THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Taken about 1935

Taken at some time during the 1940s

Taken in 1966, at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution

Mao Tse-tung (1893-1976) Founding Father of the People's Republic of China, who led the first armed up-rising of the Chinese Communists (September 7, 1927) and was the de facto leader of the Chinese Communist Party since 1934, becoming its official leader in 1943, a position he retained until his death. "Had Mao died in 1956, his achievements would have been immortal. Had he died in 1966, he would still have been a great man but flawed. But he died in 1976. Alas, what can one say?"—Chen Yun (1905-1995), a leading Communist Party official under Mao and Deng Xiaoping (1904-1997, who, after Mao's death became the paramount leader of The People's Republic of China from 1978 until his retirement in 1989).

LITERATURE COMPOSED BY AUTHORS WHOSE BIRTH YEAR MAY BE CONFIDENTLY PLACED IN A DEFINITE TIME FRAME (1934-1949)

1934

(Page 6)—20.70 1. The Discommoded Frog 2. Boiled Eggs And Radio Calisthenics 3. The Thousand-Li Horse In Its Dragon Lair 4. I Am One Of Your Kind 5. Pretty At First 6. The Singer Who Always Won The Day 7. Comedy Of The Ducks 8. After Becoming A Swan 9. Lovelorn Sister Crow 10. A Story I Heard: Ten Fables\fn{by Wang Meng (1934-)} Peking, China (M) 5

(11)—75.68 The Girl Next Door\fn{by King Tai-hsi (1934-)} Chekiang Province, China (M) 7

(18)—81.73 Operation Excavation\fn{by Ho Hsiao-chung aka Ho Tsu-wu (1934-)} Tsining, Shantung Province, China (M) 11

(29)—83.86 Scaffolding\fn{by Shao Chien (1934-)} Chiangsu Province, China (M) 4

(33)—151.20 Excerpt from The Corner Forsaken By Love\fn{by Zhang Xian (1934-)} Shanghai, China (M) 4

(36)—119.76 1. The Fox Fairy's Wedding 2. To Be The Best 3. The Foxes 4. The Pear Tree 5. Whiskers And Bright Eyes 6. The Fisher's Tale 7. The Night Singer 8. M'lady 9. The Butterfly: Nine Folktales\fn{by Michael David Kwan (1934-2001)} Peking, China (M) 43

1935

(80)—20.75 At Middle Age\fn{by Shen Rong (1935-)} Hankou, Sichuan Province, China (F) 30

(109)—64.1 Kitty Is Dead\fn{by Chao Shu-min aka Lu Ai (1935-)} Peking, China (F) 10

(118)—77.84 & 78.14 1. In The Middle Of The Night 2. The Banyan Tree\fn{by Chou Huey-min (1935-)} Kiangsu Province [at 77.84 he is said he was born in Shantung Province] , China (M) 23

(141)—78.101 Diary Of A Warden\fn{by Qi Ping aka Lu Qiping (1935-)} Nanchang, Jiangxi Province, China (M) 5

(156)—79.1 Death Ray On A Coral Island\fn{by Tong Enzheng (1935-)} Sichuan Province?, China (M) 14

(170)—111.33 Excerpt from Wu Song Fights The Tiger: A Folktale\fn{by Li Xintang (1935-)} Yangzhou, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 2

(172)—150.239 Hi Lili Hi Li …\fn{by Shui Ching aka Yang Yi (1935-)} Nantung, Kiangsu Province, China (M) 6

(178)—203.170 Father's Last Two Days\fn{by Shu Yi (1935-)} Qingdao, Shandong Province, China (M) 9

1936

(187)—41.151 & 191.134 1. Excerpt from The Horse's Mouth 2. Excerpt from Grass Soup\fn{by Zhang Xian-liang (1936-)} Nanjing, Xuyi County, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 15

(203)—77.23 Afternoon In The Study\fn{by Chang Ling-ling (1936-)} Kunming, Yunnan Province, China (F) 1

(203)—83.22 The Big Event Of The Week\fn{by Philip Chou (1936-)} Shanghai, China (M) 9

(213)—188.51 Solace In Action: A Mother's Mission to Publicize The Truth\fn{by Ding Zilin (1936-)} Shanghai, China (F) 3

(217)—256.129 1. A Distracting Sunday 2. A Rose-colored Evening Meal\fn{by Shen Rong (1936-)} Hankou, Sichuan Province, China (M) 12

(229)—73.28 Chant Of Great Grief\fn{by Wang Shang-i (1936-1962)} Honan Province, China (M) 3

(232)—188.144 Was I Really Guilty?\fn{by an unnamed female doctor at a children's hospital (1936-after 1986)} Peking?, China (F) 6

1937

(237)—76.34 A Summer Experience\fn{by Ge Wujue (1937-)} Wenzhou, Zhejiang Province, China (M) 8

(245)—150.245 Li T'ung: A Chinese Girl In New York\fn{by Pai Hsien-yung (1937-)} Kweilin, Kwangsi Chuang Autonomous Region, China (M) 8

(253)—150.253 & 151.13 1. An Unfinished Record 2. Remorse: Two Short Stories\fn{by Zhang Jie (1937-)} Peking, China (F) 9

(262)—180.60 Excerpt from Falling Leaves: "The True Story Of An Unwanted Chinese Daughter"\fn{by Adeline Yen Mah (1937-)} Tianjin, China (F) 13

1938

(275)—75.64 Red Gate\fn{by Sung Ching aka Ma Sen-ching (c.1938?-)} Hangchow, Chekiang Province, China (M) 5

