ziliudi has depended on the fulctuations of offical policy} asked Wei Ying, "or have you got other land as well?"

"They didn't count it last year, but this year they probably will. There's a new policy, isn't there?"

"You've got enough land here to keep you occupied the whole year round." Wei Li leant against the wall and breathed out a mouthful of smoke from his comfortable position on the warm kang. "How much did you make last year out of the produce?"

"We planted sixteen hundred tobacco plants and three thousand sunflower plants, and we sold them to the State for more than nine hundred kuai. And then we've got a small Ownplot for our family of three over in the First Team, one and a half mu, where we grow potatoes and pumpkins to sell; and we harvested two large sacks of crabapples—too much for us to eat by ourselves, so we sold them as well. Oh yes, why don't I cook us some melon-seeds."

When the melon-seeds were done, Wei Li put out his cigarette. The three of us took off our shoes, settled ourselves on the warm kang and started cracking the seeds with our teeth while we carried on chatting—for those of us who had enough to eat and warm clothes to wear, the slack winter season was really a pleasant time of year.

We talked at length about what was happening in the rest of the country, swopping bits of news we'd picked up from other Urblings who'd been to Peking. We talked about how the fanatics in power had managed to bring poverty even to those parts of the country which had no cause to be so poor, forcing peasants from south of the Pass\fn{Shanbaiguan, literally "Mountain Sea Pass", a famous town situated close to the Gulf of Bohai, at the extreme eastern end of the Great Wall of China, the point of access to the Northeast; of which the Chinese speak of being "within" or "without" the Pass} to brave the journey up to the Northeast in increasing numbers every year. We talked about the Floater settlements

("Floaters" was how the government described the itinerant peasants) and the terrible hardships these people had to endure when they first arrived. And we discussed how they were still up against the tyranny of Class Pedigree (which prevailed throughout the country-in the comparatively rich Northeast no less than in the poorer provinces), making it just as hard as before for the children of former landlords and Kulaks\fn{The Russian term for "rich peasants," whom Stalin attempted to liquidate as a class} to find a marriage partner and even harder to join the Party or Youth League. This artificially induced class struggle had not abated even in the fertile Great Northern Wilderness. We went on to talk about the overthrow of Lin Biao,\fn{The former Defense Minister and a follower of Mao from the beginning} his sudden transformation from close comrade-in-arms to Class Enemy Number One —a reversal of fortune which perplexed even the most ignorant old peasant woman.\fn{Lin Piao appears—the details of this are still murky—to have attempted to kill Mao, and then fled with his family to Russia, when his aircraft was intercepted by units of the Chinese air force and shot down, killing all on board}

The furious north wind roared, hurling itself against the windowpanes, making the room seem snugger than ever. Wei Ying involuntarily looked at his watch.

"Are you leaving?" I asked softly. He shrugged and smiled.

"It's about seven miles!"

"This damned weather!" said Wei Li, pressing against the glass at the bottom of the window. "The snow's already a foot deep, and it's still not stopping."

"Why don't you stay?" I urged. "You can't possibly get back in weather like this. You might run into wolves." They looked about the room, apparently embarrassed.

"Oh, that's all right. There's a little room in there which I can sleep in."

I got down onto the floor and raised the curtain which hung across the opening in the paper partition-wall.

"See. I'll sleep here."

"Well …" They thought about it for a while and eventually seemed glad to accept.

"All right?" I sat down on the kang and declared, "It's settled then. Good, now we can talk some more." So I asked them cheerfully: "What's life like for you?"

"Us?" Wei Li smiled. "Our group of Urblings broke up ages ago. Now we all fend for ourselves. The two of us bought a small lean-to and set up on our own. You must come and see our place sometime. Zhiguo came a long time ago."

"I heard that you were managing quite well. But I didn't know then that you were Wei Lan's brothers, so it didn't really mean much to me at the time."

"Could you tell me something"—Wei Ying hesitated—"something about your brother?" Seeing how I carried on crack- ing melon-seeds and didn't answer his question, he smiled wryly and added,

"You know, ever since '66 when I first saw a duplicated version of "On Class Background"\fn{A long essay written by the author's brother, completed in 1966, repudiating the Maoist theory of Class Pedigree, and objectively analysing the influence of the family on an individual, concluding that the influence of the family is insignificant caompred to that of society, and pointing out the dangers of the Class Pedigree theory—which said in practice, that, for example, the descendants of a landlord family would always be landlords, even though they might never have owned an inch of land—that reactionary, explotative ways of thinking are transmitted from one generation of a family to another genetically} posted on the wall, I wanted to meet the author so much. And then later, when the printed version came out in the High School Cultrev Post,\fn{Zhongxue wenge bao, a Peking newpaper published by the Propaganda Department of the High School Students Revolutionary Rebel Headquarters, which published this essay in its February 1967 issue} everyone wanted to know who had written it. I really wanted to meet this person—whoever he was! I only found out that he was your brother after we came here … but … aah!" He was too distressed to go on.

Wei Li looked up slowly from his reverie. There was an intense expression on his face.

"He was a martyr!" He repeated the words as if to himself, but with great emphasis: "A martyr!" I was just wondering what to say when Wei Ying suddenly changed the subject.

"I hear that your father and two brothers live up here as well?"

"Yes, in the village."

That was my reply, but inwardly I smiled. What a kind-hearted man you must be! I couldn't help noticing the expression in your eyes! You thought that maybe you'd upset me by mentioning my brother; and maybe you regretted bringing up the subject. But I'm not a sentimental kind of person! On the contrary, I'd like to tell the whole world about my brother!

"There really are so many things I want to ask you about." Wei Li was not as sensitive and tactful as his brother. "I have one question in particular," he said excitedly, "but I don't know if it's proper to ask."

"So, what is it?"

"Well, you see. . ." He hesitated and smiled awkwardly. "We don't understand why you married a man like Zhao Zhiguo?”

“Like Zhiguo?”

I didn’t care for the way he put it. I noticed that Wei Ying was staring at me too. From the expectant look in his eyes, he seemed even more interested in my answer than Wei Li was.

“Ah!” I pretended a sigh of indifference. “It’s a long story. Let's save it for tomorrow.”

That night I slept on the wooden bed in the little inner room. So many feelings came flooding into my mind.

A joy and excitement welled up in my heart such as I had never experienced before. What could it be? Was it the whole effect Wei Ying had had on me—his gentle face; his sensitivity and his open disposition, which reminded me of my brother; his generous spirit and kindness; or his voice, which had a restful quality like soft music? Or was it because of some feeling he had kept for me from eight years before?

How I wished that we had met earlier! I thought with regret that if I’d only met him in October 1970 when I was on my way to the Great Northern Wilderness for the first time, and we’d had a chance to talk a little, then perhaps I would never have married Zhiguo.

But I had no right to think in this way. I must never forget that I was now a mother! I was not entitled to such thoughts. They were wrong! And besides, I hardly even knew him. Supposing I did like him, then the most I could hope for was that we could be friends. True friends, close friends even, but nothing more than that.

Yes, when Zhiguo came back I’d be really happy to tell him that I’d made the acquaintance of Wei Ying and that I’d like them to be friends as well; maybe Zhiguo would be as pleased as I was, and then the three of us would get along just fine.

Thinking of it like this set my mind more at ease. I put on the light, turned over quietly in bed and took up the notebook and pen which lay beside my pillow. The notebook had a sky-blue plastic cover, inscribed in gold with the words: “The World is Wide, and there is Much to be Accomplished.”\fn{The much-reprinted words of Mao’s exhortation to Urblings as they set off to build Communism in the countryside} It was a gift given to all Urblings the previous year by a group sent from Peking to convey “greetings and solicitude”. It was quite extraordinary that someone like me, someone with “reactionary ideas” who’d already been in a camp for a term of Labour Cure,\fn{Laodong jiaoyang, literally, “re-education through labor,” an administrative, rather than criminal, punishment, drawn up in 1957 primarily to deal with vagrants, minor offenders and troublemakers of various sorts, but also some types of political categories; according to which labor cure offenders retain their civil rights and have more privileges and a better diet than criminal offenders, each sentence normally extending for a term of three years (though renewable at discretion)} should now have become an Urbling here in the Northeast. When had the change come about? Who had been responsible for it? It was hard to say. All I knew was that I was now treated exactly like all the other Urblings. Nobody bothered to delve too deeply into the past. That was what I liked about the Great Northern Wilderness!

Whenever I held that black fountain pen of mine, it always seemed to weigh a ton. My brother was executed on March 5, 1970, and my mother and father had brought it back from the prison. I had kept it, determined to use it to try and complete my brother’s mission. I would use it to recreate his spirit, even if it took me ten years to do so. I carried on writing down my memories of Luoke in my notebook and didn’t go to sleep until about two o’clock in the morning.

The next morning, I got up quietly. Lifting the door curtain, I saw the two of them still sound asleep. Wei Li was snoring softly with his mouth half open; and Wei Ying was lying flat on his back under his quilt—from the neatness of the quilt and from his peaceful way of sleeping, it looked as if he hadn't moved the whole night. What a strange sight! He was so still, almost as if he had given up the ghost!

I went into the outer room to boil water for washing and for breakfast, trying to make as little noise as possible. But when I turned round, Wei Ying was standing behind me, looking very pensive. I couldn’t tell how long he'd been there.

“You’re up so early,” he said gently.

“Yes, I always am; but it’s not really all that early now,” I replied, carrying on cutting up the vegetables.

“Last night you were really burning the midnight oil, weren’t you?” he said in a soft voice.

“When did you go to sleep then?” He smiled shyly and said nothing more. This silent response seemed louder than words. It gave me a slightly uneasy feeling.

After breakfast, they were in no hurry to leave, and we sat around the small table on the warm kang, like we had the night before, chatting and cracking melon-seeds. I started talking about my brother.

I spoke for a while, and then the three of us fell silent.

“He was truly a martyr!” Wei Li murmured, his intense expression betraying the indignation he felt in his heart.

“You know,” said Wei Ying, looking up with staring, thoughtful eyes, and with that same wry smile, “a young man in our neighbourhood was given eight years in prison just for putting up a poster saying ‘Long Live the Author of On Class Background!’” I breathed a deep sigh.

“My brother’s case involved a lot of people. They dug up the addresses of anyone who’d asked for a copy of the High School Cultrev Post, and all of them got into trouble. So did the editors of the paper, of course.”

“Your family must have suffered terribly. Wei Ying sighed a melancholy sigh.

“It goes without saying. What about yours?”

“Ours?” answered Wei Li, without giving Wei Ying a chance to speak. “My father was executed in 1950, when my brother was three and I was only two. My mother was a primary school teacher, she taught first year children. She’s been a widow ever since, with three children to support. My sister was a star pupil at high school—she did well in class and got excellent reports for general conduct; but she only managed to get into the Youth League in her last year of senior school. She had to wait six years! She really had a hard time getting into teachers’ college too. And then she wanted to join the Party, but no matter how hard she tried, she was always turned down because of her class background. She was really upset about it at the time, and later she gave up hope altogether. She once had a boy-friend but his class background wasn’t too good. Mother was set against the match and found her a man from a worker’s family instead.”

“How did they get along together?” I felt really sorry for her.

“Not too badly. They’ve got a child now.”

“Do you remember anything about your father?”

“No," said Wei Li, breathing out a puff of smoke. “In fact, we all hate him,” he went on at once, “especially my mother. He gave us nothing but misery.”

I didn’t quite understand, so I said nothing. And Wei Ying just hung his head silently as if something was on his mind.

“Did you have a hard time then, during the Cultrev?” I asked after a little while.

“Of course.” Wei Li followed the smoke rings with his eyes.

“For a whole month,” said Wei Ying, raising his head, “we all had to sleep in the railway station …”

He didn’t finish, and I didn’t feel like asking any further questions. No one wanted to talk about the sorrows of the past any more. They’d almost become too commonplace.

“Well, I really wish you'd tell us”—Wei Li looked at me searchingly as if he’d remembered something and said—“you know … hat I asked you yesterday?”

“You’ll be coming again, won’t you?” I stalled. “Let’s talk about it another time. If I finish the whole story this time, we’ll have nothing left to talk about!”

Perhaps it was the way I said it that made them both laugh. After a little more conversation, they stood up and said good-bye. It had already stopped snowing.

I walked with them to the edge of the village and gazed after them until they vanished into the distance. Wei Ying turned round and looked back, and again …

I walked home slowly on my own, uncertain whether I was happy or sad. I don’t know how it happened, but as I gazed out over the white expanse of snow, I started making up a poem in my head:

Is this love, I cannot tell—
That gentle voice
Like mild sunshine.
Is this love, I cannot tell—
That tender heart
Plucking mine.
The song of the sea
Never moved me like this.
The murmuring pines
Never touched me like this.
A heart so open and pure,
Soft as spring wind.
A spirit bright and kind,
Crystal-clear.

In the ocean of friendship,
I will seek the source of strength!

That night, I slept so soundly and had such a wonderful dream.

The next morning, I woke up before it was light. Looking at the beautiful patterns the ice had formed on the windowpanes, I wondered to myself whether Wei Ying would come again. No, he would probably not come. He was too sensitive not to notice that I liked him. And he was rational. Even if he liked me too, he still wouldn't allow himself to be swayed by his emotions—I was married, and I had a child. Ah, if only husband and wife loved each other so deeply that no matter whom they encountered in their lives, they could always look into their hearts and say,

"But I love my husband (or wife) better."

Perhaps Marx and his Jenny felt like that about each other! But few of the married people I knew loved in this way. It was so sad to think that Wei Ying would never be coming again, that our first meeting would be our last! I was convinced he would never come again. I sighed a sad sigh to myself, and felt much better for it. That whole day, I sat at the small table on the kang, and continued to write down my memories of my brother.

The next morning, I was carrying on with my writing when suddenly the outer door was quietly pushed open and there was Wei Ying standing in front of me, smiling.

"Wei Ying?" I called out in happy astonishment. "What a surprise!"

"A surprise?" he smiled shyly.

"Why didn't our dog bark? You must have thrown him something good to eat!"

"Of course not," he smiled. "It's because there's a bond, between me and anything connected with dogs."

"Do you mean me?" I laughed. "I was born in the Year of the Dog."

"No." He lowered his head in shy amusement and explained, "No, I didn't mean you. I didn't know in fact. . . What I said is true though, the dogs in our village very seldom snap at me, however fierce they are."

"Maybe you've got some kind of magic," I joked.

"What are you writing?" He leaned over to take a look at my book.

"Me? Just scribbling something to while away the time." I closed the book and got down from the kang to pour him a glass of hot water with some sugar in it.

"I thought you wouldn't come again."

"Why?"

How could I say why? So I just smiled instead.

"I know what you were thinking!" he said with a quiet, sensitive smile.

"Then it saves me the trouble of telling you!" I feigned an air of nonchalance.

"I don't know why it is, but I haven't been able to stop thinking about coming here to see you."

Goodness, that he should make this confession of his own accord! He was faltering, he seemed to be trying to pluck up his courage.

"Did you … did you come without any hesitation, or did it take you a long time to make up your mind?" I hesitated.

"You're a good guesser!"

He laughed happily. We were silent for a while, lost in our own thought. So it was love at first sight! For both of us! Who would have believed it possible! It so seldom happened! And yet, however close the bond between us was, we could never be more than friends. . . He looked up at me and then lowered his eyes.

"You know, it does puzzle us—me, Wei Li, and many of our friends—how you came to marry Zhiguo," he said to me softly. "Can you tell me?" He looked at me intensely, as if beseeching me for a reply.

Surely he hadn't come here today to ask me this? I wasn't interested in talking about myself if it was just to satisfy an idle curiosity of his. But his earnest, pained expression made it hard to refuse him. I was moved by his concern. What harm was there in his wanting to know me better, to be my true friend? He deserved my trust!

"You really want to know?" We sat facing one another, each leaning against a wall to make ourselves more comfortable. He looked at me attentively, as if preparing himself for a lecture by some distinguished professor.

Slowly, I began my story. …

72.98 Aunty Li's Pocket Watch\fn{by Liang Bingjun aka Le Si (1948-)} Guandong Province, China (M) 4

Everybody in the office had gone home. I was the only one left, finishing up copying the accounts, when all of a sudden the telephone rang. I picked up the receiver.

"Hello."

"Get me Director Wang on the line." On the other end of the phone was a slightly deep voice with a commanding tone. I recognized who it was and almost immediately stammered back.

"Uh, is this Aunty Li? Director Wang's gone."

"What time did he leave?"

"At 5:00. Quitting time."

"You must be joking! It's not even 5:00!" She slammed down the phone fiercely, and suddenly all I could hear was the sound of the dial tone. My ear was hot, but I didn't know if it was because of the scolding I had just endured or what. I looked at my watch. I had five after five. I looked back and the clock on our wall also read five after five. Director Wang obviously left according to the time on the wall. This time he really had bad luck. I silently turned my watch back five minutes, then, thinking about it, set it just a little earlier. I'd have to check it against Aunty Li's time, then it would be right.

In our factory, only Aunty Li's time is accurate. Nobody knows how long she's been working here. Some say she's been here since it started; others say she's related to the boss. No matter what, from the time our company was just a little Chinese-style sewing shop, with just a few seamstresses, up to right now, having developed into a large-scale Western-style garment factory, Aunty Li has always been here. No one knows exactly what her position is, but if you considered our factory a big family, then she would be the strict and authoritative grandmother.

She's always been here, issuing the rules, passing out rewards and punishments. If the seamstresses have a complaint, or if a staff member has an idea, for the most part they meet with her. We've heard a lot of stories passed on, of her promoting new people and extending benefits. But those are just stories. There are also those that hold her ability to determine right and wrong in the highest esteem, but that's just hearsay too. At least we're too young and didn't have the chance to witness the glory of her former days. By the time we started working here, her power was already supreme. We also never had the opportunity to see how it had been tested. She was already a symbol of legislation and enforcement. We're all quite afraid of her. If anything isn't to her liking, she immediately makes a phone call. We only have to hear that slightly deep voice with the commanding tone, and we know there's a problem.

Aunty Li's sense of time is as serious and principled as her sense of right and wrong. She has an old pocket watch that never leaves her person. People say it's one of the rare treasures that came to China during the Qing dynasty that her father passed on to her. The accuracy of that watch is well known. In any of the rooms of our factory, if any clock is slightly off, it always ends up being reset according to Aunty Li's pocket watch. Similarly, if there are any disputes between personnel, it's always Aunty Li's judgments that are the standard. Aunty Li and her pocket watch have really become a kind of law in our factory.

So, the next day as I was telling Director Wang about Aunty Li's call, he looked a little frightened. Although he was still talking tough—he said something about managing affairs according to the clock—he obviously had a guilty conscience. He had lost confidence in himself and the clocks in our office. It wasn't too long before he was called in to see Aunty Li. He was gone for about half an hour, and when he came back he didn't look very good. I didn't dare ask him how it went.

At quitting time Director Wang was afraid to leave right away. He pretended like it wasn't any big deal, shuffling papers around. I obviously couldn't expose him. He stayed past five after five (that was the time by the electric clock on the wall; my watch, which I changed yesterday according to Aunty Li's time, read just 5:00), he took a deep breath and wasted a few more minutes, then, seeing there was nothing out of the ordinary, left quickly.

When it was five after five according to my watch (the wall clock was now at ten after), I put my things in order and was just about to leave.

But the phone rang suddenly. It was Aunty Li; she was looking for Director Wang.

"He left at 5:00." I could only be honest.

She didn't say a word. I got nervous and asked:

"Aunty Li … what time do you have?"

"Just 5:00!"

I promptly set my wristwatch back five minutes. You just can't trust these ordinary watches we have, I mean look, Director Wang's in trouble again.

The next day Director Wang was again called into Aunty Li's office; this time he was in there even longer. Old Feng and Old Zhu of our accounting department were talking. Today they weren't talking like they usually did about our company's lack of benefits, the problems of promotion, or the meagerness of incomes. They were discussing Director Wang's situation. They felt like I did about it. Although it seemed Director Wang was being treated a bit too harshly, he had mistakenly believed the inaccurate wall clock, so what could we say? We were just like the other office workers, simply rejoicing in the fact that it hadn't happened to us, and calculating how to consider our own best interests. Afterward we'd just pay careful attention to the time. We both respected and feared Aunty Li, and luckily we had her to look to as a model, especially as a way to check our clocks. We should obviously follow her example. As Old Zhu said, if we're gonna work, we have to follow someone else's rules. At this point Director Wang came back. He looked even worse than yesterday, so we all just shut up.

Director Wang was quiet all day; he looked as though he felt he had been wronged. I lowered my head and didn't look at him. Anyway, the work was already enough to keep me busy. In the afternoon, the manager of the maintenance department (some people said he was related to Aunty Li) came with a technician to our department. My eyes, hidden by my work, looked ahead and saw a black pair of socks. The technician had taken off his shoes to stand on my desk to adjust the wall clock. The manager dialed Aunty Li on the inside line, then looked at the clock on our wall. He said to the technician:

"Slow it down by fifteen minutes and it'll be right."

I looked at my watch, and although I had adjusted it yesterday, it was wrong again now. I set my watch back another five minutes. I'd have to watch out for myself, be especially careful. I'd have to check it every day to make sure it didn't deviate from Aunty Li's standard time.

Then I heard the manager talking into the phone, saying, "The clock in the accounting department's fixed, now we're going to the factory."

After they left I saw Old Feng and Old Zhu lift their wrists to adjust their watches according to the time on the wall. Director Wang got up and hesitated at first, then he did it too. In the quiet office all you could hear was the clicking sound of the gears of the clock.

From that day on, time was the popular topic of conversation in our office. The next day Old Feng shared with us a bit of inside news. He said because the company was approaching the day of our annual pay increases, they were paying particularly strict attention to the conduct of the employees. And Old Zhu followed with another piece of news: because of the economic depression, the garment industry was in a slump. The company was going to lay some people off, so it was a very serious situation. I heard these two different pieces of information with both joy and dread. We were insignificant office workers and would naturally give priority to playing it safe. In days past, they piled the work up on me; I always had the most work in the accounting department. I was also the last person to leave the office. The present situation seemed very different. At five o'clock, nobody was thinking about leaving, they were all still sitting obstinately in their seats. Today was Wednesday, but Old Feng, who loved to bet on the evening races, was surprisingly in no hurry to leave. Instead he asked:

"Do you think we should call and ask what time Aunty Li has?"

"Yes!" Old Zhu dialed the phone unbelievably quickly. I heard him say, "Is this Aunty Li? This is Zhu Jiming in the Accounting Department. Can I ask what time you have right now?"

Then he said completely submissively, "It's 4:55? Thanks, thank you." He didn't seem surprised in the least. He immediately took off his shoes, climbed up on my desk, and set the clock back five minutes.

All I could do was set my watch back five minutes. Ai, wrong again. It's lucky Old Zhu called to ask. These days you just can't trust your watch.

At this point Director Wang lifted his arm, then put it back down. I didn't know why he was hesitating. Then he suddenly said, one word at a time:

"Couldn't-it-be-that-Aunty-Li's-pocket-watch-is-wrong?"

I stared at him stunned. I hadn't anticipated that he'd say such a thing. And both Old Zhu and Old Feng, not knowing what to do, lowered their heads as if they hadn't heard anything. But no one heard it better. To come out with this kind of statement was not something to be taken lightly. And moreover, on what grounds could he doubt Aunty Li? She always maintained morality and discipline; she was both honest and strict. She was a model reproduction of the traditional Chinese mind. And her pocket watch was famous for its accuracy.

After Director Wang said this sentence he let his head droop down. He didn't look like he felt any better. It was probably because he'd been scolded that he was in a bad mood and had come out with this indignant state-ment.

The next day Director Wang didn't say a thing all day. The atmosphere in the whole office was a little bit stiff. I really didn't like it; in the past we had all been talkative and jovial. Director Wang would sometimes joke around, saying our factory was a harmonious combination of Chinese and Western elements, but we didn't have any of the benefits—only the disadvantages of both. For example, there aren't any measures taken for Western-style bonuses or material benefits, but there is the Western work system. There isn't any of the Chinese-style affectionate camaraderie, but there are redundant employees as a result of Chinese-style personal "connections." Afterward we could criticize the meagerness of the salaries, the gloominess of the future, and all that. But despite the fact that he'd said it, wasn't everybody still acting in the same old way? If you put it that way, though, everyone still seemed happy. And I know: Director Wang has always been inclined to respect Aunty Li. He'll occasionally pour out his grievances but he'll also say: "It's lucky there are still people like Aunty Li who hold firm to impartiality."

But now Director Wang was just silent, he hadn't said a thing. Maybe he just couldn't help but change his way of thinking.

I really couldn't bear the silence. The days seemed terribly long; it wasn't easy making it to the end of the day. Everyone tidied up their things, and I heaved a sigh. Director Wang looked at his watch, then looked at the clock on the wall. 5:01. He hesitated. He waited a bit, then finally cleaned up his things and left.

I just couldn't get the drawer of my old desk to close. I tried hard to shove it in, then swore at it, and grumbled that it hadn't been thrown out earlier. Just as I was straining, struggling with my desk, the telephone rang.

Old Feng answered it. I just heard him say, "He left." I knew it right away: this time Director Wang was really in a mess. I heard Old Feng ask what time it was, then he climbed up on my desk again and set the clock back five minutes. So now the accurate time was 4:58, instead of 5:03.

So it really wasn't quitting time yet. I abandoned my struggle with my desk, sat down, and continued transcribing.

Right after work I got a ride to the theater. I had a date with my girlfriend to see the five-thirty movie. When I got there I didn't expect to see her turning around to leave. I chased her. She ignored me completely, then finally gave me a good cursing. I didn't know what it was all about. She said I was half an hour late. I checked the time on my watch, which was set according to the clock at the office which was set according to Aunty Li's pocket watch. It was 5:30. But her watch and the clock in the hall at the theater both said 6:00. According to the man at the door of the theater, the movie had already been playing for thirty minutes. I never thought that I'd end up a victim of this clock question.

But compared to Director Wang's disaster, my problem was really nothing. The next morning when Director Wang came in he was immediately called into the office. After hardly any time he came back out, indignantly packed up his things, and left. People said he had been fired. No one dared ask him anything. Someone said he suspected that comment about Aunty Li's pocket watch was one of the reasons for his punishment. But it probably wasn't true, because when somebody got fired, no one was really very clear about it. As Director Wang was packing up his things, tearing up pieces of scrap paper, the calm expression on his face couldn't hide his rage. In the whole office, the silence was broken only by the mechanical whistling sound of tearing paper. Finally he left without uttering a word.

After he left, I had a feeling that something wasn't quite right, but I didn't know what it was. After a while I heard the sounds of talking and laughing behind me. I couldn't hear clearly, but it seemed to be Old Feng jokingly calling Old Zhu "Director," as if, since Director Wang was gone, his position was there for Old Zhu to fill.

But after a few days Old Zhu was disappointed. Aunty Li brought someone named Li onto the scene and introduced him to us. During the introduction, in passing, Aunty Li made a stern comment about justice. She mentioned the importance of submitting to discipline and respecting one's seniors. She especially stressed the traditional Chinese virtue of punctuality as something we mustn't neglect. I thought what Aunty Li had to say was very significant. In an industrial organization, discipline is very important. Director Wang's situation was extremely unlucky, but since things ended up the way they did, no matter who comes on the scene, we insignificant office workers will just have to keep on doing our work. As for Old Zhu, I don't know if it was because he coveted the potential connections of the position or what, but afterward he told us that the new director Li was really Aunty Li's cousin. But we didn't know whether to believe him or not.

The days passed as they had before, the only difference was that each day before quitting time Director Li would call to check Aunty Li's time. Each day we would discover that our watches were five minutes fast, and we'd promptly correct them according to her time. Each day when work was over we'd call Aunty Li, adjust our watches, then we'd correct the clock on the wall. It had become part of our daily routine, just like those letters full of official jargon were part of each day's work, it was an indispensable verse of our closing song. And now each day, climbing up on the desk to slow the clock by five minutes according to Aunty Li's accurate time had become my responsibility. And of course I followed the director's orders, without the slightest doubt. I was just doing the work that was assigned to me. We can really do things without thinking.

At the beginning there was no problem. The days passed one at a time. Our factory gradually seemed to become a world apart from the outside. In each department our colleagues began to miss the bus and train. Missing the beginnings of movies and arriving late to parties gave rise to husbands' suspicions and wives' complaints for everyone. Nothing could be done about meeting the kids after school or missing night school. As for me, my girlfriend went from being mad at me to asking me rather humorously if I was working according to daylight savings time. But finally she couldn't take it any more and we broke up. But how could I say anything about it? I could only talk about Aunty Li's celebrated pocket watch, and about her strictness and her impeccable sense of time. I brought up several historical examples. From the time of the resistance during the Hong Kong occupation through a decade or more of prosperous economic development, Aunty Li's pocket watch played an important role in our organization. But my girlfriend—she just curled her lip and said we were completely crazy, and that we had fallen behind the real time and didn't even know it. Several of our colleagues were worried in the same way. There was no way they could persuade outsiders to believe Aunty Li's time was really accurate and that the outside world was a quickly passing mirage. People on the outside weren't in our organization, so there was no way to make them feel the soundness of Aunty Li 's authority. Half the time we were in the office, and the other half the time we were in the outside world; it started feeling like two different time zones. It was really a big hassle.

The days passed like this one at a time. Each day we'd leave work according to Aunty Li's time, but each day the color of the sky seemed darker. When other people went to work we were still at home sleeping; and when we got off work the streets were already peacefully without human shadows. I was really jealous of the outside world's night life, but all I could do was resent the fact that the external world's sense of time wasn't the same as Aunty Li's standard time. Everyone felt about the same way: some upheld Aunty Li's accuracy and spumed the reality of the outside world. Others started, as Director Wang had, to doubt Aunty Li. But these were both minorities; most people did things according to the rules, living one day at a time, where accidentally complaining was bad luck.

Each day when we got off work there were fewer and fewer people on the street. At first everyone thought we were the crowd coming out after the last movie, but a little while later people thought it was an illegal meeting and sent out the police to suppress our demonstration. In the early hours of the morning as we dispersed onto the completely empty streets, whether we were returning to the meanest alley or a new section of town, no one would believe that we were just coming home from work. The men were frequently searched by the police but even more frequently mugged in the stairwells; and a day didn't go by without a woman being attacked. But these sorts of things happened so often, and of course everyone was affected, so this also became a part of our daily routine.

Despite the fact that all the employees of the factory were coming and going according to Aunty Li's standard time, the rise and decline of the garment industry wasn't under the same control. Under the influence of the depression, the industry's tendency to grow was reduced; orders were down, and so was production. Within the factory, rumors were steadily increasing. Everyone was saying that America and Japan, and even a consortium of Eastern European countries, were going to buy into our company. The old look of our company was apparently going to change. I didn't know whether or not to believe this kind of gossip, until this one day when Aunty Li had me bring the account book to her office. As a result I saw an unfamiliar middle-aged man talking with her there. She passed the account book over to him. I stood to one side, bored, waiting, just like a page boy. He glanced at a few numbers, then said several things I didn't quite understand. I stood blankly behind him, leaning against the wall, practically falling asleep, when finally I saw him look at his wristwatch and say:

"It's almost 5:00, we'll talk again another day."

When I heard this, I couldn't contain my fright. I thought this guy would get a scolding. Behind him, the clock on the wall (no doubt adjusted each day to Aunty Li's pocket watch) now read 11:00 A.M. His watch, like most of the watches in the outside world, had clearly not been adjusted to Aunty Li's standard.

I waited for an angry rebuke. But nothing happened. I just saw Aunty Li amiably shake hands with this man, smiling as they parted. Not a comment was made about what he said. I thought maybe she didn't hear him, but ordinarily that wouldn't be the case. But then why? She opened the door to see the man off, then came back in and sat down without noticing me. I stood there behind her, trying my hardest to make a small sound to let her know I was there. But she didn't hear; she was concentrating on turning the pages of the account book on the desk. She had obviously forgotten I was standing there, watching her from behind. After a while she closed the account book, then fished her pocket watch out of her pocket. She opened it, looked at it, then put it on the table. She stared into the empty space in front of her. After a minute she held her forehead as if she had a headache, then put her head down on the desk. I really didn't know what to do. Should I just stay here behind her, or go for the door? Now it seemed like I was behind her looking for other people's secrets. But it wasn't intentional. I could swear it was absolutely unintentional. I just couldn't bear staring at Aunty Li's full head of white hair. A moment before she had the bearing of an ordinary sickly old woman, displaying the frailness of her wrinkles. This really didn't fit in with my resolute, serious image of her.

Thinking about what had just happened, a faint feeling of uneasiness came over me. I felt like a worm was nibbling at me. Why hadn't she reprimanded that middle-aged outsider like she did the people in our factory in order to keep a proper sense of time? I really didn't understand. It was this that drew out my suspicions. It forced me, who had always just followed orders, to start thinking about it. It was this that got my courage up quietly to take a step forward to look at that famous pocket watch.

It was the first time I had ever seen a pocket watch in my life. It was next to Aunty Li's prostrated head. Set off by a few fragile white hairs, it was very different than I had imagined. All I saw was an ordinary open pocket watch, very old looking with a few greasy stains. The shell and the hands of the watch were rusty, and the numbers were blurred beyond recognition. Frankly, I couldn't tell if the hands were still moving or not. I just watched, and from a crack in the shell of the watch suddenly emerged a little brown worm.

76.1 Traveling Harvesters\fn{by Shao Zhenguo (1948-)} Peking, China (M) 17

It was not yet light, but in the east a patch of sky was whitening, slowly illuminating the county town of Qian-yang in Shaanxi Province and its single street, where all the traders came to hawk their wares.

Gradually, the outlines of the street became clearer, revealing dark humps of figures that looked for all the world like the old grindstones and stone lions which used to stand outside the houses of well-to-do families. As one came nearer, however, one could make out coiled legs and hunched backs of oddly strewn sleepers.

What were they doing there?

They were "chasing the harvest." They were the traveling harvesters from Zhuanglang.

Zhuanglang is a county in Gansu Province with a circumference of several hundred kilometers lying at the foot of the Guanshan Mountains. That might seem like a lot of land, but it's very densely populated and the gods have always looked on it unkindly—there's drought nine years out of ten and even to get 200 catties of grain per mu is no mean feat. Since the household contract system was implemented, they say a lot of places have been getting yields of 500 or 600 catties, but some of the mountain regions have no water and little fertilizer.

And then even if they have water they dare not put it on the fields. In Zhuangiang the soil is really weird. If you put water on it goes hard like a rock and crushes the young shoots. So when everyone has planted their bit of land, usually just over a mu or so, they go off and "follow the harvest.'

Every May, then, the men from Zhuangiang swarm across to Shaanxi Province to cut the wheat—they make the long journey to the East in one big leap and then slowly work their way back home. As soon as the wheat in Baoji is cut, it's just ripening in Fengxiang; when the harvest is over in Qianyang, you can still hurry to catch the one in Longxian. By June, they're not far from home and can get back in time to cut their own crop.

This way of following the harvest is a Zhuangiang tradition, handed down from their forefathers. The old men have always done it like this, and their sons learn from them—it's become ingrained, second nature. If a man from Zhuangiang doesn't go out to harvest, he feels uneasy all year long, as though there's something that he's forgotten to do. When you go out cutting you don't have to worry about food—your boss gives you your three meals a day, steamed bread and soup too, really good nosh. But it is not easy to earn those three meals—in the day the sun burns all the skin of your shoulders, and at night you sleep out in the fields or in some barn, completely exhausted, without a twitch, like a dead donkey. Getting your skin scorched is nothing, but if the weather changes and the first tiny spot of rain falls your heart just sinks like a stone:

"Shit! We'll never get the wheat in!"

If you have to stop cutting, the boss stops your nosh; you have to open up your ration bag and break into some parched flour or dried bread that you've saved from previous meals. And even that's not so disastrous: the worst thing is failing to follow the harvest from place to place. In the past couple of years there's been too many cutters and too few bosses. When a boss comes to hire people, he gets surrounded like by a swarm of bees, and it's devil take the hindmost—if you're a step or two too slow you don't make the harvest. And if there are a lot of cutters, of course, then the price drops; you used to be able to try for four or five yuan a mu, but nowadays the boss just sticks out his chest and shouts, “One yuan twenty a mu, who’s coming?” and the harvesters have no choice but to go along with it. In a day or two the price has dropped to under a yuan a mu, or else they’ll forget about wages and just give you your food . You see that there aren’t going to be any more employers, and the wheat in these parts will soon be all finished; there’s nothing else for it:

“Come on, damn it, as long as we can fill our bellies …”

Back in Qianyang’s single street it was now fully light, and the place was getting lively with street vendors and traders. The harvesters were already sitting up, scratching the night’s mosquito bites on their legs, watching the mass of people, pushing carts or lugging shoulder poles, and looking to see if there might be any “bosses” among them.

With vigorous strides, a sturdy young lad walked over toward them.

“Dad! Can’t you be a bit flexible? You can’t just sit there forever! A moment ago a team leader from Shuichuang hired more than forty folk straight off at the bus depot.”

The lad had a fine build and a handsome face with large eyes which flashed with intelligence. He was wearing a white, sweat-stained shirt, patched black trousers and a pair of hemp shoes, completely worn away at the heels. Despite his clothes, however, he looked a picture of energy. ..

Wu Hedong looked up at his breathless son and then continued as before to sit on the concrete step and eat his parched flour. He managed to gulp down the last dry mouthful and then scraped the bottom of his bowl.

“Hold your horses, there’s no rush. I got a good look at this place last night. There’s a fair bit of wheat, thick wheat too. It won’t be gone for a while yet.”

And he shifted his gaze back to the people passing by. Wu Shunchang, as his name suggests, was an obedient son and, although he was burning with impatience, he sat himself resignedly down on the stone steps.

“Won’t you have something to eat? I’ve got some parched flour and hard bread. You can get a bowl of boiling water from that restaurant and give it all a good soak.”

“No, I won’t.” Wu Shunchang tossed his head, and his large, handsome eyes fell into a blank stare. He remembered the time, a few years back, when they had gone to cut wheat in Xian. They looked out over the vast expanse of the Qin Plain of golden corn, so densely packed that the wind couldn’t even bend the stalks, and the old man’s face lit up, and his eyes smiled like two sickles. Finding that the bosses were being really miserly and not paying much, Wu Hedong gave a grunt and lay down on the ground.

“God, I’m fairly whacked from the walk here, let’s rest first.” The idea being: let’s see if you won’t raise your wages a bit! The next day they came to look at the vast expanse of wheat and found that it had all been cut, every last stalk of it.

“Oh, that’s it! That finishes everything!” reproached Shunchang with angry tears. But Wu Hedong surveyed the fields full of bundles of cut wheat and pronounced once more:

“Humph! Just lumping those bundles back to be threshed will take a good few days. Don’t get impatient. We might as well go and rest again.”

But by noon there wasn’t as much as a bundle of wheat left on that whole plain.

“What do you think of that, dad? You’ve lived on the land all your life and you don’t know the old saying that ‘wheat’s only ripe for a day!’ People have to ‘snatch food out of the dragon’s mouth.’ Who’s going to wait for the likes of us! Wheat’s green in the morning, but by afternoon the ears hang and the grains fall “

“You know only too well. Want to teach your grandmother how to suck eggs, eh?”

Was Wu Hedong really not worried about missing the harvest now, then? How could he not be? You only had to look at his head which hadn’t seen a razor for many a day and now was thick with dust. Everyone else sprinkled their heads with a few handfuls of cold water and shaved themselves clean with their sickle-blades; it made them feel cooler and more refreshed. Wu Hedong, however, had heard the old folk say that you had to let your hair grow when you went harvesting. If you cut your hair you wouldn’t get to cut the wheat. You’d be sure to miss the harvest. He knew that it was just superstition, of. course, just a bit of nonsense, but even so wild horses couldn’t get him to shave his head.

Now, as he mechanically followed the movements of the passers-by, a look of melancholy was buried deep in his old, muddy eyes. Some parched flour was lodged in the black stubble of his chin, and his prominent Adam's apple bobbed up and down as he muttered to himself:

“Ah, in the old days we had ‘harvest-leaders,’ but now it’s every man for himself.”

A harvest-leader, otherwise known as a “harvest-bully,” was a strong young chap who thought he knew a bit of martial arts and could stand up out of a crowd of harvesters, strike himself on the chest and proclaim:

“I’m running this harvest! The price is five yuan a mu, and nobody better think about doing it for any less!”

And if anyone tried to hire himself he would get a good hiding. The bosses had their bluff called, and all they could do was to raise the price.

In the old days, Wu Hedong was a “harvest-leader” himself and used to beat his chest and shout the wage for the day. On one occasion, however, his act of whirling his arms and lifting a stone roller failed to frighten his opponents off; a number of hired thugs suddenly rushed up, knocked him to the ground and beat him so viciously he couldn’t get up again. He was still a little lame in his left leg to this day. At the time, he just gritted his teeth and told himself:

“Humph! The world goes in circles, rivers change course every thirty years. Just wait! When you come to our place as a traveling harvester, I’ll show you!”

The “thirty years” had gone by, and Wu Hedong was still a harvester. The passers-by, the traders and people coming in search of casual labor all seemed to be a head taller than him; their eyes darted side-long glances as they passed, but disdained to look him directly in the eyes. And who would look harvesters in the eyes? If you mention them, everyone says the same, for every ten of them there are nine thieves, and they’ll steal anything they lay their eyes on. When they eat in a restaurant they’ll swipe the rice-bowl and the chop-sticks too; if they get on a cart they’re likely to undo the ropes securing the brake, jump off and scarper with them So every year when the harvesters are due to arrive, all the householders take precautions and close their doors securely to avoid finding a bed-quilt stolen or a chicken missing.

But anyone who thinks he can take advantage of the harvesters, by saying they’ve cut a mu less than they have or something, has got another thing coming. Their legs are as precise as measuring rods—two hundred and forty paces is a mu, twenty-four paces is a fen, and you can’t cheat them out of a single fen. When Wu Hedong was a young man he came back from working on his bit of land one day and saw a hawk make off with one of his old hens. He stamped his feet and bit his lips in rage and only wished that he had wings and could fly after it. For days afterwards, he had a sick feeling in his heart about it, but eventually he dreamed up a plan of revenge. He ran up on to the hillside, stripped off his clothes and smeared his body with pig’s blood, and then lay down on the ground with pig’s offal spread out on his stomach, closed his eyes and waited for the hawk to come circling down to eat the tasty corpse. Sure enough the big bird flew down, its whirling wings covering the sky, and just the sight of its ferocious beak enough to scare anyone to death, but Wu Hedong lay completely still without the slightest twitch. The hawk jumped down on to his chest and was just about to peck at his eyes, when he opened them wide, whipped up his arms and grabbed the hawk by the neck. He then shook off the offal and went laughing back to the village. Everybody rushed out to see Wu Hedong beat the hawk to death, cursing it as he did so:

“I’ll give you what for, you thieving rascal! I’m a bigger thief myself. How dare you nab my chicken? And here’s what you’re going to get for it!”

When he had strangled the “roc” and skinned it, he took it to the local trading station and swapped it for a juicy, young chicken.

Shunchang watched as the employers slowly became fewer and fewer, but knowing how obstinate his old dad was, he didn’t dare say a word. He went and asked for a bowl of hot water from the noodle stall and silently began to mix his parched flour into it. Just as he had started eating, a tractor rumbled to a halt at the end of the street. A man stood up on the wagon and bawled out:

“Who’s coming to Nanchuan? The wheat’s not thick, I’ll pay two yuan twenty a mu, get on board anyone who wants to!”

“Shunchang! Quick!”

By the time Shunchang had rushed over, the boss had already counted out the cartful of men and waved his arm:

“That’s it! No more! Hey, didn’t you hear me!” he shouted threateningly, and with force he unclasped Shunchang's hand, which was clinging to the side of the cart. Looking up with his handsome face, Shunchang pleaded with the boss:

“Hey, Pop! Pop! Take me along, I’ve got to go with my dad!”

“No way. I’ve got enough now. Any more and it’s a wasted trip.”

“Let me on, Pop, please.”

Just then a sweet, crisp woman's voice called out:

“Anyone for Linyou? It’s hill country. We’ll settle on the price when you see the crop!”

The harvesters turned round and found a good-looking young woman of about twenty-five. She was clad in a traditional-style Chinese tunic, close-fitting black hemp trousers and embroidered black cloth shoes with button loops: neat and tidy from top to toe. The harvesters were all won over in a trice and rushed over toward her.

"I only want one!" she said hurriedly, and her deep, dark eyes skipped over the crowd and settled directly on Shunchang, who was still standing by the tractor.

Suddenly, the tractor rumbled off and Shunchang couldn't help turning around and calling after his departing father, "Dad—"

Linyou lies amid mountainous country with thick, green forest and gurgling springs. The yield of the crops isn't so high, but there aren't many people, and the weather is good for farming, so there is often grain to spare. If you tried to get anyone to settle there though, they would be sure to refuse. Due to some strange quirk of the environment, most of the families there have at least one "cripple"—a victim of a kind of Kaschin-Beck disease, with a large head, short body and crippled legs. It is mostly men who contract the disease, and so most of the laboring has to be done by the women. People from other parts tell jokes about them, like that the men can't get on the kang brick bed by themselves and have to get the women to help them up; or a father threatens his misbehaving son:

"You'd better not do that again! I might not be able to stop you, but I'll tell your mother when she comes back to put me up on the kang, and then you're really going to get a good hiding!"

Or there's the joke about the "healthy one" who can bash himself on the chest and say:

"Yeah, my legs might be a bit short, but that ten kilometers walk was nothing. Why, it took me no more than three days!"

For this reason, of course, they often need harvesters to go there. Indeed, the harvesters boast that if it wasn't for them, most of the grain in Linyou would be left to rot in the fields.

As Shunchang followed the young woman's steps along the narrow mountain path, the dazzling gold sun lit up the rich vegetation around them. Neither of them had much to say. Her embroidered shoes pattered ahead along the ground like two dancing black butterflies, while his heel-less hemp shoes clattered on after like a pair of flails.

"Come on!" shouted the young woman, breaking the long silence.

"Uh," Shunchang would reply, or at most he would say, "Yes, I'm coming," which meant that she should lead the way.

He stopped to change shoulders with his carrying-pole and turned to look at the tiny plots of land on the mountainside. The wheat was thin and of poor quality: only two hundred catties a mu or so. He could easily cut three mu a day at a price of at least one yuan a mu. Seventy or eighty cents would be all right, really … that would make two yuan ten or two yuan forty a day … on the plain you couldn't get through more than one and a fifth mu in a day, so it worked out at much the same. As Shunchang was doing his calculations he looked up ahead and saw that the woman had stopped and turned to look at him.

"How come we have to walk along in silence? Are you dumb or something?"

"Uh? Uh …"

Shunchang's handsome face looked blank, and the comers of his mouth curled upwards in an embarrassed grin.

"How much land has your family got, boss?"

She waited for him to catch up and then walked by his side, her "black butterflies" slowing their pace a little. She turned to him, her fair face suffused with pink.

"Oh, there's enough for you to cut, don't worry! There's three in the family, and we've got ten mu each. You work it out for yourself."

"Thirty mu! I'll have a job cutting all that on my own, it'll be completely yellow and starting to fall before I'm through all that."

"But there's me as well, don't forget," she said, looking across to him with her dark, pool-like eyes and replacing a fluttering strand of hair from her cheek to behind her ear. "Don't I look up to cutting wheat then or something?"

Shunchang didn't dare to look at those eyes for too long; he dropped his gaze, but his eyes fell this time to the swell of her breasts inside her tunic.

"What about your husband?"

"Him? Cut wheat? Haven't you been to Linyou before?"

"No, it's my first time."

As they spoke they came to the village—a stretch of dry river bed bounded on both sides by mountains. Strange-shaped rocks towered up out of the river bed; a shallow brook wove among them and birds flew to and fro on their tops.

"Look, there's our land," she said standing on the mountain slope and pointing ahead, "over there, that really green patch. And that's our farmhouse."

"Ah."

The yard-door opened with a creak. The young woman stamped her feet to knock the earth from her shoes and then went m.

"Come in, come in. What are you standing out there for?"

Shunchang had thought that he had better wait outside; hearing himself called into the yard he was at a loss what to do, and then, following his hostess' example, he stamped his feet vigorously on the ground, this caused him no little pain, for he had forgotten the shoes had no heels.

The yard was neat and tidy, the ground was swept clean, and on one side mustard seed had been laid out to dry. An old woman sat in the middle, turning the seeds with a stick.

"Ma, it's midday. Aren't you going to have a rest?"

"Ah, our girl's back, and who's this …?" The old woman shielded her narrowed eyes with her hand and looked at Shunchang.

"He's come to cut wheat for us," said the young woman hurriedly.

"Oh, well then, food's ready. It's in the kitchen. When you've eaten you can get cracking with the wheat, I can see the ears are getting really yellow."

Shunchang laid his cloth kit-bag at the foot of the wall, opened it up and took out two sickles and a grindstone. He asked for a bowl of water, then squatted down and began to sharpen the blades.

The old woman heard the swish of the sharpening sickles and narrowed her eyes once l1lore; the tops of the young lad's shoulders were smooth and round, and with each movement his muscles bulged. His chest was broad and straight and his long legs wide apart, his heels pressed powerfully down into the ground. My, he really looked like he could get through some work. He wasn't a bad-looker either: a round face, a bulging bridge to his nose, flashing eyes … if only my "bum" could have been like that!

"Grandma," Shunchang called to the old woman affectionately. "Don't worry about that wheat of yours getting too ripe," he said, running his thumb down the sickle blade, "I'm a quick cutter, it'll be done in no time."

The old woman blinked her eyes.

"Oh, what a good lad! Shuixiang, hurry up with the food!"

They turned around and saw that Shuixiang had already brought the food and was just standing there, thinking something over to herself

As soon as the tractor chugged its way into Nanchuan, the heads of the households, who had long been awaiting its arrival, began to clamor:

"I want three of them!"

"I want two!"

"I want a young man!"

At the same time the loudspeaker of the production brigade was blaring out some wailing opera to form a scene as confused as a "mixed dumpling" of maize and millet.

People in Shaanxi Province like to eat "mixed dumplings," but Zhang Genfa had developed an appetite for other things. He was squatting leisurely to one side, with his arms crossed; he held a cigarette in his right hand, while on his left wrist flashed a brand-new watch. With wheat cutters you don't look for the fast ones, but the ones who can cut clean; and in bundling the wheat it's not prettiness that counts, but strength and durability—young lads tie bundles that fall apart as soon as you lift them. And they eat more too: young ones can easily get through seven or eight bowls in just one meal. He looked at Wu Hedong through screwed-up eyes and took out a packet of Peony cigarettes. The silver paper crackled as he opened it.

A cigarette landed at Wu Hedong's feet.

"And I'll take you too, and you, and you. That makes four of you. Come on, we'll be off."

There was an old guy with a hunchback, one with a beard ringing his face and a middle-aged chap in his forties. They arrived at the field together and found that Zhang Genfa had a big crop of level wheat, so thick that you could hardly get a sickle into it and with such bulging grains and sturdy awns\fn{Bristles; the "beard" of wheat, which terminate the scales of the spikelets.} that you could lay a mat on top and go to sleep. Wu Hedong threw his pack down on the field's edge, fixed the blade in his sickle and looked out over the wheat:

"But there must be over five hundred catties a mu there, boss."

"Oh no, there's never that much."

Zhang Genfa shook his head and linked his cigarette stub with another Peony cigarette.

"It may look quite even, but in fact it's pretty thin stuff. You can cut one and a half mu a day, no problem. Get yourselves ready and we'll get down to work. Oh, you're not hungry, are you? It's too late for breakfast really, so if you're not too hungry then we should maybe wait until midday."

"Well," said the hunchback, patting his stomach with his straw hat, "I wouldn't mind a bite to eat now, but there again I don't mind too much if we don't, I don't feel all that hungry yet. What do you lot think?" he said, turning to his comrades, his raised eyebrows indicating his dilemma.

Wu Hedong blinked his old, muddy eyes a couple of times, lifted his lame leg, hobbled a couple of paces over to the wheat field and began to cut the wheat.

Zhang Genfa's wife had just come out with a wicker basket. She saw the figures of the harvesters departing into the field and was on the point of calling out to them, but her husband waved over to her:

"Hey woman, go and get my sickle and hurry up about it!"

His wife stood apologetically for a while before setting off back to the house.

The swish of the sickle was all that could be heard, and no steps were visible; every few swishes made a bundle of wheat, and after every few bundles a change of sickles was needed. It was approaching midday, but they had only cut a few tenths of a mu, and Wu Hedong's faded black coat was giving off steam like the cloth in a bamboo steamer. That bad leg of his had started to ache again, and he felt like sitting down and resting for a while, but then the image of Shunchang's mother flashed in front of his eyes: what would she be doing in the house now? Still stripping bamboo? She would strip the skin off each cane of bamboo, cut them down to the same length and thickness, steep them in water until they were soft and then weave them into mats or sieves. She had worn herself out with all that hard work and worry, but still they hadn't managed to settle Shunchang's marriage. They hadn't been able to raise the money for the betrothal gifts, and the girl had been married to someone else

Thinking of all this, Wu Hedong bent his lame leg and pressed on forward. The wheat fell, clump after clump The sun had already passed the zenith, and the loudspeaker had started up again. After another piece of wailing opera, it started to broadcast the brigade's own news:

"This year we have done even better than last. The more we use the contract system, the better off we're going to be."

It was all announced very grandly and sonorously in local dialect with thick Shaanxi accents.

"The award is given to the conspicuous householders—the Wangs, the Zhaos and the Zhangs—haven't made them too proud. They're not resting on their laurels, indeed their enthusiasm is even greater than before."

Zhang Genfa stood in the shade of a tree, listening to the broadcast. As he surveyed his fields of wheat, he couldn't stop a smile from breaking over his face.

"Hey lads, come under the tree and have a rest. We'll have our lunch now. Come on, everyone!"

Zhang's wife came out again with the wicker basket. She put the steamed bread and the cabbage down on the ground and stuck a spoon in the basin of soup:

"Eat up, lads. I'm sorry it's such poor fare, but I hope it fills you up, and help yourselves to the soup."

The harvesters crowded around, sat down on the ground and began to wolf the food down. The boss walked off somewhere, and the bearded chap saw his opportunity to stuff some bread under his shirt.The middle-aged fellow gave him a dig with his elbow though, and signaled with his lips in the direction of the tree, whereupon he replaced the bread in the basket.

Wu Hedong looked over at the scholartree—an old chap of seventy or more was lying on the ground, his head propped on the roots of the tree, looking like nothing more than a cow collapsed from exhaustion. He was muttering something with his old toothless mouth. Each movement creased his whole face up in wrinkles and caused his rough beard to jut up.

"Oh … it doesn't matter, take a few for yourself, it's all right."

As he spoke, a good-natured smile spread over his face.

The harvesters felt more easy at this, and Wu Hedong took a bread roll as well. He broke it into pieces and laid it out to dry in the sun so that he could keep it when it was dried. Suddenly, he thought of his son Shunchang. Was the lad eating his lunch now as well? And where could he be? …

For lunch there was "oil-splashed noodles." Shunchang ate four bowls straight off and then saw that Shuixiang was carrying in steamed bread as well.

"Oh, I've had enough really, I've not even done any work yet," he said quickly, in some embarrassment.

"But you've been walking the whole morning, here have some," Shuixiang said.

Shunchang took a snow-white roll of steamed bread and wolfed it down.

"I'm going out to reap now, boss," he declared, wiping his lips.

"Oh, but the sun's too hot now, you'll be boiled alive, we'd be better to wait a while."

"Oh, but … I'm not afraid of a bit of heat." He picked up his sickles and strode out of the yard; Shuixiang followed his receding figure with her deep, dark eyes. Why had she chosen him that morning at Qianyang? Was it out of pity or simply because he looked honest and hardworking? She had first caught sight of him as he wandered around the end of the street, looking hard with those big eyes of his for someone to hire him, and she couldn't help measuring him up with her eye. Later, when the shop opened, she went in just to have a look around, and she saw him again. He had in his hands a pair of size 41 gym shoes and, lifting up his feet, tried them for size for a long time against the heel-less soles of his old hemp shoes mumbling softly over and over to himself:

"Five yuan … five yuan."

In the end he put the shoes back on the counter and didn't buy them. Later still, when she saw him clinging desperately to the tractor and pleading with the man, she for some reason suddenly felt a pain welling up inside her heart, and she couldn't stop herself calling out like she did. Yes, it was out of pity for him, but then again a lot of people had a hard time of it, so why was it just him she took pity on?

Shuixiang's face suddenly blushed bright red. She realized that it wasn't a harvester she had chosen, but something else altogether, and she cursed herself bitterly: Oh, you're a wicked woman you've no shame at all, a young wife with wicked ideas like that!

"Shuixiang!"

Shuixiang came to with a start and saw her mother standing on the steps of the south-facing main room.

"What are you doing standing there like a lemon? Why don't you go and show him where to go?"

"I … I was looking for my sickle." Her sickle and her straw hat were hanging right in front of her eyes; she took them down and hurried out. Shunchang was definitely no slouch when it came to reaping; most cutters just used their arms, but he even brought his legs into it. Before the wheat had fallen, his left arm circled round and rolled the wheat backward; when it was all rolled up into a big bundle, he picked it up between his sickle and his foot and threw it over to one side. But when Shunchang looked down for the patch of land down the hill he got a shock:

"By heck, how can the boss be that fast!"

Shuixiang knew herself that she was a fast cutter, and although her field was a little smaller than Shunchang's, she had soon cut it all and didn't feel the least bit tired. In fact, she felt as though her energy was inexhaustible. She stood up, took the sweat-cloth from her waist, and as she wiped her deep-rosy cheeks and slender neck, her eyes unconsciously strayed over toward Shunchang's side.

She vaulted nimbly over the earth bank and watched him from behind as he worked, with the cleanly cut field lying at his back. The stubble was short, and all the bundles of wheat were the same size and the ears together. Seeing how he worked seemed to give her even more energy; she bounded over in a few strides and began cutting at the edge of Shunchang's field.

"Hey. How come you're cutting here, boss?"

"Because I've seen you're cutting so slowly, that's why!"

Shunchang was struck dumb; he made a few hasty cuts and then lurched to a halt:

"But when we've finished, what about the wages? How are we going to work them out?"

"Oh, I know how," replied Shuixiang sharply, with a voice like a sickle scything through a wheat stalk.

"But …"

"All right, let's say you cut twenty mu to my ten, will that be good enough for you?"

"But that could never be right. Let's just say half each then and leave it at that."

Shuixiang smiled secretly to herself under her straw hat, and her red face shone. Without realizing, she began to move closer and closer to him.

The village of Nanchuan was wrapped in the gloom of evening, and along with it the gnarled old scholartree with the protruding roots. The harvesters had finished their supper and were sitting under the old scholartree chatting to each other—the best way they had of relieving their tired bodies. The old hunchback puffed contentedly on his pipe, and each lungful was more delicious than the last:

"I remember we had to walk that day from Baoji to Fengxiang; it were getting dark, and my old legs were just about giving up, and then a car pulls up with some city guest in it. He looked like an official to me, and then he shouts, 'Hey you, get in here.' 'Heck,' I think to myself, 'what does he want to nab a harvester like me for?' I haven't nicked a thing. But it turns out he wants me to cut some wheat for him, and so I gets in that limo of his, and it races off over to his place! Heck, I might be a hunchback, but with luck like that a person don't have to scramble for everything. Those other folk may be able to buy tickets for the bus, but what's the point in getting there before everyone else? There's no bosses around to hire you and you're just left kicking your heels. Heh, heh."

"Ha, ha." The man with the beard, lying half back on the ground, chuckled and gave a belch. "You're better off walking if you ask me. Sitting in them cars fair tires a man out! Ha ha! Eeeee, everywhere's a lot better off than back in Zhuangiang. Have you seen the clothes they're wearing and the nosh they're eating around these parts?"

"Yep, you're right there," said the hunchback, picking up the thread of the bearded man's discourse. "Just look at our boss here. With a smart new brick farmhouse like that, it looks like there's room for his grandchildren and his great-grandchildren in that bloomin palace of his."

The middle-aged chap was a bit on the wary side for some reason, and he gave the speaker a nudge with his elbow, and motioned once more toward the tree. The old man was still lying over there on the ground. The harvesters were uncertain about his position in the bosses house-hold—his clothes weren't much better than their own, he wasn't ever called in to eat, and even though it was getting late he was still lying there underneath the tree. He never said much, and when he did he spoke simply and listlessly—just like the old scholartree, which stood quiet and still except when the wind ruffled its leaves and stirred its branches.

"What are you worried about? What he says, I gather, doesn't count in this household," said the hunchback, lowering his voice slightly. "The four sons in this family are all cadres in the town, you know."

"So that's why they got us 'four old men' to get their wheat in, is it?" rasped the bearded man, and the others laughed.

"Hey, don't interrupt me," said the hunchback, getting back to his original story.

"Well, I went over there early in the morning to get some water to grind my sickle and what do I see in that yard of theirs: carts, wheelbarrows, bikes, every bloody thing you can imagine. And have you seen that watch he wears? Brand-new, shines like gold, probably the best make in the whole bloomin world, if you ask me."

"I can see your eyes lighting up when you talk about that watch!" cut in the bearded man. "I bet you'd like to get your hands on it."

"Ha ha ha!"

"I said no interruptions, all right? Anyway, I was just on my way out with the water when this real beautiful slip of a girl walks in, and she smells so sweet, and her face is so white. Oh, you should have seen her."

"Ah, you talk a load of rot: if she's so nice why didn't you give her a big hug?"

"Ha ha ha!" The harvesters couldn't help roaring with laughter.

"Heh heh, I'd be afraid of getting a good thrashing on this back of mine, I would, heh heh," laughed the hunchback. "That was the fiancée of one of his sons, you see. They'll be getting married soon. Three thousand yuan it must have cost to fix that up. Beautiful thing she is too, a real smasher, and the boy adores her."

Wu Hedong couldn't keep his bristly jaw from shaking; his pipe quivered and showered sparks on to his foot, but he didn't feel anything.

"Hey mate, how come you've got so many worries?" asked the hunchback, drawing closer to him. This was the only way the harvesters had of showing their concern for each other. How can poor men show their feelings apart from drawing together in sympathy?

"I know you're still thinking about that kid of yours, but he'll be all right. He's at least twenty-six, isn't he? Yuu don't have to worry about him going hungry or getting lost. He's bound to have found work. You'll get together again at the next stop."

"How's the corn been over at Wujiahe this year?" asked the bearded man concernedly, in an attempt to console Wu Hedong.

"Oh, it's a bit better than before."

No matter what they said, who really understood his troubles? .

Wu Hedong wasn't someone to keep his problems to himself though, and supported by his companions' show of concern, he began chokingly to tell his story.

Shunchang's mother was really a woman with a lot of drive and energy. She worked day and night in order to get the lad's betrothal money together, and when it got dark she didn't want to waste the paraffin and so made do with moonlight instead. Her hands would get cut up from the bamboo, but she'd just suck them and swallow the blood. Wu Hedong's temper had got worse and worse ever since he got the lame leg, and even if he tried to say anything nice it always came out sour:

"What's the point of all this? We can't get a wife for him, so why bother?"

His wife would raise her head from the bamboo:

"Oh yes, and even if we don't find a wife for him, we've got to live, haven't we?"

Previously, because they couldn't find a hundred yuan or so, she had had to harden her heart and give their eldest son Shunsheng to a family beyond the mountains as a "live-in" son-in-law. With her son so far away, she couldn't often see him. As soon as she started to think about it, she felt bitter regretting that she had let her other son and his father down.

The more hardworking she became, however, the more she seemed to injure Wu Hedong's self respect as a "real man," and he was apt to vent his spleen on her at every turn.

"You spend all bloody day making those bloody mats and riddles, and what the hell do we get from it? Not enough for two square meals. You're no bleeding use at all to me, woman. Just bugger off somewhere else!"

After he'd cursed her and hit her, however, he was always filled with remorse and would limp off to some lonely spot to shed his tears.

"Well you old bastard you, every thirty years the river changes its course, does it? Well, I'd better get going and get on with it!"

In the second year under the contract system, despite all their efforts, the wheat-crop was devastated by drought. Shunchang's mother got really frantic, and sparing no effort she took the hundred catties or so of buck-wheat they had harvested and sowed it for a second crop. People normally sew one crop a year in Zhuanglang. Sowing broom-corn millet or buckwheat at the height of summer was just courting disaster—if you actually managed to harvest it you would never get all that much, and if the crop failed you had lost all your seed-grain. In the ten days after sowing there wasn't as much as a drop of rain. Wu Hedong took one look at the shoots and thought they didn't have a snowball's chance in hell. He went back in a raging temper and gave his old woman a beating.

"I said as how you weren't to sow it, but you wouldn't listen, would you, you old bitch! How are we supposed to get through the winter now you've thrown away our two hundred catties of corn? Just tell me that! I'll flay you alive and eat you, that's what I'll have to do!"

But within a month the buckwheat was already shooting up, and by the end of September heavy, full grains were weighing down the red flowers.

"Come on, Shunchang! Go and help your ma get the buckwheat in!"

The old woman was beaming with happiness; she worked non-stop for three days—pulling it up by the roots, binding it up, carrying it back to be dried, and then threshing it. She worked until the buckwheat was safely crammed into the grain-bins and then collapsed in exhaustion on the kang.

Ever since early childhood Shunchang had understood the trials of his parents. By the time he was ten, he would walk for miles up into the mountains to pick medicinal herbs, chop bamboo and collect firewood, and he would hand the little bit of money he made over to his mother. The first time he ventured up into the mountains and saw the peaks towering up into the clouds and the pitch-dark forests, where the only sound was the gloomy echo of your own coughing, and where the paths disappeared right before you, he was so scared his hair stood on end, and his legs were like jelly. After a time, however, he got to be able to find all the herbs like rhubarb, Chinese wolfberry and magnolia vine. According to the regulations of the forest authorities everyone had to pay half a yuan to enter the forest, and the only firewood you were allowed to collect was dead branches—if you chopped down a fir then you would be fined or even put in prison. Shunchang was an honest boy by nature, and even at the age of twenty-six he didn't know the meaning of the word "theft." That day he was with his dad on the mountain, each busy cutting bamboo on their own, and in the afternoon they came down the mountain together both carrying a big bundle of bamboo on their backs. Wu Hedong saw that his lad was puffing heavily, as though he were making harder work of it than normal.

"What's up? Are you not feeling well?"

"Oh no … I'm all right."

"Put the load further up, relax your back a bit more and bend at the waist …" As they came down to the entrance to the mountain, there was a sudden crack as the rope holding Shunchang's bundle snapped under the load and it crashed down on to the path. The forest wardens came over to have a look; one of them gave the bundle of bamboo a kick, and with a crack several small fir trees, as thick as a man's arm, came loose from the center of the bundle, where they had been hidden.

For a moment, Wu Hedong was startled speechless. The wardens came over, and without demur grabbed Shunchang by the neck and started beating him. Wu Hedong rushed forward and pleaded with them:

"Take it easy, lads, if you want to hit someone, hit me. I'm his dad, I'm responsible."

As he spoke, Wu Hedong picked up the fir trees and put them to one side. He glared at his son with eyes burning with anger and limped slowly forward, a small fir tree trunk clutched in his hand.

"Who taught you to swipe other folk's stuff!"

"Dad, dad …"

"Tell me!" he exhorted, striking him a painful blow on the leg.

"Ow, dad …"

Shunchang fell howling to the ground, and before anyone could stop him, his father clouted him a few more blows.

"You've got us into trouble and made me lose face now. Am I, Wu Hedong, a thief? I'll give you a hiding, you thieving rascal! What the hell did you want to go and do that for?"

"Dad I'm sorry. Please forgive me."

"Tell me why!"

Shunchang lifted up his tear-filled eyes to his father, who appeared as just a dark shadow above him.

"It's Ma, she's been spitting … spitting blood. I didn't dare tell you, I thought I could make a bit of money, so she could go and see a doctor."

The small trunk fell from Wu Hedong's hand and clattered on the ground.

Wu Hedong rushed home, took his wife in his arms and choked with sobs.

"Oh I've cursed you and beaten you; and me … I'm not worth a shit!"

"But no two folk can get by together without having a few scrapes. When you say that," and sobbing she buried her face in his chest, "I'm afraid that I might … you'll have to arrange it, get a wife for him."

Wu Hedong hugged her tightly and stroked her face with his big, rough hand, its skin like tree bark.

"Don't fret. I'll get you well, and I'll see him married. We've had a fair old time together. Every thirty years the river changes."

Wu Hedong burst into sobs and could say no more

Wu Hedong knocked out his pipe, which had long ago gone out, and swallowed the bitterness from smoking.

"By heck. I'm not fit to be a father."

The evening breeze blew lightly through the old scholartree, and its leaves and branches seemed to start into motion.

The harvesters were silent; they felt as though they should say something but didn't know how to start. The old man under the tree lay completely still and seemed to be asleep. No one had seen his eyes, however, which were still staring wide out into the night.

They unpacked their kit-bags and were getting ready to spend the night on the ground when Zhang Genfa walked over humming tunelessly to himself.

"Didn't you eat well? I'm sorry it was such a poor meal "

"Oh no, it was really good food, really good."

"Come on then, lads, let's go and find you somewhere to sleep."

To the harvesters' amazement, Zhang Genfa walked off in the direction of the village. Surely the boss wasn't going to let them sleep in the farmhouse? On kang beds? It wasn't that they weren't used to it, of course; every house had an earth kang with a straw mat on top, but when you were out harvesting, getting to sleep on one was like seventh heaven. They hurriedly picked up their things and followed after the boss. Coming to the village entrance, however, the boss walked straight past and led them over to the threshing floor beyond.

"Don't take offence, lads, there's not much room in the house, you know. There's some straw in the sheds here and there's a watchman's hut over there with a little kang, that'll take two of you; it hasn't got a mat, but you can spread some straw out on it."

The boss left, and the harvesters lay down and slowly fell snoring to sleep.

Wu Hedong lay at the foot of a stack of straw with his old, patched padded jacket stretched over him. His bad leg began to ache, and he pulled the jacket down lower.

The night was still. With wide eyes he looked up at the thickly dotted stars, as if he were trying to count them —… one … two …—and as if he was trying to think through his problems too. That star's me, that bright one over there is his mother, and that one way, way over there, that's Shunchang. There really was no end to her energy! No sooner had Shuixiang come back from the fields and hung up her sickle than she picked up the wooden pitchfork and noisily pushed all the mustard seeds drying in the yard into a big heap against the wall. Her mother stood up on the tips of her small feet and snatched the pitchfork from her.

"How come you're never tired, girl? Go and have a rest!"

Shuixiang let go of the pitchfork, but then picked up the carrying-pole with the empty pails. Shunchang, who was squatting at the side of the yard washing his face, immediately threw down the towel and strode across.

"Hey boss, let me go!"

"But—"

Shuixiang was caught in two minds, but Shunchang had already grabbed the carrying-pole and was walking off toward the gate. She quickly tickled the lock of hair from her cheek and shouted after him:

"Hey, do you know where the well is?"

The smoke from the kitchen curled lazily upward, and the stars had begun to sparkle in the sky. One of them wound the winch, and the other took hold of the pails of gurgling water.

After supper, Shunchang ground all the sickle blades one by one then spread out his pack at the foot of the courtyard wall, where he was intending to spend the night. He was on the point of lying down when the old woman called over to him:

"Hey, my lad, pick that up. I've already cleared a place for you in the straw shed. Come and sleep there."

"Ma—" complained Shuixiang, with a tone of coquettish reproach.

"Uh? What?"

Shuixiang had already pushed open the door to the room on the west side of the yard.

"Come and stay in this room, lad."

For a while, Shunchang was knocked speechless, and then he managed to say, "No, no, I couldn't. I'm fine anywhere. I couldn't really …"

The old woman was also momentarily lost for words, but when she saw the honest, humble look on Shunchang's face she couldn't help herself saying, "Yes, that's right. There's lots of room in the house. Come on." She took hold of Shunchang's arm, its skin peeling from sunburn, and led him over to the wing-room.

That room was almost bare of furniture, just a mat and a quilt on the kang and a table on the floor before it with a ticking alarm clock on top.

"This is our bum's room. He's gone off to some relalitives to loaf around; when the wheat's all cut he'll come waltzing back/"

"Uh …" Shunchang looked gratefully at the old lady, sat uneasily on the edge of the kang and ran his rough hand over its polished wooden edge. "Grandma—"

"Hey, don't call me 'grandma.' I might look old to you, but I'm only in my fifties, you know. It's just the hard times I've seen. My life only started getting better when I had Shuixiang, and I was over thirty then."

"Uh, but why can't your son do any work then?"

"Eh, he's not up to it, that's why, just like his father!" she replied, obviously with a stomachful of bitterness. With a trembling hand she struck a match and silently lit the paraffin lamp.

"All the sons I had were cripples. Two of them didn't live, and just the one survived. It'd have been better if he'd died, really. If it weren't for that girl Shuixiang, I'd have dropped off long ago, along with that old devil of a husband of mine."

Shunchang was a soft-hearted lad, and his eyes were already brimming with tears. The lamp was dim, however, and the old lady couldn't see them.

"You'll be tired out from all that reaping, son. You should get some sleep. I'm going now." She was on the point of going out of the door when she turned around and came back again.

"Oh, the quilt's over there, see … you can cover yourself with that."

For some reason she still couldn't bring herself to leave the room. Finally she inched over to the table, and in some embarrassment she stretched out her hand and picked up the alarm clock. She smiled awkwardly, with the dim lamplight illuminating her aged, gray face, and then retreated from the room.

Shunchang knew that she had taken the clock because she didn't trust him, but he didn't feel the least bit of resentment. He rather felt embarrassed that he had put the old lady in such a difficult position. He'd learnt a lot from following the harvest, and he knew that he was being very well treated by being asked to stay under the same roof as his host. As he was thinking about what had happened, the door creaked open and Shuixiang came in, holding in one hand a brand-new patterned thermos flask and in the other two fine porcelain cups.

"You can have a drink if you're thirsty, lad. I'll leave them here." Then she took the alarm clock from her pocket and put it back in its original place on the table.

Seeing the clock Shunchang couldn't stop himself blushing, as though he'd actually thought of stealing. Shuixiang noticed his expression and quickly explained:

"My ma doesn't know how to wind it up. She has to get me to do it."

Shunchang could tell she was lying, but even so his face beamed with gratitude. Harvesters get to eat at hundreds of folks' homes, and they get to know which ones treat them well. But no matter how well he had been looked after, this was the first time anyone had looked up to him, trusted him, the first time he had known the feeling of being treated like a man. It awakened in him a dormant sense of self-respect; he savored the feeling carefully and found it also had a slightly bitter, astringent flavor to it, like when you have not eaten sugar for a long time and then suddenly eat a lot of it—you find it also has a bitter taste. Shunchang felt it like a stabbing pain in his heart, but at the same time there was someone's hand caressing the wound and soothing it. He couldn't stop himself raising his eyes and looking straight at Shuixiang, and it was if only then he discovered just how beautiful her face was, how gentle, how kind, especially her eyes, like two pools of water, so deep you couldn't see the bottom, and mirroring whoever looked into them.

Shuixiang shyly lowered her eyelids and looked down at the oil lamp; the wick was giving off fluttering and dancing sparks.

"Won't you have some water?" she asked, lifting the thermos as she did so.

"Uh, no thanks, boss."

"I've told you not to call me boss, but there you go again. Can't you try something else?"

"But—"

"My ma named me Shuixiang—"fragrant water"—she says the water's tasted sweet ever since she's had me." She poured out a cup of water and left it to cool. She was silent for a time and then suddenly blurted out:

"Hey, you're twenty-six. How come you haven't got fixed up with a wife yet?"

"Why do you ask me that, sister?"

The wick began to splutter even more. Shuixiang took a hair clip from her temple and prodded the flame with it.

"Well, why shouldn't I ask?"

"Hmm. Life's not easy over in Zhuanglang, you know. My folks haven't been able to arrange it."

Silence fell again, it seemed like for an age.

"How about if I lent you some money, then you could go and fix up a wife?"

"But, how could that be right? Oh, you're just making fun of me, aren't you, sister?"

"No, no, and then you could come over here every year … to cut the wheat."

The lamp grew suddenly brighter, lighting up Shuixiang's rosy face and casting the silhouette of her shapely figure on the wall.

"You'd better be getting some sleep now, lad. We'll go out a bit earlier tomorrow."

Shuixiang went out and hurried back to her room in the east wing.

How much can I make by cutting wheat year in year out? Well then. No, I can't make the lad wait any longer, he's going to be married by Spring Festival at the latest! If I can't earn enough money, then I'll take the house apart; I can sell the doors, windows and rafters and just leave the four walls—that'll bring in a hundred yuan or so. When I get back in a couple of days and reap my wheat, I'll sow some buckwheat like what my better half did. We'll pull through the winter on buckwheat and fetch another hundred yuan by selling all our wheat. If we can get seven or eight hundred together we'll see if the Songs' girl will marry him or not. If not then we'll have to have the hunchback for a relative! He says he's willing to take a bit less than that for his girl

"Hey, take it easy over there, father-in-law! Watch you don't do your old legs in!" shouted the old hunchback jokingly from a neighboring patch of wheat where he was loosening up his legs, stiff from squatting. "Are you trying to steal all my wages or what?"

Wu Hedong cut a few more sickles of wheat and then sat down to rest in the field. He lifted up his straw hat and blinked beads of sweat furiously from his eyes: by heck, that girl of his better not be a hunchback as well.

"Hey boss, won't you get grit in that watch wearing it cutting wheat?" asked the middle-aged chap next to Zhang Genfa, as he changed the blade in his sickle.

"Ha ha, this watch? It's waterproof and shockproof, you know. Don't you think it can keep out a bit of grit? Solid steel, you see. Grit stands no chance of getting in."

Wu Hedong turned around to see the boss smiling smugly; he sighed softly to himself: ah, if only I had a watch, I wouldn't have to take the house apart. It was midday, and the sun was burning viciously. There's less wear on the sickle when the wheat's dry though, and it cuts quicker, so what if the sun was scorching?

The boss took out his sweat-cloth and wiped himself down. He stuffed the cloth back under his expandable watch strap—which, unbeknown to him, promptly snapped under the pressure.

"Hey, woman, bring us out some tea!"

The middle-aged man turned his head and continuing to scythe away asked Zhang Genfa:

"Hey boss, you've not brought out tea these past two days. How come you've just thought of it now? Ha, ha, just a joke. Don't get me wrong. I'll go and fetch it for us if you're thirsty."

"Oh no, you keep on cutting. The wheat's getting really yellow now."

As he spoke, the boss took off his shirt, rolled it up tightly and dropped it down on the ground by his feet before pressing on forward once more.

Most of the wheat had now been hacked down, and the field looked like a beach at low tide. The sun continued to beat down fiercely. Wu Hedong for some reason, however, felt cold chills running up his back. Dripping with sweat, he slashed away furiously with his sickle, hardly caring if it should slice into his leg, or even plunge into his body, or into his heart. He scampered over to the edge of the field and then worked back, tying the fallen wheat into bundles as he went. He still felt just as cold with his back to the sun. He blinked his old, muddy eyes furiously; it was sweat or tears he was blinking away, he didn't know.

As he yanked a bundle tight for all he was worth, the straw rope snapped, and it fell apart. He grabbed up the wheat once more and tied it again. His hands were trembling uncontrollably. What's wrong? What's got into me? Why do I feel so bad, like I could kill myself! If you really want to die you old devil, then just go off somewhere and lie down and die! What's stopping you? Only just don't disgrace yourself here. But still he couldn't stop his blood-shot eyes from straying over to the place on the ground where the bosses rolled-up shirt was lying.

Shuixiang's wheat was now all down. The very last patch in the deep valley lay quiet and somnolent, like a silkworm fatigued after disgorging all its silk. The field was full of neatly-piled bundles of wheat along with some scattered wheat yet to be tied. On one side lay two sickles, close together; the blades were hot enough to burn one's hand on.

"Hey, brother, have a drink."

It was not clear when she had started to address him so familiarly, calling him "brother." She strode over to the edge of the field and gulped down a bowl of cold tea, then brought the tea-jug over to Shunchang. The last rays of the setting sun shone down through the tangle of greenery at the top of the valley, bathing Shuixiang in golden-yellow light and delineating the rounded contours of her graceful waist and buttocks. The tea gurgled crisply out of the jug, like the sound of the cooing and chirruping birds in the valley.

"Here, drink!"

Shunchang rolled down from the bundles of wheat, took the bowl and drank it down in one draught.

"Want some more? You'd better pour it yourself, I'm not waiting on you hand and foot!"

"Ha, ha, sister," laughed Shunchang guilelessly.

Shuixiang pushed the stray lock of hair behind her ear again.

"You really do say some stupid things. I'm a good few years younger than you, you know. Why can't you call me 'little sister' or something nice like that?"

"But—"

"But what? Wouldn't you like to?"

She straightened her slender neck and looked at Shunchang with her head inclined to one side.

Shunchang felt a sudden flush of heat run down his body, and, his chest panting, he couldn't stop himself saying, "Little … sister."

She smiled sweetly.

"You've finally got it right." The harvested field was laden with the smell of the earth and the strong, heady fragrance of wheat straw. Shuixiang lay down on a pile of unbundled straw and stretched herself out. Her black trousers were pulled taut by the shapely curve of her legs, which trembled slightly. Her deep, full bosom rose and fell inside her tight, sweat-soaked blouse. Looking at her, Shunchang felt. a tingling in his heart; for him this was all a mysterious new world. Shuixiang rested on her elbow and turned her face to his.

"I'm from Zhuanglang too, you know. What, don't you believe me?"

"Ha, ha, of course I don't. You don't speak a bit like us Zhuanglang folk, do you?"

"And what's that got to do with it? I know that all Linyou is famous for is cripples, but they speak a lot better here than in your Zhuanglang, don't they?"

"That's right enough; other folk say our accent's so thick it hammers their eardrums to bits!"

Shuixiang gushed with laughter, free and unrestrained, like the gurgling stream in the bottom of the valley.

"Do you think Linyou's all right?"

"Oh, it's lovely here, really great!"

"Would you … would you like to come and live here?"

Shuixiang turned away. She looked out at the shorn fields as though she was regretting that the wheat had been cut so quickly.

"Don't leave just yet, brother. How about staying and helping me with threshing?"

Shunchang was at a complete loss for a moment, as though he'd lost something but couldn't remember quite what it was. He walked over toward her, unable to help himself.

How could he help falling in love with her? In all his twenty-six years, no girl had ever been so friendly with him; no one had ever looked twice at a pauper like him; he'd never said more than a few words to a girl, never so much as held a girl's hand, and here was this beautiful, kind, gentle young woman, who was being so intimate with him, calling him "brother." How could his passions fail to be aroused by her? And how could he have stopped himself calling her "little sister" just now? But even so, he felt that she really should by rights be a "sister!"

"No, I should go, really I should. I've already told my dad I'll meet him at the next harvest stop."

Shuixiang looked as though she had lots she wanted to say but couldn't bring herself to; she looked across at Shunchang with those dark, liquid eyes. Suddenly she felt a burst of compassion flush through her body.

"Brother!"

"Little sister!"

She slowly extended her hand, which seemed to be trembling slightly, and, with his pounding heart about to jump out his chest Shunchang took hold of it. She pulled him gently toward the pile of wheat. Breathing deeply, he slowly lowered himself down; the heady fragrance of straw and earth mingled together with the smell of body sweat. Beneath the crackling of the straw could be heard a faint murmur:

"Tonight, brother. Come to the room in the east wing."

That evening Wu Hedong was lying as before at the foot of the stack of wheat, staring up at the stars. There were so many of them, and so densely packed together; how could he find that bright one again? And how was his old lady doing now? You don't have to work day and night any more. You can rest easy. It won't be long before I'm home now, and I'll get it all fixed up for the lad by the spring, just you see.

He rolled over and pressed the ration bag smooth with his big hand. It was too hard and bumpy for resting his head on nothing but old, dry bread after all, and how could that be comfortable to lie on? He rubbed his head and lay back down again. After a short time he felt a gnawing hunger in his stomach; he rolled over again and opened the bag up. It was really big and seemed almost bottomless, able to hold a good few hundred catties. It was originally of plain, white cloth, but was now black and filthy like an old oil-rag.

All of a sudden he heard someone cough, and his hand holding the bag involuntarily began to tremble. He looked up and saw the old man from under the tree standing unsteadily before him. He was holding in his hand a pitchfork which he used upside-down as a walking-stick.

"Haven't you gone off to bed yet, grandpa?" asked Wu Hedong in greeting.

"Oh no, not yet. I'm watching the farmyard; if you smoke, be careful you don't start a fire."

As he spoke, his eyes came back to Wu Hedong's ration bag—he thought he saw something sparkle brightly in it. It was gone now though; his old eyes really weren't good for anything any more: they confused the earth and sky and saw stars on the ground.

His hands trembling uncontrollably, Wu Hedong hurriedly explained:

"I felt a bit hungry, you know, I thought … I thought I'd have a bite to eat."

"Oh yes, eat up. You shouldn't let yourself go hungry if you want to stay in good health. I'll go and get you some water."

The old fellow smiled again with a genuine warmth and compassion, his face creasing up in wrinkles and his patchy beard sticking up.

The unlatched door of the east wing room and the still, quiet window were bathed in the light of the stars. Shuixiang wasn't sleeping; she sat numbly on the side of the kang and thought about lighting the lamp again, but without any real inclination to do so. The room was dark; only the window was light and it cast the square pattern of its frame on to the curtain.

It looked as though he wasn't going to come. She lifted the curtain once more and gazed across to the room on the west wing.

Shunchang was lying on the kang, unable to settle. Before his eyes he saw the image of a man: a man lame in one leg, with a head too large for his body, who could hardly count up to ten. He was still a man though for all that, a man with a crippled body and a crippled heart. How in all conscience could Shunchang go and hurt him?

"Brother …" the crackling of the straw and that low murmur, barely audible. He had taken her hand in his and held it tight, smelt the heavy, intoxicating fragrance of straw, of earth, of sweat, of bodies close together. The bolt was drawn back on the door, and the starlight shone in through and lit up two trembling hands. Uh, what's this? What's happening! The door was shut tightly. Without realizing quite what he had done, Shunchang had gone across and pushed his burly frame against the door. The image of the old woman's face rose unconsciously before his eyes.

When he returned from the fields that day, the old woman had cooked four dishes and poured out some wine.

"You'll be leaving early tomorrow, so eat up."

Shunchang could hardly hold his chopsticks or lift the food up to his mouth. He felt guilty before the old lady because he'd held Shuixiang's hand, and he was too ashamed even to appreciate her kindness.

"Come on lad, get tuck in, what's the matter with you?"

"But what about Shuixiang?"

"She said she was going to the supply and marketing co-operative to buy paraffin. She'll be back soon, so tuck in."

Uh, holding hands is just holding hands after all, and I could hardly have just ignored her, could I? He began to wolf down the "New Year feast," as it was to him: even at New Year people in Zhuangiang didn't eat as well as this. The old lady carefully counted out a wad of bank-notes, checked them again, and finally laid them on the table.

"Here you are, lad. We're paying you for twenty mu, three yuan.a mu."

"What? You can't possibly, grandma … really."

"Now don't get obstinate. You can't argue with Shuixiang, you know! Come on, eat up now."

Shunchang returned to his kang and thought through all that had happened.

"You must see why I can't, little sister. But I'll … I'll never forget you, never. You'll always be in my heart."

The curtain gently slipped from her fingers. She turned away and stared blankly at the polished table, the cooled tea, and the quilt rolled carefully out on the kang, all done for him. She remembered what she had said to him, "I'm from Zhuanglang too, you know," and memories of her early life came rushing back. She really was from Zhuanglang. Her mother died giving birth to her. That was back in 1958. The big famine followed soon after, of course, and seeing as they couldn't feed her in Zhuanglang, she was exchanged for some grain. Shuixiang never found out who her real mother had been. If she asked her new mother, she would explain tearfully:

"But I am your real mother, child, as real as any mother can be; you shouldn't listen to people's gossip."

What was she asking questions like that for? She'd suckled her and swaddled her, kept her alive through 1959 and 1960. How could any real mother do more?

"A widow with children has more trials than anyone," they say, and how many bitter days did she have to struggle through on her own? Shuixiang remembered when she had just started to talk and had asked:

"How old am I, ma?"

"You're three, child."

"How old are you?"

"Me? I'm thirty-three."

"When will I be able to start helping you do some work?"

"Why do you want to go and ask a question like that?"

Shuixiang made no reply, but looked at her crippled brother, her tiny eyes dripping with tears. Her mother understood at once.

"Oh, my child," [she said], and hugged her tightly, with tears streaming down her cheeks. She had initially bought the child, however, as a "child-bride" for her crippled son. Later though, when she saw how the child turned out, she didn't have the heart to go through with the plan, and accepted her heart and soul as her own natural daughter, but later still, when she saw Shuixiang growing up day by day, she realized that she'd soon have to leave and marry someone, and all she had done would be gone, all prospects of a decent, happy life would disappear. What choice did she have? She hardened her heart and told Shuixiang:

"Child, you're going to be married to your brother."

"What! Get married to him! Ma, I'm your own daughter, your own daughter. your own child, Ma!" She started to cry, and so did her mother, but Shuixiang wasn't even conscious of her own tears. All she saw was that her mother's eyes were wet.

"Don't cry, Ma, don't cry. I'll do anything you want me to, really."

She stared blankly at the shadow of the lattice-window on the curtain, as though she were counting through all the days of her marriage, from the age of fourteen right up until today. She had never been in love before, never, and she didn't know how she had managed to fall in love with him. She thought back to how she had cursed herself that time. Yes, she really thought then that she was being wicked, and right now she felt just the same: I'm a bad woman, a wicked young woman! You're right not to come, brother, you're right.

She collapsed back down on the kang. A gust of wind lifted up the lattice-pattern on the curtain.

The sky was just getting light when Shunchang climbed off the kang the next morning.

Without a sound, he tidied up the room, wiped the table clean and put the alarm clock, the thermos, the tea cup and the sparkling oil-lamp back in their places.

As he left the room, he thought about waiting until everyone was up and saying goodbye, but if he saw Shuixiang what could he say to her? He cast a last glance at the room in the east wing, picked up his kit and walked out of the yard-gate.

He passed the fields the two of them had harvested together, and here was the path they had walked along side by side.

"Anyone for Linyou! I only want one!"

"Come on … are you dumb or something …?"

"Brother …"

As he walked along, it seemed to him that he could see Shuixiang again and hear her voice calling him; he couldn't help but stop and look back—their farmhouse was already out of sight. There was just a deserted mountain valley and the occasional cries of dawn birds.

"Brother"—the voice rang through his mind once again. He turned around and was about to stride off on his way, but was forced to stop in astonishment.

Before him on the narrow footpath stood Shuixiang, her back to the sun, so that all Shunchang could see of her was a dark outline.

He hurried a few paces further forward and stopped once more. He could now clearly see her face, which was pale, like the white paper on windows. She had changed into a short, black, side-fastening jacket, which looked plain and solemn.

"I've come to see you off …" she said, and then stood lost for words. She took up the cloth bag hanging from her elbow and opened it to show Shunchang. In the bag were a few steamed bread rolls along with a pair of brand-new, rubber-soled shoes, size 41.

"The bread is for when you get hungry; the shoes are for the journey As she held the bag out her hands slowly began to shake.

"Don't you want them, then?"

Two streams of tears fell silently down Shunchang's face. His straw hat, sickle and ration bag slowly slipped from his shoulder, and unable to restrain himself any longer, he rushed forward and hugged her tightly, kissing again and again the lips of her pale, bloodless face: a flood of tears she had been holding back at last welled up from between Shuixiang's tightly shut eyelids

Wu Hedong waited numbly until the sky was light and then, his pack on his shoulder, left the village together with his work-mates. They came out of the entrance and were just about to reach the road when all of a sudden they heard behind them the sound of hurrying footsteps and someone shouting:

"It's bound to be him that's nabbed my bleedin watch!"

Wu Hedong unconsciously quickened his pace.

"Stop!"

The four harvesters turned around in unison. The "beard" and the middle-aged chap both glared indignantly, while the old hunchback walked forward with a weary smile on his face; Wu Hedong, however, stood rooted to the spot, the expression drained from his features.

"What is it, boss? What do you want now?" asked the hunchback with a laugh.

Zhang Genfa pushed him aside and walked over to Wu Hedong.

"Hey you! When we were cutting yesterday, you … you were next to me, weren't you?"

Wu Hedong looked blank, his face a complete block of wood; but he slowly began to lower the ration bag from his shoulder. Suddenly an aged voice rang out:

"Don't move!"

Wu Hedong looked up and saw the decrepit old fellow from under the tree; now, however, his chest was bolt upright as he hobbled over.

"It's not him who's got it. I had a look through his bag last night, it's not in there. You'd better let him go." The old man turned to Wu Hedong.

"You'd better be off now; all of you, go on."

"What do you think you're playing at, Dad?" demanded Zhang Genfa.

"You'll get the watch back, don't worry. It's still here. In fact it was me that took it," answered the old man sternly.

"Where the hell is it then?"

"I left it back in the watchman's hut!"

The old man's voice rose more and more threateningly, and Zhang Genfa had no choice but to swallow his anger. The old guy turned to the harvesters again:

"Go on, get along with you now!"

Wu Hedong couldn't get his legs to move, though; the other three walked off ahead, and he was left standing paralyzed on the spot. The old guy returned to his previous manner, with his kind, gentle smile and his face creased up in wrinkles.

"Don't take it bad, brother. I know your problems; in the old society I spent half my life as a casual laborer. I know what it's like. My lad's gone and accused you wrongly, but don't take it amiss; here, here's a bit of money I've saved up. You can take it with you."

He held out the money in his gnarled, old, shaky hands. Wu Hedong felt as though he was slowly waking up out of a dream; his tears began to fall freely, and it seemed to him that only then could his old, muddy eyes clearly see the old man's face.

Sobbing to himself, he bent down and opened up his kit-bag, the old man sprang forward and grasped the top of the bag, but Wu Hedong unclasped his fingers; he took an old cake of steamed bread from the bag, and then from a hole in the bread he pulled out the shiny watch.

"I'm a thief. Me, Wu Hedong, a thief …" and he burst into sobs.

The old man couldn't stop his tears flowing in sympathy and Zhang Genfa's wife began to weep too

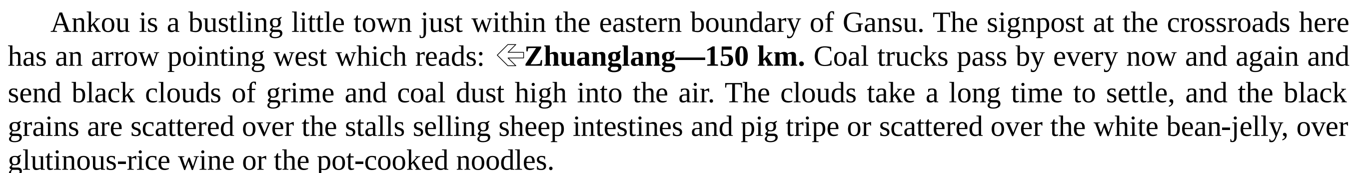
Toward the end of June, the harvesters returned in dribs and drabs from Shaanxi to within the borders of Gansu Province.



Ankou is a bustling little town just within the eastern boundary of Gansu. The signpost at the crossroads here has an arrow pointing west which reads: ⇦Zhuanglang—150 km. Coal trucks pass by every now and again and send black clouds of grime and coal dust high into the air. The clouds take a long time to settle, and the black grains are scattered over the stalls selling sheep intestines and pig tripe or scattered over the white bean-jelly, over glutinous-rice wine or the pot-cooked noodles.

It was already dusk. Outside a small restaurant five or six people were sitting on low stools around a small square table on which lay a bowl of soup and a small saucer of salt. The diners proceeded to dip their wet chopsticks in the salt and then stir up their bowls of soaking bread buns.

Wu Hedong, however, exceptionally for him, came out of the restaurant with a bowl of noodles. He carried it across to the table, watching it carefully at each step.

"Here you go, Shunchang. Get these noodles down you!"
"Oh no, you have them yourself!"
"Take them quick!"
Shunchang took the bowl, and as he ate the noodles he looked down at his father's bad leg. When he caught sight of the bare soles of his feet, he suddenly thought of the size 41 rubber shoes, and finishing off his noodles, he took them out of his pack.
"We'll start for home tomorrow morning, Dad, and then you can wear these!"
"Eh? How the hell did you buy expensive shoes like them?"
"I didn't buy them, Dad, they're—"
Suddenly, Shunchang's face reddened, and he found he couldn't think how to explain about the shoes.
"What the hell do you mean you didn't buy them'?"
Wu Hedong saw the confused expression on his son's face, he slowly lowered his eyes to the pair of shoes, and a shudder ran through his body.
"Where did you, get them then?"
"Well, they were—"
Wu Hedong, with a sinking heart, clattered his bowl and chopsticks down on the table.
"Dad, I was given them, they were a present!"
"A 'present'? You bloody thieving rascal, I don't know where you learned it from And you've learned to tell bloody lies too!"
Struggling hard to hold back the tears from his aching heart, he got to his feet, took the stick from his pack, and brought it crashing down on the new shoes, sending them flying out of his son's hands.
Shunchang knelt down and grabbed the stick.
"But Dad, someone really did give them to me!"
"Who'd give a little bugger like you anything but a kick up the backside?"
"It was—it was Shuixiang, she gave them to me "
Shunchang couldn't stop himself bursting into sobs.

The next morning Wu Hedong made his son wear the shoes himself, and they set off back home, father and son together, carrying their kit on their shoulder-poles.
"Let's get a move on, then. If we hurry back we'll still be in time to get our own harvest in …"

76.98 Little Grass\fn{by Jia Jun (1948-)} Hulun Boir, Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region, China (M) 5

As though he had just downed several bowls of alcohol, Bugabu, a veteran wrestler, grew red in the face. In his traditional wrestling vest and shorts, he stood by a fat referee, raised his head and sang in a husky voice:
"Buhe—telibie!"
This was the ritual song before a wrestling competition, meaning: "Wrestlers, come quick!"
Since the start of Nadamu Fair,\fn{A note reads: An annual local gathering for wrestling matches, horse-racing, archery, song and dance and trade.} the people of the grassland had been in a jubilant mood, but at the song of Bugabu, the noise quietened down, and soon even the larks chirping in the blue sky could be heard. Then, the crowd, men and women, old and young, started singing in chorus:
"Buhe—telibie!"
The unrefined but resonant voices were carried into the distance by the autumn wind. Amidst the singing, Nima, who had just been defeated by Bugabu, entered the ring. This forty-year-old robust man skipped up and down a little to warm up, and the ground under his feet seemed to shake. Presently, his opponent, Baers, a youth of sixteen or seventeen stalked over. When he jumped he alighted on the ground like a butterfly on a petal. Soon the two wrestlers were grappling with each other. The small but agile Baers tried to trip up his opponent, but Nima's two feet, like two tree stumps, never budged: Nima, too, tried to trip Baers, but the latter dodged to avoid being thrown. He was as swift as a little deer.
Amidst the crowd stood a man of over fifty staring at the young wrestler's legs. He was Zhou Yage, a wrestling and gymnastics teacher. The young man's agility and his attempts to pin down his opponent reminded him of his old friend Temuer in his younger days.
Claps and shouts encouraged Nima to win the tussle. Suddenly he lifted Baers off the ground like an eagle clutching a chicken and began to swing him round until he exhausted himself. Then he hurled him to the ground.

This took the spectator's breath away, and everybody was amazed. But Baers landed lightly and with one leap grabbed Nima, tripping him, and trying to topple him. An uproar of stamping, clapping and shouting burst out. Gritting his teeth, Nima resorted to his last ungraceful tactic. Using his weight he flattened his opponent on the ground. The whistle sounded, and the referee gestured that Nima was the winner.

Baers rolled over, jumped up and yelled at the referee:

"I lost! But let me try again. A return match. All right?"

Nima looked at Baers' grimy face and guffawed.

The referee's face was blank, just like a stone-carved statue of Buddha. He ignored Baers and raised Nirna's hand. But just then Baers made a dive at Nima, caught his leg and, with all his might, tugged at him until he collapsed. More shouting, clapping and laughing. Even the referee could not help smiling. Baers broke into a smile himself and having made a face at the referee ran away. Only Zhou had a stern face, aware that Baers was a promising wrestler. What struck him most was the boy's determination. It made a deep impression on him.

The competition continued. but Zhou was preoccupied with the young wrestler. He elbowed his way out of the crowd and strolled over to a meadow where he spotted Baers lying on the ground, face skywards. Only in shorts, he was bathed in the autumn sunshine. With his good tan and rippling muscles, he looked like a steel ingot just tempered in a furnace. Slowly Zhou made for him and then said:

"Hello, young man, so you've been hiding here!"

Baers smiled sheepishly. Removing the blade of grass from his lips, he asked cheekily:

"And who are you? Why are you looking for me?"

Zhou squatted and introduced himself, "I'm one of your colleagues. I hurried up here to take part in the fair. I made an appointment to meet an old friend of mine, Temuer, here. You must have heard of him, since you're both from the same place. He's the champion Mongolian-style wrestler in China."

Baers jumped to his feet at once, all his cheekiness gone. Sizing him up and down, Baers asked in awe:

"Are you … are you Uncle Zhou from Peking?"

"How did you know that?" Zhou was puzzled. Holding out his hand, Baers explained:

"I'm Baers, Temuer's son. Don't you know I'm also a well-known wrestler in this area, and a would-be champion! Whenever you write a letter, he always gets me to read it to him. Father's gone to fetch Little Tiger from the commune headquarters. He told me that you would come today."

Zhou, gazing at Baers' elongated eyes and tanned chest, seemed to see the young Temuer. A real chip off the old block!

"Tell me, Baers," he asked, "why are you hiding here instead of watching the competition?"

Baers raised the blade of grass with one hand and, with the other, pointed at the earth, saying:

"Uncle Nima pinned me down on the ground. But I won't accept defeat. Just you wait and see next year. Father's always saying that Mongolians are just like tiny shoots of grass. Neither burning, being trampled underfoot or covered with snow can stop them from growing. When the spring breeze blows, they break through the layer of soil and shoot upwards. One day, I will defeat Uncle Nima and all other wrestlers in this banner, in Inner Mongolia and in the whole country!" His head was high and unyielding.

In response to the boy's words, Zhou declared, "So you haven't learned to be a good loser! Come on, try me first."

Baers, with pent-up anger, clamped the grass between his lips, reared up and threw his arms round Zhou's waist from behind. Zhou felt his body shake. It must have been hard for even a strong fellow like Nima to defeat this young man, he thought. He tried to wrench himself free from the grip but failed, for the boy's arms were like a pair of tight iron clamps. This teacher of wrestling and gymnastics at the Central Academy of Physical Education made up his mind to enroll the boy on the spot.

"Hey, Baers, you little tiger cub, so you want to take it out on somebody else, eh?"

It was Bugabu. The old wrestler stalked towards Baers and, like lifting a bale of straw, carried his grandson under his arm and strode towards the ring. Not knowing what had happened, Zhou followed them.

After issuing prizes to the winners, the chairman of Nadamu Fair announced in a solemn tone that the honourable title of the banner "Daerhan Wrestler" was awarded to Bugabu. This brought the fair to a climax. Amid applause and exclamations, the chairman presented the badge, certificate and prize to Bugabu. Following him were three beautifullydressed Mongolian girls holding bowls of koumiss. Bugabu took them and lightly flung some of the liquid towards heaven, earth and the spectators, before gulping down the rest. Again the crowd shouted in excitement. Finally, according to custom, he must remove his wrestling vest and give it to the man he thought most promising. This was what they were all waiting for.

Bugabu scanned the crowd. It was quiet and still except for the larks' singing high in the sky. Nima was restless.

At last, Bugabu averted his eyes and, holding up his vest over his head, cried at the top of his voice:

"Baers, come over here! Put on my wrestling vest!"

For a moment, Baers, still chewing the blade of grass, could not believe his ears. His eyes opened wide in surprise. When he realized that he had been made the successor to the senior wrestler, he broke into a broad smile, then made an effort to curb his glee by biting his lips. With a feigned stern expression, incongruous with his age, he strode towards his grandfather. Delighted, he stretched out his hand to accept the vest. At that moment, a man in his fifties elbowed his way through the throng to stand between the two. It was Temuer!

"Father," he said to Bugabu, "don't you realize you're showing favouritism by giving your wrestling vest to your own grandson?"

Nima and some other wrestlers clapped and shouted, "Hear! Hear!"

Stroking his silvery beard, Bugabu winked at his son and said loudly to the crowd:

"Comrades, I've made up my mind to give this vest to my grandson, Baers. I've drunk milk all my life and I'm as honest as an ox. Do you think a man like me would show favouritism? As soon as my hand touches the backbone of a young horse, I know whether it'll be a shaft-horse or one which is only able to help pull a cart. I saw my grandson grow from a baby to a youth. I know how much strength he's got. Don't we often say, 'Don't look down on young grass. It can grow and cover the whole prairie.'"

His words were applauded by everyone. Even Nima and some other wrestlers exclaimed in approval. Presently Temuer's eyes swept across the crowd, searching for someone. Knowing Temuer was looking for him, Zhou stepped back lest he should be spotted. When the din died down, Temuer spoke up again:

"As a champion wrestler, my father has the right to choose his successor. But today I've brought you a young man. His name's Zhou Xiaohu.\fn{A note reads: Xiaohu means "Little Tiger."} His father, Zhou Yage, was my sparring partner and coach and trained me to be the first Mongolian champion of freestyle wrestling. I owe it all to him. Zhou trained Little Tiger when he was small, then he sent his son to live here on the grasslands. And as you all know Little Tiger won the second place for Inner Mongolia in the National Youth Freestyle Wrestling Competition. Now the Commission of Sports and Physical Culture of our banner has decided to recommend Little Tiger to study at the Central Academy of Physical Education. A son of a Han, a good friend of ours, he will soon leave us. Now, who do you think we ought to give this vest to?"

Having said this, he went through the crowd and came back with Little Tiger, who had been walking a horse.

Bugabu, still holding the wrestling vest, looked at Baers and then the broad-shouldered, strong Little Tiger. Baers stood beside his grandfather, the blade of grass between his lips moving up and down as he grinned. Bugabu gave the vest to Little Tiger. Who wouldn't want this vest? With trembling hands, Little Tiger accepted it. Bugabu stroked his long beard and said:

"Baers, Little Tiger, you're just like a pair of tigers. Listen, whenever you feel exhausted in the ring, just think of what I often sing." With this, he began to sing:

"Buhe—telibie!"

Standing amidst the Mongolians in their colorful robes, Zhou made an effort to hold back his tears. He gazed at his old friend Temuer's lined face and gray hair.

"So our youth has come to an end," he thought.

Then he turned his eyes to Little Tiger and Baers, his ears ringing with Bugabu's chanting.

It was under the guidance of Zhou that Baers and Little Tiger grew into two promising wrestlers. They were about the same height, the same weight at 52 kilograms and were tanned a dark brown. The only differenre was their eyes. Little Tiger's eyes were round and large, while those of Baers were long and narrow. They were as inseparable as a man and his shadow. At the end of the three-year course, a wrestling competition was held. Students learned on the grape-vine that whoever won might be chosen as a member of the Chinese team to take part in an international wrestling tournament abroad.

On the day of the competition, the academy's gym was decorated like a place fit for an international tournament. People from inside and outside the academy thronged round the ring, waiting to see Baers and Little Tiger wrestle for the 52-kilogram-grade\fn{About 115 pounds.} final match.

Presently Baers in a red vest and Little Tiger in a blue one faced each other across the mat. At the sound of the whistle, the two young wrestlers grappled like two oxen. Baers stood to tackle his opponent, which was the Mongolian way of wrestling he had learned from his grandfather when he was a child. The half kneeling position

Zhou had insisted on would not do. It was a crucial match, and he made up his mind to go about it his own way. He stood steadily and, at the second whistle, dashed and caught hold of Little Tiger's left thigh and, at the same time, thrust his right leg in between his legs. Using his left arm to block Little Tiger's waist, his right hand seized his shoulder. Unable to hold his ground, Little Tiger fell.

Baers had scored two points within thirty seconds!

Everyone applauded. So standing up worked. Baers knew his opponent would be more careful and do everything possible to win the second round. Feigning an attack, he kept his feet wide apart so as to entice Little Tiger to grab his leg. Sure enough, his opponent bent down and rushed to catch his left leg. Standing, his leg was as steady as if it had struck roots in the ground. Then Baers thrust out his right leg and tripped him up. Again Little Tiger landed on the mat, and people clapped wildly.

Baers had scored another two points.

Before he could steady himself, Baers' left arm was gripped by Little Tiger, and he lost his foothold and fell on all fours. Powerless in such a position, he had no way to defend himself and lost two points.

The wrestling match was divided into two bouts, each lasting three minutes. Baers still had a two-point lead. Though the first bout was about to end, Baers was still very aggressive. Again he toppled his opponent, and the score rose to 6 to 2 in his favor.

Little Tiger knew that he could not win the match. He was panting heavily while Baers paused just to steady himself. They sized up each other, looking for an opportunity. But the first bout was over.

The break lasted one minute. Baers took a towel and wiped his sweaty face. As he covered his face with the towel, he could not contain his joy any longer.

"Grandfather's a champion," he said to himself, "Father's the national champion of Mongolian-freestyle wrestling. I'll send a telegram to tell them that I am a champion too and that I'll soon go abroad to take part in an international wrestling tournament."

Proudly he swept his eyes over the crowd and noticed that Zhou, who stood by the referee, was looking coldly at him. Baers stopped grinning immediately. Zhou stared at Baers and made a gesture, which meant that he wanted the youth to wrestle in a half-kneeling position. It was an order.

"But … but that's tantamount to asking me to give up," he thought. However, he nodded reluctantly. Then he saw Zhou shooting an approving glance at his son. He seemed to be saying:

"Can you win this match, Little Tiger?"

This, of course, was a great encouragement to his son.

Baers was very depressed. Anger rose in his heart. The match resumed. Reluctantly and miserably he adopted the half-kneeling position, which in fact was his weak spot. But Little Tiger was in high spirits. He caught Baers' waist, and before Baers knew what to do, he was thrown down. He lost two points. Then, quickly, Little Tiger scored another two points to tie.

The second bout would soon end. Little Tiger was seeking an opportunity and suddenly he threw his arms round Baers' legs. Pushing and pulling, he finally succeeded in toppling him.

The referee held up Little Tiger's hand and announced the score of 7 to 6 in Little Tiger's favor. Baers hurriedly shook hands with him and the referee and left the ring. After dressing he ran out of the gym.

The sports ground of the academy was vast and green with grass. Sitting on the ground, Baers, for the first time, felt lonely and homesick. His mind was in a turmoil.

"Father asked Grandfather to give the wrestling vest to Little Tiger. This shows we Mongolians feel great friendship towards the Han people. But why should Uncle Zhou treat me like this? I'm no fool! I know he helped Father to become national champion. But why should he show favouritism in this important match by forcing me to do what I'm weakest at and let his own son win the match?

"People make sacrifices for the sake of friendship. But for the sake of his family, he sacrificed friendship. Huh! I'm a man now, otherwise, what wouldn't I do?"

Once when a bridegroom had ridden to announce the news of his wedding, Baers, only eight years old, had insisted on wrestling with him. But he was thrown to the ground several times. Then he got to his feet and crept over to the man's horse. While the bridegroom was talking to his grandfather, Baers mounted the horse and galloped away. When he got to the village where the man lived, he climbed on top of his yurt and peed through the window in the roof. On learning this, Bugabu gave the boy a good licking. His bottom was swollen and for days he could not sit on the felt carpet. On another occasion when he was defeated by Nima, he almost bit off his ear!

For friends, a Mongolian would lift a cup of koumiss, but to his enemies, he would raise his fists! Uncle Zhou was a friend of his grandfather and his respected coach, so of course, he couldn't retaliate or use his fists. He remembered the first day he had met him when his grandfather had given the vest to Little Tiger. Grandfather was impartial, but Uncle Zhou was biased.

"I'll go and remind him!" he decided.

Baers snapped a blade of grass and, putting it between his lips, went to see Zhou.

He was sitting at his desk, deep in thought, his hands cupping his chin.

"Professor Zhou," he began casually, "could you ask Little Tiger to return that wrestling vest to me? I know you've treated me like your own son these years and I won't forget it. But today, at a crucial moment … I noticed your expression. You wanted your son to win. I won't fight over it, of course: I know I'm no match for him. Tomorrow we'll be assigned to new jobs, and I'll be going back to Inner Mongolia. I'd better take the vest back and be my grandfather's successor."

As a protest, he put the blade of grass on the desk.

Zhou picked it up and, weighing it on his, palm, said in a deep, low voice, "It's a custom in Inner Mongolia never to take back a present. And I still remember how you said to me the first day we met that you wanted to defeat all the wrestlers in your banner, in Inner Mongolia and the whole country. And now? Didn't you .lose to Little Tiger?"

In an effort to control his temper, Baers demanded:

"Why did you encourage Little Tiger by your glance? Why did you stare at me and force me to adopt that half kneeling position?"

Zhou laughed.

"You got too big for your boots after you'd won two points. That's why I gave you a warning look. If Little Tiger can defeat you just because of my glance, who else can you beat? After you've let off steam, you'd better go back to your room and have a good cry."

With these words, he lowered his head, ignoring Baers.

Once out of his office, Baers inhaled deeply.

"Cry? Have I ever cried? Am I that soft? I can beat Little Tiger! You're showing favouritisrn! But Little Tiger and I are good friends!"

He hurried off and found Little Tiger.

"Little Tiger," he called to him, "hurry up! Let's have another match. A return bout. All right? Come with me, or I'll give you hell. Hurry up! We'll be assigned new jobs tomorrow, so we'll soon be saying goodbye."

Little Tiger's stomach was rumbling with hunger, but seeing the stubborn gleam in his friend's eyes, he followed Baers into the gym.

The second day, Zhou, on behalf of the academy, announced the job assignments. At last, he came to Little Tiger and Baers.

"We've decided that Little Tiger is to work in the Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region."

Then he spoke to Little Tiger:

"You lived there for some time, and the people there have great hopes of you. Bugabu takes you as his successor, and it's a great honor. We've contacted the provincial department of sports and physical culture and we've been told that you'll continue training there with Comrade Temuer as your coach. We're sure you'll be an excellent wrestler with the Inner Mongolian Wrestling Team."

Then he turned to Baers:

"The academy has made the decision that Baers stays in Peking and joins the National Wrestling Team preparing to go abroad to take part in an international wrestling tournament. In wrestling our country has the tradition of standing, but our wrestlers are not very good at the half kneeling position used in international competitions. Baers may be eliminated in the first round, but to train wrestlers, we'll have to concede something. A sportsman should never be afraid of defeat, but he must have the tenacity and will-power to defeat his opponent! Baers, you'll soon be a member of the national team, and wear the national emblem on your chest. Do you know what that means?"

Baers stood up, nodding with tears in his eyes, looking at his gray-haired coach and his friend Little Tiger. He realized he still had much to learn.

The National Wrestling Competition was held in Shanghai. Both Bugabu and Nima came as observers. Zhou led a group of wrestlers including Baers. He carried a big brown holdall with him instead of his usual small bag.

What's more, he would not let the boys touch it.

Temuer took Little Tiger to see Zhou. The two older men gazed at each other in silence as if confiding to the other his feelings. Little Tiger smiled warmly at his father, while Baers winked mischievously at his. Overjoyed, the two young wrestlers sat side by side on the edge of the bed pummelling each other.

"Go and enjoy yourselves outside," Zhou urged them.

At this, they jumped to their feet and ran out.

"This time, I'm pretty sure that Little Tiger will win. He's on his mettle and his skill has improved enormously this past year," said Temuer confidently.

"Well, I believe Baers will win," replied Zhou, his eyes also gleaming with confidence. "We've chosen the right person. Though he was eliminated in the first round of that international tournament, he has proved himself a promising wrestler. I have no doubt about his mental approach, strength and skill."

"Little Tiger's been with me day and night. I know he'll win." He was adamant.

"I know Baers like the palm of my hand. He'll be the champ, no doubt," Zhou countered.

They smiled at each other as though saying, "Let's wait and see!" Then they parted.

The indoor stadium was brightly lit. The green mat in the middle of the hall had become the focus of all cameras. Due to the average weight of Chinese wrestlers, 52-kilogram-grade wrestling was the item in which people were most interested. After the first few rounds, Baers and Little Tiger were the only two wrestlers left. for the final. The victor would take part in the World Wrestling Championship.