(280)—186.199 The Story Of A Brigade Leader Prospecting In The Great North-West \fn{by Mrs. Yu (c.1938-)} Jingxiang Village, Cang'an County, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 9
(288)—77.52 & 82.111 1. Such A Beautiful Sunday 2. Foolish Eighteen: Two Short Stories\fn{by Kang Yun-wei (1938-)} Hopei Province, China (F) 16
(304)—20.104 Between Life And Death\fn{by Su Shu-Yang (1938-)} Hebei [Hopeh] Province, China (M) 7
(310)—83.7 Auntie Yao\fn{by Yang Ming-sien (1938-)} Peking, China (F) 10
(320)—181.6 Autobiographical Statement\fn{by Erin Zeng (1938-)} Kowloon, Hong Kong, China (F) 2
(322)—181.159 Excerpt from The Middle Heart: A Novel\fn{by Bette Bao Lord (1938-)} Shanghai, China (F) 12
(334)—194.1 Excerpt from The Battle Of Sangkumryung\fn{by Lu Chu-kuo (1938-)} Yiyang, Honan Province, China (M) 5
(340)—150.265 Mother Fish\fn{by Xi Xi aka Cheung Yin [Zhang Yan (1938-)} Shanghai, China (F) 9
(349)—262.128b 1. Sinking 2. Cloud Dissects Itself 3. Footpaths Cross In The Rice Field 4. Vague Apprehension 5. Woman Wall: Five Poems\fn{by Lin Ling aka Hu Yun-shang (1938-)} Sichuan Province, China (F) 2
(351)—41.142 Excerpt from Humanity: "The Vagabond: He Jingfu"\fn{by Dai Houying (1938-1996)} Shanghai, China (F) 2

1939

(353)—78.23 The Travels Of Erh Ts'an\fn{by Erh Ts'an aka Joseph S. M. Lau (c.1939?-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (M) 6
(359)—39.151 & 113.110 1. Grandma Qi 2. Chinese Roses: Two Short Stories\fn{by Li Tuo (1939-)} Hohhot, Inner Mongolian Autonomous Region, China (M) 4
(368)—78.116 Our Family's Cook\fn{by Mu Guozheng (1939-)} Jinxi, Liaoning Province, China (M) 11
(378)—79.126 Are You A Communist Party Member\fn{by Zhang Lin (1939-)} Faku County, Liaoning Province, China (M) 9
(386)—81.89 Train 257\fn{by Ching Mu aka Ching-p'ing aka Thunder, Wild, Armor, Light-blue (1939-)} Kueichou Province, China 5
(392)—81.110 Tainted Love: Five Parnas\fn{by Lei Hsiang (1939-)} Shanghai, China (M) 2
(394)—83.94 Fog\fn{by Yin Dih aka Ko Ching-hwa (1939-)} Chekiang Province, China (M) 2
(396)—118.219 Flaw\fn{by Wang Wen-Hsing (1939-)} Foochow, Fukien Province, China (M) 5
(402)—188.15 Excerpt from Hunger Trace\fn{by Adrienne Poy Clarkson (1939-)} Hong Kong, China (F) 12
(414)—256.76 Excerpt from Scream Quietly Or The Neighbors Will Hear\fn{by Erin Pizzey (1939-)} Tsingtao, Shantung Province, China (F) 8
(422)—87.57b Excerpts from Born In Tibet\fn{by Chögyam Trungpa (1939-1987)} Kham Region, Tibetan Autonomous Region, China (M) -1
(423)—292.150 Excerpts from Between Worlds: Women Writers Of Chinese Ancestry: 1. "Preface" 2. "Chinese Women In America"\fn{by Amy Ling (1939-1999)} Peking, China (F) 8

1940

(431)—21.1 The Iron Inspector\fn{by Wang Hsing-yüan (1940?-)} Kwangtung Province, China (M) 5
(436)—20.110 The Moon On A Frosty Morning\fn{by Fang Shumin (1940?-)} Hopei Province, China (M) 5
(440)—83.42 Nausea\fn{by Yen Chu (c.1940?-)} Shantung Province, China (M) 5
(445)—83.76 A Woman Like Me\fn{by Hsi Hsi (c.1940?-)} Canton, Guangdong Province, China (F) 6
(451)—146.32 1. The Filial Son 2. The Despised Scholar: Two Folktales\fn{by Shih Lich (c.1940?-)} Hopeh Province, China (M) 3
(454)—146.22 The Horses Leap Over Tan Torrent Lake: A Folktale\fn{by Lu Chi-fang (c.1940?-)} Hupeh Province, China (M) 1
(455)—a186.170 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Yang (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) 2
(457)—186.172 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Chen (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) -1
(458)—186.173 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Ding (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) 1

(459)—83.1 The Water Lilies\fn{by Chen Shao-tsung aka Nora Chen (c.1940-)} Shantung Province, China (F) 3
(463)—187.32 Excerpt from Grandmother Had No Name\fn{by Alice Murong Pu Lin (c.1940-)} Chengdu, Sichuan Province, China (F) 9
(472)—73.9 The Consultation\fn{by Lin Yeh-muh (1940-)} Shanghai?, China (M) 9
(482)—73.115 The Hole\fn{by K'ang An aka Jyh-chang Chang, Chang Jhy-chang (1940-)} Peking, China (M) 8
(489)—73.264 Excerpt from Soul Mountain\fn{by Gao Xingjian (1940-)} Jiangsi Province, China (M) 11
(500)—75.9 Daughter Of The Yellow River\fn{by Wang Jiada (1940-)} Lanzhou, Gansu Province, China (M) 13
(513)—79.76 The Moon On The South Lake\fn{by Liu Fudao (1940-)} Hanyang County, Hubei Province, China (M) 10

1941

(523)—21.17 The Unexpected Tide\fn{by Dai Qing aka Fu Ning (1941-)} Chongqing, Sichuan Province, China (F) 10
(533)—39.231 Excerpt from Foundation\fn{by Jiang Zilong (1941-)} Cangxian County, Hebei Province, China (M) 15
(543)—81.130 1,230 Spots\fn{by Show Foong aka Chang Show-foong (1941-)} Tongshan, Kiangsu Province, China (F) 3
(549)—183.179 Excerpt from Building Bridges: The Life & Times Of Richard Charles Lee; Hong Kong, 1905-1983\fn{by Vivienne Poy (1941-)} Hong Kong, China (F) 10

1942

(558)—21.32 & 151.17 1. Black Walls 2. Excerpt from Overpass\fn{by Liu Xinwu [Xin-wu] (1942-)} Chengdu, Sichuan Province, China (M) 7
(566)—21.36 The Tall Woman And Her Short Husband\fn{by Feng Ji-cai (1942-)} Tianjin, Hebei Province, China (M) 4
(570)—78.29 & 82.135 1. Vestiges 2. Thoughts In Privacy: Two Short Stories\fn{by Liang-Hsüan aka Ma Kuo-kuang (1942-)} Szechuan Province, China (M) 4
(574)—79.56 The Ivied Cabin\fn{by Gu Hua aka Luo Hongyu (1942-)} Jiahe County, Hunan Province, China (M) 13
(587)—82.57 The Twilight Years\fn{by Ching Chi aka Chu Li-li (1942-)} Hupei Province, China (F) 6
(593)—83.47 The Legend Of Koxinga\fn{by Wang Hsüan aka Wang Hsiao-lien (1942-)} Shantung Province, China (M) 3
(596)—151.28 Trust\fn{by Chen Zhongshi (1942-)} "in a village near Sian," Shanxi Province, China (M) 5
(601)—188.38 Excerpt from The Chopsticks-Fork Principle: A Memoir And Manual\fn{by Cathy Bao Bean (1942-)} Ningpo, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 10
(611)—268.152 1. The Story Of The Lotus-Picking Boat 2. Father, A Stranger 3. Grandpa And His Canary\fn{by Shen Aiping (1942-)} Wei County, Hebei Province, China (F) 3
(615)—21.27 The Loudspeaker\fn{by Bao Chu-an (1942/48-)} Nanxi County, Sichuan Province, China (F) 5

1943

(619)—16.38 A Dream Of Good Fortune\fn{by Hwang Sogyong (1943-)} Manchuria, China (M) 18
(637)—40.15 The Legend Of The Sun Brigade\fn{by Zhang Lang-lang (1943-)} Yan'an, China (M) 4
(641)—75.141 An Offering Gathered From That Cherished Homeland\fn{by Jia Baoquan (1943-)} Handan, Hebei Province, China (M) 4

1944

(645)—77.42 The Sun In The Pit\fn{by Chiang Ling (c.1944?-)} Fukien Province, China (F) 8
(649)—39.124 Clock\fn{by Zheng Wan-long (1944-)} "rural Heilongjiang Province," China (M) 5
(654)—79.106 A Saleswoman\fn{by Hang Ying (1944-)} Tianjin, Hebei Province, China (F) 8
(661)—41.163 Trial By PROLEDIC\fn{by Xu Wenli (1944-)} Peking?, China (M) 3
(663)—94.191 & 150.291 1. The Amateur Cameraman 2. Earth\fn{by Chang Hsi-Kuo aka, S. K. Chang, Shi-kuo Chang (1944-)} Chungking, Szechwan Province, China (M) 41

1945

(683)—83.71 Just Let Them Not Know\fn{by Hsiao Feng aka Chang Hsiao-feng (c.1945?-)} Kiangsu Province, China (F) 5

(688)—188.65 Not A Single Day Of Peace I\fn{by Yan Huili (c.1945-)} Shanghai?, China (F) 1

(688)—191.99 Excerpt from Confessions: An Innocent Life In Communist China\fn{by Kang Zhengguo (c.1945-)} Xi'an, Shanxi Province, China (M)

(700)—21.40 Jingjing Is Born\fn{by Gu Ying (1945-)} Yunnan Province, China (F) 11 13F,

(711)—21.61 Excerpt (untitled) from Beijing Opera\fn{by David Su Li-qun (1945-)} Chungking, Szechwan Province, China (M) 4

(715)—76.18 A Broken Promise\fn{by Zhang Zhilu (1945-)} Peking, China (M) 1

(717)—78.74 Locks\fn{by Cao Guanlong (1945-)} "rural Zhejiang," China (M) 5

(722)—79.114 A Soldier In The Tianshan Mountains\fn{by Li Binkui (1945-)} Heyang County, Shanxi Province, China (M) 12

(734)—83.4 The Quadrangle Compound\fn{by Ling Chung (1945-)} Chungking, Sichuan Province, China (F) 3

(736)—83.17 1. Whistle 2. Retirement: Two Very Short Stories\fn{by Ai Ya aka Li Chi (1945-)} Szechwan Province, China (F) 1

(738)—111.40 Excerpt from Chen Yi Crosses The Mountain: A Folktale\fn{by Hui Zhaolong (1945-)} Yangzhou, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 2

(740)—186.198 The Story Of A Child, Working Every Day\fn{by "the mother of my friend EH" (1945-)} Hanzghou, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 1