As Baers and Little Tiger appeared in the ring, a sports news-caster's voice was commentating for radio and television:

"The man in the red vest is Baers, a Mongolian wrestler. His name means tiger. His opponent, Little Tiger, is wearing the blue vest. He's a Han. Their fathers won the first and second prize in a national freestyle competition in the fifties. To commemorate that event and for friendship, they decided to name both their sons 'tiger.' So this is a match between two tigers."

Presently, everybody on the stand had his eyes fixed on the two "tigers."

Before Little Tiger entered the ring, his coach, Temuer, had told him:

"You must win! All we Mongolians are backing you."

Encouraged, Little Tiger was raring to go. But he never knew that his coach wanted him to win just because he wanted to show his gratitude to his old friend for his selflessness and for caring for Baers.

When Baers entered, Temuer looked at him meaningfully and pointed to his heart. Baers understood at once: What we Mongolians treasure is friendship, not personal gain. He made up his mind that he would display the skills taught by Zhou and let all the spectators see what a fine coach he had. Then he would give Little Tiger the chance to win the match. Baers was no longer the boy who could not bear to lose, but a mature adult.

They tied 4 each in the first bout, and there were 52 seconds left. Zhou watched Baers' movements intently. Presently, Baers pressed his chest on Little Tiger's left shoulder, while using his left hand to grip the other's waist, his right hand moved up to seize Little Tiger's right shoulder. Strange! Zhou was puzzled. Surely, Baers knew it was the neck he should seize. That was like ABC for a wrestler. Suddenly Zhou realized that Baers had done it deliberately. Little Tiger, of course, turned round and floored Baers. The score was 6 to 4. Deafening applause! What a beautiful move!

Knowing what was going on, Zhou shook his head and heaved a long sigh. What instruction could he give Baers during the interval? He knew the boy too well. In the past Baers had only thought about winning, but now he knew better. Besides, Little Tiger, trained by Temuer, was a tough match for him!

Baers kept his head down as if he had really been defeated. Zhou came over to him, thrust a black folder at him, and ordered:

"Open it! Have a good look at it!"

Inside the folder were a few clippings, some with photos of the Chinese flag being hoisted at international wrestling tournaments. On one sheet, there was a big circle inside which was a little blade of grass.

"Do you remember this?" Zhou asked, pointing to the grass. "I brought it here specially for you, understand?" He was very grave.

Baers nodded.

"Do you know what it means?" There was a quiver in Zhou's voice.

Baers shook his head.

"This … this means the first place! The wish of my life." His voice was very low. "You must win the first place in an international wrestling competition some day. So you must forget all your personal considerations and defeat all your opponents. You can’t afford to lose, you know. You must win every match!” His eyes moistened.

Baers, clenching his teeth, lowered his head.

The second bout started. Little Tiger entered the arena, his ears still ringing with Temuer’s warning, “It will be a disgrace to the people of the grasslands if you lose! Understand?” So he must win too!

Presently, the match was almost finished. Both Baers and Little Tiger were exhausted. Panting heavily, they stood facing each other, both determined to win.

Again the two tigers were locked together. Three seconds before the end, Baers, at last, pressed Little Tiger to the ground. The referee helped raise Baers’ hand. The score wa:s 10 to 8. Immediately all the photographers swarmed round Baers.

He noticed when shaking hands with Little Tiger that his opponent lowered his head as though he had let down his Mongolian friends. He also saw the cold glint. in his father’s eyes, his grandfather’s pensive mood and Nima’s blank look.

Baers fled from the reporters and hid himself in a corner.

However, he was spotted. Zhou, Bugabu, Temuer, Nima and Little Tiger all came towards him. By now they knew everything. Little Tiger was close to tears. He held out a handkerchief to Baers. Temuer nodded to his son, grinning, while Nima raised his thumb.

Bugabu was the calmest. Looking at the two young wrestlers, he said in earnest:

"A good steed will never grab others’ fodder. My grandson doesn’t care about individual fame, only that of China. He’s lived up to our Mongolian expectations. Remember, Little Tiger, Baers, when you’re exhausted in the ring, think of our song.”

The old wrestler raised his head and red in the face began to sing in his husky, deep voice. But this time the song he sang was the national anthem.

Zhou took out the Mongolian wrestling vest, which he had kept for more than four years, from his holdall and offered it to Baers.

“Make it snappy! The loudspeaker’s calling you and Little Tiger. Put it on and go and get your prize. I hope one day you’ll mount the stand in this vest in a world wrestling competition.”

So for the time being what was on Baers’ mind was the blade of grass in the big circle

He was in a state between sleep and wakefulness, seemingly about to wake up yet actually still half asleep. He thought the rumbling noise was the sound of a pneumatic drill digging up the surface of the road outside his home. When he fully regained consciousness he realized that the aches and pains he was suffering all over were caused by his falling asleep curled up in an airplane seat. He was surrounded by darkness with only the scattered light of reading lamps over a few seats. The snores of nearby passengers could be heard over the noise of the engines. He lifted his arm to look at his watch, but could not make out the time. He turned on the overhead light, still he could only see a blur. He had to fish out his reading glasses to see that it had been about six or seven hours since they took off from Los Angeles. At the beginning of the trip he was so exhausted that no matter how he twisted and turned, he could not find a comfortable position.

Later, after some food and two tranquilizers he started to doze off and finally fell into a fitful sleep. He was dreaming. His dreams were episodic and very involved, leaving him with no memory of any of them. It was more like seeing some dark shadowy figures or like looking at old faded photographs. He had a feeling that they involved his home town in Fukien. This he sensed rather than actually remembered. He had the impression that there was a little girl crying and tugging at his pants. And there was the vague form of the face of a woman disappearing behind a dark shadow …

He got up slowly, feeling faint. He held on to the back of a seat and stood there for a while, stretching his back and his limbs. The coolness in the cabin made him shiver. At times like this his wife Yin-ju would be handing him a sweater. She had spoiled him these past 30 odd years. He almost never had to manage by himself. The year before last, Yin-ju had to go to America to look after their eldest daughter Chin-lin, who just had a baby. About a month later his life had turned so topsy-turvy that he longed for her return. He wished she could come home soon, but he didn’t want to appear in competition with their daughter. After all he was well aware of the fact that Chin-lin was going through a lot after a Caesarean birth. Yin-ju, however, was very much aware of the state he was in. She very quietly arranged for Chin-lin’s mother-in-law to take over and quickly returned to Taiwan. After all, having been married for so many years, they were in tune with one another. Now that the children were grown and gone she was even more attentive, looking after him, protecting him as if he were her child.

He staggered to the lavatory. The powerful fluorescent light made him look even paler. He stuck his tongue out and saw a thick layer of white. He sighed: if only Yin-ju were here.

But this was one trip he had to make by himself. He knew that it was something he had to face alone. No one, not even Yin-ju, could accompany him. More than thirty years had gone by. He was pushing seventy. If he did not face up to it now, he might not have another chance.

"Papa, hello Papa, can you hear me? Hello, hello."

Chin-yuan's voice came over the phone from across the Pacific. Over the background static, his voice was like a candle, sometimes bright, sometimes flickering faintly, weak yet piercing.

"Yes, A-yuan, I can hear you. Can you hear me clearly?" He too was shouting into the speaker.

"Papa, this call must be very expensive. I will talk about the important matter first … hello? Papa, I have bought a train ticket; I'll be leaving Peking tomorrow for Shen-tsun, the border town. Have you got your plane ticket yet? When will you be arriving in Hong Kong? Hello, Papa."

He hurriedly searched his pocket; Hsiao-lei handed him a piece of paper. He rubbed his eyes; Hsiao-lei now handed him his glasses.

"Hello, yes, yes, I am leaving Los Angeles on the twentieth and will be arriving on the twenty-first, Monday, at eight o'clock in the evening."

Hsiao-lei reminded him to mention the flight number.

"Very good, Papa, Chin-fang will be meeting me in Shen-tsun. She will be there on the eighteenth. We will probably be in Hong Kong on the nineteenth or the twentieth, at the latest. We have already been in touch with Uncle Chen. Papa, we will be there at the airport to meet you."

He became alert all of a sudden at this point, and realized only then that he was actually talking to Chin-yuan. Hefelt a lump in his throat and said, "G-good, A-yuan."

"Papa, we will definitely be at the airport. You wait for us; we will definitely be there."

"A-yuan," His lips felt frozen and stiff and he fought for control. "Good, you … be there, and I'll definitely, definitely …" He took a deep breath, recovered somewhat and asked, "A-fang, how is she?"

"Papa, listen, A-fang, if she should mention the letters you wrote her, you … just don't say anything."

"What? What letters?"

"Papa." The static reached a new high, and it rudely over-powered Chin-yuan's voice. Only a few words came through faintly, sounding like someone drowning. "I … A-fang … you wrote … don't say … just say …"

"Hello, hello, A-yuan, A-yuan!"

He was shouting. Now Chin-yuan's voice suddenly came across a little more clearly.

"We can't hear too well over the phone. Papa, we will talk about it when we meet. In any event, should A-fang mention your letters, don't say you never wrote any letters."

"Hello, A-yuan, what is this—"

"We mustn't talk too long. It's costing Hsiao-lei a lot. Papa, take care of yourself. We will meet on the twenty-first, and that's a certainty. Good-bye, Papa."

"That's a certainty, that's a certainty …"

He hung up and felt as if he were drifting in space. All he could hear was Chin-yuan's voice saying "Papa, Papa … a certainty; a certainty …"

They probably were running into turbulence. Suddenly the plane was bouncing up and down. Overhead, the "fasten seat belt" sign was turned on. The middle-aged man sitting next to him opened his eyes and yawned. As he turned his head their eyes met. The man smiled and said, "There will probably be another three hours yet or more." The man had a very heavy Cantonese accent, but he understood and smiled, nodding in agreement.

"Do you live in Hong Kong, Sir?"

"No, Taiwan, Taipei."

"Is that so? I go there often, company business," said the man as he handed him a business card. He accepted it out of courtesy but didn't bother to put on his glasses to read it. He said, just to make conversation,

"Business must be very good for your company."

"Nothing to speak of, nothing to speak of." The middle-aged man smiled very amiably, so his smug attitude did not bother him. "We are doing all right. We are just an intermediary serving between Taiwan and China mainland. Business is all right. All right. Am I correct in assuming that you, sir, are now returning to Taiwan by way of Hong Kong after a trip to America?"

"Yes, I have two children in America."

Suddenly he remembered Hsiao-lei and Hsiao-yun and added, "Umm, I mean two boys and two girls …"

"Sir, you are really blessed." The man asked him about the purpose of his trip to Hong Kong. He was never very good at making small talk with strangers, and the business at hand was certainly something he would not discuss. He muttered a vague reply and felt somewhat apologetic. He really was in no mood, emotionally or physically, to carry on a conversation. He closed his eyes and pretended to rest. It crossed his mind that it was probably an old man's privilege to claim fatigue to avoid unnecessary polite conversation.

> Dear Father,
> How are you? It has been more than thirty years since I last wrote you. For a moment, after I picked up the pen, I did not know where to begin. To be exact, it has been thirty-eight years. There is so much I want to tell you. I remember when we parted in Foochow; I was only ten. You fondled my head then turned around and left. I stood there watching your retreating figure. Later I ran upstairs and watched from the porch as you walked out of the alley. The events of that day are the only things I remember. All that happened earlier are very blurry.

This letter was forwarded to Taipei through Hsiao-lei. Hsiao-lei went to Peking at least once a year, since the company he worked for had set up an office in China. On his first trip he approached a few organizations to help him locate Chin-yuan. When Hsiao-lei went back again the second year, he and Chin-yuan met in Peking. He really did not know what to write to Chin-yuan. After he left Foochow, he had stayed in Canton and Hong Kong for some time before going to Taiwan. The first couple of years in Taipei he had sent letters home through friends in Hong Kong.. They were discontinued after a while. He had no idea what was going through the minds of his mother and his two children back home; he did not even dare to venture a guess. He gradually learned to lock away his fear and his longing. He hardly even mentioned it to Yin-ju. He did not want to analyze himself: did his actions indicate guilt?

The only thing he remembered clearly from his dreams was his old mother's wide open eyes. They seemed to have something to tell him. He had dreamed of yet another face which appeared in the dark for a fleeting moment, then turned away as if to avoid his eyes, but he did see who it was; it was the face of the mother of Chin-yuan and Chin-fang, his deceased wife.

But he seldom dreamed of his two children. Was it because subconsciously he knew that the children were constantly growing, and they would not be the same as when he last saw them? He could only see their silhouettes indistinctly at a far distance. Whenever he woke up after dreams like this, he found it hard to go back to sleep. He would go quietly to the kitchen, make himself a cup of warm milk, and sit there in a daze until daybreak.

Yin-ju, of course, knew what was torturing him. Since he did not want to talk about it, she was very understanding and did not ask any questions. However, she was forever watching the ebb and flow of his emotional state. News of his mother's death came roundabout from a distant cousin in Singapore. It went through many hands; by the time the news got to Yin-ju it was a year later. At that time they had just lost a big sum of money in a joint business deal and were on the brink of bankruptcy. Yin-ju hesitated to tell him, though eventually she had to.

How he had survived those days, he dreaded to think back, as if afraid to touch an old wound. If it hadn't been for Yin-ju he might not have been able to control himself, might have done something foolish. Yin-ju knew that he must be worried about the children, and she tried to find out the whereabouts of Chin-fang, who had stayed in their home town to keep Grandma company, and Chin-yuan, who was attending school in Foochow. She was told it would be difficult to locate them during that turbulent time, and even if they succeeded, they might only be getting the children into more trouble; why bother?

He and Yin-ju thought it over and agreed. As their father, he had walked away from them many years ago. If they harbored any resentment or hatred, so be it. They were now grown. If they succeeded in locating them, then what? They didn't want to add to their problems.

He was never good at expressing himself in words, and he lacked the courage to touch the painful wound deep inside himself. What was there left to write to Chin-yuan? True, the sensation of fondling his head for the last time was still with him, but what could he say to a son now approaching middle age? Surely not "Papa is sorry," as they casually did on those television soap-operas. His own son, flesh of his flesh whom he had failed to care for and to raise, what had become of him? Hsiao-lei said Chin-yuan looked like him. He wasn't sure whether he was pleased or disappointed.

There was still Chin-fang. She had just learned to walk when he left his home town. A weak and motherless child, she started to walk late. He vaguely remembered that she was unable to walk across a tiny ditch in front of their house and had to crawl over it, crying all the way …

Finally he wrote a very short letter, summing up over thirty years of life with a few words saying only that all's well with him. He sent, via Hsiao-lei, a picture of himself and Yin-ju and their two younger children in Taiwan.

After that his dreams became more disturbing. In his dreams the vague figures were always retreating. He knew in his heart who they were; he wanted to catch up with them, yet he did not dare. His feet refused to take a step, his throat closed …

The hostess announced that they would soon land at Hong Kong airport. He fastened his seat belt and looked aimlessly out of the window. It looked like a clear day with thin clouds. Slowly the airplane flew out of the layers of clouds. There, outside the window, right before his eyes the lights from the many skyscrapers covered the black velvety earth like a storybook display of pearls and diamonds. When he was last in Hong Kong in 1950, there were not so many tall buildings. In those days most people traveled by boat and were not able to look down on any of this. The man in the next seat, seeing that he was looking out, pointed out a few spots to him, but he hardly heard him. He only hoped that the plane would circle around a little more, giving him more needed time to adjust himself.

And yet he could hardly wait to step out of the cabin. He was familiar with the expression that "a feeling of timidity sets in as one approaches one's native land," but it never occurred to him that it could happen here. It must be that this feeling of timidity is caused by people, not places.

More than thirty years ago when he came to Hong Kong, alone and for a short stay, he never dreamed that this place would one day be the meeting ground for him and his son and daughter. A few years back, when Taiwan permitted its residents to travel abroad, it was very popular among his friends to visit Hong Kong. He alone was not tempted. But one time, an idea flashed across his mind momentarily: what if he quietly went from Hong Kong to … no, no, he no longer had any hope of finding them. It would be more difficult than looking for a needle in a haystack. What good would it do to make a trip himself? What would the consequences be? What about Yin-ju and the children in Taiwan? The whole idea that flashed across his mind was quickly abandoned..

Among his friends, he was known for his stubborn refusal to travel abroad and also for his stubborn refusal to enjoy life in other ways. For years he ran a small pediatric clinic. Anybody else would have accumulated a small fortune. Not him, he had only a small apartment. One of the reasons was that it took him quite a few years to recover from his business loss. The nurse at the clinic, however, put it more aptly:

"This is no way to run a hospital; this is like running a relief center."

Oftentimes, when she saw the fees he charged his patients, she mumbled, "Another freebie!?" Later she wouldn't even bother to comment. Yin-ju was like him too; she had never questioned him about the fees he charged. Their younger daughter Chili-mei once teased him and said,

"Too bad Papa does not speak a foreign language, otherwise he could go to Africa and be another Schweitzer."

Schweitzer? He forced a smile and thought to himself: I am not that great. He seldom analyzed himself, nor did he want to; however he was sure that his motives were selfish: to redeem his sense of guilt in some small measure, to ease the self-reproach, thereby giving himself a little bit of peace. That's all there was to it.

He thought that to adopt Hsiao-lei and Hsiao-yun was the right thing to do, his obligation, so he did it without giving it a second thought. Of course, he had Yin-ju's consent. Everybody else shunned those two children whose parents had been found guilty of a political offense. When it seemed safe, an old schoolmate came to him and commented,

"Among all the people from our home town and our medical school, only you had the courage and the sense of righteousness to do it."

Again his smile was contrived, and he kept quiet. In his heart he said to himself: what courage? What sense of righteousness? If Chili-yuan and Chin-fang were to become homeless orphans, he hoped that someone would take them in so that they wouldn't suffer from cold and hunger, and could have proper schooling.

However, he felt that even in a simple and straightforward matter like this few would really understand him, except Yin-Ju.

The plane had landed with a bump. Although the crew told the passengers to wait until it had come to a complete halt before leaving their seats, the anxious ones had already picked up their bags, big and small, and were standing in the aisles. He remained seated and mechanically smoothed his hair and straightened his tie. He could feel his heartbeat as clearly as if he were listening through a stethoscope. He took a few deep breaths, slowly; his palms were wet and cold.

He told himself that he had reached the end of this long journey. Now he had to go through immigration, baggage claim, customs and then …

Then he had to face two of the people he loved the most, but they were strangers to him, and they would judge him.

"Don't cry, be a good girl, don't cry."

The little girl opened her mouth wider and cried harder, tears streaming down her cheeks from her tightly closed eyes.

"Doctor?" the mother said worriedly. It brought him back to reality, and he removed the stethoscope from his ears, pulled down the little girl's dress and said very gently,

"It's all right. In a little while your papa is going to take you home in a honk-honk car, your mama will give you some medicine, and in a couple of days you will be well again to play with your friends. How's that?"

The vision of a little girl, a skinny and feeble child, crying as she crawled across the shallow ditch often came to mind. Her grandma was getting old; who was there to help her across a deeper and wider ditch? To take her to school? Who looked after her after Grandma died? Who took her to see a doctor when she was sick? Who was there to tell her the facts of growing up when she became a young woman?

He knew he would be hearing from Chin-fang soon after the arrival of Chin-yuan's letter. In the meantime he remained dazed. The letter arrived. He gently stroked the thin paper. The paper was of poor quality, and it looked as if it might fall apart at a touch. Water spots had blurred the words written in ink in quite a few places. The letter was short; she merely said repeatedly how happy she was to hear from her father after ten or so years, and that nothing made her happier than to learn that her father was in good health. He was jolted when he came across "ten or so years." It was probably a slip of the pen, since it was actually more than thirty years.

The childish scrawl of Chin-fang saddened him. As he lifted his eyes from her scrawl, there were, right in front of him, under the glass top, pictures of Chin-lin getting her doctorate and Chin-mei getting her master's degree. Both smiled the smile of the fortunate. The thin letter paper was making a small rustling noise. He became aware that his usually steady hands were trembling.

To write back to Chin-fang was even harder. Why should Chin-fang consider him her father? Why should she write? Why should she feel happy? He wanted to ask her: what kind of a daughter are you? Don't you understand what hatred is?

Of course he did not ask her any such questions. He just wrote a short letter addressed to both of them, and sent them a sum of money, all delivered through Hsiao-lei.

Chin-lin and the others asked him to make a trip to America again and again. He always refused, saying that he could not get away from the clinic. Then, one night Hsiao-lei called from overseas. It changed his resolution to never travel abroad.

"Uncle, I just returned from over there yesterday."

Hsiao-lei sounded excited. "Brother A-yuan said he often travels to the south on business, and he also found out that it is quite easy to apply for a permit to visit Hong Kong to meet with relatives. He wanted me to ask you if you could visit your relatives in America and make a detour to Hong Kong and meet him there. There is a possibility that Sister A-fang would be able to make the trip too."

"I …"

The possibility had never crossed his mind, and for the moment he did not know how to react.

"Let me think it over. You discuss it with them. If possible, of course I … of course …"

There was a map of China on the wall in their youngest son, Chin-hung's room. He tried to measure with his eyes the distances between certain places. All of a sudden the ridiculousness of the situation dawned on him. The hopeless regrets and repentance he had suffered for more than half a lifetime were caused by a separation of mere inches on the map. It was all very hard to believe, and life seemed so very unreal.

He pushed the baggage cart and walked toward the crowd. As he approached a middle-aged man, a strange sensation hit him. He stopped and turned to look at the man in the eyes. It was not exactly like looking at oneself in a mirror, looking into a mirror would not be as startling as this encounter. It was as if the mirror image stepped out of the mirror and walked toward him.

It was all happening too fast; afterwards, it was impossible to trace the details of that moment. For example, did he call out to his son by name, or did the name stick in his throat? Did his son callout first, or did he gather his son in an embrace first? He could not remember any of it. He only remembered that once the son was in his embrace, his only fear was that some evil magic might make him disappear. He couldn't let go. How long did it last? Chin-yuan let go first. Now he was able to look closely into his son's eyes. In those eyes shining with tears, there seemed to be a reflection of himself as if it had been locked in there all these years.

He turned and saw another pair of eyes, wide-open, full of sadness yet smiling. They were the eyes of his mother of whom he had dreamed countless times. They seemed to want to tell him something, but held back in silence. Then there was her lovely nose, her slightly protruding front teeth; his dead wife had stepped across time and across the barrier of life and death and stood in front of him—

"A-fang …"

When he heard what came out from his own throat, a trace of surprise flashed across his face. A-fang? That skinny and feeble weeping little girl?

She was still skinny, so thin that it was heartbreaking, and she was still weeping, yet smiling at the same time. There were wrinkles at the corners of her eyes as she smiled. He took her gently into his embrace. She was angular and all bones, and every one of them pierced his heart with pain. He wanted more pain. He couldn't tell how long he held her like that, though he was vaguely aware that it was longer than the total amount of time on the few occasions that he had held her as a child.

Mr. Chen, husband of a very good friend of Yin-ju's, had arranged for them to stay in a small quiet hotel in Kowloon, and he very thoughtfully showed them around the neighborhood, pointing out the locations of bus stops and restaurants, telling them that the service people spoke Mandarin and that the area was safe. He had been so nervous himself that he was in a daze. He forced himself to listen to Mr. Chen, but still he found it difficult to concentrate. All he could see was his son in a loose fitting western suit, who had as much gray at the temples as he did, but there was no sign of middle-age paunch. During the trip from the airport he discovered that his son was just as tongue-tied as he was when it came to social exchanges and small talk. The daughter had a head of shining black hair just like her mother. It was a shame she had a permanent wave, a head of tight and stiff-looking curls. She had probably done it specially for this trip. Her eyes looked larger than life, maybe because she was so thin. He wanted to look a little longer at those eyes, yet he was afraid to.

It was late at night when the three of them were finally alone in their hotel room. Although it was still daytime to him because of the time difference, he was exhausted, but not sleepy: The room was quiet for a few seconds, as if an air of strangeness finally fell around them.

Chin-yuan cleared his throat, got up and took a paper bag from his suitcase.

"Papa, here are come pictures taken recently of me, Hui-wen and our child." Chin-yuan enunciated each word distinctly, as if every word was carefully deliberated.

Chin-fang came over to look too, but he had a feeling that her mind was elsewhere. When they finished looking at the pictures, she hastily brought out a gray woolen vest.

"Papa, I knitted this for you; I wonder if it fits." She measured the vest against his body very gingerly; uttered a sigh of relief and said, "It will do; it will fit." She now seemed more confident of herself,

"I asked my sister-in-law to pick up the wool for me. I could not get any good wool even at the county seat. Peking has a wider selection; besides, Sister-in-law has better taste. I was afraid that I wouldn't be able to make the trip. I was going to finish it as soon as possible and mail it to Brother to bring to you."

He took the vest and stared at the endless stitches, knit and purl, knit and purl. He reached out for her hands and held them tightly in his own. Unexpectedly, he turned them over for closer scrutiny. Her hands were thin and hard; there were some thick calluses on the palms of her hand. He fondled them softly with his thumb. Suddenly he bent and buried his face in them for a long while. He raised his head and whispered,

"Tell Papa, A-fang, how have the years been for you?"

A-fang looked at him, then she slowly lowered her head and played with her own fingers. A long while later a tear drop fell on the back of her hand.

"Are you angry with Papa?"

She shook her head. Another drop fell on the back of her hand.

"Did you think that Papa deserted you and didn't want you any more?"

The words rushed out before he raised his head to look at Chin-yuan. Chin-yuan was watching him. Under the soft light in the room Chin-yuan looked younger than he had at first sight. Suddenly he felt lost and confused; he did not seem to be fully aware of the time and place. Chin-fang looked up and looked him straight in the eye and said softly but firmly,

"Long ago, yes. I was very young then. Everybody else had a papa and mama, and I only had grandma, I felt inferior. Grandma told me my mama died and my papa is a very good doctor who went far away to practice. He will be back one day …"

He lowered his head and saw his fingers, long, thin, and pale. These hands had taken care of endless numbers of patients, endless numbers of children and old people. But how about his own two children and his old mother? How often had he ever touched them?

" … Many years had passed, when Papa still had not returned and had not even sent a letter, I recalled a story Brother told me. It was about a genie who had been locked up in a bottle. At first he hoped that someone would come to his rescue. When no one did for a long time he gave up hope and swore that he would eat whoever released him from the bottle …" She smiled sadly and went on, "I thought then that if Papa should actually come back one day, I was not going to speak to him. So, when one day Grandma told me that Brother had forwarded a letter from Papa, I made up my mind not to read it …"

He was taken aback and was about to say something when he found Chin-yuan looking at him and remembered, all of a sudden, what Chin-yuan had said during their overseas telephone conversation. He felt puzzled.

Chin-fang shook her head, sighed and said, "I was really very stubborn in those days. I was already in my teens, yet I was so childish."

Chin-yuan cleared his throat and said casually, "Hey, doesn't your oldest take after you? I was told that whenever the child feels upset, he hits himself on the chest."

Chin-fang smiled, embarrassed. Chin-yuan looked at his watch and said, "It's late. We'd better let Papa rest. We will talk some more tomorrow."

He interrupted immediately and said, "It's all right. I am not tired."

"Let me talk some more. Some of the things I want to say may not be known even to Brother. Much later, I could not help myself any longer, and I tried to read those letters when Grandma was not looking. After I read them I kept trying to figure a way to write back. In the beginning my mind was full of angry words. Later on, when I could not sleep at night I wrote Papa letters in my head. I told Papa whatever was bothering me as if I were putting them down in a letter. This way, as I was telling Papa all my problems, I would fall asleep. Funny thing was Papa seemed to know what had befallen me and what kind of trouble I was in. Papa was always there to enlighten me …"

He gave Chin-yuan a penetrating look; Chin-yuan, on the other hand, sat there looking down, like a statue.

"During the time of the Cultural Revolution our neighbors to the left and to the right had all been raided. I was really scared then. If those letters were discovered, there would surely be trouble ahead. Yet how could I bring myself to part with them? Later, when it could not be put off any longer, I had to bum them, except two that I considered most memorable. I couldn't bring myself to bum them, so I kept them on me … Papa, I brought them with me now."

"A-fang," Chin-yuan stood up and said, gently but firmly, "It's really late. Papa has been traveling by plane for over ten hours. We should let him rest." Then he turned to his father and said, "Papa, would you like to bathe first? I will see that A-fang goes to bed."

Chin-yuan's courteous words were persuasive. Chin-fang obeyed meekly; He felt that so many things were going through his head that he needed to take a warm shower to be alone with himself.

He sat on the edge of the bed, staring fixedly at A-fang who was fast asleep. Now that those two eyes were closed, he finally found the courage to stare at her.

Chin-yuan came out of the bathroom, wearing striped pajamas. His face was pinkish and he smelled of soap.

"Asleep?" The older brother bent over and asked in a whisper. "Urn-hm. She is snoring," he said light-heartedly. Chin-yuan said, as he went around picking things scattered around the room, "These last few days have exhausted her. Not me; I often take trips for business and I'm used to them. She has never been far from home; has not had a good night's sleep for days … Papa, you don't smoke, do you?"

He saw Chin-yuan push the ashtray to one corner of the end table and answered him, "No. You don't either, right?"

Chin-yuan said, a bit embarrassed, "I used to. Social contact between colleagues makes it hard to refuse them. But, not long ago, when I succeeded in contacting Papa, I gave it up. I figured Papa is a doctor; you would most likely be against smoking. Good thing I was not hooked. It was easy to give it up." He nodded. Suddenly something triggered his memory.

"A-yuan, you must still remember that I did spank you once when you were young."

Chin-yuan's face was a blank. "Really? I have no impression whatever. Why?"

"I caught you strutting around with cigarette butts the guests had left behind." He sighed, "Chiefly it was because I was about to leave and I intended to leave you with your uncle. I was worried; what if you picked up bad habits? I was worried." He muttered, "Good thing you don't remember."

"Uncle was very strict, otherwise I would not have been able to get into the university. But Papa, I did not study medicine. Are you disappointed?"

Watching the expression on his son's face, he smiled spontaneously; If his son wasn't already turning gray at the temples he would have said fondly, "You silly boy!"

His reaction put Chin-yuan at ease; he went on, "Good thing I was taken to Foochow then. They have good high schools. A-fang remained in our home town and was short-changed."

"A-yuan," he thought it was time to solve the mystery, "What about all those letters A-fang said I wrote her?"

Chin-yuan swallowed and said, "Oh, those. At the time I was young, and I didn't know whether it was the right thing to do. We received letters from you regularly after you left Foochow, some even after you got to Taiwan. Until 1952."

He tried to convert the year to the Republic of China calendar. He lowered his head; figured for a moment and said, "I think it was in the 42nd year,\fn{From 1911, the year in which the Manchu dynasty finally overthrown.} that is, 1953, when I asked another friend in Hong Kong to forward a letter to you, the previous friend had gone to Taiwan."

Chin-yuan nodded and said, "That's it. Since then, we have had no word from you. I was then more or less aware of what was going on, and I felt at home in Uncle's house. So, I took it well. However, Grandma was an old lady; and A-fang was still attending primary school. Those two were—"

Chin-yuan looked at him and stopped short. He both wanted to hear and dreaded to hear. A silence fell between them. Both turned at the same time to look at Chin-fang. After a while Chin-yuan whispered in an even lower voice,

"I seldom went back to our home town in those days. I heard things by listening to conversations between Uncle and Aunt. They talked about Grandma and how her sight was deteriorating, probably from too much weeping."

He sat there like a clay figure, head bowed, awaiting judgment.

"I heard that A-fang was not doing well in school, that she was bad-tempered and had an inferiority complex. Grandma couldn't deal with her. I kept thinking that you would soon find a way to send word to us. But ten years went by; I graduated from college and was assigned to work in Peking. One day it suddenly occurred to me that you probably were as anxious to correspond with us as we were to hear from you, and that the reason you did not write was because you couldn't. Should I, in that case, should I write to Grandma and A-fang on your behalf?"

"So, you, you—"

"So I did. Grandma gave me one of your earlier letters which I saved and carried with me all the time. I tried to imitate your handwriting. Papa, do you think it looked like yours?"

Of course he had thought so at first glance. He smiled and nodded.

"I fabricated a story and told Grandma that an acquaintance in the diplomatic service in Peking helped me make contact. I did not dare to write too often, lest I arouse their suspicion. Grandma was close to seventy yet still very clear-headed."

He nodded.

"I sent one every few months, mostly before holidays and the New Year, so that they could enjoy the holidays more."

Chin-fang turned in her bed; Chin-yuan gently straightened the blanket over her and continued whispering after hearing her even breathing, "A-fang told you that at first she was angry; wouldn't read your letters—I mean to say my letters."

Chin-yuan smiled; he too couldn't help smiling.

"Grandma said later she did read them. Not only that, if the next one was a long time coming, she would even question Grandma. I began to write more often. I feared that they might want to write back to you, so I told them it was next to impossible to send letters to you. I told them they should tell me what they wanted to say, and I would tell my friends, who would put it in writing when they were out of the country."

"How long did you do this?"

"Exactly ten years. During the time of the Cultural Revolution, everybody was in a state of confusion; I thought I should stop before I brought them trouble. But, Grandma was in poor health and she counted on those letters …"

He closed his eyes and did a little figuring, nodded and said, "So, you stopped after Grandma passed away."

"Yes. By that time A-fang was married and had a child of her own. She had grown up. I said to myself:

enough; leave it at that; more may bring on complications."

"No wonder A-fang said that there have been no more letters for over ten years."

"Lately I seldom think about what I did. It was A-fang who reminded me about them in her letter before we came. That was why I tried to tell you over the phone; A-fang may be very upset should she find out. But I couldn't really explain the whole situation over the phone."

True, lots of things could not be explained. His glance fell on this middle-aged man in front of him who looked just like him. If he were in the other's shoes would he have done the same thing under the same circumstances? Many years ago when he was a new father, he had fears that his child might not turn out as expected—he feared that the son might not be like him. However, after he had gone through life's many ordeals, his only hope was that the child would not take after him. And now, facing this oldest of his sons, he sensed a feeling of awe rising up within him. Was it because the son bore too close a resemblance to himself, or because he was not like himself in some aspects?

> My dear daughter A-fang,
> I am very happy to learn that you have graduated from high school and are now working. It is truly hard to believe that my daughter has reached adulthood. According to your grandmother you have always hoped that when you grew up you could follow your mother's footsteps and be a nurse, or be like Brother studying engineering. You were, therefore, upset at being assigned to work in a factory. The truth is there is no such thing in the world as a noble profession or a humble profession. One should be proud of oneself so long as one is supporting oneself and serving the people. Furthermore, the kind of work your mother and brother do may not be suitable for you or interest you. I hope you stay in the factory and devote yourself to mastering a skill.

Chin-fang shyly showed him the letter yellowed with age.

"I made a point of saving this one, because this was the first one I told Grandma I wanted to read. I read the others behind her back. I was really foolish, Papa. You won't be angry with me, will you?"

He smiled a forced smile and answered softly, "How could I be? If I were you, I would be mad with my papa too. This letter was well written.' He threw a glance at Chin-yuan and added, "Did you listen to your … eh, to the advice in it?"

"Certainly not." He noticed that in the short span of one day, Chin-fang was already beginning to act like a young girl from time to time, very much at variance with her forty years, but extremely touching. "I said to myself then: hum, old hash! However, after a few more letters from you, after you had repeatedly told me so, I began to see the points."

Chin-fang took out another letter that was falling apart at the folds.

> My dear daughter A-fang,
> I am happy to learn from your brother that you have a boy friend. Since he works in the same factory you must have gotten to know him pretty well. The important points are: A person's character, his health, his ambition to advance himself, and that he be filial to parents and sincere in dealing with his friends. If he possesses these qualities, no other stringent demands are necessary. Though Chin-yuan is far away in Peking, you could ask him to come back for a visit at New Year's to meet your friend. He is six years older and your only sibling, and you ought to listen to what he has to advise regarding such an important matter as matrimony.

At this point he looked up and threw an understanding glance at Chin-yuan.

Chin-fang blushed and said with a smile, "This letter was—"

Chin-yuan butted in and said, "This letter was worth saving. I went back to our hometown and looked over her intended on the strength of this letter. About two months later A-fang and A-hsin were engaged. It was settled very quickly."

Chin-fang patted her brother lightly on the shoulder and said, "In Papa's absence of course I had to listen to Brother. You did approve."

He watched the two of them and had a feeling of loss that a phase of life had passed him by.

"Papa," Chin-fang became very serious and turned to face him. He was startled by her gaze, a gaze that he recognized from way back. "I have been meaning to tell you that I am well aware of my temperament. It is not good and worse when I was a child. I went to extremes easily. It's true. If it hadn't been for your letters which showed me how to deal with life, making me feel that I had my father's love … if it hadn't been for those letters, I might …"

She covered her face and could not go on.

"A-fang …" He gently stroked her short, stiff black hair and said, "Listen to me. Actually, it was your brother

…” He looked up at Chin-yuan who repeatedly shook his head at him beseechingly. With great effort he bit back the words that were at the tip of his tongue.

So be it! Since it was Chin-yuan’s wish, let it rest at that. Just consider that his son had taken care of a matter that should have been his responsibility.

The brother and sister would be taking a train up north in the morning, and he would be flying back to Taipei in the afternoon. They all got up before dawn—actually none of them were able to sleep; each heard the others toss and turn, but none dared to utter a sound.

All that had to be said was said; all the advice had been given again and again. The luggage was readied the night before. All the suitcases and baskets that seemed to take up so much space had been sorted out and tied together by Chin-yuan in neat bundles.

“Papa, we have repeatedly told you not to spend money on us or buy things for us, and here you are with all these purchases!” Chin-fang sounded just like his youngest daughter Chin-mei now.

“That’s right. Hsiao-lei told me that the income from the clinic is not much, and Chin-hung is still in graduate school; plus all the expenses for this trip, the hotel, food, and shopping. We feel uneasy.” Chin-yuan put a word in too.

“I have told you more than once,” he sounded almost impatient, “traveling expenses for you two were paid by the three older children, Hsiao-lei, Chin-lin, and Chin-an, not me.” He was close to losing control. “I, your father—I did not contribute anything, nothing at all! I didn’t do anything at all!” He felt a pain in his chest. On the surface he had managed to maintain a semblance of tranquillity and stability during the past five days. At this moment, it was all on the verge of collapse. “This is nothing, nothing! What’s a few earthly goods? Nothing! I am your father; you are my children! You have gone through so much hardship all these years. Can a few items compensate for your suffering? These worldly goods are nothing! I am nothing! I-AM-NOTHING!” He started to beat himself hard on the chest.

The brother and sister were so taken aback that they did not think of stopping him for quite a few seconds, then they begged him, “Papa, don’t, Papa!”

They grabbed his hands, yet he wailed,

“You still call me Papa! What sort of a papa am I—what sort of father …”

Chin-fang held him in a tight embrace, sobbing. Chin-yuan rested his forehead on his father’s shoulder, shaking uncontrollably. The inevitable emotional outburst that the three of them had tried to suppress since the night before had burst open like a dam.

Chin-yuan was the first to get hold of himself. He got up, poured a glass of water and took a tranquilizer from the bottle. He placed it in his father’s palm, and indicated that his father should take it.

When he quieted down, he realized that he was leaning against the headboard, with Chin-fang at the side of the bed, staring at him red-eyed. Chin-yuan sat on a chair in front of the bed, leaning slightly forward, taking his pulse with a very gentle touch.

“Do you feel better? Papa?”

He felt his heartbeat gradually getting back to normal; surely Chin-yuan was aware of it too from his pulse.

He nodded, turned his hand around and grabbed hold of Chin-yuan; his other hand was holding on to Chin-fang, watching them with his eyes, wordlessly. At this point he could see that all his wounds and hurts had been washed clean. They still hurt deeply, but it was a tangible sort of hurt; they were real hurts, as real as these two in front of him who were flesh of his flesh and bone of his bone. There was no need to hide the real hurt of parting, no need to pretend. He could now accept it with a heavy heart; it was only natural; there was no need to look for an escape.

At this time and in this place, he felt a vague sense of relief.

Chin-yuan looked at his watch and realized it was about time to go.

“I’ll go with you, I want to see you off.” He stood up. “Papa, didn’t you say that you are not going to see us off, not going to the station, because you may not be able to take it?”

“I’ll go. I can take it. There is nothing I cannot take. If I can this time, it will be easier next time.”

It took Chin-fang a few seconds to understand what he was saying; she broke out into a sweet smile which, in his eyes, was as beautiful as a flower in spring.

83.96 The Day He Was Fired\fn{by Yu Mo aka Wu Kuo-tung (1948-)} Huian County, Fukien Province, China (M)

We had our lunch at a place called The Angel's Restaurant. To have such a meal in a large restaurant in the crowded area of the city was like a dream. We hadn't had such a pleasure for almost two years or maybe more than two years; anyway, we thoroughly enjoyed this meal. The restaurant was full of well dressed, high class customers and to think that we were eating among them gave us a feeling of elation. After the meal we even ordered some cool drinks, orange juice of an appetizing color served in beautiful tall glasses. We wanted to enjoy the drinks slowly but unable to resist the tempting delicious taste, we gulped them down. Then we ordered another one and this time we were wiser for we used straws to sip them slowly. We did not talk much during the meal; from the very start, we concentrated on eating for the food tasted so good that we did not have a minute to spare. When we were having the cold drinks, Jill remarked on the excellent quality of the music in this restaurant and I noticed it too. Jill was always interested in music and I forgot everything else when I saw that she was happy. Of course, the things I forgot were rather important.

Our seats were against the wall. To be accurate, it was not entirely a wall for right beside us was a French window of transparent glass that occupied one third of the wall. It was very bright outside, the sunshine spilling beautifully all over the street with some of it cheerfully slipping into other people's shops. There were not many people on the street as everyone had gone into the restaurants. The streets around this vicinity were full of small and dingy looking restaurants. A better restaurant was in the basement of the bank in front of the park, a buffet restaurant but it was very small and could not be compared to this one. Moreover, that place was very crowded and everybody had to line up in front of the food counters so that often the line would extend up to the steps leading to the entrance, blocking people from entering or leaving. Come to think of it, eating is indeed an important affair and it really makes people happy to have a good meal.

Jill seemed to be very much in love with the music here and it was fun watching her wholehearted enjoyment. Originally, she had long hair, having had it cut only this summer and I did not know anything about it until it was done. She said she cut it for convenience's sake but actually I guessed she did it to save her beauty parlor expenses, which were exorbitant. Usually people do not give much thought to such expenses for once they become aware of them, they would feel sorry to have paid so much. Anyway, Jill is very clever and what she did was right. But sometimes, looking at her, she seemed to have lost her look of pure simplicity. Of course, she is already mature. I don't really know how to express myself. I only feel she has changed somewhat. For quite a few years now, I have cut my own hair very very short to save money. At first, I thought I looked quite energetic. But now, I look rather disheveled. Long hair sometimes makes one look rather strange. All these things are strange. If you do not think about them, they cease to exist.

"Today is a very good day," Jill said all of a sudden.

"Yes." I believed the music had moved her. "This morning, everybody said that."

"We must have spent a lot on this lunch!"

"Yes, quite a lot!" I said.

"I can tell that this place is different from the other places."

"It is different." I looked at the people around us.

"We shouldn't have come here."

"Why shouldn't we?" I said. "We've already eaten it."

She bit her finger. I looked at her and she quickly put down her hand.

"Please don't be so nervous. We must never regret," I said.

"I'm not regretting."

"Well, if you have no regrets, then please don't look so worried."

"It was you who insisted on coming here. All I said was we could go to a comparatively cleaner place, I mean just a cleaner place."

"I don't understand what you mean."

"You don't understand? I said I only wanted to go somewhere a little cleaner and quieter. All the small restaurants we went to were terribly overcrowded with people and flies."

"I know. Then, isn't this a good place?"

"I didn't say that this isn't a good place, but we're spending too much money here."

"You're regretting," I said.

"I'm not."

"I can tell." I gazed fixedly at her. This whole thing was really amusing and Jill was probably overexcited. I had not planned to come to this place. Usually I was very cautious even when I passed by this restaurant for they always displayed their enticing dishes in the windows and made those who were not hungry, hungry and those who were hungry, even more so. Therefore one must possess a great deal of ... perseverance to avoid falling into their trap. I truly did not plan to come to this place, but I had not had good food for quite some time and my stomach suffered from the lack of it. In the end we just found ourselves here.

"Only this once," she said. "Although we had a wonderful meal here, we'll not make it a rule to come here again."

"I know."

"How long has it been since we had a meal like this?"

"Quite some time ago." I said.

"I still remember a wonderful get-together dinner once."

"I remember it too."

"It was really wonderful."

"Quite so."

"I would like very much to go through graduation again."

Jill laughed. "Do you think we'll get a dinner party like that every time?"

"I think so. That was something that you'll remember for the rest of your life."

"Surely there must be some other significance too."

"Of course, it was also your last meal."

"No, no."

"It depends on how you look at it."

"When I think of it, I'm nostalgic for that period of our lives," she said. "Why didn't we realize how good it was then. Everybody was eager to graduate. Now, after we have graduated, we long to go back."

"What do you want to go back for?" I asked.

"I don't know. I just wish to go back."

I lowered my head to sip the orange juice. They must have iced it ahead of time; I could feel its coolness inside me. They must have iced it before serving because they had not put ice cubes in it as that would have diluted and spoiled the taste of the fresh orange juice. First rate restaurants are always very particular about details like this. After a while, when I felt that Jill was not thinking about school days any more. I raised my head. She was concentrating on the music as if she had not heard any music for a good many years.

"Do you want to order anything else?" I asked.

"What! Are we going to eat some more?"

"I am asking you."

"No."

"If we don't order anything else, they'll chase us away."

"I don't believe they will."

"We can't spend the whole afternoon here eating our lunch."

Jill looked at her watch. "Forty-two minutes after twelve. We don't need a whole afternoon. Until one o'clock is enough for us."

"We can't stay here till one. You need ten minutes to walk back."

"All right, till twelve-fifty. We both have to go back. Will ten minutes be enough for you?"

"Enough. I'm not going back to work in the afternoon."

"What! You're having a vacation?"

"Yes."

Jill did not believe me. She knew my holidays. I usually had the first and last Sundays off every month. She remembered clearly for I had often complained that I didn't know what to do on the two working Sundays. Surely she remembered.

"Vacation! What vacation? Didn't you go to work in the morning?"

"Yes, but 1 have a vacation in the afternoon."

"I don't understand."

"Why can't you understand if they give me a holiday?"

"There must be some reason for it."

"No reason," I said, "they thought I looked tired."

"How do you feel?" She scrutinized me.

"I feel fine."

"No. No. You do look a little tired."

"Don't you talk the way they did, 1 really feel fine."

Jill stretched out her hand to grasp mine and said: "Maybe they are right. You should take a good rest."

"Yes, I will."

"How many days vacation?"

"Probably for a week."

God knows how difficult it was for me to talk this way and expect people to believe me. I cast a stealthy glance at her and she looked a little suspicious. She knew my boss very well. He would often ask us to work over-time for no reason and had cut our lunch time to barely one hour. Would a person like him give his employee a week's vacation just because he looked tired? Only God knows! But I had already gone so far; I must keep on and not slip up.

"Wow! A whole week. That's simply wonderful."

"Yes."

"What are your plans?"

"Plans? What plans?"

"You must make good use of your vacation; plan a schedule, then, you'll feel more relaxed."

"I agree," I said.

"Do you want to travel?"

"Perhaps, but it's no fun to travel by myself."

"Right. Do you still remember when we went on a trip with a whole bunch of people? What a wonderful time we had!"

I smiled. I don't know why Jill is always thinking about the past. I don't mean that the past is not worth recollecting but bygone days are bygone days. It is upsetting to be always thinking about them. Of course, Jill does not feel that way and she still looks quite happy talking about the past.

"I may take a trip home," I said.

"That's a good plan."

"I haven't been back home for over a year now."

"Do you get letters from Mother regularly?"

"Yes, she's fine."

"Some day, I'll go back with you to visit her. When was the last time I saw her? Let me see—ah! it was while you were in military training. Do you remember?"

"I remember. My first big vacation."

"We bought such a lot of fruits. We had such a wonderful time."

"Yes, we did indeed have a great time." I said. "Let's not talk about that again. It's difficult for me to decide what I'll do by myself. Anyway, I'll have some rest for a week."

"You deserve it."

I looked at my watch, it was twelve to one.

"We must go now. Whatever you do, you mustn't be late," I said.

"I know. Actually, many people are always late."

"That's their business but you mustn't be late."

"Jane said that I'll be an old hand in half a year's time and then, I can do as I please."

"You mustn't think this way."

"To me it's amusing. Jane doesn't care about anything. She's not only late but also leaves early."

"That's her business." I was afraid that Jill would also harbor such thoughts. "Please remember what I say. Do you hear me? That's her business but you should never be like that."

Jill smiled. I didn't say anything more and gestured at the waiter. He came quickly and handed me the bill which bore figures in it that were equivalent to the amount I paid for two weeks' groceries. When Jill watched me paying the bill, she called my name in a strange tone of voice: "Su Tsung-hsiung …"

I had reason to say her voice sounded strange. There are various tones of voices but this tone of voice is unique. If you listen to it carefully, it is composed of a mixture of all emotions, generally the result of a feeling of uncertainty as to whether one is right or wrong in whatever one is doing. That morning, I heard something similar in the boss's office, although his voice was masculine and comparatively low it could still be classified under the same category. My boss was not bad at all, only a little too harsh. Now-a-days, bosses mostly have this kind of dedication to their work and this is actually the secret of success.

I can't remember how it happened that morning. But it couldn't possibly have sprung up in one day. I say, not in one day but I can't say for sure how many days it actually took. In short, everything came to a conclusion that morning, probably at half past ten. I couldn't swear to it; maybe it was earlier. For our boss came to the office around ten and the first thing he did was to send for me. It seemed funny that I wasn't prepared at all, like a person being pushed on to the boxer's stand bare-handed, except that I was not as nervous. I was even more relaxed than when I came for my first interview.

At times, when I thought of what had happened during my interview, I felt it was hilariously funny. Especially when I started to stammer under the stare of that hollow-cheeked bald-headed secretary. He asked me, politely of course, how was my English. I ended in replying "Quite good." Good Heavens! I never realized that my answer surprised him. Then they asked me to chat with them in English. I asked them what I should talk about but they told me to talk about anything I liked. Well, under such, circumstances, .how could I just talk at random. I stared at them stupidly. Finally, I recited an excerpt from Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. When I think of it now, I feel that was really funny. I don't know if Mr. Lincoln was as nervous as I was, but they appreciated my recital, and applauded me. After they had given me this encouragement, I grew bolder and started to chat with them casually in English. I got the job the next day.

I was assigned to the export department, and I still belonged to that department until just before ten o'clock this morning. At the beginning, I did not realize how complex the staff of that department was. Being new there, I was mindful of every single thing. I took it on to myself to do a lot of work, my own and even that of others. After some time, I became aware of the baffling situation there. Especially those eagle eyes of the export department chief which would never let go of any new employee. They would always be fixed on your back with a ferocious stare until it gave you the creeps. However, an old hand in the department, called K'ou K'ai, was very friendly to me. He was two years my senior at college and maybe because we came from the same college, we got along very well. There was a time when he advised me not to work so hard. I did not see his point until he explained to me that if I worked so hard, I might cause somebody else to lose his job. Then, I began to understand a little but still I could not see the whole truth of the matter. As a matter of fact, up till now I am still in the dark. For, while the rest of them were worrying about losing their jobs on account of me, I lost my job first because of them.

K'ou K'ai was indeed an old hand and he was born smart. I often complain that I am not that kind of fellow who is always alert, always on his toes but even if I do get to be like that, I don't think I would like it. For if you see your surroundings too clearly, every aesthetic value would be destroyed. K'ou K'ai is like that and he thinks he is happy. Well, he seems to be happy but he is not making use of what he has studied and that ought to be painful. However, he does not give it much thought. Of course, I have said that those who brood over things will have a great deal of regrets. At present, I am much smarter. I don't think that much but it does not mean not to think at all. At times, things that happened in the past would still come to my mind. I haven't quite mastered K'ou K'ai's set of know-how. If I could master it one day, I believe I will be as happy as he is.

I guess it all might have begun to happen during the time when K'ou K'ai told me not to work so hard but I am not that sure; maybe it began earlier, as early as the day I started my work. Anyway, K'ou K'ai was right in giving me such a hint. Who would like to lose his job because of somebody else? However, I haven't quite understood how my hard work would effect others. I was only eager to do my work as perfectly as I could.

Now, it has finally happened! It happened right over my head. When they sent me to see the boss in his office, K'ou K'ai frowned at me. I believe he must have guessed what was going on but I hadn't. I had no idea what was going to happen. K'ou K'ai looked at me, standing beside the merchandise counter. He looked as if he wanted to walk over and talk to me but he held back. If he had come over and talked to me, he might have saved the situation but he refrained from doing so. As a matter of fact, I was not aware of anything going on. I remember walking away from him, waving my hand and smiling. When I think of it now, I feel all the more how wonderful he is!

In the boss's office, I did not see the hollow-cheeked and bald-headed secretary. I saw only the boss himself, sitting behind the big desk. When I entered, he was very polite. He did not put on airs as he always used to do. He asked me to sit down, offered me a cigarette and finally produced that strange voice in calling out my name: "Su Tsung-hsiung …"

We walked out of The Angel's Restaurant. Jill seemed to be still worrying about the bill for our lunch. She did not talk and even her breathing became strained. As we walked along the covered sidewalks, the sunshine was really beautiful: even more so than seen through the glass windows. It reminded me of a popular song we sang at college: We Are Singing Under the Sun. The wording of the song is very cute, saying something like: “We love each day and each day we love to sing under the sun.” Now, very few people feel like doing that any more. We had scarcely taken a few steps when we saw people rushing out of the restaurants in the neighboring streets. Everyone was in a hurry. There were also a lot of cars of all kinds, especially buses. Many people brushed past us, still chewing their food as they looked at their watches, and if they saw an acquaintance they would only wave a hand in greeting. Here, you often meet people you know especially those vaguely familiar ones who crowd on to the same table with you in small restaurants and whose names you never recall so one can only wave as a gesture of recognition.

At first, we walked under the covered sidewalks. Later, I was afraid that Jill would still be thinking of the lunch bill, so I purposely moved over to a window. Women enjoy window shopping. Although they know they cannot afford to buy anything, it is still a treat just to look at the things. When we walked near the windows, Jill was in better spirits. She leaned over and looked at every item in each window, pointing at this and that, most of those things she had looked at a hundred times before, but she still liked to look. I reminded her that we did not have much time.

“They are using it as a decoration.”

“Now, everything has a price on.”

I looked at my watch then walked into the Consignment Agency.\fn{A note reads: This refers to a type of boutique that sells imported goods, also acting as an agency to sell things for people on a consignment basis.} The young girl behind the counter asked me what I wanted. I pointed to the teddy bear without looking at Jill outside. When the girl took it out, Jill nervously hurried inside.

“What are you doing?” Her eyes opened wide.

I asked the girl how much it cost and she offered it to me at a reduced price. I paid the money and asked her to wrap it up.

“What are you doing?”

“I’m buying a present,” I said.

“What! You bought it! Good Heavens! I don’t want it.”

“You want it.”

“I don’t want it. I only like to look at it.”

“Later, you can hold it when you go to sleep.”

“You must have gone mad! How can we buy this?”

“Why can’t we buy it?”

“It has no use at all.”

“Oh! Yes. You can look at it, touch it and hug it. It will give you pleasure and that is enough.”

“I don’t mean that. I mean we ought to buy things that are worthwhile.”

The girl looked at us while she was wrapping up the package.

“You know this thing is worthwhile or else you wouldn’t be thinking of it all the time.”

“We must have gone mad,” she said.

After the bear was packaged I looked again at my watch and hurriedly dragged Jill away. I couldn’t let her be late or she’d regret it later.

“We must have gone mad,” she said again.

“I ought to give you a present.”

“What! You ought to! You spend money on such things and you say you ought to!”

“We’ll buy something worthwhile, later, OK.?”

“Don’t you buy anything! You must remember, you mustn’t buy anything.”

“OK. I’ll remember.”

Jill kept quiet.

We started to walk fast. We could see Jill’s company across the street. Their building is very impressive, with ten stories or so. It is more presentable than ours. Of course, I should not have said “ours.” I could say that before ten o’clock but now I can no longer call it “ours.” Before we crossed the street, I stopped beside the traffic light platform and handed her the wrapped-up toy. She had a strange expression on her face. She looked as if she were going to cry. She has an upturned nose and at this moment it looked even more so.

“We must have gone mad.” She repeated.

"All right." I comforted her. "Let us be mad for once. Take it. Put it in the closet while you work, but don't forget to take it home with you."

"I will remember. We must … how could we have done such things, today? First, we went to that exorbitant restaurant and then we bought this."

I smiled. "Don't talk like that. Don't you think this is a happy day for us? You even said that today is our lucky day."

"What I mean is—we have surely gone mad."

"I know what you mean. It's time for you to go back to the office."

"I have to finish what I wanted to say."

"All right, go ahead."

"We spent a great deal of money today. How much did we spend?"

"I have not figured it out yet."

"If you keep on doing that, you'll form a habit of it."

"No. I'll not make it a rule."

"We can't do what others do. It's very important that we should be economical from now on."

"I'll keep that in mind."

She seemed to be wanting to say something else. Women are just peculiar. I hurried her to cross the street while the green light was on. She hugged the package and looked at me attentively for a few seconds before turning to cross the street. All that time, I had been paying attention to the cars which were waiting to turn round the corner. Usually they hasten to make the turn right after the light turned green, forcing the pedestrians to run through the crossing. I watched her running and noticed how attractive she was with her full figure. I could not remember the exact number of years we had been together. During our intimate moments, I would always fondle her smooth waist and feel that she was getting slimmer and slimmer. But she wasn't skinny thin. When a woman matures, she doesn't always become plump. She may seem to be thinner, but actually she gains elsewhere on her body.

I had been watching her back till she arrived at the door of the big building. Then I quickly turned. I knew she would be stopping at the door to look at me. Then, we would be gazing at each other again before finally waving at each other as if we were parting for life. We had done that before and then I would have to run to get back to my office which was very annoying. Now, I didn't need to run. It was one o'clock and even if it were two, I still had no need to run. I turned purposely so that I would not be looking at her again. If I were to run, where would I run to?

I stood at the same spot and thought it was amusing to think about all these things. Then, I stared at the traffic lights, watching the cars hurrying past me and felt it was rather meaningless. Fortunately, the sunshine was beautiful and it made me look quite happy to be standing there.

I really didn't like to think about what happened that morning. It was just something unexpected and I am perfectly right in saying it was unexpected. They wanted to reduce the staff, and unfortunately I got laid off, and that was really unexpected. Of course, I knew it was difficult for my boss to do such a thing for he had confidence in my abilities, or else he would not have attached any importance to the whole affair. He got so embarrassed that he could not pronounce my name naturally. At the beginning, I smoked and waited for him to speak. It must be something urgent, for he sent for me right after he came into his office. That happened before so I was not nervous at all and I waited quietly. Later, I became suspicious from the way he acted. He kept sitting down then jumping up and walking to the window. I had never seen him so nervous. He spoke only after I had finished my cigarette. He first began beating around the bush. For example, he started with the question:

"Our company is doing well, isn't it?"

Of course, I answered in the affirmative.

"Do you know how our company is organized?"

"Not too well," I said.

"We hold a directors' meeting every month. Originally our company was owned by an individual. You know that don't you? They started badly and they nearly collapsed. Later, it went public and slowly recovered with the investments of the directors."

"I understand."

"You don't understand. They are always checking on us. Of course, they have the right to do it. Many organizations are like that. They do whatever they please."

I did not know what all this had to do with me. Directors checking on the business was just a matter of course. I was only a small clerk in the export department, I could very well turn a deaf ear to the business management of the company.

"They came once last week."

"Yes, I said."

"They discovered something wrong. They seem to think that we have employed too many people."

"Maybe we have." I said.

"When they questioned me, I had to tell them that some of the employees are here on probation. We usually employ people on that basis."

"Right."

"They wanted me to give a list of the names. Of course, I know that you have done good work but to be fair and square, we also haven't treated you badly, have we?"

"No."

"We all know the extent of the directors' power. When they reach a decision, it is hard to change it. We have to lay off some people."

"Lay off some people?" I repeated. Of course, then I understood what was happening.

"Yes, we are going to lay off all those who are on probation."

"Am I on the list?"

"Yes, I am sorry."

"Oh! Now I understand."

"I did indicate that it is not fair but, Su Tsung-hsiung, I do not own the whole company."

"Yes, I know."

"No matter how I argued, it was of no use. It is difficult to change whatever they have decided upon."

"Yes, you said so."

We looked at each other. He looked very embarrassed. He is a good boss.

"If you want me to, I can recommend you to another company," he said.

"Good. I'll think it over."

"Don't worry. You are still young and this world is for the young. You are needed everywhere. As long as you have the will to work, you are wanted everywhere," he said.

I had heard this kind of talk more than a hundred times. It is supposed to be stimulating.

"I think so too," I said.

"It doesn't matter so much for the young to go through some hardship. I suffered a great deal more than you did and I survived."

"Of course." I remained very polite.

"I have a lot of data on you. Other companies will soon discover that you are a capable person. They can come to me for references."

"Thanks."

"You are not going to change your address, are you?"

"That is hard to say."

"Please keep in touch with us. You are a talented person."

"Thanks."

"Good. Please go to the Department of General Affairs. They have everything ready for you."

When I left the office, I closed the door very carefully. I thanked the boss repeatedly for it was very kind of him to have been so considerate towards me.

At the Department of General Affairs, I saw the bald-headed secretary. He was frowning as he looked at me and all of a sudden, he seemed to be not bad at all. The boss had said that the company did not belong to him alone and of course, it did not belong to the secretary. His harshness could well be forgiven for he, also, could be fired at any moment. After I had received my salary and my severance pay, he came over and shook my hand.

"Did the boss explain everything to you?"

"Yes, he did," I smiled.

"They shouldn't have done such a thing."

"That's all right."

"Did he tell you who wanted to come in here?"

"No."

"Wonderful! So he didn't tell you anything."
"He said the company needed to lay off people."
The secretary shook his head. "Do you feel that it's unfair?"
I kept quiet. I was a little confused.
"It may be a good thing to leave this place," said the secretary. "I would like to leave too, but I'm old, you know."
"You mustn't think that way," I said. We shook hands and said good-bye.

Of course, there were still things I did not understand fully, but I had to give up for the secretary was not willing to tell me everything. When I left the company, it was about half past eleven. It must have been somewhere around that time because it wasn't long after that when I saw Jill. The sun was wonderfully bright and warm. I stood under the sun for almost twenty minutes. I seldom got a chance like that. Everybody knows that sunshine is healthful but nobody has the chance to bask under it. Most people would always have a good sleep on holidays or else have fun with women. There were quite a few people like that in our company. After the holidays, they were always late for work and they come to the office with a body aching all over.

I stood on the street with nothing to do. Then, I saw a traffic policeman coming to regulate the traffic lights. Possibly he discovered the congestion of cars here. I stood beside him and watched. He did not see me at first. When he did, he smiled at me which was very nice. Usually the policemen do not have much of a smile for anybody, for their work is very exasperating. Now, he smiled; I believe the sun made him feel happy.

That policeman was, indeed, very well-trained. Shortly after he walked over, the cars were all under control and none of them dared to go beyond the line and that made it easier for the pedestrians to cross the streets. After having watched him changing lights several times, I wanted to walk away. I could not always stand there. I would have to find something to do. I had money in my pocket, an extra month's pay, what they called severance pay! Maybe, they were afraid that the laid off person would starve to death all of a sudden. They wouldn't have to hold themselves responsible if they had given him some money to live on.

I started to walk toward the heart of town and quickly headed for the post office at the back of our company. I wanted to remit some money to my mother. I sent money home every month so that she could have a better living. Being by herself, she was very lonely but she knew how to spend her time and I had also taught her ways to entertain herself. Of course, she wouldn't think of marrying again. It didn't make much sense to her.

The post office behind our company was the closest one. There were of course, post offices elsewhere, but I was used to this one. The people there were more polite and they did not put on airs. Sometimes, when you go to a post office to deposit or to remit some money, it is like entering the house of a debtor. The people there are not inclined to talk and strictly businesslike. There is nothing you can do about them.

I walked toward our company. At first, I was afraid that I might run into some of my colleagues but then, I thought it did not matter. I would just greet them as usual. Some time ago, there was a young man, like me, who had been fired. They gave him a farewell party. I did not participate because I didn't know him too well. I only knew that he was a good worker. What would happen to the company if the people like us all left?

As a matter of fact, our company couldn't care less. It was still a tall big edifice and could be seen several streets away. Especially with the neon lights on top, it shone brightly even in the night. I went past the company and walked through the parking lot. Perhaps I walked very fast for I did not hear K'ou K'ai shouting after me. I was taken by surprise when he ran up to me, all flushed in the face and gasping for breath even when he stopped running.
"What's the matter? Calm down."
"Where have you been to?"
"I'm standing here, am I not?" I laughed.
He shook his head and gathered his breath.
"At noon time, I mean at noon time. Good Heavens! I can't stand this running. I have grown old, all of a sudden."
"You are not used to running any more." I smiled.
"I was a track and field athlete and now I'm no damn good."
"Why did you look for me?"
"You're asking me and whom should I ask? Where were you at lunch time? I looked all over town for you."
"I had lunch at The Angel's Restaurant.
He opened his eyes wide. "What! The Angel's Restaurant! No wonder I couldn't find you. I looked everywhere but didn't think of these kinds of big restaurants."

"I had a very good meal and felt wonderful."

He had a funny expression on his face. "What happened?"

"What happened? I went to The Angel's Restaurant to have lunch."

"Good Heavens! If you don't tell me what happened, how am I going to know."

"What do you mean?"

"You must have gone mad to go to The Angel's Restaurant."

"It was quite expensive but very classy."

"You went there just like that, without a good reason?"

"Yes."

"Just for the sake of having a good meal?"

"Exactly."

He shook his head, them pulled me away. "We cannot talk here."

"Why not?"

"It's the time when they're all coming back to work. We have to go somewhere else. You must tell me what happened this morning."

"They just fired me. It's as simple as that."

He was taken aback and then he said: "I guessed it. I guessed it already this morning. They'll do it sooner or later."

"I don't understand."

"It's just because you don't understand. If you did, it wouldn't have happened."

We walked out of the parking lot and I looked at my watch.

"You ought to go back to work now."

"The hell with it! I can quit also. It isn't much to speak of. You have to bear in mind. It isn't much to speak of."

I did not want to see him like this. I wanted him to go back to work. He looked very angry so I had to walk with him out of the parking lot and into the park. I asked him whether he had lunch or not. He shook his head.

"I'm going to invite you. They gave me some money."

"No such thing! I won't have it."

"I have already had a very good meal. You can also try for once."

"Unless I become absolutely heartless. It is your severance pay. Damn it! You want me to feast on your severance pay?"

"OK. You do as you please."

We went to the buffet restaurant in the basement of the Bank Building. There were not many people, for they had all gone back to work. K'ou K'ai asked me if I would like to eat anything there. I said no. Consequently, he took some food for himself and I had a cup of coffee. After we had sat down, I was still worried about his being late for work. I asked him if it really didn't matter, for it was already half past one.

"Don't you worry. I know what I am doing. I told you it isn't that important. I can also quit."

"Don't talk nonsense."

"Really. I can also quit. Tell me what happened."

"It happened all too suddenly." I said.

"Don't keep it all within yourself. Speak out. You simply have to speak out."

He must have thought that I had gone mad. The expression on his face seemed to say that I would have committed suicide if I did not run into him.

"I have had this kind of experience," K'ou K'ai said, "You know everybody has to have a first time; like a woman, the first time."

"Was it serious?"

"I slept for three days, three whole days. On the first day, I thought about what had happened. On the second day I was still thinking about it. Well, I gave it up on the third day. I gave up. I slept for three days."

"That wasn't too bad." I said.

"Good Heavens! I took some sleeping pills. I couldn't sleep unless 1 took some pills."

"Did it turn out all right?"

"Absolutely. I slept for three days. When 1 woke up, it was a real awakening."

"To what?"

"To what? To know that I was still alive, alive like anybody else. Look at me. Do I look all right?" He gestured with his hands.

"You look great."

"But this is not me. Do you understand? This is not me." He smoked.

"I don't understand."

"I know." he said. "I have changed a great deal but other people cannot tell, but I know myself. Listen! You, also, cannot go on living in your own way any longer. You cannot. You must forget everything and start anew. Yes, that is what I mean."

"Did you do it?"

"Ugh! Started all over, to live their way, in anybody else's way. You do what they do."

"I understand," I said.

K'ou K'ai nodded and got us another two cups of coffee. He smoked fiercely, so I placed the whole pack in front of him.

"What did they do to you?"

"Nothing," I said.

"You must tell me."

"OK. They told me that they had to lay off extra people."

K'ou K'ai laughed loudly and I looked at him stupidly.

"You see, we were taken in. The hell with laying off people. It's a lie. It's like a country talking about disarmament. It sounds sincere, eloquent and even very convincing and that was how you fell into their trap."

"I don't know." I said.

"Even if they want to lay off people, you shouldn't be included."

"Ah! It's hard to say, I have no backing. I have nothing at all."

"That's just it. Some people have only their backing and nothing else."

"Well, it's their good luck."

"Do you know what kind of person they want?" K'ou K'ai smiled. "Me, they want a person like me, the present me, who slips away to drink coffee during office hours. One day, when I get promoted, you'll see me lying in a comfortable sofa, with my legs stretched up on the desk. You wait and see. They want this kind of men."

"Maybe."

"Have you looked at the whole of the export department? You've never looked at it carefully. Who comes in on time? You. Who leaves the latest? You. My God! If I were the boss, I would also want to get rid of you. I have to get rid of you. You will climb upward quickly and one day you will climb on top of my head."

I thought he was being funny in choosing such an example. I don't know if I could ever climb up to that position. But it gave me pleasure even to think of it.

"What do you plan to do now?"

"Rest."

"Great. Rest."

"I want to forget all about this." I said.

"You must. I will help you to find another job."

"That's good."

"We have to keep in touch."

"We will."

"Do you need anything?"

"What?"

"Money."

I started to laugh. "I have money right here."

"Cheer up!"

"I know. Look at me." I imitated his gesture of spreading out his hands.

He stretched out his hands and grasped mine. All of a sudden, we remained silent. We did not know what to say. I saw K'ou K'ai biting his teeth. He often mentioned that he had cavities and when they hurt him, he had to bite his teeth. He looked funny when he bit his teeth. He looked as if someone had hit him hard with a fist. We held hands tightly.

"Don't come to see me in the company," he said. "Don't come to that damn place. Get away from it the farther the better. Write to me or I'll go and visit you. Remember."

"I'll remember. Are you going to go on like this?"

"It's hard to say, it's not my world. It's somebody else's. Do you understand? It's somebody else's world."

"I understand."

"My world will come later. I shall search for it myself. Not right now. After three or five or ten years when I'm qualified to stretch my legs on the desk, then I'll try all over again."

"I believe we'll be very happy when that time comes."

We left the buffet restaurant in the basement and we were out under the sun again. Tomorrow might still be a fine day. Who knows? We still have half of today left. We walked toward the parking lot and we parted. We shook hands again and again. I told K'ou K'ai to say good-bye to everybody. After all, they were my colleagues.

After we parted, I looked at my watch and it was already past two o'clock. I went directly to the post office. It did not take long for it was very near. The woman employee there seemed to recognize me for she asked me if I wanted to remit money home again. I smiled at her and she handed me the remittance form and a piece of note paper so that I could write a note to my mother. I wrote the following note:

> Mamma,
> I am fine. I am remitting you a thousand NT dollars. Surprised? I'll get a raise very soon. Jill is also very well. We send our love and we are sorry for not having written for so long. I am busy with work here, but they are all very good to me. So you need not worry about me.

186.208 The Story Of A Chinese Acrobat\fn{by Yishujia (1948-)} Jinan, Shandong Province, China (F) 4

"I can only remember that my paternal great-grandfather's family was from Hongsong Village in Zhouping County, in Shandong. My great-grandfather died young, he was just fifty, and my great-grandmother lost her sight through illness, but she raised my grandfather and a great-aunt without remarrying. In those days widows remained faithful to their dead husbands by never remarrying. The fulfilment of duty was the only way their children could hold their heads up around other people.

"The impression I got when I was small was that my great-uncle had been to college, and that was why the whole family got an education. My great-uncle was a schoolteacher. My great-grandmother was supporting the family at that time; it was really hard for her. Once my great-uncle started teaching, he took all the boys in the family with him to Jinan to go to school: my great-aunt's boys, my father and uncles from our family. In our extended family, all the males in my father's generation went to school.

"I was seven.\fn{When she went to primary school} My school was the best in Jinan—my great-uncle taught there. There were forty or fifty children in my class, a lot more boys than girls.

"In those days our family owned a big, rambling house; we had livestock too, and hired hands to work our land. Just before Liberation, my great-uncle sold a lot of the family property. My great-grandmother was livid, she beat and cursed him, but later on she found out that he had been quite far-sighted: because our family property had all been sold, when the government determined class status after Liberation we were classified as middle peasants, otherwise we would have been classed as landlords and attacked. It wasn't just a question of a few houses, it was life and death.

"I've heard the old people say that the Koumintang\fn{The Chinese Nationalists} were very harsh when they first came to power—they shot people dead in Nanjing, and called it "strict social cleansing". And afterwards our Communist Party used the same word and did similar things. A lot of women who had been prostitutes before 1949 were persecuted to death.

"My father was branded an active counterrevolutionary just because of a little thing. When my father left home to go to school in Jinan, he became friendly with an underground member of the Party. He couldn't tell my father that he was a Party member, but he did tell him:

"'If a time comes when you don't see me, don't hang around, go back home.'

"But my father forgot. Afterwards the Eighth Route Army came to Jinan, they had the city surrounded, he couldn't get out, but he had to eat. At that time the Koumintang had set up a San Qing Tuan—the Three Youth League—anyone who joined up would have work to do and food to eat. So, many young people in Jinan whose families didn't have a lot of money joined that society.

"He was just a naïve student in those days, he didn't understand politics, he joined because he was afraid he would starve. Jinan was liberated after three months, but my father suffered a lifetime of bitterness because of those three months in which he didn't go hungry. He hadn't done anything bad, he couldn't shoot a gun or fight, he was an architecture student, but just because of that San Qing Tuan, he became a "wicked man" who could never say anything right. To this day I don't know what exactly the San Qing Tuan was, I've no idea what was so terrible about it. Even if it was a political organisation, it was all over in just three months, it was disbanded as soon as the city was liberated. My father really regretted it; if he'd just remembered what that man had told him, that if he couldn't see him he should leave, then he'd have been fine.

"Then he got in trouble again just after Liberation, when they were building the big City Government building. He was the project supervisor, checking that the work was carried out according to the blueprint, but he discovered that the stairs to the basement had been designed without a handrail, and the waterproofing hadn't been designed to deal with subsidence, so he reported it to his superiors, requesting modifications. But the leaders at that time were peasant cadres who'd fought their way to Jinan. They didn't understand; all they cared about was "more, better, faster, cheaper" and making revolution.

"My father asked them to stop work to put things right, but that was delaying the revolutionary task, out of the question! Then in the final inspection, a higher-ranking cadre who'd come to sign off the project almost slipped and fell into the cellar—and that staircase without a railing became evidence of my father's crime, a plot to injure revolutionary cadres. On top of that, leaks soon began to appear in the waterproofing, and that was deliberate sabotage! Nobody dared to testify on behalf of a counterrevolutionary in those days, so they arrested my father!

"I'll never forget that day. All these policemen came into our home, and there were more standing in the courtyard. My father didn't say a word, they just took him away, and I just didn't have a clue why. My mother didn't know the reason either, because my father had never discussed work matters with her. At that time everyone was very particular about "organisational discipline." It was forbidden to discuss work between husband and wife or family members.

"Some\fn{Of her neighbors} were pretty good,\fn{About her father's arrest} and still had dealings with us, but whenever there was the least sign of trouble I'd get called a jailbird's brat.\fn{"How long was your father detained?"} Five years, I suppose, though he was sentenced to twenty. My father never accepted it, he appealed, and finally the high-ups sent someone down to examine the scene of the crime and recheck the plans. In the end he was rehabilitated.

"She\fn{Her mother} was a gatekeeper at a neighbourhood-run chemical factory; later on she did embroidery. We only had twelve yuan a month for a family of five, for food, clothes and everything else. It was very hard. My mother had no choice—once I'd left home to work there was one burden less on the family. I know for certain that my mother had a very hard time, but she was a strong woman, she never talked about it. Whenever I talk about my mother I feel so awful, she suffered so much! She suffered all her life, and she died early too.

"At the very beginning I didn't perform, I just had lessons and practised my acrobatic skills—the waist, legs and the crown of the head are very important in Chinese acrobatics. I got up very early every day; in the morning after breakfast we had professional practice and lessons; sometimes in the afternoon we had school, or sometimes the school lessons were in the evening.

"In those days we could never get enough sleep, everyone was constantly nodding off—one time in somersaulting class I turned a few somersaults and then went to sleep on the spot. The first time I performed I was thirteen. It was the dance Catching Butterflies—I can still remember it. I turned three somersaults and very nearly somersaulted myself off the stage. In those days it was very dark at the bottom of the stage—once the stage lights were on you couldn't see anything below the stage.

"We mostly went up into the mountains and to the countryside. The peasants had no cultural activity at all from one year's end to the next, and they loved acrobatics, which you could understand whether you'd been to school or not, so just about every family came to watch, lots and lots of people. There was no electric light in the countryside in those days, we used big hanging hurricane lamps to light the performances we held to bring cultural entertainment to the peasants, and to promote the Party's policies.

"Sometimes we'd move on very quickly; we'd put on two shows and then leave, then another two shows and off again. All our things went in two big horse-drawn carts, sometimes we even slept on the carts—from time to time there'd be a thump, and that would be someone falling to the ground. We often slept on the ground; if we did get a room there'd be no windows, you'd sleep over here, and over there the worms would be wriggling in and out.

"After a while conditions improved a bit—we got a tractor, later on it was trucks, ferries and trains, and in the 1980s, after the Reform and Opening, we even got to take a plane. When we retired we joked that we Chinese acrobats had been on everything except submarines and the Shenzhou VI.\fn{The name of the second Chinese human space-flight (October 12, 2005), from the Jiuquan Satellite Launch Center in the Gobi Desert} Ha!

"In the countryside we used the threshing grounds.\fn{To perform on} Some of those big threshing grounds had an earth platform, others didn't. The countryside was very poor, but you still used to get people who went there to sing traditional opera, trading and singing opera at the same time—I think it was a bit like going to market.\fn{"Hardly ideal conditions for a performance!"}

"Too right! Take juggling stools with your feet: if there happened to be a strong wind, the stool would be blown to one side with one gust, and then, whoosh, it would turn over onto the other side, it was really difficult! If you were juggling umbrellas with your feet, whoosh, one puff of wind and you couldn't find your umbrella at all!

"You'd have to have another go. If you got it right the second time there'd be clapping from the floor, otherwise they'd curse you for a clumsy fool—peasants are very down to earth, you know.

"At that time I only knew to follow the troupe everywhere it went, I didn't feel anything really. It wasn't that comfortable in winter. I've always had pains in the joints on this leg, and why? It's from one year when it was snowing heavily outside, there was only a grass curtain at the window, we were all very tired, we just went to sleep wherever we fell, huddled in pairs for warmth. One quilt couldn't cover four legs, so our legs stuck out, and my leg got frozen; it itched and hurt like mad, and now I'm old it gives me trouble.

"We brought our own kitchen along with us, pots, bowls, ladles, oil, salt, soy sauce and vinegar, the lot, and we bought whatever vegetables they had locally.

"There were no rich places in those days. Shangqiu in Henan would have been the poorest. The wife of one of the troupe's members lived in Shangqiu, her children never had a chance to eat any meat, or to buy fish. The winters were bitterly cold, and for New Year she'd make the children grope for small fish in the ditches, and their New Year feast would be the whole family clustered around a pot of simple fish soup.

[The circuit tours went on] "right up to the Cultural Revolution. Before that we went to the countryside at fixed times every year to put on shows for the peasants, but after the start of the Cultural Revolution we slowly stopped going to the countryside, and stuck to doing revolutionary performances in the city. In any case, our wages from the state were the same wherever we were—I got 29.5 yuan every month for ten years, which nowadays is barely enough for a cheap family meal out!

[Revolutionary opera] "was ludicrous really, we were all idiots. We acted out battles, or things like "catching a spy", or taking American soldiers prisoner, that kind of revolutionary stuff, all fighting and killing. Some of the acrobats had good voices, so they'd sing a revolutionary song while making showy gestures, but I couldn't sing. Sometimes we did fancy work with staves, and that was the PLA fighting a battle. And tumbling? Boys would do the big somersaults, girls would do the fill-in parts in the background, cheering "Ten thousand years of long life to Mao Tse-tung!"

"Basically, all the acrobatic skill was lost. When we went to the army units to show our support, we'd perform In Praise of Men He, because we wanted to stick to the revolutionary model. This Men He was a hero of the Liberation, he died a hero's death to help the common people. Those of us who were playing the common people all had to wear Red Guard armbands. Nobody dared to have an opinion in those days, we just knew we had to go along with the revolutionary image. It was the Cultural Revolution, you couldn't do anything else. And we really felt that national costume was old, we should smash the old and embrace the new, so we ought to wear something new. It's no different from young people these days who wear those rubbishy clothes to keep up with the fashion; at the time that's what we thought.

"Originally it was pure skill and art. During the Cultural Revolution it was just revolutionary gestures, and you had to force words into the acrobatic numbers, to promote Mao Tse-tung Thought. Yes, it was all talk. The movements didn't matter, the important part was shouting slogans and making revolutionary gestures.

"For example, when I was doing fancy work with a stave, after I'd completed a set, I'd say, 'Revolution is not a crime, rebellion is just!', before I went on to the next part. Thinking about it now, it was truly ridiculous. At that time everyone was a lunatic, some were genuinely crazy, some pretending to be crazy; if you weren't crazy you didn't come up to the demands of politics, or match the current ideology.

"Some people say that acrobatics is a catch-all designation for every kind of art that involves the human body surpassing its normal limits. Actually that's inaccurate. Acrobatics includes art, animal training, farce, vocal skills (including animal impressions and funny voices, puppet theatre, shadow plays and the like), and many other different types and varieties of strange techniques and skills, like sword-swallowing, fire-eating, cutting people or horses into pieces, everything of that kind. For this reason, the ancients also referred to acrobatics as "Strange Theatre", the "Hundred Acts" and "Juggling Theatre".

"Compared with the acrobatics of other countries, Chinese acrobatics has its own special features: we attach a lot of importance to the skills of the waist, legs and top of head; this is what the phrases "artistic acting and lively fighting" and "tumbling from Peking Opera, skills with the head from acrobatics" are referring to. Seeking stability in the midst of risk, seeking peace in the midst of movement, seeking strangeness in the midst of the ordinary to attain perfection; the special characteristics of this art are displayed most plainly in gucai juggling: the performer wears a simple long robe, but can produce a thousand marvellous things from it; its philosophy is creating being from nothingness, light and heavy side by side, paper-thin flowery umbrellas, coloured balls, all kicked up high to flutter, twist and float. .

"Chinese acrobatics is very adaptable: you can set up a stage and put on a show in squares, theatres, streets or hotel rooms, for as many as a hundred people or as few as one. All this is the unique charm of our acrobatics, and China is internationally acknowledged to be the best country in the world for acrobatics.

"My specialities were the diabolo, magic tricks and light and heavy foot juggling. Heavy foot juggling is juggling with stools, light foot juggling is with umbrellas. You could say my best skill was heavy foot juggling, that's the juggling with stools; after that comes "mountain country drums and gongs", which I invented, playing music with the hands and feet, the feet beat drums and the hands beat other drums, the feet play the music while the hands keep the beat.

"When I was young, I was at the top of a human pyramid, and they juggled me along with the stools; as I got older and heavier I moved lower down the pyramid; in the last decade or so I was the one juggling all the people and stools!

"I can't remember how many performances I did in how many places, but I do remember clearly that in South America alone I was in over five hundred shows. Hardly any records have been preserved from the Cultural Revolution, and they only started keeping records on the arts in the nineties. I must say, it was tragic, the way all those cultural relics were burned; in the palaces of the Tang dynasty.\fn{618-907AD}

"Chinese acrobatics was as important as music and dance, there were said to be many records in the history books. After the Song and Yuan dynasties\fn{Tenth-fourteenth centuries AD} song, dance and music were less highly regarded, acrobatics gradually became one of the humble professions, a poor man's job. In those days, who would keep records about poor people? Apparently, our troupe didn't start keeping records until after the Liberation. It's a shame they were all burned in the Cultural Revolution, a sin and a shame.

"We went to Japan for the first time in 1981; after that we were flown all over the place: Pakistan, Japan, America, Sri Lanka … The Philippines. And then we stayed in Colombia for over a year, but we never performed in Europe.

"I had the strongest reactions towards Japan and America; the other countries were pretty much like us. In America, there was such a distance between their country and ours. The people there were more civilised. I'll give you a practical example: when you get on a public bus nobody pushes you, people form a queue without being told to. The cities were cleaner than ours at that time too—after two months there, the soles of your shoes would still be clean. Nowadays our cities are a lot better, some are even cleaner than theirs.

"In those days we knew that life in the West was better than here, but when some foreigners asked us "Does China have milk candy?"\fn{A carmel-like sweet, high in energy and milk protein} we were furious.

"'How could we not have milk candy? We've got everything you have!'

"Behind closed doors we all admitred that they were advanced and we were poor, but we couldn't bear for anybody else to say that Chinese people were bad, or that we were deprived. How can I put it? Dogs don't hate their homes for being poor.

"Some places aren't so good. In South America people used to swear at us. I was told they were joking, but I could see they looked down on us Chinese. They liked white people. We just concentrated on our performance, we didn't have a lot to do with other people, as soon as the show was over we just went back to our dormitories or the hotel.

"The Americans were very friendly. In Latin America, Colombia, we had one performance a day, and we did all our everyday things together in small groups. We went together to the supermarket to buy food, and we brought it back, cooked it and ate it together. We Chinese always stick together, wherever we are.

"The first time we went abroad in the 1980s, we all went together to the tailors to get our clothes made, we all had the same clothes, from the skin out. We all had the same suitcases as well. After the 1990s they issued us with money instead, 700 yuan per person.

"To tell the truth, after the 1980s the country just kept improving, and things got better and better for us in every aspect of our lives. In any case, I had already experienced the humiliation of being a counterrevolutionary's daughter, so I passed over all these political movements and the rest of it in silence.

"Children now are cleverer than in my day. Back then we did whatever the teacher told us; with kids today, once the teacher has told them something, they'll think up a few ways to improve it on their own, and a lot of the time they improve on the teacher's own version. They're clever, but it's harder to teach them. We were too obedient, we didn't dare slack off. Children nowadays can be lazier than we were, so they're harder to teach.

"Iin those days teachers were just like your parents, they lectured you and beat you, but sometimes we'd spend our birthdays at the teacher's home, and get-togethers at the teacher's were a regular thing. Now relations berween people have changed; all we have to do is turn up to class on time. There are rules about how to teach, we have to write lesson plans for everything. It was different then. We made it up as we went along, there was always the possibility of something new.

"In the past, when we Chinese studied acrobatics, it was beaten into us with a stick. By the time I was a student we'd been liberated, the teacher didn't dare beat us too much, but we all believed that corporal punishment was useful for training. The time I remember most clearly is once when I was being lazy and couldn't turn a difficult kind of somersault, then one blow high on my bottom, and over I went—the teacher had given me a taste of "dough drop soup". That's a knotted rope, a tool for corporal punishment, we called it dough drop soup, a blow from that really hurt.

"We still give the students a taste if they're disobedient. Why? Sometimes they're just lazy if they won't practise till they get it right, isn't that just a waste of their youth and ambition? So if somebody isn't prepared to keep practising and complains about being tired, I'll give him a taste, and up he goes.

"Corporal punishment while practising your art is against the law? So wasting life and time isn't against the law? Young people nowadays talk about "enjoying life". How many children understand what the real enjoyment of human life is? If you have no skills for life, no success in your work, if you can't cook or do the housework, will you be able to "enjoy life"? It's enjoying other people's blood and sweat! That's what I call a crime!

"I was very young when I left home, and my family was nothing to be proud of, not like other people's, so the acrobatic troupe was like a family to me. Not only were we teachers and colleagues together for over forty years, the troupe took responsibility for everything: the flat I lived in, the children's schooling, work, medical treatment, all aspects of our lives. Even though I'm retired now, it still feels like a family to me. From the 1950s to the 1980s in China, most city dwellers were part of a work unit. Apart from the tiny minority who changed jobs or moved to another place to be with their spouse, the people in a work unit would generally stay there for the rest of their life. And since education, accommodation, medical care and even the next generation's jobs were all dealt with by the work unit, that next generation tended to stay in the same place, and work in the same professional circles. This gave rise to serious problems, as small, closed groups started to emerge, who in time came almost to form a monopoly.

"I can't say much for sure about our troupe's history. I know our predecessor was the acrobatic artist Guo Shaoquan's Tianjin Magical Troupe, which had started out wandering the roads and they finished up in Jinan, where they decided to stay. Guo's children trained up a batch of students, and the troupe expanded. After the Liberation it was nationalised, and a lot of dross got mixed in then—they brought in Communist Party leaders, administrators and the like, even though they didn't know anything about acrobatics. The people who didn't understand anything were put in charge of the ones who did—isn't that typical of us Chinese? …

I had a lot of fun growing up in New York's Chinatown. I remember the fun of having friends close by, or playing on the sidewalks—hopscotch, handball, tag, roller skating, and going around the block to the candy store. I remember the fun things.

I was also aware, from a very young age, of the diversity in cultures that I encountered in school. I remember making very good friends with two Jewish girls. It was probably an odd sight to many, but the three of us did Havah-Nagilah on stage when I was in the fourth grade. I got to know their families pretty well, and remember tasting Jewish food. In that sense, it was very rich. It was a very Americanized environment.

When I was thirteen or fourteen, I hung around with one group called the Continentals, and in keeping with the times, the boys wore black leather jackets, and hung around on street corners being cool, with ducktail type hairdos, and tight black pants. This was around 1963. There was almost a uniform of what the girls and guys who were a part of that social gang wore. Very often, girls would wear white shirts with black shorts. But I remember the white blouses with the initials on them. And we had our dances. The Continental group was a mixture of first, second and third generation Chinese teenagers, many of whom attended the Chinese school. And then there were other teenage groups, whose social life was centered around a church.

Our idea of rebelliousness was hanging around street corners. Because we were the Continentals we would go around finding Lincoln Continentals and try to rip the little Continental symbols off the cars. That was the time of the movie, West Side Story, where teenage gang rivalry was depicted.

These were gangs, but not as we know of them today—with access to guns, or extortion. These were social gangs much like the ones in West Side Story. They carried switchblades or chains—but that was as far as they would go in terms of weapons. And every now and then they would get into scuffies with Italian gangs, each maintaining dominion over their neighborhood block. And it was cool for us to be a part of that. And it was cool for the girls to watch how the guys would get hurt in those things.

I look back at my teenage years and think now that I was involved in some pretty off-the-wall stuff, being part of these gangs. And hearing the elders in Chinatown give us a bad name, and at the same time knowing we didn't do anything wrong—we just looked threatening because we hung around and shared that sense of rebelliousness —of wanting to be independent, grow up, and have an identity. My parents didn't know I was in a gang. They were very strict, and if we went to a party, often it was without the knowledge of my parents. We'd say we were going to the movies, and then we'd go to a party. At these parties, we'd do the twist, the cha-cha, the lindy, or jitterbug as it's called, and the Continental Walk.

There were all-Chinese parties, and strictly limited to groups we hung out with. The extended group had forty to fifty people. Dating was certainly not the young man asking shyly whether I would go someplace like a movie or dinner, then having him show up at my door with a corsage or something, and being nervous about talking to my parents. The dating that we saw on Father Knows Best was not the kind of dating experience I had. We didn't really date, one on one. We went out in groups to the bowling alley, ice skating, or to the movies. Then you paired off with someone. I don't remember being asked unless there was a dance or the movies.

I remember being very insistent about going to Chinese school because my two older sisters went, and I wanted to go too. But I didn't start first grade Chinese school until I was two years ahead of that grade in American school. That was common. You often found older children in the lower grades because of ability. It was just the way the school was set up. We were all there, learning Chinese, memorizing the same lessons, and we were all competing for the same thing.

But the social life was different. And the friends I eventually chose to develop a social life with were mostly second or third generation Chinese Americans. There was still that sense of competition, and the ones you competed with were the immigrants.

School was from five to seven o'clock, five days a week. In my third year I started a Mandarin club because I was very interested in the dialect. I got our teacher to agree. Our Mandarin club would meet at four fifteen so that meant school started much earlier.

Chinese school was comprehensive. We learned history, science, social studies (but from a Chinese perspective), geography about China, and in some cases, the world. Very seldom would I mix the lessons from Chinese school with American school. They were two distinct worlds. With only two hours a day, what we did was very selective. We learned composition; we learned how to write. The whole method of teaching was so different from American school. There was a lot of memorization.

And penmanship, of course, was using the brush. It was learning how to write Chinese characters, with ink and brush. A very important part of that schooling was poetry.

The Chinese school also had a tradition of a drum and bugle corps. I was a baton twirler. And I was in it for four or five years.

All this time that this was going on, it never dawned on me to think about how much out of the mainstream of society we were. It wasn't until I left Chinatown that I realized what a homogenous community Chinatown really was. What a tight, closed environment we lived in. We interacted with the rest of the city only as far as our activities took us. But in terms of sufficiencies, such as food and social activities, it was very contained.

I can look back at my teenage years and see that it wasn't so different from other teenagers in other culture groups. It always amazes me how much of a New Yorker I was in terms of the environment. We had our dances, played our 45 records, had little transistor radios we played, and hung out on corners. Friends gathered after school at the local malt shop and had egg creams and french fries. These were all Chinese kids. Because the schools I went to were so close to the Chinese community, many of the students who went to the schools were Chinese, so invariably, I ended up hanging around with Chinese teenagers.

In my early teens, my parents did not think it was appropriate for us to be seen with guys. So I just didn't tell them. The activities I would do with a guy would be done in a group setting. So there was no need for me to tell my parents I'm going with so and so, because I'd meet up with a group anyway. When my parents said to me, you're too young to be dating, I assumed they meant Chinese guys. There wasn't even a race issue in that, because it was understood that I would eventually end up with a Chinese. They certainly didn't have to warn me not to date Caucasians.

At that point in my life, it never occurred to me to date anyone but Chinese because of the environment I grew up in. The school I went to had Italians, blacks, Jews, Puerto Ricans, whites—it was a pretty good mixture. But there was a sense of difference. I got along with people very well in school. I had some very good Italian friends —males and females—but it never occurred to me to date them. Or if I looked for cute guys, I'd be attracted to the Chinese ones and not the Caucasians.

Although by the time I got to college, I could say my horizons broadened a bit, and I could say there were non-Chinese guys who were cute. You found them attractive, but not to the point where you'd say, "Oh gosh, I wish he would call me up" or something. Again, I was looking for the Chinese or the Oriental guys.

I grew up in a very sheltered environment in Chinatown, and there wasn't the need to look beyond. There were plenty of guys around to date, and enough to have crushes on. And there were some in the school environment as well.

My father was in several businesses. He owned an import-export trading company, and for a while he worked in a Chinese butcher shop owned by some relatives. He also had his own business of producing monosodium glutamate which he sold to restaurants. And then he started one of the first suburban Chinese restaurants in New Jersey in the 1950s.

My mother, because she did not speak any English, found work in Chinatown in a sewing factory. But both of them were pursuing ways of supporting a family that were not in line with their original interests. They were both college-educated people who had to essentially give up careers in their fields of interest to come to the States.

We were a poor family, and when I look back at it now I can see that. There were six of us living in a three-room flat. There were two small bedrooms and one room in the middle which had a sink and bathtub in it. We had to draw a curtain around us every time we washed. The bathroom was in the hall and we shared it with other families. This living arrangement was supplemented by our father's store, which was where we had our kitchen and cooked our meals. In the back of the store was a hallway which we used as a kitchen.

There was a living area in the back of this storefront and we spent most of our time there, so all we really did in the three-room apartment was sleep. My youngest sister and I slept in the same room as my parents and my two older sisters slept in a tiny bedroom of their own. As we grew up, there were times when the four of us would sleep in one bedroom. We were poor by middle class standards, but at that time the families around us were living in the same situation. I never felt spiritually poor.

I felt the difference when I visited beautiful homes and houses in suburban areas. When my sister and I went away for these summer programs sponsored by inner-city churches that matched up city children with families in Connecticut, I remember visiting a family for two weeks, and living for the first time in my life, in a single family house with a big yard and a big kitchen. The little girl who was my age had a huge bedroom of her own, that was almost larger than the three room apartment that we lived in. I became aware of the difference in living standards in a situation like that. But I never really felt that I was poor.

In looking back at the way my grandparents lived, I would say it was very poor. They lived in a garage that was in a city alley. It was a structure that was behind a building in Washington D.C.'s Chinatown that my grandfather was responsible for. And being a very humble man, my grandfather didn't see the need for a more comfortable environment. It was comfortable for him, so that was what he and his wife, my grandmother, would make do with.

There was a bedroom in the upstairs portion of the garage with a little kerosene heater. And downstairs was a concrete floor of the garage. It was not covered with anything—just bare cement. He lived this way for over forty years. About a third of the downstairs was taken up with storage of very old things—like wood and glass. There was a junk pile stored in the garage and they lived in the other half of it. They set up a little living area of benches made out of wood and a wooden platform that my grandmother could lie down on. In the comer there was a two burner gas stove, that probably wouldn't meet anybody's fire codes these days. And they had a small old ice box. There was running water that came out of a pipe sticking out of the floor. There was a commode, but it was not one that you could flush. You had to pour water down there every time you used the bathroom.

And that was it. If we took a bath, we had to use a tin bathtub. There wasn't any hot water, so we had to boil it. And there was no drain, so we would have to carry it and dump it down the toilet, or down a drain in the alley. And the running water from the pipe had to be caught by a tin bucket that rested on a cut off stool. So if you were going to wash your hand you had to wash it over the bucket, and then you dumped the water into the commode.

My grandparents lived this way until my grandfather gave up his restaurant and retired in the mid-1960s. Then he moved to New York to be with us.

We cared for family elders, respected them made them a part of our lives. I remember when my grandmother was still alive. There was a time when we had to face a decision of either putting my grandmother in a nursing home or keeping her at home. And it was pretty much unanimous, as difficult a woman as she was, she should stay at home, even in her handicapped state after her stroke.

I grew up in a very traditional family setting. I went to Chinese movies just about every week with my parents. As a first generation Chinese, I never even ventured a thought of marrying anyone but a Chinese. So when my older sister married a non-Chinese, I was very, very upset. I was disappointed in her and felt betrayed.

What changed my world completely was going away to a small college in Vermont to study Chinese in the end of my sophomore year. I had just been accepted to Princeton University for a special program and a summer of intensive Chinese at Middlebury College in Vermont was part of that.

For the first eight weeks I knew nothing but the study hall, dorm, eating hall and language lab. That was my world in Middlebury. I kind of isolated myself from some of the students, and maybe in away, I was reluctant to deal with it and rejected that kind of environment because it was so foreign to me. There were some Chinese Americans there—a few who were second or third generation. But the rest of the students studying Chinese were not Chinese. They were students from all over the country .

I was struck by the number of non-Chinese people who spoke the language very well and were studying the Chinese culture. They were studying history to an extent of being much more knowledgeable culturally of my heritage than my peers in Chinatown. I mean, to see a lecturer who acted more Chinese in terms of his mannerism and the way he spoke than some of my friends—when he was in fact Caucasian—was mind boggling. It was a shock. I was immensely impressed, and admired that. It was something that never occurred to me as being possible. I also met a Caucasian professor at Princeton, who had the grace, if you will, of a Chinese gentleman. He had more grace than many of the Chinese men I have come across. The image of a Chinese scholar, of a Chinese gentleman that we grow up seeing in the movies—soft-spoken, very intellectual, who knew the social nuances of a Chinese setting, in terms of what to say, how to act, how to respond, patience—this man embodied much of that. He was married to a Chinese woman. I am sure the way he developed was very much affected by his marriage to this woman. If I closed my eyes, I would have seen someone who was Chinese.

So it was like all different subcultures of this country converging on this little school. That was the first time for instance, I encountered a Californian—the free spirit of a Californian—who would take off on his Porche up the mountains of Vermont. You couldn't be in an environment like that without being affected by what was going on around you.

And at the end of the eight weeks, I just broke down. I became more social. I was finally able to interact with them on their level, a level that was comfortable with me. It was like the layer of sheltered life I had led in Chinatown just slipped away. It took eight weeks, but I was finally comfortable. I don't know if it was purely a race issue, or if it was exposure to different social groups.

I met my husband there that summer. He's the first of five generations not to carry on the family business. They had always lived in Wisconsin. He works for the government. He was one of the brighter students at Middlebury who really picked up on the language, and showed a real appreciation for the culture and history. I was very impressed.

I couldn't have felt more loved from my first visit to meet his family. They were warm, loving, and they were not at all prejudiced against me. Or if they were, they certainly didn't show it. They had some concerns as to why their son was dating a Chinese girl before they met me. But they thought that was part of the weird things he was doing in terms of studying Chinese politics. But once I got there, I felt very much at home. And they were very much in favor of the wedding.

My family was the complete opposite. My oldest sister married someone who was not Chinese and was the first in the family to do it. My father was very much against her marriage and tried to break them up any way he could. And in the end, when he couldn't he did not speak to them for a long time.

In my case, I was the second one to get married. He was so disappointed, hurt and maybe disgusted at the idea that this could repeat itself, that he didn't talk to me for a good six months before the wedding. So instead of doing everything he could to break us up, he just ignored me.

It was something I had expected. I had to consider that marriage very carefully because I knew all that I was giving up in terms of relationships with my family. So I was prepared for it, and in away, respected his decision not to support me, and not to come to my wedding.

In the end, about two days before I got married, my father and I had a long talk, perhaps worked out a mutual understanding, a respect for each other's decision, and things were fine after that. Now my relationship with my family is good. I often marvel at how well my husband and my father can communicate—even in Chinese.

My children, unfortunately, do not speak Chinese. Language is very important to me. It would be very nice if they could. Unfortunately I don't offer them the environment where they can learn it and speak it on a regular basis to retain it. And when they were little I would teach them a couple of Chinese words, and it was confusing—more confusing than helpful. Even when we went to Hong Kong and lived for two years, it was still very difficult for them to learn, again because the kids they interacted with were not Chinese.

But eventually I would like for them to make that decision on their own. I would encourage it. I don't go out of my way to force them or make them go to a Chinese school right now. But I hope that they will recognize the rich heritage that they come from and will eventually consider learning Chinese. But I want it to come from them. I don't want to force it.

I've always seen myself as a Chinese—even today. Though there are times I recognize how Chinese American I really am. The music, the culture, the issues of the time, I can relate to them. So in looking back to the sixties to the things I enjoyed doing and the things that affected me, a lot of us in the States shared that. And I think that is very distinctly American, rather than Chinese.

My family is traditional in attitudes about how we were raised. We have a respect for our elders, and a very strong sense of identity in terms of heritage. We were encouraged to learn more and be sensitive to our history, where we came from, our people.

Whenever I visit my mother during a Chinese holiday and she has the special food and settings out to honor our ancestors, I always light some incense, kowtow several times and kneel before pictures of my ancestors. In my parents' living room, my dad has pictures of my grandparents and great grandparents. It's set up against the wall, and sometimes oranges and flowers are placed there on special occasions. My parents, who are both in their seventies, still journey twice a year from New Jersey to Washington D.C., to pay respect to my grandparents at the grave.

It's become a way for my family to get together. We would bring a chicken—special ordered because it must have a head and feet—roast pork, and a slice of pork fat and some sweet cakes to the cemetery. Then there are oranges and apples.

First we trim the grass around the grave markers, clean them off with water, then we place flowers and the food, and light candles and incense by the graves, offer them the food and then pour three tea cups of Johnny Walker Red on the ground. The food and whiskey is symbolic; it is our way of offering them a special meal each year to honor and remember them, so they won't go hungry. Then we burn paper money, lots of it—gold-sheeted, and even fake bills, so they will have money to spend. Then there are color sheets of paper which symbolize clothing. We burn that too. It's all done in a metal container. And we bring along a cassette of Chinese music which we play, so that my grandparents can enjoy the music while they are eating.

We do this every year, and it is a part of what my family feels is our obligation to our ancestors.

192.163 Excerpt from Wild Cat: Stories Of The Cultural Revolution: "The Typewriter"\fn{by Jia-lin Peng (1948-)} Willow Wood Town, "less than one hundred kilometers" from Liuzhou City, Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region*, China (M) 11

There's nothing eerie-looking about it—a portable Royal, at least forty years old and with two keys, A and E, blurred.*\fn{This is not the author's birthplace, which remains a mystery: it is where he had been teaching school upon completion of a course at a teacher's training college. All I know about his vital statistics is his birth year and that he was born somewhere in China:H}

It once belonged to my cousin, Mei-yin. She was a bookkeeper, and had suffered attacks of nerves. Her husband, Old Huang, a factory director, feared that her job was hurting her health, and hastily sought an easier one for her. One of his official friends consented to create a typist's position for her in the Foreign Trade Company of the city, provided that she could type. The workload would be very light, the friend promised, even a novice could finish one day's job in two or three hours. Old Huang bought a typewriter from a second-hand shop in Shanghai so that his wife could learn to type at home.

When my cousin was about to start her new job, the Cultural Revolution broke out. Some revolutionary rebels who were Old Huang's subordinates accused him of taking the capitalist road. As a matter of routine, they searched the couple's residence, and took away the typewriter. Like most people in this remote border province, who certainly had never seen an English typewriter, they might not have been able to tell the difference between it and a radio transmitter, such as one might see in a post office. More likely though, the rebels just needed a pretext to take over Old Huang's position. At any rate, they called it a radio transmitter, and accused my cousin and her husband of being secret agents in the service of American Imperialism. They confiscated the typewriter and locked the couple up in a "cowshed"—a kind of makeshift prison. My cousin was tortured to the point of insanity. As a reactionary, she was rejected by all insane asylums, which claimed they only served revolutionaries. Therefore she had to be cared for at home by her elderly mother. Meanwhile her husband remained in the cowshed.

One night, while her mother was sleeping, my cousin jumped from their fourth story window and smashed her skull on the pavement below.

Some months later, as it happened, the revolutionary rebels "liberated" Old Huang, classifying him among the revolutionary cadres. They returned the typewriter to him.

His mother-in-law, my aunt, was a superstitious housewife. Believing that "this tricky machine of foreign devils" was the demon who killed her daughter, she insisted on destroying it. While Old Huang didn't believe in demons, he did not want to keep a typewriter which reminded him of his wife's tragic death. So he gave it to me when I happened to visit them.

I'd always dreamed of having a typewriter. Though I had studied in the English department at teachers' college, I'd hardly had the chance to touch a typewriter there. After graduation I became a teacher at a commune middle school, where a typewriter was totally out of the question. Therefore, though I knew it might get me into trouble, I accepted the gift. I carried the machine back to my school in secret, wrapped it in my winter clothes within a locked suitcase, and stashed the case beneath my bed.

Due to the Cultural Revolution, our school had not held classes for more than a year now. And it seemed there would be no end to the revolution. In our province, all the mass organizations had divided into two factions—the Red Flags and the Red Stars. Both factions declared their loyalty to the great leader Chairman Mao Tse-tung. Yet, they had countless quarrels with each other.

For instance, the Red Flags supported the former provincial Party Secretary as chairman of the Provincial Revolutionary Committee which was soon to be established, but the Red Stars accused him of being a capitalist—roader, and supported the former governor of the province. At first the two factions fought with pens and tongues-in what was known as wendou (verbal struggle). Then they fought with fists, swords and spears, and finally with rifles, machine-guns, dynamite and mortars. People invented a new word, wudou (violent struggle), to name this phenomenon. At our school, most teachers and students belonged to the Red Star Faction; but in our commune, as in the whole province, the overwhelming majority were Red Flags. In our commune there were seldom violent confrontations between the two factions. Even so, after the wudou broke out elsewhere, a few local Red Star activists mysteriously disappeared, while most of the others fled. Now there remained behind only two persons who had ever been Red Stars.

I was one of them.

Not that I didn't fear death. I stayed only because I believed the commune was safer than anywhere else I could go. I had arrived at the commune from teachers' college only a few months before the Cultural Revolution began, and I had no political ambitions at all. So I didn't have any enemies among my colleagues. Being a mild-tempered man, I had never been harsh to students. Since the very start of the Cultural Revolution, I had never done anyone any harm, nor had anyone ever done harm to me. I had joined the Red Star Faction, but only in name, because most of my colleagues at the school were also members. And after two months I quit.

I secretly attributed my quitting to having studied Chairman Mao's works. In those years, if anybody did anything good, certainly in public, he or she would claim it was due to Mao Tse-tung Thought. For example, a young country doctor once successfully removed a huge tumor from an old woman's abdomen. He declared it was Mao Tse-tung Thought that had bestowed upon him the courage and skill to perform the surgery; and the patient said it was the Chairman Mao's quotations read to her that had given her the vitality to endure the operation.

I wasn't sure whether my quitting was good or not, but I did have to admit it was due to studying the supreme instruction—Chairman Mao's words. I was suddenly enlightened one day while reading over this quotation:

> A revolution is not a dinner party … it cannot be so refined, so leisurely and gentle, so temperate, kind, courteous, restrained and magnanimous. A revolution is an insurrection, an act of violence …\fn{The full quotation in which this excerpt is embedded, is quoted below. From the author's statement above, it is clearly taken from the little red book:H}

> A revolution is not a dinner party, or writing an essay, or painting a picture, or doing embroidery; it cannot be so refined, so leisurely and gentle, so temperate, kind, courteous, restrained and magnanimous. A revolution is an insurrection, an act of violence by which one class overthrows another.\fn{This, however, is but a tiny fragment of a long treatise which Mao Tse-tung wrote in March, 1927, entitled "Report on anInvestigation of the Peasant Amovement in Hunan," where it occurs in the following subsection entitled, "The Question of 'Going Too Far.'":H}

> Then there is another section of people who say, "Yes, peasant associations are necessary, but they are going rather too far." This is the opinion of the middle-of-the-roaders. But what is the actual situation? True, the peasants are in a sense "unruly" in the countryside. Supreme in authority, the peasant association allows the landlord no say and sweeps away his prestige. This amounts to striking the landlord down to the dust and keeping him there. The peasants threaten, "We will put you in the other register!" They fine the local tyrants and evil gentry, they demand contributions from them, and they smash their sedan-chairs. People swarm into the houses of local tyrants and evil gentry who are against the peasant association, slaughter their pigs and consume their grain. They even loll for a minute or two on the ivory-inlaid beds belonging to the young ladies in the households of the local tyrants and evil gentry. At the slightest provocation they make arrests, crown the arrested with tall paper hats, and parade them through the villages, saying, "You dirty landlords, now you know who we are!" Doing whatever they like and turning everything upside down, they have created a kind of terror in the countryside. This is what some people call "going too far", or "exceeding the proper limits in righting a wrong", or "really too much". Such talk may seem plausible, but in fact it is wrong. First, the local tyrants, evil gentry and lawless landlords have themselves driven the peasants to this. For ages they have used their power to tyrannize over the peasants and trample them underfoot; that is why the peasants have reacted so strongly. The most violent revolts and the most serious disorders have invariably occurred in places where the local tyrants, evil gentry and lawless landlords perpetrated the worst outrages. The peasants are clear-sighted. Who is bad and who is not, who is the worst and who is not quite so vicious, who deserves severe punishment and who deserves to be let off lightly —the peasants keep clear accounts, and very seldom has the punishment exceeded the crime. Secondly, a revolution is not a dinner party, or writing an essay, or painting a picture, or doing embroidery; it cannot be so refined, so leisurely and gentle, so temperate, kind, courteous, restrained and magnanimous. A revolution is an insurrection, an act of violence by which one class overthrows another. A rural revolution is a revolution by which the peasantry overthrows the power of the feudal landlord class. Without using the greatest force, the peasants cannot possibly overthrow the deep-rooted authority of the landlords which has lasted for thousands of years. The rural areas need a mighty revolutionary upsurge, for it alone can rouse the people in their millions to become a powerful force. All the actions mentioned here which have been labelled as "going too far" flow from the power of the peasants, which has been called forth by the mighty revolutionary upsurge in the countryside. It was highly necessary for such things to be done in the second period of the peasant movement, the period of revolutionary action. In this period it was necessary to establish the absolute authority of the peasants. It was necessary to forbid malicious criticism of the peasant associations. It was necessary to overthrow the whole authority of the gentry, to strike them to the ground and keep them there. There is revolutionary significance in all the actions which were labelled as "going too far" in this period. To put it bluntly, it is necessary to create terror for a while in every rural area, or otherwise it would be impossible to suppress the activities of the counter-revolutionaries in the countryside or overthrow the authority of the gentry. Proper limits have to be exceeded in order to right a wrong, or else the wrong cannot be righted. Those who talk about the peasants "going too far" seem at first sight to be different from those who say "It's terrible!" as mentioned earlier, but in essence they proceed from the same standpoint and likewise voice a landlord theory that upholds the interests of the privileged classes. Since this theory impedes the rise of the peasant movement and so disrupts the revolution, we must firmly oppose it.\fn{Selected Works of Mao Tse-tung, vol. I, pp. 27-29. So has our world become compartmentalized:H}

If a faction, no matter whether Red Flag or Red Star, was defeated in the revolution, the victors should not treat them like guests at a dinner party. I didn't want to be treated or treat others violently, so I quit the Red Star Faction and became a nonfaction-person. In the light of Chairman Mao's works, I guessed that middle-of-theroaders would always be the people whom the revolutionaries would try to win over. Therefore while the winners in the revolution might not award a medal to a middle element, it was unlikely that they would touch him.

I had other reasons to feel safe staying in the commune. I was somewhat useful to the Red Flags. Within the ranks of our commune, I could call myself a calligrapher and painter. Now and then, the Red Flags would ask me to write slogans or paint pictures, mainly portraits of Chairman Mao. My works appeared on the walls all over little Willow Wood Town, in which the commune government, as well as our school, were located.

Of course, I was not so naive as to think my safety was guaranteed. But I had one more thing in my favor—a sort of "political umbrella". The head of the Red Flags of the commune, Liao Zhi-gao, was a fan of the board game known as weiqi or go. But among the twenty thousand residents in the commune, there were only two or three other persons who played this game. I was one of them. Liao and I played together often, so we came to know each other quite well. You could even say we became friends. Now and then, we would have a chat, even a drink together. Needless to say, he tried to persuade me to join his faction. But I declined in a roundabout fashion, saying I still needed time to think it over.

"Don't think any more!" he said. "Vice Commander-in-Chief Lin Piao teaches us: 'We must carry out all of Chairman Mao's instructions, regardless of whether we understand them or not.' Chairman Mao asks us to join the Cultural Revolution, and we must respond to his great call, enthusiastically and unreservedly. You intellectuals always think you are wise enough to hold your own opinions. It is nauseating. That's why people call you 'stinking' intellectuals. It is also dangerous. Don't you know that's why Emperor Chin buried the scholars alive? This kind of self-opinionated attitude is totally wrong. That's why we want to remold your ideology."

However, he didn't bother me too frequently with this sort of rhetoric. To give him his due, this young man was rather kind to me. On his own initiative, he assured me that he would watch out for my safety.

Therefore, while people were busying themselves with fighting or fleeing, I remained at leisure. I had no teaching work to do, yet received every cent of my salary. To kill time, I hung around a lot with some of my former students, who were about ten years younger than me. We swam, fished, hunted birds, and played basketball. One of them, Li Guo-ping, even became my close friend.

Li Guo-ping had finished all his courses and examinations in junior middle school just before the Cultural Revolution began and now, like all of his classmates, he was still waiting for the graduation diploma. He was the cleverest boy I'd ever met. But to a couple of my fellow-teachers, he had been a troublemaker who embarrassed them a great deal by pointing out their mistakes, asking questions they couldn't answer, and arguing with them—in class! I had to say that most of my colleagues had never gone to college, and were not really qualified to teach middle school.