(740)—188.157 Excerpt from The Jade King: History Of A Chinese Muslim Family\fn{by Huo Da (1945-)} Peking, China (F) 11

(752)—268.158 1. Eyes 2. Sleep 3. The Wave And The Shoal 4. Fire And Ice\fn{by Xiao Kang (1945-)} Funing County, Jiangsu Province, China (F) 3

1946

(754)—21.65 Hong Taitai\fn{by Cheng Nai-shan (1946-)} Shanghai, China (F) 5

(759)—72.90 Race Day\dn{by Bai Luo aka Bai Lecheng (1946-)} Guangdong Province, China (M) 4

(763)—73.31 No Cha In The Investiture Of The Gods\fn{by Shi Song (1946-)} Shanghai, China (M) 7

(770)—79.86 The Woman Who Wears The Trousers\fn{by Wang Runzi (1946-)} "in a village in Wendeng County," Shandong Province, China (M) 8

(778)—82.37 Tale Of Two Strangers\fn{by Yuan Jen aka Wang Li-teh (1946-)} Hupei Province, China (M) 12

(790)—151.36 The Get-Together\fn{by Gan Tiesheng (1946-)} Peking?, China (M) 5

(795)—181.8 Autobiographical Statement\fn{by Gena Chen (1946-)} Hangzhou, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 5

(800)—188.54 Living In A Big Cage\fn{by Fu Jiqing (1946-)} Shanghai, China (F) 2

(802)—268.138 1. I Am An Apple 2. Sweat 3. Evening Dewdrops Glimmering 4. The Sun River 5. To My Child 6. I Am A Man 6. The Last Bus: Six Poems\fn{by Fu Tianlin (1946-)} Zizhong County, Sichuan Province, China (F) 3

1947

(805)—79.69 Old Sun Sells His Donkey\fn{by Zhao Benfu (1947-)} Fengxian County, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 7

(812)—81.108 Sand River\fn{by Chung-hing Gosselin (1947-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (F) 2

(815)—181.132 Excerpt from A Generation Lost: China Under The Cultural Revolution\fn{by Zi-ping Luo (1947-)} Shanghai, China (F) 7

(821)—192.91 Eight Hundred Metres Below\fn{by Sun Shaoshan (1947-)} Shandong Province, China (M) 7

1948

(827)—21.70 The General And The Small Town\fn{by Chen Shi-xu (1948-)} Jiangxi or Kiangsi Province, China (M) 6

(833)—39.160 & 40.21 1. The Nine Palaces 2. The Way Of Heaven—Beginning Of Autumn: Two Short Stories\fn{by Zhang Cheng-zhi (1948-)} Peking, China (M) 3

(847)—41.144 & 186.33 Excerpts from A Chinese Winter's Tale: "Wedding Night" ; "First Acquaintance" ; "Off To The Northeast—And Into A Marriage!" \fn{by Yu Luojin (1948-)} Peking, China (F) 11

(858)—72.98 Aunty Li's Pocket Watch\fn{by Liang Bingjun aka Le Si (1948-)} Guandong Province, China (M) 4

(862)—76.1 Traveling Harvesters\fn{by Shao Zhenguo (1948-)} Peking, China (M) 17

(879)—76.98 Little Grass\fn{by Jia Jun (1948-)} Hulun Boir, Inner Mongolia Autonomous Region, China (M) 5

(885)—82.126 Spring Hope\fn{by Li Li aka Bao Li-li, Lily Hsueh (1948-)} Nanking, Jiangsu Province, China (F) 9

(895)—83.96 The Day He Was Fired\fn{by Yu Mo aka Wu Kuo-tung (1948-)} Huian County, Fukien Province, China (M) 11

(905)—186.208 The Story Of A Chinese Acrobat\fn{by Yishujia (1948-)} Jinan, Shandong Province, China (F) 4

(909)—187.88 Autobiographical Statement\fn{by Sue Jean Lee Sutettinger (1948-)} Canton, China (F) 4

(914)—192.163 Excerpt from Wild Cat: Stories Of The Cultural Revolution: "The Typewriter"\fn{by Jia-lin Peng (1948-)} Willow Wood Town, "less than one hundred kilometers" from Liuzhou City, Guangxi Zhuang Autonomous Region, China (M) 11

(924)—268.147 1. Three Leaves 2. The Greens 3. Where Are Days? 4. Soft, Soft Her Footsteps 5. The Bowl-Shaped Heart 6. Yin Niu Si\fn{by Mei Shaojing (1948-)} Chongqing, China (F) 5

(929)—191.168 Excerpt from Captive Spirits: Prisoners Of The Cultural Revlution\fn{by Yang Xiguang [Light at Dawn] aka Yang Xiaokai [Little Victory] (1948-2004)} "the caves of Yan'an"; "northeast China", Chana (M) 10

(938)—40.133 The First Day\fn{by Ye Si (1948/49-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (M) 3

1949

(941)—39.129 Looking For Fun\fn{by Chen Jiangong (1949-)} Beihei, Guangxi Province, China (M) 22

(964)—39.156 & 94.219 & 192.141 1. The Tree Stump 2. Festival 3. Father: Three Short Stories\fn{by Ah Cheng aka Zhong Acheng (1949-)} Peking, China (M) 13

(976)—40.164 Wood\fn{by Ng Hui Bun (1949-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (F) 9

(985)—41.114 & 63.18 & 151.8 1. Happiness Street 2. The Homecoming Stranger 3. Moon On The Manuscript: Three Short Stories\fn{by Shi Mo aka Bei Dao, Zhao Zhenkai (1949-)} Peking, China (M) 20

(1005)—74.79 When I think Of You Late At Night, There's Nothing I Can Do: Five Tales Of the Wen Clan Cave Dwellers\fn{by Cao Naiqian (1949-)} Shanxi Province, China (M) 4

(1009)—76.42 A Land Of Wonder And Mystery\fn{by Liang Xiaosheng (1949-)} Harbin, Heilongjiang Province, China (M) 12

(1020)—83.53 A Silhouette Of Life\fn{by Ma Shu-li (1949-)} Mihsien, Honan Province, China (M) 8

(1028)—87.72 Street Sketch\fn{by Chu Lin aka Wang Zuling (1949-)} Shanghai, China (F) 5

(1034)—151.33 At The Denunciation Meeting\fn{by Wang Peng (1949-)} Sian, Shanxi Province, China (M) 3

(1036)—183.37 The Endangered Ones\fn{by Fang Min (1949-)} Chongqing, Sichuan Province, China (F) 22

(1058)—183.91 Scatterbrain\fn{by Su Yi (1949-)} Hunan Province, China (F) 10

(1068)—187.129 Excerpt from Morning Breeze: A True Story Of China's Cultural Revolution\fn{by Fulang Lo (1949-)} Neijiang, Sichuan Province, China (F) 12

(1080)—191.146 Excerpt from A Memoir Of Misfortune\fn{by Su Xiaokang (1949-)} Zhejiang Province, China (M) 12

(1092)—192.82 The Festival Of Graves\fn{by Zhu Lin (1949-)} Shanghai, China (F) 9

(1101)—194.181 They Don't Mean It\fn{by Lensey Namioka (1949-)} Peking, China (F) 4

1934

20.70 1. The Discommoded Frog 2. Boiled Eggs And Radio Calisthenics 3. The Thousand-Li Horse In Its Dragon Lair 4. I Am One Of Your Kind 5. Pretty At First 6. The Singer Who Always Won The Day 7. Comedy Of The Ducks 8. After Becoming A Swan 9. Lovelorn Sister Crow 10. A Story I Heard: Ten Fables\fn{by Wang Meng (1934-)} Peking, China (M) 5

1

A frog contracted dysentery after a binge of eating unripe grapes. Cramps wrung his bowels, and his appetite disappeared. His gorge rose to his chest, and his head spun dizzily. He lay on his belly in a harvested rice field, gasping and sighing as he surveyed the world with bleary, unfocused eyes.

A timid but studious rabbit scampering through the field heard his moans and wondered what philosophical profundities, what breadth of experience, were implied in these sounds. He looked at the frog's slightly shuddering frame and wondered what farseeingness and maturity and restraint such trembling represented. He respectfully asked to be instructed:

"Great teacher, please do not keep your wisdom and learning to yourself. I may not be worth much, but teach me something. Redeem my obstinate, benighted spirit with the brilliance of your all-embracing compassion and thorough enlightenment!" The frog spluttered in outrage:

"The Apocalypse is at hand. You at least are an educable young man. Look at that sky: it must have gorged itself sick. You can see little specks whizzing back and forth, and there are mirages of grapes everywhere. Look how bloated it is and how it sags. And look at this land. It is caving in; it is constipated; it has the runs; it is in spasms; it is racked with cramps that make it shake uncontrollably. And look at the sun: it has lost its brilliance too. It is wavering and will probably fall out of the sky soon. When it hits the ground it will start a big fire and dry up the rivers. And there are no ripe heads on the rice stalks in this field. This field is a wasteland, and it exudes the stench of an animal with loose bowels. Those things flying overhead are nothing but a bunch of flies: measly, lowly, droning, no rhythm, no harmony, no classical training …"

Just then a lark flew through the sky over the field and started to sing.

"Master Frog, look! There is a lark," said the rabbit.

"You think I can't see it? You think I can't recognize it? Do you think it's a lark just because it looks like a lark? What do you know? Even if it looks like a lark, it is really a transformed fly. Can't you tell?"

The frightened rabbit crouched in a foetal position. Suddenly the frog let out a pitiful yell:

"The world is falling apart!"

The rabbit's vision darkened as he plunged into hopeless despair. But only ten minutes later he opened his eyes and discovered that the sky was still the sky; the land was still the land; there was certainly no danger of the sun falling; and on the nearby threshing floor, farmers were threshing the grain. The lark was singing more joyfully than before.

But the honourable dysenteric frog had passed into the void.

2

My father was a man of wide reading and many talents and he never tired of teaching what he knew. For many years he groomed and trained me, hoping to make a genius of me.

He taught me literature. His favourite book was the Three Hundred Poems of the Tang Dynasty, and he tutored me until I could recite them straight through. Any time I tried to read a new book he would lose his temper and harangue me irascibly:

"Do you think you have mastered the whole Three Hundred Tang Poems? Do you think you can integrate and apply the marvels, the techniques, the rhymes, the antithetical matching, the word choice, the fitness of idea, the poetic imagery, the realms of thought, the shades of meaning and everything else in this book? Do you think your poems are better than Li Bai's, Du Fu's, Meng Haoran's, Wang Wei's, Li Shangyin's or Du Mu's? Have you surpassed the saints and immortals of poetry? Do you think that Tang poetry is outdated?"

He taught me to sing. His favourite song was Su Wu Tending the Sheep. Any time I attempted to learn a different song, he would question me angrily:

"So you think your singing of Su Wu Tending the Sheep is fine, do you? Do you sing it like a master? Would you be graded 110 per cent on it?"