But a few of them feigned excellence and treated students as if they themselves were wise men and the students idiots. If a student dared to show he saw through them, the teachers were furious. They took revenge on the student by punishing him unfairly or even trying to ruin his future. As a matter of fact, in Li Guo-ping's file, which was supposed to follow him for his lifetime and which he himself would never have a chance to read, the teacher in charge of Li's class had added a fabricated charge concerning his political behaviour, recommending that senior middle schools not accept him.

The Great Cultural Revolution gave students a chance to get even with the teachers they hated. They criticized, struggled against, tortured, even killed the teachers. As for the teachers themselves, either out of revolutionary zeal and hatred, or simply to save their own skins, they vied with each other in exposing each other's dirty linen. Any improprieties of the past were brought to light. This made their own time much harder. More and more teachers became "monsters and demons". And struggle sessions against them were held one after the other.

Yet surprisingly, Li Guo-ping never raised a finger to any teacher, even when it came to light that one of them could have ruined his future. After we became friends, out of curiosity I asked Li if he hated that teacher and why he hadn't taken revenge on him.

"Of course I hate the fucking bastard," he answered. "But if I kill him, it will happen in a man-to-man duel, not when his hands are bound."

That's why I respected him and chose him as my close friend, despite the fact that he was only seventeen. You didn't have to take precautions that such a boy would stab you in the back. In those days, such a person was so hard to fmd. But once you found one, you could feel the world wasn't quite as perilous a place as you had thought.

To be Li Guo-ping's friend, however, didn't always make you feel safe, because in his mind were too many unusual questions which could get both of you in trouble. For instance, he once asked me:

"Every morning the Central People's Radio Station begins broadcasting with a song, The East is Red, which tells us Chairman Mao is the great savior of the people. But every night the same station finishes broadcasting with another song, The Internationale, which says there is no such thing as a saviour. Which song tells the truth, and which song shall we listen to?"

Millions and millions of people listened to these two songs every day, but I bet few of them had ever entertained such a question. Though I strongly felt that too much thinking could get this boy, and even the people associated with him, into trouble, I simply could not help secretly admiring him. I treated him more as my classmate than my student.

Li Guo-ping liked me, I guessed, because I was easy-going and honest. Whenever he asked me about something I didn't know, I simply admitted it. This did not hurt his respect for me one bit. He said I was the "most learned person in the commune". It might have been because I could tell him stories I'd learned from foreign books which were certainly not available to a country boy, even before the Cultural Revolution. And since the revolution began, practically the only books one could find were written by Chairman Mao.

Li pestered me to tell him stories whenever he had an opportunity. I had to tax my memory to the limit to satisfy him. He liked Sherlock Holmes, Robin Hood and the Knights of the Round Table. But he was more fascinated by the real-life stories of self- made persons like Michael Faraday, Marie Curie, and Jack London.

We became closer and closer. I forgot the difference between our ages and discussed all kinds of topics with him. I even shared the secret of the typewriter with him.

It happened one evening, when everyone else living in the school dormitory had gone out to watch a show staged by the County Performing Arts Propaganda Team. I stayed home to eat a chicken I'd bought from the fair that day. I invited Guo-ping to join me. After drinking half a bottle of wine, I lost caution and showed him the typewriter, while telling him the tragedy of my cousin Mei-yin.

I could see the tears shining in his eyes. But the story didn't scare him away from the "killer" machine. With trembling fingers, he slowly printed out a sentence:

"I want to study!"

Then he told me excitedly that he wanted to study everything that was supposed to be taught in senior middle school and in university. He asked me to teach him English and any other subjects I could. He said he had had this idea in his mind for quite a long time but had felt too embarrassed to ask my help.

I was touched by his earnestness. I promised to do my best to help him, but I didn't see how English could do him any good. Li Guo-ping argued English was the first thing he wanted to learn.

Obviously, it was the wine and the fact that I had shared my own secret with him which encouraged him to open his heart totally to me. He said that sooner or later he would certainly go to college, even if the Chinese ones were closed forever. He believed some university somewhere in the world would accept him. That's why he wanted so badly to master English.

I almost covered his mouth with my hand. What he had said was enough to put him into labor camp for several years. Yet, though frightened by his words, I simply could not say no. I agreed to teach him on one condition: he would never mention why he wanted to learn English again.

I scrounged up an English-Chinese dictionary, and a copy of Essential English with the last ten or fifteen pages missing, and bought two copies of the English version of Quotations From Chairman Mao Tse-tung. When we had our classes, we usually went to some remote site near a brook or river, fishing at the same time. In case we were found out, we would say we were learning Chairman Mao's works in English. Since the leadership proclaimed that we Chinese would soon liberate the whole world, we wanted to be ready to propagate Mao Tse-tung Thought among the foreigners who didn't speak Chinese.

Half a year earlier, no matter what our pretext, if we had done anything involving the "imperialist language", English, somebody would surely have found out about it through spying and gotten us into real trouble. But it didn't seem likely now, because the revolutionaries had much more fiendish enemies at hand to deal with, and more exciting business to occupy their attention.

In Liuzhou City, which was less than one hundred kilometers away, the wudou had escalated into fierce urban warfare. The Red Stars occupied the southern part of the city; the Red Flags encircled them. Thousands more Red Flag fighters were being sent there from neighbouring counties. My go partner, Liao Zhi-gao, whom I had not seen for quite a while, was in command of reconnaissance on the front. He became a legendary hero. It was said that he and his girlfriend, who was a cadre at a neighboring commune, had slipped into the enemy headquarters in disguise, and set off an explosion, killing twenty-four Red Stars as well as their vice-commander. I heard a rumor that for his military exploit, Liao Zhi-gao was promised a very important position in the county revolutionary committee.

During those months together, Guo-ping learned very fast; I took the teaching more seriously than a paid job. Inspired by him, I also had a strong desire to improve my English. I began to listen to the English broadcasting on the BBC and VOA,\fn{Voice of America} secretly and always with earphones. Gradually, I understood more and more. As both of us made daily progress, we felt very happy.

Sometimes, I thought we were escaping from the real world and poisoning ourselves with something akin to opium. But at the same time, the more we learned, the closer I felt we were to another world, in which it was legal for a student to learn and a teacher to teach, in which one did not have to kill or be killed. I could hardly tell which of the two worlds was more real—the one we were in, or the one we tried to escape to. Were both unreal? Perhaps one of them was an illusion, the other a nightmare? I wished the illusion could last

Unfortunately, the illusion didn't last It came to an end with Liao Zhi-gao's death.

One day, Liao, his girlfriend, and five other fighters fell into an ambush. Four of his men died in battle, and he himself received a severe head wound. His girlfriend and another fighter carried him and fought their way out. But before they reached the hospital, Liao died. Two days later, his body was sent back to our commune. His coffin was displayed in the meeting hall of our school.

It was a fair spring day. But the atmosphere of little Willow Wood Town was dismal, as if the sky itself was clouded with hatred and the air rank with fear. Not a single smiling face was to be found. The children were forbidden to play by their parents. On the walls appeared slogans, such as "Debts of Blood Must Be Paid in Blood! We Vow to Avenge Martyr Liao Zhi -gao!" and

"Smash the Red Star Bandits' Lair! Exterminate the Red Stars!"

An ominous foreboding overwhelmed me. The typewriter beneath my bed made me feel I was lying on a time bomb. It could give a ready-made excuse for punitive action by the Red Flags, who were wild for revenge. I thought of dropping it into the river which was a few hundred yards from my place. But I held back, partly because I was afraid that I had been watched already, mainly because I hated to get rid of it. At the same time, however, I regretted having accepted it. I even went so far as to think that I'd been obsessed by it, and that my aunt was right: the typewriter was a killing demon.

While I was wringing my hands not knowing what to do, Li Guo-ping appeared. He offered to hide the typewriter in his own house. His family origin was poor peasant, he said, and his uncle was both a Red Flag and cadre at the commune. Nobody would search their house. Moreover, his parents were upright and kind-hearted persons. They respected me very much. Under no circumstance would they betray me.

Fearing that Li and his family would be involved in trouble, I refused. but he insisted. Before we reached an agreement, two Red Flags appeared suddenly at the door of my room. My head pounded violently, as if it would jump out from my mouth. The two men were indeed looking for me. What they said, however, calmed down my hean-beat. They handed me a photograph of Liao, asking me to make a large charcoal portrait from it.

"We'll bring you a frame in a couple of hours," one of them said. "As soon as you finish the portrait, please put it in the frame and carry it to the mourning hall." Then they left

I must have been over-sensitive. I thought it didn't look as if the Red Flags would avenge Liao's death upon a former Red Star like me. But Li still insisted that it would be safer to hide the typewriter in his house. Finally I gave my consent. After it was dark, he took it away.

By the time I finished the portrait, it was already about ten p.m. I brought it to the mourning hall. A guard put the portrait in front of Liao's vennilion coffin. The hall was dimly lit by yellowish electric lights. Before the coffin, several candles and scores of incense sticks were burning. The scent, mixed with a subtle foul smell, filled the air. On the floor, dozens of wreaths stood in rows. Many blue cloth sheets were hung on the walls, serving as backdrops to elegiac couplets and mourning phrases written on white paper. Several sheets repeated the same sentence:

"Comrade Liao Zhi-gao lives on!"

I too hardly believed that he was really dead. The good times we had had together flashed through my mind; sadness and sorrow gripped my heart. I stared at the portrait. If he was not handsome, he at least had regular features. Unlike an ordinary country youth whose facial muscles would freeze before a camera, he was smiling. And his smile was so self-confident, even conceited. At the time, he had had every reason to smile. But now, he was dead, rotting in a coffin behind the smiling portrait. What a cruel joke Fate made! Hanging my head, I was lost in black thought.

"Kneel down!" a woman yelled.

Before I realized that I was the one being addressed, somebody gave me a sharp kick on the back of the knee. I lost my balance and fell down. Then I found that two men had been pushed into the hall and forced to kneel beside me. They were Lin Yong-ge and Wei Cheng. Lin was a political science teacher at our school, who once had also been a Red Star. Wei was a Mathematics teacher at the primary school of the commune, who had never been a Red Star or a Red Flag but who had shown a strong preference for the Red Star Faction.

"Do you know why you are kneeling here?" the woman shouted.

The hatred in her hoarse voice turned my heart into ice. She was none other than Liao's girlfriend. I had seen her once but she did not know me personally.

"I know, 1 know,"—words gushed out from Lin's mouth without a pause—"I know I'm guilty of the most heinous crime, for which I deserve to die ten thousand deaths and even that cannot atone my sins. But I know the consistent policy of the Communist Party is leniency to those who confess their crimes, and severity to those who refuse to confess; it is a merit for a criminal to expose other criminals. I want to expiate my crimes by good deeds. I want to report these two men to you. I want to expose them both! I have kept a careful watch on them for a long time. He"—Lin pointed one hand at me, while the other hand fumbled in his pocket and took out a little notbook—"He is a reactionary, an enemy spy!"

It must be because of the damn typewriter, I thought. It could do great harm to Guo-ping and his parents as well!

"He dupes and corrupts students," Lin continued. "He propagates Feudalism, Capitalism and Revisionism! Here are the details." He consulted his note-book.

"Up to yesterday, he has shared ten chickens and four ducks with students, in order to win them over. The most serious crimes he has committed—"

"Shut up!" Liao Zhi-gao's girlfriend snapped. Evidently she was in no mood to listen.

"We don't need your babbling. Our eyes are discerning. We know everything each of you has done. Because of your crimes, I, on behalf of the Middle and Poor Peasant Supreme Court, sentence the three of you to death. The execution will be tomorrow, at Martyr Liao's funeral."

"You can't do this to me!" Lin sprang up and howled. "I'm a Communist Party member. I'm a Red Flag! I have followed the Party Central Committee and Chairman Mao closely, all along!"

One of the guards jabbed Lin in the kidneys with his rifle butt. It knocked Lin to the ground and silenced his hysteria. Whining miserably, he prostrated himself before the girl, and begged:

"Mercy! Please give me a chance. Zhi-gao and I are relatives. My great aunt married his grandfather."

"Pooh!" the girl spit at Lin. "You don't deserve to be his relative, you shameless bastard! Shut your mouth or I'll kill you at once."

At once Lin Yong-ge became mute. Wei Cheng's thick lips twitched, but no words came from his mouth. I myself was nearly paralyzed and speechless. I knew it was useless to say anything. They tied our hands behind our backs.

"Kneel there and don't move," the young woman ordered.

She and the guards walked out of the hall. The door was locked from the outside. We three were left in the company of the Martyr, waiting to be buried along with him.

Wei Cheng sat beside me, his back against the wall, his head bent to his knees. Sobbing, he mumbled as if to some invisible persons. A few feet away from us, Lin lay on his side, whining. Tears streamed down his waxen face, and the crotch of his pants was wet and stained with dust.

Suddenly, I thought they looked so funny. I couldn't help imagining how I myself looked … it must have been funny, too. Somewhere I had once picked up a statement by Samuel Beckett: 'The funniest thing is unhappy.' It had remained in my memory because I'd thought it was absolute nonsense. Now I came to realize how right he was!

Wei Cheng would die, at least partly because he'd showed too much preference for the Red Star Faction. However, the Red Stars had never rewarded him with any favors. They had refused to accept him as a member because of a "stain" on his record, which he himself had brought about in 1950, when he was only thirteen.

In that year, rebelling bandits occupied Wei's home town, a small mountain village, and took all the residents as hostages, including Wei Cheng. Only a few days later, the Liberation Army smashed the rebels and released the hostages. This whole incident didn't give Wei any trouble for years, until a political movement called "Four Check-into", which had begun a couple years earlier than the Cultural Revolution. The nationwide movement was supposed to clean things up in the fields of politics, economy, organization and ideology. Everybody had to confess all kinds of wrongdoings and wrong thoughts. Being an extremely earnest man, Wei Cheng confessed that he had done an “evil deed” during the bandit rebellion in 1950: he had assisted the bandits in caring for their wounded, because one of them was his cousin. This confession stained his ‘til-then spotless record. After the Cultural Revolution broke out; the stain grew, totally blackening his political color. He had to hang a board labeled “Bandit and Historical Counter-revolutionary Element Wei Cheng” around his neck, and clean toilets at the school as well as in the commune administration building every day.

As always, he devoted all his body and soul to his work. The toilets became so clean that I hadn’t been able to refrain from commenting to Li Guo-ping:

“Even if only on account of this aspect, we can see the necessity of the ‘unprecedented’ Great Cultural Revolution. Without it, would it be possible for these toilets to be so unprecedentedly clean?”

Wasn’t Wei’s life-story both unhappy and funny?

Lin Yong-ge’s case was a different story, though it was also funny. He was a Communist Party member and had a good family origin—poor peasant. He was a willing activist, who always kept abreast of the latest political events. Above all, he was an unequalled source of information. People said he knew everything, from what was going on in Zhongnanhai, Peking,\fn{A district of the Forbidden City, the former Imperial Capital actually built within Peking itself} where the highest Chinese Leaders lived, to what was cooking in a colleague’s wok; you could do nothing “improper” without it being recorded in his notebook, which he always brought everywhere with him.

One thing Lin had never lacked was the favor of the leadership. Once, he had even reached the top rank among the Red Flags in our commune. However, he quit the faction and joined the Red Stars, because Premier Zhou En-lai had once called The Red Star Faction a “revolutionary organization” but the Red Flag faction only a “mass organization”.

Lin Yong-ge not only quit, he “turned his weapon around and struck”—revealing scandals among the Red Flags. After some time, however, the Red Flags were still in power and in favor with those above. Perhaps certain other top-ranking leaders didn’t share Premier Zhou’s opinions about the faction. Or had Premier Zhou himself changed his own mind? A humble person like myself could never answer such a question. But Lin Yong-ge this time quit the Red Star Flag faction, once again turned his weapon around and struck. He accused the Red Stars of being reactionary bandits, and applied to rejoin the Red Flag Faction. Many Red Flags wanted to reject and punish him. But Liao Zhi-gao, who was quite a tolerant man, pardoned him and accepted him.

Lin’s given name, Yong-ge, which he’d adopted at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution, meant “revolutionary forever”. Indeed he had always been a revolutionary or at least had wanted to be a revolutionary. This revolutionary person was now to die a “counter-revolutionary” death.

Wasn’t it terribly funny?

Lin’s whine turned into a loud groan. His body huddled up.

“Are you all right?” Wei asked him.

“My legs are twitching.”

With his shoulder against the wall, Wei stood up. He stopped the cramp by kicking Lin’s soles. A guard with a pockmarked face came in, asking,

“What’s the noise?” Wei Cheng explained, and begged,

“Could you give him some water? Please!”

“What? Water for him?”

With disbelief the pock-marked one looked at Wei, then at Lin. Without saying yes or no, he left. Ten minutes later, he returned with a water bottle. He unbound Wei’s hands and gave the water to him.

“This is for you,” he said. “Not for that fucking bastard.”

Then turning aside, the guard made for the door. Wei Cheng helped Lin Yong-ge to sit up, and put the bottle to his lips. Lin gulped and gulped; fresh tears ran down his already-stained cheeks.

“Thank … you … I … I …”

Lin tried to say something, but was choked with sobs...

Suddenly the contempt for Lin disappeared from my heart, leaving only pity. I might have been too hard on this poor fellow, I told myself. Whatever he’d done was just to get favor from the leadership, just to be revolutionary. And whatever he had done, he did not deserve death. Before he himself drank, Wei came to me, bent over, and said to me softly:

“Take some water, Little Zhang, take some, please.”

Watching him putting the bottle to my lips, I couldn't hold back my tears. They gushed from my eyes, running down my face and dropping on my chest. Oh, Old Wei, Old Wei, how could Fate be so cruel to such a good man like you!

Through my tears, I saw Liao's portrait. His smile now had turned into a hideous smirk. He was a killer! I hated him! He had killed so many people. Now he was going to kill us as well. He was grinning at us—his victims. Yet he had no cause to grin. He himself was a victim too! He was dead, rotting and stinking in the coffin. His fiancée would sleep with other men. Even the fiancée-widow was a victim, too. She could kill us and bury us with her lover. But could she revive him? What's more, who could say that someday a bullet wouldn't dash out her own brains?

Ha, ha! Funny, funny, it was really funny. All of us—the killed, the about-to-be-killed, and the killers—all of us were nothing but victims! What a practical joke!

Some great persons had said that the Cultural Revolution was a grand manoeuvre for emancipating all mankind. Would all mankind have to go through this? Would they want to be emancipated in such a way?

Perhaps there were too many people in Clina. Even if we wiped out half our population, there would still be enough manpower to liberate the other peoples of the world. Therefore, the lives of people like Wei, Lin and me were dirt cheap.

Who were we? The enemies of the laboring people? On the contrary, we belonged to the laboring people, we were the proclaimed masters of the country. It was unspeakably funny that the death of the masters of the country could be so cheap, or, in the words of the well-known saying now so frequently used by the revolutionaries, it could be "lighter than a goose-feather".

If Szuma Chien, who had made the famous remark that a death could be heavier than Mount Tai or lighter than a goose-feather, were still alive, would he think the death of people like us was lighter than a feather? Surely he would not. The people who used his remark, did they know its original meaning?

Szuma Chien himself was a victim of tyranny! Years after he had been castrated by the Emperor for speaking out in defence of an acquaintance, Szuma Chien wrote this comment in bitterness, to an innocent friend who was about to be executed!

I wished in the future there would be an historian as great as Szuma Chien, who would say unmistakably something like this: Any innocent and unnecessary death should be heavier than Mount Tai. No one should have the right to think any other human being's life, even an enemy's life, is as light as a feather. Otherwise, those in power will be able to wipe out anyone in their way, just by labelling them class enemies and reactionaries. Would ever such an historian appear? Would he ever know that in such a great country, under such a perfect social system, there once had been so many insignificant people who died so insignificantly? Or even if he knew the truth, would he have any chance to let people listen to him?

Anyhow, it would not make any difference to me, because tomorrow I would die. I still had a few hours to live. Why should I bother myself with the future? What's more, I shouldn't think of anything sentimental, like missing my poor mother. Let me just try to enjoy the last moments of my short life, by imagining myself doing something I should most like to do.

How about making love to a girl? But I didn't know what that was really like. Though I was twenty-six years old, the most sexual thing I'd ever done was to kiss my former college sweetheart a few times. What a shame! If I could have known I would die so young, and in such a way, I would have certainly behaved differently. I began to recall what the girl and I had done together and imagined I did something more exciting. However, it gave me no pleasure, only sadness.

Finally, I imagined I was writing my life story with the typewriter. The fmal chapter was about my own death.

How would I die? Would they shoot me, beat me to death, or find some more cruel way? A couple of weeks earlier, eye-witnesses had described a savage and bloody real-life scene to me. It repeated itself in my mind's eye, like a play now performed by a different cast:

> I was tied to a pole. Liao's girlfriend stabbed a sharp, shining dagger into my chest. My blood gushed out. She opened my chest, and seized out my still-beating heart. The mob, like a swarm of wasps, dashed to my body and cut off my flesh bit by bit with pieces of broken glass and china.

Scared by my own imagination, I could be cynical or philosophical no more. I was shaking violently. Sweat broke out all over my body. My hands and feet were as cold as ice. Though I kept telling myself to pass my last few hours like a man, it simply didn't stop my shaking. I called myself a coward and forced myself to erase the chilling pictures from my mind. But they appeared more vivid.

I actually felt pain at this point. But it was due to a humming swarm of mosquitoes which kept attacking me. Their sound was more annoying than their bite. It reminded me of a struggle rally before a person's execution, where there was always a lot of vehement condemnation of the soon-to-be-killed, and many rhetorical speeches justifying the killing.

"Fuck you!" I cursed aloud, then muttered: "If you want my blood, just suck since I'm tied up, but don't tell me you are serving a great cause and leading me to Paradise!"

The imaginary pictures turned into a movie-like illusion, accompanied by a voice which said:

> "Look, this woman is cutting the flesh from the bone, with apiece of broken china bowl, bit by bit. She puts the flesh into the out-stretched hands of her son, the skinny sickly-looking boy. The flesh will be cooked on a piece of pottery tile. It is believed the flesh can make the boy healthy and strong. It is also believed that the flesh must not be touched with metal, or it will lose its magic tonic and healing power. In the last few months, cannibalism has become fairly common in certain areas in this province, especially Wuxuan County. Not everybody who eats human flesh does so for medical purposes. Some just do it to show off their bravery, or their hatred for enemies. Some do it simply for fun."

> Newcomers arrive at the killingfield. "Better late than never," says a man, picking up a few bones from the pool of my blood. Some bones are still joined by sinews. "They will make a wonderful soup."

I couldn't stand any more. I felt sick and vomited violently. I smelled foul, and found that the crotch of my pants was wet. Soon I fell into a state of half-consciousness.

"Get up!"

Somebody kicked me, grabbed the rope which bound my hands behind my back, and pulled me up to my feet. Two armed young men escorted me to the commune administration building. I was shoved into an office. The number-two-turned-number-one Red Flag in our commune, Old Chen, was sitting behind a desk. At his side, stood Li Guo-ping's uncle.

"Zhang Le-tian," Old Chen shouted at me. "You must make a clean breast of your reactionary criminal activities."

"I've never once committed a crime," I answered defiantly. Since I was going to die, I didn't bother giving consideration to my manner of speech.

"Confess your crimes or I'll kill you! You cunning spy." Old Chen slapped the desk.

"I tell you, we know what you really are. You are not only a Red Star agent but also a spy in the service of the foreign master! We have human testimony and material evidence."

He picked up something up from beside his chair and put it on the desk. It was nothing else but the typewriter.

I was stunned. Surely, Li Guo-ping had betrayed me. I didn't care what this would cause me since I was about to be killed anyway. What broke my heart was that, in this world, one could trust absolutely no one; one could not believe in anything. Not anything!

My lips twitched, but I couldn't utter a word.

Before I recovered from the shock, Li Guo-ping's uncle leapt on me.

"I know why you are silent," he snapped. "You want to die so that your collaborators can remain at large." Striding towards me, he added slowly and clearly,

"But we will not let you die so soon, so easily. We have already reported you to the county authorities. We'll send you to the county seat. There I bet you'll tell the whole truth."

Now the truth dawned upon me.

Li Guo-ping and his uncle were trying to save my life!

"I'm willing to write down all I know," I said. To write meant that I could get some time to consider.

Old Chen threw a pad of paper and a pen on the desk. Guo-ping's uncle untied my numb hands. They left, posting a guard at the door of the office.

The night was still. A clock in the building struck three. Somewhere outside in the dark, an owl began to hoot.

Facing the blank paper, I could do nothing but scratch the back of my head. Which "master" should I pick? CIA or KGB? Who were my "collaborators"? Anything I wrote could be used against me, and my false incriminations could ruin innocent people.

But on the other hand, I had to write something, or else I would certainly be beaten up before they sent me to the county seat.

Finally, an inspired idea got me out of the dilemma. Chairman Mao taught us,

"Every kind of thinking, without exception, is stamped with the brand of a class."

So every action should certainly have its class and historical root. Why didn't I begin with the popular method of criticizing, "digging deeply the historical root"?

I began with writing from memory a couple of Chairman Mao's quotations as the guideline of my "confession". Next, I exposed my "reactionary historical roots"—the crimes committed by one of my forefathers who had taken part in the war to put down the Taiping Revolution in 1851. In fact, to my knowledge, he was the only member of my clan who ever committed any reactionary crime. I criticized this alleged criminal act of my great-great-grandfather from the angle of class struggle. I based my arguments as much as I could on Mao Tse-tung Thought, making the style as elaborate and wordy as pos-sible.

Even before I was born on the paper, the first light of morning appeared. Soon they took away what I'd written, and loaded me and my "transmitter" aboard a truck, bound for the county seat.

The truck bumped along the dirt road. Thanks to a rain shower before dawn, it wasn't at all dusty. I greedily breathed the fresh moist air, and looked around. Distant mountains were capped with white clouds. In the morning sun, rice shimmered a translucent green; blossoming rape fields were almost luminously yellow.

A moss-tinged stone bridge stretched over a swift brook. A huge banyan tree, aged but still full of vitality, shaded the bridge with an evergreen canopy. Sitting beneath the tree, a young woman, with her breast exposed, was suckling her baby. Her bare feet were dangling into the water. Beside her, was a basket of clothes and a washing club. Steps away, a little boy was stalking something—perhaps a cricket or a butterfly.

What a peaceful scene! The world had never seemed so beautiful to me. Tears welled in my eyes. I almost cried out,

"Oh, please do something to make this world a better place to live! Don't let these people become killers or victims!"

I felt a strong impulse to do something to make a brighter future for them as well. But my hands, numb from being bound, mocked me; my own ominous future loomed in my mind. Very likely, the county authorities would know that my typewriter was not a transmitter; they might send me back to the commune.

What should I do? What could I do?

I was led into an interrogation room.

"Oh no," I groaned in my heart. "I am finished now."

An army officer was typing on the typewriter, using all his fingers, though slowly. He held up his head and measured me with his eyes. Unexpectedly, 1 read sympathy and a faint sadness in his gaze. He was about the same age as me, fairer than most soldiers I'd seen. And his heavy-lidded slant eyes and stalwart body showed that he might be from the north.

The man whb escorted me had left. Now there were only the officer and me in the room.

"Sit down," he said, with a wry smile. "I used to own this same kind of typewriter myself. 1 dreamed of being a diplomat, but I've become a soldier." He grinned bitterly again.

"Tell me, what's this nonsense."

"Please don't send me back," I begged. "Please put me in jail." I told him what had happened to me.

The young officer listened to me silently, while idly playing with a pen in his hands. When I finished, he was still quiet, as if lost in his own thoughts. With a sigh he broke the silence.

"All right," he concluded. "I can put you into jail for a while." He looked into my eyes earnestly.

"I'm terribly sorry. But this is all I can do." He shrugged his shoulders and spread his hands in a gesture of resignation, whispering in English,

"Sorry, but … good luck!"

In the county jail I lived a peaceful life for almost ten months. During this period, the Party Central Committee issued a proclamation, ordering the Red Stars to lay down their weapons. Those who refused to surrender were wiped out by the Red Flags, aided by the People's Liberation Army. When I was set free, not only was the war over, but the "Force 12 Typhoon"—a bloody purge in which countless lives ended in "atypical deaths"—also calmed down.

I returned to the school and no one touched a single hair on my head.

Wei Cheng and Lin Yong-ge were far from being as lucky as I was. On the same day I was sent to the county seat, they were killed at Liao Zhi-gao's funeral. Lin Yong-ge was bound to a pack of dynamite, and blasted to pieces. Wei Cheng was buried alive with Liao's coffin laid upon his body, leaving behind a pregnant wife and two children.

The widow was obliged to pay for the executioners' job; they took away her only hog as a "burial fee".

Without the typewriter, I would have certainly disappeared from the face of the earth that day. So I had to say that hardly before I typed anything on it, the typewriter itself substituted a comma for the final period of my personal history.

Fifteen years later, the government returned to their owners all remaining objects that had been illegally confiscated during the Cultural Revolution. The typewriter was sent back to me. But it was out of order already. I kept it as a souvenir of those days. Every time I looked at it, guilt mixed with fear overwhelmed me. I felt guilty for not writing something with it, but was too fearful. Hundreds of times I told myself I should make the old machine work again, yet I was glad that it didn't work. It was too appalling to imagine what new role it would play in my life.

Finally, however, this typewriter was put to work. In March 1987, my former student, Li Ouo-ping, now a Ph.D. in mechanical engineering, came back to visit me. He had realized his pledge. In 1972, Li escaped to Hong Kong. He managed to do well there, and finally received an education in the United States. Now with his wife, a Chinese Canadian, he returned to China for a visit. He spent two days with me, and fixed the typewriter.

As soon as the old machine was ready, I fell under its spell. Poking with two fingers, and wrestling with almost every word, I wrote this story over six painful months. Frequently I felt that it wasn't me but the typewriter itself which was writing, or that I was guided by the spirits of countless people like Wei Cheng, Lin Yong-ge, even Liao Zhi-gao.

Liao's death hadn't turned out to be heavier than Mount Tai. Less than two years after his death, according to the new policy of the Party, his body was dug out from the site for revolutionary martyrs and reburied among others whose deaths had once been described as "lighter than a feather", but now were simply referred to as "atypical".

Several times, I tried to quit writing, because it was too painful for me. However, I always resumed. I knew I would never have peace with myself until I put the fmal stop to this account.

But when I was putting the final stop on the draft, by an inexplicable typing mistake, it turned out to be a question mark instead of a period.

Does the typewriter itself wonder if this is really the end of the story?

268.147 1. Three Leaves 2. The Greens 3. Where Are Days? 4. Soft, Soft Her Footsteps 5. The Bowl-Shaped Heart 6. Yin Niu Si: Six Poems\fn{by Mei Shaojing (1948-)} Chongqing, China (F) 5

Three snips of tender leaves like three green birds
Proudly stand on the tree trunk.
The trunk sends forth only one green twig,
Where three birds perch.
What lovable little creatures they are!
They're still singing for this felled tree.
Though only three small leaves, they still shout to the world,

Reminding people of the tree’s full glory of spring now ravished.

On this poor, bony land
As fire flares in the black night,
The greens also flare up the thy.
When will the greens
Forever sheathe this yellow earth?
Ah, in those days when even the sky was yellow,
I’ve fancied
A fabulous green sun.

Days are garlic and wild scallions, still sprinkling loose dirt,
Days are newly rolled hemp ropes, still damp with water
*
Days are four thousand nights of deepening stillness,
The sound of water rocking in a wooden bucket on a mule’s back.
Days are the revolving poplar door that squeaks on rainy days,
That keeps turning in my tired dreams, now bright, now blurred.
Day are a thirst-quenching blue plum, a paper-cut silhouette
Of farmers bent with grain under fierce sun on hills’ plains.
Days are thick leafy shades, umbrella-like,
Skidding down my aching arms to burrow underground.
*
Days are water cans storing up sweet and clear thoughts,
Pouring out tears and sweat to choke my throat.

i

Just as I set down the hoe
I heard soft,
Soft footsteps.
“I come to keep you company.”
Through the window hole
Two gentle eyes
Looking and smiling at me.
I was twenty.
She just sixteen.
Why was I smaller than she?
*
Just as I put down my bowl
I heard soft,
Soft footsteps.

“I bring you a present!”
She said.
Something in her hand,
Moving.
A little blue fish
Made of shining silk.
Ah, what clever hands!
“Done with your work,
Through with your meal,
And still want to read! Goodness me!”
She laughed, teasing me.
Then we tussled and played silly.
*
“Wish I could go to school too.”
She drew a long, long sigh.
“But my mother has already Arranged a marriage for me.”
“You aren’t going to obey her?”
“But there’s no man to work the fields at home …”
She’s as meek as a lamb.

ii

While I read my books,
She would thread her cloth shoes
By a small lamp.
“So, get married!
Get yourself a man!”
I screamed at her.
Quiet, quietly she left.
She wanted my snapshots,
One, two, small, large, she wanted all.
Still thought it was too few.
“Don’t we see each other every day?
You’re not leaving the village.
Are you afraid I’ll run away?”
“No one is the same.
Sooner or later you’ll leave,
One day came a picture-taker
She suggested we two
Have our picture taken.
Ah, those pink sweetpeas
Blooming halfway up the hills.
We had just finished cutting the wheat,
Just hoed over the corns when

Her wedding day,
Oh, too quickly,
Arrived!

iii

After meals
I no longer hear
Her soft, soft footsteps.
“Beaten again!
Her man is such A cane!”
Whispered my new companion
Very faintly.
After setting down my hoe
I no longer hear
Her soft, soft footsteps.
“She’s pregnant!
Still going to the fields?”
There are always new reports.
I remember
How she held the awl,
Staring ahead,
“Shout!
Shout!”
She looked so funny.
Ah, why get married?
Why give birth?
Who knows?
Who knows?

iv

Such wails in the village!
This day
I shall never forget.
She was only eighteen.
Because of childbirth
She has died.
So full of life
How could she be dead?
Never to talk.
To laugh again …
On the wall in her house
There still hangs the picture
Of the two of us.

I know behind us.
Those pink sweetpeas
Blooming halfway up the hills.

v

Sky has darkened again,
I hear footsteps,
Soft, softly coming.
“I come to keep you company.”
Two gentle, gentle eyes
Smiling through the window.

Those old bowls before me
Steaming hot
Float fragrance everywhere.

But all I can see
Is the gleaming sweat
On a hot face.
Under the sun of a young spring
Quietly, quietly
The mountain stream
Lets out its warm breath.
I try to change
My bowl-shaped heart
Mould it
And fire it
In the suffering of our race.
Let such a heart,
The bowl-shaped heart
Be filled to the full
With all the words hotly passionate
That still exist in this world.
Then let it send forth
Its own fragrance
From many many kilns to float
Drift after floating drift.

6\fn{One of the names of a Meihu tune, a kind of folk tune popular in the central and western provinces of China such as Shaanxi, Shanxi, Tgansu and Ningxia}

Never have I heard such a Meihu tune, ah,
Such a melancholy melody as Yin Niu Si.
Now I know how shaky is my heart,
Time and again it has stumbled on the frozen river.

Several times he seemed wanting to cross over
But finally decided to leave me far behind.

At least he still walks ahead of me,
After crossing the river there's Shanxi.

Who has anything to say to each other?
There's only the "Silver Button String" echoing sadly from afar.

Who lets him teach me to wrap rags around worn shoes?
Who would let the rags show from his tattered jacket?

There's a piece of loose cotton on the tattered jacket
He ignores my question, "Does this come from the back?"

He only asks me to step on it,
He only asks me to step on it.

I've never heard such a sad Meihu tune.
Where is it playing now, this Yin Mu Si?

191.168 Excerpt from Captive Spirits: Prisoners Of The Cultural Revlution\fn{by Yang Xiguang [Light at Dawn] aka Yang Xiaokai [Little Victory] (1948-2004)} "the caves of Yan'an"; "northeast China", Chana (M) 10

Satisfied that the paperwork is in order, Warden Liu places his pen on the table and looks up, first at me, then at the olive-gray light at the window. Rising, he switches off the lamp and rubs his knuckles.

"Yang Xiguang, let me tell you something. This place is nothing but a giant dye vat. It doesn't matter if you're pure white when you come in; by the time you leave here, you'll be covered with stains."

I do not respond. The interrogation is over. We are halfway down the southern corridor when he pulls me aside nervously, a curious gleam in his eyes.

"See here, this place is packed full of cow-ghosts and serpent-spirits—not what you're used to. Mind they don't lead you astray." Then his face hardens, and without another word, he marches me over to Number Nine and unlocks the door.

Where is this Number Nine? Hours pass, maybe even a day, before the full weight of realization comes home to me—it is February, 1968 and I am at Zuojiatang.

Mechanically, and yet as in a dream I recall the events of the past forty-eight hours. I am sitting on a train from Wuhan to Changsha and can see nothing—my eyes are covered with a towel, my hands handcuffed behind my back. Every couple of minutes the smell of urine floats by, as do the soft voices of a young woman and my two guards. I know they are mocking me, Yang Xiguang, the student who wanted to smash the government machine. \fn{The following statements appears in the Forward to this book: "What had landed Yang in these extraordinary circumstances were his ideas. As a nineteen-year-old Rebel Red Gyuard, he had circulated in early 1968 an essay entitled Whither China? In it, he had proclaimed that the major conflict engulfing China was not between Mao's supporters and enemies, nor between China's proletariat and the formerly wealthy classes. Rather, akin in many ways to the Yugoslav dissident [Milvan] Djilas' notion of a 'new class,' Yang had written in 1968 that the major conflict lay between a "red capitalist class" and the masses of the Chinese people:—'At present over 90 percent of our high-ranking officials have formed into a unique class—the red capitalist class. … It is a decadent class impeding historical progress. Its relationship with the people has changed from that of leaders and followers to rulers and ruled, to exploiters and exploited, from equal, revolutionary camaraderie to oppressors and oppressed. The class interests prerogatives and high income of the red capitalist class is built upon repression and exploitation of the masses of the population.' A not entirely dissimilar view of the polity, though broached in non-radical terms, brought a million people into Tiananmen Square in 1989. But two decades earlier, much as in the tale of the small child and the emperor's clothes, Yang Xiguang's observations had stepped outside the ideological paradigm that people permited themselves to entertain. He was not just expounding heresy—it was heresy of a sort the students of Yang's generation had never imagined could exist."}

I can hear their words but shut them out, thinking of how last month, before I ventured out into the rural areas of Hunan, I had delivered a week's worth of newspapers and clean clothes to the place where my mother had been placed under house arrest. It was the last time I would see her. She had been acting strangely—nervous and distracted—asking again and again about me and my younger sister Yang Hui. I did not know then that these were the actions of a woman who knew she would never see her children again, who had already resolved to hang herself, and yet could not quite let go.

Just weeks ago Kang Sheng,\fn{A Politburo member and Deptuy Head of the Central Cultural Revolution Group from May 16, 1969 throught the Ninth Congress of the Chinese Communist Party, held in 1969} Jiang Qing,\fn{Mao's fourth wife, acting in her capacity as Deputy Head of the Central Cultural Revolution Group} and Zhou Enlai have met in Peking to convene a special session of the Hunan Provincial Preparatory Revolutionary Committee. At the meeting they announced that my essay Whither China? was an ultrarightist, reactionary document! It could not have been written by a high school student—not even by a college student—they declared: it must have been composed by a "black hand" operating behind the scenes. Someone in a high position within the Party, someone like my parents.

At the same meeting Shengwulian, the Rebel umbrella organization to which I belonged, was declared to be a counterrevolutionary organization. Throughout Hunan, and throughout all of China, a massive witch-hunting began in earnest.

The residents of Changsha are sympathetic to Shengwulian; friends had arranged for me to stay low at the homes of the Rebel group Red High School Committee. Days, I remained indoors reading; nights I disguised myself in a leather overcoat, a large fur cap, a surgical mask, and a pair of plain glasses then combed the streets, flashlight in hand, reading the big-character posters. One night I stayed at the home of one of Yang Hui's classmates, where I learned the details of how my sister had gone to collect our mother's body. My mother, it would seem, had been accused of being the "black hand" responsible for writing Whither China?. Before a public gathering, her hands had been dipped in black ink, and she had been "struggled against" as she knelt on the ground. I dared not imagine my mother's appearance in death. I took from my bag the last picture she had given me, her loving smile untouched by house arrest and struggle sessions. Tears filled my eyes.

The voices of the guards interrupt these memories, and I catch the words "famous reactionary." These words sting me. I will not accept such a destiny.

I was born in heady times, in the autumn of 1948, as the Civil War was nearing an end, and the tide was turning in favor of the Communist camp. My parents had just been transferred from the caves of Yan'an to northeast China. The Communists had just won a minor battle in that area, so I was familiarly called Xiaokai, or "little victory." It was only when I began school that my parents addressed me by my formal name, Xiguang, meaning "light at dawn."

My father was a member of the Hunan Provincial Party Committee; my mother, Deputy Head of the Provincial Trade Union organization. I had grown up among the Communist aristocracy and drunk at the well of communism. Up until high school, I was in awe of the revolutionary heroism of the Communist Party which had conquered the Nationalists. The novels and the revolutionary memoirs that all children read were steeped with the dogma of revolutionary violence as a means to overturn unjust regimes.

Though not immediately apparent, political upheavals continued within the Communist Party after 1949. My family's first setback occurred in 1957, for that was the year my brother and uncle, like so many others, were labeled "Rightists."

Then, in 1959 we said goodbye to my father as he retreated to the countryside; he had spoken out against the Great Leap Forward. Three years later the Party reversed its policy. My father's name was completely cleared by Party Central, and our family was reunited. With the new emphasis on knowledge and grades, I was accepted to the competitive Changsha First High School. Like the rest of my family, I was a beneficiary of those relatively "rightist" policies.

But in 1964 politics took command and once again I felt myself being pulled to the left. My parents, especially my mother, tried unsuccessfully to temper my leftist bent. When the Cultural Revolution began several years later, I threw myself into anti-work group activities. The "work groups" were teams sent by Communist authorities, at the direction of President Liu Shaoqi, to regain control of university campuses which had been paralyzed by rebelling students. During that same period both my parents were criticized by the Hunan Provincial Committee. My father was pronounced a "counterrevolutionary revisionist." I was persecuted by the work groups and the original "pure-red" Red Guards looked down on me because of my parents' bad name. It was only natural for me to oppose the “blood line,” the caste system based on “pure” class origins. I joined the Rebel faction of Red Guards composed of students coming from “bad” class origins.

Then, in the autumn of 1966, I became active in the city-wide efforts to rehabilitate the “counterrevolutionary” Rebel workers and began to support Xiang River Storm—the first Rebel, quasi-political party in Hunan to contain, not just students, but also individuals from different professions.

The Conservatives and the military had combined forces during the February Countercurrent to crush most of the Rebel organizations, including Xiang River Storm. During that period I continued to protest against the persecution of the Rebels and was briefly imprisoned by the military. As soon as I was released, I rushed off to the nation’s capital to gather information and speak with the Red Guard groups there; it was in Peking that I first encountered the big-character posters critical of the privileged class of Communist society. I decided to investigate the social origins of the Cultural Revolution, confident that my findings would fit nicely into Marxist-Leninist theory.

My data collection began with an interview of our family nanny, who had surprised us at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution by suddenly joining the Rebel organization for nannies. We had been exploiting her, she announced. She made it clear that the deference she showed my parents had been completely feigned; deep down, she and most of the other Changsha residents hated the Communist cadres and their arrogant ways. Troubled, I recorded my findings, for her hatred for those at the top could not be explained in terms of Mao’s “protracted revolution under the dictatorship of the proletariat” or “the struggle between the two lines.” I continued to pore over the works of Marx.

Then I went into the countryside to carry out a series of interviews. I spoke to the educated youth demanding to return to the cities and to workers who were forming union-like organizations. I spoke with peasants as well, who were surprisingly vocal about their unhappiness with the Communists’ land tax policies.

In Whither China? I recorded my conclusions—that a new privileged class had formed, which was, as Marx put it, “suppressing and exploiting the people.” Nothing short of a violent, Paris Commune-style revolution would remove this class, paving the way for open elections and a democratic state.

China’s top leaders in Peking had assumed that by throwing token support to the Rebels at strategic moments, they could neutralize their political adversaries. They had never dreamed that a Changsha High School student would take the call for revolution seriously enough to attempt to define a defiant, new Rebel vision. To them, my essay appeared as if from nowhere.

A screech of the brakes and the train comes to a halt. I am led off the platform into a vehicle, but in what direction, I cannot be sure. Surely this must be Changsha. I begin to imagine what detention will bring. Images of the lower classes described in Gorky’s Lower Depths and My Universities fill my head. Before the Cultural Revolution my life had lacked for nothing materially, yet to my sixteen-year-old mind, my days had been empty. Now, two years later, a part of me aches to plunge into the “lower depths” and investigate these colorful people. Until the nation’s political chessboard changes, that will be my game plan.

My blindfold is removed, and I find myself in a small, dark room, squinting at a flickering light.

At my first meal the inmates cling to me. One in particular seems very unwilling to leave.

“It’s tough for you newcomers when you first come in. After a while, though, you’ll get used to it—everyone does. Come on, try to eat.” Tall, muscular, and attentive, this man who hangs by my elbow gives me the creeps.

“I really don’t feel like anything.”

“It won’t get any better,” Luo Gang continues gently, sweeping his arm broadly to one side. He flicks his wrist and points to my bowl. “You may be in here a while. I mean it: if you don’t eat something soon, you’ll collapse.”

His words drift past. My thoughts are occupied with the political situation in Peking. How long will it take this time before Shengwulian is rehabilitated? It is February, the beginning of the lunar year. Though I am inwardly moved by his concern, I do not reply.

“Well, then let me help you clean up,” he says, removing the enamel bowl from my hands as he speaks. As I turn away, he lifts his chopsticks and hastily shoves the bowl’s contents into his mouth.

Three days later, I begin to appreciate exactly what I have forfeited. Too late.

One month passes. The pit in my stomach is now a source of constant pain, and my heart races wildly. In June I learn that this man who appropriated my food with such finesse is a professional pickpocket.

Like every child who learned to read during New China's first decade, my mental image of prison was imprinted by the dark dungeons of Red Cliffs and its riveting tales about the Nationalists' wartime political prisons. They were vile places, we knew, where hunger and terror reigned.

Though Zuojiatang Detention Center is a product of socialist construction, it has a certain reputation of its own. Conservative Red Guards bandy the name to intimidate Rebels, "black capitalists," and "reactionaries"; parents, to chasten disobedient sons and daughters. For many years, Zuojiatang [Zuo Family Pond] was nothing but a little plot of land surrounding a pond in the southeastern outskirts of Changsha belonging,. one assumes, to a family named Zuo. It grew in time into a dingy residential area. By the late 1950s, however, the name "Zuojiatang" meant only one thing: the massive and forbidding detention center where I have landed. By now the red-brick buildings have turned purple with age, though the roof tiles remain their original dark red. It is said that the layout of the facility is modeled after Soviet prisons.

Luo Gang is an enigma. It's almost uncanny, the resemblance he bears to the Western actors in King Arthur and the Knights of the Roundtable. His skin is fair, almost translucent; he has large eyes and long, thick eyebrows. And like the Occidentals I have seen in movies, he uses exaggerated gestures, opening his mouth very wide and jutting out his chin when he wishes to show surprise or disdain, or to indicate that something is out of the ordinary. If he is feeling down, he shrugs his shoulders dramatically in resignation, or rolls his eyes up to the ceiling. Such hyperbole is simply not Chinese; it makes one jumpy, and gives the impression that the person is frivolous and doesn't know his place. And yet somehow I find myself befriending this man.

Though at first he won't admit what it is he does for a living, he speaks freely of all sorts of things only a pickpocket could know. Practically every word out of his mouth is "black language;" the filthy argot of the bandit. Half of it I can't even understand: no one at school or in the Provincial Committee compound ever talked like this. Instead of "soldiers," he says "grain-eaters"; to him, they are nothing but big "rice barrels" who sit around, waiting for meals. Paper currency is "big leaves"; grain coupons are "little leaves". There are even special words for the numbers one to ten.

One problem plagues him; he is milao—starved—in every sense of the word. There is no smoking in the haozi. Luo Gang spends his waking hours fantasizing about "chasing dogs," picking up old cigarette butts. He can be sure of netting a cigarette for every question answered at pre-trial interrogation, but these never last very long; one needs a steadier supply. But he's in luck, for a fresh opportunity arises every time he is paraded around the streets for criticism, a common enough occurrence these days. That's when Luo Gang chases down a lot of dogs.

But since matchcs, too, are prohibited, creating a fire is even more problematic than obtaining tobacco. First you pull tiny bits of straw from the mats used as summer bedding, twist them into a thin "braid," pull a tuft of wadding from a quilt, and carefully wrap it around the straw. Then one has to remove a plank from one of the beds, ever so quietly, and rub it back and forth like crazy until the cotton fibers begin to smoke. By blowing gently, it is possible to bring the little ball to flame; if you blow too hard, though, you have to start all over again. The process can take hours. Luo Gang has never been much at playing chess, guessing riddles, or solving brainteasers, but when Number Nine is out of matches, he is the first one we turn to. You have to respect a guy who can make fire.

My sleep is fitful, riddled with dreams. I am betrayed by someone I trust. I am arrested. A driver and two rifle-bearing privates escort me to the Wuhan train station. I sit in the train for hours. When my blindfold is untied, I see a man in a faded green shirt and blue pants. Warden Liu.

"This detention center is run by the Military Control Commission of the Bureau of Public. Security," he announces stiffly. Then I wake up.

When it comes to food, we are all milao. The three daily meals we are given are calculated to keep us just barely alive, so that about an hour before mealtime, everybody gets up and stands in the middle of the haozi, excitedly, as if a great event is about to take place. What we are waiting for is five ounces of rice—a child's portion—and a ladleful of vegetables cooked in water laced with a few drops of oil. The rice has been carefully premeasured, steamed in individual bowls, and stacked up on a wheeled carry; the vegetables are dumped in one large wooden bucket carried about on a shoulder pole.

The turn of the lock and a rush for the door. It is the biggest and the bravest, men like Luo Gang, who end up with the bowls that seem to be just a little bit fuller than the rest. He stares at each ladle of vegetables, wide-eyed, like a water buffalo. Sometimes the portions aren't even close to being equal and there are fights.

Xiao Fuxiang, a machine technician arrested in 1965 as a "class enemy," holds the haozi long-timers' endurance record. After four years in Number Nine, he scarcely looks human. I marvel at the transforming power of hunger. Within six months fat people become unrecognizable. Thin people soon take on the appearance of mummies.

My sexual urges have all but disappeared. As flesh melts away, my wet dreams decrease from once a week to once or twice a month. There are no secrets in Number Nine. Under the tutelage of Xiao Fuxiang, one of the mummies, inmates routinely jump out of bed after their nocturnal adventures, wash themselves, and put on clean clothes. I am much too embarrassed to follow suit. Only gradually am I emboldened by the example of Xiao Fuxiang, who on such occasions never fails to trumpet the glad tidings, disclosing as a matter of course the woman of his dreams on that particular evening.

For large men like Luo Gang, the accumulated effect of hunger is not merely a matter of comfort, but of life and death. He knows it. There is little he can do. Whenever he is allowed to go in the courtyard, "out into the open air,"—a privilege once granted prisoners every month but all but forgotten after the chaos of the Cultural Revolution—he yanks up tiny bunches of weeds to chew on. One day he finds a toad hopping about the courtyard. He skins it the moment he returns, grinning all the while, and before it stops twitching, pops it into his mouth. To get it down, he pats his chest and stomach.

Real meat exists only at our imaginary dinner parties, the spontaneous festive gatherings we hold whenever we get punchy and dizzy. One inmate who is familiar with Changsha's better restaurants begins by reminiscing enthusiastically about the three-delicacy and spicy beef noodles at the Yang Yu Xing. Others think back fondly on feasts of Hunan-style roast duck at Qi Zhen Pavilion, the steaming, meat-filled buns at the Garden of Virtue, or the twenty-odd varieties of rice noodle soup at the Peaceful Haven. As privileged residents of the Provincial Committee compound my family had eaten well, but I had never known the extent of Changsha's wonderful cuisine.

Luo Gang tells me how, on a good day, he and his friends would spend a small fortune on gourmet banquets; it is not surprising that the pickpockets are active participants at. all our imaginary parties. They can relate the definitive method of preparing mouthwatering fare such as tiger-skinned pork shoulder, detailing how to select the best cut of meat and how to sear the skin to an appetizing golden brown; for steamed pork with seasoned rice powder, they share their secret method of slicing the pork belly into wide but thin slices; they explain to us how to prepare pork skin for mock shark fins. The longer we listen, the hungrier we become. These evenings conclude with a solemn pledge: as soon as we get out, the first thing we are going to do is to make a grand tour of the city's restaurants, making sure we sample each and every one of these notable dishes.

Ever since the onset of the Cultural Revolution, it has been forbidden to send care packages. This does not keep inmates from quietly passing the word to their families:

"Put lard in toothpaste tubes, dried shredded pork in the linings of jackets and quilts, glucose in medicine bottles."

If you are connected, you can buy rice. Those prisoners whose relatives are too poor to send clothing, and whose appetites permit, find out quickly that a bowl of rice is the most precious commodity in the haozi. The secret rice trade flourishes.

Luo Gang is supplied by Little Boss, a short man in his early thirties whose family had been important Changsha capitalists with Nationalist ties. In 1949 the Little Boss lost his source of income and some ten years later got involved in the grain coupon "business," brokering grain coupon transactions. These, of course, were quite illegal, and he soon found himself a "guest" at Zuojiatang. His business instinct serves him surprisingly well here, where a bowl of rice can be exchanged for a piece of clothing, or for a two-kuai prison coupon, the mimeographed prison .currency which can in turn be used to acquire toothpaste, paper, and soap. That means a bowl of prison rice is worth the daily wage of a typical worker—ten times more than the price of rice on the outside.

Although demand is high, Little Boss is forced by hunger to limit his sales to one bowl a week. On the appointed day, he stays in bed late, forgoing breakfast, until almost lunchtime. By noon he is so weak he can barely stand. It goes without saying that transactions of this sort violate prison rules, so Luo Gang discusses terms with Little Boss in a corner where nobody can hear them. In less than a month's time Luo Gang has traded in all the clothes but the ones he has on.

He has become almost crazed with hunger, at times laughing bitterly, then suddenly silent. Or he sinks into depression, wailing out endless verses of Night Song, a bandit's dirge that I have never heard before:

Life on this earth is not so great,
We're worse off than roadside grass,
The grass, it dies, but comes back in spring,
People die, and are never seen again.

The door suddenly swings open.

"Xiao Fuxiang, you're wanted for questioning." At the sight of Warden Liu, Xiao quickly jumps from his bunk to the floor and scrambles to pull on his shoes.

"Just what do you think you're singing?" bellows the warden.

"Cadre, sir," Luo Gang replies, rushing to the door, "I'm so hungry I'm ready to hang myself. Whatever I've done, if you're going to sentence me, do it now. Take me out, tie me up, hang me from my wrists, and paddle me fifty times—it's all right with me. Anything would be better than slowly starving to death in here."

The warden knows very well that Luo is one of Zuojiatang's "frozen bean curds"—even when you fry them, the oil and salt never get to them. Smiling weakly, he replies,

"So, you still think you can lead a decadent, revisionist life? Now then, that's exactly why we want to remold your thoughts. We Communists don't ever beat anyone, nor do we ever sentence wantonly or kill—"

"You just keep us hungry and helpless," mutters Luo Gang.

"Straighten up!" The warden's face flushes with anger. "You're out of line."

As it turns out, Warden Liu is not one to talk. Soon after this incident he himself is packed off to a May Seventh cadre school for remolding by individuals who are more radical and more revolutionary than he. His replacement is a military man, a bearded lieutenant in the 47th Army whom we privately refer to as "Whiskers."

By midyear, all the regular Public Security prison staff, the Conservatives who are affiliated with the Public Security Bureau, the Procurate, and the courts, are gone. The first notable change brought about by the Hunan Military Control Commission is the frequency of beatings.

Since the door to the detention center office is usually left open, we always know when Whiskers is laying into someone. Several weeks after his arrival, I climb up onto the front window bunk, where I can just make out the silhouettes of our bearded new warden, wielding a club, and another man, trying to protect his head and glasses with his hands. The glasses look vaguely familiar—they remind me of the ones worn by a Hunan University student leader of Shengwulian's Tertiary Education Storm.

"Zhou Guohui!"

My voice rings throughout the quadrangle. When Zhou looks in my direction, Whiskers beats him harder than ever. Angrily, I cry out again,

"Don't hit him!" Several other inmates watching from their windows began to chant, quoting from Mao,

"Fight with words, not weapons!"

Whiskers begins to walk in the direction of Number Nine and I know I am in for a bad time. Watching quietly as I put on an extra shirt, Luo Gang tries to stuff his cap on my head, but I won't let him.

"All right," he whispers, "but when he hits you, remember to cover your belly and your head with your hands-the other places all have bones to protect them. Whatever you do, don't let them bust up your head and belly."

In a matter of moments we are in the detention center office, where Whiskers loses no time in pummeling my head. I concentrate on cushioning his blows, aware nevertheless that out in the courtyard dozens of inmates are squatting or kneeling on the upper bunks, their angry faces pressed to the bars.

"Don't beat prisoners!"

"Fight with words, not weapons!"

The guards who have been standing by in the courtyard start to hurl stones at any prisoner they catch shouting. As the blows continue to shower down, I can see guards jumping all around. No sooner do they aim at the north wing than the southern haozi start up. Stones and voices fly back and forth, with Luo Gang's voice the loudest of them all, until the guards finally call for reinforcements, and the heavy, iron gate swings open. Mounted machine guns roll in. Soldiers carrying loaded rifles rush through the massive iron gate and spread quickly throughout the courtyard, positioning themselves at the doorway of each of the twenty-four haozi. Only then does Whiskers finally put down his club. The entire incident has lasted about fifteen minutes.

Zhou Guohui and I are subsequently led by two important-looking officers through the corridor, out of the quadrangle, and into a nearby pre-trial interrogation room. They are surprisingly polite.

"If you have an opinion, you can communicate it to me," says one of them, looking at me. "But don't be starting trouble."

"The last couple of weeks the guards have been beating people almost every day. Chairman Mao says to fight with words and not with weapons. Don't these people carry out their work according to the directives of the Chairman?"

"Beating people is not acceptable, it's true," the officer replies. "But creating a disturbance is worse."

It is the summer of 1968. The political situation that seems to be shaping up throughout China is extremely delicate, for the balance of power between the Rebel and Conservative factions has just begun to shift in favor of the Rebels. It's a good time for the members of Shengwulian to push for rehabilitation. The 47th Army can't be sure which way the political tide will drift next: everybody remembers how, just last summer, the radical Rebel group Xiang River Storm was officially cleared in a similar face-off, so the military has adopted a very cautious wait-and-see attitude toward Shengwulian celebrities such as Zhou and myself.

Perhaps that is the reason we are not punished further for our defiant behavior. The beatings subside for a while. And Luo Gang takes a fresh look at "weak scholarly types" like me. He begins to open up.

The chaos of the last couple of years was a pickpocket's dream.

"Didn't Lenin say, 'Revolution is the people's carnival?'" he winks. Luo Gang joined Xiang River Storm and had been on the scene when the Rebels seized the guns. In ordinary times everyday citizens were not permitted to get their hands on weapons, and the pickpockets had a field day. When he was wounded in the 24th High School Incident, the final battle in a series of military confrontations between Changsha Rebels and Conservatives in 1967, he was treated like a war hero. Along with his comrades-in-arms, Luo Gang had a chance to try out some of the .59 millimeter pistols and semi-automatic rifles, and to steal several trucks from the arsenal. He taught himself how to drive. Too bad, he recollects wistfully, he never did figure out how to use high gear.

I seldom hear the word "pickpocket" used within the confines of Number Nine; the preferred term is "Master Pincers." But in the parlance of Luo Gang, what he does is "catching fish." When he returns from being marched around town, he will say things like,

"A lot of fish out there today—too bad my pincers were all cuffed up. Damned if I wasn't just like a fly sitting on a bull's balls—I had to move where they did."

In my heart I know he is treating me particularly well, both because I am a celebrated political underdog and because I am relatively young. Even so, he gets on my nerves. I simply cannot stand the boundless enthusiasm with which he talks about women.

"Take off your dust mask, let me take a look," he chants again and again. "If you haven't married anyone yet, you'll have to marry me!"

The song drives me absolutely crazy. Even less amusing is his tale about how he and a friend became obsessed with the gradually swelling breasts of their female classmates in elementary school. Luo's friend had made him a bet: If Luo could touch one of those "things" without making the girl angry, he would win one kuai.

"It's a deal," Luo said without hesitating.

The next day after school, while they were walking around, they spotted a couple of girls heading in their direction. Luo Gang quickly looked away, he tells me with a smirk, and cocked his head toward his friend as if he were in the midst of a serious conversation. Then, just as the girl closest to him brushed past his shoulder, he turned around, and spat right in the middle of her chest. Losing no time, he pulled out a handkerchief and dabbed furiously at her blouse, apologizing all the time. Spitting in public was not unusual in those days, and the practice was by no means limited to men, so it didn't occur to the girl to be angry. She was even a little embarrassed at all the fuss he was making and kept protesting,

"It's all right; it's really all right."

Luo Gang grins at the memory of his victory: He had, at the age of thirteen, maintained his honor, won a sizeable amount of money, and satisfied his curiosity all at the same time. So vulgar does he seem to me that I actually feel ashamed for him.

"No game on earth is more fun than 'playing women,'" he says.

Graphic descriptions of his various exploits dominate his conversations to such an extent that I begin to suspect the haozi gossip is true, that picking pockets is not the only reason he is in prison. Though I never inquire as to his specific charge, whatever it is, it is bad enough for him to avoid mentioning it. If one is to believe the rumors, he did something in a hospital involving a nurse.

"It was some sort of sex crime," whispers Xiao Fuxiang to me one day.

"How do you know?"

"Last week he came back from pre-trial interrogation pretty shaken. The prosecutor was a woman—Can you imagine?—and I guess she was pretty tough. She even asked if he "got in" and if "liquid" came out! A woman! So he must be in for rape, or something close to it, don't you think?"

Luo Gang's class origin was bad; not "red" enough to go on to high school. With no money and a lot of time on his hands, he had loafed around for a spell, then started to steal. When he first began his apprenticeship with an old pickpocket, Luo approached his targeted victim six times, only to walk away five. The sixth time, he returned with what he was after. Half of the money went to the old man and Luo Gang had spent the rest the same day. After that, he tells me, "catching fish" became his life.

"It must be hard to take a wallet from people who are wide awake without them feeling anything," I ask somewhat self-consciously, knowing that I must sound naïve. "Do you have special tools?"

"'Course we do—razor blades. You hold them between your index and middle fingers, so with a flick of the wrist you can open up a slit for the fish to come out. But most of the time we don't need any tools."

With great excitement, Luo proceeds to describe his life during the early sixties. There had been a girl pickpocket on a train—her fish-catching skill was unerring, and Luo Gang fell for her, head over heels. They wandered around for a couple of months, stealing together by day, sleeping together at night. Then one day when he opened his eyes, she wasn't there.

"The damn whore," he mutters bitterly, "once you came, she didn't even know you were alive."

On the road he often awoke feeling panicked, haunted by the feeling that he was being pursued. One afternoon another pickpocket ran up to him, pushed a watch into his hands, and ran off again. Before Luo Gang had realized what was happening, he was surrounded by an angry mob and beaten until he was almost unconscious.

"When brown mud drops into your pants, it always looks like shit," he grumbles. Recalling the violence of that day and others, Luo surprises me by speaking almost affectionately of the Public Security Bureau.

"You know, whenever I'm caught in the act, I always try to get to the nearest branch as soon as I can," he says earnestly. "Otherwise my hands, my legs—my whole body gets smashed up."

It was the Public Security Bureau who subsequently sent Luo Gang to a home for juvenile delinquents too young to be sentenced, where he stayed until he was assigned to a factory as an apprentice worker. Since the hours were long, "fishing" had to be fit into his spare time. But he was strong and full of life, and quickly became popular with the factory girls, who called him "Spartacus" because he reminded them of Kirk Douglas. Factory life brought men and women into constant contact, and incidents involving "moving hands and feet" were common. During the numerous weekend trips into the suburbs of Changsha, it was inevitable that he would have "romantic" interludes. Yet when he recalls his trips to places like Yelu Mountain or Liuyang River, he makes a point of telling me that what he had enjoyed most was "discussing his beliefs."

"What?" I interrupt. "Did you say beliefs?" I can't possibly imagine what beliefs Luo Gang might have, unless it was that 'there's nothing more fun than playing women.'

"All my girls know I believe in The Vagabond.

"That Indian movie?"

It slowly occurs to me what he means. It's not a bad movie. I saw it in the late fifties when it ran not only in China, but in the Middle East and the Soviet Union. The story of a judge who believed in the "blood line," or the "theory of lineage," Raj Kapoor's Vagabond had everything necessary for mass appeal—a poignant love story, an intricate plot, biting social commentary, spectacular song-and-dance numbers, and, not incidentally, a likable anti-hero named Raj—a pickpocket who lived on the streets of New Delhi.

Convinced that "thieves beget thieves," the movie begins with an Indian judge unjustly convicting Jagga, a man whose father and grandfather were notorious bandits, but who himself is innocent of any crime. Now embittered, Jagga plots to teach the judge a lesson by abducting his pregnant wife and raising the child—the young Raj—to be a robber. The judge is unaware that he has a son, and adopts a girl named Rita, who being as intelligent as she is beautiful, becomes a dedicated attorney. In a strange twist of fate, Raj and Rita meet each other outside the courthouse, then again in her opulent home. They fall in love and Raj proposes, only to be driven away by her father. When Raj is arrested a second time, Rita learns of his real identity, and in an eloquent closing statement reveals to the courtroom Raj's hidden past, whereupon Raj receives a relatively mild sentence of three years.

"I like the ending the best," Luo Gang tells me. "You know, when Rita sees Raj off to labor reform camp. Remember?" I nod with a faint smile.

"She says, 'I'll be waiting for you, Raj.'"

Luo's expression is radiant, as if there were really a beautiful woman standing right next to the bunk. He has forgotten, of course, that there aren't any "labor camps" in India, nor do I remind him.

It is only natural that he identifies with Raj, I reflect. Luo Gang, too, was deprived of an education because he lived in a society that embraced the "class line." But though he recognizes the inequity of all this, he doesn't dwell on his lot. For better or for worse, he is already a pickpocket, and seems to thrive on the defiant lifestyle that he leads.

The Vagabond and its music has reached out to more than just prison inmates—even small children know the melodies and can sing the Chinese lyrics. Rita's Song, a soft, romantic tune, seems to be especially popular among the pickpockets and is often heard in Number Nine. Ever the free spirit, Luo Gang has his own favorite, the title song, Raj's Song, or Vagabond, with its snappy rhythm reminiscent of the pulse of a large, prosperous city and the pickpocket's turbulent life. Rocking his shoulders to the beat, he hisses,

"Damned if I'm not just like a beggar screwing an asshole—it's a poor sort of happiness we're stuck with on this earth."

The muscles on his face twitch.

Labor camps are not new to Luo Gang, and this is his fourth stay in the detention center. He pulls me aside one day and says quietly,

"That guy Liu is 'KGB'; he's always sending snitch reports to the cadres. I think he needs to understand some flavor."

"Flavor," of course, refers to the "flavor of human kindness."

"Him?" I ask, looking over this man in his late fifties who is said to have served as a Nationalist official and is in Zuojiatang on a charge of graft. Although Old Man Liu has always been extremely polite to me, come to think of it, he does seem to act excessively meek when the authoJities are around, and he is downright rude to the pickpockets.

"Sure. He's an historical counterrevolutionary. The Communists always use old guys like that to keep an eye on the practicing counterrevolutionaries. Sure. The same way they use common criminals to keep the counterrevolutionary criminals in line. Haven't you noticed every morning how Old Man Liu is always one of the first ones up? How he always wants to be the one to dump the pot or to bring in the hot water? What, you thought he was a hard worker?"

"Historical counterrevolutionaries" were individuals who had been pronounced guilty of political crimes before 1949—usually individuals associated with the Nationalist regime; "practicing counterrevolutionaries" referred to individuals who committed "counterrevolutionary crimes" after that time.

One or two days later, Luo Gang magically acquires one of Liu's "reports" and shows it to me. On special paper available only to the pre-trial interrogation officers I read the carefully written words:

> Cadre, sir: In Number Nine, Wen Liusheng recited aloud and wrote from memory the feudalist weeds Three Hundred Tang Poems and Zhu Geliang's Great Generals. On June 7th, Luo Gang introduced his pickpocket experiences to another prisoner. On June 11th, in an attack against our new society and socialism, Zhao Dewen said that his present salary could have bought twice as many things before Liberation. Signed, Liu.

One after another, Old Man Liu's fountain pen, ink, and paper all take off without wings. I never see Luo Gang make a move, just Old Man Liu rushing about, muttering and cursing,

"Who took my pen?"

Then it finally hits him, and as the pickpockets later joke, he is "like the blind man who has finished a bowl of sweet dumplings—he knows exactly how many he has eaten." Somebody is trying to get even, of that he is sure—but "like a mute who has swallowed an herbal tonic, he is unable to tell of the bitterness."

Old Man Liu has had ample occasion during his lengthy tenure as an "historical counterrevolutionary" to witness pickpockets gang up and beat "KGBs," or snitches, to death, so he isn't going to pursue the matter. In light of the possibilities, he figures, losing a pen isn't so bad.

In the next nationwide anti-crime campaign that comes along, Old Man Liu is sentenced. Life: a term so heavy that it is clear that the authorities have judged him not only on the matter of misappropriating public funds, but on his "historical" background as well.

"It's just not fair!" he cries out over and over. "This society eats people alive!"

Only then does Luo Gang's resentment toward him dissipate. Old Man Liu moves over to the transit cell.

Not long afterwards Luo Gang, himself, is handed ten years for whatever it is that he has done. At the age when he still needs "growing rice"—men being considered fully "grown" at twenty-five, women at twenty—he is now so thin that he bears no resemblance to the man I first met. His sentence is read aloud to him in one of the pre-trial interrogation rooms, as is the standard practice, and when he shares the news back at the haozi, everybody starts shouting, insisting that it's too severe.

But Luo Gang is beaming with pleasure and relief. He calls a friend in Number Ten, shouting at the top of his lungs,

"Well, it looks like the Public Security organs just got themselves another free piece of good muscle. Hey, hey! I'm off to the labor camp brigade to eat 'growing rice'!"

During an inmate's final weeks, family members are permitted a single visit to Zuojiatang. It is the only time that such a meeting can take place, regardless of how long one is detained. Since the authorities are the only ones who know the actual departure date, most relatives report to the prison soon after sentencing.

Luo Gang waits in vain for the guards to announce that he has a visitor and then leaves quite suddenly, on a blustery, rainy morning in December 1968. From atop my bunk, I try to picture him filing out the main gate with the other prospective laborers, slowly making the thirty-minute walk to the train station, accompanied only by a few guards, who must be cursing the inclement weather. It dawns on me that none of his "Ritas" ever showed up.

There will be no one waiting for Spartacus Luo. …

40.133 The First Day\fn{by Ye Si (1948/49-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (M) 3

The morning light streamed in and shone on a tumbler. Ah Fat glanced at it and saw a wisp of a rainbow gleaming on its surface. He blinked, the rainbow was gone. He narrowed one eye and looked again. There it was: red, orange, yellow, green. . . .

"Hey!" Ah Hung came over and said in a low voice, "The boss is looking at you."

Ah Fat blinked again and rubbed his eyes. But it was no use. He felt himself blushing, even his earlobes burnt. A pair of eyes seemed to be following him everywhere, even much later, when the people at a nearby table started to leave and he hurried over to clean up.

He stacked up a few plates and took them to the kitchen. As soon as he opened the daor, he was greeted with the heat of the kitchen and the smell of fried eggs. He took a deep breath. The smell of fried eggs was really good! He went into the courtyard, and, as instructed, put the plates into a red plastic bucket. The white plates with the yellow streaks of egg yolk on them sank at once into the grayish soapy water.

When he came out again, he saw a cup of tea standing on the counter. The man they called Uncle Ah Kuen was standing there idly. Ah Fat checked the order, and took the cup of tea to table number seven. On his way, he stole a glance at the boss. Ah, he wasn't looking at him anymore. The boss was now standing by the door and concentrating on frying hamburger steaks.

Ah Fat looked at the tumbler again. It was now empty, with a deep brown ring of tea dregs at the bottom. Tea stains marked the spot on the table where the glass had stood. The patron at that table was now reading a newspaper. Others had finished their breakfast and were leaving one after another. The woman in a green dress at the next table also left.

"Seven dollars," Uncle Ah Kuen called out lazily to the cashier. Ah Hung turned round and said to Ah Fat,

"That woman is mad!" Ah Fat would not believe him.

"This is your first day at work. There are many more things you have no idea of!" Ah Hung said. "She comes every morning, and sits there mumbling to herself."

"She looked all right just now, didn't she?"

"It's just that you didn't notice," Ah Hung replied.

The man who was reading the newspaper had put it down and was picking his teeth with care. They went past his table. The floor around his chair was strewn with toothpicks. Ah Hung walked straight on, without so much as a look at them. Ah Fat couldn't bear the sight and swept the toothpicks under the chair with his foot.

"What a mess! That man is such a pain!" he grumbled inwardly. Uncle Ah Kuen was telling Ah Hung about the greyhound racing the previous week, keeping Ah Hung from his work,

"It just wasn't possible! The fourth race. Who'd have thought—" Miss Wong, the cashier, chipped in,
"Who'd have thought that you, too, would lose!" Uncle Ah Kuen snorted in annoyance and said,
"Who said I lost? I just didn't win." Miss Wong burst out laughing. Ah Hung turned to Ah Fat and asked,
"You like greyhound racing?"
Ah Fat shook his head. Uncle Ah Kuen cast a sidelong glance at him and said,
"I guess not. A good lad, eh?" Ah Fat blushed and defended himself,
"No, it's not that …"
But Uncle Ah Kuen ignored him and turned to greet the boss's wife, who had just arrived. This was the first time Ah Fat had met her. She was standing by the door where the boss was frying hamburger steaks. The hamburger steaks were gleaming with oil, and the sausages were slowly turning in the oven. They looked delicious. She was chatting in a soft voice with the boss. It looked like she was laughing too. Ah Fat thought she seemed a kind and warm person. Miss Wong asked Uncle Ah Kuen,
"Are you going to watch the military tattoo tonight?"
"What military tattoo?"
"It's the programme for the first day of the Hong Kong Festival. It was reported on TV. It's at the Hong Kong Stadium." They went on talking about the military tattoo.
"Lunch is ready!" Ah Hung said as he came in from the kitchen. He told Ah Fat,
"Hurry up and eat. You'll have a busy time at noon." Ah Hung sat down at the table and said,
"Great! Soup with pig's bones!" He rested his legs on the chair opposite him and let out a deep breath. Ah Fat tried to do the same, but his legs were too short and couldn't reach the chair opposite him. Still, he let out a deep breath.

The place began to get really busy from about half past twelve midday. People arrived in droves. First came groups of women from the factories. Then office workers from nearby buildings. And then mechanics in blue overalls. As soon as one stood up to leave, another took the seat. Ah Fat dashed about, feeling a little overcome by the heat. His hair could have done with a wash, and the smell of his sweat-mixed with the faint odor of his unknown predecessor's white shirt that he was wearing was making his head spin. There was noise everywhere. He came out of the kitchen carrying a dish of beef curry with rice and a bowl of noodles with roast duck leg, put them down on the tables of those who had ordered them, then went to collect the coffee cups and sandwich dishes. He saw someone going up to the cashier, and so he shouted,
"Three fifty!" Then he showed someone who had just entered to this or that seat, brought the ketchup or salt to a table over at the other side, took the empty dishes into the kitchen and came out again to clear another table, wiping away with a piece of cloth the bones, stains, and crumpled paper napkins... .
Ah Fat was melting under the heat. He unbuttoned his shirt, just as Ah Hung had done. And he watched with admiration as Ah Hung picked up a whole stack of plates, with three or four tea cups on top, and teaspoons as well as forks and knives, and strode off. That was neat! Unfortunately, Ah Hung didn't manage to carry this feat through. The smallest plate at the top fell and smashed to the floor. The boss happened to be around and he flew into a temper. Ah Fat saw that the plate was just a small one, and yet the boss got really angry.
"You people do nothing but break the dishes! You people do nothing but eat." He kept saying, "You people", "You people are like this:".
Ah Fat felt that he, too, was being scolded even though he hadn't done anything wrong. At this, a wave of grievance surged up in him.

In the afternoon, the patch of sunlight before the door slowly faded. Ah Hung, who was leaning against the cashier's counter, yawned; Uncle Ah Kuen yawned too. Ah Fat, like someone infected with the disease, also yawned.
Miss Wong at the cashier's seat burst out giggling. The boss, who was sitting at one side reading the newspaper, looked up and glared at them, then buried his head in the paper again. He picked up a red pen and started marking down his choices for the grayhound racing. Uncle Ah Kuen asked,
"Any that take your fancy?"
The boss thought for a while, then handed over the newspaper. Ah Fat happened to be standing there, so he had to take the paper from the boss and pass it to Uncle Ah Kuen. Later, Ah Fat saw that his hand was stained with red ink and the dark print of the paper. He was about to rub off the marks with another hand when Ah Hung nudged him and said,

"Here comes the lorry with the soft-drinks!"

Ah Fat didn't know what he should do, so he just followed Ah Hung's example. Ah Hung went to the back of the restaurant, so he followed. Ah Hung lifted up a crate of soft-drinks bottles, so he too, lifted one up. He saw a few dozen soft-drinks bottles on the floor. They were of different shapes; some clean, some dirty. He liked those that were clean and rounded in the middle. He picked them out and put them all into the same crate. But Ah Hung snapped at him,

"Don't dilly dally! There's no time!"

Then Ah Hung snatched up a handful of bottles and stuck them all into a crate. No more fussing around sorting them out.

Ah Fat lifted up a crate, carried it out, loaded it onto the lorry, then took down another crate of soft drinks from the lorry and carried it inside. This new crate was much heavier. Ah Fat was huffing and puffing by the time he set it down where the old crate had been. When the job was finally done, Ah Hung sat down to recover his breath, hanging his head. Ah Fat noticed that he looked quite pale, and was rubbing his eyes with his fingers. Ah Fat asked,

"Are you all right?"

Ah Hung shook his head, annoyed, and did not reply. Ah Fat felt a little tired too. He went back into the shop. Someone came in and the boss glanced at Ah Fat. He had to go at once to take the order.

"Tea with milk. Buttered toast."

Ah Fat went to place the order. All this time, Uncle Ah Kuen was standing beside the customer, absorbed in studying the tips in the newspaper. Uncle Ah Kuen now sighed and said,

"It's going to be tricky this week!"

Someone else came in. Uncle Ah Kuen still did not move. Again, Ah Fat had to go and take the order.

After a while, someone called him from behind. It was Ah Hung. He went over; Ah Hung indicated with his finger a plate of toast behind a pillar. Ah Fat was quite hungry, and helped himself to a piece. He had taken a few bites when a thought occurred to him, so he leant his head out from behind the pillar—the boss was still buried deep in the newspaper and didn't see them. But Ah Fat remembered what had happened that morning and what the boss had said:

"You people are all the same!"

The boss was right. He felt as if something had got stuck in his throat, and he couldn't swallow anything. He was still chewing, but only mechanically, and the taste was gone. Ah Hung nudged him again, and pointed at the remaining piece of toast on the plate. He shook his head, and said he was full.

Ah Fat leant against the pillar, and straightened out his white shirt. It belonged to someone else and was too loose, it didn't fit him. Over on the other side, someone came in. Ah Fat was about to go over when he stopped. He had made a mistake, it was the boss's wife returning. She sat down opposite to the boss and they began talking in low voices, as if discussing something important. Ah Fat looked at them, then turned to study the red and yellow menus pasted on the wall. A fly circled slowly over a table, he followed it with his eyes. It flew inside a glass cabinet full of tumblers through a narrow opening between the glass doors; it dashed about inside the cabinet, banging against the stained surfaces of the glasses, swooping and swishing about in the narrow space looking for a way out, but was hopelessly trapped. A shrill voice broke the silence.

"You think I don't know? You think I don't know?"

It was the voice of the boss's wife. Everyone turned and looked at her. She went on,

"You make me work my fingers to the bones for you. And you use the money to buy her a watch!"

Her face was red, her thick lips opening and closing, spitting out the words. The boss kept his voice low. He seemed to be pacifying her.

"Why shouldn't I talk about it?:" She went on in a loud voice,

"I tell you. I know how to use eyeliner too, and I can put on a miniskirt and a pair of platform shoes!"

Her voice, a little hoarse now, sounded as if it was choked with tears. Ah Fat never imagined they would be like this. Ah Fat didn;t know what to do and just stared blankly at those around him. Miss Wong was looking down and adding up the bills, pretending to be unaware of everything. Uncle Ah Kuen was hiding behind his newspaper, but Ah Fat could see from one side the look of derision on his face. Ah Hung was leaning against the pillar behind him, his head lowered; he seemed exhausted, completely oblivious to what was happening.

A customer stood up to leave. Ah Fat hurried over and gave him his bill. Then he took the dishes to the kitchen. He nearly stumbled over a broom. Only then did he realize that the ground along the edge of the ditch was littered with leftover food, bits of fishbones and waste paper, empty lunch boxes, ice-cream paper cups, and a few iron wires. Before he had not noticed these things.

When he came out again, the boss's wife had gone. The boss looked a bit gloomy. Uncle Ah Kuen had put down his newspaper and was setting the tables for the evening. Ah Fat was nursing his elbows. It had been a very busy evening and his hands were quite sore. Perhaps that was because it was his first day at work, he thought. All things considered, he hadn't done too badly.

Just now when Ah Hung was taking some dishes into the kitchen, he nearly dropped another glass on to the floor again, Ah Fat didn;'t know whether it was because Ah Hung's hands were shaking or what. Ah Fat began to feel a little worried about Ah Hung; he wondered why there was always this tired look on Ah Hung's face. Right now, Ah Hung was leaning against the seat behind him.

But soon, Ah Fat's mind drifted to other things. He looked up at the clock and thought—just another half an hour and he could get off work! He could step out of the door and go home! Home! The boss had left, Ah Fat had no idea when. Miss Wong was sitting at the cashier's seat chatting with Uncle Ah Kuen about how exciting the military tattoo this evening was going to be, how spectacular. When she finished, Uncle Ah Kuen began to brag about how good he was at gambling! He even urged Miss Wong to bet a few dollars and try her luck. Once they started, the two really went on and on, non-stop.

The people at a table behind him had left. Ah Hung was not there, so Ah Fat went and cleaned up. When he pushed open the door to go into the kitchen, he saw that it was dark in the courtyard. He put the plates and cups into the bucket, and stood watching as the white plates and cups sank into the grayish black soap water. There was a gust of wind and he could feel a chill in the air.

He went into the lavatory, and pushed open the door of a cubicle. Somebody was there—he hadn't locked the door. The man inside pushed the door shut. But Ah Fat caught a glimpse of the man.

It was Ah Hung. He was inside, as if puffing on something! Ah Fat caught a whiff of a sharp, strange odour. Ah Fat staggered out, and went back into the shop. Uncle Ah Kuen and Miss Wong were still chattering about gambling. Ah Fat found his heart pounding, about to jump out of his mouth. He had stumbled upon a secret, had caught sight of something he had no business knowing. He felt confused, he wasn't sure whether it was what he thought it was. He remembered that pallid face of Ah Hung, remembered the way Ah Hung seemed to be puffing at something, and that sharp, strange odur! These images were firmly inaprinted on his mind, indelible!

He went all the way to the front door before he stopped, as if trying to get as far away as possible from those ugly, haunting images. His heart was still racing. Beside the door, he saiw only a few pieces of unsold hamburger steaks on the black iron plate; they looked dry and shrivelled now.

Miss Wong and Uncle Ah Kuen were still chattering. Ah Fat didn't hear a single word they were saying. Not until Uncle Ah Kuen tapped him on the shoulder did Ah Fat realize that they were asking him sonaething.

"What?" he looked up.

"I was asking you," Miss Wong said, "how do you feel about your first day at work?"

"Nothing special," Ah Fat shook his head and forced a smile. He stood there against the gradually darkening sky, smiling as if in a trance, as if in fear.

39.129 Looking For Fun\fn{by Chen Jiangong (1949-   )} Beihei, Guangxi Province, China (M) 22

"Zhao-le"—that's a Peking expression meaning "to look for fun." It also happens to be Pekingers' favorite pastime. They're fond of it, they're good at it, and this fun is not so hard to find. Keeping a pet nightingale is a kind of fun. So is flying a kite. So is nursing a bowl of wine over a clove of garlic. Even when they talk about death, for instance, Pekingers don't say, "So-and-so died," they like to say, "he's gone to hear the crickets chirp"—as though they could find some fun even in that.

Next to the Temple of Heaven is an area called Heaven's Bridge. In the old days it was a lively fairground where the common folk went to have themselves some fun. Performers had nicknames like The Eight Oddballs, with acts to match: people like Cloud Flier with his comedy routines, and Golden Choppers with his scenic pictures and popular ditties.

And Soldier Huang. The story went that this fellow had fought under Marshal Chang, who was trying to restore the overthrown Manchu monarchy.\fn{The last of whose rulers abdicated in 1912.} When the restoration movement fell apart Soldier Huang became just another down-and-out warrior-except he found a way to keep up the good fight. Every day he would show up at Heaven’s Bridge, pick a spot, then launch into one of his “harangues.” From ancient emperors to modern rulers, from the high and mighty to the hoi polloi—no one escaped his acid tongue. And all this he did in incomparable style: phrases rhyming, voice ringing, mouth foaming, fingers jabbing. Six deep and a traffic stopper, the crowd around him would lap it all up with cheers and applause for every other word. Needless to say Soldier Huang got a big kick out of all this and would strut around like a cock of the walk. Even his listeners would feel as if they had gone from rags to riches overnight and had the whole world at their feet. Standing up at Heaven’s Bridge to “harangue” or to take in the “harangues”—that was one way of having “fun.”

Ever since four theater companies from the province of Anhui came to the capital and took it by storm—that would have been about two hundred years ago now—their style of performance has developed into what is known as Peking opera, so popular it's a rare Pekinger who can't sing a few bars at least. Even pedicab drivers and street vendors would often park their wares by the roadside and toss off a song or two—especially pedicab drivers and street vendors and all those stuck at the bottom of the heap, who had little hope of getting out from under, let alone becoming a big shot and going down in history. Their only thrill came when they sang a few arias and made believe they had turned into the heroes and legendary figures of their favorite operas. Even prisoners on their way to face the firing squad would often break into song, There they were, clearly branded with their crimes, all trussed up and piled onto a donkey cart, soon to depart forever for yonder banks of the Yellow Springs—and they would still manage to let loose with a couple of songs, to the cheers and ovation of bystanders. To sing at a time like this and to listen to this singing—that was another kind of “fun.”

Face has always meant a lot to Pekingers, so it should come as no surprise that “emptying your pockets to buy face” was also a kind of “fun.” You say you haven’t got a penny to your name? Not to worry. What you would do is hang around in one of those little bars where you sat on a plank right across the top of the wine barrels. Don’t think that just because the customers were mere porters and peddlers and pedicab drivers that they wouldn’t know how to do things in style. Let them sit around the wine barrels and a couple of shots of rotgut later the boys would put on quite a show. This one would tell you how he once killed six men with one blow, that one would go on about the time he singlehandedly took an enemy fortress. If you were all strangers who had just met, so much the better; the tales would be even taller since you were all in the dark about each other. Anyhow by this time everyone would be pretty well plastered and the sky was the limit. You might tell someone you’ve been to the moon and he would answer, “Hear! hear!” Later, after you’d eaten and drunk your fill, you would get to your feet with a flourish and call for the tab. Even if you didn’t own a red cent you would act like Mr. Moneybags himself. When the waiter came back with the bill you’d wave your hand airily and say: “Charge it!” Before the words were quite out of your mouth you would already have made your grand exit. Wasn’t this a kind of “fun” too?

Well, all that was once upon a time. Things have changed, Pekingers are much better off now. But not everyone is living happily ever after, so “looking for fun” continues to be a popular pastime. Take those guys on the street who have deliberately stuck a foreign label on their dark glasses or their denim pants—that’s their way of having some “fun” too, only they prefer to be “seen and not heard.” Then there’s this young fellow I know who believes in just the opposite, who likes nothing better than to strut down the street all day with his radio-cassette player blasting away, loud enough to wake the dead. If you asked him why, he’d say:

“Without this thing, nobody would even give me a cross-eyed look!”

You might call this a kind of “fun” too.

Anyway, old or new, these antics all seem kind of ludicrous to sophisticated folks. And in a way they’re right. You say you’re just a seamstress darning raggedy clothes for folks as poor as you? Well, that’s your lot in life. You’re never going to turn into Wang Bao-chuan the Chancelor’s daughter no matter how many times you sing her song. You’re a pedicab driver? Then you should know your place. Maybe it’s true that you once had the famous opera star Yang Xiaolou as a customer. Maybe it’s even true that you got ticked off at him and chucked him into a ditch. Sure you fixed him. He kept right on being famous opera star Yang Xiaolou, whose funeral was attended by sixty-four pallbearers and all due pomp and circumstance, while you’re still a pedicab driver, lucky to have two people carry your coffin like a crate of cabbages to your final resting place! And as for those foreign labels on the sunshades, you can stick them on your forehead if you like, you’d still be a ragpicker’s son who’ll never set foot abroad. Life is a dud and you want to have some fun to even the score? Stuff and nonsense! Maybe that’s why people who look for fun so often end up as other people’s laughing-stock.

On the other hand, what’s so ludicrous about this? Life may be a dud, but if you can’t even have some fun then what’s the point of carrying on? According to the Austrian psychiatrist Adler,\fn{Alfred Adler (1870-1937), Austrian psychologist and psychiatrist.} it was the twin curses of psoriasis and his small size that drove Napoleon to conquer the world, to become emperor of all he surveyed. The common folk of Peiking are not quite so ambitious. All they want is to get together with their buddies and shoot the breeze or sing a few songs to drive away dull care. Is that so much to ask?

So it seems that what goes on at the Bean Street Block Office Cultural Post (just a little ways west of Winch Handle Alley), where every evening a bunch of oldtimers get together to ham it up (occasionally joined by some younger folks or old ladies who would show up to watch), now acting out a few parts from the opera The Ferry at Xiaoyao, now singing a few arias from Attack on Dengzhou, now spinning some yarns when they run out of breath, this one claiming he studied under the famous singer Gao Qingkui who had shot to stardom after appearing in The Ferry at Xiaoyao, that one saying he trained with Ma Lian-liang, celebrated for his performance of Attack on Dengzhou … so what is going on here is a practice not only sprung from deep cultural roots but firmly based modern psychoanalytic theory as well, it seems.

The Bean Street Block Office takes care of the dozen-odd alleys in the neighborhood, including Winch Handle Alley. Not much else goes on at its cultural post besides these amateur songfests. The “concert hall” used to be a warehouse, so you can imagine how simple and crude everything is: not even a ceiling, only rafters sticking out overhead like so many ribs; the cement floor pock-marked with bumps and hollows; performers and audience alike sitting on benches arranged in circles that push all the way up against the walls.

In the middle of the room is a clearance about the size of your palm, and part of that is taken up by a furnace, leaving room for two or three people at the most. You’re all right if you sing standing still, maybe you can even strike a few poses. If two of you wanted to do that you would start bumping into each other. If you want to ham it up you’d better watch out for the furnace. It’s a good thing that most of the people who’ve come to enjoy themselves are oldsters who don’t have much left anyway in the way of posture and looks. That’s why there’s never been anything like a full dress performance here. At most they do a duet on the “stage;” anything more than that and some of the parts would have to be sung from the benches. But don’t let appearances fool you: if you sat yourself down, closed your eyes and listened carefully, you’d hear singing that’s not only tuneful but soulful as well—nothing fancy, of course, but quite respectable all the same.

Sure the oldtimers like to tell a tall story or two, but their tales usually have a few strands of truth in them. Take the one about having trained with Ma Lian-liang: They probably did spend some time together as novices, only Ma made it to the top while this fellow lost his voice and ended up selling tea on the streets. But that’s another story. And that one about having studied under Gao Qingkui, that’s probably true too, only the guy forgot to tell you how he became addicted to opium later and ruined his career.

But never mind. Most of them are at least veteran opera buffs, well versed in the matters of the opera world. One listen and they’d know which school\fn{The variety of Chinese opera known as Peking Opera developed during the 19th century as a synthesis of various provincial forms; but the first fully deveoped form of this art occurred during the Yuan Dynasty (1279-1368).} it was, whose style of singing. Maybe you’ve never eaten pork, but still you know how a pig runs, don’t you? So don’t underestimate these old codgers. See that one over there, all bundled up in a padded overcoat, hands tucked in his sleeves and peering around like a numbskull? But when he sings, ah! what a voice—rich and clear, natural and graceful, exactly in the style of the immortal Mei Lan-fang! And look at this one over here: white haired, wrinkled, bent almost double, nothing at all impressive about him—until he opens his mouth, and out comes a voice so velvety-smooth, so effortlessly beautiful, straight from the school of the great Yang Bao-sen. There are actually some older opera buffs who find the style of the young singers today not up to snuff, who come all the way out here just to satisfy their craving for the real thing—like it or not, the customer is always right.

So it stands to reason that it would take someone pretty special to handle these fans and fanciers of Beijing opera, someone who has sung professionally with a company, say, or at least appeared in a fair number of amateur performances. Otherwise how can you hold their attention, let alone win their respect? But that’s hardly the case at the Bean Street Cultural Post: The commander-in-chief of this band of hearties is, believe it or not, a seventy-plus ex-coolie by the name of Li Zhong-xiang!

Old Man Li lives at 10 Winch Handle Alley. He has a square head, a broad face, and a deep, booming voice. When he walks you can tell right away that there goes someone who used to work as a coffin carrier: small even steps, chest and stomach thrust out, hips tucked in, toes turned slightly outward. His eyes may droop at the corners and he may be getting along in years, but his complexion is always ruddy—as a result of his tippling, that’s true—and he is still as cocky as a young whippersnapper. Actually, among the group of regulars there are many who can sing and act much better than Li. Some had gone through formal training, some had studied under famous coaches, there are even those who still appear professionally with various companies.

As for Li, at different times he had worked as a coffin carrier, a pedicab driver, a waiter, plus quite a few other jobs, but none that had anything to do with opera. Before retirement he did work as a doorman at a theater, but that was a theater for plays. Still, from the way he's always going on about "Chang-hua this" and "Chang-hua that,"”you'd think he and Xiao Chang-hua—athe opera star so famous for his clown roles—were at least bosom buddies if not blood brothers. In fact he and Xiao Changhua had had no more than a "wonton relationship."

Back then he was a waiter in a snack shop and so poor he couldn't even afford the few pennies for a ticket, but his craving for opera kept gnawing at his insides. So he would pack an order of wontons in a container, march up to the door of the theater and barge right in.

"Hey, where do you think you're going?"

"Delivering wontons to the star."

The guards actually fell for that line! After the first couple of times they didn't even bother to stop him anymore, figuring that whenever Maestro Xiao performed he had to have his order of wontons from this particular shop. Truth to tell, none of the wontons ever saw the insides of Xiao Chang-hua's stomach. As soon as waiter Li got inside the theater he'd hunker down in a corner somewhere and enjoy the show and the wontons at the same time. Using this trick he got to hear a good many performances by Maestro Xiao, even some by Mei Lan-fang. Well, on a diet like this even an idiot could learn to sing a few snatches after a while, and today our friend Li can still do such a perfect imitation of Mr. Xiao's comic accents that he would always bring down the house. Whereupon he would say, with an air of vindication:

"You know, if I hadn't been so poor back then that I couldn't even afford the props to get started, I could've turned 'pro.' I could have been a star, just like Chang-hua!"

Of course, anyone who knew the least bit about opera could tell that Li Zhong-xiang was light years away from becoming a star like Xiao Chang-hua. But to these diehard fans, Li's passion for Peking opera made him a man after their own hearts. So they went along with his conceits and good-naturedly called him "The New Chang-hua,"even bestowing on him the title of "Chief Coach" that Mr. Xiao had held in his company's school. Li was always one to take charge anyway, with or without a title, so he was only too happy to assume "officially" the job of overseeing the activities of the cultural post.

Older residents in the Bean Street neighborhood, especially those living along Winch Handle Alley, have come to know Li inside out over the years. They remember how, back when he was just a young fellow working as a coffin carrier, he would get up at the crack of dawn, slip into his green uniform, put on his felt hat with its plume of chicken feathers, and sit on the bench outside the Eternal Peace Funeral Parlor, chatting with passersby while he waited for his assignments. Then he worked as a waiter in the Pot O' Plenty Wonton Shop, but less than a year later he got fired for always sneaking out with an order of wontons to see his "freebie"shows. After that he was reduced to hanging around the little teahouse where people who needed a day laborer would come and give him an odd job or two. Still later, he moved to 10 Winch Handle Alley and became even more of a fixture in the neighborhood.

But what the old folks remember best was the time back in the spring of '35 when the usually down-at-the-heels Li suddenly "made it." Well, maybe to say he had "made it" was stretching it a little, but to his belt-tightening and penny-pinching neighbors it sure looked that way. What they saw was a Li who no longer went hungry two meals out of three and whose clothes had fewer patches on them.

According to Li Zhong-xiang himself, it all began when he met a Mr. Jiang at the little teahouse, who would show up every other day or so, grab a hold of Li and spend a few hours just chewing the fat with him. Afterward Mr. Jiang would slip him the equivalent of a day's wages. His neighbors on Winch Handle Alley were all green with envy: What's so hard about smoking some fine cigarettes and sipping choice tea—for free, you understand—meanwhile rattling away about anything and everything under the sun? At the end of it you'd get a day's wages to boot. Talk about your cushy job!

Everyone told Li he had met his lucky star, a bigshot, that from then on he would have it made. Li himself didn't think so, because one day he accidentally discovered that the lining of Mr. Jiang's coat was patched together from remnants, just like his own. He would mention his puzzlement to anyone who would listen:

"What a strange fellow, this Mr. Jiang—he sure doesn't have money to burn, so why is he throwing it away on just having someone to shoot the breeze with?"

It was true that Mr. Jiang was no bigwig, and Li Zhong-xiang never made his fortune either. When the Marco Polo Bridge Incident\fn{A note reads: Incident between Chinese and Japanese soldiers on July 7, 1937, at the Marco Polo Bridge on the outskirts of Beijing, marking the beginning of the war between China and Japan.} came to pass Mr. Jiang dropped from sight. As for Li, he continued to hang around the teahouse waiting for odd jobs: fixing up a shop front here, helping to bury a dead child there. His teahouse "encounter" gradually slipped from people's minds.

But after Liberation, Mr. Jiang turned out to be an honest-to-goodness bigshot. By then Li Zhong-xiang had become a pedicab driver. One rainy day he was waiting for customers in front of a theater. No one seemed to want a cab, so he parked underneath the marquee to get out of the rain. Just as he was beginning to get restless, he overheard some theatergoers talking about this show that was all about a funeral parlor. That caught his ear. He thought to himself, it's time to get up-to-date and try one of these new-fangled plays, he had nothing better to do anyhow. So he bought a ticket and went inside. Not halfway through the first act and you could have knocked him down with a feather: wasn't all this exactly like the stories he used to tell Mr. Jiang? When he asked around he discovered the playwright was none other than Mr. Jiang Tieya himself, who was now also the head of the theater company. After the show Li Zhong-xiang got his pedicab and rushed backstage. Sure enough, Mr. Jiang remembered him and welcomed him with fine cigarettes and choice tea, just like in the old days. Li said:

"Mr. Jiang, I don't want to push pedals anymore. You're the boss around here, aren't you? Can't I come work for you?" Mr. Jiang asked:

"What can you do?"

"I've picked up a few tricks from Chang-hua, and I don't get stagefright either," Li answered. Mr. Jiang laughed:

"That's Peking opera. Here we do plays." But Li persisted:

"I don't care what kind of show it is, I've taken a liking to your theater anyhow, because you speak up for us common folks. Just let me work as a janitor or something."

And that's how Li became the doorman for this prestigious theater. The news caused a sensation on Winch Handle Alley. Those of his neighbors who had seen him in front of the theater all agreed, this time Li had really "made it."

Just look at him on opening nights, all spiffed up in his spanking new tunic suit while he bustled about greeting everyone, shaking hands with those who arrived in limousines and inviting them in. He was quite an impressive sight!

Ah, but like they say, "Don't pick up the kettle that's not whistling"—in other words, let's not bring up other people's sore points. Much as Li Zhong-xiang likes to run on at the mouth, to show off, have you ever heard him talk about what really happened at the theater? True, he had bought himself a nice new suit with nary a wrinkle in it, and on opening nights he would carefully put it on, then hurry to the theater, where he would stand at the entrance eagerly greeting everyone, shaking hands with those who pulled up in limousines, showing them in—

"So glad you came!"

"Do let us know what you think!"

"This way, please!"—so that quite a few people actually mistook him for the company director or the playwright. Yes, all of that was true. But what's the big deal? He figured that he got this job thanks to Mr. Jiang and it was the least he could do to put his best foot forward for his boss. So, as with everything else he really enjoyed, he would bustle about on his job, full of enthusiasm and swagger.

But soon he noticed something wrong. People in the company began to look at him in a funny way, the youngsters began pulling his leg and calling him "Director Li" or even "President Li." He didn't really mind any of that, but then even Mr. Jiang seemed to find him standing in the light. On opening nights, when he would rush excitedly to the theater in his natty new suit, all set to receive the crowds, Mr. Jiang would always find some excuse to send him away from the entrance: Would he move the flowers over there please, and see that the VIP lounge was properly set up, then … and so on, back and forth.

Li finally got the picture: To stand at the door in fancy clothes, shaking hands and making small talk—that was only for high society, not for the likes of him! But he was also a little hurt: just because he had been standing in the wrong place, was that any reason for them to give him such dirty looks and to snap at him? Why didn't people ever try to put themselves in others' shoes? He loved the theater, he was so proud of it. Whenever he recalled that he was one of its members he would hold his head high. If I was standing in the wrong place couldn't you have come right out and said so? Others may not understand me, but at least you, Mr. Jiang, you should know me better than this!

Know you how? You can't be forever wearing your heart on your sleeve, can you? And even if you did, and others got to know you, so what?!

Li was over forty when he finally got married. Less than two years later his wife died while giving birth to their son Dezhi. Years passed but he did not remarry, though to tell the truth he had his share of sexual yearnings like everyone else—especially when you remember that he could feast his eyes on pretty young actresses all day long at work. One day, while he was going about his job, he happened to hear the splashing of water mingled with women's voices laughing and chatting. The sounds came from the women's locker room upstairs, where the actresses were showering and changing after a performance. Even Li himself didn't quite understand what came over him then: he came to a stop, turned his face upward and stared at the open window, as if he really expected to see something up there. Actually nothing at all could be seen from down below.

But this routine became almost like a nervous tic with him: Whenever he passed under the women's locker room he would compulsively slow down and gaze up at the window. Wouldn't you know it, someone reported him to the higher-ups. And probably because it was Mr. Jiang whom he respected the most, Mr. Jiang it was who came to have a talk with him. In truth Mr. Jiang himself knew that nothing could be seen from downstairs. If Li had flatly denied ever looking up at the window that would have been the end of the matter. Instead he said:

"I was wrong. I did try to look, But I couldn't see anything."

Li thought to himself: What's the big fuss, doesn't everyone have a few indecent thoughts now and then? I just won't do it again, that's all. But alas, my friend, people really got to know you well this time. So what happened but the whole bucket of shit came down on your head and you ended up being the butt of everyone's jokes! All those lovely young things who used to call him "Uncle Li" or "Master Li"—how sweet were their voices!—what did they do now but wrinkle their noses at him as they passed by. The young fellows were even more insulting:

"Hey, Gramps, go buy yourself a mirror!"

These were all educated folks, cultured people. Now if they all behaved like that virtuous Liu Xia-hui of old who remained cool as a cucumber even when pretty women climbed onto his lap—well, then, that's one thing. But these were people who made fun of Li while they carried on with their floozies. Were they phonies or what?!

After this Li Zhong-xiang became listless and droopy. No longer did he go on about Maestro Xiao one day and Maestro Yang the next. Time and again friends tried to set him up with another mate. Before the incident with the women's locker room it would probably have been a simple case of "Yes" or "No." But now for some reason he made this rule for himself: He had to tell the woman about the incident, if only to test her. Of course the matches all fell through. So much the better, he thought. What if he had ended up with a dame who was a self-righteous phony—he could never put up with that!

Just before the Cultural Revolution began, he started seeing the widow Lu Gui-ying, who worked in the box office at the theater. He was fifty-five then and she fifty. His only thought was to find a mate, someone he could talk to, someone who'd take care of him, just as he would take care of her. He and Widow Lu got along famously, but when it came time to lay his cards on the table, right away he said:

"There's something I've got to tell you. I don't have a very good reputation at the theater. There was this incident—"

"Enough already," interrupted Lu Gui-ying, "that's ancient history, I know all about it. Besides, we're no spring chickens, and who can honestly say they've never done anything to be ashamed of?"

Before this Li Zhong-xiang had been somewhat hesitant about proposing since Lu Gui-ying had three children from her previous marriage, but when she said those words to him his heart leaped and he thought to himself: at last! All these years no one had ever said anything like this to him, as though they were perfectly honorable, gentlemen and ladies all, while he was the only goddamn lowlife! But when those honorable folks lay in bed at night and looked deep into their hearts, could they honestly say they've never had a dirty thought in their lives? Well, why get all worked up over this anymore? At least there were still people like Lu Gui-ying in this world. How nice it would be to marry someone he could talk to, someone like her.

Alas, this match also fell through. Lu Gui-ying's in-laws set her own children on her to object to the marriage, and naturally quite a few nasty things were said about Li Zhong-xiang. Not wanting to hurt his feelings she told him only that her kids were almost grown, she had sweated it out so far already, why not just let it be. But by then he had heard the real story from someone else.

When the Cultural Revolution ended Li Zhong-xiang was sixty-five and old enough to retire, But he was rather reluctant to say goodbye to the theater. He especially hated to part with that play about the coffin carriers, which had remained in the theater's repertory. Whenever someone mentioned this play his heart would skip a beat, even though he would never again get all spiffed up and stand next to Mr. Jiang greeting guests at the theater entrance. Nor would he ever mention again how back in '35 Mr. Jiang used to look for him to chew the fat with in the little teahouse. The theater had hurt his feelings. But if it hadn't been for another stupid thing he later did, something that led to his feelings being hurt again, he would have hung around a few more years just so he could watch his favorite play a few more times.

During the Cultural Revolution he had "saved" Mr. Jiang's life, although Mr. Jiang never knew anything about it. Back then Mr. Jiang had been beaten up, openly attacked in the newspapers, criticized on the airwaves—things seemed headed for the breaking point. One day Li Zhong-xiang happened to pass by the Peace and Happiness Restaurant (in those days its name had been changed to the more revolutionary—sounding Long March Restaurant) when he saw Mr. Jiang through the plate-glass windows, sitting alone before a tableful of food and drinking away morosely. Li thought to himself, this doesn't look good at all. Whereupon he ran back to the theater and scrawled a note, something to the effect of:

"We love your plays. Please don't give up."

That was about all Li could manage—you didn't get to be very literate in those literacy classes. He didn't dare put his name on the note, so he signed it only, The Revolutionary Masses. Then he rushed back to the restau-rant and asked someone to bring the note in to Mr. Jiang.

After the Cultural Revolution Mr. Jiang was restored to his post, and at a rally to celebrate the revival of The Coffin Carriers he talked about how he had decided against suicide because of a note from an anonymous play-goer, tears streaming down his cheeks as he spoke. After the rally Li Zhong-xiang deliberately went up to Mr. Jiang and shook his hand. Of course, he never breathed a word to anyone about the source of the note. On opening night of The Coffin Carriers, Li couldn't resist getting his suit out from the bottom of the chest and putting it on once more to go to the theater. He had long ago learned it was not his place to bustle about where Mr. Jiang was standing. But as soon as Mr. Jiang saw Li in his once-familiar outfit he said:

"Master Li, we need some help backstage. Would you mind going back there to give them a hand?"

Well, it was high time that he retired. This time for sure he was going to retire.

To this day that certificate with the words "Honorable Retirement" in gold on a red background is still hanging solemnly on his wall. He still remembers the farewell party the theater gave him, still remembers how Mr. Jiang brought him back to 10 Winch Handle Alley in his own sedan. When Mr. Jiang and the other top brass of the company came in and sat down in his tiny house, he could feel the tears rolling along the wrinkles in his cheeks all the way down to the corners of his mouth, where he could taste how salty they were. Sheepishly he wiped them off before anyone noticed.

He began to regret his decision: How quick he had been to feel wronged! Before Liberation he had pulled rickshaws, carried coffins, suffered all kinds of abuse and taken it all in stride. But now, now he's become a sissy, good times have spoiled him. Three square meals a day, a solid roof over his head, and he starts to fret about petty things! Couldn't he see Mr. Jiang was busy? How could he expect Mr. Jiang to think of everything, to stop and worry about his tender feelings?! Besides, was it right for him to butt in where he didn't belong? Was it right for him to want to peek into the women's locker room?

But all this belongs to the past. After seeing Mr. Jiang and the others off in their car that day, Li Zhong-xiang suddenly felt his days were numbered. Take it easy, live it up a bit—that was all the fun he could expect. What else could there be?

Then, lo and behold, right there on Bean Street he discovered the gang of old geezers making music and making merry! Here were people after his own heart: coffin carriers, pedicab drivers, snack peddlers, poor folks all—not a single bigwig among them, but not a single phony either. Not three days after Li Zhong-xiang started coming to this place but he perked up again. At the theater he'd always had to be on his best behavior: no dirty words or they would make fun of him, no good-natured puffery even or they'd think he was laying it on too thick. After his fall from grace it became worse: he had to tiptoe around, all meek and mild, playing the fool. Anyway, the theater people were always using big words and dropping names that ended in "ski" or something like that, none of which he knew. But here at the Bean Street Block Office Cultural Post he felt right at home.

So he began to sing, to gab, to bustle about with gusto, just like that fun-loving, fast-talking, opera-singing young coffin carrier of forty years ago. Sure he knew that among his new-found buddies were many fine singers and experienced performers. So what? Everyone was there for the fun of it, not to nitpick. And now they were calling him "The New Chang-hua" and "Chief Coach." That was fine with him. A chief coach takes care of business, and he was just the man for the job.

Hanging out with this bunch of opera buffs at the Cultural Post, Li Zhong-xiang began to bubble over with energy. Meanwhile, his arrival on the scene made his new friends bubble over with enthusiasm. Li plunged right in and took charge: one day he would announce the schedule of performances, the next he'd begin to assign roles, the third day he would bring along someone to sing the old man's part, the day after that, who knows, he might find two people to try out for the part of the general. Or he would go talk to the people in the Block Office about whether they should give their "company" a name, whether they could get a few more props, and so on, and so on.

His constant dickering with the office produced at least one benefit: the Cultural Post was now open every day instead of every other day. His other efforts also bore fruit: A band was pulled together, complete with gongs and drums and strings. But they were still in need of someone to play the part of the dashing young man. The company used to just get one of the old guys to fill in, but that left a lot to be desired. It so happens that young Guo Sen-lin, who lives at 26 Winch Handle Alley, not only is a graduate of an opera school but also a member of a professional opera company, and, what's more, his specialty is the role of the handsome young fellow. Time and again the guys had invited Guo to join them for a little fun, but he had always refused. Actually the fanciest part Guo Sen-lin had had so far was that of a spear carrier, but he thought himself too good to team up with those "crazy old fools." Leave it to Li Zhong-xiang to bring him around.

"I swallowed my pride and went all out," said Li. Three times he called on young Guo, now giving him the hard sell, now sweet-talking him with promises of "top billing" and "starring roles," and finally all but dragged him in.

Then there's the string player they now have, Old Mr. Li, who had actually studied under the famous musician Xu Lan-yuan himself. Old Mr. Li pays for a monthly bus pass out of his own pocket and spends an hour commuting each day just to play in their band—all because Li Zhong-xiang had happened to meet him one day at the Heaven's Bridge bus stop, struck up a conversation, and invited him to join their fun. That's why even though Chief Coach Li would often throw his weight around at rehearsals when he hadn't the foggiest idea how to direct the performance, and everyone would then give him a hard time about how he was faking it and getting things all tangled up—in fact the guys all appreciated the many things he had done for the group.

Lately, though, while no one had actually said anything, they were all thinking to themselves: I say, old buddy, aren't you getting a bit carried away? It was fine in the beginning when Li would boost their ranks with people who knew their stuff, and the more the merrier. But he didn't stop at that, or limit himself to the Winch Handle Alley crowd. Wherever he went, whenever he saw an old man squatting in the sun in front of a store or drinking silently in a wine shop, he would strike up a conversation with him. At the first mention of worries or troubles Li would start saying how much fun it was to get together with the guys every night and sing some opera, as if the only way the man would find relief from his problems was by following Li back to the Bean Street Cultural Post. It was becoming a habit with Li Zhong-xiang, a bad habit.

One day he brought along his neighbor across the way, Old Man Hao of 9 Winch Handle Alley, and solemnly announced to everyone:

"My buddy here is an old hand at playing the part of a young woman."

The fellows had long ago heard of Old Man Hao, of how during the Cultural Revolution his house had been searched and his valuables confiscated, and how later he had been compensated in cash for all of it. They also knew his son Stinky, who was always zooming up and down the alley on his motorcycle and making a huge racket. But no one had ever heard of Old Man Hao's talents on stage. In fact it was only that very day that Hao himself, under Li Zhong-xiang's enthusiastic "coaching," had found out about his own "talent." Li was just going out the door when he saw his old neighbor squatting in front of the wall on the other side of the alley.

"Well, well, what are we trying to hatch here?" Li joked.

Old Man Hao sighed but said nothing. Li had to press him before he would say what was wrong. Turned out the old man was ticked off at his new color TV set:

"Who knows when they'll start smooching or messing around in bed. Or else there'll be these men and women with bare thighs that look just like carrots, bouncing all over the place! How embarrassing to be watching this stuff with my two kids! If I don't watch TV I might miss a good show, but if I do I might get all this crap instead!"

Right away Li Zhong-xiang saw his opening and jumped in:

"Now, now, don't get your nose out of joint about this. Why don't you come with me instead? We'll have some good clean fun!"

"Singing opera? But I don't know how."

"Don't try to be modest with me. You're a Manchu, aren't you, and all Manchus can sing Peking opera. You can't fool me. I'll bet you even studied singing—you probably did the part of the young woman. Yes, and I'll bet you looked pretty good back then. How about singing a few lines to show your stuff?"

Would you believe it, Old Man Hao actually got all stirred up, and right then and there belted out a song. But what on earth was our Chief Coach thinking when he said:

"You'll do fine! Just come with me and practice with the band for a few days. In no time you'll sound just like Maestro Mei!"

Maestro Mei indeed! As soon as Old Man Hao opened his mouth everyone burst out laughing: wonderful! He couldn't even carry a tune in a bucket!

Once is about enough for this kind of thing, wouldn't you say? But our friend Li didn't seem to have learned from the experience at all. A few days later he was drinking in a little wine shop when he ran into another "old pal"—well no, they had never met before, but they had hit it off right away, so in a twinkling they had become fast friends—and found out his buddy was down in the dumps because he was being bossed around at home by his daughter-in-law. So of course Li pulled him into the fold right away:

"Let me give you some advice. Drown your sorrows in singing instead. Why don't you come with me. I'm in charge over there. You can't sing? Never mind. Even listening can help you forget your troubles."

For heaven's sake, he's just like those old men in Peking who are always urging you to take rendan pills—they cure everything, you know—or those old women in Guangzhou who are forever offering you some "antirheumatism" oil. No matter what ails you, Li gives the same prescription:

"Come with me, we'll sing a few!"

Time and again he did this. The Bean Street Cultural Post had been in the pink because of Li Zhong-xiang; now, because of him, it was becoming red hot—too hot, in fact. Two more circles of benches had to be added in the hall: now the open area in the middle was no longer even "palm sized." As for the performers, they no longer had to bundle up in overcoats nor tuck their hands up their sleeves, even on the coldest nights, because just to stand up there was almost to cuddle the furnace as you sang. Something else left the veteran fans not knowing whether to laugh or cry. Those new hands like Old Man Hao who had come aboard thanks to Li Zhong-xiang's prodding—they all seemed to have let his words go to their heads, honestly believing that with a few days' practice they would "sound just like Maestro Mei." So they really knocked themselves out at rehearsal every night, howling out aria after aria the whole evening long.

Meanwhile the real "pros" were left waiting in the wings, Worse yet, since many of the newcomers were folks with a bellyful of woes, they couldn't help but air their grievances every chance they had. After an aria from The Wulong Courtyard bawling out nasty women, this one would grouse about his nasty wife; after a passage from The Four Mandarins singing the praises of honest officials, that one would sigh and mutter:

"How few there are today!"

Or someone would run on and on about the injustices done to him or to a friend or to a friend's friend. The Inn of Good Fortune would lead to a lament on snobbery and social climbing. Banquet at the Border would bring on a tirade about "that good-for-nothing son of mine." From headaches to heartaches, from tight corners to loose ends—they would babble away about everything under the sun.

Meanwhile some poor soul would still be trying to sing on the "stage."

Things were getting out of hand, but the fellows didn't want their chief coach to lose face, so they kept their mouths shut.

It was Guo Sen-lin, the spear carrier all pumped up for "top billing" and "starring roles," who first reached the boiling point. He went to Old Tang Heshun, the Block Office cadre in charge of the Cultural Post, and threw a fit:

"Did you ask me here to sing or to watch them butcher everything? Why don't you just butcher me instead? I'm cutting out!"

Old Man Tang is a big, tall fellow who is always hunched over, looking for all the world like a huge dried shrimp. The fellows would irreverently call him "Shrimp Head." As a lad he had been trained to sing the young female roles—you could tell from his looks even today that he must have once cut quite a smart figure onstage. But then he started to grow, and grow, and grow. You couldn't very well play the delicate heroine when you were at least half a head taller than the warrior hero, could you? So he was limited to concert singing. People who had heard him at the old Peking Number One Teahouse before Liberation remembered him well for his fine voice and amazing breath control: he could hold on to a note forever, it seemed, and you could never tell when he inhaled between phrases.

Who would have thought that only a few years later he would lose his voice? After that happened Tang decided he was never going to make it as a singer in this life, so he turned to his only other skill: he became a scribe, writing letters, petitions and the like for customers at his sidewalk stand. Not long after Liberation he went to work for the Street Committee, and because of his background was put in charge of running an opera club for the Cultural Post—back in his old profession, you might say.

But his luck was no better this time around. During the Cultural Revolution he was accused of having organized a decadent capitalistic club and was given a vicious beating by the Red Guards. It's kind of funny when you realize that the characters in the operas they were singing at the club had all lived at a time when the capitalist class wasn't even on the horizon yet. But that's neither here nor there.

After this our friend Mr. Tang was really through with the world of opera. If it weren't for his job he would turn tail and run at the first note from a gong or drum. The authorities solemnly promise there will be no more "mass movements," but who can say for sure? Anyway, he's finally got it figured out: It has been written in his stars that he is not to have anything to do with opera in this life; the slightest contact and he's in for it. But how to keep his distance when he is still on salary as the cadre responsible for the opera club? It would be such a pity to retire and throw all that good money away. So very reluctantly he had decided to stay on as the Cultural Post's "Shrimp Head."

To fulfill his official obligations as well as to protect his own hide, he handles two items, and two items only. First, he keeps an eye on the newspapers every day to see whether they are about to "criticize" something or other. What for? In his own words:

"So's we can fix up the outside."

Actually it's all quite simple. On one side of the Cultural Post's front door is a board for wall posters and newspapers. Whenever Old Shrimp Head sees a slogan mentioned in the press he would clip it out and post it on the board under the heading Notices—you know, articles with titles like Criticize Bourgeois Liberalism or Clear Away Spiritual Pollution, The space is usually chock full of clippings. Of course he knows better than anyone that no matter what is posted on the outside, inside the hall they're still singing vintage operas, the old war-horses.\fn{As opposed to the operas which emphasized Maoist doctrine which were the repertory of the Peking Opera from the 1960s to the mid 1970s.} But he keeps at it anyway, if only to give himself a little peace of mind.

Second, he would write new lyrics to old songs to keep up with "current events," whether they be the "one child per family" campaign, or a crackdown on crime, or "traffic safety month." If the District Committee decides to put on a show tomorrow, the Bean Street Block Office Cultural Post would be ready to roll. In a contest to pick the block that is "The Most Advanced in Cultural Activities," an ancient love story like The Romance of the Western Chamber\fn{A small section of which is included in the Protocol for World Peaces, under its more familiar Western title of The Dream of the Western Chamber.} would go over like a lead balloon, but something like The Virtues of Vasectomy—now there's a winner for sure!

In the beginning Tang Heshun was more than happy to let Li Zhong-xiang take charge of the opera club. At the least Tang could save on tea leaves, to say nothing of time and energy. He might even have someone to take the blame in case anything went wrong. But now it seemed he had no choice but to step in. If he continued to give this fellow a free hand who knows where they'll all end up? Even if the outsiders Li brought in didn't cause a lick of trouble, how were they all going to fit into the hall?

Li Zhong-xiang himself had not yet caught on to the problem. Every evening he would sit around as usual with his old cronies and sing a little, chat a bit, hold forth on matters big and small, all the while thinking to himself that he was doipg a pretty good job as chief coach. It wasn't until he heard what Tang Heshun had to say that the problem began to register. But after giving it some thought he wasn't at all convinced. Didn't everyone come here just to have some fun? If Guo Sen-lin really wanted to be a "star" maybe he should go somewhere else instead!

"Whoa there! You never know when to stop, do you? So they call you 'Chief Coach,' but that doesn't mean you really have an opera school under your command. Just look at the people you've dragged in: they're not exactly opera school material—more like inmates of an old folks' home!"

Tang Heshun was about the same age as Li Zhong-xiang and they had always been on familiar terms with each other, so now he minced no words:

"Give me a break, will you? Those old geezers you brought along who can't sing worth a damn—let them go somewhere else to get their kicks!"

Old Man Tang didn't really mean it of course, but Li Zhong-xiang was cut to the quick. All those fellows he had invited along, were they all to be drummed out just like that? Sure he would lose face, but that wasn't the point. What he couldn't stand was the thought of them going back to squatting in front of a store, or squabbling with their sons and bickering with their wives. For a long time he didn't say a word. Finally, his eyes drooping like a hound dog's, he said:

"All right, all right, can't we at least leave things as they are? How're you going to keep some and not the others?" He thought for a while longer, then added with a sigh:

"Let it be. We're all at that age now, all camels on the wagon—it's the only fun we have left."

Reckon few of the young folks in Peking today would understand what he meant by that.

In the old days there used to be a lot of camels in Peking—that's how this saying came about. When a camel died it was put on a wagon and carted away to the slaughterhouse, to be recycled into soup bones and other useful stuff. After a life of hard labor this ride on the wagon was the only "fun" the poor camel ever had. Some sense of humor, eh? Anyway, the saying was quite popular with folks like Li Zhong-xiang. After a hard day's work carrying coffins, he would plop himself down in a wine shop somewhere, order a double shot of Burning Blade and sigh:

"Camels on the wagon, that's the only fun we'll ever have!"

By now it's become one of his stock phrases, so we needn't take him too seriously. Besides, to the old codgers he had recruited into the "company," their nightly music-making might well be the only fun they have left.

Tang Heshun is a sensible and sympathetic man, and he understood what was going through his friend's mind. After thinking it over for a little while, he said:

"All right, let's do this: Those who're already here might as well stay, we're not going to kick people out anyway. But as for the rest of the world, why don't you leave them where they are? One more person and this place is going to burst apart at the seams!"

"It's a deal!" Li Zhongxiang waved his hands in delight. "I'll get that into my thick skull, I promise you. If I bring in one more person I'll be a donkey's ass!"

An oath is a most useless thing. Take our friend Li Zhong-xiang—not three days had gone by before he brought along another old crony to join his fellow buffs. What're you going to do—really make him walk on all fours? Of course he had an explanation:

"But what else could I do? I can ignore the boss, even His Majesty the Emperor himself, but this is my old buddy Wan-you who helped me out when I was desperate. I can't just watch him go to pieces."

Qiao Wan-you is ten years younger than Li Zhong-xiang. He was still a child when Li was already making a living carrying coffins. When Qiao was twelve his father died and left the family destitute, so to help make ends meet he would earn a few pennies working as an extra in funeral processions, carrying a paper willow tree or holding up signs that said Silence! or Make Way! Bachelor Li had only himself to support, and every so often he would help out the Qiao family. When Wan-you's mother came down with the "swelling sickness" back in that terrible winter of '33, it was Li who pawned his clothes to buy medicine for her. When she died, again it was Li who got together a few of the guys to talk the Fellowship Pharmacy into donating a cheap coffin, then helped Wan-you bury his mother. To Li Zhong-xiang all this was no more than "looking out for each other."

"What friends are for?"

So when it comes to acts of kindness it was actually Li who had done the first good turn, even though he has forgotten all about it himself.

Long ago in Peking there was a man who specialized in the scattering of paper money at funerals. He went by the nickname of "Hairy Patch," because of the tuft of long hairs growing out of the mole on his chin, and few if any knew his real name. As a boy Hairy Patch had also worked as an extra at funerals, but he grew tired of other people teasing him about how little money he made, so he went all out to become the best paper strewer in the whole city. It was said that when Hairy Patch scattered paper money he would have one stack under his left arm, another in the crook of his elbow, the third in his left hand; then he would wave his right hand an—swoooosh!—every last piece of paper would be whirling and swirling up, up past the top of the four-storied Sipailou, where they would dance in the air like so many snowflakes before fluttering slowly onto the ground, and no two pieces were ever found to be stuck to each other.

This skill alone was enough to make him famous allover Peking. The story went that it was he who did the honors at the funerals of the powerful warlords Yuan Shikai and Li Yuanhong. On a good day he would make a hundred silver pieces, on a bad day at least twenty, and that was not counting the clothes he would get as a member of the procession. It wasn't long before Hairy Patch had made enough money to open up his own business.

Qiao Wan-you was also determined to make good, and following in Hairy Patch's footsteps he too learned to scatter paper like magic. When Hairy Patch died Wan-you became the undisputed champ of his trade. Times had changed, though, so he didn't make as much money as his predecessor had—oh, maybe only five or six silver pieces each time—but he put it to good use. Unlike so many others, he didn't smoke, drink, gamble or whore around, and he had a good mind for business to boot. For instance, he got together a gaggle of kids to walk behind him at funerals picking up the paper money he had just scattered. Afterward they would hand it over in exchange for some candied crabapples. When he got home Qiao would carefully string up all the pieces of paper, sprinkle some water on them, then squeeze them between a couple of wooden blocks, and presto!—they were ready to be used again at the next funeral. Meanwhile he would pocket the money each customer paid him for the paper.

After a few years Qiao Wan you managed to save up a tidy little sum, found himself a wife, and bought the little compound at 10 Winch Handle Alley. That was during the days when Li Zhong-xiang was hanging around the teahouse waiting for odd jobs and living from hand to mouth. As the saying goes, it never rains but it pours. Sure enough, just then the mud hovel he was living in collapsed, leaving him without even a roof over his head. As soon as Qiao Wan you found out about this he insisted that Li move in with them. At first Li refused. Was this what it had come to? All those years of hard work and he didn't even have a place to call his own, he'd have to live off his young friend instead? How humiliating! But then where else could he go? So in the end he gave in and moved into 10 Winch Handle Alley. After much courteous yielding back and forth, Qiao Wan-you and his family took the north house and Li Zhong-xiang the west. The house to the east was rented to a couple who made their living as street vendors. They have since retired and gone to live with their son, leaving the house to their daughter Lai Yu-fang and her husband Wang Jin.

It is now some forty years since Li Zhong-xiang first moved into 10 Winch Handle Alley with Qiao Wan-you and his family. Except for the ten years or so during the Cultural Revolution when all private property was confiscated and everyone had to pay rent to the government, Li had been feeling ill at ease all along. Once or twice he had asked Qiao if he shouldn't be paying him something in the way of rent. Before Li had finished talking, the normally quiet and mild-mannered Qiao Wan-you would get all red in the face and sputter:

"That's an insult!"

So Li had to let the matter drop. This is what he was referring to when he said Qiao had done him a great kindness. Of course it wasn't the money he meant so much as the friendship behind it. By comparison he felt that what he had done for Qiao long ago was no more than a snap of the fingers. He had to find some way of repaying Qiao's kindness or he would never feel good about himself.

One day around noon, Li Zhong-xiang was having a drink at home when Qiao Wan-you walked in without knocking—he didn't have to because after all these years they were just like family to each other.

"Where's Dezhi?"

Dezhi is Li Zhong-xiang's son. Normally he would be at work at his own little tailor's stall at the market, but that day he had taken time off to have some fun.

"Has the kid got a girlfriend now?"

"It'd be about time, he's already thirty-three," Li Zhong-xiang said as he poured a second bowl of wine and set out another pair of chopsticks. Once he had run into his son walking with a young woman on Bean Street. He had seen her before—she would drop by the Cultural Post from time to time—kind of pretty, not a bad figure either. But who knows whether she's actually Dezhi's girl- friend?

Now that he's getting on in years Qiao Wan-you no longer denies himself everything. Once in a while he would down a few drinks too. He is a slight, wiry man with deep-set eyes and a narrow, straight nose, and his boyish face and silver hair give him a gentle and serene look that matches his easygoing nature, so rarely found in what used to be called the "lower classes." Although a man of few words, he has never been tongue-tied around Li Zhong-xiang. But today for some reason he was silent as he sipped his wine, head bowed and seemingly lost in thought.

Finally he let out a long sigh, lifted his head and looked around the room.

"Yep, this is a much better arrangement. You were smart not to get married again. At least you've got your peace and quiet!" Li Zhongxiang answered:

"He who is wearing shoes always imagines how cool and comfortable it would be to go barefoot, while he who is barefoot always envies the one with shoes. To be honest with you, if it wasn't for the fun I get from my opera club every night, I might well be looking around for another mate."

Qiao Wany-ou fell silent again.

"What's the matter, Wany-ou? Whatever it is, two heads are always better than one." Li couldn't stand this wishy-washy routine any longer.

"There's nothing you can do to help." Qiao smiled weakly, then added:

"All right, I'll tell you. The people from the courthouse are coming tomorrow to investigate. Chuan-sheng and Xiu-lian are getting a divorce."

Xiu-lian is Qiao Wany-ou's daughter and Chuan-sheng his son-in- law. The two had met while working in the same factory. After the wedding Chuan-sheng moved in with his wife's parents because there was no room to spare at his own parents' house.

Li Zhong-xiang was furious when he heard what Qiao Wan-you said.

"But it's only been six months since they got married. What is that son-of-a-bitch up to?"

"It's not his fault. If I were in his shoes I wouldn't be able to stand it either!" Qiao sighed again. "Forget it, dirty linen should be kept out of sight. To tell the truth, I don't even know what to say tomorrow to those people from the court."

Li didn't press him any more. He knew what a proud man his old friend was, and if Qiao didn't want to talk about it he certainly wasn't going to pry.

But in fact Qiao had been doing a slow burn for days now and was about ready to blow his lid. Besides, while he is usually pretty reserved, a few drops of liquor would loosen his tongue immediately. A couple of bowls of the potent Peking Daqu down the hatch and it's as if what was on his mind would turn musty if he didn't give it an airing right away. By then you would have no choice but to listen.

To begin at the beginning, it all had to do with his wife, who used to sell "watch-it food" at Heaven's Bridge. You can't find this stuff nowadays, but once upon a time it was very common. Actually it was just table scraps from restaurants—"leftovers" to some, a "hodgepodge" to others, but a "specialty of the house" for poor folks. In the same bucket you'd find big pieces of meat along with fishheads, fishbones, egg shells, peanut shells, toothpicks, cigarette butts and … you name it. It was served up right in the bucket too: for every five picks with your chopsticks—no matter what you fished out—you'd pay one copper, so you'd have to "watch it" as you tried to pick up only the meat. As for the proprietress, she would be busy keeping an eye on you: five passes with your sticks and she'd put a little bamboo marker next to your bowl—you can bet she was "watching it" as closely as you. Now you see how the name came about.

After Liberation "watch-it food" went out of style, so Mrs. Qiao stayed home to take care of her family and to help out at the Street Committee.

The Street Committee is always trying to improve the well-being of the people, including their minds. For volunteers it can count on all the old men and old women who have nothing better to do than stand on the street corner all day talking about the importance of family planning to anyone who would listen. Or else it would hold discussions for the old folks on such serious issues as "alienation." From their discussions they might conclude that something was "entirely necessary and very timely," when in fact it was "entirely unnecessary and very harmful," or entirely necessary for some people—cadres, say, or intellectuals—but entirely irrelevant to old ladies. In other words, what's sauce for the goose is not always sauce for the gander. But somehow these folks never got the point.

Anyway, no matter what they were doing Madam Qiao was always right there in the thick of it. Not long ago, as part of the campaign to crack down on "criminal behavior" and arrest "bad elements," she had put on a red armband and "patroled" the neighborhood. The young toughs hanging out in the area—up to no good, that's for sure—have maliciously dubbed her "Inspector Boundfoot." What a pity there are not more old ladies like her! Why then China would have no trouble transforming itself into a modern, civilized society—in one great leap, I dare say.\fn{A satire, of course, on the "Great Leap Forward" campaign (1958-1960), which was supposed to instantaneously transform China into a self-suifficient industrial and agricultural economy, but had to be abandoned when the effort failed through bad planning and mismanagement, and resulted in the loss of an estimated 20,000,000 lives in a subsequent famine.}

On the other hand, while it is all well and good to be so concerned with public affairs, it is something else again when you poke your nose into everyone's private affairs. Qiao Wan-you used to keep a pet nightingale. "Twenty cents a day just on birdfeed—is money burning a hole in your pocket?! You keep this up and I'll feed it twenty cents worth of poison!" So he switched to gardening. "Listen, ''m not going to pay for all that water!" The poor guy would no more than use a toothpick but she would find something in that to nag him about for hours on end. And she has forgotten none of the tricks from her "watch-it" days, glaring so suspiciously at everything and everyone it's enough to drive you up a wall. It is only because Qiao Wan-you is such an easygoing fellow that for the longest time he hadn't bothered to argue with her. But when she began to meddle in the affairs of her daughter and son-in-law, that was absolutely the last straw.

Xiu-lian is the Qiaos' youngest daughter, and, as in that folk saying about youngest daughter being like mother's undershirt—in other words, closest to the heart—she was their favorite child. Needless to say Mrs. Qiao was tickled pink that Xiu-lian and her husband were to live with them after the marriage. But a few days before the wedding, she summoned them into her presence and very solemnly said:

"So, you're getting married soon. It'd be none of my business if you're not going to be living here, but since you're going to be right under my nose I've got to tell you this: That 'thing,' it's not like your three meals a day, once a week is plenty often. If you go at it all the time it's no good for either of you. Anyway, I'm not going to let my daughter be abused, understand?"

If you think that's outrageous, wait till you hear what else she pulled on them. Being normal, healthy folks and newlyweds to boot, the young couple had an understandably hearty appetite for sex, so it was only to be expected that they wouldn't always stick to the "established plan." Unfortunately, only a wooden divider separated their "honeymoon suite" from the older couple's bedroom. Worse yet, Mother-in-law had brought her "Inspector Boundfoot" tactics right into the home. A light sleeper, she would wake up at the slightest rustle from the next room and, without pausing to find out whether it was fact or fantasy or false alarm, she'd bang on the divider and give them a thorough tongue-lashing. Can anyone in his right mind put up with this sort of thing? Never mind the two young folks, who have gone from rows to blows to divorce petitions—even someone as patient and tolerant as Qiao couldn't help but blow his top:

"What the hell's wrong with you?! Sticking your nose into everyone's business, every goddamn piss and fart."

The old man almost kicked the bucket when he heard her reply. In a voice loud enough for the whole neighborhood to hear, Mrs. Qiao retorted:

"And why not?! Let me tell you something, you men have no idea what we women go through. Back when I first married you, I was your mother's slave by day and by night, dammit, I was your slave. You were such an animal you never let me get any sleep. Listen, things have changed, we women have been liberated, you can't walk all over us anymore!"

Qiao Wan-you kept on drinking as he spilled his guts to his old friend. By now he had had more than three bowls of wine, even though two is his usual limit, and he was beginning to slur his words and to stammer:

"Y'know, s-soon as s-she opens her mouth m-my poor noggin hurts!"

"What a d-d-disgrace! A goddamn d-dis-grace!"

In the end that was all he could say, over and over again.

Li Zhong-xiang looked at the sorry figure across from him and his heart sank. He thought to himself: of all the problems in the world, old buddy, you had to come up with something like this! If it was money you needed, I could give you three or five hundred easy. If you needed some work done you could count on me and my son, and we could even get more help. But something like this—you know how the saying goes: Even a wise man would have trouble settling a family quarrel. What am I going to do with an old married couple like you two—pack you off to get a divorce also?! Then again, all these years you've never once bellyached or asked me for anything, all these years that I've been living under your roof—what kind of a friend would I be if I can't even come up with something to cheer you up at least?!

In this state of agitation, plus having had a few too many himself, Li Zhongxiang forgot all about his oath. Just like those old men in Peking who would instinctively reach for their rendan pills at a time like this, or those old ladies in Guangzhou who would turn to their "antirheumatism oil," he didn't even hesitate before snatching away Qiao Wanyou's wine bowl and saying:

"Listen, Wan-you, the ancients said: 'Each to his own.' Stop worrying and don't pay any more attention to your wife's bitching. Why don't you come with me—we'll sing a little opera and have ourselves some fun."

"Sing? Opera? Me?"

Squinting his eyes Qiao Wanyou shook his head from side to side.

"I … d-d-don't know how."

"Well then, how about doing the 'background'?"

"B-background?"

"Sure, background music—play the gongs, cymbals, strings, anything you like."

"D-don't know none o' that n-neither."

"So you'll learn! I bet you're a natural. Just look at how you learned to scatter paper money."

"Ummmm." Qiao Wan-you thought for a moment, finally sighed and said:

"Why not? It sure b-beats being yelled at. All right, I'll try it."

Li Zhong-xiang dug out an old erhu\fn{A note reads: A two-stringed instrument played with a bow.} from heaven knows where, and the very next evening brought Qiao Wan-you with him to the Cultural Post. Perhaps our Chief Coach did feel a little ashamed to have broken his promise, because he also brought along a fold-up chair from home and settled his old friend—the retired champ of the paper money scatterers—in a little out-of-the-way corner.

From then on, every evening when the band played away on their erhus, jinghus, yueqins,\fn{A note reads: Jinghu, yueqin*: stringed instruments*.} hardwood clappers and the like, providing "background" for the action on stage, you would see in a little cranny on the east side of the "concert hall" a thin-faced old man, eyes half closed and head swaying, an erhu in his lap. That was none other than our friend Qiao Wan-you.

But if you listened carefully you'd discover that the sounds of the erhu came from elsewhere. Even after he became one of the regulars and had been "sawing away" for quite some time, the most Qiao could manage was a very simple overture. And even then he would often miss his cue.

You'd be wrong if you thought our chief coach would take on anything and everything, that he would make his opera "company" open to all comers. It all depended on who the "comer" was.

The fellows, though, didn't let him get off lightly for his breach of promise.

"Hey, Chief, got any more old timers on Winch Handle Alley? Why don't you round them up all at once, instead of wasting time going after them one by one?"

"You know that pair of stone lions in front of Number Twenty-nine? They've been looking kind of depressed lately. Listen, Zhong-xiang, why don't you bring them over for a song or two?"

Li knew they meant no harm, so sometimes he'd sass them back, sometimes he'd just laugh it off. He really couldn't blame them for having a joke at his expense. If you counted off all the old guys on Winch Handle Alley, you'd find that aside from those working as "consultants" for that travel agency set up by the unemployed youngsters in the neighborhood or as watchmen for the warehouse around the corner—to make a little extra besides their retirement pay—and except for those who couldn't move around much anymore, why, everyone else had been recruited into the "company." Well, there was that other one, Han De-lai over at Number Nine, who came a couple of times and could actually sing quite well. But he really got off on the "Anti-Spiritual Pollution" campaign and started to browbeat everyone about it. The guys would have none of that, of course. Instead, they charged him with spiritually polluting the cultural post and really made a monkey out of him, so he never showed his face again. Now if they wanted to recruit anyone else from Winch Handle Alley it would have to be those two stone lions!

Then one evening out of the blue came Wang Jin, Li's neighbor across the yard in the east house.

And as fate would have it, the opera for the evening was Qin Xiang-tian, one of the classics that people never seem to tire of, perhaps because of its story about good winning out over evil: poor scholar Chen Shi-mei passes the imperial examinations, climbs the ladder of success but abandons wife Qin Xiang-lian and their children; eventually, however, he is given the punishment he deserves by the righteous official Bao Gong.

Somewhere in the middle of all this melodrama Wang Jin walked in. Wearing a blue polyester tunic suit, a brown hat, black-framed glasses, and a dark look on his face, he sat down without a word or a nod to anyone. He was still sitting there tight lipped and buttoned up when Li Zhong-xiang finally noticed him.

"Well, well, the gang from Number Ten is all here," Li whispered to Qiao Wan you and chuckled softly. But he couldn't help feeling rather puzzled. What was a young man like Wang Jin—and well educated to boot!—doing in a place like this?

To the residents of Winch Handle Alley, Wang Jin is quite an impressive character. Even Li Zhong-xiang, who has been living in the same compound with him for some twenty years now—even he was quite taken aback when, about a year ago, Wang's wife Lai Yu-fang very smugly announced that her husband had written a book, thick as a brick, and had been paid more than four thousand yuan for it. Sure Li Zhong-xiang knew that Wang was quite an accomplished fellow, a graduate of Qinghua University and all that, but then he had been branded a "rightist" and ended up working as some sort of a technician in a factory. Someone introduced him to Lai Yu-fang, and not long after that he moved in with her without any kind of ceremony. For the past twenty years he had kept a low profile, going to work every day and helping out around the house afterward, lighting the fire or fetching water from the public tap down the street, or playing with their daughter.

In short, there was nothing at all remarkable about his daily routine. So how did he come up with a book "thick as a brick?" Magic? Sleight of hand? But however he did it, the book itself was real enough, and so apparently were the four thousand yuan—as can be seen from the fact that his wife no longer had to work at home gluing cardboard boxes. Besides, for a while you had no choice but to hear all about their good fortune from Lai Yu-fang herself. See that sedan waiting in front of the compound several times a week? That was to take her husband to his lectures, she said. You know he's stopped working at the factory, don't you? That's because he has been transferred back to the university, she said, no more "nine-to-five" work for him. Then finally Lai Yu-fang showed everyone that book, "thick as a brick." Sure enough, right there on the cover was Wang Jin's name, and inside—why, it was so full of diagrams and charts and foreign words it made your head spin!

However, it wasn't long before Lai Yu-fang lost her smug look. The two of them started going at each other like cats and dogs, and the word "divorce" was thrown around more and more often. Living in the same compound and running into them every day, Li Zhong-xiang couldn't help overhearing all this, but he had no idea who was in the right. On the one hand, he found that broad Lai Yu-fang pretty disgusting. For instance, in the summertime she would waddle around the yard in a sleeveless undershirt, her tits flopping around underneath like two flatfish. Ugh! Then there's the way she yells at her old man—like a fishwife, a spitfire, a regular shrew!

Whatever, the woman is no angel. On the other hand, Li Zhong-xiang would think, no matter how much of a bitch she may be, there's that ancient saying: “Forget not the friends from your humble days, cherish the wife who saw you through hard times.”

But this Wang Jin—no sooner is he doing a little better but he wants a divorce and a new wife—he’s no saint either. In fact he’s just like that scoundrel Chen Shimei in the opera! And when Li Zhong-xiang thought about their daughter Yuan-yuan he became absolutely furious with Wang:

“How heartless can you get, abandoning your child just like that! So you’ve come here to forget your troubles, have you? Fine, maybe you’ll learn a few other things while you’re here, like: we may not be bigshots like you, with your book ‘thick as a brick’ and the thousands you made from it, and the sedan taking you all over town while you parade around like a VIP, but at least we know right from wrong. We may be poor but we still have our honor! After Bao Gong finishes off Chen Shimei here, we’re going to put on The Censuring of Wang Kui just for you!”

The Censuring of Wang Kui is also about an ungrateful husband, and it is perfectly understandable how Li’s thoughts went from Wang Jin to Chen Shi-mei to Wang Kui. Then again, it’s only human to make a mistake once in a while. And this time our friend Li Zhong-xiang, who has always tried to give people the benefit of the doubt, forgot that there are usually two sides to a story, and that while there are cads like Wang Kui and Chen Shi-mei, there are also husbands who are in the right.

When the passage from Qin Xiang-tian was over Li stood right up and launched into his “censuring” of all heartless husbands:

Pleas and appeals you would not heed,
Power and riches have turned your head.
Conscience, honor-both have fled;
Cursed be your name long after you’re dead.

Li Zhongxiang poured his heart and soul into the song, and whether it was because of his surprisingly moving performance, or because there were those who understood what he was driving at and wanted to help teach Wang Jin a lesson, the audience responded with loud applause and cheers.

At half past ten as usual the group broke up. A light snow was falling as Li Zhong-xiang and Qiao Wan-you made their way home. A short distance ahead of them on Winch Handle Alley walked Wang Jin, a solitary and rather pitiable figure. Normally Li would still be a-tingle with the evening’s excitement, singing and chatting away while Qiao would hum along by his side. But tonight Li felt rather ill at ease. Why were the three of them not walking together when they had gone to the same show and were now headed for the same place?

Something else nagged at him even more. It all had to do with the passage from The Censuring of Wang Kui. Why on earth did he do it? What business was it of his anyway? If Wang Jin was in the wrong, the court or his work unit would take care of that. Most likely the poor fellow was feeling pretty low and had come to forget his troubles for a while. Why did he have to give him a hard time on top of everything else?

Wang Jin reached the gate first and held it open, waiting for the other two to catch up.

“Thanks,” murmured Qiao Wan-you.

“Not at all,” said Wang Jin, locking up after they had stepped through.

Li Zhong-xiang was silent, but he felt even more ashamed of himself.

The next night Wang Jin showed up again at the Cultural Post and again sat glumly through the entire evening without making one sound. After the show Li Zhong-xiang cleaned up in a hurry so all three of them could walk home together.

“Professor Wang, you like to sing some opera, eh?” Still feeling a little sheepish about the night before, Li searched for some way to break the ice.

“No, no, I can’t sing at all.”

“Oh, so you like listening to it then?”

“Uh, so-so.”

What else could they talk about? Li couldn’t think of anything. Nevertheless, from then on every evening after dinner the three of them would leave the compound together and walk to the Cultural Post, then come home together around half past ten. Wang still kept to himself, answering only when spoken to, and then only briefly. And he always wore a pained look, like he was going to the dentist’s instead of to a show.

It wasn’t long before Li Zhong-xiang realized that Professor Wang was a complete ignoramus as far as opera was concerned. A true fan has certain tell-tale traits: for one thing, as soon as the gongs and drums start up he would sway and nod to their beat, completely lost in the music whether he was singing or just listening. But Professor Wang merely sat there like a log. That alone was enough to make Li Zhong-xiang suspicious. Then one night, as he was getting ready to go on, Li saw Wang Jin sitting there stock still, as usual. Partly to make amends for the time when he "censured" Professor Wang, and partly to see how much the good professor really knew about opera, Li asked Wang if he would fill in for a minor part.

"I … I can't," Wang got all flustered and shook his head vigorously.

Li persisted:

"There's nothing to it, not for an old hand like you. You don't even have to get up on stage. Just answer "Oh!" at the right places."

Now for anyone the least bit familiar with Peking opera this would be child's play, but for Wang Jin it was a tall order: He had no idea where the "right places" were. "Oh-ing" when he should have been silent and silent when he should have "Oh-ed;" he had them rolling in the aisles before the show was half over. To think that Li Zhong-xiang had once asked him if he could sing a few passages. What a laugh! He didn't know the first thing about Peking opera.

However, his unintentionally comic debut didn't seem to dampen Wang Jin's "enthusiasm" at all. He continued to leave the house with his two neighbors every evening and to come home with them after the show. And he continued to be tight lipped and sad eyed. By now Li Zhong-xiang was thoroughly baffled: why did Wang come along when he knew nothing about opera and seemed to care even less? Didn't he have anything better to do? Like writing another book, "thick as a brick."

Finally Li couldn't contain his curiosity any longer. As the three of them were walking home one night, he decided to get to the bottom of the matter:

"Professor Wang, I hope you won't mind if I ask you a personal question."

"What is it?"

"Please don't get me wrong, I'm not trying to throw you out or anything."

Li paused for a moment, then, pointing to Qiao Wan-you, he continued:

"Guys like us, we've got one foot in the grave, and what's more we've got no 'culture.' We have nothing better to do than sing a little opera every night and have a good time. But you—tell me, why are you hanging out with us? I'd understand it if you were a real fan, but you don't even know enough to do a walk-on. So what gives?"

Wang Jin smiled ruefully, but said nothing.

"We're over the hill and pretty useless. But you're different. Frankly, if we didn't know you could write books we wouldn't have bothered. So tell us, why are you wasting your time like this?"

At these words Wang almost broke down and cried.

As a matter of fact Wang knew three foreign languages and was an expert in computer software. The time was ripe for him to pursue his career ambitions, and he had plans to write a whole series of books, not just one or two—until the problems at home drove him to distraction. Not only was Lai Yu-fang ignorant and narrow minded, she was so hot tempered she'd fly off the handle over the merest trifle. Even back in the dark days when Wang Jin was living under the stigma of a "rightist" he would often think of his former girlfriend. But while he couldn't help but be attracted to beautiful and refined women—after all, he's only human—he had never even considered being unfaithful. No matter how unpleasant Lai Yu-fang may be, he could never forget that she had braved the times to marry him when he was still branded as a "rightist," that she had borne their daughter and taken care of the family. No, he couldn't leave her, not after all they had been through together. Now that their circumstances were improved he had plans for Yu-fang to take some courses, hoping that in time the distance between them would be reduced. Little did he dream that his whole world would be turned topsy-turvy by that one letter.

The letter was written by his former girlfriend. To this day he himself doesn't understand why he held on to it. Was it because it brought back so many lovely memories? Or was it because in the letter she had described her wretched family life, providing company for his own misery? Whatever the reason, there was no denying that the letter had stirred his emotions so that he couldn't bring himself to burn it. Instead he locked it away in a drawer, thinking that was the end of the matter. He neither kept the appointment she proposed nor did he ever write back. After all, he was a rational man—so rational he even considered showing the letter to Yu-fang before deciding against it. She didn't have the capacity to understand the matter. She would have gone on the warpath right away, charging up to the other woman's house and calling her names like "slut" and "hussy," maybe even throwing a fit and rolling on the ground in public. Why make her blood boil with this letter? Why provoke her into hurting another person?

But Wang never considered what would happen if Lai Yu-fang ever discovered the letter herself. Then, he could talk a blue streak, explain, clarify, swear by all that he held sacred, even admit that he had been "unfaithful" in his heart—and still not convince her of his innocence.

And that's exactly what happened. When she found the letter, she insisted that he go along with her to teach the woman a lesson.

"Didn't you just swear you had a clear conscience? Then come with me to tell that bitch off! No? I knew you didn't have the guts! But I do. I'm going to make sure those hussies know never to mess with me. So she wants to snatch you away, eh? Well, she can just forget it!"

From then on every female who called on Wang Jin, whether colleague or student, would have to suffer the lady's black looks. Sometimes she would even slam the door right in their faces. There was no reasoning with her at all. The more he tried the more insanely jealous she became.

"What's the matter, did I upset one of your little darlings? You feel sorry for her, don't you? Well goddamn it, why don't you ever think about me instead?"

Then she would blubber and bawl and cause a brouhaha that would set the whole neighborhood on edge. No one can put up with this kind of caterwauling day in and day out, much less a man like Wang Jin who was trying to concentrate on his career.

"All right, all right, forget it! If that's how you feel, why don't we just get a divorce?"

The words tumbled out of his mouth before Wang realized what he was saying. He was at his wits' end: He couldn't read, couldn't work, he couldn't produce anymore. Was he going to spend the rest of his life being raked over the coals for this one incident? But in trying to get it over with he had only made it worse. Their work units became involved, the Women's Association began to investigate. The verdict: she was the noble and long-suffering Qin Xian-glian, he the contemptible Chen Shi-mei, of course,

"But what's the use of telling you all this? You probably wouldn't understand anyway."

Smiling bitterly, Wang Jin shook his head and began puffing away on a cigarette. After some time he let out a long sigh:

"Believe me, I really appreciate your concern. But where can I work on my book? At home? As soon as she sees me sitting down at my desk she'll storm right in and tear everything up, screaming at the top of her lungs, 'Go ahead! Write your goddamn book, you son of a bitch! The more you write the worse you get! I'd rather go back to the old days when we were living from hand to mouth!' If I go to my office she'll say: 'Sneaking out to see your sweetheart, eh?' Even if I do find a place to work I've lost my concentration. To be honest with you, going to the show with you two every night is just about the only thing she'll allow. 'Yes, go along with them, go hear how Bao Gong fixed Chen Shi-mei. That's what'll happen to all you heartless bastards!' If you don't believe me just look over at my house tomorrow evening. She'll be parked right by the window watching me as I step out the door. If I don't walk out with you two she'll run right after me and start a fight, no question about it."

Li Zhong-xiang and Qiao Wan-you sighed again and again as they listened to Wang's story. When he was finished, the three of them stood wordlessly under a street light for a long while. Li's heart ached at the thought of a learned man like Professor Wang killing time every day with all these old codgers, forcing himself to listen to something he didn't understand at all. Then Li remembered how rude he had been when Professor Wang first joined them, and he could have kicked himself for it.

"Professor Wang, I'm so sorry, I didn't know. That day when I sang the piece from The Censuring of Wang Kui I was wrong, so wrong …"

"What piece?"

"You know, the one I sang the first time you came here."

"Oh, that one. What's wrong with it? I kind of liked it," said Wang Jin, looking nonplussed.

Li Zhong-xiang sighed again as he became even more heartsick. Wang had not understood a word of what he was listening to that night. Just as well.

They lapsed into silence again. After some time Li Zhong-xiang suddenly spoke up:

"Professor Wang, I'm just an uneducated stiff who used to carry coffins for a living, so please forgive me if I get out of line. You know me, I like to have a good time, and I like others to have fun as well. Especially those who're worried and depressed—I really want to help cheer them up if I can. But I've been thinking: there's nothing I can do to help you with your problem."

"Oh please don't say that!" Wang Jin interjected. "It makes me feel much better just to tag along with you two every day.”

“Stop kidding yourself. You can’t go on killing time like this. And if we let you we wouldn’t be doing right by you or anyone else.”

Li Zhong-xiang folded his arms across his chest and continued:

“Let me come straight to the point: The opera club is no place for you, Professor, and I can’t let you come anymore. Don’t think I'm throwing you out because I don’t like you or don’t want to help you out—after all, we’ve been friends and neighbors for many, many years now. On the contrary, it’s because I don’t want to see you waste your time hanging around this place. Me and Wan-you here, we’re not much good at anything. Even if we could talk the hind legs off a donkey and went and told everyone we met that you'’re no Chen Shi-mei, that’s still not going to help you very much. If we tried to whack some sense into the dame, make her see what a great guy her old man is, it wouldn’t work either. For one thing it’s against the law. Besides, if she got hurt it’d not only add to your worries, it’d also cost you a pretty penny in doctor’s bills!

“So let me make a dumb suggestion. She watches you from the window every night, right? Well, let her watch all she wants. You just come along with us as usual, but once we get out of the alley we can go our separate ways. To each his own, I always say. We trust you, we know you’re not going to meet a mistress somewhere. Just find yourself a quiet spot and write another book, ‘thick as a brick,’ all right?”

Now it was Wang Jin’s turn to ache inside. That was how, in addition to the fun they had every evening at the Cultural Post, Li Zhong-xiang and Qiao Wan-you came to enjoy another kind of “fun:” escorting their pride and joy, Professor Wang, out of the compound and down the alley, so he could go to the university library to write his book, “thick as a brick.”

Every evening at half past six sharp, “Shrimp Head” Tang Heshun would unlock the door of the Cultural Post. Then he would either go next door to Liu Shan’s to play chess or to the reading room to clip newspapers. Right on his heels would appear Li Zhong-xiang in his distinctive bowlegged walk, to be followed immediately by Qiao Wan you, carrying his battered erhu like some priceless treasure in a satchel made of blue twill. Once inside, the two old fellows would bustle around boiling water, making tea and setting out the benches, while one after another the troops would show up. Finally all would be ready—and the gongs, drums and clappers would take off! Everyone’s spirits would soar, especially those with troubles of one kind or another, a disobedient son, say, or a nagging wife. For a few hours at least, their problems can all go to hell. Not even paradise on earth could hold a candle to their home away from home!

People are easily satisfied, especially someone like Li Zhong-xiang. To the ancient saying, “He who is content will always find happiness,” Li has added his own: “He who has fun will always be content.” In other words, Li would win coming and going. At home he had a dutiful son who always made sure that there were five full bottles of Beijing Daqu stored under his bed and a carton of Hengda cigarettes lying in his drawer. Content with how things were at home, Li Zhong-xiang had found happiness—just as the ancients prescribed. Moreover, every evening he would walk out of the courtyard with his old buddy Qiao Wan-you and his new friend Professor Wang, until they got to the end of the alley and went their separate ways; every evening he and Wan-you had “fun” not only from their music making but also from helping a friend in need. Having found this fun. they were quite content—that was from following Li’s own prescription. And thus overflowing with happiness and contentment—not to mention a goodly amount of Beijing Daqu—Li Zhong-xiang’s face became even ruddier, his tales even taller, his bowlegged walk a positive swagger.

To be sure, whenever he saw some old fellow his age just squatting somewhere and puffing away silently at a cigarette, he would still feel a twinge of regret, as though he had let a pearl slip through his fingers. But his hands were tied not only by his own word of honor but also by the limits of the Cultural Post. When he thought about it, though, he would realize how silly he was. So many ways to have fun under the sun: bird keeping, chess playing, tea tasting, kite flying, sauntering, exercising, shadowboxing—what’s the worry?

While Li Zhong-xiang was always worrying about others, he never thought the day would come when he himself wouldn’t be able to have his fun.

One evening just before Chinese New Year, the diehard opera fans showed up as usual at the Cultural Post, humming and swaying as they strolled in. But though the door was open, there was no hot water, no tea, and the benches were piled this way and that. Li Zhong-xiang and Qiao Wan-you were nowhere to be seen. Surprise turned into consternation when they remembered Hu Si, who had been one of the regulars. Almost seventy he was, but his voice was still deep and resonant as a huge brass bell—perfect for the part of the general. One night he was singing away lustily with the rest of them, the next night he didn’t show up, and never did again. A stroke, they later heard—gave up the ghost just like that. Ever since then, whenever one of the company was absent no one wanted to ask why.

So they all breathed a sigh of relief when Qiao Wan-you appeared in a little while. Finally, someone asked the question that was on everyone's mind:

"Hey, Wan-you, where's Zhong-xiang?"

Usually they all called him "Chief Coach" or "The New Chang-hua."

But not today.

Qiao Wanyou set his erhu on his lap and began to tune it. For a long time the only sound coming from him was the squeaking of strings. At last he said slowly:

"He's not coming today. He doesn't feel so good."

"What's wrong?"

"Oh, not much. Headache and a fever, I think."

Qiao Wan-you didn't want to tell them what had really happened. Li Zhong-xiang would be so embarrassed.

In fact the evening had started out as usual. They had hollered for Professor Wang to join them, then the three of them had left the compound together, again as usual. But after they parted company with Wang at the street corner, Li Zhong-xiang's face fell. Gloomily he said to Qiao Wan-you:

"You go on ahead, Wan-you. I'm not going tonight."

Qiao was completely taken aback. Rain or shine, Li had never missed a single evening. What on earth was going on?

"I don't … feel so good."

Alarmed, Qiao asked:

"So why did you even come out? Go home and get yourself to bed right away!"

Li Zhong-xiang shook his head, a mournful smile on his lips. Hemming and hawing, he finally said:

"To tell you the truth, Dezhi came home when I was having dinner just now and asked me not to go anymore."

"Why not?"

"He said to me, why don't you take up something else instead? You can watch TV, listen to the radio, anything but go howling with the rest of them at the Cultural Post. He said people were laughing at us."

"Why doesn't he mind his own business?"

"Well, I guess in a way it is his business. Didn't I tell you he's got a girlfriend now? The girl lives right on Bean Street, I think it's the one in the plaid jacket who sticks her head into the Cultural Post once in a while. More than likely she's said something to him about us. I can't say as I blame them. To the young folks nowadays we're all just a bunch of old crackpots. My guess is, Dezhi doesn't want her to know his dad is the leader of this pack of old loonies. She might find us embarrassing."

"Oh no! He's not even married yet and already he's thrown his old man out the window. You should go, just to spite her! If she thinks you're embarrassing then she shouldn't marry into the family."

Again Li Zhong-xiang smiled sadly. His son had had a hard enough life, he said. Dezhi was twenty-five before he got permission to leave the rural commune to which he had been sent during the Cultural Revolution, but right after he returned to Peking he had come down with tuberculosis, so he had gotten off to a late start finding a job and finding a wife. Finally he was able to learn a trade at the tailoring school and had just opened up his own little stall in the market.

"He works hard every day, summertime he even works late into the evening under a street light. But at least he earns enough to keep the two of us going. You've got to admit he's a good son, he always keeps me well supplied with liquor and cigarettes. He's over thirty already and this is his first girlfriend, though he's still too timid to actually tell me about it. What he's done is to ask me very nicely not to go opera singing anymore. Well, a person's got to put himself in other people's shoes. Wouldn't you do the same for your boy? …

"Anyway, that's enough of that. You'd better hurry along before the guys think I've gone to hear the crickets chirp!"

Waving his hands, Li Zhong-xiang sent Qiao Wan-you on his way.

At the Cultural Post Li's absence put a damper on everyone's spirits. The other day the Block Office had asked them to put on a show for the New Year festivities, but now without Li Zhong-xiang there was no one to whip things into shape, and the evening just dragged on. Little did the fellows suspect that their chief coach, far from lying in bed at home, was at that very moment standing like an outcast on the corner of Winch Handle Alley, drinking in every last note floating out of the Cultural Post. Just then it was Old Man Jin singing, no doubt about it. He's the one who claims to be distantly related to the famous opera star Jin Shao-shan. But listen to him:

When I am idle I look out at the mountains,
Stroll on the slopes when my spirits are low.
One day outside the fort a strange wind was blowing;
I let it pass, then grabbed its tail to see—was it friend or foe?

Ugh! Off-key, off beat—how awful can you get?! Even his words came out fuzzy, like he was sucking on something! Li Zhong-xiang was dying to storm in and chew him out: You call this singing?! You may be related to Jin Shao-shan, but no one would ever know it from the way you're mewling! …

The longer our friend stood on the corner listening, the more pathetic he looked. There he was, itching to get in there and show them how to do it right, although often after his "demonstrations" the fellows would hoot and howl scornfully:

"Stuff it! I can do better than that!"

Maybe so, but not to let Li sing at all was pure torture to him—you might as well have him bound and gagged!

While Li Zhong-xiang was thus loitering on the corner, he happened to spy his son Dezhi and a young woman walking down Bean Street. His pulse quickened: that's her, no doubt about it—the one in the plaid jacket, lives right next door to the Cultural Post. These two are going steady for sure. Dezhi looks real sharp tonight, from his new jacket down to his shiny leather shoes. Son, you may be meek as a mouse in front of your old man, but I bet you're as bold as the next guy right now, I bet you'd even put your arm around her waist right in public! …

Dezhi and the girl headed west. A shiny pair of skates peeked out of the straw basket they each carried. From the looks of it they were going to the rink in Taoran Pavilion Park.

Li Zhong-xiang brightened up all of a sudden. Last night he had set it up with several of the guys that he would sing something from A Gathering of Heroes tonight. Now was the time to sneak in and do it; besides, he had to take care of that show for Chinese New Year. He hesitated for a moment, but then he turned and went in the same direction as his son—he had to find out what time the rink closed.

In his threescore years and ten Li Zhong-xiang had seen all sorts of goings-on along the frozen moat: children sledding, folks in the old days cutting out blocks of ice and hauling them to their ice-houses—but he had never seen so many smartly dressed young people, gliding around like swans on the mirror-smooth ice in the rink. Some pretty music was playing softly in the background, music that sounded kind of foreign but not too wild. The girls were all rosy cheeked and merry eyed, their silvery laughter twinkling in the air as they skated arm in arm with their young men, spinning and darting and flitting this way and that, their legs twirling and turning ever so gracefully. Li Zhong-xiang couldn't quite believe his eyes—he got dizzy just watching them.

Completely forgetting why he had gone there in the first place, he continued to stare at the figures on the ice. Had there been places like this when he was young? Probably. But back then they were not for the likes of him, a lowly coffin carrier. Never in his whole life had he ever lived it up the way these kids are doing! The more he thought about it the more furious he got at his son: bastard, you've got plenty of time left to enjoy yourself, but don't you know that for your father, singing some opera every night is all the fun that's left to him, just like the camel on the wagon? …

When he came out of Taoran Pavilion Li Zhong-xiang felt a little hungry, then remembered that he hadn't had much at dinner besides a couple of drinks—his son's words had stuck in his craw and killed his appetite. Right at the entrance to the park was a newly opened snack shop, a lively little place bustling with people. Li thought to himself, well, why not go in and get an order of wontons?

The people sitting inside were all couples who had just come from the rink, their skates still sticking out of the bags stowed beneath their seats. Many of the girls were wearing colorful wool knit caps, and their pretty perfumes hung coyly in the air. Slowly sipping their beer and soft drinks, couple after couple billed and cooed to each other, paying no attention to anyone else in the wonton shop. But as soon as Li Zhong-xiang stepped in the door he felt completely ill at ease. Although no one so much as glanced at him, he was sure he stuck out like a sore thumb. Turning on his heels he walked back out the door and down the steps, wondering to himself if Dezhi and his girlfriend would also be coming here in a little while. He could just see them now, rosy cheeked and sweet smelling just like everyone else. And like everyone else they would order one beer, two sodas and two bowls of wontons. They would bill and coo and gaze into each other's eyes and …

Shame on you! You're not jealous, are you?! Then all of a sudden he thought about Lu Gui-ying. She had probably remarried a long time ago. Why the hell did I give up so easily when she said, "Let it be."? Who cared what others thought as long as she and I were sensible about the whole thing? Why did I let other people run my life? What an ass, what a goddamn ass I was! And still am! …

Furiously Li Zhong-xiang kicked a pebble lying in his path and sent it scudding to one side. Then he turned onto the sidewalk outside the park and started to walk home.

A short distance ahead some maintenance work was being done on the roadway. Red signal lamps marched across the asphalt, and a big cauldron sat over a blazing fire in the middle of the sidewalk. While the roadwork crew waited for the tar to melt, a large crowd had gathered around to watch a game of chess by the light of the fire. From time to time there would be whoops and cries of:

"Head him off, head him off! Move the 'chariot' and head him off!"

"No! No! Pull back! You've got to pull your 'horse' back!"

Li Zhongxiang wasn't particularly interested, so he merely glanced at the crowd as he passed by—and almost walked right into the tar kettle. For whom should he see among the onlookers but Professor Wang himself!

Wang Jin saw Li at the same instant. Nervously he pushed his glasses back up on his nose and opened his mouth as if to say something, but nothing came out. His face was a study in embarrassment as he came over and joined Li.

The two of them walked along very slowly. For the longest time neither said a word. Finally, Li Zhongxiang couldn't hold it in any longer.

"Well, have you been there and back, or haven't you gone yet?"

"Where?"

"Where! Where are you supposed to go every day after me and Wanyou walk you out of the alley?" It was all Li could do to keep from blowing his lid.

Wang Jin walked for a while with his head down, then pushed his glasses up again before answering:

"To be honest with you, I … I haven't been going there for quite some time now."

"You mean, you mean …" Li Zhongxiang racked his brains for a more delicate way of putting it, but finally gave up. "Excuse my language. You mean you've just been jerking us off?"

Wang Jin sighed deeply. Again they walked along in silence until he said:

"I did go in the beginning, but after a while I couldn't see the point of it anymore. Let me tell you what happened. They took away my position as project director—the work unit said it was because of my poor morals and bad character. So why should I bother?"

"Tell me the truth. Were you fooling around or not?" Li Zhongxiang had a lot of faith in the work unit.

"If I was, would I have been standing there watching a chess game?"

"Then why don't you tell them what really happened? Why don't you tell them it's not because you want to get rid of that broad, it's because you've had it up to here with her nagging and her orneriness and—"

"I did, but they … Let me tell you something: Just because you say so doesn't mean they'll believe or understand what you're saying. I'm the rotten Chen Shi-mei and she's the saintly Qin Xiang-lian—now that's a lot easier for them to understand. That opera's been around for at least a hundred years!"

Li Zhong-xiang said no more. Professor Wang had a point there. Take himself for example: how many times has anyone really understood him? Bustling about in front of the theater, the pride and the pleasure he took in it—did anyone understand him then? Getting a little turned on outside the women's locker room—who else besides Lu Gui-ying understood that? Even your own son, the one you raised from the time he was still shitting and pissing in his pants—what does he understand about the fun you get from singing a little opera every night?

The night was not very cold, but a brisk wind was stirring. Little swirls of dust and litter rustled along in the gutter as the two of them walked on in silence.

Just before they reached the gate to their courtyard Li Zhong-xiang spoke up again:

"Well, Professor, when all is said and done there seems only one way to handle this: Look on the bright side and wait your 'turn.' That's what it all comes down to these days. Look at Stinky next door. He was riding along on his motorcycle one day when he got slapped with a big fine. Yep, you guessed it, that was back during the traffic safety campaign and it was his 'turn' to get it. When I warned my son to get a bell for his bicycle he said:

"Don't worry, all I have to do is make it through this month and I'll be all right."

Sure enough, all month long he took the back alleys to avoid the cops. Now that Traffic Safety Month is over he's home free. You're going through a rough patch at the moment, but someday it'll be a fellow's turn to make his case. Then you'll be in the clear and you can go back to writing your books."

Sometimes Li Zhong-xiang made a lot of sense, other times he was full of crap, so there's no point in taking him or his blather too seriously. But he always meant well, and Professor Wang appreciated that at least. Whereupon, with a nod and a smile that looked more like a grimace, Wang opened the gate, stepped into the courtyard and disappeared inside his house.

Li Zhong-xiang found his house still empty—Dezhi had not yet come home from his date. Lowering himself into a chair, Li's eyes fell on the five bottles of Beijing Daqu stacked under his bed. There was a time when the mere sight of them would have warmed the cockles of his heart, and if an old friend should drop by and happened to ask about his son, Li would have proudly shown him the bottles. But today for some reason an undescribable anger flared up inside him. Son of a gun, so you're treating me like a buddha, making me regular offerings of liquor and cigarettes to keep me happy and seal my lips, eh? To hell with that, I'm your father! Sure Professor Wang is a sadsack, but that's because he lets himself be henpecked. I'd never stand for that. I've still got what it takes to tell my own son a thing or two.

Li made up his mind: As soon as Dezhi came home he would ask him to please "withdraw" his liquor and his cigarettes. I'm no goddamn clay idol, I don't want any of this stuff. What I do want is to go singing every night over on Bean Street. You go tell that wench of yours it's nothing to be ashamed of. Why, back in '31, even the mayor himself sang in a production of Qin Xian-gtian at the Number One Theater over on West Willow Street, complete with costumes and makeup and everything! Your old man never got to go skating, never got to take a girl out for beer and wontons, and now at my age you want to stop me from singing too? No way!

Around eleven o'clock Dezhi came home.

But not a peep came out of Li Zhong-xiang.

"Dad, you didn't go … out tonight?" Dezhi asked as he set down the roast chicken he had brought home—probably as a special treat for his father.

"Mmmmm."

"Dad, if you get bored, why don't you watch some TV? I'll have enough saved up to buy a color set in just a couple of months."

Dezhi seemed to want to do everything possible to make up for his father's loss.

Well, how could Li Zhong-xiang stay angry at Dezhi? Where could he find a better son? Besides, so what if he stopped singing opera every night—it really wasn't a matter of life and death, was it?

"Dad, maybe you'd like to keep a lark instead? I'll get one for you tomorrow, and then it can learn to sing along with the one at Mr. Hao's next door. It'll sound so pretty, you'll see."

Li Zhong-xiang puffed at his cigarette in silence.

"Or Dad, maybe you'd like … some tropical fish?"

Still no answer.

"Or Dad, maybe—"

"I want to go fishing!"

With a roar Li Zhongxiang brought his son up short:

"Go! Get your old man two fishing poles! The best kind—a hundred yuan apiece! Don't be cheap!"

"Zhao-le"—that's a Peking expression meaning "to look for fun." It also happens to be Pekingers' favorite pastime. They're fond of it, they're good at it, and this fun is not too hard to find. Keeping a pet nightingale is a kind of fun. So is flying a kite. So is nursing a bowl of wine over a clove of garlic. Even when they talk about death, for instance, Pekingers don't say,"So-and-so died," they like to say, "he's gone to hear the crickets chirp"—as though they could find some fun even in that.

But I am repeating myself.

And every evening it is still the same threesome-Li Zhong-xiang, Qiao Wan-you, and Professor Wang—who walk out of 10 Winch Handle Alley together. Where are they going tonight? Besides singing opera, what other kind of fun would they find? Well, in a city as big as Peking, with people as fond of fun and as good at finding it as Pekingers are, there is really no need to worry.

One thing is for sure.

They are not going fishing, even though the fishing poles Dezhi bought continue to lie around gathering dust under the bed.

39.156 & 94.219 & 192.141 1. The Tree Stump 2. Festival 3. Father: Three Short Stories\fn{by Ah Cheng aka Zhong Acheng (1949-)} Peking, China (M) 12

As soon as sunlight appears at the east end of the street, a short, squat stump of a tree crops up. Youngsters passing by pay it hardly any mind, laughing and chattering as they bustle along. Hill folks come trudging in under towering bundles of twigs, all held together by swaths of burlap tied around their foreheads. Thus constrained from looking around, they too rush by without a glance. A plume of smoke wafts up out of the stump. An old man sees it, and, standing with his hands behind his back, asks hoarsely:

"Hello, have you eaten yet?"

Smiling faintly, the tree stump nods once or twice, answers the question by asking it in turn, and then, falling silent again, watches slowly as passersby hurry on their way.

The tree stump had no name, neither first nor last, people just called him Granddad—what did they call him when he was young?—no one seemed to know. And how many years had the tree stump seen? Nobody knew that either. Young and old, everyone on the street called him Granddad, from tiny tots to their elders to their elders' elders—no one could even tell which generation he belonged to, all they knew was he was old. So old, that he would smile slowly, smoke his pipe slowly, and when he lifted his hand slowly to wipe his face slowly, even his muscles—shriveled and near to transparent-would fall slowly, slowly back into place.

Once in a while folks from the big city would walk down this street, entering from the west and going east, peering left and right, looking up and down, poking around asking this and that and enjoying themselves no end—but just as they were about to turn back, they would catch sight of Granddad, and then their hearts would shudder, and for a good part of the day they would feel ill at ease. If by chance they started at the eastern end, the whole street would seem lifeless and gloomy from first to last, and though they may admire it for its antiquarian air, in the end they would feel a heaviness of the spirit and, sighing now and again, depart. Granddad was rather like an uninscribed stone marker, timeworn and weather-beaten, on which passersby could read the street.

The street was very old, very worn. The shopfronts were wide but not deep, room enough for no more than a shallow little stand, displaying packs of inexpensive cigarettes with brand names like Golden Sand River and Red Tassels, though here and there a few packs of Spring City would lie about, their foil wrappings covered with a layer of dust since customers for this costlier brand were few and far between. There were also shops that sold notions and dry goods, whose fresh bright colors stood out all the more sharply against the stores' battered wooden shutters. It is said that the look of the street can be traced all the way back to the Song dynasty—hard to believe, but, on the other hand, what's not to believe?

On either side of the street was a row of blackish tile roofs, with tufts of fragrant thorough worts\fn{Otherwise known as wild hoarhound.} springing up among the cracks. When the thorough worts were in bloom, the entire street would be filled with the scent of this favorite herb of the kings. Visitors from the city would then marvel and sigh, envious that their own plants in their ceramic pots back home—specially inscribed with the legend "Fragrance for the Study"—never grew with quite the same luxuriance and vigor.

The street was also very narrow, so narrow that if a peddler were to try to shift his shoulder pole crosswise from one shoulder to the other, the pole would thump against the stores' shutters on either side. Rows of cobblestones ran down the center of the street, while on each side was a foot-wide shallow ditch in which the street's sewage was drained away, the water running clear when it rained, and muddy when the skies were clear. Laden with kindling, wild game and medicinal herbs, men from the mountain villages would come down to the street to sell their wares. Afterward, the money burning a hole in their pockets, they would burrow into some tiny wineshop to drink until, many rounds later and thoroughly soused, they tumbled into the foot-wide ditch where they would sleep off their drunken stupor, after which they would drink again, until they found they had no money left, and then, all muddy and wet, they would stumble home.

The street lay at the center of a ring of mountains, in the valley plains that people in Yunnan call bazi. In fact, all the major towns in that province are situated on such bottomlands, and even the largest of them—cities like Kunming, Dali and Chuxiong—are to be found in bazis encircled by countless mountains, the only difference being that in their case the plains are broad and wide. This particular bazi, though, was very small—so small that when you stood at one end of the street, you could see the mountains towering over it on all sides just as if you were standing in a little alleyway in a crowded city, looking up at the tall buildings all around.

But small as it was, this bazi was still the flatland at the bottom of a valley, which meant it was at the confluence of several rivers and streams, which meant it was a center, however small, of commerce and culture. The commerce consisted of not much more than the buying and selling of firewood, rice, local products, dry goods and sundries. As for the cultural part, well, that's a very long story.

Legend has it that in the time of the Three Kingdoms, the brilliant statesman and strategist Zhu Ge-liang came all the way to Yunnan in hot pursuit after the renegade Meng Hu. Late one night, Zhu and his exhausted troops were passing by this street when, through the murky darkness, his eye was caught by an inscription pasted to a door. Intrigued, he stopped his carriage and got out for a closer look. Much to his surprise he found that it was a couplet written on two vertical strips, the first line of which read:

Where the ruler transforms himself, his subjects put on a new face.

The second, and complementing, line was:

Where the common man uses brawn, the gentleman uses guile.

What's more, across the top between the two vertical strips was a horizontal inscription that read:

If you perceive, ask not.

Zhu was astounded to find evidence of such an extraordinary intelligence in a region long considered to be primitive and uncivilized. The couplet—with its allusions to the divinations in the I Ching\fn{A manual of diviniations, probably compiled before the 11th century BC.} on change and on power, and finely balanced between the ominous and the auspicious—was actually about the art of governing, and, moreover, articulated perfectly Zhu's own strategy for subjugating the border tribes. Zhu was just about to look for the owner of the house in order to take his counsel when he realized that he and his troops were in a valley surrounded by tall mountains, and, fearing that the whole thing would turn out to be a trap, decided to press on instead.

Later, after his expedition was over, he sent an emissary back to the street, only to learn that no trace of either the couplet or its author could be found.

Well, a legend is just a legend, but perhaps this one was not without some basis in fact. For example, at every celebration of the lunar new year, the street would be festooned with propitious couplets, many of which would contain some unusual expression or a peculiar turn of phrase, which a person of erudition would recognize immediately as a quote from some ancient and venerable source. But if one were to ask the head of the house about it, he would most likely answer that he had no idea what it meant, it was just something he had seen his elders write, and they in turn had learned it from their elders, and that in carrying on this tradition each generation was merely hoping to bring good fortune to the family. Another local custom—a quaint and charming one—was to ink the bottom of a rice bowl and stamp it onto a couplet, to signify the wish:

May every mouth in this house be safe and sound, may the porkers in the sty be fat and round.

There was only one elementary school here, but many of its graduates did well enough to be accepted by the middle school in the county seat, and some even went on to the university in the provincial capital. After that they would find many opportunities to put their talents to use in distant places, and often it would be a good eight or ten years before they came home. Whenever a local kid won some honor or made good in that outside world, the news would somehow find its way back to the street and in no time at all would be on everyone's lips, and then pity the poor passerby who, when asked whether he had ever heard of so-and-so from these parts who had done such-and-such, should so much as hesitate at all, because he would thereupon be branded an ill-informed ignoramus, while the folks on the street would continue to bask blithely in their native son's reflected glory.

But what filled the residents of the street with the most pride was the fact that so many famous songsters came from within their midst. In the many mountains of Yunnan, people can often walk almost shoulder to shoulder and yet not be able to grasp each other by the hand, because between them would be a deep canyon, and it would take them at least a half day's journey up hill and down dale in order to meet face to face. Bored with trekking along in the mountains all by themselves, the solitary travelers naturally welcomed any encounter with another person and, with it, the chance to talk. But to raise their voices and shout at each other across the chasm? Well, one couldn't keep that up for very long, and besides, it would sound too much like a shouting match, and that would be no fun. So instead they would carryon their conversation in song—a way of communicating that was as entertaining as it was effective. And if the travelers who met across the canyon happened to be a man and a woman, it was only to be expected that they would tease and flirt with each other, letting fly all manner of suggestive puns that city folks would find too raunchy but that were so clever and witty one couldn't help but be tickled by them. Fortunately, while the verbal salvos could be as off-color as one pleased, any attempt to go beyond mere wordplay was a strict no-no. After the joking and the bantering were over, the two people would go their separate ways in the mountains, and that would be the end of that.

The story is told of the fellow who was once outsung by a woman: As she went on her way singing gleefully about her triumph, the news of his defeat was spread for miles and miles around, and after that he could not get any woman to marry him. He was so upset that he went to pieces, singing and squawking to himself incoherently, incessantly, until one day when he took a bad fall and ended up crippled. When the woman found out about this, she was so stricken with remorse that she decided to marry him, and they lived out their days singing to each other. And that, so the story goes, was the origin of many of the best and most popular songs in these parts. Then, in modern times, someone who made his living writing movie tunes came and collected these songs, and that was how they came to be sung across the length and breadth of China.

In spite of its small size, the street used to play host every March to a grand and festive event, when songsters from all the nearby settlements would gather on the surrounding slopes to take part in round after round of singing, until in the end a winner emerged—the one who had outsung them all. Afterward this champion singer would be treated like a conquering hero and invited to sing at each village in turn, where everyone would sit around a bonfire and listen, enraptured, to their honored guest until the wee hours of the morning and even beyond. From then on he would be recognized wherever he went in the mountains and accommodated in whatever he desired, including, of course, affairs of the heart.

So it was that whether young or old, male or female, any resident of the street who could not sing would be considered deficient somehow, like a mute almost, and not only would this hapless person be left out of all the fun, he would find himself left out of most other things in life as well.

Sad to say, this singing came to a sudden end when it was branded as one of the "Four Olds." In its place, the fn{A note reads: The Four Olds: old ideas, old culture, old customs and old habits—all condemned during the Cultural Revolution.} only songs heard in the street were those sung everywhere else in the country. People who overheard the school-children at their music lessons would sigh and wonder how these new songs, so insipid and monotonous, could even be considered songs at all. The music teacher came to be regarded as the number one nincompoop of the street. But as the days wore on, the street lost its own music. Once in a while, in an unguarded moment someone would burst into one of the old songs, but after one or two lines he would catch himself and then, his mouth agape, would freeze on the spot until he was quite sure that no one had heard him, whereupon he would quickly and furtively lick his lips in relief.

But while the street may have lost its voice, the songs lived on in the mountains, where you could sing freely and openly without being recognized. And so what if you were? Even if they went after you, how would they ever find you? Whenever someone in authority denounced this behavior at a meeting, people would pretend not to hear or act dumb, as if this were a story from the edge of beyond, and of course nothing ever came of it.

But with the demise of the songfests, the title of champion singer also went unclaimed for years.

Then suddenly, out of the blue came the news that people were beginning to sing again in Kunming, not just one or two here and there but thousands upon thousands of them all gathered together, and not just singing but competing again in one of those lively singing meets. There had been no explicit directive lifting the ban on singing, but as other activities became permitted one by one, people came to realize that they would also be allowed to sing their old songs again.

For more than a fortnight the street was abuzz with talk about the revival of the singing meet on its customary date in March. Residents of the street, determined to revive not only the songfest but also the special stature of the street itself, had gone to great lengths to organize the event and to publicize it among the neighboring villages. The news spread so quickly along the grapevine that soon everyone within a hundred miles knew about the meet. When the big day finally arrived, a huge throng almost ten thousand strong converged on the bazi and took their places on the slopes of the surrounding hills, their excitement rumbling in the air like distant thunder. Even officials from the county and the special administrative district were there: At one end of the street several tables had been set up for them, complete with a row of chairs behind and a row of tea mugs on top. It was an honest-to-goodness big event.

The first to sing was someone from the street, but no sooner had he finished when the response wafted down from somewhere up on the slopes, and thousands of heads turned in the direction of that sound. Undaunted, the first singer piped out his rejoinder, and again a retort came right back. So it was with each new verse, the sea of heads turning first one way and then the other, and the competition began to heat up.

But soon the audience noticed something rather peculiar about the singers: they were all middle-aged, in their forties at least, while the young folks just sat there, listening and laughing and clapping and calling out encouragement from time to time, but taking no part in the singing. There were probably some among them who could sing a little, but they knew that their repertoire was limited at best and insipid to boot, and so decided to stay out of the contest rather than embarrass themselves in front of all those people.

An old cadre from the special administrative district who was in charge of cultural activities sighed as he reminisced about the time, oh, thirty or forty years ago, when he came here for the same event and heard a fellow who could sing circles around everyone else and who, after a fortnight of competing against all the best songsters in the area, won the title of champion singer. When the cadre asked about the name of this singer, he was greeted with an indignant glare and the scornful reply:

"What! You mean you haven't even heard of Li Er?"

Sighing again, the old cadre wondered if anyone knew whether this Li Er was still around. One of the officials from the street who was playing host to the visiting dignitaries mulled this over and finally, after racking his brains, said:

"I wonder if that's Granddad?"

The word was put out, and, what do you know, the answer came back that Granddad was indeed Li Er and none other. The young folks, stunned to find out the old tree stump had had such a colorful past, were all kicking themselves for having paid such little attention to Granddad when they walked by him every day, and now they all rushed to join in the search for Granddad.

Actually Granddad was sitting right there in the throng on the hills, listening to the singing with a hand cupped behind one ear, all the while smoking his pipe and smiling slowly, as was his habit. Someone with a sharp eye spotted him and led the search team up the hill and through the crowd to Granddad. Not knowing what was going on, the audience saw there was a commotion on one of the slopes with a bunch of people standing around an old man, and they began to fear that after all the effort that had gone into reviving this singing meet some hooligans had come to disrupt everything. Even the singing stopped. But when word began to spread that a champion singer of long ago by the name of Li Er had been found, the news created a furor in the crowd.

Most surprising of all, at least to the young folks, was the spectacle of all those elderly grandmothers weeping softly as they pushed their way down the slopes to see the fellow they once knew, to ask him whether he still remembered the words of his songs and the girl he sang them to on such and such a date once upon a time?

The young folks, tactless and insensitive as the young are wont to be, naturally began to snicker and make fun of what they considered the unseemly behavior of these old women. Imagine their surprise when Granddad not only remembered but chatted amiably with all these grandmothers, each of whom had been a well-known songster in her own right back in the old days.

The cadres hurriedly got up from their chairs and offered them to the old folks. Someone stood up and, singing, told all the people on the slopes about what had just happened. The applause that swept all over the hillsides startled a flock of birds flying by overhead and threw them into disarray, but, finding no place to land on the slopes, the birds flapped their wings and went on their own way.

Naturally everyone clamored for Granddad to sing. A smile spread across Granddad's face, and with the laughlines still in place, he said slowly:

"I will need a partner."

Then, turning around, he asked one of the old women to join him.

Blushing pink as a peach blossom, the grandmother walked up to him daintily and, brushing away a tear, asked Granddad to begin.

Closing his eyes, Granddad let out a long note. Right away a hush fell over the audience, and even the sky seemed to recede. Though his voice was somewhat hoarse and uneven from years of disuse, Granddad had lost none of his easy charm and mischievous wit:

On yonder hill there stands a pipa,\fn{A note reads: Homophones for (1) a kind of tree with yellow edible fruit and (2) a plucked string instrument with a fretted fingerboard.}
Whose it is I do not know.
I'll carve and shape it into a pipa,
From my arms it will not go.

Before Granddad had quite finished, a thunderous round of cheers and applause broke out allover the hills. But this old woman was no ordinary grandmother either, and straightaway she was ready with her reply. Her voice still clear and bright, she also started off with a long note that immediately got a big hand:

Oh—I am the pipa on yonder hillside,
My roots are buried deep and strong.
Awake, oh fool from your pipa dreaming,
All you're clutching is your own little prong.

Once again the hills resounded with a roar of cheers and applause. The youngsters were all dumbfounded: Who would have thought these old folks had once been so bawdy and full of life! They may be old now, but they were still flirting and teasing, and the old songs—like fine wines—had aged gracefully, growing in richness and charm yet maintaining their zest and humor. And, in a trice, some smart young folks had learned the songs by heart.

Not concerned with winning or outdoing anyone, Granddad went on to sing a few more verses against some of the other grandmothers, all of whom beamed with pride and joy at the honor they were being given in front of all these thousands of people. Even their children and grandchildren were surrounded by admiring throngs, and, giddy with all this attention, began to hold forth as if they knew everything under the sun.

Someone from the street brought out some wine and proposed a toast to the old folks. As Granddad took a few sips, veins began to pop out all over his forehead. He was just about to sing again when he suddenly stiffened and fell backward, a trickle of saliva seeping out between his clenched lips. They rushed up to help him, only to realize that Granddad had suffered a stroke. He died as they were carrying him home.

From then on this street and these mountains once again resounded with their own songs. The name Li Er was etched in the minds of the young folks, who never tired of telling every outlander about this Li Er. Everyone felt that Granddad had erected a monument for this street, for these hills.

The wheat was just about to ripen when the grown-ups got a bunch of guns from somewhere.

It was the first time Xiao\fn{A note reads: "Little." All the children's names in this story are prefaced with "Xiao," a common diminutive.} Long had seen a real gun. Until then all they'd had in the village were those old-fashioned ones, the kind where you had to stuff the black gunpowder into the barrel. You also had to measure the powder didn't get wet, because it wouldn't catch, and then you'd have to dry it by stir-frying. You did this by taking an iron skillet and heating it over hot coals, the setting it on a cool surface before pouring in the damp gunpowder. Next you stirred it slowly, steadily, until there were no more wisps of steam. Finally you poured it out, and it was ready to use. One time, before the Cultural Revolution,\fn{Officially, The Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution (1966-1976), a period of time in which some tens of millions of local social, political and military leaders of Communist China were forced to undergo self-criticism in conformity with the theory that, if a revolution is to be permanent, it must be perpetual in its essential nature.} Xiao Rong's father was drying gunpowder when someone called him. He turned his head to look, and the powder exploded, leaving one whole side of his face permanently charred. Not only that, but the eye on that side looked like a rabbit's, and the ear like a tree fungus.

After that, the children were no longer allowed to watch, but the chickens could still run around the iron kettle as the powder dried.

Nor were the children allowed to go into the hills with the grown-ups to watch the hunting and risk being attacked by an injured animal. The people of Pingzhen took care of their children. If something unfortunate happened, what good would it do to cry or carry on after the fact? If an accident could be prevented, then it should be.

But the children were allowed to watch executions. Pingzhen was not too far from the county seat, and right outside the village was n open stretch of land on the riverbank. A criminal sentenced to death in the county court would be brought over in a big truck and flung down onto the floodplain by the river. A guard would check him over and make him kneel with his head down on his chest, waiting for the final order. The children would cover their ears, but they could still hear the shots ring out. Afterward the prisoner would fall onto the ground, blood streaming from his gunshot wounds. Sometimes a person who had been shot dead would still twitch and turn, slowly, until a man in white walked over and did something to the body, and it would lie still. Xiao Long was really curious about how the man in white did this, but he could never slip past the guard who blocked the way.

Once, just before the order to fire was given, a prisoner suddenly got to his feet and began to run. The firing squad was accustomed to shooting at stationary objects at close range. So, while the convict kept running, not a peep came out of the guns. The crowd that had gathered to watch began to jeer. Then shots rang out. But they missed their mark. More shots—but still no hits. By this time seven or eight rifles were firing away, but the prisoner was already beyond their range. Everyone on the riverbank was hysterical with laughter, even the other convicts waiting to be executed. The squad leader and two of his men went after the escaped prisoner and finally brought him back. Holding back their guffaws, the soldiers carried out the execution. The incident was later retold and passed along in many different versions. What Xiao Long remembered was how the man had stumbled as he ran, hobbled by the big round stones on the floodplain.

So this wasn't the first time Xiao Long had seen a real gun. It was just the first time he had seen a real gun up close. While his father wasn't looking, he even touched it. It felt cool.

When it came time to test the gun, Xiao Long's father looked round for a target. Xiao Long's mother told him to aim it at the sky, so he wouldn't hit anyone. But he told her that's what guns were for—hitting people.

Xiao Rong's father came looking for Xiao Long's father, saying, "Hot damn, this time we've got the real thing. Those Red Rev Rebs\fn{A note reads: Short for Red Revolutionary Rebels. Political Struggle during the cultural Revolution in China (1966-76) often devolved into factional fighting, with each faction seeking to distinguish itself from its rivals by, among other things, assuming a "more revolutionary than thou" rhetoric that was reflected in its name. Such names were often abbreviated in daily usage.} are going to be in for it!"

Rubbing a bullet head against his pants leg, Xiao Long's father answered, "Yes, but I hear they got hold of some guns too."

"Not even close," Xiao Rong's dad countered. "Besides, the Fifth Detachment is on our side. That Captain Hu—you know, the chubby one, joined the Eighth Route Army\fn{A note reads: the army led by the Chinese Communist Party during the War of Resistance against Japan (1937-1945). Soldiers who fought in this army were accorded great respect and prestige after the Communists assumed power in 1949.} back in '42—he keeps the higher-ups informed about what's going on."

"I hear the other side's got people with good connections too," Xiao Long's father said as he pressed the bullet tip against his cheek.

Losing his temper, Xiao Rong's dad cocked his head to one side and shouted, "Who's side are you on, anyway, the Red Reb Central's\fn{A note reads: Short for Red Rebels Central Command, another typical name for one of the many factions operating during the Cultural Revolution. At times such groups became the only administrative authority in given localities. It was essentially government by teenagers (whose basic customary organization is a gang); but it prospered because Mao Tse-tung and his intimates began it and fostered it, and because for several years, it was allowed to practice its brand of revolutionary purity without interference from the army—or, indeed, from any traditional political or legal authority. Mao seems to have been convinced that young people were the true repository of revolutionary change.} or the others'?"

Xiao Long's mother stood in the doorway and said, "Don't argue when you've got guns in your hands. Why are you arguing while you're waving those guns around?"

The two men picked up their guns and went outside, shifting their weapons from one hand to the other as they rolled up their sleeves. Xiao Long began to follow them out of the house.

"You come back here this instant!" screamed his mother.

Startled, the two men stopped and turned round to look. Xiao Long's mother ran over and grabbed her son, muttering angrily, "Haven't you seen enough killing already?"

The two men broke into laughter and went on their way.

The Red Rev Reb gang was the first rebel organization in the county, but it took only three days for people to figure out what was going on and to set up their own groups, one after another. Because it was close to the county seat, Pingzhen was a natural target for organizing, first by the Red Reb Central, a newer group, and later by the Red Rev Rebs, the original gang. So now all of Pingzhen's accumulated problems—from the most piddling to the most pressing—and the resulting bad blood among the villagers found new channels and champions for its expression—by force, if necessary. Because each side swore allegiance to Chairman Mao, the confrontations had intensified and escalated until, finally, guns entered the picture.

The children of Pingzhen were not allowed to watch grown-ups drying gunpowder or hunting, and now, they were also forbidden to play with the children of those who belonged to a rival faction. When the Red Rev Reb controlled Pingzhen, their children could go outside to watch demonstrations, rallies, and members of the Red Reb Central gang being paraded in the streets as counterrevolutionaries and beaten with sticks and chains. And, of course, when the Red Reb Central wrested control of Pingzhen, their children could go onto the streets to watch demonstrations, rallies, parades, beatings of Red Rev Reb members, and so on.

At the moment Xiao Long was quite bored. He looked around at the chickens, then up at the birds and the sky, all the while hoping to hear a few gunshots. A long time passed, but he heard nothing.

Slowly he sidled over to the courtyard gate and stopped. Then he stepped outside and, again, stood still for a few moments. Leaning against the door frame, he stuck his hand under his shirt and nonchalantly scratched himself on the back for a little bit, then on the belly. Suddenly he darted from the door. When he didn't hear his mother calling after him, he began to walk more confidently down the deserted street, hugging the wall just in case.

Not much had changed on the street. As usual there were some new slogans plastered over the old ones, and, as usual, a chicken was foraging among the globs of rice glue at the foot of the wall. Stomping his feet, Xiao Long ran a few steps closer. The chicken quietly darted away, cocking its head as it eyed Xiao Long. Angry that the chicken hadn't even bothered to cackle, Xiao Long stood by the wall and wouldn't let it get back to its meal. Unfazed, the chicken strutted casually to the other side of the street. Spreading out one waiting and one leg, it stretched itself languidly and shook its feathers a few times while leaving a pile of droppings on the ground. Then it began pecking at the feathers on its chest and back.

Pretending his hand was a gun, Xiao Long was aiming it at the chicken when, suddenly, a shot rant out from far away. Absorbed in its grooming, the chicken was oblivious to this. Xiao Long, though, was so excited he began to shout: "Xiao Rong, Xiao Rong, my dad's shooting a real gun!"

In the twinkling of an eye Xiao Rong came running out of the gate next door, followed in hot pursuit by the screams of his mother: "You little bastard, go ahead, just die in front of my eyes, you brat. that crazy dad of yours, he's going to get shot one of these days. Go ahead, run, you little son of a bitch."

As the two boys raced through the village, a sense of life began to stir in the street.

A big locust tree stood at the edge of the village. In summer, caterpillars dangled from its branches, gnawing at its leaves until they were full of holes. Next to the tree stood a smithy, and inside the shed was a brick furnace. When the blacksmith was at work, the coals glowing in the furnace grew brighter, then dim, with each blast from the bellows. The children loved to watch the sparks fly from the anvil every time the hammer struck the red-hot metal. They watched until the blacksmith set the hammer on the ground, upright, and, without casting a glance at anyone, muttered: "Let's rest a while." Although he could easily have boiled water over the fire in the furnace, whenever had to, because one of the children would always dash home and bring back a kettleful of boiled water. It was a great honor to have the blacksmith accept one's offering of water. When the break was over, the donor, puffing with pride, would invariably assume he had a right to stand closer to the action, so the blacksmith would have to yell at him to get out of the way.

Xiao Rong ran into the shed and scooted onto the top of the furnace to catch his breath. Xiao Long joined him, also puffing and panting. It had been a long time since the shed had been used as a forge, and the place was now filled with a stale, musty odor.

"My mom and my dad had a big fight," Xiao Rong told his friend. "He even slapped her hard on the face."

"Your dad and my dad went shooting together," Xiao Long replied. "Did you hear the shot my dad fired?"

"That shot was fired by my dad!" Xiao Rong argued.

"No way!" countered Xiao Long. "My old man would get to shoot before yours did!"

"You're full of shit!"

"YOU'RE Full of shit!"

Suddenly a voice behind them said, "Are you guys playing a game?"

Turning around, Xiao Long and Xiao Rong saw that it was Xiao Quin, whose house was right behind the forge. They fell silent. Xiao Quin's father belonged to the Red Rev Reb gang.

Leaning against the door, Xiao Quin lifted her leg and fixed the setrap on her shoe. Then she set her foot down and stomped it a few times for good measures. Neither Xiao Long nor Xiao Rong said another word about the guns. Instead, they stared straight ahead at the road leading out of the village.

"Look, my mother made me some new shoes," said Xiao Qin.

Xiao Long took a sidelong glance. "What's so special about new shoes?"

Xiao Quin replied, "They're for the festival tomorrow."

Drawing a blank, Xiao Long asked, "What festival?"

"It's Children's Day, silly!" Xiao Qin replied.

"Look, if there's no school,\fn{A note reads: During the cultural revolution schools were closed in many places for long periods of time.} there's no Children's day," quipped Xiao Rong. "You can only have Children's Day when you have school. When the teacher says it's time to celebrate this or that, then we have a holiday. That's the way it always was, don't you remember?"

This reminded Xiao Qin of something else. "Hey, I heard that Teacher Zhang's leg is still broken. My mom says that if they can't fix it, he'll become a cripple."

“You mean Baldy Zhang? He was beaten by that teacher who came down from the country. Did you guys see the beating?” asked Xiao Long.

“yes, I saw it,” Xiao rong replied.

“So did I. Boy, he hit him harder than my father beats me,” Xiao Long tittered.

“What are you guys going to do tomorrow to celebrate?” Xiao Qin wanted to know.

“Us?” Xiao Rong hesitated for a moment before weaving in the direction of the fields outside the village. “We’re … we’re going to play in Deep Gully, right, Xiao Long?”

Xiao Long answered gleefully, “Right. you’ve got to celebrate a festival with special games. That’s much better than new shoes.”

Pleased with themselves, the two comrades jumped down from the furnace and, arm in arm, began to head for home.

Xiao Qin called after them, “Can I come too?”

Xiao Long stopped. He hemmed and hawed but didn’t say anything.

“Please let me come,” Xiao Qin pleaded. “I promise I won’t tell my parents.”

“OK,” Xiao Long finally agreed.

“Can Xiao Liang and the others come along too?” Xiao Qin added.

This time it was Xiao rong who answered: “OK, but you guy will have to listen to us, because we’re in charge. We’ll go there tomorrow night. And make sure the grown-ups don’t find out!”

That night, at dinner, Xiao Long’s father announced: “We’re going to see some real action. Those Red Rev Rebs want to take over all the water in the irrigation ditches, including what we need for our wheat fields. We told them no way, that water is ours, and they can just forget it.”

Xiao Long’s mother said, “Well, we’ve gong through this before, threats and all. But now, with all these guns … why don’t you stay out of it this year?”

Xiao Long’s father didn’t reply. He took a mouthful of food and began munching noisily.

Xiao Long took the opportunity to pip up, “Ma, tomorrow’s a festival.”

“What festival?”

As soon as he mentioned Xiao Qin, Xiao Long wanted to kick himself. But neither his father nor his mother seemed to have noticed. They just said, “Oh,” His mother added, “you’re right. Well, then, tomorrow you can wear the jacket you got for New Year.”

Only the chickens and the dogs knew that the children of Pingzhen had sneaked out of the houses and were now walking along the riverbank. When Xiao Long pointed out that the grown-ups might still see them there, Xiao Qin reminded him that he and Xiao Rong had said they were going to play in Deep Gully. So they all crept through the wheat fields and made their way to the big irrigation ditch.

By then the setting sun had lit up the top part of the eastern bank and was bathing it in an orange-red glow, but the other side of Deep gully had already let off the heat of the day. Even the grass was beginning to perk up. The water in the ditch splashed and gurgled as it flowed along. Down in the gully the children could shout and holler and not be heard by anyone, so they screamed and screeched to their hearts’ content as they ran along the slopes of the canal. Their only other companions were the insects that buzzed about and the swallows swooping from one place to another.

Then the moon’s reflection in the water grew smaller and smaller, and darkness settled in. Three or four stars twinkled steadily in the sky, while many more fireflies flitted here and there.

Suddenly, Xiao Qin exclaimed: “I lost my flashlight!”

“You brought a flashlight along?” Xiao Rong asked incredulously.

“Didn’t you guys say we were going to play night battles?” Xiao Qin retorted That’s why I brought a flashlight. If I don’t find it I’m going to be in big trouble, because my dad and mom will find out I’ve been here.”

Everyone got all excited and began to feel around on the ground, looking for the flashlight. When Xiao Liang found it, they all crowded around.

“How does it work?” asked Xiao Long.

“You push it this way, and the light comes on. Pull it back and it goes off,” Xiao Qin told him.

“Let me see,” said Xiao Long as he grabbed the flashlight. A little flick, and a beam of light gushed forth. “Wow!” he cried as he aimed it at the sky. Insects caught in the glare became blurry streaks of white.

Suddenly shots rang out.

Stunned, the children fell onto their stomachs. Bullets whizzed overhead, each trailing a think, bright strand of light, to be met by another barrage from the other sides.

Much later, the shooting finally stopped.

Xiao Long was the first to find his voice. “I bet they can’t hit us down here in the gully!”

Xiao Qin burst into tears and said, “Let’s go home!”

“Let’s do it one more time,” countered Xiao Long. He pushed the switch again, and once more the threads of light stitched back and forth across the night sky.

In their excitement and glee, the children sprang to their feet and flicked the switch again.

Xiao Long thought he heard a stone ricocheting against the side of the gully. Turning to look, he saw that both banks were suddenly awash with the red glare of a setting sun. Only this sunset was full of noise.

The flashlight flew way up in the air. When it finally hit the water, it was still shining. Gradually a school of small fish, bathed in the red glow, began to nibble at the round lens.

One evening in March 1987, I was at Xia Yang’s New York apartment. The place had been remodeled into a studio in great haste, and it looked so old that one might expect it to crumble at any moment, although in fact there was no such danger. What I did not expect, however, came through a long-distance call from the other part of the globe—my father was seriously ill. I immediately made preparations to leave for home.

My family had lived under the shadow of my father’s serious illness ever since the early 1960s. In the summer, I remember, when we and our neighbors were mingling noisily in the yard, mother used to come out to hush us. We were too young to keep father’s illness in our minds all the time.

Father came down with hepatitis while he was being reformed in a labor camp in Lushan. The illness went from acute to chronic, and eventually developed into the cirrhosis that was to cause his death. Just when we were prepared to face father’s imminent end, the Cultural Revolution started.

Back in 1957, father had been branded a “rightist.” So he was merely a “dead tiger.” He was “criticized and struggled against,”\fn{A popular form of political activity during the Cultural Revolution. These strug- gle meetings were endorsed by the party and organized by the Red Guards and mass organizations. At these meetings “enemies” of the revolution were criticized and often physically abused} placed beside “active” enemies at mass meetings, and struggled against;\fn{Those who had been criticized and put in the category of “enemies” before the Cultural Revolution. Although they were not the main targets of the Cultural Revolution, they did not escape. They were dragged out again for criticism, mainly for symbolic purposes} confessions, labor—all were invoked for the purpose of humiliating him symbolically. Then he was sent off to a cadre school.\fn{A re-education-through-labor program for party and government cadres as well as for intellectuals during the Cultural Revolution. It was based on a letter from Mao to Lin Piao of May 7.1966}

In those days, whatever happened to father was taken for granted, even his certain death. But father did not die then. He actually lived to see 1979.

That was an important year to father, as was 1957. I remember one day before the New Year’s, a phone call took me home to see him in the evening. Father sat by the desk, his back toward the light. He always faced the desk light when he worked and turned around when he was tired. Mother said,

“A man from the Department of Organization\fn{A major department of the Party, in charge of recruitment, promotion, and other personnel matters} came to tell us that all cases for the rehabilitation of rightists in the country are to be cleared before New Year’s. Father is on the list. What do you think of this?”

The only thought I had was that the name Zhong Dianfei\fn{The name of the author’s father} would no longer be preceded by adjectives.\fn{After he was branded a “rightist” in 1957, his name, whenever mentioned officially, was preceded by that adjective} But I did not speak my mind because I knew this mattered very much to mother.

After 1957, mother single-handedly supported her five children, her mother, and her brother, who was a college student. It is impossible to measure, even now that I have grown up, the amount of hardship she went through. I remember that our clothes were handed down from the older to the younger brothers. The material was the most durable kind of corduroy. When we walked, it rubbed between our legs and produced scratching noises. All our clothes were homemade in the traditional style, which could be worn back and front, leaving two pale worn spots on both sides where we sat.

When they could no longer be worn, grandma would tear them apart and use the rags to make soles for our shoes. Grandma always complained about the pain in her shoulder. She had to hand-stitch over twenty shoes for us every year.

We raised chickens with their eggs in mind. In winter, the chicks lined up along the windowsill, picking dried paste from between the lattice and the paper, leaving the window as tattered as a temple after a storm. For people everywhere in China, those were the hard times. For a time, locust tree blossoms ceased to be only herbal medicine.\fn{Locust-tree blossom is a traditional ingredient of Chinese medicine; but during the famine years (1959-1961) people used it as food}

Shan Shan, my youngest sister, was weak and sick from malnutrition; Da Lu, my third younger brother, once came back with mother beaming with excitement because they had found some young sweet potato vines to feed the family; my fourth younger brother, Xin Zuo, nearly stuffed himself to death with meat at a dinner party to which he was invited—the first in our family had he died. Yes, life was harsh for everybody.

But I cannot imagine how father endured life in the labor camp. Sitting in a chair, I pondered how to explain to father that I did not think much of his rehabilitation. I did not want to hurt mother's feelings. Father might also get upset because, after all, this was a matter that had altered his entire life.

That father was a "rightist" affected our lives too. My eldest brother, Li Man, could not go to senior middle school. It was because children from families such as ours were not allowed to enter college, and senior middle schools prepared students for college. Li Man was a talented student. His grades were always good. Even today, it's hard for me to imagine what kind of psychological impact this must have had on the mind of a boy only in his teens. But father insisted that he repeat the senior middle school entrance examination the following year. This, I think, was father's way of maintaining faith. In 1978 when he passed the examination and was eventually allowed to go to college from the village where he had been sent to settle,\fn{Colleges and universities were closed down for five years after the beginning of the Cultural Revolution. When most of them reopened after 1971, the university entrance examination system was replaced by the working-class recommendation system in order to emphasize the ideological background of the candidates. In 1978, with the downfall of the Gang of Four, the old examination system was restored. Li Man passed the exam that year and went to college } father mentioned it only briefly in a letter. I wonder what else was on his mind when he wrote the letter by the desk light.

When I reached eighteen, father made a point of telling me: from now on, we are friends. From this I realized that I had reached adulthood. My feelings at that moment must have been similar to those of the young men in ancient China after their coming-of-age ceremonies: the feelings of self-confidence and gratitude, and a sudden surge of inner strength. So that evening I finally conveyed the words of a son from the standpoint of a friend.
This is what I said:

"If I were overjoyed tonight, my past thirty years would be reduced to nothing. As a person, you have already affirmed yourself. There is no need for others to judge you. If the power of such judgment is in the hands of others, they may well support you today and deny you tomorrow. Therefore, in my view, your rehabilitation has no real significance outside of mere technical convenience. Moreover, the political vicissitudes that have afflicted you are not without blessings. They have forced me to rely on my own efforts to acquire confidence in life, although for you these twenty years must have been brutal."

Father replied with a smile"

"Now the tenure of my Party membership has been confirmed as forty years. Just imagine, half of the time I wasn't in the Party. Your mother has made some beef stew today. Why don't you go and see if yon can buy some noodles. We're going to have beef noodles today."

Mother was happy too, telling us how she couldn't have bought the beef if she hadn't asked so-and-so for help. Father then asked if she had garlic. How can we eat beef noodles without garlic!

After 1979, father started to write a great deal. His essay "Reflections on Film Literature" published in that year's Literary Criticism reminded many people that he was still alive. The China Film Publication House planned to put out a volume of father's essays written before 1957. So father sent me out to track down his old articles. The newspaper section and the magazine section of Peking Library are located in two separate parts of the city. Since I had just been transferred back to Peking from the countryside and had not yet found work, it became my full-time job to shuttle every day between east and west Peking. Government libraries do not have an index system. I had to look through every issue and page of the newspapers. Magazines with their annual indexes were a great deal easier.

For his article "The Gongs and Drums of Film," father was singled out for criticism by Mao Tsetung himself. I was only eight years old at the time and did not know what to say when questioned by my teacher. So I parroted that father was a bad man. I did not use the word “enemy” because I was too young to understand what “enemy” meant. Only twenty years later was I finally able to read this article with my own eyes. I made a photocopy and took it home to father. He also had his own feelings about it. For fear of offending certain people, the publisher named the collection The Sunken Land.\fn{In the early post-Mao era, although the Gang of Four had been condemned, Mao’s image was still protected and his thought still held up as the only ideological guideline in China. Since Mao had personally criticized “The Gongs and Drums of Film,” to use the same title would suggest opposition to Mao’s thought, and Mao’s associates who were still in power could find fault with it. According to Ah Cheng, his father settled on the title Sunken Land because he wanted to indicate that a person condemned by the party disappeared from the face of the earth. Such had been his fate for the preceding twenty years}

Father preferred to use the old title, “The Gongs and Drums of Film,” but had to compromise in the end. A friend who was a seismologist would have bought the book by mistake had I not told him that it was not the kind of work of reference he thought it was.

Many people began to visit father at home. Mother reminded him to remain vigilant against certain faces. Although father understood and deplored the rapid switch from cold shoulder to glad hand, he was hospitable and offered whatever was called for.

Father knew many people who did not survive. He recalled that in the 1950s he attended the premier showing of Lao She’s\fn{Pen name of Shu Qingchun, a famous social novelist in China and regarded as the chroincler of life in Peking just as Dickens chronicled the London of his day. Many of his best works were published before 1949} play, The Young Task Force. In the midst of socializing with the guests, Lao She turned to father and lowered his voice:

“Is it worth your while to come and see such a play?”

Father told many stories about Zhao Dan,\fn{A famous actor and writer from Shanghai respected not only for his artistry but also for his intellectual integrity} but he wrote only one article about him: “Zhao Dan’s Last Words.” It echoed what Zhao Dan had said in his own article, “Policies Too Specifically Imposed, No Hope for Art and Literature.”

My father and I used to discuss whether the professionally ignorant should lead experts.\fn{An argument of long-standing in Communist China—whether intellectuals and technical workers should be supervised by non-expert Communist cadres (the “red vs. expert” dispute). Before and during the Chultural Revolution, those who opposed this view were criticized} I maintained the view that they should. Experts should concentrate on their profession. If they become political leaders, they would be unskilled for the task. Wouldn’t that be wasteful? To quote ancient sages:

“The incompetence of one makes room for many others to be competent; inactivity in one nurtures the energies of many.” Father added,

“It is actually the experts who are better at distorting facts and framing charges. Leaders with professional expertise can hit your vital parts, doing internal damage, while leaders ignorant of the professions can at most make a fool of themselves. For less pain and damage, the latter are indeed a much better idea.”

Although I seldom offer grand theories, I use the phrase “I think” rather frequently. Father therefore told me that when doing self-criticisms\fn{During the Cultural Revolution, everyone who had been criticized had to write such confessions repeatedly to show repentance} in the cadre school, he was frequently caught for saying “I think”: how dare he use “I think” even when he is being criticized! This is extreme bourgeois individualism! Father was very grateful to a man in the same cadre school who had been labeled a “historical counterrevolutionary.”\fn{People so labeled “not because they actively opposed the revolution but because they had worked for the previous regime or had been members of the Nationalist party} Seeing that father had trouble getting his self-criticism approved, he offered to revise it for him. The product was not only approved, but also became a temporary model for other inmates. When father inquired about his tricks, this person replied,

“I used to work for a Nationalist newspaper; my professional capital was the ability to write this stuff.”

What a pity that the confessions and self-criticisms from all over the country had been destroyed, father thought.\fn{When the Cultural Revolution ended, most victims were rehabilitated and their written confessions and self-criticisms were officially destroyed as unpleasant reminders of their persecution} It would have been a good idea to publish a selection of the best self-criticism literature. When Ba Jin\fn{Pen name of Li Feigan, one of the most highly regarded novelists in modern China} proposed the construction of a Cultural Revolution Museum, father said that the exhibits should include the various confessions and self-criticisms.

I added the suggestion that a dictionary of Cultural Revolution terminology be published, or else future generations would find it difficult to decipher these documents. One such example was the term jiao dai\fn{Confession and self-criticism}. Another is zui, an adverb meaning “very,” which was triplicated before certain nouns.\fn{For example, the standard way of saying “the great leader of China” became “the great, great, great leader of China.”} Our descendents might think that their ancestors were, for a time, all stammerers. This could create complications for ancient anthropology, ancient medicine, and ancient semantics in future generations. My comment brought roars of laughter from father.

Father had two things which made me envious: his laughter and his nose. When I was too young to evaluate the judgment imposed upon him, his laughter convinced me that he could not be a bad man. According to physiognomy, father's nose was a sign of sure fortune and prosperity. In reality, however, his fate did not fit with what his nose suggested. I think this had to do with his involvement in films. After all, it has only been a hundred years since film was invented, too short to be embraced by physiognomy. But then, one can hardly reach such a conclusion, since the good fortunes of most film stars do have to do with good looks.

Every year, a film or two would run into trouble. I asked father why. He replied:

"Films are the only art that can get into the central party headquarters at Zhongnanhai.\fn{That part of the Forbidden City in Peking where Mao and other leaders lived and where the Central Party Committee has its offices} Access to such a place brings trouble to them."

I, for one, disagreed with the theory that film scripts should be more literary. Father questioned this:

"Well, how are you going to make the censors who read only classic literature understand what you want to do in the film?"

I then realized that father had chosen to do something he had always known was dangerous. His nose, no matter how fortunate it appeared, could not have saved him. Mother was always angry at father because he did not bother to get proper rest. I think I understand him. Certain people simply cannot afford to rest. To them, rest means giving up, and then death approaches.

Heavy snow in New York. In America, people are not in the habit of seeing guests off at the gate. So Xia was waving farewell only at the studio door. For a moment I thought I was back in Peking and could go straight to the hospital to see father and to joke with him. Father burst out laughing and said,

"Go take a bath."

The Dream of the Red Chambert ends with a scene of heavy snow, a scarlet cloak, and two lonely lines of footprints. What one man leaves behind is not the same as the chaotic imprints in Manhattan.

Father died on March 20. I arrived one day too late, both in theory and in practice, due to that arbitrary dateline across the Pacific.

Before the cremation, streams of visitors came and went. Some had genuinely looked forward to father's passing. This made father appear more like a soldier than the meek Chinese scholar he had actually been, who did not even have the means to take a proper bath. In the summer, he carried water out to the yard and bathed in one of the corners, surrounded by a piece of cloth. In the winter, public baths were like hospitals. One had to wait for one's number to be called be- fore squeezing inside.

Father was getting old, so I went with him lest he fainted. Soaking in the hot water, he closed his eyes tightly, painfully enjoying the luxurious comfort. I had the urge to ask him what he thought was the greatest happiness in a man's life, but I did not for fear he would blurt out his feelings. Whenever father stayed in a hotel for a conference where there were bath facilities, he would always invite friends of a similar fate to go and take a bath. Then they would sit around, their hair dripping wet, and talk about things other than bathing. Father did the same thing when he was in the hospital. The nurses were not at all surprised to see his wet-haired visitors. Ever since the beginning of Chinese civilization, shower and bath had always been regarded as the most important things for health next to food and drink. Bathing was such a serious matter that it was supposed to have strong effects on the heart. After the Han dynasty, the Japanese imitated the bathing techniques and greatly elaborated on them. When I asked father about his impressions after he had come back from a visit to Japan, his answer was "Could take a bath any time." What else? He answered,

"So we won the war."\fn{According to Ah Cheng, his father was with the People's Liberation Army during world War II and fought behind enemy lines. In 1945 he witnessed the surrender of the Japanese army. When he went to Japan and compared its postwar achievements to China's backwardness, he could not help wondering at the hollowness of the Chinese victory}

Although the China Eilm Art Research Center was responsible for arranging father's funeral, the Peking Film Studio offered to send special staff along to help. So did film studios throughout China. Mother was deeply appreciative but declined them all. Nonetheless, Wu Tianming\fn{A famous film director and head of the Xi'an Film Studio} managed to send people from the Xi'an Studio to help. He himself was standing outside the funeral hall, arms folded, in utter silence. People from the Shaanxi area are among those who, since ancient times, have watched many happenings in China. He understood what this scholar had done in life, what he had hoped for, and what he regretted..

I went with my elder brother to collect father's ashes. The front hall of the crematorium was empty, no container in sight. It was only with the help of a worker that we finally found an iron dustpan sitting in one of the corners of the hall. We bent over to see father in gray ashes. The laughter had gone, and the nose too. Only a few droplets from his melted glasses lay frozen on the bony forehead.

"The Gongs and Drums of Film," The Sunken Land, Essays of Inspiration, and The Technique of Films were the only few offerings in front of father's portrait, books he labored from his very heart.\fn{According to Ah Cheng, he feels sad that due to the political circumstances, his father, an intelligent and committed person, toiled for his entire life to produce only a few works. There is a tremendous sense of waste}

40.164 Wood\fn{by Ng Hui Bun (1949-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (F) 9

The rain was pattering. The mountains looked even more blurred. I began to feel a little annoyed. Had she got it wrong? Perhaps he was just an ordinary poet. I should have learnt more about him before I came.

As soon as I stepped into the woodland, I began to feel somewhat uneasy. The trees there were of all kinds, their hard sprawling branches blocked the way almost completely, and his house was at the very end of the path. I really wondered whether I should push on. It was early winter. In this deep valley where the sun could hardly penetrate the dense trees, my light coat offered me little protection against the chill of the misty November wind. Then, the path came to an end.

His house looked shoddily built, the walls and roof were some medium-sized timbers put together. The timbers were still overgrown with mosses and mistletoe. In front of the house was a clearing with weeds and logs; the soil was a sort of pale yellow. As I came near the house, I discovered that there was no door, just a very narrow entrance. Some hoarse and creaking sound came faintly from the inside, and it travelled gently, yet unmistakably, in the wind.

I dared not enter rashly, so I stopped for a while by the door. The house didn't seem to be fitted with windows, it looked quite dark inside, quite deep, too. I called his name and knocked lightly on the wooden walls, but there was no response. I hesitated, then went in.

The house was empty. In the feeble light, I saw him standing in the middle of the room, his back towards me, sawing a section of a trunk. His long coat, in sober color, reached almost to his heels. I called his name again. He did not answer and just went on sawing, backwards and forwards, backwards and forwards. His movements, slow and relaxed, were more like those of someone posing rather than someone at work. Then he laid down the saw, picked up a plank, and used it to carefully push open the big skylight above him. The wind gushed in at once, sending the dust on the floor swirling. In the white sawdust dancing in the wind, I saw him turning around slowly. Light from the skylight enshrouded him like a drape, then spread around him. And yet, what an old and desolate face it was! I had thought that he was only about sixty and would still be full of life—the life of poetry—but what I saw now was an old man, gaunt and withered.

"I am a reporter from a magazine house. Can I talk to you?"

He picked up the saw, put his hand on a log lying horizontally on two sections of trunks, and sawed lightly on the log. He was bald; his hair, almost the color of wood, fell to his shoulders from below his earlobes and the back of his head. In the harsh sawing sound, his dry, wiry, and slightly wavy hair quivered. He was wearing a long, loose, old-fashioned coat, the sturdy, bulky shoulders of the coat standing in sharp contrast to his shriveled neck. It reminded me of the kind of coat I had seen in old movies. I went up to him and said:

"Can I talk to you?"

As he sawed, his eyes were not set on the wood, but at a distance about two feet beyond. His pupils were a strange color, like a tea stain, and they also spread like tea stain, making it hard to tell the pupils from the white of the eye. His mouth could hardly be seen, as he had lost all his teeth and there was nothing to support the muscle around it. Deep furrows ran along the sunken muscle and curved right into the mouth. They looked like the sun's rays etched on copperplate. The sun was a void at the center, a black sun.

"I've heard people reciting your poems and I really like them."

I had come across his poems by chance and they had stuck in my mind. It was the Mid-Autumn Festival, my colleagues were having a gathering at a friend's house. I was a little apprehensive of this kind of gathering. I was used to being alone. My interests were different from theirs, or perhaps I was too gauche and tongue-tied to join in their conversation. But I did listen to the young woman when she recited a poem.

They were teasing a colleague about her romance. Amidst the noise and excitement, I saw a huge dragonfly flying into the room through the gap of the half-opened blinds. It was a beautiful dragonfly, with an elongated body almost completely lemon yellow in color, and transparent wings criss-crossed with dark brown veins. It circled low and rested on the coaster beside me.

After a while, it flew off, flitting about over people's heads. Where had it come from? Why did it bother to fly to this city through the dust and the cold?

They were still laughing.. No one seemed to have noticed it. Then, I saw the young woman sitting slumped in the rocking chair next to me raise her head slightly in the direction of the dragonfly. She had soft shoulder-length hair and one of her hands was resting on the arm of the chair. My heart started to pound, faintly. I had seen her before—she had written many charming and sad stories for the magazine. Sometimes I ran into her, but she just bowed her head and walked past me softly.

Soon, she noticed me too. She bit her lower lip and smiled quietly, brushed back the hair draping over her forehead, and settled back into the chair. I took a step forward. They were still chattering behind me. The light seemed too glaring.

"You saw it?" I asked.

"Yes," she replied softly, glancing at me, and lowered her eyes again.

"Beautiful, isn't it? Few of them are dark brown in color."

"Yes, it's beautiful."

She leant an elbow on the arm of the chair, then rested her chin on the back of her hand. Under the white lamp, the color of her scarf looked soft and mellow.

"Do you know this poem about a dragonfly?

Between dream and silence you skim,
Stirring the hesitation in the water

"What?"

"'Stirring the hesitation in the water'—that might be used to describe it," she said lightly.

"I don't know it. How does the whole poem go?"

She recited it softly. Her head tipped to one side, she fiddled with the end of the scarf on her knees and rocked slowly in the chair, coming in and out of the light, in and out of the light. The glimmering light and her soft voice made everything appear unreal. Then, she looked up and smiled shyly.

"You like it?"

"Oh, yes. I've never come across people writing in that way."

"I'm surprised you like it. Your poems are very different."

A tuft of her hair was dangling down and she tucked it back behind her ears. Then, she stared at the bits of paper on the floor.

I felt a little hot.

"Whose poem is that?"

"It's the work of a very strange man. He came to Hong Kong a few years ago. My aunt knew him in the past, and likes his poems very much. She said he had published two volumes of great poems, but she hasn't seen him for years."

"Where does he live now?"

"On one of the outlying islands. I can get his address from my aunt. If you like, I can give it to you in a day or two. It's difficult to find him, though. Some of my friends went there once but failed to meet him. Maybe you can have a go. You write poems; he may be willing to talk to you. I do want to know how he's getting on, it's just that I don't feel like venturing out on my own."

She rolled the scarf in her hands and bowed her head slightly.

My heart was pounding madly, probably because of the heat. Feeling a little thirsty, I stretched out my hand to reach for the cold water on the table. But I was so nervous I dropped the coaster, which fell by her heels. I put down the glass at once, but she was already bending down slowly for the coaster, her scarf brushing the floor.

"Your scarf is soiled."

"Oh!" Then she broke into a smile again.

"Can I read your poems?"

But there were no books in this house. It was almost empty, not even a bed could be found. All that could be seen were boards of different sizes, piled high along the walls, some long, some short, some thin as a sheet and half transparent, others cracked, looking like the face of a clock, or hollowed out in the middle, like a wheel. Many were covered with moss, patches of gray clustered together in the corners of the walls. They were soggy, and smelt of damp. Many were rotten and useless, but still had grains. What did he want them for? Did he sleep on them?

"I've heard that you've been here quite a few years. Do you still write poems?"

She had told me that he had stopped writing poems at least a decade before he came to Hong Kong. In all that time, he had published just a few articles. Nothing else was known of him; there was no way of finding out more information. And now his silence made it hard for me to continue asking him questions. Was he the right man? Could it be that he and the poet just happened to have the same name?

Watching his expressionless face as he went on sawing, I began to feel a little uneasy. He didn't seem to be concentrating on his work, and he didn't seem to be deep in thought. He must have noticed me, but why didn't he pay me any attention? I had asked him a very simple question. Why this silence? Once in a while, he'd raise his head and look at the sawdust quivering in the white sunlight, but he didn't stop sawing. The rust-colored saw continued to slice through the frosty air, backwards and forwards.

Then I left. What kind of person was he? He puzzled me. Did he really write poems? Had she perhaps made a mistake? When I came back from the visit, I could not help phoning her and asking her to come out and meet me. Well, just to ask her about him.

Standing by the lamppost opposite her house, I felt a little nervous as I waited for her, my coat fluttering against the occasional car that swished past me. I was the sort of man who could not be sure of a lot of things, who was afraid of loneliness and yet could not get along well with others. Nothing decisive would happen to me.

"Have you been waiting for long?"

She walked towards me gracefully.

"Not really."

It had rained earlier on and the road was filled with big puddles dark with the reflections of trees in clumps. Shewas wearing a chequered dress, white on beige, and a long scarf with alternating bands of beige and brown. In this gloomy weather, it greeted me like a cool, bright smile.

"I wanted to meet you because I want to know something about him."

"Haven't we just discussed him on the phone?" she smiled and said gently.

I had no reply.

"You really went to see him?"

"Yes."

Then I told her about the meeting in detail.

When I came to an end, she frowned, as if in disbelief.

"I can't believe it," she said.

"What did you think he'd be like?"

"I never imagined he'd be so old and gaunt. I learnt his poems from my aunt. When my aunt came to Hong Kong, she stayed with us. Whenever she couldn't sleep, she'd recite his poems. I slept in the bed beside her, and gradually I remembered the poems by heart. But lately my aunt has changed. Doesn't say much, and every so often, she raps on the desk with her knuckles. I'm afraid of her."

She stretched out her hands to receive the falling leaves.

"You know many of his poems?"

"A dozen or so. There's one I like very much, Bottle. Let me recite it to you."

Then she began. Her hair streamed in the wind behind her back, revealing the gentle lines on her forehead. Her soft voice wafted rhythmically through the chilly air. When she had finished, she looked up and asked:

"Do you like it? Don't you think his poems are gentle and charming? They are full of love and hope. My aunt told me she used to have a big album bound between white boards. It contained all his works which had not been included in his poetry collections and were precious. But, someone took it away when they began criticizing him. She couldn't get it back no matter how hard she tried."

"What did they criticize him for?"

"I don't know. My aunt didn't say. She's not the chatty type. She only told me that he had never written any love poems and had always been alone."

She kicked a stone before her carelessly, slowly unraveling the scarf she had rolled up in her hands. Then, letting her hair drape over her face, she asked softly:

"You haven't written any love poems either, have you?"

A motorcycle was fast approaching us from behind. It sped past us, but the loud roar of its engine vibrated in the air for a long time before it died out, like a quenched flame. I felt a little flustered.

"Look at that motorcycle!"

"I can't understand some of his poems though. I just think they're so unaffected, so charming. Anyway, I like them. Well, I don't understand many of your poems either, but I like them too."

She broke off at the stem a leaf which was leaning towards her, and rubbed it gently on her face. She tilted her head to one side, looked at me, and grinned. She was not the kind of girl who was always happy, but in the sunlight, her face glowed and she looked quite radiant. I caught a whiff of the fresh scent of leaves on her, I could hear the gentle rustle of her clothes as she walked beside me. But I was aware that a lot of things were just fleeting shadows, shadows of what I hoped would really happen. A tuft of my hair was tickling my face, and I flicked my head to toss it back. I took a deep breath, then a step forward. I'd better not go off into wild flights of fancy. I wanted to say something, but I couldn't find the words. She also grew quiet and we walked in silence. I didn't take the chance, so nothing happened.

"This is where I live," she said at last.

For many days after our meeting, I could not calm myself down, and kept wondering why she was so fond of his poems. She was a sensitive girl. When I had seen her in the past, she had always looked down and walked on softly. It was hard to believe she could discuss his poems with such childlike tenderness. It had been a long time since I had last met a girl like her. However, I was no good at taking my chances, I worried for no reason. I could feel faintly that I was going to spoil something. But why did I keep thinking about her? Weren't the poems enough to think about?

What kind of person was he really? Was he as wonderful a poet as she had made him out to be? What had come over him? How had he got through those few decades? I couldn't find out anything more about him. The friends I knew well—none of them had heard of him. And there was just no way of finding his poetry collections. How could a person just vanish into thin air? What had he gone through? Where could his poems be?

In the reference room of our magazine house, I went over the bound volumes of Humanities Literature published over the last twenty odd years. I didn't find anything.