He taught me calisthenics—Set No.1 of radio calisthenics. Whenever I wanted to study the five new sets, he asked compelling and very logical questions:

"Do you think you've done the first set long enough, and you don't need to improve or keep in form? Isn't the first set good enough for a 160-centimetre runt like you? Do you think …?"

He gave me boiled eggs to eat. When I asked if I could switch to fried eggs or cake made with eggs, he shouted me down:

"Do you think you don't need boiled eggs now? Boiled eggs provide you with calories, animal protein, and vitamins A and C: Don't tell me you want to give them up?"

Due to my father's eloquent rhetorical questions, to this day I have read only one book—Three Hundred Poems of the Tang Dynasty. I can sing only one song—Su Wu Tending the Sheep. I can do only one routine of calisthenics—the No.1 Set of radio calisthenics. I have eaten only one kind of food—boiled eggs.

3

Five years ago I had the fortune to make passing acquaintance with a thousand-li horse\fn{A note reads: A li is approximately ⅓ of a mile.} in a cow stall down in the country. Hunger and exposure to cold had left it beaten down, withdrawn, drooping and reticent. It could only run as fast as a cow; even donkeys did not want it among them. Harnessed to a plough, it fell far short of a cow in strength, so even though it was kept in a cow stall, it was a "reject" among cows.

Later a few men came who were good judges of horses, and with their knowing eyes they spotted this thousand-li horse. They fed it two scoops of oats, and it immediately showed its strength by galloping a few circles, to the amazement of the cows, donkeys, mules and pigs.

Then it rejoined the horse herd. The horses held an impressive reception to welcome its return to the group.

Later it took first place in a horse race. For this it was asked to leave the stable. A special dragon's lair was made for it—anybody knows a horse that can cover a thousand-li in one day is really a dragon exiled from heaven. Instead of oats and grass it ate bodybuilding mix, pearl rice, fish-liver oil and calcium with dextrose. Every summer it was watered from an artesian well of beer, and in the winter it drank Maotai and Five Grain liquor.

Once a common horse went into the dragon's lair by mistake and was driven out with one well-placed kick.

The horse gradually grew fat. Its neighing became loud and coarse, and its stomach was distended. Of course it could not gallop any more.

I can see its future already—smoked horsemeat at the slaughter-house. It makes me shiver at the mere thought of it.

4

As a nightingale was singing his song one evening, a snake read an essay aloud to it, proving that the snake was one of the nightingale's kind. The article stated that the snake's egg had once been lined up in the same row with the nightingale's egg. That is to say, they were from the same district. Besides, the same sun had shone on their eggs prior to hatching, which proved that they were members of the same clan. Thirdly, they both liked to sing at night, and their singing, from the snake's point of view, was quite similar. Fourthly, they both enjoyed doing things in the garden. Fifthly, neither of them liked the snow and ice of winter. Sixthly, they both liked roses, which proved they had common interests. Seventhly …

The nightingale said in exasperation:

"Even if your article had a thousand items of ironclad evidence, 1 would not admit that you are a nightingale instead of a snake!"

Then the snake pulled out another article which proved that he was not a snake, and that other snakes could not be his kind. His evidence was, first of all, that his coloration differed from other snakes. Secondly, his measurements differed from other snakes. Thirdly, his body shape differed from other snakes. Fourthly, his fetishes differed from other snakes …

The poor nightingale grew so drowsy from hearing this line of reasoning that he fell into a rosebed and went to sleep.

The snake slithered over, and with one bite he gulped down his fellow creature.

5

My first impression of my female neighbo'r was not bad. But it was a shame she was so fond of dispensing theories on what is and is not beautiful. For instance she often said to me:

"I just don't like noses that stick out. We're Chinese. People with noses that stick out are nothing but xenophilic lackeys. An elephant's nose is very large, but does that make it look good? Most people with big noses don't give a damn about anything, and they think they're better than everybody else …"

Because she said this over and over, I could not help taking a good long look at her nose, and I discovered that it was really somewhat flat.

She also liked to say:

"Hair that is too black does not impress people. Why do I say so? Dyeing hair is popular now. If your hair is dark and glossy, people might think you dyed it. And overseas you see all sorts of wigs everywhere. Just pay a little money, and you can have any kind of hair you want on your head. You can have it coarse or fine, sparse or thick, red, black or yellow." Then she added in afterthought: "And that's why I say, the time when you could judge a woman's appearance by her hair is already past."

She spoke too much. I could not help focusing my attention on her hair, which was actually on the sparse side. It was dry and had a brownish tinge, like buckwheat infected with rust blight.

Another thing she said was:

"I don't believe the folk saying that says, 'A good pair of shoes beats a shirt.' Shoes are basically secondary to a person's appearance. The Red Army men wore straw sandals during the 25,000 li Long March. They didn't have the chance to go to Wangfujing to buy high-heeled leather shoes. The quality of a woman's shoes is not as important as her gauze mask. A snow white mask shows that a woman is civilized, sanitary, thoughtful, concerned for other people, discerning. well-provided for, modern, informed about science, modest, optimistic, judicious, objective, self-restrained and cautious. And what does a pair of good shoes show? It is a sure sign that a woman is banal, superficial, free with money, pretentious, fake and flirtatious."

Her theory made me notice that though she wore a gauze mask as white as snow, her shoes were quite drab and poorly fitting. There was an awkwardness in her walk, probably because she was splay-footed and had fallen arches.

As she held forth with her aesthetic theories, I finally realized that her looks did not deserve much in the way of compliments.