In the end, I learnt about an institution specializing in providing information on Chinese literature and history for foreign scholars. I went there on the pretext that I was helping a French reporter, who had recently arrived in Hong Kong, to find some material on modern Chinese Literature, and borrowed several rolls of microfilm of a few literary journals. Then I borrowed a microfilm reader from a professor friend and studied the microfilms carefully.

But still, details about him were scanty. None of his poems could be found, and there were just a few articles denouncing his works. His poems were accused of being glutted with images and lacking in clarity. One critic said he was like a goldsmith, interested only in refining words in his own laboratory, and he used excessively accurate words to "create a philosophical maze." In an age when there was a general trend towards clarity, he sought to lead the masses to an "open grave of obscurity." Strangely, however, another critic attacked him for writing in too "objective" a manner and for being too "frosty" in his attitude. His descriptive passages, this critic said, were too plain; there was no implied meaning, no love, no concern for the people in society, and no social consciousness. Yet, another critic dismissed his poems for being too materialistic. His poems, according to this critic, "have a tendency to fetishize objects and reveal an infatuation with the industrial civilization. While they are good at describing cities, there is no glorification of progress to lift the spirit, no far-sighted vision about the future, and they show a lack of confidence in humanity."

These comments confused me even further. How could a man be charming as well as frosty, full of love and yet lacking in concern for others, have hope in things and yet no confidence in humanity? Why were these critics' views the polar opposites of hers? Were they talking about the same man?

Night had fallen. The moon looked a little clumsy and grimy.

It couldn't possibly be she who was mistaken? Her face—so soft, so still—rose up in my mind. And that pair of fair hands shading her eyes as she looked at the sunlight that crept through her fingers! I felt a gentle surge of something in me, but when I was about to reach out for it, it was gone. Oh, why was I thinking about these things? I decided to visit him again. If I could get him to talk to me, then everything would be clear. Surely, she'd be interested to know too.

When I arrived at his house, I could not help but hesitate. The sun was blazing, the soil a dazzling yellow. The material I had brought with me felt even heavier.

Inside, everything looked the same as when I last visited him, except that the place seemed even dimmer. The skylight was closed. There was no light except what could seep in through the narrow slits around the window pane. I could just faintly make out the window pane, blurred at the edges: it looked like a wound that might heal well. By the door lay a newly felled trunk; its branches, still uncut, stretched clumsily to the corner of the wall.

"It's me again."

I had not expected any replies from him, still I could not help but feel a little sad. What had I come here for? I had no way of knowing if he would speak to me or not. I looked at him, at a loss what to do. He had no shoes on; his feet, covered with sawdust, seemed to have turned the color of wood. His movements were light, it was as if he was working on a delicate job, and there was no salvaging it if he went wrong. He pulled the saw as far backwards as possible, waited a while, then pushed it gently forwards. Between these two movements, he drew a luxurious arc in the air with his elbow. Sometimes, when the saw got stuck in the wood, he would stop, sweep away the little twigs sticking out from the teeth of the saw, then pull it backwards again. Suddenly, I thought of his eyes. They were not the color of tea stains, they were the color of wood—the brown sawdust scattering in the air.

"Can I talk to you again? I came once before … also at this hour … I am from a magazine house …"

He still did not look at me.

"I just want to ask you a few simple questions … I've heard your poems … and I like them. Why don't you write poems now? … Or is it just that you don't publish them? … Your poems are charming, why did some critics say you're frosty and obscure? … When did you last publish your poems before you came here …? Are you living alone …? Why have you sawn off so many logs? Do you mind stopping for a moment? … Oh well, it doesn't matter, it's all right if you don't stop …"

The whole house rang with my voice. Outside, the wind was rustling the trees. My throat was seized with a pricking pain like that brought on by a coughing fit. I grasped a twig beside me and rolled it on my palm, the bark hurt my skin.

"Could you please answer my questions? I write poems too … I just want to know your views on poetry. I really like your Dragonfly poem—really like it. Say something, please. I will understand. I write poems too … Not great poems, but I keep on writing. Please say something. I can understand. I really write poems myself—no kidding. I can understand everything … Say something, please! I'm not making this up—do believe me. I really write poems—really … Shall I recite my poems to you?"

I was sweating allover, my mouth seemed to be watering with acid. I felt suffocated.

Then I heard a voice reciting a poem. Bitter, trembling, that voice floated into the chilly, murky shadows. I panicked, was that my own voice?

The wind began to rise from some remote mountain area. The distant sound of wind sweeping past the branches, rocks, and brown soil could be faintly heard. The room was filled with swirling sawdust and dust. The pale sunlight penetrated through the clouds and crept in through the slits between the planks on the roof, enwrapping him in a tangle of dusty, quivering lines. He looked even less like a living man. Suddenly I was filled with rage. I scratched hard a section of a trunk beside me, leaving deep white lines on the surface, which looked bloated, swollen and ugly. How could he be a poet? He was just a madman working on a ridiculous job at the wrong time and in the wrong place. His past setbacks had worn him out, there was nothing left in him except some habitual movements. Why did I bother to come here? What had he got to do with me? I wanted to move him with my poems, but he just went on marking time with the rhythm of his saw. He was living in another world, where there was no memory, no feeling, no shadow, no people, and no self. Why did I bother to recite my poems to him?

For days after I left him, I didn't feel like talking to anyone. It could be because I had never tried to reach out to people, never given anything to anyone, and had never even been aware of this. I had been wasting my life and I could no longer afford to do so. But perhaps there wasn't much I could give now. When we were young, we were so foolish, so wasteful, we could hardly imagine that anything would come to an end. But now, even before the end was in sight, we just grasped anything that came our way and wouldn't let go. But why did I keep thinking about such things? I stayed at home for days. Outside all was quiet. Only snatches of conversation from some television programme and the occasional barking of a dog drifted in. The sounds rose slowly and steadily into a perfect arc, and then was no more, in sorrow gone. Sometimes, I thought I heard an aeroplane passing by, then everything returned to silence.

I never again touched the films I had borrowed; the microfilm reader was littered with old newspapers, many of which were stained. He simply wasn't a poet, why should I bother?

And yet, a letter from a far-away friend changed all that again.

I had wanted to write a novel about palace dance in the Tang dynasty, and had asked this friend to help me find a few old dissertations in his local library, as the material there was more abundant and complete. One morning as I left my house, I received a small parcel in the mail. The sun was shining brightly on my desk before the window. I sat down and tore off the wrapping paper. Inside were photocopies in different shades—extracts from various journals and books. Under the sunlight, I looked over them. Then, in a blank space on the last page of an article, Blue Sorrows, Ensemble Dance, I found a poem written by him.

It was a poem about trees. Different kinds of trees. Trees dead or dying—rotten and disfigured by the wind, sunk deep into the ground, or struck dead by lightning, cleft apart, their branches stretching out like scorched fingers. Trees washed away by waves, shapeless or misshapen; trees ravaged by weather; trees, sulphur-yellow, fallen to the ground, their bearing lost. But behind all these, behind the lime, grit, scars, and salt, there was

The firmness, and the scent of wood,
The scent of growing trees
Weaving its way through the delight of night
And the colors of seasons.

It came into his room, and his fingers caressed the rough texture of the trunk, the pricking sensation of the bark. And still the rings continued to grow, round and round,

Rising above the abyss of destruction,
Decline, decay, and death
To join the songs of rivers.

My face was now in full sunlight. There was a touch of winter scent in the air. On this December morning, the distant mountains were shrouded in mist—a light veil of yellow. I could feel faintly a warmth spreading through my body. It was a feeling at once familiar and remote. There had been a time when this feeling was lost, I couldn't tell why. But now it came back to me again in the hazy winter mist. Was that why he continued to work? I remembered how he had stood there, his back arched, sawing the logs slowly and tenderly, letting the planks crack in his hands and filling the narrow space of his room with the fragrance of wood. It was like a hint, a sign of perseverance, like what he said in his poem. But what had he been through to make him end up as he now was?

I wrote at once to ask my friend to help me find out more information about him. I also continued to work on the microfilms. There was, however, nothing about him in the journals for many years after.

I began to feel a little apprehensive. Had he vanished? Just like that? Then, in the March issue of the 1958 volume, I found a notice carrying his apologies to the public, in which he admitted to a few mistakes he had made in an article he'd written on poetry. The notice was short, the mistakes were not explained. And in a 1967 article published under the name of Jiu Feng, I found this sentence:

> He could have spent these few years on a careful self re-examination; unfortunately, he made no attempt to consolidate his progress; instead, he took the road of retrogression and strayed farther and farther.

What had happened to him in those few years? And for what reason?

I spent three whole days and nights on the microfilms, not giving myself a break until I finished reading everything. But his name never appeared again. Was that when he had stopped writing poems for good?

I told her at once all the things I had learnt, hoping that her aunt could help. But her aunt could no longer speak. His poems, though charming, could no longer soothe away her haunting memories of the past. She remembered only her life in those days, endless days when she stayed shut up in a house, listening to the dull, repetitive sounds droning in the cold street outside. Thud. Thud. Thud. It was the sound of death. A vehicle drove away with a carload of dead bodies.

Was he thinking of the past too? He was old: how much longer could he last? I was a little frustrated. Why was it that one could only get to know another person within such narrow confines? Why was the link between people so fragile?

I already felt a little uneasy when I was talking to her on the phone. I had been going on and on about my discoveries, then I noticed the iciness coming from the other end. When I arrived at the coffee shop, she was already there. She had on a grayish-blue woollen sweater, and was leaning against the brown plaster wall. She stirred her drink slowly. Her hair draped over her face again. It was still a soft and peaceful face, but the sun was shut out. I told her the story again from the very beginning. She listened quietly. Sometimes she raised her head, and then continued to stir the coffee, which had long gone cold. When she talked about her aunt, she rested her chin on her hands, and her voice became cold and distant, as if that was already consigned to the past. The air extractor above me rumbled, I gathered my spirit.

"His poems are really great!"

I quickly drew out from my pocket that poem of his which I had copied down and handed it to her. She read it for a long time, put it on the table, and said lightly:

"It's great, but there are parts I can't quite understand."

I wanted to tell her my views, but her indifferent expression choked my words. She was gazing at a poster on the pillar.

"You want to go and see the German puppet show?"

"No, not really. It's so cold."

It started to rain when we left.

I felt defeated. Two people had failed to meet due to some time lag, and could not be together. This could well be all my fault. I had messed up everything and now she had withdrawn into her own web. There was nothing I could do to save the situation. I was a man who didn't know what to do with love. I supposed I could only look for a safe haven somewhere else. But what could the poet give me? Throw me into even greater confusion probably.

Why was it that everything always came to a deadlock at a certain stage?

Time passed; nothing happened. I kept waiting. For a long time, there was no news about either of them. Perhaps everything had simply vanished. I spent my days waiting.

After several months, I got hold of a diary. The diary was quite thick. It belonged originally to my friend's uncle, a book-seller of pirated editions. He passed away not so long ago, and his family gave my friend all his books and manuscripts. My friend sold most of the books, keeping just a few for reprint, and the manuscripts were laid aside. I was in his house and happened to be leafing through the diary when suddenly I saw his poems. Without thinking twice, I asked my friend to let me have it.

The whole diary was filled with poems. Beside his poems, there were the works of many other poets—good ones, bad ones. About twenty pages were scribbled with his poems. Not many, but good enough for me.

Having got hold of the diary, I read and re-read his poems at one sitting, not stopping until dawn arrived. It was early summer now, and a few stars were glittering in the clear sky. I caught a whiff of something, like someone cooking wheat. In the car-park behind the house, the sparse shadows of trees swayed visibly. It was very tranquil. Occasionally, some wandering cats ran by and rattled the gate, then all was quiet again. I felt a wave of uneasiness rising in me. Was that because of her? But still, I felt happy.

I read his poems again, and once again. Then, I closed the diary and sank into deep thoughts.

His poems could be divided into three main categories. Poems in the first group were about simple feelings and ordinary things—the rising sun, the rain, the rocks, some plums, autumn tinted with the color of palm trees. Poems in the second group dealt with streets, cities, houses, and buildings. The last group was purely about objects. There was some truth in what the critics said about him, but they had all taken the part for the whole—they had simply seized one aspect of his attitude towards life, imposed on it their own attitudes or beliefs, and then claimed that this picture of him was a full portrait. My understanding of him was no more complete than theirs, having read so few of his poems.

Still, I had the feeling that he was more interested in the simple things of everyday life than in abstract concepts. He loved the seasons; he loved salt, bread with a sweet taste, coffee, sleep, fresh air, friendship, and trees; he loved what you could see and touch. If some of his poems were charming, that was not because of his choice of subject matter but because the way he presented to us this ordinary world was extraordinary and charming. He let us see that our monotonous everyday life could also be charming, let us feel that there is poetry in even the most mundane things.

He rarely wrote about himself. He always wrote about objects and events in the outside world, as well as the relationship between the two. That was why some described his poems as "objective." He seldom wrote about sad things either, or chanted slogans. He planned everything he wrote with meticulous care. Yet, beneath the apparent detachment and behind the objects and events he described, one could feel the turbulent flow of his emotions, his warmth and concern for people. In his poem Window, he wrote about a man sitting alone in a house and then hearing a blind fortune-teller walking past his window, the tap of the fortune-teller's walking stick resounding in the desolate darkness of the night. The poem was written in a plain style, but its impact was strong. We could feel the darkness outside the paper window, the blind man groping and shivering in the cold. We could hear, in the clang of the fortune-teller's gong, an ominous note presaging the fate of man.

His poems about streets and objects were also not purely descriptive. The various shapes, colors, and arrangements were all richly suggestive in meaning. One was about a big red oil tanker parked right at the edge of a flight of stone stairs. It was a very powerful poem, heavy with a sense of impending thunderstorm, of danger and disaster. It was amazingly close to a prophecy. His most recent poems were mostly descriptions of things broken or discarded—cracks in the walls, plaster flaking off the ceiling, crushed earthen jars, abandoned wooden carts, cement floors, cold glints on broken copper knots, wood fragments wrinkled or gnarled, and worn-out bamboo baskets—as well as hanging objects like strings, hangers, timber articles, coat-hangers, deer carcasses. The threat of death was palpable, but there was also an unyielding spirit, a stubborn refusal to give in.

And that explained all.

When I finished reading, it was already about six in the morning. I rang her at once. She was probably still in bed, but it didn't matter. Surely she would be glad to hear this news, and then everything would be different.

The phone rang for a long time before I heard her sleepy voice. I had really woken her up. I told her my discoveries at once, then hurried out to wait for her in the park opposite her house.

The park was still in cool shadows. An old newspaper was swept by the wind to the middle of the lawn, then swept away again. Under the yellow lamp light, I saw dewdrops glistening faintly on blades of grass.

Then, she came up to me slowly, a figure drifting through the mist. In the dim morning light, she looked even more like an illusion. I waited for her to sit down on a bench, then gave her the diary. She took it without a word, the expression on her face like a kind of sorrow at dawn. She put the diary on her knees, glanced at the cover, then turned to the pages I had marked with narrow strips of paper, and read each page carefully. Sometimes, she turned back the pages and read again. Her head lowered, her hair clinging to her face, I could only see the silhouette of her forehead and nose. In the gentle breeze, under the yellow light, I could feel a drowsy tenderness. Then, she closed the diary and raised her head.

"What do you think?" I asked.

She looked a little confused, her head tilted to one side. The lights in the park began to go out, the sun had not yet risen. The hair on her forehead was streaming back in the wind. How pale she looked!

"I like several of them, like Plaster on the Wall and Rock. I think they are great. But many of the rest I don't much care for. Why did he write so many poems about things shattered and damaged? Decay and disintegration terrify me. Once started, there seems no stopping the process, the sinking will continue, on and on."

Her head bowed even lower. I saw her feet gently rubbing the sand on the ground.

"It won't be like that," I said in a low voice.

Then, silence fell on us, heavily, steadily, like a gray net over our heads. The sun rose gradually, but I was overcome with despair. She had withdrawn completely into her self now. When she had reached out to me earlier on, I did not have the courage to take the chance, I had hesitated. And now, the only remaining link between us was gone. She was no longer interested in him. She would feel we had nothing in common anymore, and there was nothing much we could talk about. I, too, was a sinking person: what could I give her anyway? She was left with her own silence.

Then she stood up. It was still quite dark. I offered to take her home. She didn't turn back and just waved her hand perfunctorily. In silence, she slowly disappeared into the gloomy mist. Occasionally, the headlight of a passing car would mark her out in clear relief. And then, the shadows returned.

I felt icily cold. Would everything vanish just like that? I was the sort of man who didn't know how to handle my feelings, didn't know how to manage things.

Back home, I locked myself in my room for days. Full of frustration, I read his poems again and again. Now I had nothing but him. But could I, like him, rise from loneliness, above all that had been lost or destroyed, and continue to grow? Light was streaming in through the windows, the glass top of my desk basking in the warmth of the sun. I could smell in the wind the fragrance of trees from afar. Anything was possible, I thought. I decided to visit him again; he was now my only comfort.

When I reached his house, it was past ten. The trees in the sun were glittering white and silver. The lingering morning mist made his house seem much more pleasant, and his back less crooked. I called him, then sat on a pile of planks by the wall. The fresh scent of newly felled logs filled the air inside the house. Why had I never noticed it before? Next to the entrance, there lay some long twigs overgrown with green leaves—they were not there last time. The skylight was still closed, I went and opened it. The strong summer sunlight poured down in a cascade, waking the dust in the house and dispersing them hastily in the air.

Then, I began to recite my poems. In the sawdust and sunlight, I felt much more tranquil. I had no more reservations, no more fear, no more sorrow, and no more expectations. I recited slowly and smoothly, beginning from my first short poems. I was not a great poet, and had written many shoddy pieces. But I wanted him to know me, everything about me—all my uncertainties, fears, stupid mistakes, happiness, as well as my recent sufferings. I, too, was a simple and taciturn person, so I could only rely on my poems. He would understand me. I was not looking for any response, but I knew he was listening. Was he really? It didn't matter. I heard the hoarse and creaking sound that came from his saw. The aroma of the newly felled logs caressed my face, I felt the dazzling sunlight and the beating of my heart. Wisps of summer mist rose in gentle twirls into the sky, drifting past his loose coat and rippling over his face. The wind stirred the new leaves on the ground; the crickets chirped. We, too, seemed part of the summer days.

Then darkness fell slowly. Thereafter, I spent many Sundays there. I recited all my favorite poems to him, and told him why I liked them. Snatches of my memories; something from my imagination; some possible meanings. I had never talked so much and probably never would again. But I had never felt more at ease.

Now and then, we would fall silent, and listen to the wind sweeping through the trees and heading straight to the flood-land stretching for miles behind the house. In the calm autumn days, there was sometimes just the continuous sound of sawing and our own breathing. Sometimes as the crimson evening light of late autumn streamed in through the skylight, we would watch the sawdust dancing in the air. Sometimes, we just watched the cloudless sky, or the twittering birds in the distance. And in these peaceful, tranquil afternoons, I felt as if I had been fully compensated—for everything that I had lost through fear and hesitation, and everything that I had failed to obtain because of my own inadequacies.

And in all these days, he still remained silent. The wind and rain came in and out through the narrow entrance. He kept his head lowered and went on working, the creaking of his saw echoing in the room. But, for all his habitual movements and silence, I could detect some slight changes.

On fine days, when the sun no longer dazzled the eyes, he would raise his head, look at the skylight and sway weakly for a good while before stopping. When the wind smoothed out his hair over his shoulders, and the cold sunlight fell on him, I could see a face glowing with a light tan.

Many a time when I recited to him my poem about shabby streets, he would bend down, pick up the saw, rest it in the slit of a log half-sawed, and brush the handle of the saw lightly. Then watching it quiver, he would sigh as if he was humming a harmony. And when I finished, he would carry on with his work quietly.

I noticed too that he no longer just ate the leaves on the trees, and he spent more time outdoors felling trees. When the wind and rain leaked from the skylight, he began to take shelter in the corner of the walls.

All these signs—so consistent and yet so ambiguous, perhaps even meaningless—could not but shak me.\fn{The text has: shook.} I wrote a long poem.

It was a poem about him, about his loss, his obsession with wood, his perseverance, the pose he struck with his movements, his silence, his despair in decrepitude, and also his gradual opening up.

I spent hours on this poem, all at one sitting. I was exhausted when I took it to read to him. I sat on the floor leaning against a big log lying horizontally on the ground and recited the poem quietly. The sun rose. I felt a warm current flowing gently in my body. To my surprise, he was listening carefully, a newly sawn piece of wood clasped under his arm, his head tilted slightly to one side, so rapt he let the wind drape his long brownish hair over his face. Outside the faint sound of branches dropping to the ground could now and then be heard, and the air was rich with the scent of bamboo flowers. I was breathing lightly.

Then, I saw him raising his head slowly and looking fully at me. His eyes were the boundless color of wood. I felt a little stunned. This was the first time he had looked at me in all those days. The sunlight was trickling through his hair and over his clothes, highlighting the edges of his hair and clothes in gold. Amidst the dim surroundings, he looked even less real. I bit my lower lip lightly, and watched him sitting down slowly, weightlessly. The sun had risen even higher, its rays pouring in through the skylight and splashing all around us, engulfing us in the white light of the rising dust.

Then, I saw him handing his saw slowly to me. The air was still full of the shadows of dust. All of a sudden, I felt a strong gust of wind sweeping in from outside. I shivered, I caught in the wind the strong stinking smell of wood and the damp gathered in the shade. The swirling sawdust choked me, I wanted to roll up my collar. I felt a chill running through my limbs. The sun was still shining. I heard the sound of my body condensing into ice. I froze.

41.114 & 63.18 & 151.8 1. Happiness Street 2. The Homecoming Stranger 3. Moon On The Manuscript: Three Short Stories\fn{by Shi Mo aka Bei Dao, Zhao Zhenkai (1949-)} Peking, China (M) 20

A late autumn morning. The street was bleak and desolate. A gust of wind rustled the withered yellow leaves on the pavement. The dreary, monotonous cry of an old woman selling ices could be heard in the distance. Fang Cheng pulled his old black woollen coat tightly around himself and kicked a stone on the ground. It wedged itself in the iron grate in the gutter with a clunk. The call from his sister just now had been really too fantastic: young Jun had been flying his kite in this street yesterday afternoon, yes, this same bloody street, when all of a sudden, he had disappeared without a trace; in broad daylight! His sister's sobs, followed by the beep signalling the line was disconnected, had upset him so much that his head was still ringing. Sun, the section head, was sitting opposite him at the time, and had given him an inquisitive glance, so he had put down the receiver and done his utmost to look normal.

Across the road, a row of locust-trees had been sawn down to the roots, the trunks lying across the pavement. A yellow Japanese forklift was parked by the side of the road. Four or five workmen were busy attaching hooks to the sawn-off trees and loading them onto a large truck to the tooting of a whistle.

Fang Cheng approached the old woman selling ices.

"Such fine locust-trees, how come …"

"Ices, three cents and five cents." The shriveled mouth snapped shut.

"Comrade …"

The old woman's strident voice robbed him of the courage to repeat his question. He crossed the road to the truck. A young fellow who looked like the driver was leaning against the front mudguard smoking.

"Excuse me, what's going on here?"

"Don't you have eyes in your head?"

"I mean, what are you sawing the trees down for?"

"Who do you think you are, going round poking your nose into everything? Are you building a house, and you want us to leave you a log for the roof beam? I'll tell you straight, I can't even get one for myself."

Flicking away his cigarette butt, the driver turned round and climbed into the cab, slamming the door behind him.

Fang Cheng bit his lip. A middle-aged woman carrying a string bag was walking past. He caught up with her.

"Excuse me, where did you get those turnips?"

"At the greengrocer's over the way."

"Oh." He smiled politely and walked with her for a few steps.

"How come these trees have been cut down? Such a shame."

"Who knows? I heard that yesterday a kite got caught in the trees, and some young rascal climbed up to get it." She suddenly fell silent and hurried off nervously.

A long shadow slipped across the ground. Fang Cheng swung around. A man wearing a leather jacket pulled a green army cap over his eyes, gave him a swift glance and walked past.

It was only then that Fang Cheng noticed the high outside wall exposed behind the stumps of the felled locust-trees. The plaster was so old that it had peeled off in places, showing the large solid bricks underneath. He took a deep breath, inhaling petrol fumes mixed with the sweet scent of locust-wood, and walked back along the wall. Before long he came upon a recess in the wall enclosing a gateway guarded by two stone lions. The red paint on the door had faded and was covered with a layer of dust, as if it hadn't been opened for a long time. On it was a very ordinary plaque with the words: and beneath it a cream-colored buzzer.

13 Happiness Street

Fang Cheng went to press it, but it wouldn't budge. On closer inspection he realized it was moulded from a single piece of plastic and was purely decorative. He stood there bewildered.

As he drew back a few paces, trying to get a clearer view of the whole gate, he bumped into an old man who happened to be passing by.

"Sorry. Excuse me, who lives here?"

He stopped short. The terror that welled up from the depths of the old man's eyes made Fang Cheng's legs go weak. The old man stumbled away, his walking stick beating an urgent and irregular rhythm as he disappeared into the distance.

A young boy walked by, absorbed in whittling a branch from one of the locust-trees with a penknife.

"Hey, where's the neighborhood committee office, young man?"

"Turn at the lane over there," the boy sniffled, pointing with the branch.

The narrow lane twisted its way through the shoddy makeshift houses. From time to time Fang Cheng had to walk sideways in order to prevent the boards and exposed nails from catching and tearing his overcoat. At the entrance to what looked like a rather spacious courtyard at the far end of the lane two sign boards were hanging side by side: Neighborhood Committee and Red Medical Station. Both were; covered with the muddy finger-prints of children. He pushed open the door of the room on the north side of the courtyard and stuck his head inside.

"Did you bring the certificate?" asked a girl busy knitting a jumper.

"What certificate?"

"The death certificate!" she said impatiently.

Everything in the room was white: the sheet, the folding screen, the table, the chairs, and also the girl's lab-coat and pallid face. Fang Cheng shivered.

"No, no, I've—"

"Listen, if we don't sign it nobody's going to let you hold the funeral service!"

"I'm looking for someone."

"Looking for someone?"

She looked up in surprise, lifting her hair back with one of her knitting needles.

"Don't you know what's proper?"

"But this is—"

"The Red Medical Station."

Retreating into the yard, Fang Cheng noticed a dense crowd of people in the room to the south. He walked over and knocked on the door.

"Come in," a voice said.

Inside about a dozen people were seated around a long wooden table, all staring at him in silence. The light inside the room was so dim that he couldn't make out their faces, but judging from their heavy bronchial wheezing, most of them were old women.

"Has it been signed?"

The question came from a woman at the far end of the table. From her voice she seemed pretty young; she'd be the chairwoman or something.

"No, I—"

"Then they're still alive and breathing," she broke in sharply.

A howl of laughter. One fat old woman laughed so much she started gagging, and someone thumped her on the back.

"I'm a reporter," Fang Cheng explained hastily.

Instantly the room fell deathly silent. They gazed stupidly at each other, as if they were not too sure what he meant.

The chairwoman was the first to break the silence.

"Your papers."

Fang Cheng had barely taken out his press card when it was snatched away by the person nearest the door. The card in its red plastic cover was handed round the table for everyone to look at and comment on. As it passed from hand to hand, some of them shook their heads while others spat on their fingers and rubbed it. Finally it reached the chairwoman. Gripping the card, she studied it carefully, then got the old man in glasses beside her to read it aloud. At last she gave a nod.

"Hmm. Have you come to take photos?"

A buzz of excited confusion filled the room. Dull eyes flashed, people nudged and tugged at each other, and one old woman who had fallen asleep propped against the table actually woke up. It was as if something that they had been waiting a lifetime for was finally about to happen.

“You can take our picture now, we’re in the middle of our political study,” the chairwoman said haughtily. “Sit up everyone, and don’t look into the camera!”

They all sat up straight, and there was a loud rustle as they picked up the newspapers on the table.

“Hold on, I haven’t brought my camera. I’m here on another matter. I’m trying to find out who lives at Number 13 Happiness Street.”

“How come you never breathed a word of this earlier?” said the chairwoman, obviously quite put out.

“You didn’t give me a chance—”

“All right then, what do you want to know?”

“It’s about Number 13 Happiness Street—”

“Someone alive and kicking? That’s none of our business. On your way then, and next time don’t start gabbling away at us again, these old bones can't take all the excitement.”

“Whose business is it?”

“Quiet! Let's get on with our meeting. Now, where were we? Oh yes, this case involving Dumb Chen from over in the Fourth Xiang-yang Courtyard. He’ll live on in our hearts forever and all that, but people have started asking why he’s still being issued with a face mask every winter—”

“Maybe his corpse is still breathing.”

“We’ll issue you with a cauldron to lie in when it’s your turn to go to heaven, so you won’t have to straighten that hunch back of yours …”

A strange rasping sound came from the corner.

They started to quarrel, their voices getting louder and louder. Fang Cheng took advantage of the confusion to slip out. When he reached the gate he breathed a long sigh of relief, feeling that he had actually almost died himself.

He took a wrong turn. The buildings inside another compound were being pulled down, and clouds of dust filled the air. A crowd of children pressed around the entrance, peering inside. In the yard the workmen were chanting as they swung a wooden pole against the gable of the house to the east. A structure like a well was under construction in the middle of a stretch of rubble.

“What is this place?” Fang Cheng asked the children.

“The local housing authority,” a young girl replied timidly. Stepping over a pile of lime, Fang Cheng ran into a young fellow carrying a bucket of cement.

“I’m a reporter, where is your foreman?”

“Hey, Wang!”

A head popped out from a scaffold.

“What is it?”

“The newspapers again.”

Wang leapt down nimbly and put down his trowel, wiping his forehead and muscular neck with his sleeve.

“Well, you lot are on the ball all right, it’s our first go at this particular innovation—”

“Innovation?”

“Sounds as if you’re here about cadres doing manual labor again. Your paper’s carried that news a good half dozen times already, and the only thing they ever change is my name. If you fellas keep it up it won’t be long before I’ll have trouble figuring out what I’m called. Take a look at this job. What’d you reckon?”

“What exactly is it?”

“A house, of course. The latest style.”

“Actually, it looks like a …” he bit back the word “tomb.”

“A blockhouse, right? But it doesn’t have peep holes in the sides.”

“What about windows?”

“They’ll all be on the roof.”

Wang rubbed his hands in glee, flicking off small pellets of mud.

“Ideal in case of war, keeps out robbers, protects you against both wind and cold, it’s got lots of advantages. It’s something we learned from our ancestors.”

Our cave-dwelling ancestors, Fang Cheng smiled wryly.

“The thing is that houses like these are cheap, you can build ’em by the dozen with pre-mixed concrete. They’re easier to make than chicken coops, and they’re more solid than a blockhouse. If this catches on, you and me’ll both be famous. For starters I’ll get a new house, and sit in an armchair at the bureau office. But don’t put any of that in your story.

"Here, take a look at the blueprints. We're in the middle of a demolition job, so the air's not too clean. Hey, Li, are you taking that shovel's pulse or what? Look lively now and bring a stool over here …"

Fang Cheng felt a bit dizzy.

"It's all right, I'll look these over back at the office. By the way, do you happen to know who lives at Number 13 Happiness Street?"

"Dunno, that's not our business."

"Whose is it then? Whose business is it to know?"

"Don't blow your top, let me think about it for a second … you could try asking. around at the bureau, they've got a big map there. It shows everything down to the last detail."

"Good, I'll try them."

"Do us a favor while you're at it, take this blueprint with you and give it to the director. We'll get a pedicab to take you."

"No need, but thanks all the same."

"This time be sure you don't get my name wrong," Wang shouted after him.

Fang Cheng staggered out and stood in the middle of the road, staring at the sky.

The secretary darted out from behind the door, her heels clicking.

"Director Ding will be very happy to see you, Comrade Reporter. The other seventeen directors would also like to talk to you, at your convenience of course. Director Ma would like to give you his view on the question of the revolutionary succession; Director Tian wants to give you a run down on his war record; Director Wang would like to discuss the simplification of Chinese characters—"

"Which one of them is the real director of the bureau?"

"Here we make no distinction between the director and assistant directors, we simply list them all in alphabetical order."

"I'm sorry, but I'm a bit pressed for time. I'm here on another matter. Anyway, how do all the directors know I'm here?"

"They were at a board meeting together just now."

"Am I breaking it up?"

"Don't give it another thought. They've been at it for nine days already. They were only too glad to take a break."

The director's office was thick with smoke. A pudgy old man with a healthy-looking complexion standing beside the conference table extended his hand to Fang Cheng with a broad smile.

"Welcome, have a seat. Look at all this smoke, it's a form of collective murder—"

"What?"

He waved his arms around in the air in an attempt to disperse the clouds of smoke.

"The fact that I'm an optimist has been my salvation, let me tell you. Have you heard of a medicine called 'Anliben'?"

"No."

"It's a miracle drug used overseas for people with heart trouble. Does your paper ever send you abroad?"

"The chances are pretty slim."

"Then could you ask someone to help me get some?"

"I'll see what I can do. Do you have heart trouble?"

The director immediately looked glum.

"I'm an old man, getting past it. Who knows, maybe the next time you come it'll be Director Ma sitting in this seat."

He cleared his throat.

"But let's get back to the matter in hand. Major political campaigns bring about major changes, and major changes promote further political campaigns. In the current quarter we've completed 158% of our work plan; compared with the same period last year—"

"Excuse me, Director Ding, I haven't come here on a story."

"Oh?"

"I want to make some enquiries about a house. Who lives at Number 13 Happiness Street?"

Beads of sweat appeared on Ding's shiny red face. He pulled out a handkerchief and wiped his face.

"You're not trying to trick me with some difficult question, are you? A big city like this, how could I know every house on every street by heart, like a production chart?"
"I heard that you've got a big map here …"
"Yes, yes, I almost forgot."
Groping for a small bottle in his pocket, he poured out a few pills and popped them into his mouth.
"What do you think of the chicken-blood cure?"
"I haven't tried it."
He pressed a button on his desk and the red curtains on the wall parted slowly. He picked up a pointer, whipped the air with it energetically, and went up to the map.
"How about the arm-swinging cure?"
"I'm sure it helps."
"Yes, it's very effective. Happiness Street … Number 30 … ah, a coal depot."
"I'm after Number 13."
"13 … 13 … come and see for yourself, my friend."
It was a blank space.
"How come it's not marked?" Fang Cheng asked in surprise.
Director Ding patted him on the shoulder.
"Look carefully, there are quite a lot of blank spots on this map. No one knows what these places are."
"No one knows?"
"Nothing to be surprised about. It's just like all the blank spots in our knowledge of medicine."
"Not even the Public Security Bureau people?"
"Why don't you go and see for yourself, we open out onto their back door; it's very handy. What do you think of gadgets like pacemakers, are they reliable?"
"Pacemakers? I don't know much about them."
Fang Cheng felt around in his pockets and fished out the blueprint.
"This morning I went to the local housing authority and Wang, the foreman, asked me to give this to you. It's the innovation they've been working on."
"That fellow's too active for his own good. He's like a bloody magician, always coming up with some new gimmick. There's still a lot of major business here we haven't had time to get round to yet."
Ding frowned, rolled up the blueprint and threw it into a wastepaper basket in the corner.
"It's thanks to people like him that there's never a moment's peace and quiet anywhere."
The secretary appeared at the door.
"A message for all directors. The meeting is about to resume."

Fang Cheng showed his press card to the guard standing at the opening in the iron fence which surrounded the Public Security Bureau.
"I want to see the director of the bureau."
"Interrogation Room I."
"Uh?"
"Up the stairs, first door on the right."
"I'm a reporter."
The guard looked at him blankly, not bothering to reply.
Fang Cheng went up the stairs, and with the help of the faint light in the corridor found a door with a brass plaque nailed to it:

Interrogation Room 1

He knocked. No one answered so he pushed the door open and went in. It was sumptuously furnished, with a red carpet on the floor and some leather chairs set around a tea table. It was not in the least like an interrogation room. He heaved a sigh of relief and sat down.
Suddenly three or four policemen came in through a small side door escorting a man in a gray Mao suit. The man was of medium height, and his swarthy face was like an iron mask, cold and stern. A policeman wearing spectacles moved to his side and whispered something in his ear. He nodded.

“This is Director Liu,” Spectacles said by way of introduction. “Please be seated.”

The director’s voice was deep and harsh. He and Spectacles moved to the chairs opposite and sat down. The other policemen stood at either side of them.

“Director Liu, there’s something I would like to ask you,” said Fang Cheng.

“Just a moment, first I’ve got a question for you.”

After a moment’s pause, Liu proceeded.

“If I gave you five matches to make a square, how would you do it?”

Fang Cheng stared at him in astonishment.

“Now, don’t be nervous.”

“I’m not nervous.” He thought hard, but his mind was a complete blank.

Suddenly, Liu gave a harsh laugh, and turned smugly towards Spectacles.

“This is typical of ideological criminals, they always try and find a way to use the extra match. Ordinary criminals are another case altogether …”

“You have a thorough grasp of the psychology of the criminal mind,” offered Spectacles obsequiously.

“This is an outrage!” Fang Cheng protested.

“Don’t get excited, young man, and don’t interrupt me when I’m talking.”

Liu turned to Spectacles again.

“The important thing to note here is that by using psychological tactics you can force the criminal’s thinking into a very small space, or shall we say a surface, where he can’t possibly conceal himself, and then he’s easily overwhelmed. Do you see what I am saying?”

Spectacles nodded. “But … but how can you tell he’s a criminal? From the look in his eyes?”

“No, no, that’s all out-of-date. Ideological criminals can easily disguise their expressions. Listen, everyone you confront is a criminal, and don’t you ever forget it.”

“Everyone?”

“Yes. That’s what class struggle is all about.”

“But … then … that’s …” Spectacles spluttered.

“All right, you ask too many questions, I have no alternative but to put you down as ideologically suspect.” Rudely cutting Spectacles short, Liu turned and looked sternly at Fang Cheng.

“State your business, young man.”

“I … I want to make an enquiry about a house.”

“Good, go on.”

“Who lives at Number 13 Happiness Street?”

Director Liu froze, but in an instant a barely perceptible smile appeared on his lips. Spectacles, still looking crest-fallen, opened his briefcase and took out some paper, ready to take notes. The two policemen stood next to Fang Cheng. The atmosphere in the room became tense.

“Your name?” Liu asked sharply.

“Fang Cheng.”

“Age?”

“What do you take me for? I’m a reporter.”

“Hand over your papers.”

Fang Cheng drew out his press card and passed it to one of the policemen at his side.

“Examine it and take his fingerprints. Also, find his file and check his ideological status,” ordered the director.

“What am I being accused of?”

“Prying into state secrets.”

“Is Number 13 Happiness Street a state secret?”

“Whatever no one knows is a secret.”

“Including you? You mean, you don’t know either?”

“Me? There’s a certain continuity to your case, you won’t even co-operate during interrogation.”

Fang Cheng sighed.

“Next question …”

Towards evening, Fang Cheng was released.

The municipal library was empty except for the faint but pervasive odour of mould. Fang Cheng leafed through the catalogue, finally locating the book: A Study of Grave-Robbing Techniques Through the Ages. He noted down the call number and rushed upstairs to the reading room.

A middle-aged woman with prominent cheek-bones standing behind the desk looked at the slip and then studied him.

"Are you an archaeologist?"

"No, I'm a reporter."

"Are you planning to visit some tombs for a story?" she said half-jokingly.

"I want to uncover some secrets."

"What secrets can you possibly find in this book?"

"A place where life has ended can still contain all kinds of secrets."

"Doesn't anyone know what they are?"

"No, because even the living have become part of the secret."

"What?"

"No one knows anyone; no one understands anyone."

The woman with high cheekbones stared at him.

"Good heavens, you must be mad."

"It's not me who's mad, it's heaven."

She turned away and ignored him after that. Nearly an hour later he heard the clickety-clack of the book trolley, and the book landed on the desk, raising a cloud of dust. Putting it under his arm, Fang Cheng went into the reading room and sat down at an empty desk in a corner. He leafed through the book, taking notes from time to time.

A pale square of sunlight moved slowly across the table. Fang Cheng stretched and looked at his watch. It was getting late. Before long he found himself surrounded by other readers. Strange, they were all concealing their faces behind thick books. Looking more carefully, Fang Cheng shuddered. They were all reading the same book: A Study Of Grave-Robbing Techniques Through the Ages. He broke into a sweat, and stirred uneasily in his seat.

As he slipped out of the library he was aware of a shadowy figure following closely behind. He went into a small lane and then suddenly turned back. The man didn't have time to conceal himself and they met head-on: it was the fellow in the leather jacket he had bumped into the previous morning in Happiness Street. As soon as he emerged from the lane, Fang Cheng made a dash for a trolley bus at a nearby stop. He jumped on board, and the doors closed behind him with a squeal.

When he got off the bus he looked around anxiously and only relaxed when he felt sure he had not been followed. He thrust his hands into his overcoat pockets and did his best to regain his self-confidence and courage.

At a crossing a boy ran past flying a kite. The string in his hand was taut and the kite danced in the air. A high place, of course! Jun had disappeared while he was flying a kite. It must have been because he had seen something from a high place. What an idiot I've been, he thought, why didn't I think of that earlier? How awful, he'd almost let himself be suffocated like a rat trapped in a hole …

He bought a pair of high-power binoculars at a second-hand store and set off in the direction of Happiness Street, working his way towards his target through a maze of lanes and alleyways. Finally he saw a tall chimney towering alone in a stretch of vacant ground, surrounded on all sides by broken bricks and rubbish.

He made for the boiler-room at the foot of the chimney. A wizened old man was stoking the boiler as an airblower droned in the background. His tattered sweat-stained work clothes were held together at the waist and swung back and forth in time with his monotonous movements.

"Can I interrupt you for a minute!" Fang Cheng called out.

The old man slowly straightened himself, turned his long, skinny body and walked over to the doorway. His face was covered with coal dust and ashes.

"Who're you looking for?" he asked.

"I wonder if you could tell me where this leads to?"

"Heaven."

"No, what I mean is who's the fire for?"

"How should I know. They pay me, I do the work, that's the way it is."

"If they pay you, there must be some evidence for it."

"Ah, yes. Now where's my pay slip got to?" he said, patting himself up and down. "Must've used it to roll a cigarette."

"What was written on it?"

"Let me think … seems it might have run something like this: 'Burn enough to make a thousand black clouds.'

Hah!"

The old man grinned, baring his teeth. Against his grimy face his broken and uneven teeth seemed extremely white.

Fang Cheng took off his black woollen overcoat.

"Can I trouble you to keep an eye on this for me. I'm going up to take a look."

"You don't want to leave a note for your family?"

"What?"

"You're the twelfth so far. Just yesterday a girl jumped …"

The old man went back to stoking the boiler. Tongues of flame shot forth.

Fang Cheng gazed up at the chimney, which seemed to lean slightly. He went to the foot of the iron ladder and started climbing. The houses grew smaller and smaller and it got so windy that his clothes flapped around him. When he reached the last rung, he steadied himself. Hooking one arm through the ladder, he turned around and began to survey the scene with his binoculars. Rooftops, date trees, courtyard walls … all came clearly into view.

Suddenly he stiffened, and the hand holding the binoculars began shaking. He couldn't believe his eyes. Finally he managed to collect his thoughts and refocus the lenses. He searched carefully in every corner, but didn't see even a single blade of grass.

"Oh bloody hell." he muttered to himself.

As his feet touched ground he heard someone calling out sharply behind him:

"Don't move. Where do you think you're going now?"

Not at all surprised, he brushed the dust off his clothes and turned around. The man in the leather jacket gave him a shove, and they walked towards a jeep parked some distance away. Twisting his head, Fang Cheng saw the old man stoking the boiler while thick smoke continued to billow out of the tall chimney.

"Black clouds," he said.

Fang Cheng was sent to the lunatic asylum.

When he looked at the people running in circles around the desolate grounds and the outside wall covered with weeds, he finally understood: so now he too was inside the wall.

Papa was back.

After exactly twenty years of reform through labor, which took him from the North-East to Shanxi, and then from Shanxi to Gansu, he was just like a sailor who, swept overboard by a wave, struggles blindly against the undertow until miraculously another wave tosses him back onto the same deck.

The verdict was: it was entirely a misjudgment, and he has been granted complete rehabilitation. That day, when the leaders of the Theater Association honored our humble home to announce the decision, I almost jumped up: when did you become so smart? Didn't the announcement that he was an offender against the people come out of your mouths too? It was Mama's eyes, those calm yet suffering eyes, that stopped me.

Next came the dress rehearsal for the celebration: we moved from a tiny pigeon-loft into a three-bedroom flat in a big building; sofas, bookcases, desks and chrome folding chairs appeared as if by magic (I kept saying half-jokingly to Mama that these were the troupe's props); relatives and friends came running in and out all day, until the lacquer doorknob was rubbed shiny by their hands, and even those uncles and aunts who hadn't shown up all those years rushed to offer congratulations … all right, cheer, sing, but what does all this have to do with me? My papa died a long time ago, he died twenty years ago, just when a little four or five year old girl needed a father's love—that's what Mama, the school, some kind-hearted souls and my whole social upbringing, starting from birth, told me. Not only this, you even wanted me to hate him, curse him, it's even possible you'd have given me a whip so I could lash him viciously! Now it's the other way round, you're wearing a different face. What do you want me to do? Cry, or laugh?

Yesterday at dinner time, Mama was even more considerate than usual, endlessly filling my bowl with food. After the meal, she drew a telegram from the drawer and handed it to me, showing not the slightest sign of emotion.

"Him?"

"He arrives tomorrow, at 4:50 in the afternoon."

I crumpled the telegram, staring numbly into Mama's eyes.

“Go and meet him, Lanlan.” She avoided my gaze.

“I have a class tomorrow afternoon.”

“Get someone to take it for you.”

I turned towards my room. “I won't go.”

“Lanlan.” Mama raised her voice. “He is your father, after all!”

“Father?” I muttered, turning away fiercely, as if overcome with fear at the meaning of this word. From an irregular spasm in my heart, I realized that stitches from the old wound were splitting open one by one.

I closed the composition book spread in front of me: Zhang Xiaoxia, 2nd Class, 5th Year. A spirited girl, her head always slightly to one side in a challenging way, just like me as a child. Oh yes, childhood. For all of us life begins with those pale blue copybooks, with those words, sentences and punctuation marks smudged by erasures; or, to put it more precisely, it begins with a certain degree of deception. The teachers delineated life with halos, but which of them does not turn into a smoke ring or an iron hoop?

Shadows flowed in from the long old-fashioned windows, brightly illuminating the opaque glass desk-top. The entire staff-room was steeped in drowsy tranquillity. I sighed, tidied my things, locked the door and, crossing the deserted school grounds, walked towards home.

The apartment block with its glittering lights was like a huge television screen, the unlit windows composing an elusive image. After a little while some of the windows lit up, and some went dark again. But the three windows on the seventh floor remained as they were: one bright, two dark. I paced up and down for a long time in the vacant lot piled with white lime and fir-tree poles. On a crooked, broken signboard were the words:

SAFETY FIRST

Strange, why is it that in all the world’s languages, this particular word comes out sounding the same: papa. Fathers of different colors, temperaments and status all derive the same satisfaction from this sound. Yet I still can’t say it. What do I know about him? Except for a few surviving old photographs retaining a childhood dream (perhaps every little girl has such dreams)—him, sitting on an elephant like an Arab sheik, a white cloth wound round his head, a resplendent mat on the elephant’s back, golden tassels dangling to the ground—there were only some plays that once created a sensation and a thick book on dramatic theory which I happened to see at the waste-paper salvage station. What else was there? Yes, add those unlucky letters, as punctual and drab as a clock; stuck in those brown-paper envelopes with their red frames, they were just like death notices, suffocating me. I never wrote back, and afterwards, I threw them into the fire without even looking at them. Once, a dear little duckling was printed on the snow-white envelope, but when I tore it open and looked, I was utterly crushed. I was so upset I cursed all ugly ducklings, counting up their vices one by one: greed, pettiness, slovenliness—because they hadn't brought me good luck. But what luck did I deserve?

The elevator was already shut down for the day, and I had to climb all the way up. I stopped outside the door to our place and listened, holding my breath. From inside came the sounds of the television humming, and the cliches of an old film. God, give me courage!

As soon as I opened the door, I heard my younger brother’s gruff voice:

“Sis’s back.”

He rushed up as if making an assault on the enemy, helping me to take off my coat. He was almost twenty, but still full of childish attachment to me, probably because I had given him the maternal love which had seemed too heavy a burden for Mama in those years.

The corridor was very dark and the light from the kitchen split the darkness into two. He was standing in the doorway of the room opposite, standing in the other half of the darkness, and next to him was Mama. The reflection from the television screen flickered behind their shoulders.

A moment of dead silence. Finally, he walked over, across the river of light. The light, the deathly-white light, slipped swiftly over his wrinkled and mottled neck and face. I was struck dumb: was he this shriveled little old man? Father. I leaned weakly against the door. He hesitated a moment and put out his hand. My little hand disappeared in his stiff, big-jointed one. These hands didn’t match his body at all.

“Lanlan.”

His voice was very low, and trembled a little. Silence.

“Lanlan,” he said again, his voice becoming a little more positive, as if he were waiting eagerly for something. But what could I say?

“You’re back very late. Have you had dinner?” said Mama.
“Mmm.” My voice was so weak.
“Why is everyone standing? Come inside,” said Mama. He took me by the hand. I followed obediently. Mama turned on the light and switched off the television with a click. We sat down on the sofa. He was still clutching my hand tightly, staring at me intently. I evaded his eyes, and let my gaze fall on the blown-up plastic doll on the window-sill. An unbearable silence.
“Lanlan,” he called once again.
I was really afraid the doll might explode, sending brightly-colored fragments flying all over the room.
“Have you had your dinner?”
I nodded vigorously.
“Is it cold outside?”
“No.” Everything was so normal, the doll wouldn’t burst. Perhaps it would fly away suddenly like a hydrogen balloon, out the window, above the houses full of voices, light and warmth, and go off to search for the stars and moon.
“Lanlan.” His voice was full of compassion and pleading. All of a sudden, my just-established confidence swiftly collapsed. I felt a spasm of alarm. Blood pounded at my temples. Fiercely I pulled back my hand, rushed out the door into my own room and flung myself head-first onto the bed. I really felt like bursting into tears.
The door opened softly; it was Mama. She came up to the bed, sat down in the darkness and stroked my head, neck and shoulders. Involuntarily my whole body began to tremble as if with cold.
“Don’t cry, Lanlan.”
Cry? Mama, if I could still cry the tears would surely be red, they’d be blood.
She patted me on the back. “Go to sleep, Lanlan, everything will pass.”
Mama left. Everything will pass. Huh, it’s so easily said, but can twenty years be written off at one stroke? People are not reeds, or leeches, but oysters, and the sands of memory will flow with time changing into a part of the body itself, teardrops that will never run dry.
. . . a basement. Mosquitoes thudded against the searing light bulb. An old man covered with cuts and bruises was tied up on the pommell horse, his head bowed, moaning hoarsely. I lay in the corner sobbing. My knees were cut to ribbons by the broken glass; blood and mud mixed together. . .
I was then only about twelve years old. One night, when Mama couldn’t sleep, she suddenly hugged me and told me that Papa was a good man who had been wrongly accused. At these words hope flared up in the child’s heart: for the first time she might be able to enjoy the same rights as other children. So I ran all around, to the school, the Theater Association, the neighborhood committee and the Red Guard headquarters, to prove Papa’s innocence to them. Disaster was upon us, and those louts savagely took me home for investigation. I didn’t know what was wrong with Mama, but she repudiated all her words in front of her daughter. All the blame fell on my small shoulders. Mama repented, begged, wished herself dead, but what was the use? I was struggled against, given heavy labor and punished by being made to kneel on broken glass.
. . . the old man raised his bloody face.
“Give me some water, water, water!” Staring with frightened eyes, I forgot the pain, as I huddled tightly in the corner. When dawn came and the old man breathed his last, I fainted with fright too. The blood congealed on my knees …
Can I blame Mama for this?

The sky was so blue it dazzled the eyes, its intense reflections shining on the ground. I was clutching a butterfly net, holding a small empty bamboo basket and standing amidst the dense waist-high grass. Suddenly, from the jungle opposite appeared an elephant. The tassels of the mat on its back were dangling to the ground; Papa sat proudly on top, a white turban on his head. The elephant’s trunk waved to and fro, and with a snort it curled round me and placed me up in front of Papa. We marched forward, across the coconut grove streaked with leaping sunlight, across the hills and gullies gurgling with springs.
I suddenly turned my head and cried out in alarm. A little old man was sitting behind me, his face blurred with blood; he was wearing convict clothes and on his chest were printed the words “Reform Through Labor.” He was moaning hoarsely:
“Give me some water, water, water …”
I woke up in fright. It was five o’clock, and outside it was still dark. I stretched out my hand and pulled out the drawer of the bedside cupboard, fumbled for cigarettes and lit one. I drew back fiercely and felt more relaxed. The white cloud of smoke spread through the darkness and finally floated out through the small open-shuttered window. The glow from the cigarette alternately brightened and dimmed as I strained to see clearly into the depths of my heart, but other than the ubiquitous silence, the relaxation induced by the cigarette, and the vague emptiness left by the nightmare, there was nothing.

I switched on the desk lamp, put on my clothes and opened the door quietly. There was a light on in the kitchen and a rustling noise. Who was up so early? Who?

Under the light, wearing a black cotton-padded vest, he was crouching over the waste-paper basket with his back towards me, meticulously picking through everything; spread out beside him were such spoils as vegetable leaves, trimmings and fish heads. I coughed. He jumped and looked round in alarm, his face deathly-white, gazing in panic towards me.

The fluorescent light hummed. He stood up slowly, one hand behind his back, making an effort to smile:

"Lanlan, I woke you up."

"What are you doing?"

"Oh, nothing, nothing." He was flustered, and kept wiping his trousers with his free hand. I put out my hand:

"Let me see." After some hesitation he handed the thing over. It was just an ordinary cigarette packet, with nothing odd about it except that it was soiled in one corner. I lifted my head, staring at him in bewilderment.

"Oh, Lanlan," beads of sweat started from his balding head, "yesterday I forgot to examine this cigarette packet when I threw it away, just in case I wrote something on it; it would be terrible if the Team Leader saw it."

"Team Leader?" I was even more baffled. "Who's the Team Leader?"

"The people who oversee us prisoners are called Team Leaders." He fished out a handkerchief and wiped the sweat away. "Of course, I know, it's beyond their reach, but better to find it just in case …" My head began to buzz.

"All right, that's enough." He closed his mouth tightly, as if he had bitten out his tongue. I really hadn't expected our conversation would begin like this. For the first time I looked carefully at him. He seemed even older and paler than yesterday, with a short grayish stubble over his sunken cheeks, wrinkles around his lackluster eyes that seemed to have been carved by a knife, and an ugly sarcoma on the tip of his right ear. I could not help feeling some compassion for him.

"Was it very hard there?"

"It was all right, you get used to it."

Get used to it! A cold shiver passed through me. Dignity. Wire netting. Guns. Hurried footsteps. Dejected ranks. Death. I crumpled up the cigarette packet and tossed it into the waste-paper basket.

"Go back to sleep, it's still early."

"I've had enough sleep, reveille's at 5:30." He turned to tidy up the scattered rubbish.

Back in my room, I pressed my face against the ice-cold wall. It was quite unbearable, to begin like this, what should I do next? Wasn't he a man of great integrity before? Ah, Hand of Time, you're so cruel and indifferent, to knead a man like putty; you destroyed a father before his daughter could remember his real face clearly … eventually I calmed down, packed my things into my bag and put on my overcoat. Passing through the kitchen, I came to a standstill. He was at the sink, scrubbing his big hands with a small brush, the green soap froth dripping down like sap.

"I'm going to work."

"So early?" He was so absorbed he did not even raise his head.

"I'm used to it." I did not turn on the light as I went down along the darkness, along each flight of stairs.

For several days in a row I came home very late. When Mama asked why, I always offered the excuse that I was busy at school. As soon as I got home, I would dodge into the kitchen and hurriedly rake up a few leftovers, then bore straight into my own little nest. I seldom ran into him, and even when we did meet I would hardly say a word. Yet it seemed his silence contained enormous compunction, as if to apologize for that morning, for his unexpected arrival, for my unhappy childhood, these twenty years and my whole life.

My brother was always running in like a spy to report on the situation, saying things like, "He's planted a pot of peculiar dried-up herbs," "All afternoon he stared at the fish in the tank," "He's burned a note again …" I would listen without any reaction. As far as I was concerned, it was all just a continuation of that morning, not worth making a fuss about. It was my brother who was strange, talking about such things so flatly, not tinged by any emotion at all, not feeling any heavy burden on his mind. It was no wonder; since the day he was born Papa had already flown far away, and besides, in those years he was brought up in his Grandma's home, and with Mama's wings and mine in turn hovering over Grandma's little window as well, he never saw the ominous sky.

One evening, as I lay on the bed smoking, someone knocked at the door. I hurriedly stuffed the cigarette butt into a small tin box, as Mama came in.

"Smoking again, Lanlan?"

As if nothing had happened I turned over the pages of a novel beside my pillow.

"The place smells of smoke, open a window."

Thank heavens, she hadn't come to nag. But then I realized that there was something strange in her manner. She sat down beside the small desk, absently picked up the ceramic camel pen-rack and examined it for a moment before returning it to its original place. How would one put it in diplomatic language? Talks, yes, formal talks …

"Lanlan, you're not a child anymore." Mama was weighing her words. It had started; I listened with respectful attention.

"I know you've resented me since you were little, and you've also resented him and resented everyone else in the world, because you've had enough suffering … but Lanlan, it isn't only you who's suffered."

"Yes, Mama."

"When you marry Lianping, and have children, you'll understand a mother's suffering—"

"We don't want children if we can't be responsible for their future."

"You're blaming us, Lanlan," Mama said painfully.

"No, not blaming. I'm grateful to you, Mama, it wasn't easy for you in those years—"

"Do you think it was easy for him?"

"Him?" I paused. "I don't know, and I don't want to know either. As a person, I respect his past—"

"Don't you respect his present? You should realize, Lanlan, he showed great courage in staying alive!"

"That's not the problem, Mama. You say this because you lived together for many years, but I, I can't make a false display of affection—"

"What are you saying!" Mama grew angry and raised her voice. "At least one should fulfill ones own duties and obligations!"

"Duties? Obligations?" I started to laugh, but it was more painful than crying. "I heard a lot about them during those years. I don't want to lose any more, Mama."

"But what have you gained?"

"The truth."

"It's a cold and unfeeling truth!"

"I can't help it," I spread out my hands, "that's how life is."

"You're too selfish!" Mama struck the desk with her hand and got up, the loose flesh on her face trembling. She stared furiously at me for a moment, then left, shutting the door heavily.

Selfish, I admit it. In those years, selfishness was a kind of instinct, a means of self-defense. What could I rely on except this? Perhaps I shouldn't have provoked Mama's anger, perhaps I should really be a good girl and love Papa, Mama, my brother, life, and myself.

During the break between classes, I went into the reception office and rang Lianping.

"Hello, Lianping, come over this evening."

"What's up? Lanlan?" He was shouting over the clatter of the machines. His voice sounded hoarse and weary.

"He's back."

"Who? Your father?"

"Clever one, come over and help; it's an absolutely awful situation."

He started to laugh.

"Huh, if you laugh, just watch out!" I clenched my fists and slammed down the receiver.

It's true, Lianping has the ability to head off disaster. The year when the production brigade chief withheld the grain ration from us educated youth, it was he who led the whole bunch of us to snatch it all back. Although I normally appear quite sharp-witted, I always have to hide behind his broad shoulders whenever there's a crisis.

That afternoon I had no classes and hurried home early. Mama had left a note on the table, saying that she and Papa had gone to call on some old friends and that they would eat when they returned. I kneaded some dough, minced the meat filling, and got everything ready to wrap the dumplings.

Jianping arrived. He brought with him a breath of freshness and cold, his cheeks flushed red, brimming with healthy vitality. I snuggled up against him at once, my forehead pressed against the cold buttons on his chest, like a child who feels wronged but has nowhere to pour out her woes. I didn't say anything. What could I say?

We kissed and hugged for a while, then sat down and wrapped dumplings, talking and joking as we worked. I was almost on the verge of tears from the gratitude, relaxation and the vast sleepiness that follows affection.

When my brother returned, he threw off his work clothes, drank a mouthful of water, and flew off like a whirlwind.

It was nearly eight when they got home. As they came in, it gave them quite a shock to see us. Mama could not then conceal a conciliatory and motherly smile of victory; Papa's expression was much more complicated. Apart from the apologetic look of the last few days, he also seemed to feel an irrepressible pleasure at this surprise, as well as a precautionary fear.

"This is Jianping, this is …" My face was suffocated with red.

"This is Lanlan's father," Mama filled in.

Jianping held out his hand and boomed, "How do you do, Uncle!"

Papa grasped Jianping's hand, his lips trembling for a long time.

"So you're, so you're Jianping, fine, fine …"

Delivering the appropriate courtesies, Jianping gave the old man such happiness he was at a loss for what to do. It was quite clear to me that his happiness had nothing to do with these remarks, but came from feeling that at last he'd found a bridge between him and me, a strong and reliable bridge.

At dinner, everyone seemed to be on very friendly terms, or at least that's how it appeared on the surface. Several awkward silences were covered over by Jianping's jokes. His conversation was so witty and lively that it even took me by surprise. After dinner, Papa took some Zhonghua cigarettes from his tin cigarette case and offered them to Jianping. This set them talking about the English method of drying tobacco and then on to things like soil salinization, the insect pests of peanuts and vine-grafting. I sat bolt upright beside them, smiling like a mannequin in a shop window.

Suddenly, my smile began to vanish. Surely this was a scene from a play? Jianping was the protagonist—a clever son-in-law, while I—I was the meek and mild new bride. For reasons only the devil could tell, everyone was acting to the hilt, striving to forget something in this scene. Acting out happiness, acting calmness, acting out glossed-over suffering. I suddenly felt that Jianping was an outsider to the fragmented, shattered suffering of this family.

I began to consider Jianping in a different light. His tone, his gestures, even his appearance, all had an unfamiliar flavor. This wasn't real, this wasn't his old self. Could strangeness be contagious? How frightening. Jianping hastily threw me an enquiring glance, as if expecting me to repay the role he was playing with a commending smile. This made me feel even more disgusted. I was disgusted with him, and with myself, disgusted with everything the world was made of, happiness and sorrow, reality and sham, good and evil.

Guessing this, he wound up the conversation. He looked at his watch, said a few thoroughly polite bits of nonsense, and got to his feet.

As usual, I accompanied him to the bus-stop. But I said not a single word along the way, and kept a fair distance from him. He dejectedly thrust his hands in his pockets and kicked at stones.

An apartment block ahead hid the night. I felt alone. I longed to know how human beings survived behind these countless containers of suffering and broken families. Yet in these containers, memory is too frightening. It can only deepen the suffering and divide every family until everything turns to powder.

When we reached the bus-stop, he stood with his back to me, gazing at the distant lights.

"Lanlan, do I still need to explain?"

"There's no need."

He leaped onto the bus. Its red tail-lights flickering, it disappeared round the corner.

Today there was a sports meet at the school, but I didn't feel like it at all. Yesterday afternoon, Zhang Xiaoxia kept pestering me to come and watch her in the 100 meter dash. I just smiled, without promising anything. She pursed her little mouth and, fanning her sweaty forehead with a handkerchief, stared out the window in a huff. I put my hands on her shoulders and turned her around:

"I'll go then, all right?" Her face broadening into dimples, she struggled free of me in embarrassment and ran off. How easy it is to deceive a child.

I stretched, and started to get dressed. The winter sunlight seeped through the fogged-up window, making everything seem dim and quiet, like an extension of sleep and dreams. When I came out of my room, it was quiet and still; evidently everyone had gone out. I washed my hair and put my washing in to soak, dashing busily to and fro. When everything was done, I sat down to eat breakfast. Suddenly I sensed that someone was standing behind me, and when I looked round it was Papa, standing stiffly in the kitchen doorway and staring at me blankly.

"Didn't you go out?" I asked.
"Oh, no, no, I was on the balcony. You're not going to school today?"
"No. What is it?"
"I thought," he hesitated, "we might go for a walk in the park, what do you think?" There was an imploring note in his voice.
"All right." Although I didn't turn round, I could feel that his eyes had brightened.
It was a warm day, but the morning mist had still not faded altogether. It lingered around the eaves and tree-tops. Along the way, we said almost nothing. But when we entered the park, he pointed at the tall white poplars by the side of the road.
"The last time I brought you here, they'd just been planted." But I didn't remember it at all. After walking along the avenue for a while, we sat down on a bench beside the lake. On the cement platform in front of us, several old wooden boats, corroded by wind and rain, were lying upside down, dirt and dry leaves fonning a layer over them. The ice melting in the water crackled from time to time. He lit a cigarette.
"Those same boats," he said pensively.
"Oh?"
"There're still the same boats. You used to like sitting in the stem, splashing with your bare feet and shouting, "Motor-boat! Motor-boat!" The shred of a smile of memory appeared on his face. "Everyone said you were like a boy."
"Really?"
"You liked swords and guns; whenever you went into a toyshop you'd always want to come out with a whole array of weapons."
"Because I didn't know what they were used for." All at once, a shadow covered his face and his eyes darkened.
"You were still a child then."
Silence, a long silence. The boats lying on the bank were turned upside down here. They were covering a little girl's silly cries, a father's carefree smile, soft drink bottle-tops, blue hairclips, children's books and toy guns, the taste of earth in the four seasons, the passage of twenty years …
"Lanlan," he said suddenly, his voice very low and trembling, "I … I beg you to forgive me."
My whole body began to quiver.
"When your mother spoke of your life in these years, it was as if my heart was cut with a knife. What is a child guilty of?" His hand clutched at the air and came to rest against his chest.
"Don't talk about these things," I said quietly.
"To tell you the truth, it was for you that I lived in those years. I thought if I paid for my crime myself, perhaps life would be a bit better for my child, but—"he choked with sobs—"you can blame me, Lanlan, I didn't have the ability to protect you, I'm not worthy to be your father."
"No, don't, don't …"
I was trembling, my whole body went weak, all I could do was shake my hands. How selfish I was! I thought only of myself, immersed myself only in my own sufferings, even making suffering a kind of pleasure and a wall of defense against others. But how did he live? For you, for your selfishness, for your heartlessness! Can the call of blood be so feeble? Can what is called human nature have completely died out in my heart?
"Twenty years ago, the day I left the house, it was a Sunday. I took an afternoon train, but I left at dawn; I didn't want you to remember that scene. Standing by your little bed, the tears streaming down, I thought to myself: 'Little Lanlan, shall we ever meet again?' You were sleeping so soundly and sweetly, with your little round dimples, the evening before, as you were going to bed, you hugged me by the neck and said in a soft voice, 'Papa, will you take me out tomorrow?' 'Papa's busy tomorrow.'' You went into a sulk and pouted unhappily. I had to promise. Then you asked again, 'Can we go rowing?' 'Yes, we'll go rowing.' And so you went to sleep quite satisfied. But I deceived you, Lanlan. When you woke up the next day, what could you think—"
"Papa!" I blurted out, flinging myself on his shoulder and crying bitterly.
With trembling hands he stroke my head.
"Lanlan, my child."
"Forgive me, Papa," I said, choked with sobs. "I'm still your little Lanlan, always."
"My little Lanlan, always."
A bird whose name I don't know hovered over the lake, crying strangely, adding an even deeper layer of desolation to this bleak winter scene. I lay crying against Papa's shoulder for a long time. My tears seeped drop by drop into the coarse wool of his overcoat. I seemed to smell the pungent scent of tobacco mingling with the smell of mud and sweat. I seemed to see him during the breaks between heavy labor, leaning wearily against the pile of dirt and rolling a cigarette, staring into the distance through the fork between the guard's legs. He was pulling a cart, struggling forward on the miry road, the cart wheels screeching, churning up black clods of mud. The guard's legs. He was digging the earth shovelful after shovelful, straining himself to fling it towards the pit side. The guard's legs. He is carrying his bowl, greedily draining the last mouthful of vegetable soup. The guard's legs.

I dared not think any more, I dared not. My power to imagine suffering was limited after all. But he actually lived in a place beyond the powers of human imagination. Minute after minute, day after day, oh God, a full twenty years. No, amidst suffering, people should be in communication with one another, for suffering can link people's souls even more than happiness, even if the soul is already numb, already exhausted …

"Lanlan, look," he drew a beautiful green necklace from his pocket. "I made this from old toothbrush handles just before I left there. I wanted to give you a kind of present, but then I was afraid you wouldn't want this crude toy …"

"No, I like it." I took the necklace, moving the beads lightly to and fro with my finger, each of these wounded hearts

On the way back, Papa suddenly bent over and picked up a piece of paper, turning it over and over in his hand. Impulsively I pulled up his arm and laid my head on his shoulder. In my heart I understood that this was because of a new strangeness, and an attempt to resist this strangeness.

Here on the avenue, I seemed to see a scene from twenty years earlier. A little girl with blue hairclips, both fists outstretched, totters along the edge of the muddy road. Beside her walks a middle-aged man relaxed and at ease. A row of little newly-planted poplars separates them. And these little trees, as they swiftly swell and spread, change into a row of huge insurmountable bars. Symbolizing this are twenty years of irregular growth rings.

"Papa, let's go."

He tossed away the piece of paper and wiped his hand carefully on his handkerchief. We walked on again.

Suddenly I thought of Zhang Xiaoxia. At this moment, she'll actually be in the race. Behind rises a puff of white smoke from the starting gun and amid countless faces and shrill cries falling away behind her, she dashed against the white finishing tape.

Sunlight slid onto the glass desk top. A warm band of orange trembled lightly as I lowered my eyelids. It was a still morning. At intervals the oppressive sound of popped rice spread through the lane. A war was going on in Afghanistan. A jumbo jet had crashed in southern France … The world was so concrete, as if meaning only existed in a given concrete time and place. The tired and drawn face in the mirror when I was washing this morning resembled a cornered beast. At the public lecture a few days ago, the university students had started to hiss, and someone handed up a slip saying

"You represent us? How disgusting!"

The grating sound of the microphone's alternating current gave me the opportunity of silence. What more had I to say to those fellows, who considered themselves so superior?

I opened my eyes and blew lightly, and the snow-white cigarette ash on the glass top was like a flock of seagulls skimming over the water. At low tide I would almost invariably go hunting for shellfish with my playmates. We would knock off oysters from the rocks one by one and pour them into our mouths. There were also small crabs that hid in the seaweed or under the rocks …

I'm a fisherman's son, but it seems as if this was no longer a fact but only a line in a dossier. Had my mother not died and her brother taken me to Beijing, at this minute I would probably be sitting on the deck of a chugging, throbbing motorized junk, smoking a long-stemmed pipe and surrounded on all sides by fishing nets full of salt slime and the odor of fish. I spread out a hand: pale, slender, not a single callous. Fate is incomprehensible, perhaps the only thing that is incomprehensible …

Someone knocked on the door, so lightly that at first I thought I'd heard wrong. It was a girl with short cropped hair that had a brownish tint.

"Is Mr. Ding here?" she asked timidly.

"That's me."

"I …" her round face flushed.

"Come in and tell me what's on your mind."

She almost kicked over the thermos flask on the floor. “I’m sorry—”
“It doesn’t matter. Please sit down.”
After some hesitation she sat down on an old stool beside the couch, placing her old satchel on her knees. “My name is Chen Fang, I’m a student at the Normal College. I came because I like your stories.” She laughed apologetically.
“Which ones do you like?”
She thought it over. “I like The Relic.”
“As far as I’m ccncerned that’s become a relic itself. What about the more recent ones?”
“Er …” her tone was a little uncertain. “I haven’t read them yet.” I got on my guard, thinking she might be one of the students who had been booing.
“What’s the reaction of the students around you?”
“I’m not sure. Some people seem to think they aren’t as deep as before.”
“A hole in the ice is deep,” I said.
The girl seemed to be a bit nervous, continually fiddling with the frayed strap of her satchel, twisting it back and forth around her fingers.
“Would you like some water?”
“No, please don’t bother, I’m going in a minute.” She took out a thick manuscript from her satchel.
“I tried to write something. It’s fairly poor. I thought I’d ask you to read it, is that all right?”
I took the manuscript and weighed it in my hand.
“Are you in the Chinese department?”
“No, physics.”
“Your first try at writing?” She nodded earnestly.
“Take my advice, stick to your own field and don’t waste your efforts on this.”
She shrugged “Why?”
“Really?”
“I say that because I’ve tried.”
She laughed, very sweetly, and for a moment her ordinary-looking face appeared beautiful. “But I’ve always liked sour things since I was little.”
I bit my lip and remained silent.
“And you can make sweet wine with sour grapes.”
“Sweet wine?” She stood up.
“Anyway, I;’d still like to try.”
“Very well then, I won’t say any more.” At the door she turned her head.
“I thought, I thought you would be full of confidence.”
“Confidence? The word is too abstract.”
“What is a concrete one then.”
“Life, writing,” I grimaced, “and confidence, too.”
After seeing my visitor off, I sat down again at my desk. Perhaps this was the beginning of a story, starting with the conversation about sour grapes, and then what? I picked up my pen, screwed off the cap, and stared at the metal nib.
What was the matter? It was fine weather outside, and I was shut up in a room, like a fly in winter. I used to be able to write eight thousand characters a day, “like a fountain “, to use the old lady’s expression. She saw herself as my protector. One look at that stupid face would make anyone contemplate suicide. Perhaps a difficult labour is a good thing, a new beginning. How droll, a man approaching forty still talking about new beginnings. Emperors build their mausoleums when they’re still in their teens. Ordinary people are lucky, you can go for a walk after work, of slip off and have a drink, you don’t have a load of worries …
The pen slipped between my fingers and poked a hole in the right upper comer of the manuscript, splashing a big blob of ink on it. Idly I drew a crescent moon.

The sight of Juan coming in aroused a feeling of time fleeting. It was as if in that second, memories of the past welled up and swirled around me, forming a background in disharmony with our everyday life.
“Why’re you looking at me like that?” she asked.
“Nothing,” I said dully. She pulled out Dongdong from behind her. “Say hello to daddy.”

Dongdong stood between me and Juan, looking glum and gazing blankly at the floor.

"Say hello." Juan's voice was a little impatient. Dongdong still stood there, not budging.

"The teacher says he had a fight with the other children this afternoon, he grabbed some one's car … I'm exhausted." Juan settled her bottom on the couch and sighed.

I went over and hugged Dongdong, prickling him with my moustache as I kissed him. Not saying anything, he dodged aside, detached himself from me and toddled over to the desk.

"Moon," he muttered, stretching out his small hands to the manuscript. Juan bustled over.

"Ah, the great author, he can't produce a single word, but he knows how to doodle. There'll soon be a mountain of letters piled up demanding stories. I wonder how you're going to meet those debts."

"I don't owe anything to anyone," I said stiffly.

She smoothed a crease on my sleeve with her fmgers, giving me a quick glance.

"I only owe myself," I said then.

"What's up with you?"

I stayed silent.

She walked over, patted me on the shoulder and stroked my face.

"You're tired."

I looked into her eyes and gave a forced laugh.

"What's bothering you?"

"Nothing."

"Then why this?"

I grasped her hand. "I'm tired."

"You've got such a terribly gloomy expression. Shave off that moustache tomorrow. I'm going to chop up some meat, I bought some chives."

I sat down at the table and stroked Dongdong's downy head. This time he did not dodge away.

"Daddy will buy you a car tomorrow."

"I don't want one," he said, staring at the paper.

"Why not?"

"Fatty said the car was his grandad's." He suddenly lifted his head and asked, "What's my grandad?"

"A fisherman."

Dongdong turned his head to look at the goldfish bowl on the side table.

"What sort of fish?"

"All sorts."

"Where does he live?"

"He's dead."

Dongdong raised his eyes in surprise.

"He drowned at sea."

"Wasn't he careful?" I shook my head.

"Were you sad?"

"I was only three then."

"I'm four and a half."

"Yes, you're a big boy now." Dongdong drew his forefinger back and forth on the manuscript.

"Teacher says the moon is round."

"She's right."

"Why didn't you draw it round?"

"Each person has a different moon."

"Grandad's moon?"

"Quite round." I remembered the small dark cottage piled with fishing gear. I often burrowed myself in there, to lie alone on the dried fishing nets. Moonlight filtered down from the cracks between the rafters, murmuring in the sea wind, an accompaniment to the monotonous sound of the waves.

"Posterity equals zero," Kang Ming smacked his lips and threw the matchstick into the ashtray. "Zero, old man."

I shook my head, reluctant to continue the argument. All arguments were meaningless. I knew he was needling me, trying to draw me into a game that I was already tired of. Every Saturday evening as a rule he would occupy our twelve square metre room in his own unique way.

"There's no need to feel any responsibility in regard to posterity. The question's very simple, no-one has to feel responsible in regard to anyone."

"Do you have a responsibility to yourself?" I asked.

"That's a complicated question."

"No, it's also very simple. People now tend to put the responsibility on society all the time. In fact, society is composed of individual people. If each individual refuses to accept responsibility for his own acts, how can we expect any social progress?"

"OK, I give up. Your wife?"

"Taking the child back to her mother's."

"Writing coming along well this time?"

"No."

He turned his head and looked at me. One eye was very bright, reflecting the light from the standard lamp, the other was in a dark green shadow. .

"You've changed," he said.

"Really?"

"Probably it's the conscience of the artist pressing on you so hard you can't breathe."

"I'm not an artist, never have been."

"Your name is big enough."

"It'd be bigger if I started a fire on the street."

"Don't set your demands too high, old man." I stayed silent.

"The question is not how you or I think, of course it's a good thing to develop your own brain." He got up and walked to and fro, his shadow slipping across the wall. "One thing should be understood, we are merely society's luxuries."

"I don't understand."

"It seems that only we 'commercial' editors know how the market works …" He walked over to the desk and picked up the sheet of paper. "Interesting. Do you know what makes the moon appear full or not?"

I gazed at him. He turned around and leant against the table, smiling enigmatically.

"It's the result of the earth beneath our feet blocking off the sunlight, common knowledge."

The paper at the end of the cigarette began to curl up, covering the red fire that was gradually darkening, the blue and brown wisps of smoke mixing together. Although technically deficient, the girl's story still touched me deeply. The tragedy was certainly her personal history, the beginning and the end of love. To search for love in this loveless world is very difficult, but loss is something instant and eternal.

"The business about the room, haven't you been keeping up the pressure for it? The application's been in for months."

A rustling sound, it was Juan taking off her clothes. The cigarette ash tumbled off, falling in separate flakes on the manuscript.

"Go and see Xu tomorrow, one word from him is more effective than you making ten visits to the Association."

"I'd prefer not to."

Was that my voice? People can never hear their own voices accurately. How long can this voice linger in the world? At most seventy years, then it will disappear along with me. But the noise of the sea never ceases, never ends. I write something, it is printed in a book, but who dares guarantee that twenty or thirty years later people will still be reading it? Not even just twenty or thirty years, the younger generation have begun shaking their heads right now.

"Ge's wife, he works in our factory, she's in a washing machine factory, they're having a trial sale, only a hundred and fifty …"

What lasts forever? Eternity in art is too terrible, the sight of it strikes fear into people's hearts, like a cold gravestone. It demands a writer stake everything on a single venture. The bed boards creaked, Juan was turning over. Seagulls staked everything on a single venture. No one who has heard their full-throated, doleful wail could doubt this. Why am I always thinking of the sea lately?

I drew a deep breath, smoking relaxes me. A piece of cigarette ash fell near the moon. Ah, the result of blocking sunlight. Yes, artists are still men. I really shouldn't look down on Kang Ming, we're all the same. And he has his own reasons, too. Perhaps lying is man's basic nature, and being sincere is acquired; sincerity must be studied. Is the problem only in speaking truthfully?

"It's getting late," Juan said in a muffled voice.

This was a hint. She was waiting for me, just as primitive tribal woman waited for the hunter, no, fisherman. The fishing spear in his hand, an animal skin around his waist, he utters a full-throated cry answering the summons.

"Yes, this month it's our turn to collect the water and electricity bill, last month the electricity was so dear, there must be someone stealing the electricity …"

I wonder if the small dark cottage still exists? The pungent fishy smell, the slippery floor, the small iron bucket hanging from the ceiling to catch the rainwater. Haven't been home for many years, I really should go back and look around.

"Tomorrow evening you should go to our place and pick up Dongdong. I may be working overtime."

My father, to me, will forever be a mystery. How he drowned not even I know. He didn't leave a single thing behind. No, he left me. And what shall I leave behind?

I stubbed out the cigarette and switched off the lamp. Everything disappeared, the moonlight poured in, I remembered the girl's smile.

"Why don't you say something?" Juan snorted, and turned over facing the wall. She was angry, but it was a pretence. I turned down the quilt and pulled her over by the shoulder, watching her quivering eyelids in the dark.

"All right," I said. She slowly lifted her arm, moving her face nearer.

"The business about the room …"

"Here's to your creative work, may it be an eternaJ fountain!:" said the old lady.

I put down my cup.

"What's up?" the old lady looked at me.

"We should drink to Xu's health."

"May as well, I suppose. To my reluctance to go to the grave," the old man said.

The old lady placed a piece of fish on my plate. "Try some, it's yellow croaker, my own work."

"Excellent."

"Compared with your stories?"

"Much superior."

The old lady moved closer, with a mysterious air. "There is something you must thank me for properly …"

"What?"

"Guess."

I shook my head.

"Go on, guess." She trod on me with the tip of her foot.

"That's enough." The old man impatiently knocked the plate with his chopsticks. "Stop making such a fuss, if you've something to say, come out with it."

"It's none of your business!" The old lady gave him a baleful look. "A few days ago, Mr Zhang, the director of the press, was here; I mentioned you to him. He's agreed to publish a collection of your work."

"Oh."

She waited for me to make a better response.

"Thank you, but …" I knocked the table with my knuckle. "Why don't we wait a little, we can talk about it later."

"What?"

"I haven't put together anything decent yet."

"Ho, here am I burning joss-sticks and the buddha turns his backside to me."

"He's looking ahead," the old man mumbled, sucking on the fish head. "Mm, mm, wait and see."

"You've been waiting all your life, and in the end, all you've got is a name with nothing to show for it except your memoirs, huh?" the old lady said indignantly.

"What're you yelling?" The old man thumped the table. "At least I've got something worth putting into memoirs."

"Humph," came from the old lady.

The old man's good humor revived after a minute. He dug out a dark brown fish eye and looked it over carefully.

"Think it over, don't let this opportunity slip by." The old lady clasped her arms around her shrivelled chest and sighed. "I'm going to take a look in the kitchen."

"The old nag," muttered the old man, waiting until she had gone out the door. He turned towards me, "Don't listen to her gibberish."

"She means well."

"There must be something bothering you." I gave a noncommittal smile.

"It doesn't matter, literary men are given to over-sentimentality." He concentrated again on the fish eye.

"I'm just a little unwilling." He lifted his head and gazed at me expressionlessly.

"How old are you?" he asked.

"Thirty-seven."

"Do you know how old China's history is?" I didn't answer.

"Five thousand years." He stretched out five crooked, trembling fingers. "There's no harm in waiting a bit longer, young man." As he finished speaking, he downed the fish eye in a single gulp.

I sat down at the desk. I knew this would be the inevitable result. I could not go back to the deck, to the rocks, to the small dark cottage where the moonlight rang out from the rafters. I had a slight headache, it was the wine—the sun-dried grain was to blame, the sun was to blame. I felt a sadness I had not known before, and felt like crying although I hadn't cried for years. Perhaps my tears were saltier than others. I was a fisherman's son. My father died at sea. His boat overturned, and there wasn't even a corpse, but they set up a wooden tablet for him in the village graveyard. There were many wooden tablets there, facing the sea, facing the sunrise every morning.

I was fortunate. I wonder whether authors who have been published often go past bookshops and look at their own books behind the glass. Hard-back and paperback. The hard-back editions have characters stamped in gold on the outside, and the cover is made of soft, pliable leather. They are more fortunate than I.

Fortunes can change, however. I shouldn't stop. I didn't choose this opportunity, it chose me. Actually, nothing is of much importance in the end. My nerves are weak, I'm always being troubled by nightmares, night- mares that trouble my peace of mind. That fish eye has seen everything there is in the sea: seaweed, electric eels, mother-of-pearl … yes, oysters too.

Don't stop, I'm only thirty-seven, that's still an up-and-coming age for writers. That girl's smiling face didn't hold beauty and purity alone. A smile can cover up anything. But where the smile has been, a scar or wrinkle will remain. I pulled open the drawer and gingerly touched the dog-eared corner of the manuscript. Sour grapes will onliy ripen and turn into wine if there is a sun. She had hope. Although the students' booing ws not very pleasant, it nevertheless held a sun-like sincerity and honesty.

Oh, what's the point of thinking of these things, life is always concrete, I have known love too, I have the right to describe this love too. It was a secret, a secret that couldn't be transcended in a tragedy, but I've had my brush with it. This isn't plagiarizing nonsense, of course it isn't.

I spread out the sheet of paper with the drawing of the moon and began to write.

Holding a toy car in his hand, Dongdong was kicking a stone, humming snatches of a song which seemed to be a story about a cat and a butterfly.

"Hurry up, Dongdong," I pulled hias small hand. "Stop kicking that stone." He looked around at the dark shadows of the pedestrians and traffic around us, still humming.

"Daddy, look at the moon," he said.

The moon was big ad round.

"That isn't your moon."

"No, it isn't."

"Where's your moon?"

I said nothing. We were walking under the dense shade of a pink siris. I knew he was looking at me intently, but he couldn't see my face clearly.

74.79 When I think Of You Late At Night, There's Nothing I Can Do: Five Tales Of the Wen Clan Cave Dwellers\fn{by Cao Naiqian (1949-)} Shanxi Province, China (M) 4

1: In-Law

The early-morning stillness is broken by the braying of a donkey. Blackie says:

"That fucking in-law has come for you." The woman says,

"Stall him while I put on my pants."

"Shit," Blackie says, "what difference does it make?"

The woman blushes.

"Just say I'm sick and I can't go. It's that time of the month anyway."

"I can't do that," Blackie says. "Chinese don't go back on their word."

Blackie walks outside to greet his in-law, who is tethering his donkey at the gate. Blackie turns and shouts into the cave:

"Go fetch a chicken. I'll get some liquor from the commune."

"In-Law," Blackie's counterpart says, "I brought a bottle since we always drink yours."

"When did we start worrying about yours and mine, anyway?"

Blackie's woman walks into the yard and, without a glance at either man, heads for the chicken coop.

"No need, no need for that. A cow fell and died last night at our village," the in-law says to Blackie's woman. "I borrowed this donkey from the brigade leader, and the son of a bitch was cooking a pot of beef." He takes a leather bag from around the donkey's neck.

"Here, take it. You might need to cook it a bit longer."

Head lowered, Blackie's woman takes the bag and goes into the cave without a glance at either man.

While they are drinking, Blackie says:

"It's that time of the month. Day before yesterday. Want to wait till it's past?"

"Fine with me."

"On the other hand, the brigade leader might deduct work points for keeping his donkey. You can take her now. Just wait till she's finished before she does it."

"Fine with me."

"Bring her back next month. I can't borrow a donkey."

"Fine with me."

After they finish drinking, Blackie says to his woman, "Put on those clean clothes. I don't want people in the other village laughing at me."

"No need. The commune's on the way. I'll buy her a jacket and trousers there."

Blackie sees his woman and in-law on their way, across one ravine after another and over a series of ridges.

"Go on back," the in-law says. "Here's the mountain."

Blackie says, "You go on up the mountain. I'll head back." He hesitates, then turns back. The in-law smacks the donkey's rump with his large fist; the animal starts clip-clopping down the road.

Shit. Go on, go ahead. A thousand yuan less would be the same as handing me his own daughter. Shit. Go on, go ahead. It's only one month a year. And Chinese don't go back on their word. These are his thoughts as he walks.

Blackie takes another look behind him and sees his woman's turnip-like feet dangling alongside the donkey's haunches, swinging back and forth.

Blackie's heart, too, is swinging back and forth.

2: Woman

Wen Hai finally got a wife, which made the villagers very happy. But people listening at the door that night said she wouldn't let him do it. She refused to loosen the knot in her red sash and spent the whole night crying.

Later on, they said that not only would she not take off her trousers for him, but she even refused to work in the fields. And when Wen Hai came in from a hard day's work, instead of cooking for him, she did nothing but cry; she kept it up all day long.

Before long, the village was in an uproar. Not taking her trousers off for him is one thing, but refusing to work the fields and not cooking are things he should not tolerate.

"The founder of the Wen clan cave dwellers would not have tolerated this," they told Wen Hai.

"What should I do?"

"Beat her till she comes around."

“Can I do that?”

“Go ask your mother,” said a man whose face was creased and pitted like a newly plowed hillside and on whose chin grew a wispy goatee like partially chewed grass on a grave site.

Wen Hai went and asked his mother, who told him, “Trees need to be pounded if they are to grow straight. Women are the same.”

So Wen Hai went home and, taking his mother’s advice, beat his wife black and blue.

People listening at the door reported, “It worked. Wen Hai is doing it to his wife right now, and he keeps saying, ‘Fuck your old lady. You think I’m screwing you? No, I’m screwing that two thousand yuan. Fuck your old lady. You think I’m screwing you? No, I’m screwing that two thousand yuan!’”

“That’s exactly what Wen Hai’s daddy did to his mother back then,” someone said.

Not long afterward, Wen Hai’s wife started cooking for him.

After that, Wen Hai’s wife was seen following him out into the fields, keeping her distance, a hoe over her shoulder.

“My, my, black-and-blue.”

“My, my, black-and-blue.”

The women in the fields scrunched up their mouths, blinked their eyes, and shook their heads.

3: Leng Two’s Madness

No one knew why Leng Two went mad after being just fine for so long or why, after bemg mad for so long, he got better again.

Leng Two’s father suffered from shortness of breath, and since herbal medicine had no effect, he thought about going to the mines to get some ephedrine from Leng One.

“Go on,” his wife said. “He hasn’t sent us any money for at least half a year. And bring some burlap bags back home with you.”

So Leng Two’s father climbed unsteadily onto a manure cart heading to the mines. The day after his father left, Leng Two went mad. The same thing happened as before; he kept shouting over and over:

“Murder! Murder!”

Leng Two lay face up on the kang, slapping it with his big, swarthy hands, making it resound like a threshing ground. When he tired of that, he pressed the back of his head against the hard brick sleeping platform, arched his back, and shouted:

“Murder! Murder!”

When he tired of that, he recommenced slapping the kang. Not daring to leave his side, Leng Two’s mother kept a vigil beside him.

We’re done for if he really commits murder. He would have to be possessed to really commit murder. These were her thoughts as she stood by the stove. She wiped her eyes with her sleeve.

“So fucking poor,” Leng Two said often, “that we can’t even eat oatmeal bread without mixing it with wild yams.”

Leng Two’s mother replied, “That’s to save money for you.”

“How many fucking years of going without oatmeal bread will it take to save up two thousand yuan?”

This time, Leng Two’s mother went ahead and made some oat- meal bread. But he wouldn’t eat it. He just kept shouting, “Murder,” and slapping the kang until he wore holes in the grass mat, which had already been mended with burlap bags.

Villagers said that if the barefoot doctor, one of those itinerant care providers, could do no good, she ought to ask the spirit healer to look at her son. But Leng Two’s mother just shook her head, for she knew from experience that neither the barefoot doctor nor the spirit healer could cure him.

We’re done for if he really commits murder. He would have to be possessed to really commit murder. Again these were her thoughts.

Then one day, the villagers realized that Leng Two had stopped screaming “Murder” and slapping the kang.

Leng Two slept soundly on the kang, snoring like a pig.

“Is he cured?” someone asked Leng Two’s mother as she fetched water.

“Yes, he’s fine.”

“How did that happen?”

“He’s fine.” Leng Two’s mother walked off in a hurry. Leng Two’s father returned on the manure cart, reporting that their daughter-in-law would give them no money but sent him back with a few burlap bags and some ephedrine. Leng Two's mother did not tell his father that he had gone mad, for she had not told him the time before either. Leng Two's father took no notice of the sorry condition of the kang mat, either this time or the time before. He was concerned only with the ephedrine, two crystals of which would take care of his problem.

Leng Two's mother mashed some boiled yams for Leng Two to use as paste to mend the grass mat with the burlap bags.

At least he didn't commit murder. At least he's not possessed, Leng Two's mother was thinking as she stood beside the stove, watching him mend the mat. She raised her arm to wipe her eyes with her sleeve every so often.

4: In the Haystack

Silence all around; the moon goddess casts her light on the ground. On the moonlit side of the haystack, he and she tamp out a nesting spot.

"You first."

"No, you first."

"We'll go in together, then."

He and she climb into the nest, bringing the hay sliding down so that it buries them both. He reaches out with his muscular arms to prop it up again.

"Don't worry, this is fine."

She cuddles up in his arms. "You must hate me, Elder Brother Chou."

"I don't hate you. The coal miners have more money than me."

"I won''t spend any. I'll save it up so you can find a wife."

"No, thanks."

"But I want to."

"I said, 'No, thanks.'"

"And I said, 'I want to.'"

He can tell she is on the verge of tears, so he holds his tongue.

"Elder Brother Chou," she says after a long silent moment.

"Hmmm?"

"Give me a kiss, Elder Brother Chou."

"Don't be like that."

"But I want to."

"I'm not in the mood today."

"But I want to."

Once again, he can tell she is on the verge of tears, so he leans over and pecks her on the cheek, gently, softly.

"Not there, here." She puckers up.

He gives her a peck on the lips, cool and wet.

"How did that taste?"

"Like oats."

"Wrong, you're wrong. Try again." She pulls his head down.

"It still tastes like oats," he says after a thoughtful pause.

"Don't be silly. I ate some hard candy a while ago. Come on, try again." Again she pulls his head down.

"Hard candy, it tastes like hard candy," he hurries to say. Neither of them says anything for a long while.

"Elder Brother Chou."

"Hmmm?"

"Why don't I do this for you tonight?"

"No, no, the goddess of the moon is right outside, so you can't do that. It's not something girls of the Wen clan cave dwellers do."

"Then make it next time, when I come back."

"Um."

Once again, there is a long silence, except for the footsteps and sighs of the moon goddess.

"Elder Brother Chou."

"Hmmm?"

"It's fate."

"Yes, it is."
"Our rotten fate."
"Mine, maybe. Yours is OK."
"No, it isn't."
"Yes, it is."
"No, it isn't."
"Yes, it is."
"I said, 'No, it isn't.'"
He can tell she is crying now. He also feels hot tears rolling down his cheeks and splashing onto her face.

5: Grandpa Pothook

Grandpa Pothook was carried back from the graveyard again. Grandpa Pothook was from another province and had no kin in the village, but everyone still called him Grandpa. When he got drunk, he became everyone's grandpa, young and old. That is exactly what everyone called him.

Pothook was the only individual who drank every day and could afford to do it. His younger brother, Panhook, a ranking official in their native province, sent him twenty or thirty yuan every month—he spent it on drink.

Pothook was not one to eat anything with his wine, which he drank warm. He had a unique method for warming his wine: he made a little pocket in the crotch of his pants, where he tucked away the wine bottle after every couple of swigs.

Pothook liked to share his wine.

"Come on, take a fucking swig for your grandpa here." He'd then suck in his breath, making a hollow in his wrinkled belly so he could reach down into his crotch to bring out the bottle. It would be nice and warm. Besides the smell of wine, the bottle carried other odors, rank enough that some refused the offer. But others, less fastidious, hoisted the bottle like a bugle and—glug glug—took a healthy swig. Pothook, his eyes crinkled in a smile, would cock his head to watch, his mouth opening and closing as if the liquid were pouring down his own throat.

As soon as Pothook was drunk, he staggered off toward the graveyard, muttering the same two lines from a folk song:

When I think of you in the daytime, I climb the wall to you;
When I think of you late at night, there's nothing I can do.

Once he reached the graveyard, he lay spread-eagled atop a large stone to sleep it off. Weather permitting, he would strip naked, exposing his skin to ants and an assortment of bugs.

"Go on, go down to the graveyard, and carry Grandpa Pothook back. We can't let him catch cold," one of the older generation would say to one of the younger ones, who would take four or five friends along.

When he had sobered up a bit, they would start teasing him:
"Do the tiger hop for us, Grandpa Pothook!" And he'd reply:
"I'm too old for that sort of stuff."
"You're not too old," they would say as they wove a tail out of tall grass.

Pothook would hold the rope in the crack of his ass and begin hopping all over the place. Instead of falling out, the tail would smack loudly against the scrawny thing hanging between his legs. That had everybody in stitches.

Now they were carrying him back once again, but this time Grandpa Pothook uttered only a single comment before passing out for the last time:
"Bury me in Widow Three's grave."
Never expecting him to say something like this, everyone who heard him stared blankly into space.

76.42 A Land Of Wonder And Mystery\fn{by Liang Xiaosheng (1949-)} Harbin, Heilongjiang Province, China (M) 12

It was a deathly silent and boundless swamp, covered the whole year round with dried branches, rotten leaves, and poisonous algae. The surface, dark brown and stagnant, had a deceptively peaceful appearance. Below it was an oozing abyss which contained the decomposing skeletons of bears, hunters' guns and tractors belonging to reclamation teams. It sent out a morbid odor for a hundred li and was known as Spirits' Swamp.

When I first arrived in that Great Northern Wilderness, I heard many legends about this Spirits' Swamp: deep in the starless, moonless night one could see across the slumbering wasteland the eerie greenish glow of the will-o'-the-wisps; one could hear bears roar as they were swallowed by the swamp, gunshots fired by hunters for help and the desperate cries of those caught in the mire—sometimes one could hear a strange bird's song which sounded just like a sad woman's wailing, "what a pity, what a pity"—but no one had ever seen what kind of bird it was. The local Oroqen people called it the bird which "summons back the spirits." They thought that it was really an incarnation of the God of the Earth and that deep in the night it came to comfort and call back the spirits of people and animals who had died in Spirits' Swamp. And the will-o'-the-wisps were its lanterns.

Spirits' Swamp, like the ferocious nine-headed dragon of Greek myth, forcibly occupied the land behind it, a fertile land of more than ten thousand hectares, and no one dared cross the swamp to reclaim it. The Oroqen people used to call this land the "Devil's Reach." During winter they occasionally crossed it, but they never killed any animals for fear of inescapable punishment by the "Devil."

It was my third winter in the Great Northern Wilderness. A detachment of a dozen or so educated youths had been sent by our reclamation company to Devil's Reach.

As a result of being wrongly sited at the outset, our company was located in a natural depression with fairly limited arable land. If harvest happened to coincide with a rainy season, the combine harvesters got bogged down in the wheat fields like paralyzed toads. So we had always had bad harvests and that particular year could not even produce enough for the following year's seeds. We couldn't afford to live off the land, much less send grain to the state. That was why the reclamation regiment decided to disband our company and reallocate the more than two hundred young people to other companies.

What more profound humiliation could there be than this decision? Many of us burst into tears as we listened to the old company leader's announcement. Li Xiao-yan, the company's deputy instructor, was the first to stand up and indignantly refute the decision.

"The company should not be broken up! We can reclaim Devil's Reach. We ought to have thought of it earlier. We must rebuild our company there. Let Devil's Reach be covered with our reclaimers' footprints for the first time. We'll guarantee the regiment that we'll get a crop the same year we reclaim the land. The following year we'll have our new company base. Take our word for it!"

Though usually we listened indifferently to her ambitious words, this time her rousing speech actually did encourage us and many of us felt the same way.

Finally the regiment canceled their decision and accepted our guarantee.

Several days later, we set off with two first-rate 54 h.p. tractors decorated with red ribbons and flowers, a newly-made wooden sled trailing behind each for the vast snow-covered wilderness. The whole company had lined up to see us off. Hope, confidence, trust and a silent concern was in their eyes, and each of us felt a strong sense of responsibility. Everyone cried.

The first sled held our food and luggage and we squeezed ourselves into the tent set up on the second. We sat silently shoulder to shoulder. Beside me my younger sister cuddled a wicker cage which contained a small squirrel. She looked pale, her expression dull, her eyes sad and, like a deaf-mute, said nothing the whole journey. I had no other brothers or sisters. Although I had loved her very much since childhood, I felt a mixture of pity and hatred towards her then because she had recently acquired a bad reputation and I was thoroughly ashamed of her.

Li Xiaoyan, the deputy instructor, sat opposite with the blacksmith, Wang Zhigang, a sturdy man with a tanned, rough complexion, who gave the impression of being powerful, strong and determined. It seemed natural for us to compare him with Othello, and we had nicknamed him the "Moor." He liked to be alone, and had a just and ethical character. He didn't seek the limelight, and had a strong influence over the younger people. I rather envied him for that. It was the deputy instructor who had nominated him specifically to join our detachment. Now I stared with jealousy as Li rested her head on the Moor's broad shoulder to take a nap.

I asked myself why I was attracted to her. Was it her beauty? Certainly she was beautiful, a girl from Shanghai, with a lovely face, white, delicate skin, large, shining eyes, and thin, curved eyebrows. Her face always had an expression of wonder. Her slender figure seemed to confirm what we'd heard, that she had been a good ballet student in Shanghai and that many dance troupes had wanted to recruit her but that she'd refused them all. She had come to the Great Northern Wilderness of her own free will. From the first moment I saw her, I couldn't help being aware of her. But I wasn't usually someone who was easily reduced or overwhelmed by pretty girls. On the contrary, whenever I meet a girl, the more beautiful she is, the more aloof I am. It's one of my maxims—never be a slave of love through indiscretion. Was it her seriousness, her solemnity that enticed me? Not really. I rather preferred girls with enthusiastic, frank and open-minded characters. Sometimes I thought Li's solemn bearing was hypocritical and it disgusted me. It was true she'd sworn not to pay a home visit to Shanghai for three years in order to consolidate her determination to settle in that border area. She also made the suggestion that other girls in the company ought not to wear make-up or colorful clothes. But some of them passed it around that Li still worried about her white, delicate skin and that in summer she stealthily went to the river bank to get a suntan. Unfortunately the sunshine only turned her white skin pink, not the brown she wanted. She also tried to be more masculine, wearing what the boys wore, doing the same manual labor they did. She wanted to change her figure, to adopt the so-called "beauty of the laborer," but she remained slim and graceful. Strong and healthy, she was like a small white birch, erect and tall during those three years in the Great Northern Wilderness. She had not been home once during that time. In the first year she had become the head of the platoon, in the second a Party member, and the third the deputy instructor of the company, a model for the whole regiment, showing others how to strike roots in the frontier reclamation areas.

One summer evening in that third year, right after she was appointed deputy instructor of the company, I suddenly heard someone singing when I was sketching on the river bank.

Under the bright sky of early spring,
My eighteen-year-old lover sits on the river bank.

It was a "decadent" song strictly prohibited at the time. Who was singing it? If our deputy instructor heard about it, an "ideological struggle" would inevitably ensue. Whoever it was sang well. Her voice was very sweet. Burning with curiosity, I picked up my home-made drawing board and went quietly along the bank to find out who the singer was. Suddenly I came upon someone sitting on a large, smooth gray stone beneath a reclining willow tree on the opposite bank of the river. It was none other than our deputy instructor!

She was washing her clothes, dangling her bare feet in the water, her trouser legs rolled up above the ankles and her white calves uncovered.

Under the bright sky of early spring,
My eighteen-year-old lover waits for his sweetheart, Yinglian.

After scrubbing, kneading and wringing out the clothes, she stood up on the large gray stone and tiptoed cautiously across a group of cobblestones to hang them over some branches. Afraid the cobblestones might hurt her feet, she moved gingerly, with quick light steps, just like the dance of the cygnets in Swan Lake. Having spread the clothes across the shrubs, she returned to the river bank with the same steps. She collected a few wild flowers, taking in their scent and placing some in her hair, two on the right and three on the left. Then, squatting in front of the river, she stared for a long time at her own reflection in the water. She was admiring her own beauty! After a while she rose slowly. Then suddenly she jumped up on to the gray stone's smooth surface and, her arms outstretched, made an elegant semi-circle and performed a Mexican folk dance with quick steps.

The drawing board slid from my hands and dropped into the water, causing a slight noise. Alarmed, she stopped dancing and saw me watching her from the opposite side of the river. She appeared stunned, like a bewildered fawn or a startled crane about to take flight.

The river between us, we stared at one another in astonishment.

The first to recover my composure, I jumped into the river to retrieve my drawing board. Feigning a casual manner, I waded through the shallow water to the opposite bank. By then, the wild flowers in her hair had disappeared and the trouser legs had been rolled down.

"You … what are you doing here on the river bank?" she asked, intending to gain the upper hand, and with it the psychological initiative. She tried her best to conceal her embarrassment, assuming a relaxed manner as much as she could. She became again a solemn, reserved young woman in the presence of a young man, a deputy instructor with the requisite dignity. But she hadn't had enough time to button up her jacket, faded from many washings, and underneath she wore a pink shirt, short and tight, with a V-neck through which I caught a glimpse of a white neck and bosom, round white shoulders and even the cleavage of her heaving breasts. Immediately I averted my eyes and felt my heart racing with excitement. I flushed, feeling an inexplicable kind of shame, guilty about debasing her and myself as well, though I could swear to heaven that I didn't, even for a moment, desire her. I didn't even feel the instinctive response which ordinarily occurs when a young man meets an attractive girl, the passion which originated with Adam and Eve.

She was so very sensitive. As my eyes took her in, she immediately covered her jacket flap and turned round. When she turned back again I saw the old familiar deputy instructor, jacket buttoned right up, and feet burrowed deep into the sand to hide the fact that she had no shoes on.

I felt humiliated by her behavior and tried to find words to break the awkward silence, but ended by blurting out something very foolish:

"You're … so beautiful!"

"What!" Her face blushed like a crimson cloud. My sudden appearance had caused her problems, placing her in an impossibly awkward position.

"What I … I meant is that you danced beautifully. If I'm not mistaken, it was a Mexican folk dance, wasn't it?"

"Mexican dance? Don't make fun of me. I was just doing the radio limbering-up exercises for middle school students."

"Does that mean you're going to deny you were singing as well?"

"Singing a song? Why should I deny it? I did sing a song." In addition to her feigned puzzlement, she now added one more thing, an artificial directness. She began singing:

Near the Qinghe River, on Tigerhead Hill,
Is situated Dazhai Production Brigade. . . .

After singing two lines she said to me, "That's the song you heard me singing." The blush had receded and she had completely recovered her normal complexion.

I felt that she had made a fool of me and treated me as though I was blind and deaf. I couldn't stand any more such insults. Suppressing my anger with great effort I said coldly:

"No, that wasn't the song I heard. You sang: "My eighteen-year-old lover waits for his sweetheart, Yinglian!"

"Eighteen-year-old lover? His sweetheart Yinglian? I've never even heard of such a song. Don't talk nonsense!" She raised her slender eyebrows with a surprised and astonished expression, as if I had called her a thief.

So many hypocritical changes of expression had taken place on that lovely face.

I had nothing more to say, and just looked at her in astonishment. To me she looked like the Sphinx, with her lion's body and human face, only the Sphinx was, more honest. As I remember, even the Sphinx said the same thing to everyone: If you fail to solve my riddle, then I will devour you. But the Sphinx was less shameless than this deputy instructor, since ultimately she jumped down from the rocks and died when Oedipus correctly answered the riddle. The deputy instructor wanted me, a normal person of sound mind, to believe myself to be an idiot, a daydreamer, talking in my sleep.

"You hypocrite!" Indignantly I turned around and abruptly strode off.

"Wait!"

I halted without turning around, but I could sense her anxiety.

"You … are you going to report me to the company leader?" she murmured, with an imploring tone.

Still with my back to her, I softened and shook my head. After walking a distance I could not help looking back. She remained standing beside the river like a statue, motionless …

I never told anyone else about the incident. I couldn't be that mean.

But from then on, whenever she made her speeches she would become uneasy when our eyes met. I regretted that and felt sorry for her.

Not long after that I got a telegram saying that my mother was seriously ill, but I was unable to get permission from the company leader to return home. The reason was clear, since I was the combine harvester driver and it was then harvest season. Actually I knew that the company leader didn't believe the telegram was genuine. That was another reason he didn't approve my request. He had been deceived several times by phony telegrams which parents or their children sent in order to arrange a reunion. Some of them even invented the death of a parent. As a consequence, the company leader had become an empiricist. It was no use pleading with him to let me go, nor would any kind of explanation help. But I couldn't remain indifferent to the telegram. My father had died early and my mother, a worker in a small factory, had brought up my younger sister and I through all kinds of difficulties and hardships. It had not been easy for her, and only I understood how she had put her heart and soul into looking after us. Now my younger sister and I had come to this Great Northern Wilderness and left her at home alone. She was a woman of strong character and would never use deceitful measures even though she was yearning to see us.

I decided I had to return immediately to see her.

That day I stealthily left the company.

My mother! This woman who had tasted to the full the bitterness of life! She was so unyielding, so concerned for her children. She knew she was dying but she only cabled us that she was “very sick” instead of “mortally ill.” She didn’t want to alarm us with such frightening words.

During my mother’s last five days I lived with her and gave her as much care and love as I could to thank her for bringing us into this world and helping us to grow up. I did this not only for myself but also for my younger sister who was unable to return.

Five days, only five days! No matter how I expressed my love or took care of my mother during those five days it was only a symbolic compensation. How can a mother’s love and concern for her children ever be compensated? My mother's last words were:

“Look after your sister. You’re all the family she has.”

Numbed by grief, I went back to the company. The day I returned, on the instruction of the company leader, the Youth League branch held a meeting to discuss what disciplinary action should be taken over my desertion. Before the meeting, someone had disclosed that I was certain to be expelled from the League. The meeting itself was purely a formality and I would be used as an example to warn the others.

I myself was totally indifferent to whatever punishment I had to have.

The meeting was conducted by the deputy instructor. I thought she would certainly use the opportunity to take her revenge and I was determined to keep my mouth shut and listen to her long criticism of me. At first she asked me to say something about my mistake. I looked down and muttered:

“My mother … died … three days ago.”

Finishing this sentence, I put my head in my hands and felt everyone’s eyes focused on me. For an instant, it seemed that everyone at the meeting was holding their breath. Suffocated by the sudden silence, even the air seemed unnaturally still. Following this pause, the deputy instructor said in a low but clear voice:

“The meeting is over.”

She was the first to leave. As I passed by the company office, I heard the deputy instructor and the company leader arguing fiercely. I was surprised, since the deputy instructor was used to carrying out the company leader’s instructions. Wondering what they were wrangling over, I stopped to listen.

“I am the head of this company. Don’t I have the right to punish a subordinate?” It was the angry voice of the company leader with his heavy Sichuan accent.

“I am the Youth League branch secretary. Punishing League members is the duty of the League branch.” The deputy instructor’s voice was raised too.

“All you’re doing is making excuses for a deserter!”

“A deserter? Did he desert the battlefield? Did he cross to the other side of the Heilong River? Do you know that his mother died? Three days after her death he came back—”

“Oh, his mother died, did she!?”

“Company leader, I am an educated youth too, with an elderly father and mother. They’re longing to see me. I’d go back home this very minute if I hadn’t taken an oath. But I can’t. I don’t agree that he should be expelled from the League. Company leader, please, put yourself in his position and think it over!”

I heard her start to cry. As I stood outside the company office, tears welled up in my eyes too.
I felt thoroughly grateful to her. Not because she had defended me, but because she had said, ‘I am an educated youth too …’ All of my misconceptions and prejudices about her were erased by this sentence and I felt I would go through hell for her. Hearing this I knew she was a good person with a noble character and a sympathetic heart.

Nevertheless, two days later this same person told me something which hit me like a bolt of lightning. That day, while helping me to turf out the weeds in a long stretch of ground, she asked:

“After work would you mind coming with me?”

It was the second time in three years that she had talked to me. The first had been the encounter by the river not long ago. This time her sullen and serious expression seemed to omen some misfortune. As we shouldered our hoes and lined up to return, she said to me in front of everyone else:

“Please wait. Let’s go together.” The others looked at both of us with curious expressions. After they had moved off a distance, she looked me in the eye, and said:

“Without consulting you, I've arranged to have your younger sister transferred to our company.”

“Why? What’s happened? Tell me!”

“When you were home …”

“Tell me!”

“'She had an abortion.”

Shocked I felt my body swaying and nearly fell. She steadied me with her hands. I roughly pushed her aside, shouting, “You’re lying!”

She staggered backward. Eyes wide with fear, she uttered two words,

“It’s true!”

I felt suddenly as if I was glued to the ground. I wanted to shout out but it was as if there was something stuffed down my throat and I couldn’t. The only sound coming from my voice was a hoarse moan. My vision blurred and she became indistinct. Like someone crazed, I raced towards the tent. I wept through the whole of that night, biting the quilt corner to avoid disturbing my soundly sleeping roommates. I remembered my mother’s last wish, but before I could carry it out, my younger sister had acted scandalously. Now she was to be transferred to my company so she could be under my wing.

Never! With the right of an elder brother, I would punish her severely, on behalf of my dead mother.

The next day I was called to the office by the deputy instructor and there met my younger sister. On seeing her, I sprang at her like a leopard, took her hair and forcefully hit her head against the earthen wall.

“Stop!” I heard the deputy instructor’s shout. She dashed forward trying hard to loosen my frenzied grip.

“Get away!” I roared at her.

I tormented my younger sister as though I was tormenting myself. My hysteria seemed to relieve the pain.

Suddenly, I received a sharp slap on the face. I released my grip.

The second slap was much harder.

The two slaps had sobered me up and unconsciously I stepped back, feeling my burning cheek.

My younger sister didn't utter a single word, nor moan, shout or plead. Her disheveled hair covered a pallid face bathed in tears, and her large eyes were full of humiliation.

Her face drained of color, the deputy instructor held my younger sister tightly and stared at me, determined to fight if necessary.

“You bloody animal!”

That was the first time I ever heard her use bad language.

From that day on I was in love with her.

Now she was sitting opposite. As the covered, tractor-drawn sled slogged on through the whirling snow, we were chilled by the northwesterly wind. It carried snow-flakes into the tent through an open flap which no one wanted to draw. We looked at the white world outside, the white land, the white mountains, the white river, the white forests. The blizzard violently pursued us, like millions of maddened galloping wild oxen.

After silently looking round at everyone, the deputy instructor then said, almost to herself:

“Should we have someone tell a story? Or perhaps sing a song together?”

There was no response to her suggestion. Everyone was exhausted. Her eyes fell on me. I cleared my throat and began to sing The Reclaimers’ Song:

Every reclaimer has a sun in his heart,
One hand holds a gun, the other a pickaxe.

No one joined in and so naturally I halted after the first two lines of the song.

Just then, the Moor started to whistle. He wasn’t a good singer, but he could whistle quite tunefully. What surprised me though was that he was whistling the famous Russian folk song Troika. He wasn’t at all afraid of the deputy instructor’s interference. His whistling had an enchanting quality, like a clarinet or a trumpet. His lyrical, rhythmic melody produced in us a sense of sadness, of deep melancholy.

Someone started humming quietly, then another and a third, gradually converging into a chorus.

My younger sister looked up, stared uneasily and then, lowering her head again, heaved a long sigh. I felt sorry for her.

I gazed across at the deputy instructor's face, guessing that she would immediately put a stop to this sentimental song. But she remained indifferent. Her head was still resting on the Moor’s shoulder. Her eyes closed, she pretended to be falling asleep, but I noticed her hand covertly beating time.

I felt that my pride was hurt and bit my lower lip. The song continued:

The Volga is covered with ice and snow,
The Troika is driving over the icy river.
Someone is singing a melancholy song,
The singer is …

Night fell unobtrusively and the merciless blizzard stopped its howling. Maybe it surrendered itself or maybe, with our tractors driving at full throttle, we left it behind in that silent wilderness.

Now we were enclosed by the chill darkness, a huge natural tent flap.

Traveling like the migrant Oroqen people, we drove swiftly across the vast snowy plateau for two days and two nights. When we looked at the map, we were convinced that we had arrived at the snow-and-ice-covered Spirits' Swamp. A solemn wilderness dawn was just breaking.

Spirits' Swamp! It was not as dreadful as the legends made out. Perhaps it was in hibernation and its true ferocious appearance was hidden deep beneath the snow. It seemed as if the largest lake in the world lay frozen in front of us. Devil's Reach—it looked so flat we could hardly believe that it extended only as far as the remote horizon.

"Hey! Devil King, where are you? Show yourself!" shouted one of our companions.