6

Once a singer received no applause after her performance. At a meeting afterwards she said:

"Applause doesn't mean anything. Is the sound of hands clapping beautiful? Is it art? Is it precious like gold? How much can you sell a kilo of it for? Some people get a little applause, and they're walking on air; they forget who they rt:ally are. They are chosen to be singing stars and get to ride on airplanes and to cut phonograph records. What a farce! This is corruption of the soul. If you don't believe me, I'll swing my rear end and sing dirty songs: see who gets more applause then!"

She also suggested doing an analysis of the audience and lining it up in groups by category to prove whether or not applause had any value.

At another performance the audience gave her thunderous applause. And so she spoke effusively:

"Songs are for people to listen to. No matter how good the lyrics and melody are, it is useless if people don't like to hear them. The eyes of an audience are crystal clear, and listeners have a balance scale in their hearts. If you depart from what the audience likes to see and hear, you become elitist rather than populist, and you deviate from the proper orientation. This leads to isolation, self-congratulation, narcissism, ivory tower obscurantism, despair and degeneration. It is not just the sound of hands clapping that I hear in the music hall: it is the beating of each passionate heart!"

After a while, musical workers held a meeting to discuss unwholesome trends in musical perfonnances and the need to channel the audience's interest and raise its level of appreciation. She brought up the time that her audience had not applauded her as an example and proclaimed:

"I took a stand! I took a stand! I took a stand!"

More time passed, and the musical workers held yet another meeting, where they spoke of the lack of songs and perfonnances which were welcomed by the masses. This time she made an example of her perfonnance that had received thunderous applause and proclaimed:

"I've already done that! I've already done that! I've already done that!"

7

After the publication of Andersen's story The Ugly Duckling, a disturbance arose in the flock of ducks.\fn{Hans Christian Andersen (1805-1875), the Danish author, first published this story of his in 1843.}

"I've been saying for a long time that I'm really a swan, but I've been ignored, looked down on and misunderstood," said an old male duck. "My youth has been wasted. Give me back my youth. Give me my swan's feathers and wings. Give me back my swanly pride and honour!"

"This is all because of the farmer's shortsightedness," quacked a female duck. "And the turkeys are jealous of anyone with ability! Because of them we are poverty stricken, we are down and out, and we are called 'ducks.' And what does 'duck' mean? The Chinese people think that the main characteristic of ducks is stupidity. Are we really stupid? I may not know what one plus two is, but is that my mistake? Has anyone given me training? Has anyone sent me to university?"

"I believe I've already turned into a swan. I'm going to make sure by looking at my reflection in the lake."

A moulting duck walked to the edge of the lake and looked in, but the graceful shape of a swan was not what he saw. He racked his brains for a while, and finally discovered the truth of the matter. He cried loudly to the others:

"The water in the lake is not fair. This water gives special breaks to some birds! This water has accepted a bribe of toad meat from the swans, and that's why their reflections look so wonderful, and ours look so dull!"

"Down with the lakewater! Down with the farmer! Down with the turkeys. Down with the Chinese people!" the ducks cried in unison, getting more and more angry.

The farmer walked over and hit the leading drake with a bamboo pole.

The ducks quieted down immediately.

The swan, who actually had once been an "ugly duckling" flew overhead through the blue sky, conversing with the white clouds.

8

On the other hand, what happens when an ugly duckling transforms into, or perhaps it is better to say, is recognized as a swan?

His life as an ugly duckling was poignant, moving and noble-minded. It drew people to him.

After his reputation was made, and he was given the title and privileges of a swan, was his life still so wonderful and touching?

Suppose he got "puffed up" and looked down on his duck brothers? He would go around with a fat cigar in his mouth and make a habit of shouting at people. He would demand the best food and proclaim everywhere he went:

"I am a swan. I was once treated as an ugly duckling. I am a swan! The bastards thought I was an ugly duckling!"

What would happen then?

Maybe he was an authentic swan, but why did he have to rub it in?

9

Sister Crow fell in love with Brother Crow. They were never apart, flying wing to wing and singing duets as if they were joined by an invisible thread.

"How blue is the sky, how gentle the wind, how buoyant the clouds!" Their song was a delight to the ear.

"How blue is the sky, how gentle the wind, how buoyant the clouds!" A group of young crows flew in circles around the admirable couple, singing happily.

Who would have expected Brother Crow to be influenced by the "new tide" from the West and its "sexual liberation"? He left Sister Crow in the lurch and didn't even say goodbye.

Sister Crow was heartbroken. She sang,

"Gloomy the sky and dark the land, dreary the wind and bitter the rain. His heart is a wolfs and his liver a dogs. He and his hypocrisy. In this whole crow's world there is no beauty, goodness, truth, youthfulness or justice!"

"Gloomy the sky and dark the land. Dreary the wind and bitter …" The young crows sang after her, but not as resoundingly. Though they had plenty of sympathy, they could not completely understand Sister Crow's feelings. Besides that, their increasing years had brought certain subtle Freudian notions.

Soon the young crows were splitting off in pairs, and when they got intimate they started billing and cooing like on the movie screen, all they heard from Sister Crow was a string of curses:

"Damn you, damn you, damn you!"

"Look at this emptyheadedness! Look at this false beauty! Look at you living in a dream. Don't you know that passion is emptiness and emptiness is passion? That is a truth that cuts through everything!!"

"Love is a prostitute! Love is a thief! Love is a were-fox! Love is a witch! You have to be above love if you want enlightenment."

"Love is a demon! Love is a sea of suffering! Love is poisoned wine! Love is a dirty rag! I don't see any worth in such vulgar pursuits"

"So you're flying now; you're pairing off and singing. Do you think your flying and courting and singing are anything special? Don't fool yourselves. I had a grander time then. You've been diddling around all this time, and you haven't come up with anything original. It makes me laugh so hard my molars fall out! It's more of the same old thing. It's all the same delusion I went through years ago!"