But the "Devil" did not appear. Suddenly the Moor pointed to something in the distance:

"Look!"

A round wooden stake with a notch cut into it stood at an angle. Curious, we walked over to have a look. The deputy instructor brushed the snow from the stake and we saw a wooden tablet with something carved on its rough surface. Most of the words had been eroded by wind and rain, but some poor handwriting was still faintly visible:

. . . died here. . . .

Each of us shuddered.

"There's another one over there!" My younger sister had discovered a similar evil omen. She was the first to walk back to the tractor. The deputy instructor said softly:

"Let's go back. Don't disturb their rest."

If someone asks me what the hardest and bitterest work of all in the Great Northern Wilderness is, I'll answer "Reclamation." And if someone asks me what work in the Great Northern Wilderness I feel most proud of, my answer will also be "Reclamation."

Because we were eager to discover the best sources of water and timber, nearly every part of Devil's Reach was covered with our footprints. We finally discovered a stream—not marked on the map—which was the only clean water source. We named it the "Wanderer" since it had been wandering across the flat wasteland for countless years before we discovered it and set up a tent next to it.

When the snow melted, our gleaming ploughs sank into the bosom of Devil's Reach. Who but a reclaimer could experience the joy of ploughing the first plot of virgin land by tractor? There were many wolves on this flat land. In threes and fours they swaggered along behind the tractors, preying on field rats startled by the ploughing, and at night they would howl around our tent. The hardship of this work had transformed all the young men in the detachment into saints. All of us, including my younger sister and the deputy instructor, lived in the same large tent. Their small "world" was separated from ours by a hanging blanket, behind which existed a sacred, forbidden place.

One night, I suddenly woke and could not hear the usual night shift tractor roaring outside the tent. I immediately sprang to my feet and, without thinking, barged into the "forbidden place" to shake the deputy instructor awake.

"What do you want?"

"The Moor is out ploughing, but the tractor has stopped!"

With the tractor silent for such a long time, there must be something wrong with the Moor. Everyone in the tent got up. Just as we were all about to run out, the Moor suddenly appeared at the entrance, his hands gripping the two front paws of an old wolf which was clinging to his back. The animal was still half alive, its mouth wide open, its two back paws gripping either side of his waist.

"It's still alive! Quick! Hit it!" shouted the Moor. We immediately took up sticks and clubs and beat the large gray animal to death. The Moor flung himself on a pallet, gasping for breath. After a long pause he told us:

"The steel cable on the big plough broke and I was changing it when that damned thing came at me and got me round the shoulders with its claws."

His face and hands were cut and bloodstained, his clothes in tatters. Frowning, he took off his padded jacket. His sweatshirt and skin had also been clawed. The deputy instructor ordered my younger sister:

"Quick, get the first-aid kit!"

Just then we suddenly realized that the deputy instructor, feet bare, was wearing only her underclothes. She had just become aware of it herself and felt uneasy at our stares. But she remained calm, and said coolly:

"What are you looking at? Haven't you got any thing better to do? Go to bed again, all of you!"

Submissively, one after another, people went to bed and buried themselves in their quilts once again. But I remained, holding the lantern above the Moor's head.

It was the first time the deputy instructor had ever given me such a tender look. Without saying a word, she took the first-aid kit from my sister and carefully bandaged the Moor's wounds.

My younger sister was the "Minister of Domestic Affairs" of the detachment and did all our washing and cooking. The frozen vegetables brought from the company had all been eaten and no edible wild herbs could be found in such a cold winter, so she did her best to make different kinds of food for us with the remaining two bags of flour.

If I had joined this reclamation work because of the deputy instructor, then my younger sister had come to Devil's Reach because of me. I was her only family member. If I went to the ends of the earth she would go with me. Although I had treated her cruelly, she still wanted my protection and shelter. On the surface, I still appeared indifferent towards her, but in truth I had already wholeheartedly forgiven her. Only those who are guilty of monstrous crimes do not forgive others. And after all, she was my younger sister, my only sister.

I was duty-bound to take care of her. Both before and after the scandal occurred, had I carried out my responsibilities as an elder brother? No, I hadn't. The first day we arrived in the Great Northern Wilderness, she had become fascinated by deer, and had asked if we could work at the deer farm together. But I had refused. I thought her fragility and willfulness would cause me endless trouble and worry. Instead I had looked after my own affairs and shirked my duties as an elder brother. After her mistake, which had left her open to public censure, my first thought was that she had tarnished my reputation. I had detested her without feeling the slightest ounce of pity or sympathy for her.

Now, in countless sleepless nights on Devil's Reach, I gradually realized my true nature. I had to confess to myself what a selfish brother, what a mean coward I was.

One day, when just the two of us were alone in the tent, I called over to her with a soft voice:

"Sister!"

She was kneading flour on the chopping board. Hearing me calling, she raised her head and looked at me with a frightened expression, tears welling up in her eyes.

"Younger sister, are you still angry with me?" I moved to her side.

Tears, large tears trickled down her pallid face on to the dough she was kneading.

"Younger sister …" My voice was hoarse.

Turning around and throwing herself into my arms, she hugged me with flour-covered hands and sobbed. After a long while she stopped. The first thing she asked me was:

"Is mum better?"

It was as though I had been stabbed in the heart.

Oh, mother! If only you had heard what your daughter was saying, you would cry too. May you not hear, and have no more worries about your children. But I wish that somehow you could know what your daughter had said, because she was the one who loved you most.

I hadn't the courage to tell my sister that our mother was dead. I worried about her delicate feelings and the fragile heart which wouldn't be able to bear such a shock. I answered in a gentle voice:

"She's not sick. She's been missing us terribly. When I told her that we were both all right, she felt better."

A wan smile appeared at the corners of her mouth, a pained and anguished smile. It was the first time she had smiled for several days.

"Tell me who the young man is. I want to teach him a lesson."

My sister firmly shook her head.

"Do you … love … him?"

Silent, she nodded.

"He … How about him? Does he love you?"

Another silent nod.

I stared at her. The angelic expression on her face was obviously a reflection of her true feelings. I felt lost.

Suddenly she asked:
"Elder brother, do you love her?"
"Who?"
"The deputy insuctor!"
"Where have you heard such nonsense?"
"I discovered it for myself. She likes you a lot too."
"Really!?" I grabbed her tightly by the arm.
"Yes!"
"But she likes the Moor!"
"She trusts him and so do I. He's worthy of our trust. Any girl would trust someone Like him. But you're the one she's fond of. She told me that you have an artistic nature. She also knows that you're in love with her."
Suddenly she stopped talking. Almost at the same time, both of us saw the deputy instructor standing by the entrance to the tent. She had obviously overheard our conversation.
"Ai-ya! I must go and collect the clothes I left drying by the river."
Finding an excuse, I fled from the tent, racing wildly across the flat land. Devil's Reach seemed to be the most beautiful place in the whole world.
That day after eating our evening meal we all gathered together in the tent to tell stories, something we did quite often to amuse ourselves. We told all sorts of stories: fairy stories, ghost stories, horror stories, humorous stories; each of us, including the deputy instructor, freed of the company's fetters, seemed to have come into our own in Devil's Reach.
The deputy instructor told us a tale from the Odyesey, of how the great Odysseus, returning to his homeland of Ithaca after attacking Troy, was detained by a headwind in an isolated island with his companions. She told us how the residents of the island presented them with a magic plant, common on the island, which was so delicious that upon eating it a person would forget all of their troubles. Odysseus and his companions forgot their homeland, their parents, their brothers, sisters, wives and friends when they ate this plant and so they stayed on the island for the rest of their days.
To my surprise, the deputy instructor told this story in such a natural, unexaggerated manner that we were all moved by the depth of feeling she expressed. She finished her story and left us all deep in thought. Only my younger sister heaved a long sigh, and said to herself:
"I'd like to get a lot of those magic plants."
The deputy instructor sat next to the Moor, her head resting against his shoulder as usual. The flames from the big stove cast a red glow across her face. As the light flickered over her pretty features, an expression of longing and sadness appeared before my eyes.
I inevitably felt a deep sympathy for her. Had she not been restrained by the oath she had made three years earlier, she could have visited her family. Three years! She must have missed her parents and friends more than any of us. I opened my board and said:
"Don't move, Moor, I want to draw both of you."
Actually I really only wanted to draw the deputy instructor, so beautiful was she, but I dared not openly say so. However, the Moor thought that I was publicly mocking him, something he could not endure. It was obvious that he had misunderstood. When the deputy instructor subconsciously moved her head away from his shoulder, he clutched her hand and stared at me coldly:
"Don't move! Let him draw. Don't disappoint him!"
There was a hint of challenge in his intonation. The deputy instructor obediently leaned her head against his shoulder again and looked at me with a faint smile.
Without saying anything more I began to sketch. I was determined that the drawing would be meticulous, would really convey her beauty. So I looked up at her and drew several strokes, took another look, and drew several more. Never had I worked so carefully on a sketch. Finally I finished it and intentionally broke my pencil lead on the very last stroke.
"I'm sorry, I haven't done it very well." I handed it over to the deputy instructor.
Everyone gathered around admiring the sketch.
"Not bad! It looks just like her!"
"Ah! That's really quite a talent you've got. Why have you kept it a secret from us? Will you draw me one day?"
"Ai-ya, you've only drawn me!" The deputy instructor threw a glance at the Moor.

"I'm sorry. My pencil broke." I flushed slightly. The deputy instructor took the sketch and looked at it carefully for a while and then said, "May I have it?"

"Certainly. You can keep it if you like."

"I'll look after it." She looked down. As she did, the Moor stood up and slipped out of the tent. From that day on he was much more reticent.

Everything in life can be passed on except love. I would persist in my pursuit of her, never give up my love for her, never love another, never …

The first spring rain came.

The soil of the reclamation fields, dark and rich, was like a baby greedily sucking Mother Nature's milk.

People often compare spring to a gorgeously dressed young maiden, but it was traveling over Devil's Reach more like a solemn woman, walking slowly and with measured paces. Carrying her uniquely soft dye with her, she turned the world green.

One day the deputy instructor fainted by the banks of the Wanderer. She was ill and did not come to for two days. While in a coma, she kept mumbling, "Wheat seeds, wheat seeds." None of the medicines in our first-aid kit could reduce her temperature. On the third day she came to, called my sister to her bedside and asked:

"How much food is left now?"

"Only a little," answered my sister.

The deputy instructor looked about with an expression of deep concern, and said with a smile:

"My dear friends, on behalf of the company I want to thank all of you. I am going to suggest that the Party branch records your merits. Now, except for one or two of us, everyone should return to the company and give them a hand moving here. This must be finished before the ice on Spirits' Swamp melts!"

She gently took my sister's hand.

"You have to stay with me, otherwise I'll feel lonely."

"I want to."

"I'll stay too," I said. The Moor looked over at the deputy instructor.

"I'd like to stay as well, if you agree."

She nodded her approval.

Now only the four of us remained on Devil's Reach. One day, a second … four days passed. The company still had not arrived. A company of more than two hundred people on the move would inevitably mean many difficulties; but, within those four days, Spirits' Swamp had completely melted. Our trusted friend the Wanderer River had betrayed us and collaborated against us with the Spirits' Swamp. When my sister and I went out on the fourth day, we were stunned by the change in the environment: in one night, the clear, meandering Wanderer had somewhere become a rushing current, turbid and muddy, like a wild galloping horse with hairpin turns and whirlpools, lumps of snow and ice, withered branches and broken trees. The river had overflowed and poured water across the swamp. Spirits' Swamp was now a vast expanse of water. My sister was worried.

"If the company doesn't arrive today, we won't have anything to eat."

The Moor and I shot her a glance but said nothing. What we were most worried about was how the company would cross the swamp.

Without saying anything more, my sister went back into the tent, and the Moor and I followed. She sat on a pallet beside the deputy instructor, who was still in a coma, and tears filled her eyes. Catching sight of us, she quickly wiped them away, picked up a sickle and a small basket and said:

"I'm going out to dig some wild herbs."

It was almost noon when suddenly we heard my sister calling out from a distance:

"Brother, brother, quick, come here!"

The Moor and I immediately jumped to our feet and ran out of the tent where we saw my sister, like a small terrier, chasing after a weak roe deer. Tossing her sickle, she hit its rear leg and it fell. She sprang at it, but failed to hold it. Struggling free, the deer ran towards the swamp. My younger sister was on its heels. At the edge of the swamp it stopped for a moment, as if looking back at her, then jumped and fled, limping.

"Stop!"

"Sister!"

The Moor and I shouted at her. My younger sister was at the very edge of the swamp, pacing up and down. She finally came to a halt and looked at the deer with its mired feet. After a slight hesitation, she made a first cautious step into the Spirits' Swamp.

"Come back! It's dangerous." shouted the Moor as we ran towards her.

She turned round to look at us and then waved her hand as if to say, "Leave me alone."

When the Moor and I reached the edge of the swamp, she had already caught the deer. Struggling with the small animal, she suddenly sank deep into the mire. Before we could even think what to do, all we could see was her small hand repeatedly grasping the air. In an instant, both my sister and the deer had completely disappeared from sight.

"Keep away …" Her last words in this world still echo in my ears.

"Sister!" I shouted and raced recklessly towards the swamp.

With his strong arms the Moor grabbed me from behind. I struggled against him and then lost consciousness.

When I recovered I found myself lying in the tent, the image of my younger sister's tiny hand appearing repeatedly before my eyes. My mother's last wish rang again in my ears and tears welled up. I struggled to get up and saw the Moor standing still outside the tent. His tall figure was silhouetted clearly against the pale moon. The eerie song of a bird rang out over the swamp and sent cold shivers down my spine. Perhaps the bird was calling back my younger sister's soul. I wasn't superstitious, but the thought suddenly flashed across my mind. I stared at the Moor and blazed with hatred towards him. Had he not restrained me, I believed I would certainly have been able to save my younger sister. I was consumed with guilt over her death.

I stood up and staggered out of the tent. When the Moor heard my footsteps, he turned slowly round, his eyes wide open, and stared at me in astonishment. Maybe he knew I was enraged, for he instinctively stepped back. I abruptly raised my fist.

"You …"

Stunned, he stepped back again.

"I hate you!" I growled, clenching my teeth.

He fixed his eyes on me and said in a low, deep voice, "If it's because of your sister, then I have the right to defend myself. Do you think I have the heart of a devil? Don't you think I'm upset about your sister's death? If I could change places with her, I'd willingly be caught in that swamp myself. If it's because of her …"—he threw a glance at the tent—"then go ahead and hit me! So long as I'm still alive, and she's not your wife, I have the right to love her."

His words made me shiver. As though paying condolences to my younger sister, I lowered my head. A silence reigned over the night. The flat wilderness was quiet and sullen, and even the song of the eerie bird who called back lost souls had died away.

The Moor slowly turned and walked away into the darkness. Soon his figure was lost in the hollow black night.

"What are you two quarreling about?"

I looked over my shoulder to see the deputy instructor standing by the tent. In the past four days she had become so weak that, had she let go of her grip on the tent flap, she would most certainly have collapsed. After a long silence two words fell from my lips:

"The wolf …"

"Wolf?" Scrutinizing my expression, she asked:

"You're hiding something from me. Where's the Moor? Where is your sister? Where have they gone? Tell me! What's happened?"

"My sister died in the swamp."

I couldn't hold back my sorrow any longer and covered my face with my hands, sobbing aloud.

On hearing this, she uttered only a short "Oh!" and fainted, as if she'd suddenly received a heavy blow.

The Moor had not returned even though it was now deep into the night. Where could he have gone? Would he come back and share the same tent with me again? Had he met with some mishap? If he had any kind of accident I would be responsible …

I was plunged into confusion, and waited anxiously for his safe return, feeling the dark night move on its long course. I took care of the still-unconscious deputy instructor. It was the first time in the unlimited vastness of that flat wilderness that I experienced such dreadful loneliness. The whole night long I could not fall asleep.

At dawn I heard the hurried clatter of hoofs in the distance and ran out of the tent to find the Moor dismounting from a horse.

"Where did you get the horse?" I said in a friendly manner; trying to put aside all of the unpleasantness between us.

"Several days ago, I found a branch with a trail marker cut into it and knew there must be some Oroqen hunters nearby. I found them yesterday and borrowed it from them. How is the deputy instructor?"

"Still unconscious."

"The Oroqen hunters told me that maybe she has haemorrhagic fever."

"Haemorrhagic fever?!" I froze. I had once heard of someone dying of that like a leaf ripped down by the autumn wind.

"Take this horse and escort the deputy instructor back to the company right now," ordered the Moor. "You must go back the way we came and you will probably meet up with our company and be able to save her."

"No, I'll stay here and you take her."

"I'm too heavy. If I try and take her, the horse will certainly collapse halfway there. It's already exhausted. The two of you go together. If you head westward fifty li you can cut around Spirits' Swamp, and go due west beside it!"

To continue arguing with him would have been hypocritical. The Moor tied the unconscious deputy instructor to my back and then helped me mount.

"Take the gun!"

"You keep it."

"No, you should take it. You need to be prepared for any eventuality." He fastened the gun to the saddle. I reined the horse around and then gave the animal a strong punch on its rump. The horse neighed and raced westward at full gallop. Although the westward route was thirty li less than the eastward one, we had to cross a vast grassland. We were fortunate in having a well-bred Oroqen hunter, a short and compact animal, not handsome but able to bear hardships and stand up to grueling work. It really is the hunters' friend, the camel of the wilderness.

Having passed the Spirits' Swamp I continued urging the horse on. It seemed to understand what I wanted, and galloped on without slackening. After traveling nearly thirty li I felt my cotton-padded trousers drenched by the animal's sweat. Suddenly it snorted several times and began to stagger. It tried to continue with all its strength, but its forelegs buckled. As soon as I dismounted, it instantly inclined to one side, stretched out its neck, and collapsed.

The horse's belly rose and fell, warm air spurting from its nostrils, its mouth dribbling white foam. Before lying down, the intelligent animal had paused to prevent its full weight crushing down on its rider's leg and had looked at me almost apologetically with its clear eyes.

"Put me down! Put me down! Where are we? What are we doing here? Where are you taking me?"

The deputy instructor had come to, and struggled against the rope tying her to me. I untied the rope and gently put her down on the ground, her head and shoulders leaning against my chest.

"I'm taking you to meet the company. You're seriously ill." She murmured"

"Am I going to die? Is that it?" I felt upset hearing my beloved say such words and replied in a loud voice,

"No, of course not!" She forced a smile.

"I'm not afraid of death. Really. Don't you remember the lines in our oath to settle in the wilderness: 'It's not necessary to be buried in our home village, everywhere in the wilderness is our home.' The only thing I regret is that in a few months I would have been able to visit my parents. I really miss them. They're longing for my visit, nearly going crazy over it. I've written them a letter promising to go after the autumn harvest here, but now …"

I sobbed, my tears falling on her face.

"Don't cry." She gently took my hand. "If I do die, please bury me beside Spirits' Swamp and let me keep your younger sister company. She was a good girl. My only request is that on my grave tablet, I would like the word "reclaimer" carved together with my name …" Large tears gradually filled the corners of her eyes. I held her tightly and sobbed loudly and bitterly.

"Look, what's that? It's like that magic fruit in the legend. Would you break off a branch for me, please?"

Her large, beautiful eyes were fixed on something nearby.

Following her line of vision, I saw a cluster of purplish-red azaleas in bud. I helped her to lean against the saddle and went over to break off the branch.

She was dead when I returned.

She and the Oroqen horse had stopped breathing at the same time.

Beneath me I felt the ground spinning; above, the blue sky turned black. Wiping my eyes and pinning the azalea to her chest, I knelt down and kissed her pale lips for a long time. I think that had she been alive, she would not have blamed me. Carrying her body on my back, I walked on. I saw the company caravan appear on the distant horizon.

The whole company expressed sorrow at the death of the deputy instructor. Everyone cried.

When the company caravan, the carts, sleds, tractors and trucks drew near the swamp, it was already dusk. Someone found a cotton-padded hat stuck on a wooden pole temporarily used as a grave marker. I went ahead and removed the hat. It was the Moor's dog-skin hat. A slip of paper inside read:

"I've discovered a way through Spirits' Swamp and have marked it with twigs. A li east of here."

That night the whole company passed safely across the swamp leaving behind only the carts which might get stuck. But nowhere could we find the Moor.

The next morning, beside the Wanderer we discovered bloody strips of the Moor's clothing, a big axe and three dead wolves. There had been a fierce fight between him and the wolves. We imagined how he had fallen after having fought with all his might against them.

During those sorrowful days we began to seed Devil's Reach.

In accordance with their last wishes, we buried the deputy instructor by Spirits' Swamp. From Camel Mountain, a hundred miles away, we transported a huge gray stone which the old mason in our company chiseled into a grave tablet and on which he carved the words:

In memory of reclaimers
Li Xiao-yan,
Wang Zhig-ang,
Liang Shan-shan,
our beloved comrades.

On Camel Mountain we felled more than a thousand pine trees to make a road across Spirits' Swamp along the markers placed by the Moor, and named it "Reclaimers' Road." The following year several other companies came to settle on Devil's Reach. At last we conquered Spirits' Swamp.

One silent dusk when I visited the reclaimers' graves I saw a stranger standing there and found a bunch of azaleas on the tablet. Azaleas had been my sister's favorite flower.

In an instant, I understood that the stranger was the young man who had been in love with her. From the expression on his face, I could see that he would never leave Devil's Reach. We exchanged a glance and he turned and walked slowly away. I didn't stop him to ask his name, nor even think to ask where he came from.

He was one of our generation—that was all I needed to know.

We had experienced the blizzards of the Great Northern Wilderness, the hardships and the joy of reclaiming this land of wonder and mystery. From then on, no matter what the difficulties were, whether we stayed or whether we left, nothing could produce fear in us or make us surrender The Great Northern Wilderness!

83.53 A Silhouette Of Life\fn{by Ma Shu-li (1949-)} Mihsien, Honan Province, China (M) 8

"Uncle Pi, haircut time," Wei Yu-lan announced with a smile as she approached, holding a white porcelain tray in her hands.

"So soon? My hair is still pretty short," Pi Sung-cheng defended himself, raising one hand to cover the back of his head. The other hand held a transistor radio, playing a Peking opera, up to his ear. "Cut it next week. I'm listening to the most important part right now."

Old Uncle Pi's head was almost completely bald. The only part with some hair left was a triangular patch in the back between the ears pointing downward. From a distance it looked like a beard on a featureless face.

"Short hair is easier to wash," said Wei Yu-Ian, now standing beside the old man. She put the tray on the stone railing of the verandah and picked up a piece of white cloth from it. She tied the cloth, a makeshift barber's apron, around the old man's neck and then adjusted the rattan chair a little so that the side to be cut caught the sunlight. Usually it took forever to coax Old Pi into getting a haircut. Today, he was uncharacteristically agreeable.

"I say, Miss, don't tie it so tight around my neck; I can hardly breathe." Pi preferred to call the Catholic nuns "Miss" rather than "Sister." He didn't think "sister" sounded any better than "nun." Nor could he see why so many nice girls wanted to be nuns. So, he called them "Miss;" "Miss" did not rule out the possibility of their getting married, he reasoned.

"It has to be tight; otherwise your neck will itch something horrible." Wei Yu-Ian spoke slowly but manipulated the scissors deftly. "Raise your head a little. That's right. A little higher. That's better. Now don't move, or your ear will pay for it."

Pi's transistor radio was now on his lap under the apron. The aria being broadcast was sung by a famous actor starring in the role of an ancient warrior in a tragedy. The quality of the transistor radio was poor to begin with and the high-pitched voice of the singer vibrated from under the apron like strange noises from a ventriloquist.

"It sounds funny. What are they singing?" Sister Wei asked.

"Funny?! It's a tragedy. You young people don't know anything about Peking opera. What a pity."

Pi sighed. He pulled one hand out from under the apron, pointed to a spot on his head, and said, "It's itchy over here. Please scratch it for me."

"Don't move. As soon as I finish and clean up it won't itch any more."

"Hey, he doesn't have any sense of humor." Tsai Sung-ling, sitting close by, nudged the glasses on the bridge of his nose as he made this irrelevant remark. He then continued cutting out silhouettes from small pieces of black paper.

"So, you have a sense of humor? Wait till it's your turn to get a cut," Pi countered.

"I'm cutting now, aren't I?" Tsai waved the paper in his hand in front of Pi's face, apparently delighted that he, had gotten in the last word.

"Cutting those devil's shadows all day long. Aren't you afraid of disquieting the evil spirits?"

But Pi swallowed these words before they came out; he really did not want to curse his roommate.

Tsai started to cut the profile of Pi's head, which was stretched forward to accommodate the haircutting. Glancing up, then cutting away, Tsai cut silhouettes from live models the way artists do their sketches. With a few snips of his scissors he had already profiled the hair, the forehead and the nose. The nose was purposely fattened a little to stress a dull personality. He held his finished work up high, showing it to Sister Wei behind Pi's back. Sister Wei, still trimming Pi's hair, laughed silently as she nodded her approval and signaled to Tsai that she wanted the piece. Tsai put the silhouette in the white porcelain tray.

In the past, Tsai had had a booth outside a theater where he earned his living by cutting silhouettes for people. He was very good at it and could cut the profile of an entire bust within one minute. He did this without tearing the piece of paper, so that when a silhouette was cut out, a long strip of scrap paper would be left dangling at one end of it. He kept these strips on a string as a record of his sales for the day.

Old Tsai said he did it because he was deeply concerned about his clients whom he depended on. Upon hearing this, one of his clients, blinking his eyes in sudden enlightenment, asked Old Tsai, "You mean we are like parents raising you?"

After that, he didn't hang the strips of scrap out for people to see.

After his wife died, the childless and aging silhouette cutter fell sick. His kinsfolk sent him to this Home for the Elderly where he shared a corner bedroom on the third floor with Pi Sung-cheng.

"Miss, my blood pressure is high. I can't eat all this fat. Please give me a piece of lean meat." Pi Sung-cheng said to Sister Lin Ching-chih as he stood in the cafeteria line. He shoved his plate toward her.

"How about this piece? With high blood pressure you should eat lots of celery." Sister Lin mercilessly tossed another spoonful of celery onto Pi's plate, and continued, "Come to my office tomorrow; and I'll take your blood pressure again." Sister Lin was a graduate from the Medical College of Taiwan University, and was assigned to the Home by a missionary organization.

"It's useless just to take my blood pressure all the time. It won't come down without medication."

"Uncle Pi, you can't just take medicine whenever you feel like it."

"Wouldn't kill me if I did," Pi muttered to himself as he walked into the dining hall carrying his plate. When he saw his roommate Tsai sitting at their usual place, he turned away. He was still sore about Tsai's earlier remark during his haircut.

"Hey, old boy!" Sang Chiung called out when he saw Pi coming his way. He moved over a little to make room and asked, "How did your bean sprouts turn out? I have a bottle of sorghum vinegar. Maybe we can fry the bean sprouts with vinegar some day."

"All dead, damn things!" Pi walked over to Sang.

"How come? You have grown sprouts before."

"What's the use? If you forget to water them for three days, the damn things simply won't grow any more." Pi sat down, adjusted his plate a little, then closed his eyes and crossed himself. Since he'd come to the Home he made the sign of the cross before every meal the way the Sisters did. He often preached to the other folks that people should show their gratitude to God, and that the Chinese had always been thrifty with food and that they had always reminded themselves not to forget the hard labor put into each grain of rice. So, he reasoned, it was only natural to feel thankful before each meal.

"Bean sprouts depend on water just like human beings depend on food. If a person goes without food for too long, he starves. Last week I got sick so I couldn't take care of the sprouts. Then they all withered," Pi explained.

"What a pity. If you'd told me I would have helped you water them. You had them in the storage room, didn't you? Did the Sisters say anything about that?" Sang Chiung asked.

"What can they say? We are all halfway to the grave anyway. All I have left is this hobby. The Sisters wouldn't say anything. If I'm not allowed to grow sprouts, what else can I do?"

"When you think about it, their job is not easy," the toothless Sang Chiung said after gumming a mouthful of food. "I hear that Sister Liu and Sister Chao often cry in front of the altar of the Holy Mother after they return from their donation collecting trips."

"I've been a bachelor all my life, without any family. But if I had a son I would certainly ask him to marry a nun. Where can you find such nice girls?"

"Nuns don't get married. What have you learned from your Bible classes?"

"I know, I know. But on this point I'm afraid I disagree with God. Why are all these nice girls kept unmarried? Men and women should all get married when they reach the right age. What does God want his sons and daughters around him for anyway? If I—"

"If all the nuns and monks got married, who would take care of us old guys here? It takes all sorts of people to make a world, just like dishes. Well, this is a lousy comparison, but I simply use it as an example. Dishes made with well-chosen ingredients including meat and vegetables are like happily married couples. Ones with the wrong ingredients are like mismatched couples. Besides these, there are vegetarian dishes without meat and meat dishes without vegetables. The nuns are like the vegetarian dishes, and you, old bachelor, you are the steamed meat."

"Rubbish! You are the hellish steamed meat." Pi couldn't help laughing, too, though the comparison sounded a bit offensive to him.

By now the two were among the small number of slow eaters still left in the dining hall. Seeing old man Hu Yao-ting staggering slowly across the hall, Pi said to Sang, "Old Mr. Hu has recovered. A few days ago he was still in bed and had to be fed by the Sisters."

"Yes, he has been up for two days now. Yesterday I saw him taking a walk. He must be over ninety. It's not easy being that old. When we get to that age, I wonder how we will turn out."

"You are looking that far ahead? If I can live another ten years, I'll consider it a special blessing."

"There is no problem with your health. And forget about the other problems, it's your short temper that belongs to people in their forties. If you can control your temper, you'll certainly live longer."

"Nonsense," Pi snapped, but only jokingly. Actually he was pleased to hear these flattering words. "One can bargain with other things, but not with fate. If Death wants someone …" Pi stopped when he saw Old Hu walking toward them. He stood up, stepped forward to hold the nonagenarian's hand and said loudly, "You're looking much better now."

Hu smiled, stretching his wizened lips horizontally. He breathed heavily, as if he were panting. After a few seconds, he asked, "What did you say?"

Pi shouted into Hu's ear, "I said, you're looking much better now."

Hu's eyeballs rolled a little behind the droopy eyelids and responded smilingly, "You two are keeping well, too." His voice was as soft and faint as a whisper; his smile revealed his toothless gums. Then he walked away slowly, half a step at a time. He had never fully recovered from the stroke he'd had ten years ago. Watching Hu walk away, Pi seemed lost in his own thoughts. He muttered to himself, "How can a person bargain with fate?"

When Pi returned to his room, Sister Wei was there writing a letter for his roommate Old Tsai. Pi turned on the light in the darkening room and asked the Sister, "Is the man with a sense of humor giving you trouble again?"

"You two old fellows always want to outdo each other," Sister Wei said with a smile. Her hair was plaited into two braids, with a part in the back.

"He is a tough arguer. I am no match for him," Tsai said, while handing a cup of tea to the Sister. "Have some jasmine tea. It's not bad."

"Thank you, but I can't drink tea. It keeps me awake at night."

“Just a little. It won’t matter that much. Oh, with his interruption I forget where I was.” Tsai tried to resume his letter.

“Writing to your adopted daughter again?” Pi blurted out as he threw himself down on his bed.

“I’ve got to cut ten sets of paper designs based on folk-tales.”

The sister prompted, “Are you going to tell her the names of the tales?”

“Well, just mention two or three names to give her a general idea. Write these: The Goddess of Offspring, A Wedding of Mice and A Dragon-Phoenix Matrimony. She is young, so I chose happy tales for her embroidery designs.”

“What a talented girl! Besides making pottery, she can also do embroidery. When you finish the designs I would like to have a look at them. Usually you cut silhouettes.”

“Of course, I’ll show you when I finish them. Silhouette cutting has become a petty craft. Nowadays, girls don’t do it any more. In the past—”

“Why don’t you ask your daughter to come here for a visit? Is she having tests at school now?” Pi interjected, turning in his bed.

Tsai pretended he had not heard the question. He turned to Sister Wei and said, “Let’s go on with the letter this way: ‘The paper designs will be ready within a week. Before you come to fetch them, go to Tong-Jen-Tang Drugstore first to get two doses of my prescription.’ You don’t have to write the prescription or the address of the drugstore. She knows them. She does this for me quite often.”

“Have I offended anybody?” Pi asked, annoyed at being ignored. He got up and left the room. Walking around outside, he sang a few lines from Rowing on a Lake, an aria belonging to a female role in a Peking opera:

A small fish with rosy gills, swimming
Downstream from the Upper Yangtze River,
Keeps its head swaying and its tail swinging,
Keeps its head swaying and its tail swinging.

At the same time he swung himself, imitating a swinging tail. Just then, Sister Lin Ching-chih carne up behind him with a pile of thin terry cloth blankets balanced across her arms. Seeing Pi swinging himself in such a funny way, she laughed so heartily that she bent forward and the blankets fell to the floor. She said, “Uncle Pi, what - are - you - doing?”

Caught by surprise, Pi laughed, then blushed. He said, “I am re-creating a young woman’s role in a Peking opera.” He helped Sister Un pick up the blankets and asked, “Are you passing out blankets to us?”

“Yes, these were donated by the Lion’s Club for the hot season. These two are for your room.” Sister Lin thinking again how she caught Pi singing, tried to hide a giggle as she handed him two blankets.

“Aren’t you coming in to sit for a while?”

“No, I can’t. I am very busy right now. I’ll come to listen to your singing some other time. It sounds pretty amusing.”

“Oh, I can’t sing at all. I was just fooling around.”

“By the way, please tell Uncle Tsai that if he has no place to store his pottery pieces, I can keep them for him. The director has mentioned twice that he shouldn’t keep them on the floor. We have to do something about that.”

“I don’t dare talk to him about his earthenware. He would go to any length to fight with me if I do. Those pots and jars are his treasures. If I touch the stuff I’ll get the scolding of the century from him. How can I tell him to get rid of them? I’ve tried, but it’s useless.” Pi sighed and went on, “This is not a real home, but we better take it as our home. I’ve never seen anyone like him; he always seems ready to take to the road at a moment’s notice. Right now he is in the room. Perhaps, you. can go in and talk to him. Maybe he’ll listen to you. With a man like him, soft words are more forceful than tough words. I used to be a soldier fed on bullets; I can never be good at talking.”

“Old boy, what are you doing?”

It was Old Sang’s voice. Pi recognized the voice but did not answer. He didn’t even turn his head. He kept digging until he heard the steps come up close. “I’m planting hot peppers, son.”

“Why are you growing peppers? We have hot peppers with every meal.”

“You call those peppers? You country bumpkins! What I am planting are called ‘facing-the-sky peppers.’ They’re small but very very hot.” Pi stopped digging to wipe the sweat off his face. “Oh, my. I’ve dug only two small holes and already I feel tired out. Just goes to show you can't go against your age."

"You shouldn't push yourself too hard. Why don't you take it slow?"

"What the hell do you know?! We have to hurry to plant these while it's not too hot. A hot sun will kill them off."

"They can't take the heat and you still call them hot peppers?"

"Wise guy, you think you know all the answers."

"Hey, old boy, how is your roommate Old Tsai? Is he sick?"

"No, he was fine yesterday. Why?"

"I just went to your room to see if you were interested in a game of chess. Old Tsai was still in bed. Usually he gets up very early; doesn't he?"

"I don't know what is bothering that old mule. Last night he was in a very bad mood. Probably Miss Lin offended him. Come on, give me a hand. I have to stomp the loose earth down." Pi covered the plant with earth, stomped on it a bit, and watered it with water he had carried there in a basin. "I've done everything humanly possible. If you damn things don't grow this time, wait and see what I'll do to you."

"Did you say Sister Lin?" Sang returned to his earlier line of questioning. "How could she have offended Old Tsai? I think something is bothering him. Lately he often looks sad when others are talking and laughing."

"I know. It looks like he can't make peace with himself and he is living in an ever-existing war." Pi straightened his back, took a deep breath, and brushed the dirt from his hands. As they walked away, he continued, "You've seen his treasures on the floor, haven't you? Some of the pottery pieces were made by his wife. Naturally he wants to keep them as momentos now that she's gone. But he shouldn't display them all over the floor; they gather dust. And he doesn't want to store them away or to put them to use. Once I asked him to give me a pot to plant flowers in. He got so mad he wouldn't talk to me for two days. What an odd guy! Actually he is a hundred and twenty percent nice guy, but just too finicky."

"Let's sit down over here." Sang handed the spade and the basin to Pi and dusted off a stone bench.

All the fixtures in the yard were inscribed with the names of the donors. This stone bench, the inscription showed, was donated by a society calling itself "Love the Young."

Sang felt that the donation was somewhat misplaced. He laughed and said, "We are all just old children."

Sitting on the bench, Pi continued talking about his roommate. "Old Tsai must have been a pottery lover in his previous life. A few years ago he adopted a Goddaughter, who was also fond of pottery. Every now and then she sends over a piece she's made. Old Tsai says her work is very much like his wife's. He often holds the pieces in his hands, comparing them over and over again. He likes to talk about the kiln temperature used, the color, the quality of the clay. I don't understand a thing about all that. To me, if he doesn't put the pieces to use, they are worthless."

"Old Tsai is very artistic, even though he can't read. What do you think of his silhouette cutting?"

"What about it? I think it's accursed."

"Uncle Pi, this is for you." Sister Lin stopped to hand Pi a letter. "This is a letter to Uncle Tsai from his Goddaughter. Will you please take it to him? Oh, last night I told him I could keep his earthenware for him. He didn't say anything for a while and then he suddenly shouted at me, 'Over my dead body!' I was scared to death. Then he said he would take his pottery away and wouldn't let anybody touch it. I've never seen him so angry." Even Sister Wei was stunned by his reaction.

"He's just a stubborn old mule." Pi concluded.

"Say, Old Pi, why are we going to all this trouble?" Tsai wiped the sweat off his face. The two old men had chosen a quiet corner in the market to set up their selling area on the ground. Yet they felt very uneasy.

"To hell with it. It's so damned hot. All the missiles launched day in and day out have changed the weather," said Pi.. He was spreading a piece of plastic sheet on the ground and weighing down the four corners with stones.

"We could have saved ourselves all this trouble if we had stayed home. It'll be embarrassing if we see somebody we know. You wanted to make money; so you dragged me into this," Tsai complained.

"What's embarrassing? Haven't you been a street-vendor before? How come you're so high-brow now?"

"What I used to sell was my own craftsmanship. But this stuff, look, this is different."

"What's wrong with it? If people from the Home see us, I'll take the responsibility. Coward!" Pi's bold words, however, did not even put himself at ease. Carefully he scanned the customers around them, fearful that something would go wrong. He did think of folding up and going back, but then he thought he shouldn't scare himself with his own timidity. After all, the chances of getting caught should be very slim.

As Pi looked at Tsai squatting there, wordless and motionless, he felt somewhat guilty for dragging his roommate into this. He said softly, “I say, Old Tsai, don’t blame me for being miserly. At our age we may leave this world any time. What do I want money for? I just don’t want to waste these things. We have enough blankets and they are still in pretty good condition. Now new ones have come; it’s gotten out of hand. If we keep them in storage too long, they’ll mildew. That’d be a waste. The blankets were already given to us, so they’re ours. There is nothing wrong with selling our own property. Why should we feel as if we were selling stolen goods? Oh, well, you can’t see the point, just like you can’t let go of those pots and jars of yours.”

As he touched on this topic, Pi glanced at Tsai’s face. Seeing no change in Tsai's expression, Pi went on, “What’s the use of keeping all your earthenware? It won’t hatch to produce more. It’d be better if you put them to good use. For instance, you should use some as flower pots or as gifts to friends. By the way, where did you move them to? The other night you were tidying up for a long time, but I can’t figure out where you stored them. In your black trunk? Where else is possible? There is so little space in our room.”

“Mind your own business. I hide my stuff wherever I like. Don’t you worry about it. If we are not going to sell the blankets, let’s go back.” Tsai finally responded.

Pi was satisfied with this reply, because he felt that as long as Old Tsai still talked back, their relationship was not at a dead end.

“Of course I want to sell the blankets, especially after all the trouble we’ve taken.” Pi said. “Okay, I won’t mind your business. Sooner or later you’ll see my point and will ask me for help. Say, Old Tsai, how much do you think we can sell this for? The material is pretty good—”

“Three hundred at most, in a place like this.”\fn{A note reads: One US dollar equals forty New Taiwan dollars. [This story was published in 1981; in 2000, the exchange rate was about 32 to the dollar.]} “Okay, we’ll sell it at that price.” Pi slapped his own thigh decisively while speaking. He wanted to get the blankets sold and go home as soon as possible. He stood up, rubbed his knees, and paced back and forth, his hands clasped behind his back. He sang softly, “I am like a bird in a cage.”

Across from them, a young man was selling watermelons. Cut-up pieces were displayed on the stall and several whole melons sat in a basket on the back of a bicycle nearby. Having no customers at the moment, the young man asked Pi, “Mister, what are you selling?”

Pi was annoyed by the question, thinking to himself, “Can’t he see with his own eyes?” However, he suppressed his temper, hoping the young man to be a prospective customer. He thought of buying two pieces of watermelon to strike up a relationship with him, so he asked, “Is watermelon sweet in this season?”

“Oh, yes, very sweet. Be my guest and have a piece.”

“I won’t take it free. How can you make money by giving away free watermelon?”

“It doesn’t matter. We’re neighbors. Take a piece.”

“I want two pieces, but I insist on paying you.” Pi figured if he accepted the free melon, how could he name a price if the young man asked about his blankets later? So he handed the young man a fifty NT dollar bill.

“You two are from the Elders’ Home, aren’t you?” The young man's question so startled Pi that he forgot about the change. The melon peddler, not noticing, continued, “The people in this area all look familiar to me even if I don’t know them personally. You two—”

“We don’t live here.” Pi did not look at the young man.

“I see your blankets are mostly sold. You did very well.”

“Well,” Pi walked away from the melon peddler and took back a piece of watermelon to Tsai. “Old Tsai, have a piece of melon. It’s pretty sweet.”

Tsai was squatting on the ground and rubbing his temples heavily with both hands. Pi asked, “What’s the matter? You don’t feel well, do you? You were all right just a little while ago.”

“It’s my old trouble, not serious. I’ll be all right.”

“Have a piece of watermelon, then you won’t feel so hot. Where are your pills? Don’t you have any left?”

“No, recently the pain has been coming more often, so I’ve used them up. A couple of days ago I asked Sister Wei to write to Hsiu-chin to send me some more, but they haven’t come yet.”

“Hsiu-chin is really a devoted daughter. How come she hasn’t come to visit you lately?”

“Her school work is heavy, and now she has a boy friend. They met in the pottery workshop. Oh, that’s right, you brought me the letter yesterday. She’ll bring the boy here to see me next Sunday.”

“You should rest up these days and not work so hard on your design cutting. Last night you stayed up very late, didn’t you? I woke up at midnight and the light was still on.”

“Hsiu-chin is graduating soon. I want to make her a gift. She likes to embroider, so I want to cut out some patterns for her, enough for her to use until she gets married. I chose lucky themes for the designs." Old Tsai took a full mouthful of watermelon.

"Have a look, Ma'am," Pi said to a woman with a shopping basket in one hand who was looking at their display.

"You have only one pattern. Don't you have any others to choose from?" the woman asked.

"This pattern is very good. There is no need to choose," said Pi. He glanced at his partner who stole a silent laugh.

The woman was measuring a blanket with her hand. "It's a bit too large."

"This is the right size for me, so it can't be too large for you. A blanket is better too long than too short."

"It's not for me. I want one for my grandson. My son is coming back from abroad and it'll be the first time the grandson—"

"Well, a larger one is still better. It can be used for many years."

"How much?"

"Only three hundred and fifty. It's cheaper to buy in smaller markets." Pi slyly quoted fifty dollars more than they had planned since the woman was fairly well-dressed. She frowned a little at the price but did not bargain, probably because she felt the peddlers were so old.

Pi took the money; just then he noticed Old Tsai's face suddenly turn pale. He thought Tsai's headache must have come back and asked, "What's the matter?" The woman also I asked, "Is he all right?" Tsai managed to tell them that he was all right, but as soon as the woman left, he grabbed Pi and said, "Old Pi, look! Look who's coming. You got me into this mess."

Confused, Pi turned to look and saw Sister Wei walking within ten yards of them.

At first Sister Wei did not see them, but Tsai was so nervous that he thought the Sister only pretended not to. So he walked up to her with an awkward smile. The Sister, not sensing anything wrong, said cheerfully, "Hey, it's you guys. What are you doing here?" Then she caught sight of the merchandise. Blushing, she did not know what to say.

"Going to Taipei for business?" Pi eeked out a question.

"Yes, yes. The director asked me to go to the Junior Chamber of Commerce. They wrote us a letter saying that they are coming to visit the Home early next month and will bring some donations." She blushed again.

"More donations to come."”Pi regretted his words. Tsai added incoherently, "That's fine. Let's go back and have some rest. It's so hot and tiring here."

"Well, I'm leaving first.\fn{A note reads: In Chinese societies, old people normally avoid saying "I'm leaving first," which could be taken as an allusion to death.} You have business to attend to." Sister Wei walked away quickly, feeling relieved but regretting her last sentence, which she uttered so mindlessly out of nervousness.

"Old Pi, you're my enemy!" Tsai shouted angrily at Pi after the Sister left.

"You are the one who caused all the trouble. She didn't even see us, but instead of playing deaf and dumb like you should have, you went up to greet her."

"Playing dumb? She saw us but was too embarrassed to say hello. Do you think she's as blind as you are?"

Pi was not sure, so he did not say anything more.

"You boasted that you would take the responsibility if we ran into people from the Home. Why didn't you say anything when the Sister was standing here?"

"She didn't ask about this. What did you want me to say?"

"Do you have to wait for her to ask? She said, 'You have business to attend to.' Isn't that enough? And you had the nerve to say 'More donations to come!'"

"That was a slip of the tongue. Why are you examining each word like they do during testimony at a Communist liquidation meeting?" Pi's shame turned into anger.

"Examining your testimony? If this sort of thing happened forty years ago, I wouldn't let you get away so easily."

"What are you going to do about it now?" Pi was panting heavily.

"From now on I'll have nothing whatsoever to do with you. Don't you ever involve me in anything again." Tsai said this so forcefully that his upper denture fell loose. Bystanders burst into laughter and he could not help laughing himself. But he immediately took on angry countenance again. The bystanders quieted and soon left one after another. Tsai heard one say, "Strange, his partner just bought him a piece of watermelon, why then is he so angry?"

Later, when Pi returned to his bedroom there was already a red string strung across the middle, dividing the room into two equal sections. The only door was in Pi's section. Pi thought, "How will Old Tsai use the door? He didn't think of that. He is just causing trouble for himself."

Actually, Pi did feel guilty about involving Tsai in today's incident. He also knew that Tsai would not accept his apology and would not forgive him for a long while. So for the time being, he thought, the only thing to do was to try to avoid his roommate by staying out of the room as much as possible. That day he went out early and came back late, hoping to make it more convenient for Tsai to use the door. At noon, when he saw Tsai was in a corner of the dining hall having his lunch, he felt somewhat relieved.

For the next two days, Tsai said not a word to Pi and ignored him completely. He concentrated on cutting his paper designs. He also appeared very weak.

From a distance Pi could not see the details of the paper designs, but he heard the scissors cutting all the time. The sound sometimes got on his nerves. The atmosphere in the room was quiet and tense, like a suspenseful scene in a silent motion picture. Pi didn't even sing like he used to.

Each time Tsai finished a few designs he pasted them on a large sheet of white paper. He looked so serious as he worked, holding his breath as if he were afraid of scaring the fairy tale characters out of the design in the paper. He worked under the table lamp even in the daytime and kept putting on and taking off his glasses. The cut-off scraps of red paper covered the floor. Some were blown across the line, drawn by the red string, over to Pi's side. Some of the cut-off strips were as fine as threads.

"What delicate pattern could that be?" Pi wondered, but found it difficult to imagine, He stealthily picked up a strip and took it out to the yard to examine it closely. It was a square frame without any contents. He could not tell what details were supposed to be inside this frame. Cutting marks were visible on the edges of the square, giving the examiner a glimpse of the work. However, the discontinuous marks were like broken pieces of a dream that could not be pieced together into a story.

On the afternoon of the third day after their quarrel, when Pi was coming out of Sang's room after a chess game, he saw someone climbing out of the window from his own bedroom on the second floor. A frightening thought flashed across his mind. He felt so weak that he sat down on the stone steps. He muttered, "Old Tsai, you stubborn old mule. What are you trying to do?" Just then he saw Tsai reaching the verandah and then the hallway. Feeling relieved now, Pi mused to himself, "Old mule, you're seventy and still act like a child. You really haven't used the door."

That evening, as he was looking through magazines in bed, Pi had a persistent impulse to talk to Tsai about his window climbing feats. He wanted to say, "Okay, you are tough. You use the window rather than the door. If you want to die, choose a better way; don't try the window. You are the one who put up the string in the room, so it's up to you to take it down." He suppressed the impulse to say these words, but he could not suppress his feeling of sadness and worry.

Tsai did not seem to be angry any more. He was completely absorbed in his paper-cutting and ignored everything else. That night he took out a parcel from his cabinet. The parcel was wrapped with a piece of blue cloth in a white floral pattern. Inside the wrapper was a large album with a red velvet cover. Tsai put the album on the table, opened it and put into it every sheet of the large white fillers with the paper designs pasted on them. He carefully looked at each sheet. Then he closed the album and pressed it tightly. Observing this ritual from a distance, Pi silently counted the sheets: there were nine now; one to go, according to what the cutter himself had said earlier.

Pi sighed deeply. Three days had passed, and he hadn't gone across the red line. If he took down the red string, he thought, Tsai might not mind. But he wouldn't do it.

Though he had shared a bedroom with Tsai for three years, Pi had never given any thought to Tsai's personality. Now feeling somewhat confused, he still did not want to think about it. He could not figure him out anyway. He turned over in his bed and fell asleep. At midnight he woke up and saw Tsai asleep in his chair, his body bent over the table. The table lamp was still on, shedding a dim light on Tsai's thin white hair. Pi toyed with the idea of getting up to turn off the light and put something warm over Tsai, but then he saw the red string and decided to remain in bed. Soon he fell asleep again.

A stream of people went in and out of Pi's room. The red string had been broken by someone at some point without being noticed; now it was just a casual curving line on the floor. .

Pi felt paralyzed in his chair. He was ignored by the crowd coming in and out. Nobody asked him to go to lunch. He kept repeating, "I know this is real; I know it."

In the afternoon, Sister Wei came in with a shopping bag in her hand. She bent down and said softly to Pi.

"Uncle Tsai's daughter left this bag behind. She has left with a boy for the funeral parlor. Will you please keep it for the time being? I am very busy now and have to go there myself." Her eyes were red.

Pi nodded. Then he recalled something and struggled to stand up and walk to Tsai's desk. He turned the red velvet album over and over again in his hands and then closed it. He picked up the wrapping cloth from the floor and wrapped up the album. He said to Sister Wei, "Hand this to his daughter yourself. Tell her to express her appreciation for it in front of her father's coffin."

Sister Wei covered her nose with one hand and held the album in the other. As she was leaving the room, Pi called her back. He took out the blanket from Tsai's cabinet, his hands shaking, and handed it to the Sister. Pi broke into tears and said to her, "Tell him for me that his blanket is too old. This time he is on a long journey; it is not too much to take a new blanket."

"Yes, I'll tell him. You take care of yourself," she said. Looking for a bag to put the blanket in, she tried to empty the shopping bag she had just brought in. Scattered on the floor were two tins of powdered milk, a bottle of honey, and a package of medicine. These things reminded her of the last letter she wrote for Old Tsai and they unleashed her tears again. Before Pi could see them, she hastily put them back into the bag again.

After Sister Wei left, the room seemed empty. Pi picked up some of the scraps of paper and looked at them. He then put up the red string again and hanged the paper strips from the string.

The red paper frames looked like an inscribed eulogy chop, hanging strip by strip. The story itself had flown away with the crane. That old mule Tsai had left his room with a pile of unfinished work, and it looked like he'd only got nine designs done. He forget to count the designs in the album Pi pondered, just as that thought crossed his mind he stepped on a milk canon the floor. It reminded him that Hsiu-chin had brought it over. Where were the headache pills? Why did she bring milk and honey? Damned girl! Then in a hateful manner he blurted out, "I shouldn't have given her that album! Who would want that kind of daughter anyway?"

Just as Old Pi finished, two caretakers came into the room, and caught him still red in the face. They also saw the red strips of paper hanging in the room and wondered what it all meant. Everyone just stood in the room without saying a word.

"What are you guys here for?" Old Pi finally asked.

"The Sister told us to come here and take away Mr. Tsai's bed."

Old Pi waved his hand at them as if to tell them to get on with it. The two caretakers took up positions on both ends of the bed and then rolled up the bedding and took up the mattress. Suddenly, Pi jumped up from his chair and shouted, "Stop!"

They were all surprised by what they saw under the bed. All the pottery pieces were individually tied with red string under the springs, one next to the other.

The two caretakers began to untie the strings, but they were stopped by Pi. Pi said, "Anybody who wants to remove these pots and jars has to do it over my dead body."

87.72 Street Sketch\fn{by Chu Lin aka Wang Zuling (1949-)} Shanghai, China (F) 5

I go out of my door early to find a crowd of people at the street corner. The Shanghainese are notorious for their curiosity—if one person stoops to look at a dead ant on the road, someone else will join him, then a third and a fourth. Soon, dozens, even hundreds of people will press round. If you didn't know what was going on, you might assume that a space alien had landed in the city!

I decide to walk around them, but my attention is caught by a rasping voice:

"Grandfathers, uncles, tradesmen, young friends, one and all! I am a disciple of Master Haideng, the great exponent of the martial arts! I come here today to this corner of your fair city, not in search of personal gain, but to bring good fortune to all …"

The last few years we have seen a big increase in the number of people peddling quack medicines. They start with a catchy come-on spiel, then they strip to the waist and do stunts, and finally they bring out their elixir and hit you for money. We weren't born yesterday. We're not so easily fooled into buying pills, powders, pastes, and pellets concocted from heaven knows what kinds of greasy filth and foot-washing water. Still, for all that, there's something rather entertaining about watching someone swallow nails or drill a hole through a brick with his finger. So when you see one of these guys starting his sales pitch, you stick around to watch, even though you know how the show is going to end. Then what do you do when the performance is over and the outstretched hand comes your way? Like they say up north: no way, eh? \

But this guy starts a little differently from the others, claiming off the top, truthfully or otherwise, that he's here to bring us all good fortune. He wears a pair of baggy black trouser, held up by a filthy red sash and is naked from the waist up, with arms as thin as hemp stalks and a chest so scrawny you can count the ribs. His face has a ravenous look, and his stomach caves in like a well. He looks like he hasn't had a decent meal in years.

"I am Sichuanese."

He holds up an envelope with a line of characters printed on it, shaking it in our direction:

"See, here's my address—Ma Family Village, Tianqiao County, Yongli District, Sichuan Province. If you're ever in Sichuan, just ask the first person you meet, 'Where is Longlife Ma of Ma Family Village?' Anyone will tell you …"

Even in the unlikely event of there being another Sichuanese in the crowd to disprove his claim, I'd still be prepared to bet that 99 percent of the people here aren't going to believe a word of it.

Then his sales pitch takes an abrupt turn, as he pulls from his pocket a small paper package. As he walks around the semi-circle of onlookers, he begins to unwrap it, showing everyone a few grains of white powder in their paper wrapping.

"If I told you that this medicine was guaranteed to cure any illness, you certainly wouldn't believe me. Just bragging won't do any good—that would be like trying to build Mount Tai by piling up dirt. But if you don't believe me now, I can make you believe! How? With facts! Facts will show that there is a marvelous power at work in this powder, and this power is qigong! You must have heard of qigong …"

Now it's obvious—he thinks we're stupid. We Shanghainese have seen a lot; we know more than he realizes. Who is there that hasn't heard fanciful stories about the wonderful powers of qigong? And it isn't just qigong stories we've heard—there's also stuff about people who can read with their ears or bring things through solid walls by will power, extraterrestrials captured by Soviet scientists, and prehistoric television sets excavated from the Pyramids. To say nothing of yin and yang, the Eight Trigrams and the Book of Changes!

People sneer at the little Sichuanese. He waves dismissively:

"You should certainly have heard of the great qigong master Yan Xin! Who is Yan Xin, you ask? He is a famous professor at Sichuan Medical College! There's an essay all about him in the March issue of Flower City magazine, a hundred thousand characters long." His eyes gleam with excitement.

"I want to tell you about Yan Xin's powers. It is plainly stated in that essay that he can remove a mole from someone's face at a distance of fifteen hundred kilometers! If he's giving a lecture and he tells you to laugh, you'll laugh. If he tells you to cry, you'll cry. If he tells you to jump, you'll jump.

"What's the secret behind these great truths? It can't be explained in two or three words, but"—he clears his throat and continues in stentorian tones—"Qigong is a higher science, an anatomical science, an advanced technology. I'm not making this up, you know; those are the words of the great scientist Qian Xuesen! And all that advanced technology is in this medicine! This medicine is a special cure for all chronic illnesses! Men and women, old and young, all can have chronic illnesses. Babies suffer malnutrition and roundworm, children get indigestion, old folks have dizzy spells and can't control their bladders, women have irregular periods and menstrual cramps, middle-aged men are impotent or ejaculate prematurely, even youngsters—"

He pauses a moment, then sounds his words out more clearly than ever:

"Young men have a malady known as 'marrying in your dreams.' Why do we call it 'marrying in your dreams?' Because it afflicts a man who has yet to marry but longs for a wife day and night. When evening comes, he has a dream—that he is with a woman! How happy he feels! How wonderful if he could only have this dream every night! But—"

"Friends!" He slaps his thigh, and his voice becomes ferocious:

"If you have that dream every night, you will be ruined forever! When you get up, your head will swim, your back will ache, and your joints will be weak. And when you finally do get married, you're no good for anything! But to those who have such dreams I say that help is at hand. If you take my medicine, you will never again have a wife in your dreams. Instead you will really marry! A beautiful young virgin! I guarantee it!"

Laughter ripples through the crowd. The atmosphere has changed; now everyone feels amused and relaxed. Then he takes out a bundle of envelopes.

"I have twenty envelopes here, which I will give to twenty people. People who get envelopes are getting my medicine free of charge. All I ask is that, once you have taken it, you send me testimonies to its effectiveness. This is so that I can improve it still further. The address is on the envelopes. I have only twenty! Once they're gone, there won't be any more! Okay, who wants one?"

Craning his scrawny neck, he turns his head to scrutinize every individual in the crowd. Nobody says anything, but many of them crane their necks and widen their eyes or else shuffle their feet and hope that the others won't notice. Some stroke their chins or clear their throats for no apparent reason.

The Sichuanese gives a little cough himself to ease the tension:

"Folks from Shanghai are a bit, well … okay, I'll make it easier for you. If you want one, raise your hand!"

Almost before the words are out, a trendy-looking youngster in Nike running shoes gives a half-mocking laugh and raises his hand in a kind of salute. Then, as if roused by a clarion call, more hands go up, some high, some low; some urgently, others diffidently. The momentum seems to sweep people up. A plump middle-aged woman near me lifts her right arm ever so slightly, then drops it down again. But, to my astonishment, he goes straight over to her and offers her the first envelope!

Many of the onlookers are taken aback, not least the young man in the Nikes, who scowls and begins to grumble. The Sichuanese laughs:

"Don't fret, young fellow. I know this lady believes in me, even if she didn't raise her hand. She needs my medicine!"

The plump woman blushes. With a smile he asks her,

"Are you a Party member, Ma'am?"

Though his voice is scarcely above a whisper, she's obviously extremely embarrassed. But he just smiles:

"It's all right. None of your leaders are here. It's okay for us to have a little chat."

People begin to laugh. The woman's face turns red, then white, but she still reaches out and takes the envelope. In smooth, measured tones, the Sichuanese continues:

"The Party calls on us to serve the people, and that's exactly what I do. As to the question of whether qigong is materialism or idealism, well, let's deal with that another time. People from Shanghai are all well informed—I'm sure you all know that American president Ronald Reagan is a firm believer in astrology. What you may not know is that the supreme leaders of our own country also use divination to set state policy and lead the Chinese revolution from one victory to another. This is not superstition! It is an irrefutable truth in Marxist philosophy that spirit is transformed into substance and substance is transformed into spirit. Qigong is substance that has been spiritualized."

Swindler he may be, but he's good—you have to give him credit for that!

One by one the envelopes are handed out and carefully held open to catch a few grains of the white powder that he shakes in. You can see from their expressions that the recipients are delighted.

When he has finished doling out the medicine, the Sichuanese unexpectedly taps a thin man on the shoulder:

"Friend, I've talked so much my lips are dry and my mouth is parched. Can you give me fifty cents for an ice cream?"

The thin man is neatly dressed and wears a pair of old-fashioned tortoiseshell-frame glasses. In his string shopping bag are some vegetables and a small white fish. He looks like an average kind of intellectual, struggling to make ends meet, and maybe a bit henpecked too, and he dithers anxiously over the prospect of parting with fifty cents. He doesn't hesitate for long before the rest of the crowd starts to grumble indignantly at the Sichuanese, feeling that he's trying to hoodwink them. The plump woman moves quickest; without a word, she spins round like a girl of eighteen. The youth in Nikes is close behind her, slipping away as though his soles were greased. All at once, everyone wants out of there.

At this, the expression on the face of the Sichuanese changes. Suddenly he bellows,

"Listen! All of you! Who is there, in today's society, who can catch a white tiger?"

I can't understand what he's talking about. In the confusion, an old woman whispers, "What's he mean about catching white tigers?" She shakes her head. An old man, maybe a retired worker, pushes his way back through the crowd to explain: "Catching a white tiger is getting something for nothing." Smugly he adds, "I caught on right away. There's no way you can get something for nothing. Sure this guy's full of fine words, but he still asks for money in the end, doesn't he?"

The old woman nods agreement. Neither of them has received envelopes, so they aren't in any hurry to leave. But I remember that they were craning their necks hopefully with the rest when the medicine was being handed out.

"You! And you!" The Sichuanese jerks his hands up—first the left, then the right—to point at the retreating figures of the plump woman and the youngster in Nikes.

I can't really explain that gesture of his, but everyone understands it instantly. As if compelled by some mysterious force, they are frozen in their tracks. Everyone stops dead. Nobody dares move. And those two, the man and the woman, tremble convulsively, unable to control themselves or take a step.

"I'm not forcing anyone to stay." The voice softens slightly. "But I tell you this—you can go all the way to America, and you'll still be in my grasp. Makes no difference if you believe me."

He claps his hands twice.

"I can make your head hurt when you read or your stomach ache when you eat. I can make you rush to the bathroom and then find you can't piss. When you're right there on top of a woman I can stop you getting it off."

He points again. The plump woman and the youngster in Nikes come back, step by step.

It's unbelievable. In the bustle of the world, there's suddenly an abyss of silence, like a black hole, like a whirlpool in the Bermuda Triangle … some irresistible force has everyone trapped.

He looks around at us all. There is menace in his laughter now.

"This skill of mine," he asks us, "is it fake, or is it real?"

"It's—real!"

Elegant scholars, grizzled elders, fair women and brave men, workers, students, housewives—probably butchers, barbers, retired officials, and peddlers as well—in this instant all answer in unison like children in a classroom.

"It's a real skill, so …" He spits on the ground. "I asked for some money for an ice cream. Was I right to do that?"

"You—were—right!"

We chorus obediently. Like someone waking from a dream, the thin man in the tortoiseshell glasses gropes all over his body. Finally he pulls a wad of tattered bills out of his pocket, selects a red one, and hands it over.

The Sichuanese smiles slightly. He holds up the red paper and shakes it at the crowd.

"See how generous our friend is! I ask for fifty cents, and he gives me a buck. But"—there is a change in his manner as he continues, slowly and deliberately—"you earned this money with your sweat and blood. I know how it is for people in Shanghai. A university professor doesn't earn enough in a day for a pack of Marlboros—he certainly can't afford fancy neckties or a leather jacket. In the morning he only has rice gruel to eat. And you young ladies—you look so cute in your makeup and bright clothes, but all you eat for lunch is salted vegetable soup. So … how could I take this money? How could I?"

No answer. All these smart people are dumbfounded.

He snaps his fingers. The red banknote flies through the air, loops over, and lands at the feet of the thin man. Hesitant eyes peer through tortoiseshell frames, following the scrap of paper until it settles on the ground.

Hushed whispering begins. People are trying to work out whether they should stay or leave. The plump woman turns away, only to have him shout and point to her again. Her flabby body shakes with terror.

Nobody dares speak. All eyes are riveted on his other hand. He raises it slowly, his finger pointing at the young man in the Nikes. The pitiful youth stands like a statue, red pimples protruding all over his face, frozen in time.

What's he up to, this extraordinary stranger?

Finally his hand is drawn back. He taps another man on the shoulder:

"Young fellow …"

The man doesn't really look young, but then he isn't all that old either. He is dressed in an old blue police uniform and Chinese-made Liberation running shoes. He has a narrow forehead, a long chin, and narrow slits for eyes. He reacts quickly—before the Sichuanese can make his pitch, he has a five-yuan bill ready in his hand!

"Well, well! Another generous friend!" Again, he takes the banknote and gives it a shake.

"He gives me five bucks when I ask for fifty cents! I'd say that a man who's just out of jail is more free than anyone with his cash …"

He murmurs to himself and squints at the man in the police uniform, sizing him up.

"A man just out of jail is afraid of the cops. So he does what the hunters do when they want to fool a tiger. They drape tiger skins over themselves, and he puts on a police uniform. We know how it is! However"—his voice becomes slower, the words drawn out—"how could I take your money? I can see your pocket bulging, but all that means is that you've made a bit of money and you don't know what to do with it. But that money wasn't so easy to come by. If you want to get a trader's license, you have to go to the Department of Commerce, the Tax Office, the bank, the Environmental Protection Agency, Public Security … one place after another, to get your forms stamped. You haven't made a cent yet, and the money's flowing like water. When you do finally make a little profit, you think you're in luck. But it's slippery, this luck! It can find you, but you can't find it! All of a sudden there's a new policy, and you find you didn't play your cards right. Screw up once, and you're back in the slammer. How can I take your money?"

Again the bill is tossed back.

Everyone is totally confused. It's like a play, him demanding money then giving it back. Everyone wants to act their part now, pulling out their money and offering it respectfully to him. And the amount they offer keeps increasing—perhaps because they're afraid of him, or perhaps because they hope he'll give it back. By the plump woman's turn, it's up to ten yuan. Frowning slightly, she brings out her money, staring anxiously at the outstretched black hand as if it were grasping her soul.

This time, to everyone's surprise, he doesn't return it. Instead, he stuffs her money into his pocket:

"I won't insist on this dear lady taking her money back. But I won't spend it on myself! It will go to print more envelopes, so I can give more people medicine to cure what ails them. Then even more people will have good fortune! Aah!"

It is a long, drawn-out "Aah," like officials say when they are making speeches.

The plump woman has disapproval written all over her face, but there's not much she can do about it. People glance uneasily at each other, wondering what other tricks he has up his sleeve.

"Let me tell you straight."

He takes off his shabby straw hat, revealing the few sparse hairs on his little head.

"I don't really need an ice-cream bar. You figure out how much you want to give me! I know what you're thinking now! 'Humph! This fellow's just here to cheat us out of our money after all!' You're so cheap, you Shanghainese! All you care about is making money off the other guy. Some tiny amount of money the size of a fly, and it weighs you down like a millstone! Getting you to do something for someone else is harder than climbing up to heaven! As long as you live you'll never believe that someone like me just wants to bring good fortune to others. I'll be honest with you—I'm not expecting miracles. But I will ask you this: What is it that makes you, as humans, different from animals? Does that ever occur to you? Don't you want something more from life than just food and clothing—like doing something for society, for humanity? There's a saying here in Shanghai: 'People need to know their own value.' Right? So, people, where do you find your value? Are you just working for yourselves and your children? I'm sorry to have to tell you this, but even if you're a Party member or an official, you're still no better than a beast! I'm not in the Communist Party myself, but I'm more of a Communist than most Party members. Why? Because I serve the people! That's how I know my value! To my mind, real human value is in doing good deeds for humanity, no matter how small."

His face is earnest now. Hat upturned in his hand, he steps toward us. There is a deathly hush. The greasy black hat is like an open mouth. Somewhere from the depths of that mouth comes a derisive, merciless laugh; the man's voice seems to drift in from far away.

"Today I will use my special powers and restore your power to you. Don't get me wrong! I'm not superstitious, and I'm not religious. I don't believe in any religion. I believe in humanity! Only in humanity! Now, if you please, grandfathers, uncles, tradesmen, and young friends, those of you who have received my medicine, a small contribution for humanity!"

First into the hat is a ten, and the man who puts it in is the released convict in the police uniform. His move acts like an order, as those who have received the envelopes push and shove each other to be first with their donations. In no time the hat is crammed with money, much of it in one-, two-, and five-yuan bills. There are very few small bills or coins. Nobody but the man in the police uniform has put in a ten, however—even in the general panic, the others have kept their heads somewhat.

"Master, can we go now?" someone asks timidly.

"Sure. Feel free to go." He becomes expansive. "Just as long as you understand how people ought to live their lives! Do as you please! I have other places to go to cure the sickness of humanity," he says, stressing that final word, humanity.

With these words, he clasps his shabby hat to his chest and heads for the road.

Three tall cylindrical trash cans stand at the roadside. The garbage in them has overflowed, and a small mountain of it is piled up on the curb. A woman dressed in rags squats by this pile of trash, picking through the rotting food and vegetable peelings with shaking hands. Whatever she finds, she drops into a worn bamboo basket.

The Sichuanese stands silently at her side. Then, without any warning, he leans forward and dumps the contents of his hat into her basket. Her scraps and peelings are covered with brightly colored paper bills.

The dispersing crowd forms again instantly.

"What's his connection with the old woman? Do they know each other? Are they in this together?"

The old woman stares at him in disbelief and raises a hand toward him. Five blackened fingers stretch wide apart.

He looks down at her hand. A gentle smile lights his small eyes:

"The money's for you." He puts his hat back on his head and walks away.

"Money … don't want …" the old woman mutters. She shakes her head and pulls a banknote out of the basket, holds it up and strokes it, then lets it slip from her fingers onto the pile of trash. Still muttering, she picks the bills out one by one and throws them away.

"A madwoman."

The people feel disappointed. They can't take their eyes off the bank-notes, some stuck to bits of watermelon rind, some tucked under an old box, some teetering on top of the pile, about to flutter away … even in a pile of filth, money still fascinates them. Which one did you put in? Which one was mine?

They turn away from the money and look at the madwoman. Somewhere in their consciousness, a powerful force is holding them. Even if they know which of the bank-notes is theirs, they don't feel it's quite right to be looking at it any more.

The old woman goes on hunting through the garbage, oblivious to everyone around her. Ignoring the money, she picks out the peelings and puts them in her basket, shaking off the dirt and the banknotes that are stuck to them.

Driven as much by pity as by curiosity, I too go over to look at the old woman as the Sichuanese had done. Looking at her untidy white hair, her sallow skin, and her thin lips, I feel the intensity of her hunger and thirst.

Slowly she straightens her back and holds up her hand. I pull out the bean-paste bun I was going to have for breakfast and press it into her hand.

"No! No!"

She jerks her hand away, then stretches it out again, five fingers outstretched. She waves them in my face:

"Five languages! He speaks five languages!"

My bun has fallen onto the pile of garbage. I don't understand her.

"You can't execute him, comrade!"

She seizes my sleeve.

"Not now we have the reform policy. He speaks five languages; he can make a contribution to the country!"

She's grabbing me so tightly I feel uneasy and look around for help. They're laughing at her as they pull her away. Someone says, "Okay, we know now, five languages. Go home and get something to eat. Fat lot of use five languages are."

But the old woman doesn't want to go. She still resists and reaches out her arm to me, staring at me with dulled eyes. My heart is pounding—maybe what disturbs me is those eyes, sunken, opaque, glistening, like two coals glowing in a thick fog.

"Don't worry. She's harmless." A woman selling scallions and ginger by the road tries to comfort me. Seeing my bewilderment, she continues,

"She must have done something terrible in a past life. Her son was executed ten years ago—he was a student at the Normal University. She's here every day, always says he never stole or looted, he was so honest and clever, but … it's politics, isn't it? Who knows what goes on?"

"Wang Shensheng!" I shout. "She must be Wang Shensheng's mother!"

That's right! He was a university student, executed in 1977. I remember how everyone in the city was made to discuss the case. Full of righteous indignation, they all shouted, "Kill! Kill! Kill!" The muffled gunshot cast a dark shadow on the general euphoria that greeted the arrest of the Gang of Four. I had just started working as a junior editor at the Youth Press. When everything was quiet in the night, I would sit alone in the office, wiping away my tears as I wrote eulogies to the spirits of martyrs. At dawn, I would tear the pages into shreds and throw them into the toilet. My secret was discovered, but by someone who sympathized with me. He did not betray me, but jokingly recited a verse—I never knew where it came from—

Nobles strive for wealth and fame,
Heaven helps them all.
But still the anxious man from Qi
Fears the sky will fall!

Ten years have passed. The opinions that doomed Wang Shensheng to execution are now part of the state reform policy, proclaimed in endless propaganda campaigns. The people who were shouting for his death are now climbing the ladder of success, scrambling for official jobs and hustling for money … how absurd it all is!

I don't feel like giving up. I say to the people gathered round,

"Her son was Wang Shensheng!"
People stare at me strangely, then walk off. To them, I am as mad as the old woman.
I can't accept this. I grab hold of a fashionably dressed girl:
"Wang Shensheng—did you hear?"
She giggles nervously:
"Wang what? Is that some kind of disease?"
I hang my head, tell myself not to be so foolish. When I look up, the woman has gone, her bent body engulfed in the mass of humanity. My eyes cloud over, but still I can see a sinewy forearm and five fingers, pointing straight up to the blue of the sky like five stiff lances.

151.33 At The Denunciation Meeting\fn{by Wang Peng (1949-)} Sian, Shanxi Province, China (M) 3

One night, when everyone was fast asleep, the team leader, Deyuan, let Old Man Niu Sheng\fn{His name means "Ox tether."} in on a secret.
"Best be on guard, Elder Uncle! The 'Thunder God' is planning on holding a denunciation meeting just for you!"
Deyuan left Old Man Niu Sheng scared witless. The old man knew that "Thunder God" was the nickname—given by general consensus—to Comrade Lei\fn{Lei means "thunder"} who had come down with the work team.
The man was not old—he looked around thirty at most. But he had an awesome brusque way with him when it came to work. Early in the spring, he just dug in his heels and wouldn't let anyone plant any ginger in their private plots; then when the hot weather came, he rounded up all the team cadres and made them uproot all the tobacco plants the commune members had grown.\fn{Examples of Lei's political extremism, interfering with people's private plots. Tobacco and ginger are cash crops and therefore "smell of capitalism".} In the end, he made all the private plots barren, and everyone felt very frustrated.
Now Old Man Niu Sheng had fallen into the hands of the "Thunder God." He was probably done for. He was so bothered he did not get a wink of sleep all night. All his life, this old man had been respected: he had never squabbled with anyone, or done anythIng to be ashamed of: how could he face a denunciation meeting? Denunciation meetings—this old man had seen plenty of them these last few years; the dunce cap on the skull; bricks hung around the neck; the body blows with the willow, et cetera.
When, in the past, the old man had seen these things going on, it had made him tremble all over. Who would have thought it would now be his turn. The old man sighed. Feeling the wrinkly skin on his body under the blanket, he thought to himself: I must shave myself bald—to save having the hair pulled; on my body I'd best wear my padded vest under the shirt—it would be good padding against the stick …
The denunciation meeting was even worse than Old Man Niu Sheng had imagined. The atmosphere was frightening. The great big storeroom—originally used to store grain, only now there was no grain to store—was crammed with people. There were a few tables in the front of the room. Comrade Lei was sitting in the middle. From the beam hung a gas lamp—so bright the old man could scarcely open his eyes.
Comrade Lei announced in a booming, unusually awesome, frightening tone of voice—a tone reeking of gunpowder—the opening of the meeting. It was as though a whole string of firecrackers had been set off right behind the old man. Comrade Lei called upon Old Man Niu-sheng to make a complete confession of his crime of taking the capitalist road.
What was there to confess? Old Man Niu Sheng did have a skill that had been passed down through the generations—the skill of cutting leather cords. But this made him different from other country-folk: besides doing farmwork, they could all do a bit of carpentry, odd construction jobs, and so on. In the slack season, it was a way of covering losses, and getting a little pocket money. In the old days, this job, which involved dealing with dead horses and ox carcasses, was looked upon as a most lowly skill. It was not until cooperativization that Old Man Niu Sheng became renowned far and near for the straps he cut, which were strong, even, and durable. He became known for miles around as "Old Man Ox Tether," and County Commissar Liu even came in person and presented him with a framed glass "certificate of merit," which he received with trembling hands.
But now, Old Man Niu Sheng had become Comrade Lei's "Capitalist Model." It was said that Comrade Lei had made some calculations: three yuan to cut up an ox hide. At a hide a day-why, that would bring an astounding ninety yuan a month, or one thousand eighty yuan a year! That, plus the work points he made, and the grain and firewood and all that they got at the year's end—why, he would have struck it rich!

When Comrade Lei's theoretical article was broadcast over the speaker system and carried in the newspaper, it became known far and wide that in Hu Yang Village someone had "struck it rich." Old Man Niu Sheng had not known whether to laugh or cry. From the time he had inherited his father's set of tools all those decades ago, the most hides he had ever cut in one month was three and often there would not be one in four or five months. He couldn't understand: Comrade Lei had come as part of the work team from on high; how could he wish oxen to die every day in his team?

Of course, Old Man Niu Sheng was ashamed about the three yuan per hide. But that was because the peasants insisted. They would look on as he undid his shirt and practically kneel on the stinking hide—which might be days old—spread out in the yard, to scrape away remnants of bloody tissue. Any ordinary person would be unable to eat for three days after a sniff of the smell. After the scraping, he would put his hands in the boiling hot alkaline water to treat the hide. Then he had to cut it into strips, rub the strips, and so on. Why, the one hide would keep him busy right through the night. In order to overcome the horrible smell, he always had to buy a bottle of liquor. And furthermore, those peasants who had come a long way would stay the night at his place. And when the old man ate, how could he let others just look on? With his old friends and acquaintances it went without saying—even strangers on their first visit would be treated like honored guests. When they took their leave the deeply moved peasants might come out with five- or ten-yuan notes, but old Niu Sheng would always say,

"That'll be three yuan." No wonder Lao Liu the carpenter had worked it out and said,

"All you can show are losses! If it were me, I'd have washed my hands of the business years ago!"

But that Comrade Lei, who was forever going on about his "all-around dictatorship" and his "restricting bourgeois rights," had all but made Old Man Niu Sheng's peasant dwelling out to be a landlord's mansion, and was set on banning this kind of "capitalist activity."

As it turned out, the very day after the ban was announced, Old Man Lu Ziming from Shishu Ling\fn{Persimmon Ridge.} turned up at his door with an ox hide. As whenever old friends meet, there were the usual inquiries made of each other's situation. Lu Ziming was still as forthright as he had been when he was young. Full of gripes, he described how a few years back, when they had harvested their cash crops, every family in Shishu Ling was fairly prosperous. But now, with their struggle meetings and denunciation sessions, the place had gotten so poor that even the devil wouldn't pay a visit there.

"Just imagine! We're so poor we can't afford to buy anymore." Pointing at the ox he had carried over, Lu Ziming continued,

"So I had to come and trouble you."

What can I do? They only proclaimed the ban yesterday! Old Man Niu Sheng thought to himself. But he did not have the heart to tell his friend his problems. Look at that! What a first-rate hide! Big and perfect. There is enough for eight pairs of center harness and six pairs of side harness—enough to last Persimmon Ridge several years, he thought. What the hell! I'll do it.

The old man got busy as he had always done: he worked through the night, and just before dawn he saw his old friend off.

It is said that even a sparrow flying by casts a shadow, and so some "theoretical backbone" reported this "new trend in the class struggle" to Comrade Lei, which is what had led to the denunciation meeting.

" … and that's the whole of it. There's nothing more," Old Man Niu Sheng was saying, his lips trembling a little.

"No! That won't do! You've got to give a thorough account!" Comrade Lei exploded, banging the table.

"What? The rubber tire of the cart?"\fn{Here there is a pun, for jiao dai ("to convess") sounds the same as jiaodai ("rubber tire").} Old Man Niu Sheng was scared witless by the shouting. He knew that Comrade Lei had just confiscated everyone's handcarts and, to prevent the "sprouts of capitalism" from shooting up again, had demanded that even old tires and wheel rims be surrendered. So he quickly answered,

"But I have no cart! If I did you can be sure I'd give up the tires, wheels and all!"

Immediately all the commune members, regardless of the fact that this was a solemn denunciation meeting, burst out laughing, and order was thrown to the winds in the meeting place.

Comrade Lei got so annoyed he began to gesture with his hands and stamp his feet. He glared at Old Man Niu Sheng, whereupon a few of the jokers among the crowd started whispering.

"This fellow is thoroughly unrepentant! His confession is just a hoax. We mustn't let him spread any more poison!"

This led to more laughter. For these were the words Comrade Lei always used to sum up a confession, regardless of what the accused had said. Sure enough, before the laughter had died from everyone's lips, Comrade Lei announced,

"This fellow's thoroughly unrepentant! His confession is just a hoax … Now let us begin exposing his crimes and denouncing them!"

Old Man Niu Sheng knew that once the denunciation had begun, he should prepare to be beaten. He unthinkingly felt the padded vest he was wearing under the cotton jacket.

At first, Comrade Lei just waited and bore with it; then he started to fix empty stares on the "theoretical backbones" and the team cadres. Those that were stared at either were busy puffing away on their pipes or pretended they were thinking, searching for something. All avoided those eyes that put a certain pressure on them. Finally, when no one could bear the silence any longer, someone got up to denounce. Comrade Lei breathed a sigh of relief. He nodded, saying,

"Good. Let's have Team Leader Deyuan lead off on the denunciation."

"What? My old chum Deyuan whom I've known for decades?" Old Man Niu Sheng practically shook.

"Listen, Old Grandad. You're coming up to sixty you know! Everyone knows you're an old man without kids or anything—a "five guarantees"\fn{Childless and infirm old people in a rural collective aqre guaranteed food, clothing, medical care, housing, and funeral expenses.} recipient. So why do you bother cutting ox hides? You could sit there without moving a muscle and the team would have your white rice and refined flour brought to your door. There! You have it cushy, and you won't just enjoy it! Why go to all that bother to take the "capitalist road?"

Deyuan kept denouncing old Niu Sheng. And the masses at the meeting, feeling sad and surprised, began to exchange meaningful glances. As soon as Deyuan finished speaking, several people raised their hands, all eager to denounce Old Man Niu Sheng. Comrade Lei busily nodded his head. The "theoretical backbone" who was acting as notetaker wrote busily.

It was the turn of Shengcai—the team's well-known joker—to denounce.

"This day, we must thoroughly denounce old Niu Sheng's capitalist thinking. The old fellow hardly ever reads the papers or studies. All he cares about is working with all his might by day; then at night, instead of sleeping, he's got to tan hides and cut harness. What do you want to cut harness for, I ask you? What we want now is revolution, not production, and when it comes to farming, what do you want harness for anyway? Hmph! Why can't you be like Comrade Lei: sleep in the morning, read papers at noon, sort out capitalist roaders at night …"

Hearing Shengcai's "denunciation," everyone in the room had to bite their lips to stop themselves from laughing out loud. A forest of fists were raised by people wanting to "denounce." The speeches went on and on:

"Yes, and we also have to work out how many hides he's cut since Liberation, and just how many work teams are using his 'capitalist wares!'"

"Right! Total up just how many sets of harnesses hitched to how many team of oxen, and just how much grain they have produced—all this is 'evidence' of his capitalist crimes!"

More and more people spoke up, the denunciation became more and more heated.

As for Old Man Niu Sheng, he gradually calmed down. He no longer felt uneasy or frightened. In fact, it occurred to him that the feeling within him at this moment was not unlike what he had felt as he received the framed glass plaque from County Commissar Liu all those years ago.

183.37 The Endangered Ones\fn{by Fang Min (1949-)} Chongqing, Sichuan Province, China (F) 22

In\fn{The brown long-tailed pheasant (Crossoptilon mantchuricum) is currently found only in the high altitude ranges of China's Lüliang Mountain (in western Shanxi Province) and adjoining Little Wutai Mountain (western Hebei Province). It has been included in the "International Trade Convention on Endangered Species," and the Chinese government has designated it as a first-class protected species} the month of March, Cloud Crowned Mountain tends to disappear in the impenetrable vapours of its rolling mists, enveloped amorphously as if God himself were holding court there. Then just as suddenly, gusting mountain winds might sweep open a vista of escarpments, snowbound slopes, and naked trees. In the depleting fog of the high-noon burn-off, while the base of the mountain still remains bathed in haze, a hint of colour forgotten by a rainbow might peep through. This spectre entrances the eye as the nebulous screen of mist evaporates to reveal the graceful forms of an elegant bird species.

This is the beautiful brown long-tailed pheasant, whose form in both male and female strikingly resembles that of the peacock. While neither sex possesses the spectacular hues of that more exotic bird, the lustrous black-brown of its long, slender neck and sleek, body-hugging wings enhances its distinguished, vigorous gait.

Resembling continuous snow-white strands like spun silver, its long and gracefully slender tail feathers create the illusion of a gauze skirt when draped downward, mimic flowing streamers when stood upright, and replicate the spectacle of wildly blooming snow asters,\fn{Saussurea involucrata, a member of the composite family, with a bluish-purple flower} when fanned out in full glory. A snow-white beard coils upwards toward the back of the head and beyond, sticking up into the air to become two tapered horn-feathers. This complements the tail, the uppermost portion of which is further adorned with a very long brown feather that pulls together the bird's contrasting hues into a striking, harmonious whole. Its rose-like burgundy face, its coral feet, and its long pink jade-like beak provide the finishing touches for a most exquisite example of natural aesthetic design.

It was very clear that Cock-A-Lock was the undisputed leader of the flock. For as he walked at the head of the ambulatory group, his dominant status manifested itself further in his exceptional size and stalwart presence, in his powerful feet, in the dense solidity of his beak, and, especially, in his long, recalcitrantly rising horn feathers, all of which contributed to effect awe-inspiring majesty. Faced with the stubborn snows of six-month winters, when Cloud Crowned Mountain offered nary a tree in leaf, nor a flower in bloom, nor tender shoots of grass, not even a free-flowing stream, the head rooster by virtue of superior intelligence and courage becomes crucial to the survival of the flock.

Cock-A-Lock, then, bore the responsibility of leading the others in the search for the buckthorn berries or some other such fruit left over from the autumn that would sustain them through the arduous days that stretched interminably ahead. Thus, during this period of remorseless frigidity, several hundred pheasants attached themselves to him as tenaciously as a soul clings to its physical abode. At sunset they followed him up into the trees to pass the night, and at sunrise they followed him all over the mountain in the hunt for food, their feet leaving behind them in the snowy expanse trails of arrow-shaped imprints. All of their hopes they placed on the coming of spring.

But tragedy stalked their never-ending progression, with some falling from starvation and others virtually freezing in their tracks, while the survivors stepped over them in their quest to remain in close proximity to their leader.

Following up the rear of the flock was Skewbill, a lazy, apathetic fellow. In the evening he would always perch in the lowest branch even if the next highest branch was within easy reach. During the day he would always trail the ranks, and when one of his companions would drop dead before his eyes, he would step around the body instead of lifting his feet to step over it. For this reason he was often subject to the alarming whoosh of scavenger crows swooping down upon the carcasses that lay in the wake of the trekking birds. It was only at such times that he would be startled into hastening his pace and catching up with the others.

At this time, when Skewbill was once again frightened into rushing for the back of the ranks, the flock came to a sudden, unexpected standstill. But he, through inertia, kept right on going until he found himself most improbably in that rarified position at the head of the ranks. And there he was stunned to see a truly horrifying sight: the leafless, twisted, steel-gray branches of the buckthorn trees blanketing the southerly slppe before them were totally devoid of their golden fruit.

This had been Cloud Crowned Mountain's largest and most prolific grove of buckthorn trees, the place that the flock had always chosen as their winter feeding grounds. What had happened to the fruit? Could there be another flock of pheasants about? Had the crop been destroyed by punishing winds or a snowburst? Or had the birds' unrelenting consumption of the fruit depleted it to nothing? As the winter wind howled and stomachs growled, Skewbill, exhausted from a long day of tagging after the flock, sank to the gelid snowy ground, and refused to get back up on his feet. Daunted by the bleakness of their prospects, ten or so of the pheasants plunged into despair and also flopped over onto the frozen ground, their eyes helplessly fixed upon the figure of the head rooster.

At this moment, Cock-A-Lock, too, succumbed to the grip of terror, and his eyes clearly revealed a spirit slipping into chaos and confusion. If he could not find a new food source and fmd it quickly, if the impulse to embrace despair spread unchecked, then this flock of pheasants, the largest on Cloud Crowned Mountain, would presently disappear into the vortex of history.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" Cock-A-Lock cried out three tinies and leaped atop the canopy of a buckthorn tree, where he anxiously scanned the grove even while frenetically skipping from treetop to treetop. But in that boundless territory spread out before him, for as far as the eye could see, not one life-saving nugget of fruit begged for discovery .

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" he cried out again, more piercingly than before, and valiantly pressing on his search, he flew up into a twenty-six foot Sabian crabapple tree.

It was a miracle!

There slyly hiding in the jumbled, snow-covered branches, hung strand after strand of purple-red crabapples. There they radiantly—seductively—glistened, looking for all the world like an angel had dropped them from heaven. Overjoyed, Cock-A-Lock rushed for them, and soon a rat-a-tat spate of pecking sent the berries raining down out of the tree and onto the heads of his charges.

Like an unstoppable black tsunami, the birds scrambled for the Sabian crabapple tree and swarmed around its base. Jet-black neck after jet-black neck stretched forward, carrying along beak after sharp, hungry beak, as a frenzy of snapping up and snatching away began. Every berry that fell magnetically attracted ten or so birds, who glommed onto it in a grappling huddle. Big balls of birds, they were, and as they rolled about they sent a debris of snow and feathers flying into the air. It was not long before the dark mass of birds had broken up into a multitude of these brown feather glomerations that scattered out over the broad mountainous terrain. All over the expanse of white driven snow clamorous contests played out between brain and brawn. Truly, it epitomized the class divide of the haves and the have-nots, the former protesting their righteousness and the latter clinging to their discontent.

High up in the tree Cock-A-Lock tirelessly seized berries and threw them down. It was only when he had taken hold of the last ruby morsel that he became aware of his own hunger. Irresolute, he reconnoitered the ground below.

There under the tree lay Skewbill, still as death. The cold and hunger he had suffered was the same that had driven everyone else to their extremes, and yet this struggle for one little berry was not cause enough for him to abandon his indolence. Therefore, when Cock-A-Lock in the end tossed Skewbill that very last crabapple, it was just as the saying goes: the idle person has idle luck.

Nonetheless, Skewbill’s lassitude kept him pinned to the ground, and he tried to pick it off from where he lay. He missed once, then missed again. He didn’t get a third chance, for another long beak appeared and snatched the priceless morsel away.

The one who had swiped the prize was another rooster, one who was distinguished by his unusually large head. Like Skewbill, Noggins had declined involvement in the grand crabapple brawl, but laziness had nothing to do with it. His affliction, rather, was faint-heartedness. Since even the slightest rustle in the breeze would trigger in him an attack of the trembles, it was ludicrous to conceive of him leaping into the fray. And now that he had managed to gain something with minimum effort—well, only a fool would altruistically give it up. However, just as he had raised his head and was preparing to gulp it down, he received a violent peck on the top of his skull.

A sharp cry of pain emanated from his throat, and the delicacy in his mouth dropped onto the ground and rolled away.

His attacker was a beautiful hen. Slim and delicate of figure, exceptionally elongated of tail, her two brown tapering tail plumes arched up from the middle and dragged far behind her, phoenix style, effecting the look of a magnificent bridal train. But there was nothing delicate at all about Phoenix’s behaviour, especially when it came to contending for food.

Yet she too soon found herself bereft, for just as she went to stand under the Sabian crabapple tree, that berry she held in her mouth vanished. A gang of ten or so disgruntled birds rushed her from behind, and closing upon her they all fused together into one of those seething whirling feather masses.

Unbeknownst to them was the fact that a rooster with a long, long neck was sitting atop a buckthorn tree savouring that last berry. This intelligent, resourceful rooster had taken advantage of his long neck to reach into the midst of the.squabble, snatch up the object of contention, and escape undetected without a single scratch. Now as he gazed upon his hunger-crazed comrades in their rolling, tumbling tussle over one berry, he stretched out his long neck and burst into a resounding song of triumph.

“Gua! Gua! Gua!”

From atop the Sabian crabapple tree there came the stentorian cry of Cock-A-Lock. Its electrifying authority brought to an abrupt halt the roiling altercations that littered the landscape. With alacrity, each dishevelled, lacerated, traumatized pheasant returned to the base of the crabapple tree. Raising their jet-black necks, they all turned their full attention upon their leader in expectation of some new beneficence.

From his commanding perch high above them, Cock-A-Lock reviewed his troops, twisting his head about and back, about and back, examining them with absorption and intentness. What was very puzzling to him was that the multitude that had started out with him in the autumn—several hundred roosters and hens—now looked to be less than half its original size! But the question that loomed even larger before him was: now that the Sabian crabapple tree had been stripped, where was he to search for the food that would save those of his charges who remained?

Far away, even beyond the broad, misty environs they called home, there was a shadow, an invisible, untouchable yet terrifying shadow, that was at this very moment inexorably closing in upon Cloud Crowned Mountain.

Sixty million years ago, the brown long-tailed pheasant was a flourishing, expanding species. Their elegant, vigorous forms frequently haunted high mountains and dense forests, while layer upon layer of their footprints were left all over the vast expanse of the loess plateau. And even humans, once they appeared on the earth, could not help but regard these birds with respect.

Not long afterwards, the environment became infested with perils, and life degenerated into a procession of hardships, while the habitat of the brown long-tailed pheasant shrank smaller and smaller until it became limited to solitary Cloud Crowned Mountain. The population of these pheasants shrank as well, until today there were only a few thousand left. Nevertheless, that terrifying shadow continues to press in upon them, intent upon pushing this ancient species to the brink of extinction.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" The indomitable Cock-A-Lock opened his throat and disgorged a clarion call.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" The dark mass of birds cried out in concert towards the heavens.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" From mountain ridge to mountain ridge, the sound of pheasants echoing each other's cries filled the air. This was the shout of all survivors everywhere, the primal scream from the ages born in the primordial formation of the earth when the land rived and the heavens split and mountains thrust towards the sky in violent upheavals, then passing along its legacy to the rumble of the mountains and the roar of the sea, the weeping and the wailing, the ranting and the raving that goes on and on forever without end. This was an endangered species which focused all of its being upon its love of life, upon the struggle against extinction, upon the call of Spring, upon the urgent need to be fruitful and multiply!

Then the accumulation of snows melted, the ice of the rivers broke up, gentle winds brought warmth, and the trees and the grasses burst into green. With the calling of the pheasants, lifeless Cloud Crowned Mountain began to revive.

Amid patches of dingy leftover snow, a carpet of soft, thick grass was already spreading over the languid, sun-drenched mountain slope. A group of pheasants lay like an inky splotch on this "lawn," desultorily pecking at its tender blades and absentmindedly gazing at the head rooster. Cock-A-Lock, reposing on top of a large white rock, had abandoned his usual demeanour of majesty. From his throat there emitted a low glur-glurgling sound, the replication, it seemed, of an ancient principle affirmed and reaffmned over the ages.

Long Neck, the intelligent one, was the first to rise to his feet. He threw up his neck ramrod straight and strutted off briskly, putting distance between himself and the group. Clearly, he was flaunting himself, and his ostentatious stride and insufferable air of arrogance grabbed the attention he sought. At least one hen, herself a bird of gargantuan conceit, found his exhibition enrapturing and set off in pursuit. Catching up to him, she painted her brilliant yellow beak in the air, about and back, about and back, as if to see who could put on the more flamboyant display.

Following them with deliberate, measured paces was a rooster who walked with a limp. This was Lamer, and in the previous year a contest of dominance with Cock-A-Lock had left him with a broken leg, but not a broken spirit. His ambitions remained unfaded, and now at this time when an inevitable change was afoot, he naturally set out to reassert himself. Sticking like a shadow to Lamer was the faint-hearted Noggins, because Lamer was as tough and cool as a Marine and knew what to do when danger was out and stalking about. And that petite, exquisite hen whose black-brown wings were each adorned with a multicoloured plume was following close upon Noggins, because she found his large, prominent head to be irresistibly attractive.

Long Neck and his cortege instigated a commotion in the flock, and the black-brown splotch on the grass erupted in pandemonium and began to split apart. Roosters and hens knotted in threes and fours and called out back and forth to each other, then merged and withdrew from the head rooster. Quitting the collective, they moved off to a different hillside. Before long the dark splotch had receded like a retreating tide from the original slope, revealing once again its carpet of green.

Next to the large white rock, however, there still remained ten or so of the birds. A few moments ago they too had spread their wings in an impulse to take off, but they had not gone far. Rather, they had closed ranks again with the head rooster. Now they were lying there—motionless, awaiting Cock-A-Lock's unmistakable resounding song of authority .

After awhile, Cock-A-Lock stood up, and shaking his imposing horn feathers, he unleashed from his throat a dreadful cry of wrath. Those roosters and hens who had remained at his side stood up as well. They stretched out their necks, glared, and refused to budge an inch. The sound of violently flapping wings ensued, and Cock-A-Lock flew down from atop the rock and savagely thrust his long beak upon the head of one of the roosters. A hen was the next to receive the brunt of his rage. On the "lawn" a fresh tumult broke out as the ten or so loyalists, chased and pecked by their leader, cried out in terror until he fmally succeeded in driving them off the slope. But just when Cock-A-Lock lowered his head to smooth his feathers, those thick-headed numskulls came straggling back one by one. They gazed upon him with eyes that told of their reluctance to depart, and pitifully complained of his abuse. Especially that feckless Skewbill. True to form, he brazenly reclined upon the ground and effected the heavy-lidded look of lassitude.

Without uttering a sound, Cock-A-Lock pounced upon the hapless Skewbill and started working him over with his beak. At fIrst, the lazy bird simply ducked his head under his wing; but the poor protection this tactic provided forced him to shift strategies, and he leaped to his feet and made a run for it. To his consternation, though, Cock-A-Lock did not ratify this retreat but bolted right after him in furious pursuit. With ruthless abandon did he peck at him, and peck at him, until Skewbill, battered and terrified, most uncharacteristically straightened up his neck and drove his crooked beak into counter-offensive.

But how could one so apathetic and ineffective all his life ever hope to match a head rooster? On top of that, his crooked beak was a handicap in itself, not to mention that his eyes were already occluded with his profusely flowing blood. Indeed, each thrusting peck that he directed upon his opponent was no different from knocking an egg upon a rock.

This monumentally mismatched contest swiftly came to its inevitable conclusion. For the first time—and last—Skewbill's prostrate figure on the grass did not get there out of laziness. As the deed had approached its culmination, the sharp, distressed cries of the remaining loyalists had echoed and re-echoed across the grassy expanse until those birds finally fled into the forest and disappeared.

As if glad at having unloaded a burden, Cock-A-Lock started meticulously preening his wings and tail feathers, readying himself to embark upon his new life.

Suddenly, somewhere in the dense wood there erupted the clamorous announcement of something afoot. Its cause was soon made apparent as there emerged upon the smooth green tract a young hen who moved in sublime serenity. Mesmerizingly graceful was her long snow-white tail, enchanting was her glorious queenly comportment. And as she turned her splendidly shining neck to cast amorous glances at the head rooster, the entire grassy expanse, it seemed, fell under the spell of love. She was none other than that incomparable mistress of tenderness, the unrivalled empress of charm, the breathtaking, divine Phoenix.

Who can resist the seductive power of beauty? Surely not even the commanding general of the most powerful of armies. Cock-A-Lock immediately threw out his chest and thrust his head high into the air, and shaking his magnificent horn feathers, he approached her. To her he crooned a springtime serel/ade of love:

"Coo-coo-kwa-la-chee; kwa-la-chee …"

His song, reminiscent of the babbling of mountain brooks and the undulating of ocean waves, was the spring mating call particular to the brown long-tailed pheasant. To its modulating tones Cock-A-Lock sloughed off his mission as head rooster, and rid of restrictions and worries, he joined up with Phoenix and the two of them went off toge:ther into the forest.

On the green grassy carpet only the solitary crumpled body of Skewbill remained, blood still trickling away. A giant golden eagle circled in silhouette high overhead. Its sharp scream pierced the sky and it plummeted down like an arrow.

High up in the mountain there is a crystalline cataract fed by the runoff from melting snow. Its waters plunge into a whirlpool below, then shoot out again to carve into the yellow-brown earth a clear, swiftly flowing stream. Upon the fertile banks of this stream, lushly growing wild chives, flowering onions, and dandelions sway greenly in the crisp spring breeze, sending out wafts of delicate fragrances that entice the attentions of rambling pheasants.

Long Neck curved his head and neck downward and pecked up the fat blade of a wild chive. But before he had raised his head again, a long, bright yellow beak flashed over and snatched it away. Fortunately there was no lack of delicacies to eat, so Long Neck dropped his head again and pecked up a tender flowering onion. Instantly, and to his astonishment, that bright yellow beak tossed the chive and grabbed up the onion.

This time Long Neck raised his head and discovered the prodigiously haughty hen that had been following him around. He, however, chose to overlook her effrontery and magnanimously walked away. Who would know it, though, but Goldie would not be put off. She continued to dog him, snatching away whatever he picked and immediately discarding it, as if she were getting back at him for something.

Taking advantage of all this was the clever Plumella, who danced along in their footstes, snapping up the tasty tidbits, revelling in the ease of their acquisition. Thus, before Long Neck had even swallowed a bite, Plumella had already eaten her fill.

With Long Neck's forbearance fimally depleted, a burst of anger surged up from within and erupted into his eyes, which glared wrathfully, and his horn-feathers, which stood formidably erect. He was just about to teach Goldie a lesson when Lamer ambled over and sluggishly plopped himself down right between them. He had been gorging himself on Nature's bounties and, thoroughly sated, he lay there languidly, now aimlessly regarding the sky, now mindlessly contemplating the ground, coo-cooing as if he were laughing at something or talking to himself.

This distracted Long Neck, who, suddenly enraptured at the immense breadth of the heavens, found his ire gradually subsiding. Goldie, meanwhile, had discovered the lusciousness of the yielding vegetation and the sweetness of the clear water and forgot her annoyance at him. Plumella, her stomach already filled to bursting, sauntered over to the edge of the stream. Noggins was there drinking, his extraordinary, large head dipping and rising, dipping and rising in smooth undulant grace, turning the flames of Plumella's infatuation up ever higher.

"Coo-coo-kwa-la-chee, kwa-la-chee," Cock-A-Lock's spring serenade, rebounded from afar.

"Coo-coo-kwa-la-chee, kwa-la-chee." From every quarter echoed the response of innumerable inspired roosters.

The perceptive Long Neck halted his foraging. A primeval impulse suddenly went coursing throughout his body. His two rose-like cheeks became engorged and glowed a more intensive red. He threw out his chest, elevated his head, and hoisted his tail into its upright position, then strode over to Goldie, stood before her and dashingly regaled her with his song of spring.

But; inexplicably, vainglorious Goldie eyed him with indifference, turned heel upon him, and disdainfully walked off. She headed towards Lamer. To Lamer this was a highly unexpected but welcome surprise, and his face swelled vividly ted as he poured out a most mellow and moving rendition of that hallowed pheasant classic. Still, for some reason Goldie found his performance a bore and contemptuously turned her back for a second time, walking away with leisurely steps. She left in her wake a pair of red-faced roosters, who now squared off in irreconcilable wrath.

Two jet-black necks curved into hooks, four glaring eyes flashed their enmity, two pairs of horn-feathers stood on edge, as each rooster cried out his challenge to the other:

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Three deafening cries, and they clashed together ferociously. Long Neck was agile and quick, hitting his mark with deadly accuracy every time, promptly bloodying Lamer's face. Lamer, though, was bold, powerful, and tenacious, and with every attempt he came away with a feather until Long Neck was screeching in pain. Alternately charging and retreating, the two roosters described a circle on the grass. After several rounds, the battleground was covered with feathers and blood, and still neither was able to defeat the other.

From the sidelines Goldie watched the duel that she had instigated, her long yellow beak following the movements of the jet-back necks, back and forth, back and forth, up and down and up and down, as if she were a scrupulously conscientious referee. Her frequent cries of encouragement further added to the din.

And then the struggle escalated. Glaring at each other, the two roosters circled, thickset wings outstretched, snow-white tails flared. With the noise of drumming, ruffling, flapping wing-feathers, two brown clouds rose into the air, clashed against each other, fell back to the ground, and separated. Again they rose up, again they clashed, again they descended, and again they separated... From the grassy clearing to the thicket of bushes to the bank of the stream, they remained locked in battle, and still it was not decided.

Finally, with a ghastly shriek one of the brown clouds flumped inert to the ground, while through the momentum of his re-ascent the other dropped down upon the motionless mass to rain a succession of pecks upon it. It would have been the end of the downed contender if Goldie had not intervened. With three sharp cries that sounded just in the nick of time, she brought the bloody drama to an end.

Although his feathers stood scrappily awry, with gory, seeping patches of flesh malignantly peering out of their disjunctures, Long Neck radiated a spirit of undiminished vitality. This time when he approached Goldie resplendent in the pride of the victor and loudly declaiming his springtime aria, she did not walk off. Indeed, she advanced to meet him, cooing in response, as if she were proclaiming her praise and approval of his mighty masculinity.

Lamer rose with difficulty. His bum leg had betrayed his valour and his strength. Through blood-occluded eyes he watched the indistinct figures of Long Neck and Goldie as they retreated together into the thickets. Silently he accepted this outcome, neither pursuing nor crying out after them. Nor was this the time for indulging rancour or raging in passion, for females always did and always would choose the victor, in accordance with an unalterable principle that befittingly guided the pheasant species.

Slowly he made his way to the edge of the stream, where he plunged his battered, bloodied head into the icy waters. He pulled it out and shook it, then repeated the action, over and over, as if he wanted to cleanse himself thoroughly of his new injuries and his old pains. When Lamer finally raised his head, one glance revealed to him Noggins serenading Plumella.

Succumbing to a surge of instinct, he instantly hurtled toward the offender. For the first time in his life, timorous Noggins stood his ground in the face of an oncoming force. Was it because Plumella held him dearly in her heart? Or was it because the injured Lamer would surely collapse at the first blow? Thus once again the grassy clearing by the side of the stream erupted into mortal combat. Lamer, of course, was restricted in his movements, but this did not diminish his ferocity. And though Noggins was naturally predisposed to cowardice, he had to his advantage an unhampered, powerfully built body.

Ultimately, Lamer could not sustain the fight as his strength gradually failed him, and Noggins was in the position to claim victory. For her part, Plumella was ready to make her fair and impartial choice.

But then suddenly a black shadow swept over them and from on high the sharp cry of the golden eagle split the air. In the wink of an eye, skittish Noggins had scuttled into the underbrush, vanishing even faster than Plumella. Only the physically inconvenienced Lamer remained explosed by the side of the stream.. Raising his head Lamer gazed at the sky, gave out two loud cries, and prepared for the fight of his life.

As luck would have it, though, that golden eagle had just feasted upon Skewbill and was now merely up there asserting his supremacy. Before long, he disappeared into the firmament. But in these few very short minutes, Lamer had been dramatically transformed into a hero. When lovely Plumella cast aside her extraordinary Noggins, who had always excited her to the very core of her being, and ran straight to Lamer, that rooster she left behind in the underbrush drooped his head in untold grief.

"Coo-coo-kwa-la-chee, kwa-la-chee …"

Desolately did Noggins intone these notes as he walked in solitary mournfulness. His timidity notwithstanding, this rooster possessed strength and power as well as all the surging emotions of spring, and yet where could he go now in search of a mate? As pairs of roosters and hens in affectionate communion strolled past him, he was reduced to repeating that time-honoured song in endless refrain, until it gradually transformed into an elegy of despair. He tramped on far and abroad, over hill and dale, on and on, and it became his only companion.

Under the blazing sun of May, the highland bursts forth in magnificence. The dragon spruce dangles its purple bells, the larch shakes its embroidered balls, the snow-white rattail peeks out from the thick grass, and the flame-red blossoms of the hairy hazelnut glisten on the ends of their branches. From mountain to mountain extends the riotous efflorescence of wild peaches, apricots, cherries, and morningstar lilies, while shining, crystal-clear spring water tinkles along its pathway. Awash in the exuberance of spring, Cloud Crowned Mountain unleashed the energy of life.

It was here within this superb incarnation of springtime resplendence that the pheasants passed their honeymoon. Their days of coupledom, intimacy and inseparability found the roosters turned out in especially fine form. As the sun shone its rays upon them, they searched tirelessly—joyously—for the tastiest, plumpest tidbits to present to the hens. At dusk they scoffed at every difficulty and danger to pursue their elaborate selection of the safest and most comfortable branches for the hens to perch upon. Their solicitousness even spanned the night, when the hens were fast asleep, as they themselves napped and woke in fits and starts for the sake of maintaining vigilance: the discovery of a lurking enemy would set off their cries and they would scurry away to draw off the evildoer and protect the hens.

During these days of newly wedded bliss, when loving pairs strolled leisurely about the forest, one couple happening upon another would occasion a rooster duet as the two males urbanely harmonized their spring wedding songs. And then the couples would each go along their own way. As decreed in pheasant law, one family would claim as its territory a section of the mountain slope, and whoever would dare to intrude upon the territory of another would be subject to savage attack and might even lose his life. Of course, immersed in the paradisical atmosphere of this sweetest time of year, who would deliberately commit such a provocation?

The romantic honeymoon period swiftly drew to its end; and the hens grew voluptuously fat and started building nests and laying eggs. The roosters were leaner, meaner, keener, and they intensified their vigilance as they started going out on patrol. Just as the Ruler of Heaven and Mother Nature, each in their own domains, work in full cooperation to run the world, the roosters and the hens, in accordance with God's plan, joined in partnership to build their families.

Every year at this time, as inevitable as the seasons, would arrive hordes of coal-black crows so numerous they would blot out the sky and smother the earth. These inauspicious birds would glut the air with their raucous weird cawing, or they would go about in throngs blatantly flaunting their might in numbers, spreading an ink canopy in flight and transforming the colour of the trees upon landing. Or they would gad about individually, randomly terrorizing whomever they met, whizzing back and forth like stray bullets in an urban gun battle.

Thus, wherever the crows invaded was also to be heard the loud "Gua! Gua! Gua!" of pheasant roosters. Especially at those times when a mobbish cacophony ripped through the forest, Cloud Crowned Mountain would resound as well with the concerted cries of roosters united in harmony. But this was no longer their tender, undulating song of spring, but rather a sharp, ear-splitting alarm, the signal for concealed hens to protect their nests and their eggs.

When Cock-A-Lock sounded his alarm, by the side of a spring was Phoenix, thirstily partaking of its cool, refreshing waters. Her body that had become so full and voluptuous was now quite gaunt, making her beautiful tail look even longer. The wear and tear of producing eggs and the rigours of brooding had very quickly sapped her strength. The brief frenetic feeding excursions she could afford to indulge in only once a day were not nearly sufficient to make up for the toll exacted upon her. And now these incessant warning signals constantly cut short even these hasty ventures.

Phoenix did not dare to ignore the alarm. She rushed back to her haven of larches and oaks and scampered in under the canopy of lespedeza and Japanese spiraea where her nest lay hidden. But it was too late: her four pale turquoise eggs had disappeared. Instantly her eye fell upon the thick green grass, where several little piles of empty broken shells winked appallingly at her. On the corpulent branch of a larch sat two crows lustily cawing away, the corners of their black beaks adorned with strands of yellow yolk that gave them the appearance of wearing gloating smiles.

Enraged, Phoenix flung herself up into the air after them, but the drag of her long tail hindered her ascent. By the time she attained their perch, the two crafty thieves had long absconded, leaving her in dead silence.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" Phoenix cried out in agonized grief. She flew down from the tree and slipped once more into her canopied abode, where with her sharp, long beak she meticulously combed through the nest and the grass around it. When it became excruciatingly clear that none of her unborn progeny had somehow miraculously escaped, this beautiful, ordinarily submissive hen fell into a mad frenzy and ripped to shreds the nest still warm with her own body heat. And then she fainted dead away.

A spring rain began to fall and its pitter-pattering drops soothed an afflicted soul. A wind began to blow discreetly, and its softening breeze caressed a body racked with pain.

When Phoenix regained consciousness, Cock-A-Lock was standing beside her cooing gently as if he were solicitously comforting her.

And how could he not? The mountains still stood as solidly as usual, and so did the trees, and spring had not yet flown. What was to prevent them from building another nest and starting their family anew? And so, unflinchingly facing the elements, the two grief-stricken pheasants, one flinging his long, intractable horn-feathers up into the air, the other trailing her ravishing, complaisant phoenix-tail, plunged together into a deeper, denser part of the forest.

Under the spreading branches of an ancient tree, tucked away in a shallow, gapping cave carved into the rock, sat a pheasant's nest replete with eight eggs. A helter-skelter pile of dead branches concealed the entrance and protected it from the wind and the rain. In the cave Plurnella sat aboard her nest, relishing the sense of security that its strategic design offered. Indeed, its exceptionally advantageous arrangement allowed Plumella vastly more freedom of movement than was afforded to those such as Phoenix. She could venture outside twice a day to replenish herself and she could do so with relative leisure.

Now at this moment when Lamer sounded the alarm, she was stretching herself on a nearby patch of grass. Instantly she sighted a crow dropping down like a black arrow upon the dead branches in front of the cave. There he furtively snooped around, looking every inch the thief. Clever Plurnella, taking care not to disclose her presence, quietly sneaked up upon him, and just when he thrust his black head into the mass of dead branches, she delivered an aggressive peck to his backside.

With a screech of pain, the crow thrashed around in the branches before making his panicky, flurried getaway. Plurnella spat out the black feather he had so generously given up and dispassionately hopped up onto the pile of deadwood. With her red jade-like beak she rotated her turquoise eggs one by one, satisfying herself that none was missing or broken. In cooing contentment she gathered all eight of them up under her soft, warm belly and sat in heavy-lidded euphoria.

Just at this time, the forest rang out once again with Lamer's warning cry. Plurnella, eyes popping and hackles raised, geared into full alert. Up ahead there appeared the tremulous movement of a dark brown, furry round thing amongst the thicket of yellow roses. Then two downy ears came into view, and a pair of beady eyes, and a long, slobbering mouth. It was a fox!

Plumella shuddered. Clearly, it would be futile for her to throw her slight body up against the strength and bulk of a fox. Could she draw him away from her eggs by fleeing? But that would be too obvious. How about hiding? But the three walls of the cave offered no retreat. In despair Plumella clutched her eight eggs ever closer to herself and awaited the fate that doomed them all.

But then just at that moment, like the cavalry riding to the rescue, a big brown cloud landed at the mouth of the caye. With a resounding "Gua! Gua! Gua!" Lamer stood there in a proud, terrible praetorian pose, blocking the fox's retreat. Unintimidated, the rapacious fox cut short his hunt and rushed at Lamer. Again the rooster rent the air with his cries and darted away. Keeping ahead of the fox, now he would skim along the ground, now he would soar up into the air, in this way enticing the fox away from the cave and into the wood.

Under the lingering fright of this close call, Plumella stood up with utmost caution. Again she applied her red beak to the task of rotating the eggs. Not one was missing, not one was broken. She resumed her cooing and her sitting, and waited for Lamer to return.

The moon rose and shed its cold light upon the lofty larches, transforming them into thousands of gruesome steel swords, and upon the dead wood in front of the cave and Plumella in the cave, freezing them into ice sculptures. And still there was no trace of Lamer.

The sun rose and shed its warm rays upon the hundreds of song birds, upon the mobs of raucous crows, and upon slope after mountain slope where the patrolling roosters let out their frequent warning cries. But the area around Plumella's cave remained silent, devoid of the voice of Lamer.

By the time the sun was arcing down toward the mountains, Plumella could no longer quietly wait. Agilely she hopped atop the dead wood pile, where she used her sharp beak to select long, slender twigs and take them back one by one to cover her eggs until the nest and the deadwood pile looked as one. Then she flew down from the deadwood pile and headed swiftly in the direction where she had last seen Lamer.

Plumella covered the distance rapidly because Lamer had left the path he had taken strewn with clues. At first there were only brown and white feathers, singly and in little clumps; and then there were also spots of deep purplish blood. Finally, Plumella drew to a stop under a dark green dragon spruce, where in a pool of blood every manner of rooster feather lay stickily amassed. And nearby lay a rooster head, eyes staring widely, beak clamped resolutely upon a wad of dark brown fox fur. And two coral-coloured feet that had planted countless backward arrows in the dust also lay there, clenched. One of them still held in its grasp the bloody eyeball of the fox.

Plaintively did Plumella cry out. Then with her beak she gathered up the feathers one by one and formed them into a neat pile, and atop the pile she placed the head and two feet. Then she sat herself quietly down beside the remains and watched them expectantly, as if she were waiting for Lamer to come back to life.

A considerable amount of time passed, but the miracle was not forthcoming. Instead crowds of crows converged overhead, inexorably drawn to the spot, cawing noisily in anticipation. Their cries jolted Plumella into wakefulness; she leaped to her feet and sped like the wind back to her nest.

Two broken eggshells already lay upon the grass in front of the cave. Next to the cave stood two of the black birds in the act of plundering their third trophy. Incensed, Plumella spread her wings, unleashed an awful, enraged cry, and charged furiously across the thirty or so yards that still separated them. One of the crows hastily pinched up an egg with his beak and took off with a flurry, but the fragile shell disintegrated, leaving him nothing for his trouble. The other crow quick-wittedly decamped with an egg impaled on his beak, drinking its contents in flight.

The futility of paying further heed to the crows drove .Plumella headlong into the cave, where, clinging desperately to hope, she urgently rummaged through her nest. Every inch of its she subjected to her agitated probing, even to the bottom-most layer, but the cold, hard fact was that, of those pitiful eight little eggs, only half were left.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Just as did Phoenix, Plumella sobbed her maternal lamentation. But for her, no caressing breeze arose, no soothing rain fell, and above all, no rooster's consolation responded to her grief. For her, there was only the thickening dusk that settled heavily over the deadwood pile, mute in its macabre stillness—that, and the turquoise eggs that lay in the nest, their fate consigned to the will of Heaven.

And so it was that the forlorn Plumella ceased her mourning and quit her waiting. Silently she gathered the eggs up under her and resumed brooding them with all the propriety that was the given of her species.

As the night faded into day, and as the day again relinquished its authority to night, she remained astride her eggs, unwilling to risk her progeny for even a second. Three days passed, and then five, and still she did not set foot on the ground, though thirst and hunger connived to ravage her will. Under their assault, she inserted her beak into the cracks of the rock, sucking in the moisture of the earth; and she stuck the tip of her short little tongue onto the rock wall and licked at the cool lichens. Scratches and scars fanned out across her red jade-like beak, bloody lacerations multiplied upon her delicate tongue. Yet the instinct for self-preservation prevailed over the pain.

A week passed, ten days, and spring slipped into summer. Still Plumella did not budge from the nest. In the extremity of her deprivation she pecked at the white mould growing on the dead branches, and when the mould was gone she tore the bark off and ate that. Though the mould nauseated her and the hard, dry bark stuck in her throat, she gulped them down under the dictate of hunger.

The ten days stretched out into an excruciating twenty. Many times did she simply faint dead away upon her nest, but with each revival her overwhelming impulse was to confirm the well-being of her eggs. For Plumella at this time, nothing existed except her developing progeny, not the sky, not the earth, not even herself.

At long last there emerged from underneath her wing a fluffy little thing. Another followed upon its heels, and then a third, and a fourth. These homely little balls of life didn't look anything like their parents: they had no long graceful tails, they had no impressive horn-feathers, their beaks were short, their feet were blunt, and their down was a mottled jumble of yellow and white. Nevertheless, these shortcomings did not detract from their cleverness. Together the four little chicks stood on the edge of the nest in front of Plumella, bouncing up and down vivaciously and "cheep-cheep-cheeping" their high-pitched little songs.

Plumella had once more fallen into a swoon, and now this wonderful sound of newborn little innocents restored her to consciousness. She blinked her eyes, uttered a couple of notes, then totteringly climbed out of the nest and numbly rolled down from atop the pile of deadwood. There, plenty of delectable, tender grass lay spread out at her feet, while only a few steps away tinkled the refreshing spring waters, all hers for the taking. She fell to without delay, tearing up mouthfuls of the grass with her dilapidated beak, gorging on it until her craw bulged. Then she walked over to the side of the spring where, lowering and raising her thin, fragile neck for a seemingly interminable period, she drank her fill, literally until the water audibly gurgled back up into her throat.

Then, completely satisfied, Plumella shook her neck, flapped her wings, and called out for her children. The little fluffy balls came running and, bouncing and chirping joyously, they gathered round their mother. Under the gloriously blue sky, on the edge of the dense dark forest, a chorus of cheeps and coos animated the air as the hen and her four chicks sang and danced in the celebration of the birth of a new pheasant family.

Suddenly there sounded from among the revellers a sharp, discordant note, like the "sproing" of a snapping violin string, and Plumella flumped onto the ground like a tossed bale of straw. Her bulging, overstuffed craw had burst. From the split-open cavity there slowly spilled out a mass of undigested grass mixed with water still cool from the spring. So recently ingested, they now returned to the places of their origin. And the four little chicks who had just made their entry into the world had become orphans.

An overcast sky steadily blackened, throwing the earth into darkness, punishing it with pelting rain, riving the atmosphere with slashes of crackling voltage—announcing with symbolic aptness the arrival of a remorselessly aggressive summer. The riotous blooms of spring were ripped from their moorings, dashed upon the earth and mashed into a sodden, muddy pulp. The waters of the spring rose up in rage and roared forward, scouring up mud and sand, rampaging down the mountain, uprooting the bushes and grasses lining their banks and carrying them unceremoniously away. Huge trees cleaved by lightning littered the ground like corpses, their trunks left standing, smoking like joss sticks delivering a believer's prayers to Heaven. When the sun re-emerged, it had become a fireball that relentlessly spewed sweltering heat. Its intense ultraviolet rays rapidly transformed Cloud Crowned Mountain into a lush and verdant domain.

In a quest to escape the oppressive heat, each pheasant family began its move toward the mountaintop, 6,500 feet above sea level. As the pilgrimage got underway, the ceaseless chain reaction of roosters' cries and hens' cooing was further infused with the cheep-cheep of the new chicks, whose joyous sound greatly alleviated the mugginess of the forest.

In a shade-mottled glade, Goldie came upon an awesomely erect, red earthen mound that stood about three feet tall. Like a giant up-ended sesame seed bun, it was embellished profusely with the white larvae of ants, truly a feast bestowed by the gods. Goldie, a diligent hen of prodigious accomplishment, had brought into the world eight chicks, making hers the largest family among all the pheasants. It was no wonder then that she stood with even greater pride than before, that her neck stretched out even longer, and that her brilliant yellow beak glistened with an even brighter sheen.

Under Goldie's guidance, the eight little chicks converged upon the anthill and fell greedily upon the larvae. This sudden attack triggered a commotion in the colony, and large black ants came swarming out of the hill. Oddly, however, they did not try to protect their progeny, but simply ran about in what appeared to be panic-stricken confusion, their eight tiny legs carrying them nowhere fast. The lively, naïve little chicks naturally got bored with the motionless larvae and went instead for the ants. Here and there they ran about, chasing the scurrying black creatures. Whenever a chick caught one, it would cheep cheep cheep in victory and flap its short, little wings in exultation.

Goldie devoted herself fully to the little creatures and kept a constant eye on them, loudly calling the foolhardy back to within safe perimeters and murmuring encouragement to the executers of particularly quick and accurate pecks. In front of the littlest one, who scampered vainly after the others, she set a half-dead ant for him to practice upon. And those two who already sported lengthened beaks and real feathers found themselves forcibly separated a number of times, punished for fighting over the food.

There was only one element missing from this ebullient family scene, and that was Long Neck. For the past several days, ever since the trek north had begun, Long Neck had been taking himself off somewhere, alone. At the crack of dawn he would swoop down wraith-like out of the tree, call out softly several times, and disappear. At dusk he would suddenly reappear wherever his family happened to be, guggle softly as before, and fly up to his perch for the night.

That he had embraced the lifestyle of the libertine was not something that Goldie chose to be concerned about. She was too preoccupied with the welfare of her chicks. From time to time in the distance she would hear his voice inexplicably lifted with the strains of the spring mating call, but she just twisted her head and waved her beak, disdaining to pay it any heed.

As the blazing sun heated the glade to temperatures worthy of an oven, the zealous, hustling chicks finally came running with their protruding craws, and on an apparent whimsy scurried in under Goldie's wing. In their minds that cozy spot afforded all the safety, comfort, and protection from the elements they would ever need. Goldie earnestly opened her wings to gather in the eight little things, only to discover they were actually not so little any more. She could feel a growing ferment underneath as the ones whose behinds stuck out frantically pressed inward while those stifled for air strained outward. Sixteen wings pushed and shoved, sixteen feet trampled and were trampled, older chicks and younger chicks jockeyed and vied for position, churning and hopping like a pot of bubbling porridge.

Goldie stood stock still as their sharp feet scratched upon her underbelly, her eyes closed as if she were fast asleep and her throat emitting small sounds of comfort and contentment.

Meanwhile a three-foot Pallas pit viper came silently slithering like a turbid stream through the grass, its black and white spots gleaming through its translucent grayish brown skin. It circled round to the back of the anthill, paused a moment, then lifted its triangular head and tested the air with its long slender tongue. Conditions were ripe for a sneak attack.

Just at this moment, Goldie jerked to wakefulness and shrieked out her warning cry. The eight scatterbrained, unruly chicks charged out from their feathery sanctuary and careened into the bushes behind them. The serpent, naturally, had no intention of relinquishing his meal to the underbrush. But as he slithered toward the concealed delicacies, a sudden stab of pain racked his hinder part. Under its dolorous effect he snapped into a coil, whipped his head round, and lunged with split-second timing at Goldie.

The ensuing struggle pushed to the brink all the resources, stamina, and strength that both parties could ever hope to muster. In the beginning Goldie held the advantage with her forceful, lightning strikes at the serpent's neck. Fortunes shifted, though, when the snake swayed evasively before her, manoeuvring a position from whence he threw himself upon her neck and wrapped himself around twice like a rope. With stubborn determination, the two locked into a rapid crescendo of violence: the tighter the snake's stranglehold on Goldie, the more viciously did she tear at his hide; and the greater the pain she inflicted, the more intensely did the snake squeeze her throat.

It wasn't long before Goldie fell to the ground, but her brilliant yellow beak continued to rend the flesh of her opponent until at long last the snake relaxed his grip and dropped away like a length of limp twine.

Three crows alit upon a nearby branch and eyed the carcasses. Eight forlorn chicks huddled together in the underbrush and wailed in anguish.

Suddenly Goldie's body twitched, arid then twitched again, and then she clambered to her feet. There she stood, breast held high, neck extended loftily, head elevated with pride, the haughty attitude that had always marked her presence restored in full. Only her elegant neck was swollen, as if pumped up with air; and from it dangled the dead, taupe-coloured snake. And her white and brown feathers were scrambled together, sticking out in ghastly confusion. From a distance she appeared a fiendish monstrosity.

Startled at the apparition, the three crows flapped off to the accompaniment of their piercing, frightened caws. The eight chicks dashed out from underneath the bushes and crowded once again around their mother's warm belly. Finally Long Neck showed up on the heels of dusk. Glur-glurring in puzzlement, he circled the monstrosity. Then reaching out with his beak he grabbed hold of the snake and gave it a yank.

To his shock and amazement, the monstrosity toppled over onto the ground, stiff and dead, and turned out to be none other than his Goldie. A crowd of cheeping chicks suddenly bereft of their sanctuary scrambled for refuge under Long Neck's belly. Totally unprepared for this turn of events, Long Neck simply stood there, thunderstruck. Then as reality sunk in, he, in emulation of Goldie, spread out his wings to receive them. From this moment, Long Neck's carefree days of libertine wandering were over.

On this fine, sunny summer day, the little spring flowed in gentle tranquility, its crystal-clear waters kissing out strings of dimples as it passed over the silky smooth pebbles that lined its bed. Here and there a fallen leaf or two sported gleefully in the current, rising and diving with joyous abandon.

Lined up alongside the spring partaking of its waters were Plumella's four orphans. No longer were they little balls of down, Their legs had lengthened, their bodies had elongated, and their short little mouths had become long, sharp beaks that could produce the sound of preening feathers. However, long tails and stately horn-feathers still eluded them, nor had they yet developed the harmonious snow-white and coffee-brown coloration that was the hallmark of their species. They were still ugly, splotchy, yellow and coconut-brown chicks. Furthermore, it was as if they were doubly afflicted, for their comportment wholly resembled their appearance.

Especially did their image suffer in comparison with the chicks of other families, for then their graceless manner took on a positively oafish quality. The simple act of drinking became a shameful spectacle as they lifted their heads to swallow the sweet spring water filling their mouths only to have most of it dribble out disgustingly from both corners of their beaks. Other chicks could drink their fill with only eight or nine mouthfuls, while the heads of these four might dip and rise twenty times—thirty times—before they could even wet their throats.

Their feeding practices equally deserved ridicule. They limited their gleaning to grassy vegetation, thoroughly ignorant of the fact that ant larvae were the most delectable of foods. Even their vegetarian diet, though, displayed their benightedness. Naturally enough they would scoff down the succulent leaves of wild garlic, long-root onion, and wild leeks, as would anyone with half a brain; but they also browsed indiscriminately and happily among the insipid-tasting fare offered by flowering onion, Chinese pamassia, and Japanese spiraea.

For the past several days, they too, like all the other pheasant families, had been making their way gradually up the mountain, but it wasn't because they knew that the higher environs were cooler and more comfortable than those below. It was because they were following the current of the spring upstream in pursuit of its end—so they could walk around it and get to the other side. For they longed desperately to reach the adult pheasants whom they could hear calling and cooing over there.

Now the four chicks had stopped to get a drink, and as they occupied themselves with that endless dipping and raising of their heads, the sound of cooing again wafted over from the woods on the other side of the spring. Their attentions instantly consumed, the little Plumellas ceased their drinking and strained their widened round eyes upon the spot from where the sound emanated. When they caught a glimpse of a long, elegant, snow-white tail amid the deep green bushes, they all erupted into the frantic cheep-cheep-cheeping of desperate aspiration.

It may have been the noise of the flowing spring water, or perhaps the distance between them and the object of their desire, but the tail became smaller and smaller and the cooing fainter and fainter, until fmally one of the Plumellas impulsively thrust his long, slender legs into the spring. The current promptly pulled his feet out from under him, sending him head over heels into the water. He scrambled to his feet, shook the water from his body, spread out his short little wings, and plunged intrepidly ahead.

In the wink of an eye he landed on a protruding rock in the middle of the spring. On the bank the three other Plumellas watched in horrified fascination, cheeping away at the top of their lungs. The little valiant atop the rock showed off {or them, waving his head in a posture of cocksure pride before boldly diving headlong for the next rock. The waters between the two rocks treacherously chose that very moment to swirl into clutching curls, and he was at once hopelessly caught up in it: From the bank his siblings saw only a brownish-yellow whirlpool spiraling its way downstream and out of sight, leaving in its wake the thin lingering resonance of his cheeping, mordantly hovering over innocent, tranquil waters.

On the bank the remaining little Plumellas stood momentarily in stunned silence. Then they turned and lit out in pursuit of the brownish-yellow whirlpool, retracing their steps downstream. It was nightfall before disappointment and exhaustion finally drove them into the underbrush for shelter. But the rest and renewal they sought became hostage to the terror of the night. The moaning of the wind, the cry of a nocturnal creature, even the rustle of a falling leaf, all posed in the darkness as the handmaids of dread. These black hours they passed in merciless wakefulness, clotted together in a shivering wad.

The light of the new day arrived accompanied by the tantalizing cooing that beckoned as before from across the way. With its reaffirmation the three little Plumellas forgot their grief, and the terror surviving the deposed darkness evaporated as well. They skipped out from underneath the bushes, shook the dew from their immature feathers, and headed back upstream in the resumption of their original quest.

Perhaps it was in answer to their prayers that the stream suddenly narrowed to inviting proportions and offered in addition the convenience of a traversing rock, long and narrow like a bridge. Crying with joy the three Plumellas beat their short, little wings and fairly flew across. Once on the other side they headed straight away toward the place from where the cooing sound emanated.

It happened that at that very moment on the very path they had taken, there was proceeding with his stately, measured strides a tiger on his way to the spring for a drink. Suddenly a fleeting movement on the forest floor arrested his steps. He was certain he had seen something running sprightly—indeed three somethings—but now, strangely enough, they had transformed into a pile of decomposing coconut-brown leaves. He approached the pile with inquisitiveness, huge feet firmly, deliberately, treading circles round it. But not the slightest stir could he detect. Before the king of the mountain, all pledged their allegiance with total silence. His supremacy reaffirmed, the tiger roared in gratification and continued on his regal way to the spring.

Very gradually, very slowly, the forest came back to life. After the song birds resumed their twittering, and the cooing of the pheasants once more resounded through the trees, that pile of coconut-brown leaves moved ever so slightly. Then out from it emerged, very cautiously, very gingerly, a little Plumella. A moment later, from a spot about twenty inches away, a second Plumella poked his head out and looked around. All was peaceful. Not even a crow was in sight. The two little Plumellas cheeped elatedly, rejoicing at their narrow escape. But what about their nestmate? The two of them began digging into the leaves, tearing up mouthfuls with their beaks until, fmally, they found him.

But whether they had found a dead sibling or a live one was not at all clear. There he was lying in the damp dirt, ominously on his side, his soft feathers faded and dull, his thin legs straight and stiff. From his anus there protruded a mass of red and white and yellow and black intestines, covered with bits of leaves and earth. His eyes, though, were glittering, and his beak was twitching, as if he were making a mighty effort to swallow his pain. Now that he received notice that the danger had passed, he unleashed from, his throat a terrible scream of agony. It was a sound worthy of triggering temblors and sending leaves rustling to the ground, had he not been so small, and his two siblings could not help but shudder at the effort it must have cost him to maintain silence when that tiger stepped on him.

The injured Plumella worked his legs and twisted his body in an effort to get up, but the attempt sent him into convulsions. Grittily, he renewed the effort, not once but numerous times, until at last he overcame his infirmity and pulled himself to his feet. With the mass of intestines dragging behind him, he followed the two other Plumellas as they gravitated toward that cooing sound.

It wasn't long before they caught sight of a long, elegant snow-white tail swaying gracefully just up ahead. Augmented with notes of hope and elation, the pain-ridden cries of the injured chick grew louder. It caught the attention of two crows who had just alit upon a nearby branch to scout for some likely prey. Two Plumellas dove for cover under a clump of bushes, leaving not a trace of their presence. Burdened with his encumbrance, though, the injured one could not execute such a fleet manoeuvre, try as he might. When two sharp inky-black beaks pulled the mass of intestines out into a long bloody rope, that little entity who had so tenaciously clung to life disappeared with a heart-rending wail into the summer sky.

Autumn comes bearing its cornucopia of fruit. The wild David rose sets forth a profusion of little red calabashes. The wild hawthorn bends canopy-like under the weight of its ripening produce. The indigo berries of the cotoneaster mass into billowing lakes, while the purple-red Sabian crabapples mound up into ruby hills. Then, too, there are the sprawls and the heaps of gleaming golden buckthorn fruit that blanket the sunny slopes. Indeed Autumn comes bearing its cornucopia and pours into the emerald luxuriousness of Cloud Crowned Mountain the joy of the bounteous harvest and the felicity of “mellow fruitfulness.”

It was in this season of full-blown ripeness that the chicks finally matured into young adults. Their unsightly garb had fallen away, replaced by sartorial splendour. Their ungainly toddle had evolved into poised sedateness. No longer did their throats emit juvenile cheeps but instead produced the coos and calls of full-fledged roosters and hens. All the hours of their days they spent wandering in the company of their elders, infinitely proud of their accomplishments.

Among all of the pheasant families, it was likely Cock-A-Lock’s that had come closest to achieving perfect happiness. Cock-A-Lock with his powerful charisma and Phoenix with her commanding elegance had passed on to their children an eloquent fusion of their most desirable traits. All four of them possessed the long, intractable horn-feathers of their father and the long, sublimely glorious tail of their mother in a combination that truly reflected the ingeniousness of the Creator.

Underneath a short, pendulously weighted David rose tree, Cock-A-Lock was teaching three of the little Phoenixes how to leap up and pluck a fruit with their beaks. With head raised, neck arched, and eyes fixed intently upon the target, he bent his knees, stretched out his legs, spread his wings, and leaped. When he returned to the ground, his beak was holding a bright, shiny red fruit. Thoroughly engaged by this performance, the three Phoenixes eagerly flung themselves at the tree’s enticing bounty.

Their impatience and lack of discipline, however, only reaped them exhaustion. Up they would leap and down they would drop, over and over, until they flopped scattered and panting on the ground with nothing to show for it. Cock-A-Lock demonstrated again. He leaped up three consecutive times, enthralling the three Phoenixes once more with his powerful agility, with the exquisitely arcing curve of his soaring ascent, and, especially, with those spiny rose fruits that he rolled over to them, one to each.

Finally, one of the little Phoenixes succeeded in capturing one of the red dollops, inciting thereby a flurried onrush from the other two, who were intent upon proving their own deservedness. The three of them wadded up into a squabbling ball every bit as dynamically indecorous as those of their elders before them. The object of their contention rolled about elusively in the melee, escaping here, dodging there, until it rolled right up to the impassively observing Cock-A-Lock. .

As the three little Phoenixes watched in dismay, Cock-A-Lock made it disappear down his throat. Their disappointment was palpable. And yet when Cock-A-Lock sprang up once more to pluck another mouthful for himself, it finally dawned on them that squabbling was unnecessary, for more than enough for everybody hung right overhead, free for the taking. And so, underneath the red rose tree, four vibrant, resplendently endowed pheasants bounded successively, unceasingly, into the air, performing the joyous dance of the bountiful harvest.

Under the verdant shade of a nearby dragon spruce, two other Phoenixes, an elder and a younger, lay in a serene tableau. The elder, who had become painfully scrawny under the rigours of reproduction and brooding, was now completely restored to her former glory, having eaten fully of Autumn’s nutritious opulence. Her feathers glowed vividly, and from every angle her bearing displayed the highest standards of grace.

But her beauty paled next to the offspring beside her. This youngest of the little Phoenixes scintillated in even richer, more vibrant tones, her carriage surpassed that of her mother in noblesse and delicate refinement, and those two high, inset tail feathers resembled flowing silk streamers upon which had been fastened dark chocolate-brown plumes, dragging lengthily behind her in serpentine sumptuousness.

While this magnificently trailing tail was an endowment that justified exceptional pride, it also inflicted upon the littlest Phoenix unanticipated aggravation. The three other little Phoenixes had been passing their nights perched in a tree for a week now. She, though, always found her ascent sabotaged by her ponderous tail, which would invariably drag her down before she could reach the lowest branch. This meant that she had to continue spending her nights on the ground, where the dangers were infmitely greater.

Thus it was that, while her siblings were revelling in their newly acquired talent to relieve a tree of its fruit, she was brooding over her miserable failure.

Perhaps it was because she doted on this most beautiful of her children, or perhaps it was just in her nature as a mother, Phoenix always exercised greater patience with this, her youngest. Now she stood up, signalling to her softly, and she stretched her neck high, pressed her tail down, and leaped into the air with beating wings. Airily as a cloud, it seemed, she landed with perfect balance on a horizontal branch suspended six feet above the ground. Then, with her long tail in tow, she leaped with flapping wings from branch to branch, spiraling her way upward, until she appeared at the very top, thirty feet in the air.

The little Phoenix watching from below gaped in awe at her mother's cool, wind-blown poise, her lovely, lyrical body language, her lofty, commanding air of supremacy. Then mustering every nerve and sinew she sprang up in emulation toward the branch.

Again the tail dragged her down before she achieved half the distance.

Dejected, the little Phoenix lay slumped on the ground, showing no desire to ever again rise to her feet. Soon, the other three Phoenixes, fruit-filled and satisfied, came trooping back and espied their sister in her state of gloom. Deliberately, they held their bulging craws high and circled round their stunningly beautiful but exceedingly clumsy sister, and they shouted and sang and hopped and pranced, as if gleefully celebrating her misfortune. Then one of them rose up into the air and alit upon the dragon spruce, from where she engaged the other two in a polyphonic capriccio. With modulating tones and shifting speeds, the trio exuberantly performed their concert, as if to taunt their sister with their success.

Finally provoked, the littlest Phoenix rose with a jerk and lashed out at the two on the ground. At first the two simply dodged and parried, teasingly hedging circles around her. Then out of boredom, or perhaps because dusk was approaching, they fanned their wings and flew up into the tree. With an air of triumph the three young bullies spiraled their way to the top and snuggled on perches next to Mother Phoenix.

She whom they left on the ground all badgered and bothered just stood there, confounded. Then suddenly she sprang to life, and in an explosion of flapping wings she propelled her body upward, reaching, stretching with all her might, and landed squarely upon that elusive six-foot high branch. Her unexpected success elicited excited cries of congratulation from both Big Phoenix, high on her perch, and Cock-A-Lock down below. Little Phoenix, however, had not yet stabilized her perch, and she teetered tentatively, breathlessly in the air, before tumbling headlong back to the ground.

It was that tail of hers again, so beautiful but way too long, so long that it robbed her of balance. However, there was no doubt about it, she had achieved something this evening: Heartened by her progress, Cock-A-Lock levitated into the tree, demonstrating for her the epitome of correct form and the technique of guaranteed success. Little Phoenix's self-confidence soared and she threw herself into the task with renewed energy. Upward she strived for the branch, and back she flopped, but undaunted she tried again, and again—and again, until it was all too clear that defeat would not unleash her this night. For the evening mist had enveloped the jade green tree in a foggy bluish screen, transforming the branch she sought into a phantom limb. Unable to retain its image, she could not achieve it, tail or no tail. The unlucky little Phoenix would be obliged to spend another night on the ground.

And so it was that Big Phoenix in a flap of wings came fluttering down from her lofty perch to accompany her daughter through the hours of the night. For the pheasant forebears had decreed that a mother was to stay on the ground until the last of her chicks had made it into the tree. With the grace of Heaven, this, she hoped, would be the last such night.

A curtain of darkness fell and extinguished the forms of all that surrounded them. Nothing existed, not the stars nor the moon, not the heavens nor the earth, not the tree nor the spring. The entire universe, it seemed, had reverted to the ultimate, inky void of Chaos. In this boundless precinct of black-shrouded silence crept the evils pervading the cosmos: death, pestilence, unabating cold, all the terrors of Nature and all the hair-raising demons slipped out of their supernatural realm.

Finally a wisp of fog became discernable in the wood, and the horizon disclosed a smudge of morning light; the sky and the earth reappeared, and the forest came back to life. At the top of the dragon spruce, Cock-A-Lock awoke and murmured to the three little Phoenixes. Softly they replied and soon four feather clouds flapped their way down from the tree.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" Cock-A-Lock resonantly announced the arrival of a new day. This was the day that the littlest Phoenix would achieve her perch in the tree. From this day forward the Cock-A-Lock family could be gether all the time and never have to be separated at night again.

But the answer to Cock-A-Lock's hope-imbued greeting was silence. There was nothing to do but lead the three little Phoenixes on a search for those lazy sleeping beauties.

Next to a dense clump of bushes enveloped in a thick, marbled fog lay sprawled on their sides two unsurpassingly beautiful pheasants. Their long tail plumes spread their splendour on the ground like misty clouds. Their red coral feet stretched out straight as if employed in a painstaking search for something. Their black-brown wings were spread open in a posture of deep, dreamless slumber. Their red jade-like beaks were slightly ajar in the manner of one talking in her sleep. Through the floating, curling layers of fog they appeared ethereal and otherworldly, especially around the neck, where the snow-white horn-feathers that originated under their chins now gleamed like crimson necklaces.

The worldly, experienced Cock-A-Lock was immediately seized with alarm and rushed to examine those crimson necklaces. Just as he feared, the ground underneath them was encrusted with drops of coagulated blood. How well he knew he was looking at the victims of a leopard cat, who had stolen up to them under cover of night and sucked dry their arteries.

Overwhelmed by this sudden loss, Cock-A-Lock stretched out his long neck and wailed his grief to the heavens. It was a silent wail, though, for while his mouth opened and closed over and over again, no sound came from his throat. This head rooster whose commanding calls had resounded throughout the territory had become, in the flash of a tragic instant, a mute.

The three little Phoenixes gently nuzzled the body of their sister, as if they had completely forgotten the hard time they had given her the evening before. It took a long time for them to be convinced that their poor little nestmate would never rise nor ever vent her anger upon them again. With this realization they whimpered and drew close to Cock-A-Lock, pouring out to him their grief and seeking from him reassurance against the dread that had crept into their hearts.

All this time Cock-A-Lock stood silently next to Phoenix. Only when the little Phoenixes gathered round him did he finally awaken from his grief-stricken reverie. At the moment he turned his head to face them, his intractable horn-feathers suddenly drooped to either side of his head, like the blades of broken swords. And from that time they never stood on end again.

The air became brisk and cool. An incandescent sky soared to new-found heights. The alpine wind blew chilly and biting. The oak trees flamed red, the birches turned purple, poplars melted into golden yellow, and larches shimmered in chartreuse. Their leaves came fluttering down, mixing together into rainbow whirlpools as they sought new niches to call home. Black storks, kingfishers, nightingales, and red-tailed water mynahs flocked off to seek warmth in the south. Hawks, falcons, red-necked flycatchers, and white-capped buntings moved in, coveting the invigorating environment Cloud Crowned Mountain offered them. In anticipation of the rigorous winter to come, all living things were resetting their rhythms of life.

The pheasants, too, were engaged in this seasonal adjustment as they began departing from their high-altitude summer home to head for their sunny slope below. The forest rang out with the calls of pheasant families signalling to other pheasant families. The thickets lining their route teemed with figures rushing along their way. Along the banks of the spring that the four Plumells had once followed upstream, there now trooped a long procession of pheasants headed downstream.. The old rooster walking tall before them had an exceptionally long and lustrous black neck. Following close behind him clustered ten vigorous, spirited youngsters, eight of them with brilliant yellow beaks, and two whose wings were adorned with multicoloured plumes. Of course, this was none other than Long Neck' enormous family. That libertine Long Neck—no-one would have believed that he would raise a family of ten!

It had not been easy for him. The amounts of time, effort and mental energy required for the undertaking had taxed him enormously. The daylight hours mandated surpassing discrimination in choosing a playground for the little Goldies: a water supply, a copious variety of victuals, and a ready place to take cover were all imperative to an appropriate site. Even then, letting his guard down for even a moment could prove to be fatal, so he stood in constant vigilance against landbound and airborne dangers alike.

No less exacting was the task of ferreting out a secure nighttime retreat. The measure of his effort lay in the evidence of his success, for his choices proved impregnable: the underside of a precipice tucked behind a roaring waterfall, for instance, or a tree hole camouflaged under an artful arrangement of dead branches.

But the toughest job of all was the one that came with the arrival of the little Plumellas. One can easily imagine the ebullience and joy with which those two poor little beleaguered orphans flung themselves at him. Yet eight sharp yellow beaks lined up belligerently, like a breast-work of razor-edged knives, to block their way. The eight little Goldies had unsurprisingly inherited their mother's conceit, so in their minds it was simply impossible to allow just any riffraff into their exclusive circle. Eyes aglare, eight surrounded two with malignant intent, while two faced eight, united back to back in a brave but hopeless stance of self-defence.

Into this tense encirclement Long Neck suddenly thrust his beak and gave a firm if harmless peck to the biggest of the eight. With that the offense disintegrated and the eight congregated to one side, cheeping querulously. And so it was that the two Plumellas were saved, and with a mixture of anguish and relief they rushed under Long Neck's wings.

Long Neck's family, of course, had already been the largest on Cloud Crowned Mountain, and this expansion only increased the rigours of his responsibilities. The little Goldies, always and ever the object of his protective instincts, now became the subjects of vigilance as well, for they constantly sought to harass the newcomers, and one never knew what they might be capable of.

As if that were I not enough additional burden, he discovered that the two pitiful little creatures were sorely in need of remedial education. Their drinking habits were atrocious (not to mention inefficient); they had no idea how to properly feed themselves; and ants were things they ran away from. Patiently he back-tracked to the first stages of infancy and taught them the rudiments.

The eight little Goldies, of course, having learned all these things long ago from their mother, would cluster nearby and cheep uproariously in derision, or they would rush up and muscle them out of the spot where they were eating or drinking. But this very behaviour proved a favourable stimulus to the two little Plumellas, and they learned all the more quickly. Their innate intelligence indeed served them well here. As the days slipped by, the chicks shed their unsightly down and donned their splendid raiment. And through the clashes and squabbles of childhood and the mounting days and nights of togetherness, their relationship eventually evolved into one of endearment and close-knit familial harmony.

Now as Long Neck's brigade approached a bend in the spring, they found Cock-A-Lock and the three Phoenixes refreshing themselves on the opposite bank. With much excitement the two families hailed each other, confirming their delight in a performance of leaps and bounds. The new generation had matured at a time when malevolent winter sat poised at the edge of the equinox, reviving the imperative of alliances.

The three Phoenixes spread their ample wings, and with their long tail plumes floating behind, they fluttered across the spring to Long Neck's side. Their extravagantly fit and vigorous forms, the subtly curving contours of their bodies, enthralled all those watching them, young and old alike. Especially the two Plumellas, who walked together to the edge of the water with wide and wondering eyes.

How strange it was: that impassable chasm seething with turbulent waters had shrunk to little more than a shallow, narrow ribbon! They turned their heads to look at the three exuberant Phoenixes, then turned again to look at the spring with its tiny, lapping ripples. Suddenly, in near-perfect sync, the Plumellas 6pened their wings, pressed down their tails, and with an effervescent flutter crossed to the other side, landing with smooth precision next to Cock-A-Lock. This was a great discovery for the Plumellas, and they congratulated themselves with excited cries and kissing pecks to each other's beaks. Then they lifted off once more to celebrate their new-found skill, back and forth, back and forth, tirelessly.

Long Neck's black neck snapped up straight in surprise and wonder at this sudden, uncharacteristic behaviour on the part of the Plumellas, while the Goldies turned nonchalantly away, disdaining to even watch. Only the spring understood them as its waters flowed along softly in a rhapsody of colour reflected from their bodies flying overhead.

Only after the Plumellas finally settled down did Cock-A-Lock himself leap to the other side. He stretched his neck toward Long Neck and opened his mouth, but did not utter a sound. Ever since Phoenix and their child met their tragic deaths, neither had his horn-feathers stood back up, nor had he regained his sonorous voice.

The two families joined forces and continued on downstream with the two old roosters in the lead. As they proceeded, other pheasant families joined them, and their ranks rapidly and steadily swelled to exodus proportion. By the time they arrived at that slope where Cock-A-Lock had guided—even forced—the collective into dispersal, there were enough of them to turn its grassy surface once again into a black-brown sea.

The white rock in the centre upon which Cock-A-Lock had lain still remained vacant. Needless to say, his sadly diminished condition meant he would not mount it again. So the question now was, who would transfonn this motley assemblage into an effectively functioning collective body? The black-brown sea began to churn and a disorderly clamour rose from it as malcontent bubbled to the surface and conflicts erupted among rival families. With post on the rock left unfilled—with this vacuum in leadership—a free-for-all was clearly in the making, that could only end with the decimation of the flock.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Three resounding cries commandeered the air, and Long Neck flew resolutely onto the rock. There he stood tall, wrapped in an aura of sleek, serious majesty, as if proclaiming the birth of a new dynasty .

The dark mass below fell into a stunned silence, but only momentarily before bursting into a fit of savagery and swarming toward the rock as if intent upon taking out Long Neck in an inundation of pheasant flesh. In the midst of the paroxysm, several exceptionally sturdy-looking roosters squeezed to the foot of the rock, long sharp beaks menacingly poised for an attack.

Atop the rock, Long Neck stood dispassionately, awesome in his authoritative righteousness. Since he had dared to take the head rooster's throne, there was no sense in relinquishing it now. The materializing battle was at the brink of its outbreak when ten brash, quick-witted Goldies and Plumellas threw up a tight cordon around Long Neck's throne. Fanned around the rock and facing outward, they stood in nerveless bravery, like a contingent of loyal palace guards, and glared daggers at the insurgents.

With that the latter backed down, their gambit over, and the crowd with its awful surging power settled down into a model of docility.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" Head Rooster Long Neck thundered out his command.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!" The flock gathered round the rock. Faced with the cruelties of the impending winter, faced with the prospect of extinction, these vulnerable pheasants could only rely upon their own unity to see them through.

The snow arrived with the dawn. Flakes as soft. and fluffy as eiderdown glinted in the auroral light as they descended thickly and languorously. By the time the landscape was bathed in the full, cloud-filtered light of day, the trees, the slope, the spring—all of Cloud Crowned Mountain—had wrapped itself in a thick snowy coat.

In a towering, needle less larch, Head Rooster Long Neck awoke. In ordinary times, he would at once lead the flock down out of the tree. Today, though, confronted with the unusual weather, he hesitated. The pheasants all around him were barely discernible, the only indication of their existence being the presence of all the strange, snowy, roly-poly entities that the tree seemed to have sprouted overnight.

The snow was still falling thickly, incorrigibly blocking out the sun, though the sky managed to gradually brighten. Long Neck shook himself free of his new white blanket and called out gently to his flock. The pudgy snowballs trembled, the long, slender popsicles on which they sat began to shiver and creak, and the entire tree erupted lingeringly into rustling, billowing, alabaster clouds. When the clouds dispersed, the popsicles had been miraculously transformed into brown branches, and the pudgy snowballs had become elegant, gorgeous long-tailed pheasants.

Spreading his tail, Long Neck launched himself into the air and glided down to a patch of open ground about two hundred yards away. As he alit, there arced into the sky out of the sixty-foot larch a torrential swath of brown that crackled and ruffled and whooshed deafeningly with the tumult of flapping wings, emblazoning the ghostly canopy of heaven with a magnificent chocolate rainbow. Like a tempestuous arching waterfall, it cascaded to the ground as if vying with the descending snow for the extravaganza of the year. The floating eiderdown flakes wavered in its wake, while upon the landscape awash in white it added the delicate touch that turned Nature's canvas into a masterpiece.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Long Neck signalled for the foraging expedition to begin. Former leader Cock-A-Lock walked at his side, as vigorous and proud as ever despite his truncated horn-feathers and expired voice.

During its circuitous wandering over the wild, white landscape, the army of foragers came upon a southerly slope, where it halted in . uncertainty; for in its path there lay countless little piles of snow that so discomfitingly resembled graves that the youngest members spread their wings in an impulse to flee.

Worldly wise Cock-A-Lock, however, continued to advance, and Long Neck, remembering something from the autumn, accompanied him. Almost simultaneously they flew up onto two of the graves, where with much violent gyration and shaking and flapping, they sent clouds of snow surging and spiraling into the air. When the swirling crystalline nebula they stirred up subsided, a miraculous sight greeted the eyes of the flock: two dashing roosters standing atop two heavily laden, gleaming, golden buckthorn trees. This metamorphosis of graves into mounds of food sent an electrifying wave of exhilaration through the exhausted flock.

When the subsequent raucous, billowing cloud of snow disappeared, the expanse of white graves had been replaced by a scene of a hundred or so elegant pheasants sitting upon as many brilliant yellow buckthorns, extending their black necks desultorily about them and plucking golden balls with their red jade-like beaks. As the resilient canopies upon which they lay quavered with their movement. bits of leftover snow slipped idyllically to the ground, while wispy tail plumes fluttered languidly in aceompaniment. Framed against the vast sky and the sweeping snowy slopes, the scene coalesced into a composition worthy of an artist's attention.

On the banquet's borders strolled Long Neck, Cock-A-Lock, and several other sturdily built roosters, carrying out another anciently decreed duty, that of applying the skills gained in guarding one's family to the good of the entire flock. Barred from joining the banquet scene themselves, they were limited to savouring it from afar. Even during the process of foraging, they had had to focus their attention upon the surroundings, the ground as well as the sky, for the approach of an enemy could be sudden, swift and deadly for those caught off their guard. Such was the price of taking the throne and of being endowed with superior physical strength.

In the afternoon, the sky suddenly split into two. On one side it glowered blackly, on the other side it gleamed in yellow. The wind died, the clouds hung motionless, the snowy expanses dulled to a gloomy gray, the bushes and trees stood as still as death. Pitch-black crows brushed past the tree branches like spectres, long-tailed squirrels scurried into tree holes, and across the snowy ground there fled leopards, tigers, leopard cats. As the black and yellow halves maintained a stalemate, the myriad creatures of earth and sky panicked at their premonition of disaster.

Long Neck, too, felt the urgency of these ominous signs and led his charges back up into the giant larch. But how much protection could its sparse branches afford them? Those branches were now continuously shedding globules of snow dislodged by the hundred or so pheasants who perched upon them, whimpering and shifting their feet in anxiety-laden suspense.

Finally, a darkening cyclone appeared out of the umbrageous sky, assaulting all in its path with its arsenal of blinding snow and stinging sleet. For three days and three nights it rampaged through the trees, dumped mountains upon the slopes, and hammered brutally at the imprudent creatures that dared to exist on the face of the earth. On it raged, unmitigated, until it had snuffed out all signs of life and silenced the cries of the pheasants—until the only living things that seemed to remain in the universe were inorganic objects made of congealed water droplets.

Can such things be? Is it really possible for violent forces to destroy that which lives while breathing life into that which is inanimate?

The fourth day, at last, belonged to the glorious, blazing sun. Pale, puffy clouds scudded across the sky, while a delicate breeze wafted over the newborn landscape below. The sleet that had run rampant during the dark stormy days now sat in deathly silence waiting to be melted back into water. Here and there on the mountain slope, crows, squirrels, leopard cats, tigers re-emerged into the open. The radiance of the sun was giving back to the myriad creatures the original aspects of their lives.

Up in the larch, Long Neck started to move, but his feet seemed to be stuck to his branch, while his wings felt as if they had been trussed up. He sounded the wake-up call to the members of the flock anyway, then began to twist about in an ungainly fashion until he had limbered up his cold, stiff body and was able to make his fluttering trip down out of the tree. This time, however, no cascading rainbow followed upon his descent. Indeed, it was not until the sun had reached its zenith that the pheasants began trickling in twos and threes down to his side. Then they started crying in hunger.

Surely Long Neck, too, was suffering .from hunger and cold. And yet when he had taken inventory of the ranks, he did not lead them out on their foraging expedition. Rather, he called out loudly and headed back to the larch in which they had ridden out the storm. The flock followed reluctantly behind. There they discovered twenty or so pheasants still scattered through the branches, fast asleep, two in tight embrace.

Furiously, the pheasants on the ground called out to them. Long Neck flew up into the tree and gave a fierce peck to those two old ones sleeping in embrace. To his consternation, they plummeted to the ground like a rock and split into two upon impact. They hadn’t been embracing after all, but rather had been frozen together by ice and snow. It was then that it became apparent that although all the other pheasants in the tree looked very much alive, in actuality their souls had long ago fled to Heaven.

Those who were still alive hung their heads in sorrow. In the act of bowing their heads, they discovered yet another horror. Here and there in the thick crust of snow were grotesque heads stretching upward, broken and battered feet sticking up, and bloody mangled wings spread open. It was as if countless suffering souls in hell were struggling to crawl out of their icy pits to grab the souls of those still living on earth. Pandemonium broke loose among the living flock as pheasants cried out in terror, leaped about in agitation, and fled back to the open ground. There they crowded close together in a shivering mass.

Long Neck was still up in the tree, contemplating the bodies, and then he studied those on the ground as well, as if he were making a body count. After he flew back down out of the tree and was walking toward the flock, he was arrested by the sight of a particular head sticking up out of the snow. Although it was disfigured beyond recognition, its bright yellow beak made it clear that this was one of Goldie’s progeny.

Long Neck stopped and very carefully began to dig the body out. The snow crust was frozen hard as a rock, and even when he attacked it violently, he only managed to chip up a few flakes of ice. But he was patient, very patient, and he continued pecking away at it, unremittingly.

Just when the pitiful little Goldie was nearly freed, Long Neck received a ruthless peck on his wing. He jerked his head around and discovered Cock-A-Lock's bright piercing eyes fixed upon him. Long Neck returned to his toil, only to receive another peck on his neck. This time he flared in anger and lashed fiercely back at Cock-A-Lock. To his surprise Cock-A-Lock did not respond in kind, but rather sped off back to the flock.

When Long Neck pursued him to the open ground where the flock was waiting, he at once came to his senses. For his charges, who had received a shocking fright and had suffered a long period of cold and hunger as well, had already collapsed en masse on the ground. They had not even the strength to stand up anymore. Indeed, some were already dead.

But the others still strove for life, and this being the case, could Long Neck afford the luxury of immersing himself in personal grief?.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Long Neck uttered three cries of encouragement to his enfeebled flock. What he had to do most urgently was to get them straight to that buckthorn grove where its profusion of sweet golden fruit was the only thing that could save them.

The cruelty of the Ruler of Heaven is that he often does not provide enough for his creatures on earth. Filled with confidence and hope, Long Neck led his cold and hungry ranks to the buckthorn grove, and although the pheasants physically languished in the grip of exhaustion, they followed him with energetic spirits. Upon their arrival at the site of their yearnings, however, they stopped dead in their tracks, dismayed at what assaulted their eyes.

On the vast expanse of whiteness there gaped an open wound infested with a taunting jumble of stark, steel-gray branches. Nowhere was there any sign that those branches had ever borne a single fruit.

A disheartened mutter rose from the ranks as the pheasants voiced their crushed disappointment. Long Neck himself looked about in puzzlement, wondering if he had led his group to the wrong place. But no, there was their old friend, the Sabian crabapple tree, standing as ever alongside the buckthorn grove.

Having retrieved his bearings, Long Neck threw himself into the next course of action. Over to the base of a buckthorn tree he went and proceeded to dig aggressively in the snow. At first his efforts seemed futile, for all that his beak flung off to the side was snow and more snow. Undeterred, he continued uprooting the white stuff until, at last, at a depth of over a foot, he struck gold.

The starving flock swarmed upon the site, and the space between the mute expanse of white and the grim welter of steel-gray, became animated with a seething black-brown swath. Black necks rose and fell, long beaks furiously assailed the snow. Clearly, digging for treasure was much more taxing than sitting atop a canopy and plucking the tree's willing fruit. Fortune now played her impartial game, distributing her treasures ruthlessly at random. The strong ones who hit bottom with nothing to show for it could draw upon their reserves of energy to try again.

But for the weak, unable to sustain the strenuous effort required, an empty hand on the first try would likely spell their doom. Those fatigued to the edge of prostration could not even hedge their bets, for after a short spate of digging, they would sink limply to the ground and look lamely upon the snow, sighing in exhausted resignation. Still others would risk everything on a single throw, pouring out all their reserves in the pursuit of the timely morsel, only to keel over stone dead before having the chance to savour it.

The rate at which those black necks rose and fell soon began to diminish, while the numbers of those sitting listlessly upon the snow waiting to die increased steadily. Alarmed at the rapidly deteriorating situation, Long Neck raised his head and twisted his long, long neck about, as if seeking a divinity to alleviate the crisis. Then his eye fell upon the Sabian crabapple tree. And he remembered how that spring Cock-A-Lock had saved the panicky flock with the ruby fruit of this very tree.

Long Neck wasted no more time. He spread his wings and launched himself into flight, ascending like a cloud to the branches of the tree. It was just as he thought. Among its burly branches hung string upon string of lustrous purple-red berries.

Without a moment to lose, Long Neck plucked the longest, reddest string and threw it down to the flock below. It was like tossing a lighted match into a pool of gasoline. Those who had resigned themselves to death were the first to react. As if absent spirits had leaped back into their bodies, they sprang to their feet, sprinted for the tree, and fell rapacious upon the string of berries, ravenously tearing it apart. Then those who were deeply immersed in their digging discovered that easier pickings were to be had, and they too thronged toward the tree. Up in the branches Long Neck worked feverishly to satisfy them, but their voraciousness overwhelmed his capability.

The result was a re-enactment of last spring's free-for-all as each string he tossed to them elicited a knock-down, drag-out struggle over the fruit. All the brawling mini-mobs sent snowflakes and feathers dancing and fluttering into the air in a scene that moved the mountains with its perverse beauty. Here the flames of life that had been nearly snuffed out roared up again in dazzling radiance, and all the potential of that life, retrieved from the brink of annihilation, set forth once more upon the path of realization.

It's hard to say whether it was a test devised by God, or whether it was simply the uncanny tendency of misfortune to come in droves.

Appearing in the sky like a bank of black clouds was a giant golden eagle, who cast its terrifying shadow over the pheasants.

The first to notice its approach was Long Neck. As he scrambled to descend from the Sabian crabapple tree, he cried out to his charges. The flock of squabbling pheasants froze in the midst of their engagements, then gravitated into one large contingent and headed apace for a dense stand of wild willows. Simultaneously, Cock-A-Lock and seven light-footed roosters of martial appearance, who had been standing guard duty, closely followed upon Long Neck's heels as he sped toward a swath of high open ground. They raced along, necks craned towards the sky, screaming out their brazen defiance.

The eagle began his circling descent, scouting out his prey. Against the driven whiteness of an open tract of land, the brown forms of eight swiftly moving creatures dragging long tails stood out in striking contrast, as bold and incautious as disembodied spirits. Their proud, tall postures and their loud, concerted cries looked very much like an insolent challenge to combat. The eagle abandoned the flock of pheasants retreating towards the stand of wild willows, and veered abruptly upon the open tract, swooped into attack position, and plummeted toward the one with the most obnoxiously piercing voice and the most powerful gait, Head Rooster Long Neck.

But by the time the eagle discovered that he had come away with only snow in his talons, Long Neck had dropped out of sight. About fifteen feet away from the original spot a black-footed rooster was craning his neck toward the heavens bellowing out his war song as if ridiculing the foolishness of the raptor in the sky.

The eagle flapped its wings and climbed back up into the blue zenith, then plunged back down toward Black Foot. Again he ended up with only the debris of the frozen landscape, while Black Foot, too, had disappeared. Again at a distance of fifteen feet, another rooster, one with broken horn feathers, was standing motionless. Twice the eagle had botched it, and to make things worse that rooster with the broken horn-feathers looked like such a weakling.

Impetuousness conceived in anger took over, and instead of remounting into the sky, the eagle pumped his gigantic wings and lit out after Cock-A-Lock in snowy landbound pursuit. Unfortunately, while this giant bird of prey was capable of covering hundreds of miles a day in the air, it was no match for the swiftness and agility of a pheasant on the ground. When Cock-A-Lock transformed into yet another aggressive-looking rooster, the eagle's confidence in his powers of perception evaporated and he agitatedly vaulted into the air and lunged out and charged about in blind, chaotic confusion. Cock-A-Lock and his seven underling's, meanwhile, became ever adept at their nimble manoeuvres as they taunted him with their elusiveness.

After about twenty rounds like this, the eagle tired and had no choice but to retreat to his lofty realm. There he glided in circles on the wind currents, looking down in exasperation at the fragile little creatures below. In his right talon he clutched the only booty he had gained in the skirmish: an elegant, snow-white tail plume.

Though the eagle had risen high into the sky, the eight roosters regarded their victory as far from unconditional. Tail to tail they formed a circle, craned their necks to face upwards, and in unison howled at their aggressor. Only when they had hooted him off to distant realms would the flock be able to retrieve some peace in their lives.

The eagle, though, was not the least bit moved by all their strenuous clamour. The blizzard that had raged for three days and three nights had left him as bad off as the pheasants, and it wasn't any easier for him to allay his hunger pains in the vast wasteland of snow than it was for them. So up in the vault of heaven he hovered quiescently on the air currents, recuperating and gathering his strength for a renewed attack. Not until he had stuffed one of those bouncing jouncing delicacies into his stomach would he be satisfied.

By this time the flock of pheasants lay hidden in the willow grove, where the dark brown of the branches blended with their coloration to make them nearly invisible. Their presence, though, was clearly manifested in the occasional fluttering motion of a long tail plume. Still, to drop out of the sky and into the grove to pick one off without getting tangled in the jumble of branches was an unlikely scenario. That is to say, within the eagle's field of vision, the only possibility of a meal lay with those eight roosters maintaining their circular defence in the middle of that open tract.

And now it was clear that those eight roosters were sneakily making their way toward the willow grove. If he didn't make his move soon, his opportunity would be lost.

Though he hadn't yet completely recovered his strength, the eagle prepared to chance it. From down below, all that was apparent had been his precipitous ascent and subsequent disappearance into the firmament. But then, just when the pheasants, convinced of their success, had broken up their formation and were heading like demobilized soldiers toward the willow grove, thatcrafiy eagle suddenly re-emerged from a bank of clouds and dove straight for them, with the speed of lightning it seemed.

He had caught the roosters off their guard. Their former unified chorus of cries now became squawking screams of terror, and there was no way that they could redeploy their tactic of methodical serial harassment. With this sudden crisis on their heads, in which each rooster was equally vulnerable, Cock-A-Lock banked on the wisdom of his vast experience and resolutely stood his ground. Like a fine sword suddenly unsheathed, his faded horn-feathers shot up into the air once more. And with a surge of energy, his long muted voice burst into a piercing, resounding cry. With his neck outstretched and his feathers bristling, he leaped abruptly ahead, and in the second before the eagle reached him, he vaulted into the air and delivered a ruthless peck to his left eye.

This time it was the eagle who was caught off guard. He shrieked with agony, and a viscous purplish-black liquid ran out of his left eye socket. Maddened by the excruciating pain, he raised his huge talons and struck the old rooster on the back with the force of all his might. Cock-A-Lock thudded to the ground. As he struggled to raise himself up in flight once more, the eagle dropped right on top of him, pressing him down with the weight of the mountains, and prepared to eat him alive.

At the moment his sharp, hooked talons were poised to clamp upon Cock-A-Lock's body, though, his right eye suddenly went black, and his neck was clinched from the side by a long, red jade-like beak.

It was the beak of Long Neck.

This forced the eagle to abandon the prey already in his clutches and devote his attention to Long Neck. With his sharp claws he seized Long Neck by the breast and held him with grim resolve, but that beak clamped upon his neck did not relax its grip one iota. Thus it was that a ferocious raptor and a fragile pheasant became entangled together as hopelessly as if someone had dipped them in a pot of glue.

On that open snowy tract a brown ball trundled about, attended by an entourage of dancing feathers. From it there emitted no cries, while the parties that made it up strained one against the other in steely determination. The strong and the weak, the attacker and the attacked, had melded into one, no longer distinguishable to the eye of the observer. Their life and death struggle flaunted its incongruity against the dignity and serenity of the snow-white mountains. The flock of pheasants emerged from its cover in the willow grove and gathered round to watch the drama, uniformedly impotent to affect its outcome.

On that smooth, uninterrupted snow tract the brown feather ball proceeded to roll along, and the more it rolled the tighter it became, and the more it rolled the farther it went, as if it would roll right on to the ends of the earth. And so when it rolled to the top of a cliff, just like that, without further ado, it rolled right over the edge.

As it descended toward the rocks far below, the huge feather ball whipped up whirlwinds, and the whirlwinds in turn slammed it against the sharp, projecting rocks of the escarpment wall. Time and again it collided, and time and again it bounced back out, each concussion eliciting sharp cries and sending feathers flying in profusion. Still loathe to loosen their grip for the slightest of seconds, the two tightly maintained their ball, locked together like implacable avenging ghosts, all the way to the bottom, when the force of the impact finally split them apart.

The eagle was impaled on a sharp rock, his neck perversely twisted to one side. His left eye was a bloody mass while his right eye was wide open and staring, as if he could neither believe nor accept his defeat. About six feet away lay Long Neck, the white flesh of his breast exposed, most of his feathers torn away by the jagged rocks. His red beak was ajar and quivering. His eyes fluttered open and he saw the eagle, frozen in the rage of his unacceptance, and he murmured a nearly inaudible glur-glurring response. He wriggled his feet and tried to stand up, but his body failed to obey. He moved his head, looked at the sky and stretched out his neck.

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

Long Neck's final, and most resounding, cry finally burst forth from his throat. It reverberated to the top of the cliff, carrying to his charges the spirit of invincibility and the sympathy of the dying for those left behind.

The pheasants, amassed in a dark patch at the edge of the cliff, had at last attained a vestige of peace. Now they stood there as silent and still as statues. Was it shock, or was it grief that held them there in mute abeyance? Or had the head rooster's death left them paralyzed with uncertainty?

It started to snow. The fluttering flakes imparted to this world of dead repose an element of animation. Penetrating the atmosphere laden with snow and silence came the distant echoing roars of big cats and the cawing of crows.

A tremour of restlessness rippled through the flock. It soon escalated into a turmoil, with pheasants milling about, calling out gratuitously, pointlessly beating their wings. It was then that that fine specimen of martial magnificence, Black Foot, flew onto a nearby rock and sounded a demand for attention:

"Gua! Gua! Gua!"

The dispassion of Nature had ushered in a new era of leadership, and the flock settled down and submitted to Black Foot's sovereignty. Weary but re-inspired, the pheasants resumed their nomadic quest—for food, and for survival. On the verge of entering a mountain pass that would lead to new horizons, they were arrested by a desolate cry coming from the snowy expanse that spilled over the cliff.

It was the cry of Cock-A-Lock, whose back had been broken during his encounter with the eagle. The flock had departed from the scene, leaving him struggling vainly in the snow. And now that they were about to disappear into the pass, he wailed out his wretched despair.

The pheasants came to a standstill and turned their heads in the direction of the appalling sound. Again they fell into an attitude of immobility suspended like statues, as the agonizing lamentation echoed again and again across the way, striking their hearts with palpable dread. But no one could save the luckless old rooster, just as no one could change the bitter destiny of the pheasant species.

Once again the roars of tigers and leopards and the cawing of crows drifted across the distance, rousing the flock from its state of suspended animation. The pheasants re-launched their steps into the pass, moving onward like a nimbus, planting their backward arrows in the snow. To the fading sound of that plaintive cry, they gradually disappeared into the clouds and mist.

183.91 Scatterbrain\fn{by Su Ye (1949-)} Hunan Province, China (F) 10

"Brother Yu, did you know, Scatterbrain's got married?"

Asan, who'd just arrived from my hometown, announced this suddenly after tossing out the water in which he'd just washed his feet, and putting out the light.

"Last January," he went on.

"So, she's been married off at long last. Her husband keeps a beancurd shop, and is a son of a distant relative of Tang Number Four.\fn{The fourth son of his father:H} They moved into town only a year ago. Do you remember that half-withered willow tree west of town? The two started a business under it. Every day they earn more than …" He kept chattering on, but my heart sank, tormented by a sense of loss.

"But was the man willing to take her?" I asked.

"Why shouldn't he be?" He sounded annoyed. "She's not a deaf-mute or a cripple. She's a bit plain but she's got a good heart. That young Tang's not bad-looking, but he can't have children. Everybody in town says so. They're going to build a new house. They've got about ten different kinds of bean products, so their business is quite brisk. The smoke from their chimney proves that. It's brought the withered part of that willow tree back to life. Isn't that strange? This spring the dead branches got damp and then sprouted leaves. The branches were three to four feet long when I left home, really green and lush, swaying in the wind."

"Sounds like Scatterbrain's doing well." An I indescribable feeling welled up within me.

"And how! She's eaten a lot of bean curd and got rosy-cheeked and a lot sharper, quite a change from when you last saw her. By the way, she kicked up a fuss just before her marriage. Didn't people use to tease her saying you would marry her? Who'd have thought she would have taken it so seriously!"

"What do you mean?" I asked with a forced calm.

"She cried for several nights, holding the books you'd left. Her mother was furious. She finally grabbed them and threw them into the stove. 'You're haunted by him!' she told her. 'He's an educated man. Are you fit to be his wife?' She scolded her daughter like that until finally she started to cry."

"Then what happened?"

"Then? She had no choice but to agree." Asan yawned several times, gradually relaxing into sleep. :

Moonlight found its way into the room through the window, glinting on the clasp of my wife's hand-bag. A moment ago she had given me a sulky look before putting up for the night at a neighbour's. The bag seemed to be mirroring its owner's meaningful glance …

I propped myself up and draped a coat round my shoulders. The red light of the cigarette glowed between my fingers.

Oh, Willow Town, it's been a long time since I thought about you.

Late spring of that year I returned to my hometown for the first time in ages.

In my memories it was a small place nestling in the hills, with a yellow dirt path leading to the county seat. The name Willow naturally indicated that it was a world of willow trees—a poplar every three feet, and a willow every four. The several hundred households were screened by misty poplars and willows. However, apprehensive and uneasy, like a stray mongrel returning to seek refuge, I was in no mood to resurrect the dreams of my childhood.

In 1976, on the eve of the Qingming Festival, people in Nanjing had held an assembly to mourn the late Premier Zhou Enlai. Gripped by powerful emotions I wrote several elegiac verses and slogans. When the evening broadcast on April 6 started,\fn{From the end of March to April 5, 1976, people in all parts of the country held rallies to mourn the late Premier Zhou Enlai and denounce the "Gang of Four" On the evening of April 5, the Gang suppressed the mass rally at Tian An Men Square, and on the following day proclaimed the mourning movement a "counter-revolutionary event" and began to search out "counter-revolutionaries"} the sky in Nanjing became overcast. Some students, their mouths sealed, an unfathomable expression in their eyes, walked by me like strangers. The face of that character Ma in the school's political office grew darker every minute, as though he scented blood. It is said that a man is at his prime around thirty but the capriciousness of life had made me timid and weak. A "purging" wind was blowing towards us from the north and, unable to resist my mother's urgings and my own panic, I deserted.

Several days after writing to my second aunt, I finally stood beneath night's pitch-black canopy in my hometown.

Although it was hardly nine, not a single sliver of light could be seen in the surrounding windows. On the cool fresh breeze, fragrant with the smell of sweet dry hay, came the yapping of a puppy somewhere near by. I gently tapped twice with the rusty knocker at my second aunt's door, then twice again.

"Oh, is that you, Deyu? I've been waiting for you for the last few days!"

In the wake of her senile chatter, a light was turned on. Coughing could be heard from some of the neighbours' houses and lights appeared in windows. The door opened with a creak. Smiling, Second Aunt hurriedly buttoned her tunic and stroked her dishevelled gray hair. She quickly took my bags from my shoulder, as though she had an extra pair of hands.

"Scatterbrain! Scatterbrain!" she called out to get some water boiled as she asked me in detail about my situation. A ladle of water was scooped from a huge jar and poured into a dented aluminium basin for me to wash with, and three eggs were fished out of an earthenware pot.

"Scatterbrain!" She raised her head and shouted upstairs again. Receiving no reply, she sighed and went to the kitchen to light the stove herself.

"Your second aunt has three daughters," my mother used to say. "The eldest is a glutinous rice cake, the second a flower and the third is a nitwit."

It was obvious that this Scatterbrain must be the so-called nitwit. The electric light, as dim as a kerosene lamp, emphasized the old, slightly lopsided, liver-coloured chest and cabinet by my side. On a soot-stained wooden wall hung a dusty photograph of my late second uncle wearing a Chinese-style jacket with buttons down the front.

He had died two years earlier. When I was young I often used to see him pick flowers for Second Aunt. He was proud of having married a woman who knew a little about the basics of writing. My mother often pointed at their windows and whispered to us that Second Aunt was shrewd and that we must be alert.

However, the window frames were now covered in cobwebs, the carved pomegranates, peaches and flower buds were crumbling, and the hostess was elderly. She lived on a pension from the grain supply station, maintaining her family like a setting sun doing its utmost to illuminate the dusk.

My head was spinning slightly as I whisked the eggs with the chopped scallion. Meanwhile, Second Aunt pulled back the shabby yellow coverlet on the old Nanjing-style bed to reveal three small heads with large shining eyes, shy and excited, like a litter of rats. That explained the giggling I heard from time to time. Second Aunt patted their bottoms and then tucked them back under their quilts, telling me that one was her elder daughter Dafeng's son and the other two boys belonged to Erfeng. I quickly scooped out a large handful of sweets and cake to divide among them. The children thanked me affectionately and whooped about.

"What about third sister?" I asked. She shouted at the boys to stop behaving so wildly just because there was a visitor, then sat by the table and blew on the hot tea for me.

"I'm glad you brought her up," she replied, sighing. "She's a good-for-nothing, has never been to school, so getting a job is out of the question. It's not right to keep her at home or to let her go. She's already twenty-six! She helps me get. the firewood, carry water and do some of the other chores. To be frank, I would have gone with your uncle long ago without her."

She seemed to be on the verge of tears, deepening the lines on her face. Checking herself she continued,

"I don't know what I did to deserve it. That girl was born too thick to learn anything. The doctors say there's nothing wrong with her health, but she seems to me as dumb as a piece of rock. Now, don't laugh at us. While you're here just pretend she doesn't exist."

Finding it difficult to think of what to say, I rummaged out the pieces of fabric, sausages and other presents I'd brought and put them on the table one by one. She courteously murmured her thanks to my mother. Then, accompanied by the children's intense stares, I followed her, my bag under my arm, through the kitchen and up a narrow steep ladder to the attic where she showed me my bed. Crossing the wooden floor, which creaked and swayed under our weight, she pointed to an old-fashioned dressing table and told me I could use it as my desk.

"Go to bed early. You're tired."

Overhead, I saw a board the size of the bed and about an inch thick suspended from the ceiling beams by ropes as thick as a person's thumb, on which timber of various lengths, broken furniture, pottery jars and various unrecognizable utensils were piled.

"It won't fall down," she said, smiling gently as though she'd read my mind. "I don't mean to offend you, but I could see you hesitating! It's been there for a dozen years. The ropes are very strong. If there was any danger, I wouldn't make you take the risk,"

Her reassurance was given readily and I really didn't know what to reply.

"Or, you can swap your bed with Scatterbrain, but the other room is smaller."

"No, no, not necessary."

I was at a loss for words. She laughed aloud, but immediately stopped herself and said,

"Go to sleep, and don't worry! What did the doctor say about your sickness?"

She narrowed her eyes and listened to my explanation, kidney trouble, and immediately offered to buy some liver, which she said would be good for me. Finally she went back downstairs.

I heaved a sigh of relief and lay down, but sleep did not come. I wondered what was happening in Nanjing. Why should my relatives here keep me at arms' length? My eyes shut tight, I tried in vain to recall the murmuring of the wind in the willows that I used to hear in my childhood. The whole town was still

Early the next morning I still did not see Scatterbrain, only a vatful of clear water, empty pails and a shoulder-pole set next to a rake in the shade in the small yard. Not a single straw could be found on the cleanly-swept floor. Chickens strolled on the flagstones; there were finely chopped vegetable leaves in an earthenware basin. Second Aunt told me that Scatterbrain had gone to carry coal and to build a new cooking stove for Erfeng, ber second sister, who lived in the county town. It seemed that apart from the household chores, Scatterbrain was also bossed about by her sisters whenever they had heavy work to do.

That evening Dafeng, who taught locally, and Erfeng, a salesgirl at a grocery store in the county town, came riding on the backs of their husbands' Forever 18 bikes for the family feast to welcome me. While Second Aunt was busy preparing special dishes, Dafeng leaned back in her chair knitting incessantly as I chatted with her husband. Unlike her sister, Erfeng greeted me with a smile as soon as she stepped into the house. Then she swept her eyes over the dishes on the table.

"Oh, mum, look at the sweat running down your face! Let me do it."

The moment she entered it, the kitchen was alive with laughter and excitement. I heard the clanking sound of the meat slicer as she issued instructions to her mother.

"Put it there, mum. Just leave it. I need garlic not scallion. Mum, would you please open my bag and check to see if I got the right things: a scrubber, two brushes, a bundle of chopsticks from Hangzhou and two toilet rolls. The medicinal herb brewer you wanted is out of stock, so I brought you a very small pot to use for the time being. In the other pocket there's a stainless steel radish-peeler, better than the one I brought you last time " Still knitting, Dafeng came into the kitchen and demanded,

"What about the doormat I asked you for? You promised to get it for me a long time ago."

"We don't have any."

"I don't believe it. Your shop gets everything."

"Oh, listen to that, mum! I'm not telling lies. Besides, big things like that can't be taken out in broad daylight.

Every time I—"

She suddenly broke off. After a pause Second Aunt asked about Scatterbrain.

"I don't know where she is," replied Erfeng. "Perhaps she's out collecting firewood."

Beaming, she brought in a tray of braised fish, the children shouting and jumping behind her. The feast was ready. The light was on and we'd had a glass of wine but there was still no sign of Scatterbrain, After a little while the door was thrown open and in strode a robust figure carrying a bundle of firewood taller than herself. Her massive shadow seemed to take up most of the wall. Was this Scatterbrain?

All of her family, barring her mother, kept on eating, drinking and chattering, paying no attention to her. She put the bundle down, grabbed a towel to wipe her neck and then sat down on the threshold. With her wild cropped hair, broad neck and shoulders, she seemed just like a man were it not for the firm breasts beneath her faded old tunic. Her Chinese-style trousers hung six inches above her worn sneakers and there were several fresh cuts on the rough skin of her legs She stared at me, a naïve expression on her face. Her eyes were gentle and extraordinarily large.

Second Aunt filled a big flower-patterned bowl with rice, piled it high with food from the table and handed it to her. She didn't even look at it, and continued sizing me up.

"Scatterbrain!" Second Aunt shouted at her.

Startled, she blushed and jumped to her feet, shot a sullen glance at her mother, then threw the towel down and rushed into the kitchen. The room rang with laughter. Second Aunt banged the bowl on to the table and ranted,

"Do you want to eat or not?"

Dafeng pulled her mother's sleeve, and the latter shook her head and sat down with a sigh. Pressing her thin, rosy lips into a smile, Erfeng said,

"You've asked for trouble now. Mind you, she hates to be called by that beautiful name of hers in front of outsiders!"

"Nonsense!" Second Aunt glared at her. "Is your Brother Yu an outsider?"

"Of course not." Erfeng patted her on the head and added,

"Don't get angry, mum. Starve her for a bit and she'll pull her claws back in." Then she leaned over to refill my cup, telling me that Scatterbrain's real name was Fengzhu but that nobody called her that.

"She doesn't seem a scatterbrain to me," I thought. "She's got a lot of self-respect!"

After the feast, I handed out some more sweets and cakes while racking my brains for stories about Nanjing to tell them. Flushed with drink, we all sat round the room, the men smoking, Dafeng swiftly shuttling her bamboo needles back and forth and Erfeng, her newly-permed hair loosened, cracking melon seeds between her fine teeth while directing the children to sing, recite texts and even the Roman alphabet to entertain me.

I snatched a moment and went into the kitchen. Scatterbrain sat by the stove, the light from the flames gently caressing her face. I put two handfuls of sweets in her lap. She raised her head and was about to say something when the children flew in, chirping and giggling, put their arms round her nock or jumped on her legs and in an instant made a clean sweep of her sweets. She just threw me an apologetic smile, and didn't show the slightest sign of annoyance. The next moment she laughed and shouted with the children, tickling them, imitating a tiger to frighten them. Then she held them under her arms and smacked them hard until they were fed up and boxed and kicked her. Just then Second Aunt came in to fetch me for dessert.

Before it got too late, the evening came to an end, everyone in high spirits. Erfeng's husband rang his bicycle bell to hurrfy up his wife, who was standing by the ladder whispering to her mother, picking strands of hair from the old woman's shoulders. She told her mother she had to put off paying for her children's keep because she was hard up that month.

"If you can't make ends meet, let me know and I'll borrow some," she told her weary mother. And if the boys didn't behave themselves she mustn't hesitate to beat them with the bamboo broom.

I went to the attic and emptied the remaining sweets from my bag onto Scatterbrain's bed, which was covered only by a worn-out patterned sheet with holes in it. A cluster of colourful cones made of silk threads trailed from the bamboo mosquito-net pole.

It's not easy to malinger in a small town. Worried about the situation in Nanjing, I felt as though my soul had been separated from my body. My clever second aunt seemed to realize what was up, as though she had another pair of searching eyes behind her slightly upturned eyebrows. Our talks about the old days had finished and I had no more to tell her about the world. Being too formal was inappropriate and offering a hand seemed to be getting in her way.

We became more and more estranged from one another. I made one mistake after another. When I poured out too much water for washing and was about to throw it out she stopped me, smiling, let the children wash with it, and then rinsed out a rag before sprinkling it on the floor to keep down the dust. When we had meat, I unthinkingly left some fatty scraps on the table, but I discovered afterwards that she had scooped them up when I wasn't looking, fried them and shared them between the three gleeful little mouths. So I had to keep reminding myself not to make too many blunders. However, the harder I tried, the clumsier I became.

To try to dispel my depression I went out for a walk. Willow Town was unworthy of its name now. Some of the trees were old, some had died and others had been felled. New flat-roofed concrete buildings had been erected next to shabby old houses. Every now and then a brand-new Phoenix bike could be seen in a narrow gray flagstoned alley. There was a red poster on the wall by the bakery on which the slogan "Smash the Tiananinen Counter-revolutionary Incident!" was written. It had been washed white and then gray by rain and most of it .had been torn away. The stream in front of the town flowed as gently as ever and people walked as slowly as they had always done. Like a listless old man, the town plodded on beside the powerful current of the times.

Only the traditional customs remained unchanged. There was no room for secrets in the town. My return for convalescence was already known to every household. My perturbed, pale, thin face aroused suspicion in people's eyes. Even if I just stayed at home, somebody would drop by on the pretext of borrowing something, scan my features to make a concrete diagnosis of my disease and then go to this and that doorway to gather a few mouths together.

Of course there were livelier times too. Knowing that I had come from Nanjing, some of the young workers came and sat beneath the lamp and asked me to describe again and again what it was like at Qingming Festival. How far had the line of demonstrators stretched? How had they blocked the traffic? How many people had carried that giant wreath?

Looking at the listeners' knitted brows and moist eyes, I seemed to relive the event and was unable to conceal my excitement.. However, each time I reached the climax of my story, Second Aunt would urge the guests to rest, a smile on her face as always, but with an element of censure in those searching eyes. =

The workers didn't come again and life became duller and duller. Idlers are often absent-minded and make the same blunders again and again. Fond of tea, I had already reduced myself to three cups a day but the children still asked curiously,

"Don't you feel bloated?"

Embarrassed, I raised my head, but Second Aunt carried on her own business as if she hadn't heard a thing. When I tried to pay her something for room and board, perhaps in a rather clumsy way, she not only refused to accept it but seemed to take offence, saying that I looked down on her. For the next two days she served me fish and meat. How could I stay on?

But my mother wrote that under no circumstances should I go back just then. She also wrote a letter to Second Aunt talking about the old days and sent her a large package of groceries.

The attic became intolerably desolate, as the children's interest in me flagged. Only then did I become more aware of the existence of Scatterbrain.

*

"You're back?"

"Yes."

"Your mother's calling you!"

"She's always doing that."

"Then go quickly or she'll blame me."

"No, she won't."

"Honestly, you really don't understand!"

"What don't I understand? Don't worry, Brother Yu. in a minute I'll—"

"That'll be too late!"

"No, it won't. Work doesn't fly away. It's always there for me to do. I'll.pile it up and do it in one fell swoop. Wouldn't that—"

"Well, if you don't go, I will."

Bewildered, she stepped back, put down my pocket transistor radio and went downstairs feeling hurt.

She usually came to visit me after gathering firewood and having had her breakfast, smelling of sweat and grass. At first she was too shy to come inside and just stood giggling by the doorway. Seeing that I didn't totally ignore her, her trust in me quickly grew. She watched tongue-tied as I used my buzzing electric razor and a comb and face cream.

On my part, I deliberately turned simple things into mysteries, and cooked up all sorts of stories. I enjoyed the curiosity and enthusiasm sparkling in her eyes. To be frank, in that old house it was only when I was alone with her that I could relax a bit, since with her you didn't have to watch your step all the time. On the contrary, I could even tease her from a position of some authority, although when I thought about it I realized that what I was doing was behaving ruthlessly, like a bully. Because I thought she couldn't harm me, I treated her as a wooden dummy on which to take out my own anxieties.

But she was such a ninny that even if I ignored her she would hang around staring at the book in my hands. Sometimes I would look up and grin and then she would do the same.

"Why are you staring at me like that?" I would asked.

"You're staring too!"

"I think you're silly."

"So are you!"

Once I gave her a pencil and a piece of paper and taught her how to draw the sun, trees, dolls and dogs. She was fascinated, as the pencil wobbled disobediently between her thick-jointed fingers. She drew everything she saw: bowls and chopsticks, stools, sickles, chickens, even mountains and streams. The drawings of course were quite artless but had an original sort of simplicity, making the landscapes and the household utensils seem exceptionally benevolent. She would draw a stove that was unusually spacious, with blazing tongues of fire cheerfully licking at a small iron pot, perhaps because she wanted to speed up the boiling of the water.

Her mechanical daily work routine was thoroughly disrupted. She would collect empty cigarette packs to do "exercises" on. Sometimes she would leave half her household chores undone.

"What horrible scrawls! Why don't you wash the bowls, you idiot!"

A chill ran down my spine every time I heard Second Aunt's shouting, as terrifying as the ominous creaks I heard from the board over my bed in the middle of the night. One day, when Second Aunt had shepherded her grandchildren off to see Erfeng, Scatterbrain came limping up the ladder. I walked over and found she had a deep cut in her foot.

"Ouch, I got jabbed by a bamboo stake!" she explained, grimacing in pain as she picked up a piece of old cotton wadding to wipe the wound. With an exclamation, I grabbed it from her and rushed to the marketing cooperative to buy some bandages, cotton wool and antiseptic powder. Then squatting down, I took her foot and dressed the wound for her. This done, I took out a pair of used nylon socks and helped her to put them on.

At first she was stubborn, hiding her fret while breathing heavily in pain. When finally I stood up, I found her crying. She suddenly clasped my arm and kept calling my name between sobs. Somehow or other it seemed to make the distress in my own heart well up inside me.

"You should thank me," I said, trying to hide my emotion. "Just boil me a few more kettles of water and that'll be enough!"

She didn't believe me at first but then, realizing I meant what I said, she jumped to her feet, and, ignoring the pain, darted across the attic with the wooden floor creaking under her heavy footsteps.

Before long the kitchen became raucous: green bamboo branches exploded in the stove, flames danced and the water in the pot whistled merrily. Suddenly, unexpectedly, she began to sing in a hoarse voice:

Sometimes sunny, sometimes cloudy,
A spring breeze rnstles through the trees.
March breezes are still chilly,
A folksong warms my heart …

How nice it was to hear that! When I was little I'd heard a woodcutter sing it rather mournfully as I was tagging along behind the adults to visit a grave in the mountains. But now Scatterbrain sang it with an entirely different emphasis, vigorous, unrestrained and full of life, igniting a flame in my heart. Oh, poor girl, how hard your life was. And why did I have to hide away in the fare of a turbulent current? Why did people have to have tortuous, suffocating lives?

"Hey, Scatterbrain!" I shouted.

"Yes?"

"Fengzhu!"

"Yes?"
"Sing it again!"
"Okay!"
Sinre there was nobody else home, I just shouted away. She sang even louder and more happily, her tongs and my hands beating time. The wizened granny from next door popped her head in, looked around and then withdrew, eyes wide. Without the slightest misgiving, Scatterbrain swayed as she sang, her large moist eyes gazing brightly at the sky …

"Have some tea, Brother Yu!"
From then on Scatterbrain, usually perspiring profusely, came with an earthenware pot at least five times a day.
"You're crazy! Are you running a water shop?"
Finally losing her patience, her mother exploded. I pricked up my ears in my room but could not overhear everything in detail. At lunch Second Aunt was less than usually hospitable and after the meal scolded her daughter again. All of a sudden Scatterbrain kicked over a stool and lunged out of the door. Uneasy, I climbed gingerly up and down the small ladder three or four times but the ground floor was quiet, with no sign of Scatterbrain.
That evening, when the family sat round the table to eat, the door was kicked open. Scatterbrain appeared before us like some primitive giant or a warrior returning from a great war. As well as the bundle on her back, she had an armull of grass. Covered in blades of grass and bamboo leaves, she crossed the hallway with heavy steps and threw the firewood violently on the kitchen floor.
I felt as though my blood had congealed. She bounced out, towel in hand, and lost her temper with her mother,
"Look at how much I get every day! Don't you think it's enough?" Her mother, ashen-faced, abruptly covered her eyes with her hands.
"I'm to blame, I'm—" I stuttered.
"No, I am!" Scatterbrain intetjected. "I want to light the stove! I do! I like doing it!"
She stood with crossed arms in the middle of the room, her blouse torn, chest heaving. The children stared. Wiping her eyes and without uttering a word, Second Aunt filled the bowl with rice and food as usual and got one of the boys to take it into the kitchen, since Scatterbrain never ate her meals at the table.
I knew I had ofiended Socond Aunt and felt that the searching eyes, flashing now with suspicion and increasing reproach, were about to move to the surface. Dafeng's demeanour remained slack and apathetic. Erfeng, cackling as before, was less polite to me and spent most of the time in the kitchen with her mother .
After supper that evening,. in front of the wizened granny and their relative Asan, Erfeng, chuckling while cracking melon seeds, asked Scatterbrain to .show them her coloured socks.
"Why, they're just like a pair of butterflies flying side by side! Scatterbrain, did you know that coloured socks are for brides?" Failing to see the jibe, she blushed.
"Brother Yu gave them to me."
"Exactly! He washed your feet for you, helped you put on your shoes and gave you these socks. Isn't that good enough?"
"Stop that nonsense, Erfeng!" her mother shouted.
"Nobody's better than Brother Yu," Scatterbrain said candidly. The others in the room snickered, waiting to watch the fun. The little ones sprang over to her and put their arms round her neck. Trying to keep herself from laughing, Socond Aunt turned to Erfeng,
"Watch your tongue. Don't make fun of the poor girl any more. Your Brother Yu will get angry with you."
"Really? Brother Yu?" Sweeping her eyes &om left to right, Erfeng giggled,
"I only meant it as a joke. If it bothers you I'll box my own ears and swallow my words."
All I could say, tongue-in-cheek, was that I didn't mind.
"See!" Smugly Erfeng glanced at her mother. Then, stretching out her hand, she turned to Scatterbrain in mock seriousness,
"Give them to me. I don't have a pair of nylon socks like that."
"No, I won't!" Scatterbrain shrank back with the socks so decisively that she narrowly escaped bumping her head against a corner of the table. Erfeng quickly pulled her back and shouted at her,
"I was just sounding you out! Now go quickly and wash and change your clothes. Brother Yu wants to marry you and take you to town. You can ride on buses, live in foreign-style building, draw pictures every day and drink boiled water."

Before she had finished, the whole room rocked with laughter. Erfeng was bent double, the old granny gasped for breath and Asan spewed a mouthful of tea on the table. Dafeng kept patting her chest and her primary school teacher husband laughed so hard that the cigarette end trembled in his fingers.

Amidst the laughter Second Aunt suddenly broke into tears. Erfeng grimaced, stopped cracking melon seeds and took the shoe sole ftom her mother's hands. Stitching the sole she whispered to her mother,

"I mean well, mum. If we got a brother-in-law as good as Brother Yu, why, even thunderbolts would sound like fire-crackers!"

That started her mother laughing again. Scatterbrain chuckled, looking now at me, now at her mother, and then blushed scarlet and lowered her eyes. Keeping my temper with a great effort, I withdrew to the attic and decided to leave the next day or at the latest the day after. After another peal of coarse laughter, Scatterbrain mounted the ladder with a pot of boiling water. Her face was still bright red!

"When … when will we go?" she asked, her head lowered.

One of the little monsters retreated from the doorway and stomped down the ladder.

"They're holding hands! They're holding hands!" he screeched fraudulently. After all the humiliation and petty annoyances I could no longer tolerate being pestered by such a half wit.

"Get out of here, you idiot!" I burst out angrily and pulled the quilt over my head. As I did so, a corner swept across the dressing table and I heard the pot lid drop to the floor and smash.

After a long while I felt something hit me and groped around for it. It was that damned pair of socks rolled into a ball. Without saying a word, Scatterbrain walked slowly back to her room. There was no snoring that night and, strangely, no rustling sounds from overhead either.

Outside the window the sheet of rain hung like a screen of pearls.

I was in two minds about leaving. A look of relief flashed across Second Aunt's face although she still urged me to stay. I compromised and postponed my departure for one more day.

Scatterbrain ignored me, sitting apathetically on her usual seat in front of the stove. I walked over to say goodbye to her, but before I could, she started yelling and flew out into the wet alley.

Erfeng arrived unexpectedly that evening.as soon as she'd put down her umbrella, she pulled her mother into another room and mumbled animatedly. Just then I walked into the room, and saw that it was too late to slip out again. They stared at me in panic as though I were a smoking grenade.

"Mum, I'm off now." Erfeng, flustered, rose to her feet and moved to one side.

"He Deyu! He Deyu!" A man with a raincoat draped around his shoulders was standing outside in the rain.

"You're wanted by the town revolutionary committee!"

"What's the matter, Huang?" Second Aunt asked cautiously, after exchanging a look with Erfeng.

"Someone's come from Nanjing, but I don't know what for."

The house was so silent, I heard my heart throbbing. I took a bamboo hat from the wall and walked out into the rain. Erfeng, who had been rooted to the spot, threw down her red umbrella and slumped into a chair. Looking as though she was ready to face anything, she declared to her mother,

"I'm not leaving tonight. As the thankless manager of your affairs, I'll take care of it!"

Two colleagues from the school, assisted by a local public security man, made an investigation. There was no way out except to make a confession. Since I had not disguised my activities there was no point in withholding the facts. Now that hundreds and even thousands of people had already confessed that they were participants in the "counter-revolutionary event," what was the point of offering any resistance? Some of them had sacrificed their lives, some had shed blood. Those who "deserved imprisonment" had already been shackled and those without shame had sold their souls.

As for me, I was no bolder than an ostrich sticking its head in the sand when the storm arrived! After my confession I wandered about the streets, my heart sinking. The leaden sky and the incessant rain merged into a vast, hazy sheet.

When I got back the street lamps had still not been turned on, although the rain had darkened the sky. In the distance, some of the neighbours stood in a group by a doorway with panic-stricken expressions. Seeing me, they scattered, looking over their shoulders as though fleeing from a monster.

The moment I entered the house Erfeng slipped into the inner room like a shadow. She must have got wind of something in advance and hurried here to warn her mother. All the rooms were pitch black. Erfeng's voice drawled out from behind the wall saying that her mother had gone to bed and my food was in the pot.

The stove and the pot were cold, the food was lukewarm and there was of course no boiling water. Scatterbrain remained sitting motionless as if in a trance, a perfect replica of a stone statue in the dark.

I had to go the following day. It was the only way out. I said goodbye to them from the other side of the wall, having made sure that there were at least two pairs of attentive ears listening. Then I climbed the ladder and lay down At midnight the board hanging overhead fell down with a bang.

There's no particular need to recount in detail the thrilling scene that night. It is all ancient history now. There was no coiled python up on the board, although the mice had perhaps turned into "spirits," living there year in and year out. The rustling sounds had been made by their gnawing at the rotten wood or the ropes when they were hungry. Constant effort leads to sure success.

That night they achieved splendid results—everything fell down with a thunderous sound and choking dust. I almost fainted in fright. But I was in luck, for my bed was made of coir ropes. When the first board fell down it hit the head of the bed and made a sort of slide. Other falling objects bounced off the bed frame.

When I came to I felt my head was still on my shoulders but my waist and legs were under a heavy weight. When I moved there was a sharp pain. Second Aunt must have been frightened out of her wits. She kept shouting nervously,

"Erfeng, Erfeng!"

Some of the neighbours, and Oafeng and her husband, who rushed to the scene, stood around clucking while Erfeng shrieked. Only Scatterbrain dashed into my room, turned on the light and, letting out a loud roar of despair like a tigress seeing its dead cub, desperately propped up the weight pressing down on me. My eyes abruptly filled with tears.

Eieng now came in, a sheet round her shoulders, her hands holding it tightly in front of her chest. Through the jumbled pile on top of me I saw her retreat into a corner, stamp her foot and start telling others to give a hand. Not lifting a finger herself, she just shouted orders to Scatterbrain, directing her to do this and that and be quick and careful, as if it was her sister who had caused the disaster. I inwardly cursed her vicious face, pale with fright, and her monstrous yelling.

Covered with sweat and dust, Scatterbrain, panting hard, picked up the fallen things and took them away. Whenever she heard me groan she shoved the others aside and propped up the weight on top of me. Finally she leaned over and picked me up in her strong, trembling arms.

My left leg was fractured and I had to be rushed to the hospital immediately. Before going, they had a discussion as to how to get me there. On a stretcher? On the back of a bike? Dafeng said she couldn't go out at night and her husband declared that he couldn't stand the sight of blood. Second Aunt was ashen with fear and worry. Erfeng gave her a pinch to perk her up a little. Some of the neighbours said they would help carry me but Erfeng mumbled to them that they should think about reporting the matter to the men from Nanjing.

Carrying me on her back, Scatterbrain descended the ladder, quietly shouldered her way through the packed hallway and strode along the damp, gray flagstoned alley. Asan caught up with her, riding a pedi-trailer. She placed me on it and they pushed me a dozen li.

I remembered clearly that when we left the hospital it was not.vet dawn. Seeing that I was out of danger, Asan excused himself to go to the county market and let Scatterbrain push me back alone.

A golden full moon still hung in the pale blue sky. Several stars were twinkling especially brightly after the rain, like the mischievous, artless eyes of children. All was still except for the sound of the tricycle creaking along the muddy road. It moved forward, slowly and steadily, since Scatterbrain was afraid that the jostling would hurt me. My fractured leg had been put in plaster and then bandaged, and dazzled in the twilight.

"Fengzhu!" I called out weakly.

There was no answer. All I could hear was the creaking of the wheels mingled with the sound of her footsteps. I knew she was still angry with me.

"I'm going very soon," I said emphatically.

Still no reply. Only her panting and the gurgling of water in the roadside ditch. A milky white mist floated over the fields leaving dewdrops on the wheat seedlings shimmering in the morning rays. The fragrance of late broad beans wafted in the air It was a beautiful, tranquil, pure scene but somehow I felt like crying.

"Fengzhu! Fengzhu!" I called in a louder voice, but she stubbornly kept silent. Surrounded by sparse trees, Willow Town could now be seen in the distance, as pale as a wash painting in the morning rays. A rooster in a nearby cottage began to crow.

"I can only stay for a few more days, Fengzhu," I continued sadly. "Do you hate me?"

I felt a cold drop of water fall on me. Raising my head, I saw two trickles of tears on her dust-covered face.
"But you, you don't want to take me."
A vast sadness came &om her husky throat.
I didn't know what to say.
"They, they say you don't like me because I'm ugly and stupid." Her shoulders shook like a weeping child's and her head tilted to one side.
I felt a dull inner pain, a feeling that I owed her something although I didn't know what.
"Come here," I said. "Come to me."
The tricyc1e halted near a small willow tree. She timidly stood under its swaying branches, her milky, mournful eyes full of tears, her face gentle in the moonlight, radiant with a simplicity, grief, sincerity and compliance that I never again beheld on a woman's face.
I spontaneously grasped her large hands, which smelled of sweat and earth, and kissed them again and again. A feeling of gratitude mingled with a kind of gallantry ran through me, and I said passionately,
"Let's go. I'll take you with me!"
In that moment I felt that I still had a little heroism left in me. But she whimpered and struggled free. Then, squatting down, she wept bitterly, her head buried in her hands.
"You're fooling me! I don't believe you! I know that in your eyes I'm only good enough to gather wood or carry water—useless. When necessary you'd make me work and then after that throw me out! Good things always happen to others, but never to me! Brother Yu, I'm no fool, no."

What is the most precious thing in this world? How can we measure human feelings? How can you determine a person's worth? Why should hypocrisy so frequently overwhelm sincerity and why do those versed in the ways of the world always bully those who are upright?

On the third day after the accident I said farewell to a weary and vexed Second Aunt and to Willow Town, that had bred me and was now driving me out, and started off. Apart from the fact that they had a tractor, my colleagues were like two yamen runners escorting a criminal. They rode with me to the county seat to catch a train for Nanjing.
On our way to the county seat Scatterbrain suddenly rushed out carrying that same earthenware pot, filled with tea. Was it to quench my thirst or to send me off! How long had she been waiting there? The tractor braked and she ran over, lowering her red, swollen eyes.
"Please have some tea, Brother Yu," she said in a hoarse voice.
I held back my tears, drained a bowlful and reached out for more. Trembling, she poured me half a bowl and suddenly turned her face to one side, wiping away her tears. Oh, my dear Scatterbrain, turn around, I said to myself, feeling a pain in my heart. Is this the only way we can part?
With a roar the tractor chugged off, but she still stood holding the pot under the sparsely-leaved willow tree. I didn't know whether she turned round or not, for all I could see was her back against a slice of gloomy sky and that soon was hidden from my view by a row of haystacks

Six years have passed since I left Willow Town and my leg has long since healed. Aocording to Asan, she still thinks about me, perhaps still longs for me.
It is another bright moonlit night. Where are you, Scatterbrain? I whole-heartedly wish you warmth and happiness in your new beancurd shop and hope that you regain your trust in people! That is all I can do. Forget me, Scatterbrain! I am unworthy of being preserved in your memory. You have a rare, pure heart; you never begrudged your love, even your life. But what can I give you in return?

187.129 Excerpt from Morning Breeze: A True Story Of China's Cultural Revolution\fn{by Fulang Lo (1949-)}
Neijiang, Sichuan Province, China (F) 12

Stretching along the banks of a river, my native city is surrounded by green mountains covered with sugar cane and corn plants. Neijiang, a medium-sized city, lies between Chengdu and Chongqing in the southwest province of Sichuan. The river that winds through the city and the valley is a branch of the Yangtze, called the Snake. It shimmers with white clouds and blue sky. Large ferry boats on the river sometimes join together forming a bridge, and I often walked across this bridge to my school. Here is where I spent my happiest years, with my two best friends Meimei and Suansuan.

I met Meimei on my first day at the Neijiang Dragon Gate High School, where she was standing on the playground holding two ping-pong paddles.

"Play ping-pong?" she asked. Before I could say yes, she handed me a paddle, and we played all morning and became friends. I asked,

"How old are you?"

"Fourteen," she said. "How old are you?"

"Fourteen, too."

Meimei was a very good ping-pong player. Her paddles never left her hands, and wherever she went she bounced on her toes ready to play.

Meimei was tall and thin. She always wore a purple T-shirt, white pants, and white sneakers. Her hair was cut short above her ears, and her skin was honey-colored. Her eyes were round and dark, with long curved eyelashes. Meimei was beautiful.

Meimei had a flute, which she played on her way to school in the morning and on the way home. Sometimes I met her, and asked,

"What is the song you are playing?" She always answered,

"Birds singing."

Suansuan, my other friend, was aloof. Her habit was to sit alone in a corner of the classroom and write poems. She wore thick glasses, and was the only student in our class to wear them. Suansuan was short and a bit chubby. She never cared about her dresses, and many times she wore her socks inside out. She didn't take me as her friend until the first exam scores were posted and I scored highest in English. She spoke to me quickly in a flat voice:

"Will you go with me to the Small Town Inn to have rice wine and cold beans? We can take a boat."

The green mountains seemed to move as the boat glided between them. At the foot of the mountains straw cottages were scattered, large and small. Around the cottages bamboo trees rose up like walls.

The inn, a large sky-blue pavilion, was old and as quiet as a Buddhist temple. The only waiter, an old man with a long white beard, served us bowls of wine and seven small dishes of cold beans. Suansuan said,

"Two plus seven is nine. The number nine symbolizes good luck. In ancient times people believed the sky was formed by nine layers and over the ninth layer was Heaven." Suansuan pointed out the window at the mountain and said,

"That mountain by the Snake River is called the Tortoise. Because the tortoise and the snake are symbols of longevity, the inn was named 'Longevity.'"

The rice wine was sweet, more like a dessert than wine, and fragrant too, like jasmine. Counting the beans in the dishes, I found that each had exactly twenty-seven beans.

"Twenty-seven is three times the number nine. This means good luck, too," I thought and smiled. No wonder the boatman had charged us exactly nine cents to get here.

"I come here to write my poems," Suansuan said and stood up. Lifting her small bowl, she made a toast:

Drink up, life is wine.
Do not wait, it's time.
Drink, drink, life is fine!

Meimei lived near the school in a large brick house. She liked the Small Town Inn too. She often flew kites around Tortoise Mountain and went fishing in the Snake River. I spent a summer vacation at her home. She and her mother lived alone. I didn't see her father, who worked far away in the south of China.

Meimei's mother was kind. She cooked for us and washed our laundry. She enjoyed watching us play ping-pong in the yard, and when she found time she made us big dragon kites. I loved her, and always wished she were my mother.

Meimei played ping-pong two-handed. She taught me how to use my left hand also.

"First, learn to swing your left arm," she directed.""Second, handle chopsticks left-handed at meals."

Gradually, my left hand became skillful, and we played double games with four paddles. That was great fun!

We fished in the cool early morning. Sitting by the river, we waited patiently and caught fish. Meimei said,

"To fish is an excellent way to teach yourself to be patient. Patience is important for everyone." Sometimes we went quite far and fished in a mountain pond. Meimei told me she had once caught a little yellow fish there with four legs.

"But I returned it to the pond," she said. "A strange fish is usually poisonous."

Suansuan liked to invite me for dinner at her home, an apartment with four rooms, very much like mine. Her parents were professors at the University of Agriculture. At their dinners the table was set in a festive way with white silk napkins, silver spoons, and ivory chopsticks. We were not allowed to talk while we ate. Instead, we listened to light music. After dinner we all went out for an evening stroll. Her parents were familiar with all our school books and asked me what subject I liked the best. They told me I was welcome to read in their library, which contained many novels.

Suansuan's parents called her Erzi, which means "Son." They called Suansuan's younger sisters, "Number Two Son" and "Number Three Son." They must have wanted sons, I thought.

My mother did not like me to invite my classmates home unless they were poor.

"Don't show flowers to the rich, but send charcoal to the poor," she always said.

She was my stepmother. My own mother died when I was four. My father met my second mother at his office when he worked as a statistician and she, as an accountant. Later, my father got a new job as a supervisor for the largest industrial equipment manufacturer in our region. Then, my mother got a job in a shipping company on the same street. They both got higher wages. My father was a good humored man and he loved her very much. She loved him too. They never quarrelled. They didn't pay much attention to me, but they never spanked me either; I was their "good child."

Our teachers were fond of Meimei. She was a wonderful athlete and good at mathematics. In everything, she was quick and precise. They also had a very high opinion of Suansuan, our class scholar. They said,

"Suansuan is the most talented student we have ever had since the school was established in 1955. She is at the top in all subjects. Her literary writing is the best."

My teachers liked me because I was good at language, art, and history. And I had the ability to organize the students. Shortly after I entered the high school, I became a leader in the Student Union. Our teachers said they were sure that we three would be accepted into the finest universities in China, Qinghua or Peking University.

Three years passed quickly. Both Meimei and I were seventeen and Suansuan was eighteen. Meimei wanted to become an engineer, Suansuan, a writer, and I, an artist.

On May 16, 1966, I arrived at school and found all the students and teachers gathered in groups here and there on the campus, writing big signs. They wrote,

LONG LIVE THE PROLETARIAN CULTURAL REVOLUTION!

"What's going on?" I asked the class monitor.

"The Cultural Revolution has begun, and it's going to destroy the old educational system."

"Why is that?"

"The old methods have been producing bourgeois intellectuals. Read today's newspaper! Today the great Cultural Revolution begins!"

I picked up the newspaper from the ground and saw the first page splashed with headlines. One said:

COMRADES, JOIN THE GREAT CULTURAL REVOLUTION LAUNCHED BY OUR GREATEST LEADER CHAIRMAN MAO HIMSELF!

As I was wondering why the headlines emphasized the words "Chairman Mao himself," the school emergency bell rang and we all proceeded to the playground, where the teachers stood on the stage. Their expressions were particularly serious. The school principal began the meeting by announcing:

The great Proletarian Cultural Revolution is an unprecedented revolution in Chinese history, launched by our great leader Chairman Mao himself. This revolution has far-reaching significance, which will be corroborated by Chinese history. From now on, teachers will stop teaching and students will stop studying. All must devote themselves to the revolution. The National Examination for College Entrance scheduled for early July has been postponed.

The Communist Party Secretary of the school walked to the microphone and announced in a loud voice.

"The Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution is a test for everyone. It will distinguish stone from gold and separate the fish eyes from the pearls."

I felt disappointed that the examination was postponed. I looked over at Meimei. She lowered her head. I looked at Suansuan. She gave me a spunky smile, as if nothing had happened.

After the meeting we were told to go to our classrooms to make big signs expressing our attitude towards the Cultural Revolution. We found all the benches in the room piled up, and the tables joined together, creating one big table. Our master teacher came in. He carried a thick roll of white paper, ink bottles, and writing brushes. In a meek voice he said,

"Write, I will get you more paper."

Before noon, our classroom was covered with posters. I looked at the newspaper headlines and copied one in ancient Chinese calligraphy. I signed my name and went home for lunch.

The next day most of the teachers seemed to have disappeared. A rumor spread that they had gone to Number 2 High School to study new policies. For the next twenty days we came to school and had nothing to do but make big posters and read the newspapers. One day the newspapers printed this from Chairman Mao:

"All Chinese must criticize the old play, Magistrate Hairui Loses His Position."

None of us had seen the play, so we didn't know what to say about it. Suansuan, however, had read it, and she whispered to me,

"Hairui was a well-known magistrate in the Ming Dynasty four hundred years ago. According to the play, he loved the people and tried again and agai.n to persuade the emperor to be merciful, and for this reason Hairui was considered a troublemaker, a disobedient magistrate. He lost his position."

We didn't understand the reason for Chairman Mao's directive, but we had always been taught to follow any directive by our government leaders and had never questioned this. So we all designed big posters with quotations from the newspapers attacking the play.

Meimei became silent. She didn't play ping-pong anymore. Instead of her purple T-shirt, she wore a black blouse. One afternoon I suggested we go fishing together, but she said sadly,

"I'm afraid I can't be your friend anymore because I am from a capitalist family. It would get you in trouble."

Before I could stop her, she ran off.

I didn't believe Meimei was from a capitalist family. A capitalist child would be spoiled. Meimei was not spoiled. A capitalist home would have many servants. Meimei's home had none. Meimei's mother had washed my clothes and cooked for me when I stayed with them. I couldn' believe her mother was a capitalist. She was a good woman, a kind woman. She was the best mother in the world!

I went to see Meimei later that day. She was not home. Her mother explained to me why they were labeled a capitalist family.

"When Meimei's father was a child he worked in a tobacco factory. He worked for his boss for nineteen years. The boss was an old man who had no children. Before the old man died, he adopted Meimei's father. He left a will that said, 'I give my house and factory to this young man. In return he must take care of his adoptive mother and support her until she dies.' Because of the house and the factory, my family has been listed as a capitalist family. But we don't own the factory. It was taken over by the government many years ago."

At a school meeting on another day, a student from a poor peasant's family made the following speech:

The first goal of the revolution is to clarify class lines. Those who are from the poorest peasant families or the poor factory workers' families are the Red Sort. They are revolutionaries. Those who come from a capitalist family or a landlord family or a well-off peasant family are the Black Sort. They are enemies. The rest are the Gray Sort, who will either be revolutionaries or enemies-depending on their attitude towards the revolution. If they stand on the side of the revolution, they will become revolutionaries. Otherwise they will be enemies.

From now on, the Black Sort are not allowed to smile or to cry. Their smiles mean they are laughing at the revolution; their tears are shed for their lost past. The Black Sort are not allowed to sing songs because their voices are poison arrows directed towards the revolution.

Suansuan and I both were considered the Gray Sort, although my family background was regarded as less dangerous than hers. My parents were not professors—who were called Reactionary Academic Authorities—and they had no religious beliefs. All religious groups were labelled “Reactionary Guilds.” Suansuan’s grandfather was religious; he believed in Buddha.

Suansuan ignored the Cultural Revolution as much as possible. It didn’t matter to her who the Red Sort or the Black Sort were. She still went often to the Small Town Inn and wrote poems.

One evening Suansuan came to my house to tell me that the libraries of the University of Agriculture were going to burn books. Literature books, art books, and music books—all were called “Poisonous Grasses” and were being thrown out of the library! She said the pile of books was as high as a mountain.

“Why don’t we go take them when no one is watching?” she said. It seemed like a good idea, and, when I agreed, she smiled and quoted an old saying:

“A scholar who steals books should not be called a thief.”

That evening we went to see the mountain of books. There was no guard there, so each of us filled a schoolbag with books. On the road near our homes, we laid out all the books in the moonlight and divided them evenly. One of the best books I got was Art Philosophy. It was filled with nearly a hundred pictures of oil paintings neither of us had ever seen before. Suansuan found a most wonderful novel, Marx’s Youth. It described the romantic love between Marx and his fiancée. We could hardly believe the great founder of Communism had had such a private life.

There were only four students in our class qualified as the Red Sort. They established a revolutionary organization called the Red Guard, just as students in the cities of Peking and Shanghai had done earlier. The government newspaper reported,

> The Red Guard Organization is new and vital. The Red Guards are iron fists. The Red Guards are Generals of Heaven. The Red Guards will defend our great leader, Chairman Mao. The Red Guards will sweep dirty old water from the earth. The Red Guards will destroy the old world and create a new world.

The four Red Guards at our school wore red arm bands, and painted new slogans everywhere on the campus:

THE DRAGON’S SON IS A DRAGON,
A PHOENIX’S SON IS A PHOENIX,
BUT A RAT’S SON CAN ONLY DESTROY THE GROUND
BY MAKING HOLES IN IT!

MY FATHER IS A HERO, SO I AM A HERO;
YOUR FATHER IS A BAD EGG, SO YOU ARE A BAD EGG!

BLACK SORTS, RAISE YOUR HANDS!
IF YOU DON’T OBEY, I WILL SLAUGHTER YOU!

The Red Guards in my class had actually been dull students who got the worst marks. I felt they welcomed the Cultural Revolution because it abolished the university entrance examination, which they probably could not have passed. The Red Guards began holding political meetings at the school, and everyone was required to attend. Their first lecture was called “Revolutionary Family History Education.”

They preached to us about their own bitter family backgrounds. A female Red Guard appeared first on stage. She said,

“My father was a rickshaw-puller. One summer noon, he pulled a rich couple uphill. It was hot, and the sun was like fire. He was tired. He strained to pull the rickshaw. Suddenly his bladder dropped out. The urine wet his pants.”

When she sat down the other guards cheered. A male Red Guard then spoke,

"My father lived in a shabby straw hut. One night it caught fire. My father fought against it. He fought all night. The next morning his tooth ached. He had lost the ability to bite a pickled cucumber."

Suansuan burst out laughing. I knew she was laughing at the two stupid speakers and their fathers. I bit my lip to control myself, or I would have laughed out loud too. Meimei lowered her head. She was not allowed to express emotion. All the Black Sort lowered their heads like Meimei. There were seven. Most of my class were Gray Sorts—there were forty-five of us.

The school Communist Youth League secretary was a Gray Sort, too. Her father was a wine-seller and her mother a butcher. She followed the Red Guards around, flattered them and parroted their words. One day she created a huge poster. It read,

I would rather have my head cut off than not defend the great Mao Tse-tung's thought!

To show her determination, she bit her index finger and smeared blood on the poster. Overnight, her action earned her the title "Woman Hero," and made her a favorite of the Red Guards. To memorialize the occasion Suansuan wrote a poem dedicated to her:

Daughter of a wine seller,
Daughter of a butcher,
A grin on your face,
A knife in your hands.

Meimei kept her head lowered all day long. She refused to talk to me. One afternoon I found her alone in the school bathroom. She tried to run out. I grabbed her. I saw that her eyes were red and tearful. Again she ran off, and I could not stop her. Walking home alone, I stopped at the river and took a boat to the Small Town Inn. I sat by the window, thinking of Suansuan's poem for Meimei:

Lift your head high like a stallion,
Young one.
Do not bow down under your burden.

"Burden?" I said. "It's not a burden. It's a mountain. Meimei carries a mountain which I can see but cannot help remove."

Out the window the sunset was dim and red and made the river look like blood.

In July, the school principal announced a new order from the local government:

"Two-thirds of the high school graduates are to go to isolated mountain villages to lead the Socialist Education Movement, to 'spread revolutionary seeds.' One-third of the students are needed to stay at the school."

Suansuan and I were listed in the group that was leaving. But Meimei was not going. All the Black Sorts like Meimei were put in small groups, which had four Red Guards, Black Sorts, and eight Gray Sorts. The Gray Sorts in Meimei's group were of a special type, like the Woman Hero, whose name headed the list.

The night before we left for the mountain villages, Suansuan and I decided to say goodbye to Meimei. We wanted to promise that we would be her true friends. We wanted to give her half of the university books we had saved from the burning. We wrapped them in newspapers that were filled with revolutionary headlines so that they wouldn't cause her trouble.

Her house was dark; nobody was there. We waited for nearly two hours. Finally we knocked on the neighbor's door. The neighbor told us that Meimei and her mother had moved away and had left no address. The commune officials had ordered them to leave, and the house was going to become the commune office the next day.

We left early in the morning. It was raining. A muddy truck took Suansuan and me and another thirty-six students away. Suansuan sat beside me. We didn't talk. The truck passed by the Small Town Inn, the Snake River, and Meimei's house, which grew smaller and smaller and then faded away.

It was two o’clock in the afternoon when the truck stopped in Ganyang city, 100 miles to the west. We had been in the truck for six hours. A short, middle-aged man received us, an intellectual.

“I am the Mayor’s secretary. Welcome. You will stay here for nine days of training, then proceed to mountain villages to spread revolutionary seeds. This is the way for you to carry out the Socialist Education Movement.”

He spoke with a smile and pointed out two classrooms for us to stay in, one for the boys and one for the girls. He distributed food coupons to us, and instructed us to be in the auditorium at eight next morning.

As we opened our bedrolls and spread them on the floor, we saw other groups of students arriving and heard the secretary repeating his welcome. The students were from other cities far away. .

It was too early for supper, so after a shower, Suansuan and I decided to go for a walk. The town was small. It had only one street. At the end of the street, stood a white tower, narrow and very high. Beside the tower we noticed a sign that read WHITE TOWER TEMPLE. Under these characters was a line of smaller characters:

“The White Tower Temple has controlled the River Spirit for a thousand years.”

We both laughed. The river behind the tower was wide and strong, a branch of the mighty Yangtze. How could the little tower control it? Suddenly I felt sad. The river reminded me of Snake River, of Meimei.

The next morning, in the auditorium, the Mayor’s secretary announced who the student leaders would be. Each school had one, and I was declared the student leader for our school. After that, he asked us to go to an adjacent room for a meeting.

Two men sat in there, young and energetic-looking. They wore starched military uniforms. They stood up when we entered, shook hands with us, and told us they were Deng He, and Yong Tian, students of the Radar Military Academy in Chongqing. And they had been assigned to the He Feng commune to carry out the revolution fifty miles away.

“We have been assigned to train you,” Deng He said, “and teach you the four military principles: be united, alert, serious, and strong. We ask you, the student leaders, to wake up your students every morning at six so they can do exercises. There will be ten minutes for breakfast, and then bring them to the auditorium at eight. We’ll teach you how to lead the revolution in the countryside. The class struggle is complex, and so you must be very careful.”

Before the meeting was dismissed, Deng He opened his notebook and read off our names. As he called mine, he looked up at me. We walked back to the auditorium. Just before I entered, Deng He stopped me and asked,

“Could you tell me, what is the meaning of your name?”

“Morning Breeze,” I said, and hurried in. At the meeting the Mayor’s secretary addressed us:

“Your task is to wash hands and wash feet. You will find these hands and feet in the capitalist fortresses dirtied by thick capitalist dust. You must use the hot water of the revolution to wash them. Your water must be very hot. It must be over a hundred degrees. The revolutionary water is Mao Tsetung’s thoughts. They will be found in the documents that you are going to study during the next nine days. You must consume the spirit of the documents. That is your spiritual food. Nourished by them, you will be strong enough to go into the capitalist fortresses to wash hands and wash feet. Then you will draw the capitalists out of the fortresses and force them to walk the Socialist Road.”

In the afternoon we were asked to discuss the significance of the “Wash Hands and Wash Feet Campaign.” Some boy students joked,

“We must use boiling water to wash them. It must be a thousand degrees. If they will not permit us to wash them, we will pour the boiling water all over them and scald them to death.”

In the evening we studied by ourselves. The first document we were asked to study was entitled “Wash Hands and Wash Feet.” It consisted of twenty-three points that formed the policies for the Socialist Education Movement. We had to study together in designated rooms so that the Mayor’s secretary could easily check up on us. While we studied, Deng He and Yong Tian came to deliver red badges on which were written “Socialist Education Work Team” in yellow characters.

Deng He sat down beside me and asked what my father did and how he had selected such a good name for me. He also asked how old I was. I told him my father was a statistician, and that he had given me this name because I was born in the early morning in summer. I told him I was seventeen.

The next morning I woke up my schoolmates at six o’clock. We all ran down to the playground where Deng He and Yong Tian were waiting. They taught us military morning exercises in which we had to jump a lot. Then they ran us in formation around the town. Breakfast was a bread roll, a boiled egg, and rice porridge. I ate less than half the bowl of the rice porridge because I was not used to eating in such a hurry.

At eight, we filled the auditorium. Deng He was on the stage. He led us in a revolutionary song, We Are a Family of Poor Peasants. After we sang for about twenty minutes, the Mayor's secretary brought a young skinny man in dirty black work clothes onto the stage.

"Comrades!" the skinny man shrieked in a strong northern accent. "I come here to teach you how to use hot water to wash the newly-born capitalists in the countryside." His first sentence made all of us laugh because, with his accent, the words "hot water" sounded more like the words for "fresh excrement," and the word "capitalists" sounded more like "myself."

He pounded his fist on the table. This stopped our laughter. He went on to say,

"Thus, we can make the water hotter. They are afraid of our proletarian iron fists. We musn't be polite!"

The words made us laugh again because, with his accent, he seemed to be saying,

"They are afraid of our proletarian iron heads. We musn't cough at them. Just at that moment he accidently sneezed a big sneeze.

The next morning we were taken out by the Mayor's sec- retary to see a "Class Struggle Exhibition." The exhibits contained many old coins, old silk robes, and gold basins. The guide told us that all the old things had been confiscated from landlords and capitalists.

"They keep these things because they have nostalgia for their lost past," he said. "They will never stop trying to restore their lost paradise."

On the fourth morning we were asked to watch a political movie titled, "The Vietnamese Are Our Lip and Tooth Friends." It showed how the North Vietnamese were resisting the imperialists. As the movie started, these lines appeared on the screen:

"Now the imperialists are invading Vietnam. At the same time they are cooperating with the class enemies in our country. The class enemies who daydream of taking advantage of the Cultural Revolution to overthrow our government. We must watch out." Suansuan nudged me and whispered in my ear,

"What nonsense."

The fifth day we listened to "poor family histories." Two peasant women were on the stage. One carried a baby in her arms. When she moved the microphone close to begin speaking, the baby cried. She quickly unbuttoned her blouse and pulled out her breast. We bent our heads as low as we could, embarrassed to see her nakedness. The woman told us that her father and grandfather had worked all their lives for a landlord. The landlord was cruel, and he made them eat leftovers.

The other woman said her mother had been a capitalist's housekeeper for twenty years, but was fired because she accidentally lost one of the family's socks. She lost it in the river where she washed the laundry. Both women ended their speeches with the same shouts:

"Down with the landlord class! Down with the capitalists! Never forget class bitterness! Never forget to take revenge on the class enemies!"

The remaining days we made hundreds of posters of Chairman Mao's sayings.

"Choose the saying from Chairman Mao that can solve your problem," the Mayor's secretary said. "Chairman Mao is truth. His thoughts can solve all of your problems. Chairman Mao's quotations are the doctor's prescriptions that can cure diseases of the mind. Set the doctor beside your pillow so you can see him every morning and every evening. In this way you will never be sick with bourgeois diseases."

For our posters, most of us chose the quotation, "We are friends, we come from different provinces, we must help each other." Suansuan wrote a quotation from the ancient Chinese philosopher, Lao Zi:

"The Heavenly Father sends everyone to earth as king, so long as he is diligent in learning, thinking and acting." I asked her:

"Why do you write Lao Zi's quotation in- stead of Chairman Mao's?" She grinned and said:

"Chairman Mao once quoted this in his speech. Now I am quoting from his speech."

I usually stayed up late at night to read and think. Before I went to bed, I always took a shower in the public bathroom outside the building. Many nights I met Deng He, who was walking alone. He always greeted me,

"Hello, Little Devil. How are you this evening?"

"I'm fine, thank you," I would answer.

On the ninth evening Deng He organized a farewell party for us. He asked each school to perform one or two skits at the party. Our school comedian, Xian Hui, offered to represent our school.

The auditorium now became our theater with green curtains hung on the stage. Deng He performed first, singing a revolutionary song, A Lamp Shines in Chairman Mao's Window. He had a good voice and stage presence, and he was handsome.

Comrade Yong was next. He demonstrated military boxing.

Then it was our school's turn. When the curtain opened, Xian Hui was standing with her back to us. There was no music. She wore a deep brown robe. Her hair was in a bun tied with a large red ribbon. Before we realized what was going to happen, she spun around and gave a big smile. Her almond eyes and two protruding front teeth made her smile great fun, and all the audience laughed. She then quit smiling and bowed, announcing her show. Her voice was a high-pitched falsetto.

"An Egg," she said.

Stepping this way and that with small light steps, she opened and closed her hands like flowers. A delicate wail arose from her hands, from small pieces of bamboo that she pressed together and then released. She sang to the accompaniment of music:

"In Village Wang lives Fortune Wang. He is famous for being lazy. And famous for good luck. One day he strolls out and finds an egg on the road. 'Thank the Fortune Buddha,' he says, and picks it up. He sets the egg in his palm and gazes at it. He gazes hard at it, and sees a wonder. The egg can be hatched into a chicken, a chicken will lay more eggs. The eggs can be hatched into more chickens, the chickens will lay still more eggs. He says, 'I will sell the eggs to buy a little lamb. The little lamb will grow into a big lamb. I will sell the big lamb to buy a little cow. The little cow will grow into a big cow. I will sell the big cow to buy a little horse. The little horse will grow into a big horse. I will ride the big horse to visit a rich woman. I will ask her to marry me, and then, I Fortune Wang, will be Rich Wang.' Suddenly he tripped and slipped. His egg fell and broke."

Xi an Hui stopped singing. The music stopped. She faked a big cry, and threw herself to the ground. The curtain dropped. Our Xian Hui earned a storm of applause.

It was late in the evening after I took a shower and started back. Deng He met me on the way.

"How nice to see you, Little Devil," he said, and took my hand.

"Xian Hui from your school is a fine actress. But remember, never give that performance again. It was written by a rightist who used An Egg to attack The People's Commune established by Chairman Mao in 1958. The author meant to say that The People's Commune is an empty dream that ends up as a broken egg."

I was upset to hear that. I looked at the moon. It was a full moon, reminding me that this was the middle of July, the time I should have been taking the National Examination for College Entrance. Two months had passed since the Cultural Revolution began, two months that would never come to me again. Did the moon know what had happened here on earth?

"Little Devil, I feel sad because you are leaving. When can I see you again?"

His voice was soft. I turned to look at him, trying to make sure what he said.

"See my white shirt. There are so many spots here and there that make it a black shirt."

I turned to watch the moon again. A breeze stirred; it was gentle and cool.

"Breeze," he exclaimed. "Morning Breeze. Beautiful! You are beautiful. You are the most beautiful girl I've ever known. Will you write to me? Please write to me."

I was so surprised that I rushed to my room without answering.

Lying on my bed, I couldn't sleep, my heart beat very fast. I heard the clock chime one. I tried harder to sleep. Then I heard the clock chime two, then three, then four, and then I got up to pack. A steamboat would carry us across the river at five o'clock, and trucks would take us to the mountain villages, to the communes. My commune was to be the Three Stars Commune, thirty miles away.

At the pier I saw Deng He. I pretended I didn't notice him, and walked onto the boat. When the boat started off, all the students waved to him and called goodbye. I covered my face wth my straw hat.

The young peasant guide and I walked silently from one bare field to another in the late, hot afternoon. The sun was scorching, the fields of wheat stubble looked extremely vast, and I felt very small. The guide had met me at the Three Stars Commune office, and told me I was being sent to a bandit village, the Three Stars Village. After we crossed the fifth field the Three Stars Village came into view—thatched-roof houses scattered randomly about, shabby and low. We entered the village, where an old lady of about seventy was standing by a door.

“She is your hostess,” the guide told me. “She is Grandma Li.”

I entered Grandma Li's house where two older men politely received me. These were Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar.

“Welcome to our Educational Work Team,” they said and shook my hand.

“Our work team has now grown to twelve members,”the Political Commissar told me with a smile. Monitor Ding was a skinny man with a serious face. He wore a clean, faded blue shirt, like any peasant leader. The Political Commissar was short, round and smiling. Like an intellectual, he wore two pens in his white shirt pocket. As we drank tea, Monitor Ding told me that ninety-five percent of the villagers were bandits before the revolution. They had led the Three Stars Bandit Uprising in 1950, in an attempt to drive out the Communists. That was why this commune was called the Three Stars. The Political Commissar tried to encourage me:

“Don’t be afraid,” he said, “you will do a good job. We will support you. All the comrades in this work team will support you.”

“Where are they?” I asked.

“They are in different villages, just miles away,” Monitor Ding said.

“Are there any students in the team?” I asked the Political Commissar.

“No,” he said. “They are factory workers, retired soldiers, and clerks, but they are very nice. They have been in this commune for over a month. They have experience in how to wash hands and wash feet. They will help you.”

Grandma Li’s house had two rooms, and mine was a small, neat one at the back. The earthen floor was clean. There was a double bed, a desk and a new wooden bucket—my toilet. In the mud wall behind the bed I saw a little bamboo door. I opened it: a huge black mountain started almost from the doorstep, blocking the sky. Frightened, I slammed the door shut. Just then, Grandma Li called me to dinner.

There were bowls of wheat porridge and pickled cucumbers on the table by her bed. We sat down and ate. Grandma Li seemed not to want to talk to me. After dinner, she brought me a basin of warm water and a fresh towel. I washed my dusty face, which made the water muddy. She took the same water and began to wash herself with it.

“Oh, no, Grandma Li!” I said; “Don’t use it, I will warm you some clean water.”

She ignored me. And then when she finished, she said,

“We have only one well. It’s far behind the mountain, and we don’t have enough firewood for cooking, so we don’t often have warm water.” I was touched by this and I offered,

“Grandma Li, I will carry water for you every day.”

I took five yuan from my pocket and insisted she use it to buy some firewood. Grandma Li refused, saying she was paid by the Commune for taking care of me. But she gradually grew talkative and friendly, and she saw me to bed that night.

The next morning I got up early, went to the well, and carried water home. After breakfast, Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar arrived.

“We have come here to hold a village meeting,” they said, “to show you how to wash hands and wash feet. This village remains a closed bottle because its former team leader, Liu Zhenwen, is a stubborn element. We must start political surgery on him. Chairman Mao teaches us: ‘Use scissors to cut a sparrow, beginning with the head.’”

When Monitor Ding blew his whistle, all the villagers dragged themselves into the yard—old and young, men and women, children and babies. They found space and sat down on the grass. Monitor Ding stood before them and declared in a loud voice,

“Comrades, it is high time for you to confess your crimes. We have checked on every one of you and discovered the serious crimes you have committed. There is no way for you to escape. I urge you to confess right now, to wash hands and wash feet by yourselves. If you fail to confess, we will wash them for you. But by then, don’t complain if the water is too hot. Revolution accepts no excuse and has no mercy. Believe it!”

The villagers were silent. A man finally stood up, walked towards me, and said,

“I want to confess my crime to you.”

I quickly stood up and looked at Monitor Ding. He nodded permission. I went with the man out of the yard. Sitting in a field, he said:

“My name is Liu Zhenwen.”

“Liu Zhenwen, the former leader?” I asked.

"Yes, I used to be."

"What are you going to tell me about?" I opened my notebook.

"I am a criminal. In 1958 I helped carry out the Deep-Plough-Land Movement. It brought death to my people. Half of them died of hunger. This movement called for digging the fields two meters deep, and burying seeds there. The following year nothing grew. My people had to eat grass, tree bark, leaves, and mud." He paused.

"Grandma Li's three children died in one day. They were buried in one grave. Blind Grandpa Zhou's two sons died too." He paused again.

"Peasants called me father, because I was a village leader, but I could only watch them die at my feet." He looked away.

"Mr. Liu is a good man, I'm sure," I immediately decided, and put my notebook aside.

I remembered the Deep-Plough-Land campaign. It was part of the People's Commune movement launched in 1958 by Chairman Mao. The goal was to bring more crops from the land. I was ten years old then, in grade school. All the teachers talked about the campaign, telling us "the two-meter-deep land will grow peanuts as big as potatoes, and cotton bolls as big.as a baby's round face." And there was a Saturday afternoon.

After the music teacher taught us a song, The Deep-Plough-Land Movement Is Excellent, we hurried to have supper, then followed him to a village to "entertain" the villagers.

"They are carrying out Chairman Mao's campaign," the teacher instructed us.

That was a cold winter night. The mountain wind blew, making a sound like animals screaming. In the fields I saw a great many political slogans on paper flags hanging in the trees. And under the kerosene lamps I saw the villagers digging into the ground. The holes were so deep I was worried I might fall in.

The next year one-third of my classmates died of hunger. As a boarding student then, I remembered how for many months each of my meals had been just three little boiled yams.

Mr. Liu began to puff on his pipe.

"Did any village leader reject the Deep-Plough-Land Movement?" I asked.

"Yes, but they were beaten to death. The village leader of the No. Two Team Village was beaten for three days."

"Who beat them?"

"People from other villages."

I had heard of that, too, when I was ten. Mr. Liu was telling the truth. Then I asked him,

"Are ninety-five percent of the villagers here bandits?"

"No," he was sure.

"Then how did the commune get the name, the Three Stars?"

"It is because of a pavilion not far from here. It is shaped like a triangle. Our people call a triangle 'three stars.'"

"But I heard that there'd been a reactionary uprising called the 'Three Stars.'" He shook his head and told me that it was a made-up story.

The next morning I reported to Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar that Mr. Liu was innocent. But the monitor said,

"He is a blatant class enemy! He seized on the small shortcomings in the Deep-Plough-Land Movement to attack the People's Commune Movement launched by Chairman Mao." They both said,

"You mustn't be so naïve."

Two weeks passed. Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar assigned me many documents to study and constantly reminded me that I must try to raise my political consciousness. I read them during the day at Grandma Li's house. Sometimes I held a meeting to read aloud the documents to the villagers. But I spent most of my evenings visiting the peasants after they returned from the fields. They seemed friendly to me, and called me Little Comrade. They came to visit me too, at Li's house, to "confess" their "crimes." One villager "confessed" that he had taken home an old broom that belonged to the village. A woman confessed that she had taken some dry peas from the fields and put them into her own pockets. A young boy confessed that he had said that Marshal Lin Piao's eyebrows looked like two worms.

"My crime is most serious because I said such a bad thing about a government leader," he said.

Blind Grandpa Zhou lived at the end of the village with his aged wife. When I learned the villagers carried water for the couple by turn, I joined in. Besides, I often helped them with sewing and mending.

At night, at Grandma Li's there were many mosquitoes. While reading, I had to wear long-sleeved shirts and thick pants to protect myself. This made me sweat. To save firewood, I washed myself with cold water, and discovered that the water from the well was icy cold even in summer.

Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar often dropped in to see me. They seemed satisfied with my work, saying I had opened the "closed bottle" since so many villagers had confessed. The Political Commissar once joked with me,

"Your water is really hot." They also told me they had moved into a nearby village office three li away, and asked me to report my work to them at any time.

The villagers seemed to enjoy chatting with me while I was eating supper. They sat on the floor or on Grandma Li's bed. They told me they seldom went to see a doctor. When they got sick, they warmed their feet in hot water, and, if very ill, fasted for a whole day.

"It really works," they declared. When one of their children got sick, they would say "the child is not pretty."

I liked the village girls very much. They were simple, honest and sweet. They were curious about my clothes. I let them open my suitcase to look through my clothes and try them on. One day they saw my sanitary napkins, and asked what they were for.

"For my period," I said.

"What? You also have a period? We thought only country girls had that thing."

Red was their favorite color.

"Why do all of you like the same color?" I asked one day.

"It chases ghosts away."

"Where are the ghosts?"

"Everywhere." Then they showed their red paper wallets to me.

"You see, we use red paper to make wallets so we won't meet thieves and never lose money." They opened their wallets and I found none had more than a few coins.

One day a letter came from Deng He. My heart beat fast. He wrote:

> Dear Little Devil,
>
> I have been wondering how things are going with you. You must be busy getting yourself adjusted to new conditions, just as I did when I came to the commune. It took me three weeks to adjust.
>
> May I tell you something more about myself? I was born in 1946, in Yi Bing. It is a handsome city, where three rivers meet, the Lin Jiang, Min Jiang, and Jialing Jiang. The waters of the Lin Jiang and Jialing Jiang are so clear you can see the sand on the bottom, and from far away they look like emerald-colored silk ribbons. Min Jiang flows from the Yellow River so it is always yellow. My home is on the banks of the river. Day and night I can hear the roaring of the waters. I like watching the many white-sailed boats that pass by and I often hear the chanting of the trackers. My father, who died many years ago, was a writer. My mother is a painter in water colors. As a child I often sat with mother in front of the house, under the willows, and painted the scenery. I have three brothers, all of whom are now military commanders. I am the youngest in the family, and my mother loves me best.
> The day I left home for the military academy was my eighteenth birthday. Mother walked with me all the way to the door of the train. As the train started to move she stood there alone on the platform for a long long time. I knew she was crying. Ever since, I've come to feel that the most painful thing in life is to have to say goodbye. So, now when I return home I always tell mother not to give me any kind of send-off when I leave again. I myself never give anyone a send-off either. I'm afraid to say goodbye.
> But that day you went away I did want to see you off. That morning I walked back and forth along the dock, hoping I'd be able to see you again. . .
>
> My home is only 200 li away from yours. I wish so much you could come to visit me there someday.
> Today I am writing to you, alone in my room. It is late in the evening. Today is my twentieth birthday. I am so happy to be able to write you. I miss you very much. The first time I saw you, I had an unexplainable feeling about you. Please be kind enough to write to me. I am waiting for your letter.
> Deng He

In the envelope I found a few stamps. He must have thought that I had no money to buy stamps. I wrote to him:

> Dear Comrade Deng,
> Thank you very much for your letter. My village is in the mountains and has ninety-six villagers. They are kind to me, although they know I am a student. I have no idea how they found out I am a student. Maybe it is because of something that happened on the third day after my arrival. I was walking along a narrow road by a flooded rice paddy. The road was wet and slippery, and several times I nearly slid into the water. It amused me and made me laugh out loud. When I reported this incident to my monitor and the Political Commissar, they instructed me not to laugh in front of the villagers, because I am not a student any more but in the ranks of revolutionary cadres. And a revolutionary cadre must be very serious.

I will say goodbye to you now.

Little Devil

He wrote me again in a week, and gave more details about his family. His grandfather had been a magistrate during the Qing Dynasty and had left a great many valuable books, including sets and sets of original Tang Dynasty and Song Dynasty poems, some Yuan Dynasty plays, and some Qing Dynasty novels. Deng He's father had started writing at seven. He had won recognition for his poetry and short stories.

After reading this second letter, I thought about his family, an intellectual family, and wondered how they had managed to get positions in the military for all their children. Such positions led to a comfortable life, political preference, and other special treatment. He must have been born into a high-ranking official's family, I concluded, and put his letter at the bottom of my valise.

I did not like the children of high-ranking officials. Too often they were spoiled.

After supper, I decided to visit Mr. Liu's home. I was determined to prove that Mr. Liu was not a class enemy but a good man. Standing outside his window, I saw both he and his wife reading a small book by the light of an oil lamp. The book cover was red, a certain sign that it was one of Chairman Mao's works. They were reading intently. I decided not to disturb them and went on to visit neighbor Zhen's home.

I was shocked to find Mr. and Mrs. Zhen, his mother, and their five sons sitting on the earthen floor naked except for undershorts. Mrs. Zhen explained to me that they didn't have enough clothes to wear. They saved the few they had for going into the village. She also told me that they didn't have enough rice bowls for all to eat at the same time, and so she and her mother-in-law had to eat after the others had finished.

That night I tossed in my bed, feeling guilty. For seventeen years I had never given the peasants a thought. Those who produced food for me had to struggle for their own survival. At about one o'clock I heard raindrops, then a downpour. Our house was leaking. Grandma Li and I got up to hunt for basins, buckets, and pots to catch the rain.

I thought of blind Grandpa Zhou and rushed to his house. His door was open and I saw Mr. Liu inside, helping Mrs. Zhou sweep the rain water from the floor. In one corner stood blind Grandpa Zhou on crutches. The water seemed under control.

On my way back in the dim light I saw almost every family fighting the rain. I rushed to the village office to get Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar. I banged and kicked at the door, and called,

"Get up, get up!" When they opened the door I pulled them out, shouting,

"Come quick! It's a tragedy! We must do something!"

They finally understood what I wanted and they smiled. Monitor Ding asked,

"You walked all this way in the rain? It is already two o'clock in the morning!" Then they accompanied me home. The Political Commissar warned,

"Don't walk alone at night anymore. This is a bandit area."

When morning came, I called an emergency meeting and organized a group of young peasants to repair the leaking houses. Many families donated bamboo, wood, and wheat stalks. We worked hard, and before evening, had repaired all the roofs. Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar praised me highly. They recommended me to the Ganyang city government as an "Advanced Revolutionary Cadre," and nominated me for membership in the Communist Party.

"You are a qualified Communist because you do things according to our great leader Chairman Mao's teaching: 'Serve the people with your heart and soul.'"

As a result, the Ganyang city government held a meeting of four hundred people to honor me. Every student who was a work team member was present, and, as an award, the Mayor gave me a handsome notebook. I did not understand, though, why they should nominate me to become a Communist Party member. After all, the houses I'd helped repair belonged to "bandits." Or, didn't they really believe they were bandits either?

On the sixth week a new policy came down from Peking—from Chairman Mao. It was announced that all students must immediately return to school. Monitor Ding and the Political Commissar came to see me. They looked sad. They held my hands in theirs, and silently sat beside me for a long time.

"Why does Chairman Mao send us back to school in such a hurry?" I asked.

"There is something urgent," the Political Commissar answered. "Chairman Mao announced the policy in Shanghai last night. The policy states that to send the Educational Work Teams to the countryside is wrong."

"You mean to wash hands and wash feet is not correct?" I asked. They didn't answer. Monitor Ding merely said,

"Our work team is going to be dismissed next week."

That night I wrote to Deng He, giving him my school address. Then I packed. I was to leave early next morning. Grandma Li shed tears as she saw me to bed. After an early breakfast I left two cakes of scented soap I had brought with me on Grandmother Li's bed, and I opened the door.

To my great surprise, I saw the yard was packed solidly with villagers. They were standing in complete silence, waiting to see me. Emotion overcame me. Many were crying. Grandpa Zhou touched my face with his hand and said,

"I hate that my eyes can't see you."

The villagers walked with me down to the river. No one talked. Grandpa Zhou, on his crutch, walked shoulder to shoulder with me. Mr. Liu carried my bags onto the boat. Holding my hands in his own, he said,

"My people will remember you."

The ferryman lifted his oar and began paddling. As the boat slid away from the riverbank, a long, low cry rose from the villagers. I caught my breah and waved to them. I waved until I couldn't see them anymore. …

191.146 Excerpt from A Memoir Of Misfortune\fn{by Su Xiaokang (1949-)} Zhejiang Province, China (M) 12

Fu Li and I, with our son Su Dan squeezed between us, were in the backseat of a '93 Dodge rental. I was dozing, thanks to a bunch of Chinese students in Buffalo who had kept me up the night before. It was my own damn fault, of course, with my "elegy" of the "yellow civilization" and all the rest of it. I had been badgered with questions on the subject all the way from one end of the world to the other, and in Buffalo, the night before, the discussion had lasted into the small hours. Mind you, to bemoan the fate of the "yellow civilization" under the night skies of North America—that in itself was a form of self-indulgence, an exercise in words—at least until Fu Li walked into the room.

"Su Xiaokang, you are driving tomorrow. Time to break it up."

That was Fu Li's style: no mincing of words, no room for saving face. Her goal in life had always been clear-cut—to be a doctor. But in China even the unenviable job of seeing a hundred patients every day had been taken away from her as one of the side effects of my being on the wanted list. In the United States, she had struggled through the exams needed to qualify as a registered nurse. The exams were now over, and I was dragging her off to see the country.

Fu Li was dressed in a loose-fitting cotton top and shorts, but she was not relaxed. Even half asleep, I could feel the tension in her as she sat on the other side of Su Dan. She had always lived life as if it were filled with pitfalls, while I was perfectly relaxed. For a period of several years I had actually let fame and fortune go to my head, which Fu Li had found intolerable. Fu Li is the sort of person that folks in her home province of Henan refer to as "women with heads held high and men with downcast eyes"—that is, people who do not conform to their prescribed roles. Fu Li always held herself upright, the expression on her face calm and collected. My own infantile attempts at sophistication, added to my general inability to say no—what is called the "amiable ear"—had always roused in her a kind of loving resentment, and she would call me a good-for-nothing.

I had taken my wife and son on this kind of aimless roving several times before. Once, with a group of five or six people, we drove down to Virginia to see where the early English colonists first landed. When we stopped at a restaurant on our way, I picked up my courage and tried to order in English. One young woman giggled, and Fu Li exploded.

"What's so funny? His English is not as good as yours? So what? Isn't it just a matter of your being a few years younger?" She got up and walked out, leaving the girl, Chai Ling, with a flea in her ear.

On another occasion, we went up north to Montreal and then to Toronto and saw Niagara Falls from the Canadian side. Now we had been to see Niagara Falls again, but from the American side, as if there were some strange affinity between its raging turbulence and something in ourselves.

Within the Falls area, Route 90 on the U.S.-Canadian border, though not wide, is neatly divided down the middle by grass dividers. It has an air of tranquillity typical of the East Coast, nothing like the superhighways of the West Coast, where, rather than driving, one seems helplessly propelled forward by a frenzy of speed. Anyway, there we were. It was three or four o'clock in the afternoon and there was very little traffic on the road. The sky was a wash of blue and I dozed off and on, oblivious to Fu Li's tenseness.

I knew Fu Li had doubts about the driver. This was one of the differences between us. Ever since landing in this nation of cars, I had never hesitated to entrust this hundred-plus pounds of whatever I'm made of to whom-ever it might be at the wheel, driving at whatever chosen speed. I was like one of the eight hundred million Chinese who put themselves into the hands of Mao Tsetung to be experimented with during the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution, without bothering their heads about possible disastrous consequences.

My trust had always been given cheaply: I would gladly entrust my safety, my reputation, and my honor to my friends to do with what they liked, as if they were honoring me and giving me "face." Fu Li could never stand this side of me, and we had had many rows about it after we got married. She had never stayed in the West before, but she was by nature a very private person and always drew a line between herself and the rest of the world. During our aimless driving about after her arrival here, she always avoided riding in other people's cars. She did not trust other people's driving, just as she did not trust other people's morals or other people's consciences. But on this occasion she had no choice. I had spent the previous night holding forth and had driven all morning; in the afternoon I was burnt out and had given the wheel to someone else. Fu Li probably had been worrying about this since the night before.

Route 90 was so smooth and the traffic so light, it seemed the Dodge had the road to itself. The Falls area was immersed in the serenity of the summer afternoon. The world had never been so genial. On these open roads, driving was child's play. What was there to worry about? I finally fell sound asleep. The last thing I felt before I departed into slumberland was eleven-year-old Su Dan's little head resting on my shoulder. I now say "departed" because at the time I did not realize that this interval in slumberland (I am not even sure for how long) was a threshold, an entry into another world. Fu Li took leave of me across this threshold, and I did not even give her a parting glance. She had not slept and had not gotten over her tension. Later I realized that people who can sleep through a high-speed car trip must be people like me who are incorrigibly credulous and trusting. So far, the world had treated me well. 1 do not understand why suddenly, on a quiet highway near Niagara Falls, it changed face without warning.

Seven days and seven nights later, 1 woke up to a gray misty world similar to one 1 had woken up in after a raging fever during my early childhood in the city of Hangzhou: a gray mist accompanied by the smell of antiseptic. Shadowy human shapes flitted before me. They said,

"You were in a coma for three days, and then you were raving for three days."

Their voices seemed to come from some cavernous depth and made a buzzing sound. Could 1 walk? I couldn't feel my right leg, and my hipbone hurt excruciatingly.

What happened? Where were Fu Li and Su Dan? The car had flipped over a short distance west of Buffalo, and all three of us were found unconscious. Fu Li and I were taken to Lake Erie County Hospital, while Su Dan was taken to Children's Hospital in Buffalo. He had regained consciousness the next day and was safe in Princeton with a friend.

Somebody came for me and put a pair of crutches in my hands, and I hobbled after him into another room. There was a single bed in the room, surrounded by a network of colorful tubes and gadgets. A figure lay on the bed, hair spread untidily on the pillow, mouth covered by a strange-looking mask. This was not an apparition. The shape under the white cotton sheet was unmistakable. I would know it if it were burnt to ashes: Fu Li. I had a dim memory of her all tensed up in the car when my world was still intact. Now she was lying here, not only totally relaxed but not knowing where her soul was hovering.

I realized that something bad had happened to my beloved. It is a dreadful thing, this unbearable shock of realization that flashes through the brain and drains it. The brain breathes, and it can asphyxiate. The world had given me three such shocks during my life thus far.

First, when I was sixteen years old, Father stood with his back against the light of the window. I could not see his face. I only heard his voice tell me,

"Your maternal grandfather has been executed by the government." This meant I was a "damned cur" one generation removed, not one of the five categories of "red offspring."

The second time, I was forty years old. In a darkened room, poring over a pencil scrawl on a piece of paper, I made out the words saying that I was fifth on the government's most-wanted list.

The third shock came when I was overseas. My cousin called and sobbed over the phone,

"Second Aunt has passed away." Her second aunt was my mother.

Always during those moments my mind would at first go blank and then realize in a flash that my world had changed. But July 19, 1993, was different. This time my world collapsed.

I had fallen asleep and, asleep, had passed through a disaster, the details of which I will never know. It was a dream without memory, blacking out the most fateful moment of my life, leaving me nothing with which to go on. I had no choice but to accept other people's versions of what happened. The car flipped over because the driver, a woman, was fumbling for the windshield wiper. Did it rain? How can one be thrown off the highway for lack of a windshield wiper? The police report stated that when the car went off the highway and flipped over, it landed on its right side, where Fu Li was sitting. Another version had it that both Fu Li and I were thrown out of the car and knocked unconscious. I was sleeping and did not wake up even when my world crashed. Yet a third version held that Fu Li, awake, stretched over from the backseat to help the driver control the car, which had gone insane; that she was struggling in an upright position, and when the crash came her head hit the windshield. This was the cruelest version, and I could not bear to hear it.

Lying in my hospital bed, I tried but could not piece together anything that had occurred in the hours after the crash. I felt frustrated, having my life described to me by others. I felt as if the day of my birth as told by my mother was the only kind of information that was trustworthy.

Come to think of it, however, isn't it true that the Chinese are always having the "unexpected" in their lives interpreted for them by others, and isn't this especially true of my generation, which seems to have grown up through a series of "unexpected" events?

For instance, in 1971 Lin Biao tried to "defect" and his plane crashed in the desert.\fn{A reference to the September 13 incident of 1971, whereby Lin Biao, Mao Tsetung's designated heir, was said to have plotted the "571 Project" to assassinate Mao and seize power. When the plan went wrong, Lin Biao left hastily with his wife, son, and close follow- ers in a Trident jet but crashed in Mongolia. All aboard were repotted dead} At the time the whole country seemed to have gone into a state of shock, and everyone waited for Premier Zhou Enlai and company to offer a proper version of what had happened. At the same time, we did not trust this official version and were always hungry for alternate ones.

Again, in 1989 in Tiananmen, there was another crash. How many died? Who gave the orders to shoot? The world would not accept the version offered by the Chinese leadership but could not come up with a version of its own. Why didn't the students retreat? one might ask. The so-called student leaders at Tiananmen Square each have their own versions. Whom should we believe?

About the car crash of July 19, I accepted only two facts. One was that Fu Li was in a coma. The other was that the police report stated the driver could not drive. By then I had lost even the capacity for anger. From that day onward, the world turned upside down and swallowed me up.

On August 12, 1993, Fu Ii opened her eyes. From then on, she stared silently at nothing for days on end.

Had she lost the power of speech? Was she brain-damaged? Paralyzed? Would she become a vegetable? The moment she opened her eyes, she had to fit into one or another of these categories. It seemed there is a wide range of definitions for the state of existence between non-living and non-dying.

She did not appear to notice the people who came to see her. However, when our son was brought to the hospital from Princeton one afternoon, the minute his loud voice was heard from the corridor, a shiver went through her whole body and her eyes turned this way and that, trying to locate the sound. Yet when our son entered the room and bent over her, calling "Mummy!" she looked at him dumbly, without uttering a word. I marked this day as the day of her awakening and wrote in my diary,

"Fu Li has regained consciousness."

I wondered if she recognized me. My one way of checking was to hold her tremulous right hand every day and try to register its every squeeze, as well as each twitch of her leg. I firmly believe that it was her way of responding to me, the only way she could.

Suddenly one day, a tear welled up in her right eye and lingered over her cheek. I wiped her cheek and cried uncontrollably, turning to the window to hide my tears. Suddenly I felt a tapping of her right hand on my left. I turned around and saw her face contorted intensely. In desperation she tried to tap me again. I suddenly understood what she was saying:

"You mustn't cry, mustn't cry."

Only when vocal communication failed did I realize the importance of speech. I tried another kind of language and whispered a song into her ear. I remembered a lullaby, Little Swallow, that she used to sing our son to sleep. Now I was singing it to wake her up.

Here is a woman with whom I shared life for more than a decade, and now I have to see her reduced to this. Was this kind of life worth living? I had thrust this life upon her. These days, during changing time, when I saw her limp body being turned this way and that by the nurse, all I could do was stand aside and weep.

"I am a good-for-nothing," I would tell her, over and over again. This was the first time I ever saw myself in this way.

It was impossible even.to "hold hands and shed silent tears,"\fn{A stock phrase in classical Chinese romances} for her face was totally devoid of expression. She had never been the expressive type, never put on feminine airs. Now out of her coma, she remained gazing in front of her, her face placid and detached as it had always been. It held the essence of the look of hers that I had always loved best. When I first saw her with that expression on her face, on the bare yellow plains at the other end of the world, my heart had told me, She is the one. We both belonged to that generation when the aging leaders sowed wild oats while we in the bloom of youth were repressed. We first had our hormones diluted with cheap idealism; following that, in the years of "opening up," we were poisoned by greed and driven by brute appetite.

Love had always eluded us; without a miracle one would never encounter the real thing. But our miracle came in her hometown in Henan province in 1979. At the time I was on the editorial staff of a daily paper; Fu Li was a medical student at a local professional school of medicine. It seemed she was determined not to go with the tide. Already twenty-six years old, she still refused to date the young men hovering around her. Her mother, onetime editor-in-chief of a daily paper, was anxious for her to marry and mentioned the matter to an old acquaintance—who happened to be my boss. Thus, she and I met.

To this day, I do not know why she bothered to show up. She walked in, tall and slender in a light blue skirt, gave me a look, and sat down. My boss and I did most of the talking; demurely, she put in a word now and then. She had a mole on the left side of her chin, similar to the one on Mao Tsetung's chin, supposedly a mark of greatness, not a beauty spot, which traditionally should be above the lips. Later I asked her about it. She smiled and told me a mole was just an abnormal growth on the skin and, if hers had not been on her face, she would have had it surgically removed.

At the time I was thirty and had just emerged from a disastrous love affair into which I had thrown myself recklessly with a youthful ardor akin to religious fervor. I felt drained and defeated, with no hope of finding anyone else. But the day I met her, I felt as if I had walked into a refreshingly cool morning. It must be the kind of feeling described by Eileen Chang:\fn{A Chinese writer (1920-1995) born in Shanghai}

"To meet the one among ten thousand, to meet in ten thousand years, not a moment too early nor a moment too late, right on the dot of time. It is beyond words."

After marrying me after a minimum of romance, she later told me that the minute she saw me, she knew I was the one.

She also told me that once she had made up her mind she invited her close friends to meet me, her peers who were already married and had children. She lured me to her place under some pretext and put me on display. Her friends looked me over and unanimously voted against me. They said I was a worthless scribbler and barely matched her in height. (Among the people of Henan, tallness is one of the basic requirements of the eligible bachelor.) But Fu Li said she liked me for my temperament and air of a literary man. So she married the worthless scribbler.

From the hospital window I could see the housing projects of Buffalo's inner-city. The Lake Erie County Hospital, over ten stories high, stands right in the middle of them. I often pushed Fu Li's wheelchair down the corridor of the hospital ward; through the window at the end of the hall, we would gaze beneath us at the the dumb desolation of the projects in the stillness of the setting sun. Life suddenly stood still, frozen, in the summer dusk. Even the lushness of North America would wither before our eyes. How did the two of us find ourselves here? Where are we, anyway?

On another occasion, a familiar melody suddenly broke the silence of her room, sending a thrill through me. It came from the tape recorder at Fu Li's bedside, singing a song: "In a land far far away, there's a sweet sweet girl." The glow of the setting sun settled itself on Fu Li, now tied to her wheelchair, her head secured between two supports, the head once held high now drooping if unsupported. Thus we let time slip by, as the strains of the song drifted around us. The tape was a gift from Kang Hua, a Ph.D candidate in physics at Buffalo University. It was at his place that we had talked away half the night on the eve of the accident.

I do not know whether Fu Li could hear the once-familiar song or whether she could hear me when I sang Little Swallow between sobs. But I found myself lost in the melody, hearing in it a primitive beat, a universal appeal. It reminded me of the forlorn situation of Fu Li and myself, and our helplessness as human creatures cast on this earth. I said to her,

"I escaped in the late spring of 1989, and we were torn apart for two whole years. Now, in the blazing summer of 1993, we were only parted for a week, but it is like a parting for life."

This is how the song moves me, making it my own particular song of Far Far Away, and brings tears to my eyes every time I hear it.

I am not talking about music, I am concerned only with how the song affected me. Actually, In a Land Far Far Away was originally a folk song of love from rural northwest China\fn{Here referring to the base area centered around Ydan'an, Shaanxi Province, where Mao Tsetung set up his power base in the mid-1930s; the folk culture of this area had a deep invluence in forming Communist literary tradition} recovered by the musician Wang Luobin. During the fifties, it was on everyone's lips, virtually becoming our national anthem, a political symbol of "national solidarity." In fact it had been so politicized that, during the dark period of the sixties,\fn{A reference to the Cultural Revolution (1966-1976)} the genuine ring of the song was totally lost. I had always disliked politicized love songs, the most repulsive being The East Is Red,\fn{"The East is red | the sun rises | Mao Tsetung appears in China | he seeks the good of the people, | he is the savior of the people"} which was originally a love song from Northwest China. Our thoughts have been so inured to these fakes, we have lost the capacity to enjoy the flavor of genuine love songs.

But that evening my soul was transported by the strains of the song, as if I had had a glimpse of heaven. Only in the depths of pain, perhaps, can one be so blessed. Without being conscious of it at the time, I was able to hear that song in its pristine rhapsody; it gripped my heart and flooded my soul. For a moment, I felt that Fu Li and I were back in the misty heights of Mount Lu during our honeymoon trip in 1979.

We took the boat from Wuhan to Jiujiang city and from there headed up the mountain to find ourselves the only occupants of a little guest house wreathed in mists at the peak. We were in raptures. After leaving Mount Lu, we took the train and at dusk found ourselves in the town of Tai'an on the outskirts of Mount Tai, right on time to celebrate the Moon Festival. Fu Li said, "Come on, let's climb the mountain!" and off we went. In the darkness of the night, we set out from the north gate of Daiyue Temple, the temple guarding Mount Tai, and started up.

The first leg of the climb, from the Daizong Gate to the Dai tip, was reputedly composed of seven thousand stone steps. Her ponytail swinging behind her back, Fu Li charged ahead, never stopping to rest, and arrived at the Double-Pine Pavilion before daybreak. Obviously impressed, a group of young Latino men at the other side of the Heavenly Ladder decided to race us. Thus as we climbed the dangerously steep stairs, sometimes Fu Li and I left the tourist group behind and sometimes they outstripped us. Racing each other from either side of the Heavenly Ladder, we reached the Southern Gate of Heaven, covering another 1,594 steps for this last leg of the climb. This was the proverbial Eighteen Steep Windings, Eighteen Slow Windings, and Eighteen Windings neither Steep nor Slow.

On the last stages of the Eighteen Steep Windings, one of the young Latinos flopped down on the ground from exhaustion and started throwing up. I stopped to catch my breath for a moment and went over to see whether he was okay. Panting for breath, he pointed to Fu Li and said to me in broken Chinese,

"Your … girlfriend … is beautiful!"

I was off guard and didn't catch his words at first, then realized that he was smitten by Fu Li. What he did not know was that she was already twenty-eight years old. As I turned back, I regretted not telling him that she was my wife. We waited for sunrise at the peak. It was cloudy and the sun did not show herself, but we were blissfully happy anyway.

During the Moon Festival of 1991, Fu Li had been in the United States barely a month. One night after a party, she wrote this in her diary. I came across it by chance after the car accident.

> It is the Moon Festival, and the first time in three years that we celebrated it together. Twelve years ago today, Xiaokang and I got married and went to Mount Lu and Mount Tai. I can't believe that time has passed so quickly. Just now Xiaokang said to me, "Look, you are getting old. Remember how that young foreigner admired you at Mount Tai?" I replied, "It's so depressing to hear you say so." But it's true, I am getting old, with nothing to my name. It breaks my heart.

When I am with Fu Li, I am lifted into heaven; away from her all I have is worldliness, but I never realized it at the time when I was catapulted into celebrity. And now, I am again able to have a glimpse of heaven because "in a land far far away," there are only the two of us together, she seriously wounded, and that land far away is a new stage in our lives.

I watch helplessly as our son grows up on his own. He is no longer what we conventionally consider a Chinese and will not be moved by a song like In a Land Far Far Away. After that evening, I often played that song, repeating it again and again, ruminating through its melody on what I have lost and what I have gained—making a set of accounts one might say. I will never forgive my own recklessness. Recklessness seems to be the most destructive factor in my makeup. Fu Li fought against my recklessness all through our married life, but she lost the battle, in a series of grave misfortunes.

Take this last calamity, for instance, which was outrageous beyond belief. After Fu Li's accident, the driver admitted that she had never driven on a main highway before. Yet I had given the car over to her without a thought and dived into the back seat to catch some sleep.

For the last ten years, I myself was like a crazy old car, careening recklessly among the potholes of China's dangerous political highway, on more than one occasion almost running out of control. Back then Fu Li was at my side, desperately trying to hold me in check, until the spring of 1989, when the car of my fortunes turned upside down. Here in the United States, it was Fu Li who was hurt most seriously, with a cerebral hemorrhage, broken ribs, and punctured lungs.

The pattern of our lives seemed to be that Fu Li would first try to keep me in check and, failing that, would fall into the trap that I had laid.

For instance, I always picked sensitive subjects on which to report, making myself a thorn in the side of the people at the C.C.C.P.\fn{Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party} Propaganda Department and the Ministry of Security. Fu Li would give me a mild rap on the shoulder.

"Take it easy, our son Su Dan is still a baby."

When River Elegy was caught up in controversy, she reminded me not to jump into the fray. But she began to dislike my literary buddies and gave them the cold shoulder whenever they crashed in without warning. She had no trust in the kind of things they were dabbling in.

When the students started their actions in Tiananmen, Fu Li watched me closely. She asked for leave at the hospital where she was working and followed me wherever I went. One day Yan Jiaqi\fn{At the time, head of the Institute of Political Studies at the Chinese Academy of Social Science, Peking, and an advocate for political reform. On the wanted list after June 4th, he is now in the United States} came over and asked me to join him in Tiananmen Square for a declaration. Fu Li held my sleeve and followed me all the way to the square. Carried here and there in the swirling crowd, she would give the sleeve a tug now and then, reminding me to keep a check on my tongue.

Suddenly there was a call for a march and demonstration. The few so-called intellectual elites were caught unprepared, at a loss over how to introduce themselves to the crowd. After all, they couldn't very well repeat the antics of the Cultural Revolution and parade themselves in dunce caps with a board hanging down their necks, could they? In the midst of our perplexity, Huang Shunxing of Taiwan showed up wearing a cloth band slantwise from shoulder to waist with his name and title—HUANG SHUN XING REPRESENTATIVE TO THE NATIONAL PEOPLE'S CONGRESS—written for all the world to see. It was the answer to our prayers, but where were we to find cloth bands in the square? Huang's was probably brought over from Taiwan where it had seen long service, and obviously he had kept it around, foreseeing that sooner or later it would come in handy. For lack of cloth bands we had to make do with paper.

"Fine doings!" Fu Li snorted when she saw me sporting a paper band advertising SU XIAOKANG, AUTHOR OF RIVER ELEGY. However, she followed me up onto a truck, and thus we paraded up and down the Avenue of Eternal Peace. When we got home, she spat out,

"Very nice, you got your moment of glory. All videotaped by the security. From now on you're not going anywhere!"

She meant exactly what she said: She stayed home, guarding the door, in case I was dragged out agaIn. Some individuals would not take no for an answer, my writer friend Zheng Yi being one. He came for the "May 16 Declaration" that I was supposed to have drafted. It was a declaration on behalf of the intellectuals of Peking in support of the students. But I had barely written a word before I dropped it to take part in a new TV program. Zheng Yi was baffled and exploded.

"Fuck! Doing TV now, in these times?"

"That's his job," Fu Li countered.

"Job! Anyone can write a fucking TV script! This is the turning point of history! Everyone has to account for his performance!" Fu Li exploded in turn.

"You go ahead and make history. Leave Xiaokang alone, he hasn't got the makings."

Following that sparring, Dai Qing came over to ask me to join her in Tiananmen Square to advise the students. Fu Li wouldn't allow me to budge. Dai Qing started begging.

"Dear little sister"—Dai Qing's family name was also Fu and she was older than Fu Li—"please give me face just this once."

Fu Li wouldn't let go; she held me tightly by the hand all the way to the door.

Then she gave up. As a result, I went to the square. As a result, I was accused of "counterrevolutionary incendiarism" by the Communist Party.

I ran off to save my own skin, leaving Fu Li behind. By then everyone was heading south, so she also headed south and reached Guangzhou (Canton), on the southernmost tip of the mainland. But she couldn't bear to leave our son, so she turned around and returned to Peking. By then, she was prepared to join me in the trap I had set for myself.

As a result, she is lying here, with a cerebral hemorrhage, punctured lungs, an incision in her throat for oxygen, and two tubes down her nostrils for medication and nutritional fluids.

These alien objects were intrusions in the sensitive parts of her being. The minute she returned to consciousness, she fought them. So her right hand, which was not paralyzed, was tied to the bedpost. Within a few minutes, she freed her hand and again started tugging at the gadgets. So the nurse tied her fingers together one by one before tying the hand to the bedpost.

What followed was a repeated pattern of her fingers struggling through the layers of gauze to pull out the tubes in her nose. The nurse was furious and shouted at me,

"She's making it worse for herself. Do you know how painful it is to insert the esophagus tube?"

I could not bear to watch every time her tube was reinserted. That combination of courage and mad determination on her part, that stubborn resistance to any forced manipulation, was a quintessential expression of her innermost character. I had never before realized what kind of a woman I had married.

Every morning as I rushed to the hospital, what first met my eye was invariably the sight of bloody marks where she had chewed her mouth in frustration. I would see her sitting in her wheelchair as she let the nurse fix her hair, twisting it into whatever shape she liked.

The first letter; which someone carried by hand to Paris, was not dated. It was probably the spring of 1990. At the time I was shuttling between Paris, Taipei, and the United States, feeling very good about myself, while she was trapped and miserable.

> Someone is leaving, and will bring this letter to you, though I am not sure whether you will see it. Your letter made me full of anxiety. I worry about your health. A few days ago, a friend who had seen you in Paris stopped by and described your situation abroad, which made me worry all the more. I cannot imagine how you manage day by day.
> As to the folks at home, there is nothing to worry about. Your parents are not affected, they are in good health, and your father goes to work every day, though I do not know where. Neither are your sister or brother affected. In July [I989] the local security asked your brother for your whereabouts, and they were very civil. During the summer when your whereabouts were unknown, our home was searched, but the people were also very civil. My mother's life has not been affected, either.

One chilly morning on May 20, 1989, almost on the eve of the bloody onslaught, Li Peng\fn{Prime Minister of Chine on June 4, 1989} proclaimed martial law. I feared the worst and hastily left the group working on the sequel to River Elegy. I scuttled here and there, not daring to go home, not knowing where to hide. Fu Li searched for me far and wide. When she finally found me, she did not waste words. She entrusted Su Dan to her younger sister and, holding me by the hand; dragged me to the Peking railway station. We left for Zhengzhou city in her native Henan province, to take refuge with her mothet: The train was crowded with students who had been to Peking to take part in the hunger strike. Some of them actually recognized me, but Fu Li avoided them, giving me no chance to show off. She left me in Zhengzhou and headed straight back to Peking, an eight-hour train ride, first laying down the law about my seeing anybody. Two weeks late, she held our son in her arms through a night of terror as the Avenue of Eternal Peace was strewn with bloody corpses. But at the break of dawn she still went to work at the hospital. Her hospital was located on Chongwenmen Avenue, running parallel to the Avenue of Eternal Peace. One side of the high-rise in-patients' ward had been splattered with bullets the night before. The military police started looking for the "wanted" from door to door: Fu Li figured I might not be safe in her mother's place. For the second time, she left our son with her sister and went south, trying to negotiate a safe hiding place for me. So engrossed was she that she did not even know of the secret directive for my arrest. When she first heard of the “wanted” list, she still did not imagine that I was among the wanted, though by then she had figured out that no one would risk helping het: she worried about me and she worried about our son. On her return, she dared not stop midway in Zhengzhou but flew right back to Peking.

> My mother’s health is okay. She worries about me and came to Peking last November. Seeing that I was all right, she was relieved and headed back.
> Things are okay here with me and Su Dan. The child is somewhat affected by the event, but not too darkly. I approach things from the positive side, telling him that his father is a good man, that sometimes good people are wrongly blamed, but that everything will be cleared up eventually. He does not doubt this for a minute and thus has no sense of inferiority. He will be fine.

The police showed up at the hospital where Fu Li was working. They brought her to the security office. Then they made her sit in the middle of a circle while seven or eight men questioned her on her movements after June Fourth. In July they came again, this time to notify her of a search of our apartment. She said,

“Fine. But it must be during my son’s absence.”

The whole hospital, doctors and nurses and staff, all witnessed the scene as Fu Li was taken away by the police.

> Su Dan’s grades are okay. He doesn’t put enough effort into his studies, always looking for fun, but he has no serious problems. I often criticize him, but never because I am in a bad mood myself and want to take it out on somebody. He has an enormous appetite and is a bit overweight, I am helping him reduce. As for myself, everything is fine. Swings in mood are inevitable, but it all depends on the situation at your end. If your situation remains stable, so will my mood. Physically I am also holding up; nowadays I am really careful about preserving my health. In the daytime I study English, and every Wednesday night I attend classes in Chinese medicine, learning basic skills such as massage and acupuncture. Who knows, someday they may come in handy.
> My own assessment of the situation is this: first, the possibility of your returning in the near future is nil, so the only way to reunite is for us to exit; second, my chance of leaving the country through regular channels is very slim, but it is worth a try, as only through regular channels can I take Su Dan with me; third, I have no hope of applying for study abroad, so I do not let this fact affect my spirits and do not suffer any disappointment on that count; fourth, I am prepared to be denied the right to join you for many many years. I will carry on as usual and bring up our son. Let your heart rest at ease on that count.
> What worries me is your situation. I think that in the first place you should let go of your sense of mission; just sit back and be content to survive as an ordinary man. Only by surviving can you achieve something or write something. Put aside other people’s hopes in you, ignore their expectations. Just be yourself, live according to your own wishes. Perhaps your life will be better. A man cannot sail through life having everything his way, so it is important to keep up your spirits when things do not go as you would like. I can understand you. Try not to drink too much. Take care of yourself and live regularly on a daily basis. If you find it too hard to be on your own, find someone; I won’t blame you. But whatever you do, the most important thing is to create an environment wherein you can lead a normal life. Also, don’t go on buying toys for Su Dan. I have money, enough to last me and our son for many years. Don’t worry. As to your own income, I advise you to make some long-term plans. A good friend will be leaving in a few days and I will send you some supplies.

The second letter is also undated. By then I had settled down in Princeton. A good friend of hers was coming out as a spouse, and through her Fu Li sent me clothes and medicine. There was a stack of photographs in the envelope, one of Fu Li standing in front of the bookcase in our Peking home. Dressed in a red woolen sweatet; she stood with her arms crossed, looking very composed, but the expression on her face was forlorn.

> I really do not know the particulars of your circumstances, cannot put myself in your shoes, and do not have much advice to give you. But somehow I sense that you are under extreme psychological pressure. I feel that in the first place you should just be yourself and try to live according to your own inclinations.
> With too much sense of your responsibilities and no ability to fulfill them, life will be very burdensome. In your literary circles, wasn’t there a saying about how everyone has his turn in the spotlight? That is a perfect description of your situation. A man cannot be on a pinnacle all his life, nor can his writings. If every composition is a work of genius, then the world will be exploding with works of genius and writers of genius, as a result of which there will be no more writers and no more works of genius. If every hill is the highest peak, there will be no more peaks. I never expected you to be a celebrity, and I don’t care one whit what others expect of you. Relax, use this chance abroad to learn something, read what interests you. The situation at home is still pretty tense; attacks have increased. I really think there is not much hope for this country; nobody can fix it. The population is too big, too uneducated, and now everything is at a standstill. Who can tell what the future holds?
> As to the problem hanging over those of you out there, I’m afraid we won’t see an early solution. Don’t be fooled by the release of several individuals. They’re far from thoroughly cleared, just out on bail and living in pure misery. They say that even though you people out there are suffering in exile, you’re better off than they are. As for yourself, I don’t think you'd be released, even on bail, if you were caught. The police are pursuing your case on two counts: the first is the connection between River Elegy and Zhao Ziyang,\fn{Secretary-General of the Communist Party, generally regarded as sympathetic to political reform, who had to step down in the aftermath of June Fourth} the second is your going to Tiananmen to speak to the students. As to the first, they have ended up with nothing substantial. On the second issue, the organizer, Dai Qing, has not yet been released, but from the material I have been able to get hold of, it seems they can't build up a major case against her. From the way the people who are handling her case are talking, you can tell that the episode of going to Tiananmen is not a major issue. Which means to say they know you have nothing to do with politics, but they still won't let you off the hook. Do not delude yourself with false hopes.

Of course I am not saying that you should throw yourself into politics just because of the hopeless situation. I think you should consider the roads open to you. Above all, never become a "professional revolutionary." Learn English, find a job, and cut your links with the clique you are currently involved in. Your strength is still in your pen, but do not rush things. The day will come when we can all settle down. Most people feel that it will be decades before our country can enjoy real stability. So in terms of the future, you must be prepared to settle abroad. Even if you need to come back for the sake of your "identity," our family still needs a place abroad as a last refuge. I hope that you will be able to hold out under any circumstances and face life and the future in a spirit of optimism. Our day will come.

Fu Li left home and came to a foreign land to join me. What's the point of babbling about "concern for the nation and concern for the people" if I cannot even protect a woman who has given up everything for my sake? That the Almighty decided to punish me by hurting her is more than I can bear; I beg the Almighty on my knees to kill me instead. I was never a man destined for good fortune, but it turned out that I married the best wife in the world. What is the meaning of all this?

There is a destiny in men's lives. Apart from us mainlanders who have been brainwashed into a ruthless atheism, is there anyone in the world who does not harbor a fearful respect for a power beyond themselves? Since 1985, I had been basking in wotldly gain and glory. In the years 1988 and 1989, so-called mediums had sent me warning signals, not to mention Fu Li's anxiety on my account. I ignored them all, being totally wrapped up in myself, but in her eyes I was more immature than the students.

When I luckily escaped the pursuit and arrests following June Fourth, I actually wallowed in self- congratulation, deluded fool that I was. As the shots rang out in Tiananmen, I left my mother-in-law's home in Zhengzhou and started on my hundred-day life on the run. A group of people whom I had never met came to my rescue. Casually, they walked me out of a city where the WANTED list was posted on every street corner and where the police had conducted a meticulous door-to-door search. Equally cool, these people escorted me onto an island in the sea, an island where every incoming ferry was searched and questioned. Following that, we crossed a bay that was crisscrossed by patrol boats and the opposite shore sealed off with gun emplacements. Finally, late one night I stood in Shatin under the windows of a high-rise building, gazing at the glittering lights of the Hong Kong racetrack, and my heart was actually filled with self-glory. How could this be other than the hand of Heaven steering me?

But the same hand that steered me to safety thrust me in deeper trouble. As in the previous case, I had been warned but had ignored the signals. Was this not fate? The sweet was followed by the bitter, giving me a taste of the whole range of human emotions.

I am looking again at the picture of Fu Li in her red woolen sweater; arms crossed, the expression on her face forlorn, as I continue the letter that was brought me by hand

My life here is very smooth, believe me. Colleagues at the hospital are friendly, no one picks on me, and I have enough to live on. Don't worry. I feel low now and then, but how can I help it? However, these moods come.. and go. A while ago, you told me to apply for permission to go abroad, and I started the proceedings. But to this day I have not received your affidavit of financial sponsorship or acceptance into a school for Su Dan. Have I been misinformed, or have you run into difficulties? There's no way to discuss this over the phone. But I want you to know where I stand: Su Dan and I have no problems staying here on our own. The reason for trying to leave is to join you, because in such adversity it is better to have family with you than to cope on your own. Whether we should try to leave earlier or otherwise is up to you, depending on circumstances on your side. Think it over carefully and give me an answer as soon as you can, so that I will be prepared. As to the methods of exit, I insist on leaving through legal channels; I will start the application process only when everything for a legal exit is in place, because only then can I take our son with me. I do not consider for a moment other, irregular, ways of exit. Also, if it is within your means, try to lodge an appeal for family reunion through "humane" channels. You have got yourself entangled in this mess; it's hard to get out of it. Face the fact that this society of ours does not respect the individual, so don't indulge in wishful thinking. Actually, you have always held illusions regarding China.

I have no illusions whatever. My letters to you were mostly written for police inspection. After you left, many former friends were afraid to contact me. Some, however, offered to use contacts with the higher-ups to get me out. I refused. I also warn you to be careful when speaking to people you don't know. Never mention anything you heard from me; that's dangerous. During this past year since you have been abroad, you have gradually lost your vigilance toward the situation here. Actually we are still in danger. Any hints in your letters, if detected, mean trouble for me. People change, you know; you can never tell what they are capable of. How I wish you could go back to writing freely on any subject you liked! But above all, extricate yourself from politics. Even if it is not possible, still you must keep a grip on yourself. Another thing is, don't let whatever steps you take hinge on my situation. If in our telephone conversations you keep talking like that, it will just encourage them to keep me here to control your movements abroad. It will actually hurt my cause. Remember, they can't really do anything to me. In a word, let your decisions rest on your judgment of your own situation. This letter has been dragging on for three days. Such an opportunity! I just put down whatever pops up in my head.

I have been thinking and thinking since you left, and I decided that just sitting around and waiting is not the solution. I want to be self-supporting under any circumstances; perhaps this is one of the differences between me and the other "fugitive" wives left behind. I think it is better for my spirits too to be trying to do something instead of just sitting back and waiting. Of course separation is painful, how can it not be, unless our marriage is on the rocks? Your letter tells me to just wait patiently. I do not understand what you mean. Do you mean I should not do anything, but just live day by day? Do explain what you mean when you write next.

I asked a cousin to issue Fu Li an invitation, and 1 also sent her an I-20 form. She followed the application procedures step by step, and soon sent me another letter:

After my trip to my mother's place for the Spring Festival, I returned and went straight to the Public Security for my application. The answer was speedy: I am classified as one who would "constitute a danger to national security" if allowed to leave the country, and I was told to forget it. Besides, there are documents, I was told, specifying that family members of "traitors" and people on the WANTED list cannot be allowed to leave the country. I asked which organization had issued the documents. Were they for internal circulation or open to the public? I was told that they are internal documents from the State Council. I further asked whether this conforms to civil rights ensured by the Constitution, and whether this is in keeping with Party policy. The answer is, This is necessary for national security. From then on, they stopped talking any sense. We always overestimate these people, making them out as better than they are.

Finally I made two requests. I said, I cannot do anything to counter your documents, but for my own sake and that of the child, can I leave the country with my child if I annul my marriage? The answer: "Your marriage does not look like it's being annulled, is it? And even if it is, the answer is still no." Then I said, Okay, if I am to be tied down to the marriage all my life, so be it, but my child is innocent. He is not yet of age, he would not be a threat to national security. But the answer was still no.

I appealed to an international human rights organization, and luckily Fu Li was included in a list of people that the U.S. government negotiated with China to have released. And so at the end of the summer of 1991, Fu Li was allowed to leave the country with our son. Child in hand, she crossed thousands of miles to be with me, and I was blessed with the joy of family life for two years. And then, things were so ordered that I was made to fall asleep in a car on a highway so I would wake up to see my wife lying in an emergency room like a vegetable, and to hear the doctor tell me that she is hemorrhaging into the brain.

Is this fate? I asked myself as I stood in the huge hospital building. It looked like a factory where patients were parts and pieces of the machinery. People like me who write "uplifting" prose use the word "fate" with the highest frequency, but we always use the word to question the country or the nation, uttering it so grandiloquently and so glibly. There was even a section on "fate" in my TV series River Elegy. But when it is my turn to ask about my own fate, the heavens have already collapsed around me.

I suddenly remembered the first calamity that had struck Fu Li and me. She had conceived a pair of twins but had only been able to keep one. Twelve years later the second calamity; she was allowed to travel thousands of miles to reunite with me in the United States, only to be struck down. It is senseless. Aside from the punishment of heaven, there is no other explanation. Fu Li was a naturally cautious person, always weighing pros and cons before taking a step. After losing that other son, she was even more fearful of some unforeseen disaster, but it happened anyway.

It occurred to me for the first time that Fu Li was most unfortunate in marrying me. There seem to be unforeseen calamities in my life, but, my fate being "tough," my calamities were transferred to this woman who is my wife. Why are things ordered like this?

I was always running into scrapes, but I never gave them a thought, never learned caution. Not even Fu Li could deal with my recklessness. That day in the lounge of the hospital, I suddenly remembered I had been warned of this calamity.

It was the summer of 1991. I was working on a TV movie in Taipei and at night was often dragged by friends to the Yinlu Teahouse, where we drank wine and listened to music and songs sung in the local dialect. After several visits, I learned that the owner was actually a fortune-teller. There were some among our group who dabbled in stocks and would consult him on their luck. One day they egged him on to tell my fortune. I can't tell whether he knew anything about my background. He asked my date and hour of birth and said,

"The gentleman has just passed through a great calamity, is that right? Well, not to mince words, there is another one coming."

"When?"

"When you are around forty-five. It is probably something like a traffic accident."

Nobody took this warning seriously, treating it as a joke. I didn't give it a thought myself. The fortune-teller was probably the only one who was in earnest. But when the accident happened, I was forty-five by the lunar calendar.

If I used a wet napkin to wipe the dead skin and dried blood clots off her lips, Fu Li stretched her mouth to meet the wetness of the tissue. Her throat gurgled dryly. Sometimes she coughed or sighed or even made a sound like "ouch." Her punctured lungs had become infected, and she had lost the ability to swallow. Giving her water through a feeding tube was out of the question. It was equally impossible to quench her thirst through the nose tubes. She was being tormented by thirst and could not say it; she could not even make a gesture because her hands were tied.

As I wiped her with the wet napkin, I kept saying to her, We shouldn't have left your hometown of Zhengzhou. If we hadn't moved to Peking, I wouldn't have earned that bit of fame and wouldn't have gotten into so much trouble. Today we would be sitting with your mother and sister and brother, leading our quiet lives, making hot dumplings for the Spring Festival.

"Or," I said, "I should have waited for you in Paris, we wouldn't have driven anywhere, in someone else's car; the metro is superb, and you would have loved the rich cultural heritage of Paris and the ease of living."

She opened her eyes, her face placid and relaxed, just listening. Sometimes she would be restless, trying to turn her body this way and that; we turned her over—ah, her buttocks were red and infected. Once when we did this and our faces were close against each other, her right hand clung to my head, trying to press it against her face in a show of endearment, while her bandaged hand patted my face softly as if saying, Don't be sad.

In the afternoon, I would sit in the ground-floor lounge, waiting to take her to her physical therapy session. One day in the middle of September, the news broadcast suddenly announced that Wei Jingsheng, after fifteen years in prison, was being released. It was part of China's bid for the Olympic Games. I should have gone to prison, I thought to myself. Avoiding the calamity of prison only called up another calamity. If I were in prison in Peking, Fu Li would come for jail visits with Su Dan. But now our roles are changed; she is in prison, while I bring Su Dan to see her, though he cannot understand the nuances of the situation. As my thoughts wandered here and there, I seemed to understand for the first time that I was but a mediocre creature, mistaken by the world for what I was not, and only with the collapse of my world could I be freed from that imposture. But I have never acted with evil intent; why was I being punished thus? I was scared out of my wits by the prospect of prison. Was I being punished for that by having my wife turned into a wreck?

As I wake up this morning, I see a naked back protruding out of the other sleeping bag, lying exposed on the floor. It's Su Dan, turned virtually motherless in the blink of an eye. Only then am I aware, with a wisp of sadness, of the existence of my son.

When Children's Hospital found that both parents of this Chinese boy were still unconscious, they planned to follow regulations and take him to an orphanage. Fortunately a friend, Su Wei, rushed over from Princeton to keep him for us, pretending to be his uncle. At the time, Fu Li was still unconscious, and for seven days I was stuck in a hospital bed, unable to walk. I drifted in and out of consciousness, hallucinating that I had taken Su Dan with me back to the apartment of Kang Hua, the man with whom we spent the evening before the accident, and that I had been lying on the floor at his place for a whole month.

Su Dan was still asleep. I crawled over and said to him softly,

"Daddy is leaving." He turned over, raised his head, and asked,

"When are you coming back?"

"Seven tonight."

"Try to come back early, Daddy."

Every morning I left him lying on the floor. Kang Hua would come pick me up at a fixed hour and drive me to the hospital, and I would always ask him to stop by a Bower shop to get Fu Li a rose. In all our dozen years of marriage, I had never given Fu Li roses. At the time in China, it was not the thing to do. But now I wanted to give her a rose every day.

That morning, I got up exceptionally early and walked out in a daze. Buffalo, bordering Canada, was wrapped in the shadow of autumn, especially bleak on a deserted morning like this. All alone, I walked aimlessly about in the woods, until I found myself at the edge of a shimmering lake. As I stood by the water, my heart was filled with tender sweetness. I felt uplifted, as if I had reached a wonderful fulfillment. But immediately I was seized by a fearful shivering and rushed off. I don't know how long I had been walking about until I reached a highway. There was no traffic and I stood there on the highway all alone, with one thought only—how to end it all.

I don't know how I left the highway. Perhaps it was the memory of Fu Li lying unconscious in the emergency room, perhaps it was the vision of Su Dan's naked shoulders on the floor that pulled me back. All I remember is the thought that flashed through my mind, but I did not know how to describe it. Only later, while reading an interpretation of Dostoyevsky, did I accidentally come across the perfect description of my state of mind at the time, of "hope forever gone, only life left behind, and there is a long life to go through. You cannot die, even though you do not want to live."\fn{From Liu Xiaofeng, Truth Crucified (Peking, Sanlian Joint Publishing, 1991)}

I had loved Dostoyevsky ever since I was young and had enjoyed reading The Idiot. I was quite dejected when I could not find volume II after finishing volume I. My father told me to read The Brothers Karamazov, but I couldn't finish it. Later I realized it was because I could not understand the soul-searching nature of Dostoyevsky's prose. But now a few words on Dostoyevsky could light up my soul. I wrote in my diary:

> In all my readings of the last ten months, this passage is closest to my heart: unprecedented despair and devastation with no words of comfort, no ways of displacement nor means of release. Everything gained in life irretrievably lost, with not a single straw to hold on to; this is probably what I had never realized before—the rootlessness of the individual soul.

All I can remember of that time by the lake was that it was a day in early September, 1993. But on that morning I suddenly saw the abyss of existence, the bottomless black hole extending under my feet. The experience of that morning cut my life into two. The first half, carrying with it the burden of my youthful strivings and worldly gains, had drifted away into meaninglessness. What was left was the second half, an empty mortal coil, a wandering ghost in a huge black hole.

Hitherto I had never had an impulse toward death but only a desire for life. Often, the more terror life held, the more I wanted to live. In my fugitive life following June Fourth, I had once hidden for nearly fifty days in a darkened room. I felt I was going mad, but I still clung to life. Only when living means unbroken fear does one have the impulse to give up. I suppose that is the black hole. Perhaps it is only when man faces this black hole that he can begin to question what existence is about and realize that living needs courage, ask himself whether his life is a failure and question whether it was worthwhile.

Lost forever was the tender sweetness that wrapped itself around me by the lake that morning. I have faced this black hole, faced a broken-down existence that was mine alone. The fact of Fu Li lying there unconscious condemned me to utter defeat and reduced my life to absolute meaninglessness. Saying that man can control his own destiny sounds to me like a hideous joke. My friends and I had thought of ourselves as somebodies, had been so cocky about fixing our country, our nation, our society, our civilization, all sick to the core, yet when we have to face alone the calamity of an individual or a family, our world collapses beneath us and we have nothing to hold on to.

One of the co-writers of the script for River Elegy, Yuan Zhiming, was quoted as saying that we have been chased out of China at the risk of our lives; he meant that "we have gained the freedom of a heaven, but lost the earth beneath our feet." I myself, however, beg to disagree. His saying about losing the earth seems to echo the concept of "earth fixation" that he himself had condemned in his script. When I myself was reduced to crying to heaven and earth in absolute despair, there was nothing to gain or lose; there was no distinction between sky and earth.

Soon after the accident, Chen Shuping with her husband, Professor Yingshih Yu, took the train from Princeton to Buffalo. As she entered the hospital room, Chen carried a soft toy rabbit, holding a baby rabbit to its breast, which she laid softly at the top of Fu Li's bed. Fu Li was still bound to her wheelchair, unable to raise her head, and could only tap her friend with her right foot.

"She was greeting me," Chen told me later.

I followed Professor Yu to the second-floor cafeteria and started crying the minute we sat down.

"I want to take her home to China," I said. He took out cigarettes, handed me one, and, seeing that I refused, lighted one himself as he answered,

"You think they will be so kind as to let you in?"

I had made a brief stop in Paris in the early spring of 1993. Mlle. Tan Xuemei, a professor of Chinese literature at the Seventh University of France and a good friend of ours, had mentioned a new book by Garcia Marquez: Strange Pilgrims: Twelve Stories. She had translated an article on the book, but by the time her translation reached me by post, Fu Li's accident had happened. Her translation reads:

> It is quite obvious even from the theme that Twelve Stories hovers between the fantastic and the cryptic. Known for his Hundred Years of Solitude and The Autumn of the Patriarch, Garda Marquez in this new work again incorporates the Latin-American tradition into his own unique style. Marquez's own writing life began with legends, but he is now drawing inspiration from reminiscences of his exile in France, Barcelona, and Italy. Yet his own distinctive style remains.
> In his introduction to Twelve Stories, Garcia Marquez mentions that these stories acquired form twenty years ago and then were left to brew. They were gradually forgotten and sprang to life again during his exile in Europe. The "geological" method of composition, typical of his style, highlights one outstanding incident and piles over it layers and layers of memory, achieving a final effect with the realistic precision of the earth's crust. One of the stories involves a figure who haunts the halls of the Vatican, dragging the corpse of his daughter. Another describes a young Colombian woman honeymooning in Europe, and how she dies from loss of blood from a prick on her finger. In a third story, a group of children on holiday in Sicily plot to kill their obnoxious housekeeper. The stories seem unearthly and yet earthy. They are uniformly about rootless people trying to break out of their stifling "continental rationalism" but only able to escape through absurdity, magic, insanity, or death itself. …

192.82 The Festival Of Graves\fn{by Zhu Lin (1949-)} Shanghai, China (F) 9

Rain beat down, relentless and slate-gray in the howling wind. It poured through the bare branches of the trees and battered the stunted shoots of winter wheat. Only the shallow river rejoiced, as it swallowed up the rain and the turbid streams that swept along the ditches between the fields. Then the wind died down, and the rain stopped. Sunlight pierced the clouds like a magic sword, and the land shone. The river waters rushed on in shining torrents, sweeping away the waterweeds left behind from the year before.

The trill of a bird wafted from the depths of the bamboo grove, breaking the silence of winter. But people seemed unconvinced by this harbinger of spring, until they looked up at the soft blue of the sky or noticed pale yellow buds of forsythia on the sunlit slopes and shepherd's purse spreading its carpet of fresh white flowers over the fields.

Wind followed, then more rain and a rumble of thunder. After the storm subsided, the sun broke through again, and a profusion of lilac wolfberries, yellow dandelions, and blue wildflowers dotted the meadows like stars. An emerald curtain of weeping willow fronds adorned with tiny catkins of pastel yellow billowed to the surface of the water.

She surveyed it all coldly, and the stirring of new life filled her with an irrational dread. Each day the earth became more bountiful, and each day she felt more empty and alone. Here it was again, April Fifth, the Festival of Graves. Withered branches along the riverside thrust forth buds of white and red, peach and plum trees burst into bloom, and in the vegetable plots the rape plants flowered golden yellow. Bamboo shoots pushed like steer horns through the soil, and the leaves on the willow trees burst forth like blossoms. The waterweeds revived and embellished the waters with their vivid color. When she opened the door, a dazzling haze of green confronted her.

As she brushed her hair, she examined herself in the mirror. She saw a gray, lined face, eyes like dry wells, a sharp nose, and a puckered mouth. Worst of all was her chin, which looked as if it had been gouged away by a shovel. Her few remaining teeth protruded between thin lips. It was the face of an old woman ready for the coffin.

Try as she might, she couldn't understand how age had crept up on her. Other women could watch their children grow and sigh at the passage of time:

"They're so big now, it's no wonder I'm getting on."

But there was none of this for Huang Huizhen, she who had handled women's affairs and served as the commune's Party secretary. She had not endured the pain of childbirth or known the joy and pride of being a mother and grandmother. Her life seemed to have jumped from childhood to old age; the fantasies of young womanhood had hardly existed. The past was reduced to a dim vision: the setting sun burning out like a last ember in the ashes, the moon's pale crescent high in an inky sky. An old graybeard emerged from the gloom, singing a senseless riddle:

From times gone by, who knows when,
few survive three score and ten.
Childhood slips by in a haze,
dotage passes in a daze.
Inbetween is haste and hurry,
days of toil and nights of worry.
Once mid-autumn's come and gone,
see the moon grow pale and wan.
Past the Festival of Graves,
flowers wither, blossoms fade. …

She must have been six years old, squatting by a stream playing in the mud, kneading crumbs of soil into the shape of rolls, then crumbling them and starting again. The strange song had delighted her then. She looked up to catch a glimpse of the old man's face, but just then the last dim light of dusk died. Disembodied, the gruff voice sang on:

Round and round the seasom go,
the curfew tolls, the roosters crow. …

There had been more besides, but she couldn't remember what. Something about grave mounds, perhaps. Nor could she remember who the old graybeard was. An uncle, maybe a great-uncle—at any rate someone from her family. It embarrassed her that not all her ancestors had been the simple commoners she would have liked them to be.

Huang Huizhen couldn't understand why this vision had been haunting her since the beginning of spring. Why should she be remembering the events of childhood so late in life? At times she felt she had dreamed it all. The graybeard couldn't possibly be any relation of hers. How could she, a Communist, a revolutionary, and a materialist, indulge in such delusions? Why could she not recall the deeds from her past that merited praise and brought her glory? Was this some ill omen, warning her that she was not long for the world?

She was a little afraid of dying. She was already sixty-six years old, and as the local saying goes,

"Sixty-six, sixes doubling, bean curd boiling hot and bubbling."

This means that when you get to this age, the traditional funeral dish of bean curd is ready for your death. So the custom of the region was for all daughters to give their parents sixty-six cubes of pork on the Festival of Graves in the year they reached sixty-six. It was said that by eating the sixty-six cubes of meat the old folks could avoid illness. Then, once this milestone had been passed, the parents could live on for many more years. So, on this morning, people who had survived into their sixty-sixth year would all wait anxiously for their daughters to come by. Those who had no daughter of their own would make arrangements for a stand-in, who would carefully prepare a bowl of diced pork and carry it ostentatiously through the village.

Huang Huizhen would not copy the practices of ignorant peasants. She was a woman of status and high revolutionary consciousness and had always despised such customs as adopting stand-in daughters and eating sixty-six pieces of pork. She also knew something about science and realized that for older people to eat so much meat at a single sitting could be hard on their systems and cenainly would not prolong their lives. Besides, there was the expense to be considered! Such cogent reasoning should have been enough to reassure her, but somehow it did not. How unfathomable people can be—sometimes we can see into everyone's heart but our own.

On the morning of the Festival of Graves, she was ill at ease. Outside, spring was bright and fecund, so much so that the festival to honor the dead became a celebration of life. The villagers were making the sticky-rice dumplings that are always eaten at the festival, kneading them into all sorts of shapes, round, elongated, and pointed. Pampered children took bites out of each kind. If they did not like what they tasted, they would spit it out, or else they would eat the filling and discard the slippery outer shells. Grandmothers would grumble at their antics, but even when the little darlings tossed their leftovers to the chickens and ducks or played with them like mud pies, it didn't seem to affect the general good mood.

In Huang Huizhen's eyes, these unlettered rustics were no better than mother hens sitting on their eggs. All they cared about was raising sons and carrying on the family line. All these years after the revolution, their consciousness was still so low that they were more concerned about the yield from their beans or the fact that their latest grandchild had a dick than they were about the great affairs of the Party and the state. She found this vexing and painful. Huang Huizhen would not pander to their primitive beliefs or join in their merriment.

She looked silently round at her four walls, hung with the pictures of her past. There had been a time when she had liked to open the windows and flood the room with light, letting the sun's crimson rays shine on her photographs and warm her heart. But later she had become nervous about drafts, and the windows had remained shut tight from that time on. Now the photographs before her were yellowing and faded with age.

The damp cold chilled her to the bone. She had lived alone since her husband's death, without even a dog or a chicken to keep her company. Now the place seemed uninhabited, a wasteland, with no babies crying, children toddling, and toys scattered about.

There was a measured knocking at the door. Startled, she sat bolt upright. Then, after a moment, the knocking came again, still firm, and courteously insistent. She hurried to her feet, her heart fluttering with hope. Could it possibly be … had her daughter come?

For she had a daughter. Not her own flesh and blood, but the child of her husband's first wife. Even though she was a stepmother, she had truly loved the child and cared for her. When the girl was young, she had taught her to sing, "The sky in the liberated areas is the brightest sky of all," and told her tales of the Red Army's final surge to victory in the civil war. She wasn't one to coddle a child, but she certainly never treated her poorly. There had always been food on the table and clothes to wear. Not too many clothes, of course, and not much in the way of treats and toys, but what harm was there in raising the child in the tradition of revolutionary austerity? When her daughter married, she gave her two chests and some quilts as her dowry. What the girl actually wanted was a dressing table, but Huang Huizhen drew the line at that. Dressing tables were for the pampered young daughters of the bourgeoisie. How could a Communist Party cadre provide such a gift? When she saw how disappointed her daughter was, she spent a little extra on books; but the young couple seemed uninterested in the kind of books she gave them and behaved most ungratefully. They did maintain appearances, however, and visited her at New Year and on festivals.

Her daughter became pregnant soon after the wedding and gave birth to a little girl. The young woman, her husband, and his parents all wanted to try again for a boy. By then, however, the one-child policy was in effect, and Huang Huizhen was the official responsible for women's matters. She tried several times to persuade her daughter to volunteer for sterilization, but the young woman would not consent and began to avoid her. So Huang Huizhen went to the factory where her daughter worked and impressed on them that they were not to make any concessions in this case because of connections with officialdom. Her daughter's response was to stop going in to work. Six months later there was a general inspection by the birth control authorities, and all the women of the commune were ordered to present themselves for examination. Huang Huizhen's daughter was brought in, already heavily pregnant. The mother's face darkened with fury:

"Take her away, and abort it!" Guards stepped forward to drag her away, but the young woman slumped to the ground and wailed,

"Mother, Mother, I beg you, let me have my baby!"

Huang Huizhen remembered her daughter as a headstrong child, too proud to beg, who had seldom called her Mother. So she was quite taken aback at such desperate pleading. Still, birth control was Party work, and how could she let personal feelings interfere with that? If she let her daughter off, how could she enforce the policy on other women?

When they heard that Huang Huizhen had refused to give permission for the baby to be born, her son-in-law and his parents, both of them in their sixties, came in and knelt before her.

"Chief Huang," begged the old grandfather, "if you'll only let her give birth, the whole family will kowtow and burn incense for you, and the child will remember your kindness all his life …" Huang Huizhen was exasperated at their pigheadedness and hissed through clenched teeth,

"All right, if you want the child so much, pay the fine. It's a thousand yuan!"

In fact, the regulations stipulated half that. She had spoken as she had only to get rid of them since she was sure they couldn't raise the cash. But, instead, her words seemed to galvanize them all like a shot of ginseng. They dashed off to borrow what they needed, and within twelve hours they were back to her with the thousand yuan. Not that it did them any good.

Huang Huizhen was the kind of official who always has to take the lead in implementing Party policy and never invites the disapproval of her superiors. She refused the money, and her daughter was hauled off to the clinic. An examination confirmed that she was seven months pregnant, and an abortion was ordered. But then—and nobody quite knew how it could have been done with so many watching eyes—someone slipped her a note, and she announced that she had to go to the bathroom. Guards were sent with her, of course, and posted at the door. But when after several minutes she had still not emerged, they went in to find the room empty! Incredibly she had managed, as heavily pregnant as she was, to escape through a high and narrow window.

There must have been accomplices! It was a conspiracy! Huang Huizhen was livid. Her husband attempted to talk her around as they lay in bed that night: the girl was his only family, and besides she was seven months gone; why not just let her have the child? Such talk only made her more determined, and after a sleepless night she sent people out at daybreak to tie her daughter up and bring her in.

They strapped her to the birthing table and induced labor. To the astonishment of all, the seven-month fetus was alive—and a boy! The doctor had no choice but to put the baby in an incubator. The daughter's whole family was overjoyed: they lit incense, recited the name of the Buddha, and then came happily along to pay the fine. The hospital officials were at a loss to know what they should do, so they went to Huang Huizhen to ask for directions.

Huang Huizhen ordered them to remove the baby from the incubator immediately. Shortly after, his little life ebbed away.

Her daughter's family wailed in anguish. Mad with rage, the old father-in-law seized a knife and vowed to have it out with Huang Huizhen. If the authorities hadn't intervened, locking the old man up for a few months on a charge of intended homicide, her life might have been at risk.

The ill will that this incident had generated between her daughter and herself had endured for over ten years. Her daughter had never visited her since then. The consensus of the village gossips was that Huang had gone too far. People felt that she had only been so mean because the girl wasn't her own flesh and blood. But that just wasn't so! It wasn't that there was any bad blood between her and her daughter. She was acting for the Party and the state, for the public good!

Time and time again she had considered going to see her daughter to explain, but the girl had become a stranger to her. Only today did she realize how much she longed to see her again. She shook convulsively as she reached for the doorknob. Today is the festival, she thought. Perhaps my daughter will bring me sixty-six pieces of pork like the village bumpkinsdo …

But when she opened the door, it was to a messenger to tell her that she should go to county headquarters for a Party meeting.

Despite her disappointment, she felt some slight comfort. At least officialdom hadn't forgotten her. Even if her daughter didn't bring her anything, the county would treat her to a meal—and a few pieces of pork would be nothing compared to the banquet that was certain to follow the meeting.

It was mild outside, the warm breeze redolent with pollen and honey. On this day, the Festival of Graves, there was an unaccustomed bustle of activity by the bend in the river where the commune's dead rested. For many years, the graves had been neglected and allowed to become overgrown, their only visitors passing birds pecking at the nut bush. The dead had passed lonely years in the shadows of solemn evergreens, secure in their coffins, spared the atrocities that the living committed against each other.

Now, however, times were changing. In a period of affiuence, people were more inclined to feel concern for their ancestors, and on this festival day they brought offerings of fish and meat, wine and vegetables, to the gravesides. Now that they had more to spend on themselves, they worried that the dead might still be poor, so they burned silver ingots made of tinfoil. Strings of paper money, yellow, white, and green, hung from the trees by the graves, spinning in the breeze like colored lights revolving over a dance floor. Huang Huizhen had always turned up her nose at such superstition, but today she was a little less inclined to find fault.

She was quite warm by the time she arrived at the government office compound. Sweat beaded on the tip of her nose, and her cheeks were flushed as if she had been drinking. Other old comrades were streaming in to attend the meeting. Some were being led along by their grandchildren, some were perched on the backs of bicycles pedaled by their sons, still others hobbled in leaning on their canes. In this company, Huang Huizhen seemed very sprightly to have come along under her own steam.

She had every reason to feel proud of herself. She had served a three-year term as Party secretary of the commune (or county, as it was now called). The two pines at the gate of the compound had been planted in those years on her orders. Since then, an orchard had been added, which shimmered with the pink petals of flowering cherries—trees that to her eyes were eminently lacking in the resolute spirit of the pines. In her days … but enough of that. Her back was straight and her head held high as she strode into the meeting hall.

Through force of habit, she surveyed the room as she entered. Nobody jumped up and exclaimed,

"Here's Secretary Huang!"

Nobody ran over with a stool or poured her a cup of tea. It was as if she, their former Party secretary, were invisible to them, like a bubble, like thin air. They just sat there chattering merrily away, gossiping or complaining about their sons and daughters-in-law. Irritated at their rudeness, she cleared her throat. At last some of them looked around at her, nodded briefly, forced a smile, and then went back to discussing all the things they had to do at home and comparing their various aches and pains.

She stalked angrily over to a seat by the window, sat down, and did her best to ignore them. Of course she wouldn't join in—here they were, old Party members, hardly out of office, and they had turned into a pack of gossips. What a disgrace! She wouldn't have tolerated this kind of sloppiness when she was Party secretary. But the new deputy county head didn't seem bothered by it at all. He read through a Party document about carrying out rectification at the local level with a smug grin on his face and then remarked to the chattering crowd in front of him,

"Well, now I've put you in the know about the spirit of the document from Party Central. Considering the fact that you're all getting on, and it's been quite an effort for you to make it to county headquaners today, I suggest that you have your lunch and then head home."

Huang Huizhen had understood perfectly well when she was summoned to county headquarters that the meeting would be only a formality. Still, she was most displeased at what this wet-behind-the-ears official had to say. In her day, whenever Party Central had announced a new initiative or set forth key duties, she never failed to organize discussion groups and send feedback to her superiors. Then she would select model peasants for everyone else to emulate, identify pacesetters in carrying out the new policy, and publicize their experience with the campaign. And what did you get these days?

"Put you in the know," indeed!

"Have some lunch!"

What do you take us old comrades for? Are we just windbags, lunch buckets? Others might be willing to accept it, but not Huang Huizhen. She had joined the Party in 1948, before this new deputy county head had been born.

Not that she didn't want the meal, of course. After the exertions of the morning, she had started to feel hungry some time ago. Besides, one of her reasons for coming was that she wanted to eat meat, to make up for her disappointment over the sixty-six cubes of pork.

The meeting hall was transformed into a dining hall, and young Butch, the chef from the county government offices, came in with some other youngsters to lay out the bowls and chopsticks. She couldn't abide Butch. His class origins weren't anything to be proud of, and to make matters worse, he followed current fashions, growing his hair long like a girl, wearing jeans that hugged his backside, and talking in slang that didn't sound at all proper. He also took advantage of the fact that he and the new chief had gone to school together and had been roommates when they had returned to the village. Now he addressed the deputy county head unceremoniously as "Little Li." And not only did the official allow this, but he even slapped the other on the back:

"Hey, buddy, mind how you do your work today. Cook the meat as tender as you can; these old comrades don't chew so well."

Butch was downright rude. Staring maliciously right at Huang Huizhen, he snorted:

"Huh, they've eaten well so long they've all rotted their teeth." Little Li merely slapped him on the back to shut him up:

"Cut the crap, eh?"

Butch pulled a face and went off to another table. The deputy county head didn't pursue the matter, just turned to address the gathering:

"Since the meal isn't ready yet, why don't you old comrades make some suggestions about how the county administration should do its work in the future?"

This lackadaisical attitude made Huang Huizhen's blood boil. What kind of a Party leader was he? Consorting with hooligans, even putting the children of landlords and rich peasants in positions of responsibility! Where were the prestige and principles of a Communist Party member? She couldn't stand it any longer. Her face puffed, and purple with rage, she rose abruptly.

"Since we're in a Party rectification," she snapped, "I'll be blunt. Our present leadership is short on Party spirit, it lacks principles, and its political standards are low."

The listeners looked at each other nervously, unsure of how to react. Working herself up even more, she picked a newspaper up off the table, rolled it up, and slapped the table with it:

“When I was doing underground work, I was under the leadership of the comrades who had come south to fight the civil war, and in those days …”

Everyone was silent. They had heard this line from Huang Huizhen almost daily when she had been Party secretary. She had only to mention coming south, and you knew a lecture would follow; like it or not, you had to pay attention, or you were in big trouble! This time, however, after a few seconds of bemused silence, there were snorts of laughter. Amid the laughter someone muttered, “Huh, coming south with the leaders of the Red Army! I’ve heard that some of those women were sold into whorehouses and they haven’t come out yet!” Someone else added,

“What do the old whores think they have to brag about?”

It was just as well the laughter was so loud and that Huang Huizhen didn’t hear the last few words, or she might really have had a fit. As it was, she was so furious her mind was a blur. If it had just been the common people being so impudent, she could have borne it, but these were Party cadres! All of them had always been subservient and attentive to her, and now they were mocking her brazenly. Could the inconceivable be true—that their behavior toward her in the past was all a sham? At a momentary loss for words, she opened the newspaper in her hand and saw the bold print of a headline:

PARTY GENERAL SECRETARY VISITS EUROPE

There was a photograph beside the report. As she looked at it, the blood rushed to her head. She gesticulated and shouted,

“Don’t you laugh! I’ve got criticisms of the general secretary as well! He’s leader of the Party, but instead of doing rectification work, he’s off on a trip overseas. That’s the job of the foreign minister—”

Before she could finish, the tension broke, and the listeners began to howl with laughter. Butch called out for someone to rub his stomach and ease the pain of laughing. The laughter was so loud it threatened to blow the roof off. The new deputy county head hurriedly gestured them all to lay off:

“Don’t laugh, folks. A Party member has a right to air her opinions about the leadership.”

He was trying to keep a straight face, but everyone could tell from the twinkle in his eye and the catch in his voice that he couldn’t completely suppress his mirth. Butch found it hard to contain himself as well, but muttering “crazy bitch!” and rubbing his belly, he headed back into the kitchen:

“Hey guys, here’s a newsflash, April fifth, New China News Agency! They’ve dug up a mummy from the tombs at Mawangdui who wants to take a potshot at the Central Committee!” His young fellow workers clustered round:

“What do you mean?”

Butch couldn’t resist the opportunity to do an imperson- ation. By the time he was through, everyone else was holding their sides as well. Then Butch shook his head and said more soberly,

“It’s hard to understand why, but they get old, and the brain starts to go. Oh, yes, I almost forgot—Little Li said to cook the stuff soft or the old monkeys won’t be able to chew it.” An old cook who was chopping meat on the table broke in:

“What’s so hard to understand? You shouldn’t make fun of her. In the old days, you’d have been called a rightist or a counterrevolutionary for less than that!”

There was menace in his voice, but Butch’s assistants were just a bunch of kids, without any understanding of what the words rightist and counterrevolutionary meant. They just laughed at the old cook as if he, too, were some ancient relic. The old man saw how little they respected his experience, so he pointed to Butch:

“You don’t believe me? His father talked too much, and that was the end of him!”

That wiped the smile from Butch's face. His father had been framed and sentenced to labor reform in a coal mine, where he had been killed when a mine shaft had caved in. The case had been determined by Huang Huizhen, which was why Butch had always loathed her. He had been a child when his father died, and his mother had not had the education to explain the whys and wherefores of the case to her son. Thus it was still a mystery to him why Huang Huizhen had taken it on herself to brand his father a counterrevolutionary. Now that the old cook had raised the subject, Butch asked him what had happened.

“It’s a long story,” said the old man. “It was during the Great Leap Forward in 1958, and Huang Huizhen’s husband—he was the boss of the co-op in those days—told everyone to plant five hundred catties of seed on every mu of land and harvest a hundred thousand catties of grain from it. If you try to spread that many seeds onto a single mu, they'll rot, and most won't sprout. Huang Huizhen was pretty ingenious, though. She mobilized the entire village to paint old newspapers with paste, then stick the seeds onto it standing on their ends. When the newspapers were loaded with seeds, they laid them down in the fields and covered them with soil."

This had them all baffled. Someone asked,

"Did they really plant their fields that way? Did the seeds grow?"

"Sure," the old cook nodded, "a couple of shoots here and there, nothing more."

Butch was beginning to understand where the story was leading, but the other youngsters still hadn't a clue. In their innocence they asked,

"So what's this all got to do with Butch's dad?" The old cook pushed cubes of meat to the side of the chopping block and continued slowly,

"Butch's father was teacher at the primary school at the time, and when there was something nobody else could understand, we would always go to him for an explanation. He said that what Huang Huizhen was doing was against the laws of nature, and he wrote a letter saying so to the authorities. He even sent an article to the newspaper, which was how he came to be dragged away as a counterrevolutionary. Nobody doubted his scientific knowledge." The old cook sighed and changed his tone abruptly:

"That's all in the past now. Don't let it get you down, Butch. Just try and mind your manners a bit; don't shoot your mouth off all the time. You meddle in things that don't concern you and say things that shouldn't be spoken. Take that business about criticizing the Party general secretary. It's all very well for Huang Huizhen to talk like that, but if you'd breathed a word of it when she was in power, she would have had you tied up and dragged of[Face the facts, we're not all equal, you have to give way … Butch, hey Butch?"

The old man looked around, but Butch was gone. Then he saw him going into the hall bearing a tray loaded with food.

It was a splendid lunch. The pork was as tender as the deputy county head had said it should be, and the chicken was falling from the bone. Butch had divided the food into individual ponions and placed the same selection before each of the diners.

Only Huang Huizhen had an extra dish at her place, a bowl decorated with a blue floral design, full to the brim with bubbling white bean curd, fragrant with the tang of green onions, a rich sauce dripping down the side onto the table.

"How come she gets bean curd, and I don't?" complained the person sitting beside her.

Butch sniggered:

"Take it easy. Just let her have what she deserves."

Huang Huizhen was starting to feel a little better. The spread before her was eminently superior to sixty-six cubes of pork, and it looked as if she were finally getting some preferential treatment. But when she heard what Butch said, she realized the intent behind the bowl of "bean curd boiling hot and bubbling," and she trembled with rage.

"Butch … how dare you!"

Butch stood to one side watching her, the tray still in his hands, the corners of his mouth curled in a half smile of malice that made her shiver. Huang Huizhen's face turned from sallow to crimson, then from crimson to white. She slammed down her bowl and stormed out.

How unfair it was! She had lived long enough, she should die now that she was sixty-six, she couldn't take any more of this aggravation! What kind of monster was Butch? How could he humiliate her like that? Just because he was friends with the deputy county head … or maybe the deputy county head was behind it all! When the higher-ups had decided a few years ago that he should take over from her, she had put up a stubborn fight—why should they take her power away when she was in good health and prepared to redouble her efforts for the revolution? Besides, how could she relax if her power were handed over to someone like that? A young guy in his thirties, born after she joined the Party! So cocksure of himself because he'd been to college! Always on about incentives and efficiency! Dancing around with a bunch of delinquents! Where would his dance lead them all?

He got the position anyway. Still, as a result of her efforts, he was given only the rank of deputy rather than full county head, as the original plan had been. He must have set up today's scene to get revenge on her.

But Huang Huizhen was still Huang Huizhen. Rattled as she was, she didn't lose control altogether. From her jumble of thoughts, a course of action emerged. She decided she would pay a visit to County Head Zhu.

He wasn't like Little Li. County Head Zhu was a solid cadre of the old school. In years past he had served under Huang Huizhen as office manager for the Party branch office, and she had seen to it that he was designated as one of the next generation of leaders. In her campaign to stop opponunists like Little Li from getting power, she and Office Manager Zhu had busied themselves day and night with their investigations, collected incriminating evidence, called all kinds of meetings, busied themselves till their hair turned gray, and suffered who knows how many sleepless nights!

In the end it had been Zhu who had composed the letter denouncing Little Li. They decided that their letter would have to be anonymous for the time being. This was because Little Li was the cunning type: he knew how to suck up to people, and he always managed to get the credit when things went right and to avoid criticism for disasters.

Naturally the district authorities took the letter very seriously and spent over a year investigating the Little Li affair. But then they ruled that the accusations were largely hearsay and slander. Huang Huizhen was appalled at the decision and upset to think of all the wasted effort. Little Li was delighted and ready to celebrate his promotion.

Then, all of a sudden, the policy changed. The top leadership stopped promoting people several grades at once and went back to a system of letting them go up a step at a time. So Little Li rose only to deputy head, while the higher rank—county head and county party secretary—went to the author of the anonymous letter, Office Manager Zhu. Even the darkest of clouds have silver linings after all.

She walked out of county headquarters and followed the road east. In a while she saw the birdcages hanging above the balcony of County Head Zhu's home. Her spirits revived. Zhu was the forthright and generous sort. He would always let her have her pick of his birds. Once he had bought a talking parrot at considerable expense, and, simply because she had admired it, he had sent his wife around with the bird as a gift that very evening.

She should have a good talk with County Head Zhu. Not only did she plan to tell him what she thought of Little Li and offer advice on how he should proceed; she also intended to discuss the great affairs of Party and state. The land in the village was now being contracted out to families, and individuals were being allowed to hire laborers and exploit them. In the cities, foreign capitalists were being invited over to manage factories, entrepreneurs were opening businesses, and there were merchants and peddlers all over the place. The only thing missing from the 1940s were the foreign concessions! No, they even had them, too, though they gave them a slightly nicer name: special economic zones. What did all this have to do with socialism? It wasn't just some fit of pique that had made her say she was going to protest about the Party general secretary. \

But those people … they were all cadres who had been nurtured by the Party, yet they were so unfeeling, they had mocked her.

Huh, you can laugh! Just remember, she who laughs last laughs longest! Some day the Central Committee would come back to its senses. Her only regret was that since she was getting on in years, sixty-six already, she might not live to see the day. County Head Zhu was younger, though—he'd be around when the time came. But, then again, even he was fifty-eight and unlikely to oudast Little Li. In three years' time, County Head Zhu would be forced into retirement as she had been, and Little Li would take over. That prospect worried her dreadfully. She would have to suggest ways Zhu could make his position more secure.

She hurried on toward County Head Zhu's house. She didn't know whether he would be in, so she peeped in through the high window that faced the road. He was there, so she went up to the door and knocked. Nobody answered at first, so she rapped a litde harder and called out,

"County Head Zhu, Little Zhu!"

It wasn't Zhu who opened the door but his wife, a forced smile on her face:

"Oh, it's you … I'm so sorry, he's … he's not at home just now."

Not at home? But she'd just seen him at the table!

At a loss for words, she stared dumbly at the wrinkles etched into the woman's fat face, as if seeking an explanation in the pattern of their lines.

The river flowed quickly that spring. Broken twigs from the past year were whisked around in little whirlpools or swept along by the current. Huang Huizhen realized that fate had been as relendess and unfeeling to her as those cold waters, sweeping away everything that she had been. What had it all been for, her life of struggle? She wasn't so sure anymore. Everyone had forsaken her, her colleagues had humiliated her … no need to dwell on that now.

But County Head Zhu, Little Zhu, her protege, her successor! She had cared for him, guided him along like a younger brother, and now he treated her like a stranger! He was there, she knew he was, but his wife said,

"He's not at home!"

Just like that—as if she'd been a beggar at his door.

She trudged along in a dream. Or perhaps it was the past that was the dream from which she was now waking. The wind blew chill against her, its cold cutting her heart, and she began to shiver in spite of herself. Yet, oddly enough, the flowers, grasses, and trees seemed to be absorbing warmth from the sun despite the cold and flourished vigorously, growing strong and spirited. Young women stepped out, dressed in their brightest and newest clothes, bearing woven baskets containing sixty-six cubes of pork for their parents. Courting couples strolled along arm in arm, the men in Western suits and leather shoes, the women with their hair flowing free over their shoulders.

Huang Huizhen disapproved of all this. It was a scene from another planet to her. And so confusing—had she woken from a dream or returned to one?

Huang Huizhen wavered, not knowing where she should go next. Everything before her was a blur, fields stretching as far as the eye could see, the setting sun fading like a last crimson ember dying in the ashes. High in the blue-black sky, the slender crescent of the pale new moon was rising. Out of the gloom came the old graybeard, singing his senseless riddle:

From times gone by, who knows when,
few survive three score and ten.
Childhood slips by in a haze,
dotage passes in a daze.
Inbetween is haste and hurry,
days of toil and nights of worry.
Once mid-autumn's come and gone,
see the moon go pale and wan.
Past the Festival of Graves,
flowers wither, blossoms fade …

She was six again, playing in the mud by the stream, kneading tiny fragments into the shape of rolls, then crumbling them and repeating the process. The strange song enchanted her. She looked up to see the old man's face, but in that instant the last glimmerings of dusk were covered by the curtain of blackness. The desolate sound of the gruff voice continued:

Round and round the seasons go,
the curfew tolls, the roosters crow.
See your dead before your eyes,
weeds grow yearly where they lie,
Unattended; overgrown, hosts of grave mounds high and low. …

Now that she had remembered the last couple of lines, she felt a marvelous sense of relief. She saw that she had come to the bend in the river where the graves lay.

How could she be here? This wasn't the road home. She was about to turn back when her eye lit on a familiar figure, a woman in a purple jacket, her hair permed, kneeling by a grave with a wicker basket in her hand. It was her daughter. She was lifting dishes out of the basket, making offerings to her father.

As Huang Huizhen watched, a sudden ray of hope shone through her depression. If her daughter cared enough to make offerings to her father, perhaps she would pay a call on her as well. Why couldn't she get on with her daughter as the peasant women did with theirs and live out her life in contentment?

She almost called out, but she couldn't drop her defenses that far. Then it occurred to her that her daughter would have to pass right by her house on her way home, so she decided to go first and make her a special meal.

Back at home, she rolled up her sleeves and got busy. Time was tight—she couldn't go out and buy fresh ingredients or grind glutinous rice into flour for the traditional dumplings. Fortunately, she had a well-stocked larder—cans of luxury food not available to mere peasants: sausage, dried shredded meat, pressed chicken … she soon had a dozen plates of food and a bottle of red wine laid out on the table. In case that wasn't enough, she filled bowls with melon seeds and candies and even measured some malted milk powder into a glass, with hot water ready to add when her daughter arrived.

She would put on airs no longer. If her daughter would only come, she would give her anything; the dressing table of course, even a television. Her daughter might not agree to it all straight away, so perhaps she would start off with some new clothes for her granddaughter. Huang Huizhen resolved that she would not even oppose her daughter if she said she wanted another child; why, she would even make a contribution to help pay the fine. She had money, and what she would really like was a chubby little grandson making little messes on the floor and wetting the sheets …

She waited until the dishes on the table were all cold, but still there was no sign of her daughter. Impatient, she went back to look for her. She rushed in a panic to the bamboo grove across the river from the graves. All she could see were the green grave mounds and the strings of paper cash fluttering like butterflies in the breeze. The pines, still without new growth, stood somber and dark, grief-stricken as a widow.

There was nobody there. Her daughter was gone.

Huang Huizhen felt dizzy. The bamboo grove whirled around, the river flowing above her, dark yellow waves rushing toward her … the world was turning upside down. She groaned and grasped hold of a slim bamboo. But it wouldn't hold her up, and she slumped to the ground.

Beyond the shade of the bamboo grove, there was the red of peach blossoms and the green of willows. Shafts of sunset red as tulip petals caressed the fields. And in the fields, the golden rape, the snow-white magnolia, the pink flowers of the broad beans … however fierce the wind might be, however hard the rain, the earth would come to life, the flowers would bloom again.

194.181 They Don't Mean It\fn{by Lensey Namioka (1949-)} Peking, China (F) 4

Our family moved here from China two years ago, and we thought we were pretty well adjusted to American ways. So my parents decided to give a party on Chinese New Year and invite some of our American friends.

When we first came to the United States, we had a hard time getting used to the different customs, but we gradually learned how things were done. We learned American table manners, for instance. We stopped slurping when we ate soup or ramen noodles. (At least we didn't slurp when we were with other Americans. When we ate by ourselves at home, we still sneaked in a juicy slurp every now and then.)

Mother stopped complimenting people here on how old and fat they looked. She learned that Americans thought being old was pitiful, and that being slender was beautiful.

Father's English pronunciation was improving. He used to have trouble with the consonant r, so instead of "left" and "right," he would say "reft" and "light." Since he's a professional musician, making a correct sound is important to him, and he practiced until he mastered his r. Now he can tell me to pass him the Rice Krispies crisply.

I worked harder than anybody at doing the right thing, and I even kept a little notebook with a list of English expressions (one of my favorites was "It's raining cats and dogs"). I even adopted an American name: Mary. I knew my friends in school would have a hard time with my Chinese name, Yingmei,. so now I'm Mary Yang.

I really believed that our family had adjusted completely. We had even joined in celebrating American holidays, such as Independence Day, Labor Day, Thanksgiving, Easter, Christmas, and New Year—Western New Year, that is. My parents decided to show our American friends what Chinese New Year was like.

Chinese New Year, which falls in late January or early February, is sometimes called the Lunar New Year because it's based on the phases of the moon. It doesn't always fall on the same day in the solar calendar, but depends on when the first new moon occurs after the winter solstice, or the shortest day of the year. Anyway, in China it's also called the Spring Festival, because by that time you're pretty tired of winter and you're looking forward eagerly to spring.

In China we celebrate the New Year by setting off firecrackers, and we were delighted when we learned that firecrackers were also set off here in Seattle's Chinatown at New Year. But eating special foods is the most important part of the celebration.

So a week before the party, we helped Mother to shop and cook the special New Year dishes. We had to serve fish, since the Chinese word for fish is yu, which sounds the same as the word for "surplus." It's good to have a surplus of money and other valuables.

Mother admitted that living in America for two years had made her soft, and she no longer felt like killing a fish with her own hands. These days, she bought dead fish, but she always apologized when she served it to our Chinese guests. When we first came to America, Mother used to keep live fish in the bathtub because that way she knew the fish would be fresh when it came time to cook it. Even for the New Year party, she bought a dead fish, but at least she went to a special store in Chinatown where they had live fish and killed it for you on the spot.

For our New Year dinner we also had to have noodles. We normally eat noodles on birthdays, because the long strands stand for a long life. Why noodles on New Year, then? Because in the old days, instead of having your own special birthday, everybody's birthday was on New Year's Day, no matter what day you were actually born on.

The New Year dish that involves the most work is the ten-vegetable salad. Mother tells us that each of the ten vegetables is supposed to promote health, and eating it on New Year makes you healthy for the whole year. I can understand why some of the vegetables are healthy—things like carrots, bean sprouts, and cabbage, which have lots of vitamins. But the salad also includes things like dried mushrooms and a kind of lichen. When I asked Mother why they were supposed to be healthy, she thought a bit and then admitted that she always included those ingredients because her mother and grandmother always included them.

So we got to work. We had to soak the dried ingredients. We had to wash the fresh vegetables and slice them up into thin strips. In addition to all the cooking, we vacuumed every room thoroughly, since we wanted to start the New Year with a really clean house. Mother said that we had to do the cleaning before New Year, because doing it on the day itself was bad luck. It was believed that you'd sweep out good fortune together with the dirt.

With all the cooking and the cleaning, I was exhausted by the time our guests arrived at our house for the New Year party.

The first of our guests to arrive were the Engs, a Chinese-American family. Paul Eng, their son, was in Eldest Brother's class. Paul and Second Sister were beginning to be interested in each other, although we pretended we didn't notice. I was glad that Second Sister had finally thrown away her Chinese cloth shoes. They had developed big holes, and we could see her toes wiggling around inside. Tonight she was wearing a new pair of sneakers she'd bought with her baby-sitting money.

The O'Mearas arrived next. Kim O'Meara was my best friend in school, and we'd been at each other's house lots of times. The last to arrive were the Conners. My youngest brother's best friend was Matthew Conner, who was a really good violinist and took lessons from my father.

"Happy New Year, Sprout!" Matthew said to Fourth Brother.

"Sprout" was my brother's nickname, because for school lunch he used to eat sandwiches filled with stir-fried bean sprouts. Now he eats peanut butter and jelly sandwiches just like his &iends, but the nickname stuck.

Because we had too many people to seat around the dining table, we served dinner buffet style, and the guests helped themselves to the food. When they saw all the dishes arranged on the dining table, they exclaimed at how beautiful everything looked.

"Oh, no, it's really plain, simple food," said Mother. "I've only added a few small things for the New Year."

The guests paid no attention to her and began to help themselves. Mrs. Conner wanted to know how Mother had cooked the fish. Mrs. Eng said that she also cooked fish and served noodles on New Year, but she didn't do the ten-vegetable salad. Maybe it wasn't served in the part of China where her family originally came from.

Nobody had complaints about the food, from the way they devoured it and came back for seconds. The kids even ate up the salad. Kim O'Meara laughed when she saw her brother Jason taking a second helping.

"Hey, Jason, I thought you hate vegetables!"

Jason's mouth was full, so he just mumbled an answer. Mrs. O'Meara looked at me and smiled.

"I bet you and your mom put a lot of work into making that salad, Mary. Doesn't it hurt to see it disappear in a matter of minutes?"

It was a lot of work to make the ten-vegetable salad. I got a blister on my finger from slicing all those celery and carrot sticks.

"I'm glad to see how much you people like it," I said. "You'll all be very healthy this coming year!"

Looking at the platters of food getting emptied, I began to worry.

"We'd better do something about dessert!" I whispered to Mother. At this rate, our guests would still be hungry after the main courses were finished.

"But I never make dessert!" Mother whispered back. Dessert isn't something Chinese normally eat at the end of a dinner.

So I ran into the kitchen, found a carton of almond cookies, and hurriedly dumped them on a platter. When I put the platter on the dining table, the cookies disappeared before I could say abracadabra (abracadabra was one of the words in my little notebook). Since it was a weekday night, people didn't stay long after the last cookie crumb was eaten. There was a congestion at the front door as the guests thanked us for inviting them and showing them what a real, Chinese New Year dinner was like.

"The fish was delicious!" Mrs. Eng said to Father. "I'll have to get the recipe from your wife one of these days. She's a wonderful cook, isn't she?"

“Oh, no, she’s not a good cook at all,” said Father. “You’re just being polite.”

I heard a little gasp from my friend Kim. She stared wide-eyed at Father.

“What’s the matter, Kim?” I asked. Instead of answering, Kim turned to look at Mrs. O’Meara, who was saying to my mother,

“I loved your ten-vegetable salad. Even the kids loved it, and they don’t usually eat their vegetables. You and the girls must have spent hours doing all that fine dicing and slicing!”

“The girls did the cutting, and I’m sorry they did such a terrible job,” said Mother. “I’m embarrassed at how thick those pieces of celery were!”

I heard another little gasp from Kim, who was now staring at Mother. But I didn’t get a chance to ask her what the problem was. The O’Mearas were going out the front door, and the rest of the guests followed.

“How come your father and your mother were so nasty last night?” asked Kim when we were walking to the school bus stop the next morning.

“What do you mean?” I asked. I didn’t remember Father or Mother acting nasty.

“It was when Mrs. Eng was telling your dad what a good cook your mom is,” replied Kim. That’s right. Mrs. Eng did say something about Mother being a good cook.

“So what’s bothering you?” I asked. Kim stopped dead.

“Didn’t you hear your dad?” she demanded. “He said that your mom wasn’t a good cook at all, and that Mrs. Eng was just being polite!”

I still didn’t understand why Kim was bothered.

“So what? People are always saying things like that.” But Kim wasn't finished.

“And then when my mom said how hard you worked to cut up the vegetables, your mom said she was embarrassed by what a terrible job you did in slicing!” I had to laugh.

“She doesn’t mean it! It’s just the way she talks.” When the school bus arrived and we got on, Kim began again.

“Then why do your parents keep saying these bad things if they don’t mean it? I’d be really hurt if my mom said I did a terrible job—after I worked so hard, too.”

What Kim said made me thoughtful. I suddenly realized that whenever people said good things about us, my parents always contradicted them and said how bad we really were. We kids knew perfectly well that our parents didn’t mean it, so our feelings weren’t hurt in the least. It was just the way Chinese parents were supposed to talk. Finally I said to Kim,

“I think that if my parents agreed with the compliments, then that would be the same as bragging. It’s good manners to contradict people when they compliment your children.”

“It’s bragging only if you say good things about yourself,” protested Kim. “It’s different when your parents are talking about you.” I shook my head.

“We Chinese feel it’s the same thing. Boasting about our children, or husband, or wife, is the same as boasting about ourselves. People even think it’s bad luck.”

It was Kim’s turn to be thoughtful.

“So that’s why your parents never said what good musicians you were. That would be bragging, right?”

Music is the most important thing in our family. My elder brother plays the violin, my second sister plays the viola, and I play the cello. We all practice very hard, and I know Father thinks we are all doing well—only he has never said so to other people.

“The funny thing is,” continued Kim, “your kid brother is the only one in your family who isn’t a good musician. But I’ve never heard your parents say anything about how badly he plays.”

I thought over what Kim said about Fourth Brother. He is the only one in our family who is no good at all with music. But we don’t talk about his terrible ear. Finally I said,

“It’s like this: We’re not hurt when we hear our parents say bad things about us, since we know they’re only doing it because it’s good manners. We know perfectly well that they don’t mean it. But if they say my younger brother has a terrible ear, they’d really be telling the truth. So they don’t say anything, because that would hurt his feelings.”

Kim rolled her eyes.

“Boy, this is confusing! Your parents can’t tell the truth about your playing because it would be bragging. And they can’t say anything about your brother’s playing because that would be telling the truth.” I grinned.

"Right! You got it!"

I think Kim understood what I was driving at. She didn't make a face when she heard my mother saying that the cookies Second Sister baked for the PTA bake sale were terrible.

After our Spring Festival party, the days became longer, and cherry trees burst into bloom. The baseball season began, and Fourth Brother's team played an opening game against another school. My brother might have a terrible ear for music, but he was turning out to be a really good baseball player.

In the seventh inning Fourth Brother hit a home run, something he had wanted to do for a long time but had never managed before. All his teammates crowded around to congratulate him.

"You did it, Sprout! You did it!" shouted Matthew Conner, his best friend. Mr. Conner turned to Father.

"I bet you're proud of the boy!"

"He was just lucky when he hit that home run," said Father.

Overhearing the exchange, Kim turned to me and smiled.

"I see what you mean," she whispered.

That Easter, the O'Mearas invited our family for dinner. I knew that Easter was a solemn religious holiday, but what I noticed most was that the stores were full of stuffed rabbits and fuzzy baby chicks. Chocolate eggs were everywhere.

For the dinner, Mrs. O'Meara cooked a huge ham. She had also made roast potatoes, vegetables, salad, and the biggest chocolate cake I had ever seen. I had eaten a lot at Thanksgiving dinners, but this time I stuffed myself until I was bursting. The rest of my family did pretty well, too. We all loved ham. As Mrs. O'Meara started cutting up the take for dessert, Mother said,

"I'm not sure if I can eat one more bite. That was the best ham I've ever tasted!"

"Aw, that ham was terrible," said Kim. "I bet you could do a lot better, Mrs. Yang."

There was a stunned silence around the table. Mrs. O'Meara stared at Kim, and her face slowly turned dark red. I heard a low growl from Mr. O'Meara.

"You and I are going to have a little talk later this evening, young lady," he said to Kim.

Our family was speechless with surprise. My parents, my brothers, and sister all stared at Kim. I was the most shocked, because Kim was my best friend, and in the two years since I've known her, I'd never seen her do or say anything mean. How could she say something so cruel about her own mother?

The rest of the evening was pretty uncomfortable. Our family left early, because we could all see that Mr. and Mrs. O'Meara were waiting impatiently to have their "little talk" with Kim as soon as we were gone.

Next morning at the school bus stop, Kim wouldn't even look at me. Finally I cleared my throat.

"What made you talk like that to your mother, Kim?" I asked.

Kim whirled around. She looked furious.

"B-but you were the one who t-told me that saying nice things about your own family was the s-same as bragging!" she stuttered. "Last night I was just trying to act modest!"

I finally saw the light. I saw how Kim had misunderstood what I had said.

"Listen, Kim," I said, "Chinese parents are supposed to say critical things about their own children, and husbands and wives can say bad things about each other. But young people must always be respectful to their elders."

The school bus came.

"I guess I'll never understand the Chinese," sighed Kim as we sat down. At least we still sat together.

After school I went over to Kim's house and explained to Mrs. O'Meara about how the Chinese were supposed to sound modest about their own children. I told her that Kim had thought I meant children also had to sound modest about their parents. Mrs. O'Me.ara laughed. Although her laugh sounded a little forced, it was a good sign.

I soon forgot about Kim's misunderstanding, because I had other things to worry about. Our school orchestra was giving its spring concert, and the conductor asked me to play a cello solo as one of the numbers. Father said I should play a dance movement from one of Bach's unaccompanied cello suites. It was a very hard piece, and I was really scared to play it in public. But Father said we should always try to meet challenges.

I practiced like mad. On the day of the concert, I was so nervous that I was sitting on pins and needles waiting for my turn to play ("sitting on pins and needles" was another expression in my little notebook). My legs were wobbly when it came time for me to walk to the front of the stage. But as I sat down with my cello and actually started playing, I became so wrapped up in the music that I forgot to be nervous.

After the concert, my friends came up to congratulate me. It was the proudest moment of my life.

"You were great, Mary, simply great!" said Kim. Her eyes were shining.

Mother's eyes were shining, too.

"Yes, she was good," she blurted out. Then she covered her mouth and looked embarrassed.

Kim turned to me and winked.

"That's all right, Mrs. Yang. We all know you didn't mean it!"

The photogaph above is of a portrait statue of young Mao Tse-tung (1893-1976), located on Orange Isle, Changsha, the capital of Hunan province, China. It was unveiled on December 2009, which would have been Mao's 116th birthday. Thirty-two meters tall, it took two years to build and cost about 35 million US dollars (300 million RMB). In all, some 8,000 giant granite bricks were mined from Fujian and broght to Changsha.

Both the statue's location and its youthful cast were chosen due to a poem Mao Zedong wrote as a young man in 1925. Entitled Changsha, it is one of his most well-known poems.

Alone I stand in the autumn cold
On the tip of Orange Island,
The Hsiang flowing northward;
I see a thousand hills crimsoned through
By their serried woods deep-dyed,
And a hundred barges vying
Over crystal blue waters.
Eagles cleave the air,
Fish glide in the limpid deep;
Under freezing skies a million creatures contend in freedom.
Brooding over this immensity,
I ask, on this boundless land
Who rules over man's destiny?

I was here with a throng of companions,
Vivid yet those crowded months and years.
Young we were, schoolmates,
At life's full flowering;
Filled with student enthusiasm
Boldly we cast all restraints aside.
Pointing to our mountains and rivers,
Setting people afire with our words,
We counted the mighty no more than muck.
Remember still
How, venturing midstream, we struck the waters
And waves stayed the speeding boats?