"Damn you! Damn you! Damn you!!"

At first the young crows were shocked and puzzled, but later they got used to it. Before this they had not known the bitter taste of love, but now they showed a fair amount of sympathy for Sister Crow. Still they were absorbed in flying, courting, singing, and nibbling, and could not spend time thinking of Sister Crow's affairs. They were too busy.

10

Below is a story I heard. I was told it is a translation of an African fable which appeared in a magazine published in the Sixties. It is so perfect, and it gets across its message so well, that I just had to write it out here. It is not my creation, and I hope the editors will not count this story when they count up the number of words to pay me for.

*

A man who found fault with everything lay beneath a walnut tree, sighing and venting his spleen.

"How unfair this world is! You try to find what sort of justice or right there is, but it's like picking through filth. There is nothing but a load of modem superstitions and primitive ignorance. Look at this tall-standing walnut tree. It has deep roots and a straight trunk; its foliage is luxuriant. It stands here, imposing and dignified, but the walnuts that it bears are not as big as the eggs of a chicken. This is ridiculous! It's moronic! It's an affront to the honor of all trees. An insult is what it is! And look at that pumpkin over there—a limp, spindly vine. It has no spine, no upstanding character. It lacks the distinction of growth rings or a woody stem. A creeping thing like that, down among the mud and dog turds, could never be a rafter or a beam. But somehow the gleaming golden pumpkins that grow on that vine are three times bigger than my head!"

As he cried out at the way fate had treated the walnut tree, and attacked the pumpkin for its upstart plumpness, a slight breeze loosened a walnut, and it fell—"bop," right on his head.

He jerked back in fright and his heart skipped a beat. It was a good while before he regained his wits. He felt his skull, and it was as sound as ever. There was no cavity or concussion or wound. There was not even a little goose egg.

He found himself giving praise from the bottom of his heart:

"Praise to all-knowing and omnipotent heaven; glory to the Lord! In such a just and equable world as ours the wisdom and grace of heaven are everywhere. Just think, if the walnuts on this tree really had grown as large as pumpkins and one of them had fallen down, it would have smashed my gourd. For me that would have been the end to all eternity!"

75.68 The Girl Next Door\fn{by King Tai-hsi (1934-   )} Chekiang Province, China (M) 7

Dear Wang Brother:

Ever since you moved away we have been so quiet and lonely. Sister and I think of you ever day. I had a dream last night, I dreamed of you and me, Sister and also Ho-liang playing together. Just as we were having so much fun, Mother woke me up. I was angry and scolded her.

"I was just talking to Wang brother. What bad luck!" My mother said:

"You have to go to school now. If you are late, you know you'll be punished."

So I put my clothes on, washed my face, brushed my teeth, and after eating my breakfast I shouldered my school bag and went to schoel. Do you know what Sister said?

"If Wang brother was here, he would take us to school."

I had asked Sister to write to you but she said girls cannot write letters to boys, the teacher said so. So I am writing to you. If I make any mistakes please correct them, all right? The end. Goodbye!

Liu Hsiao-ti

Respectfully written on February 16th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

Your letter and postcard were brought to me by the postman. Thank you. Sister was so happy! She used her whitest handkerchief to wrap up the postcards. I have practiced writing your corrections many, many times and I know I will not make these same mistakes, but we must correct our mistakes, then we are good students.

Ever since you moved away that room has been empty and then Sniffles and Chen Hsiao-hwei came to live. Sniffles is Chen Hsiao-kang. We call him Sniffles because he sniffles all the time, he never washes his face so that his face is all covered with mucus, yellow, black, dried and wet. Hsio-hwei is his older sister.

Chen Mama is beautiful! She has so many pretty new dresses. She also has money. Yesterday morning at breakfast she gave Sniffles and Chen Hsiao-hwei five dollars to go out and eat noodles. Sniffles is awful, he thinks too much of himself.

"My mother has many social engagements, when she doesn't come back to eat she gives us money to eat outside. You don't have any." This is what he said. I said:

"My mother used to give me a lot of money, even New Year's money; she bought apples for me and many, many other things." Then he said:

"You're lying!" His sister Hsiao-hwei heard us talking so she opened the door and dragged Sniffles in so fiercely. His sister does not have mucus on her face, she is very, very white. She likes to bite her lips hard. When she comes home from school she just hides in her room. I never hear her studying, don't know what she does. Then Hsiao-kang runs all over the place.

Chen Mama just puts on her new dresses and goes out every day. She doesn't come back until it is very, very dark. Whenever Sniffles comes to our home he refuses to go back. Mama says:

"Hsiao-kang, why don't you go home, your mother will scold you."He answers:

"Huh, I'm not afraid, my Mama is not at home, my Papa does not come home either." Then he said: "My Papa has many, many engagements, my Mama also has many, many social engagements."

Hsiao-hwei ran over without a sound and pulled hard at Sniffles' arm and insisted he go home. Her face was so very white. My Mama asked her to come in and play but she did not even say a word, just pulled Sniffles away. Mama then said to Sister:

"What is the matter with you, you don't even ask your schoolmate to come in for a while."

Hsiao-hwei and Sister are in the same class. Hsiao- hwei is very bad, she never talks to people, she is much too proud. Sister says the proud must fall. I guess she will fall, Wang Brother, don't you think so?

Yes, I forget to tell you that the little bird that, belongs to the Lee f:amily who live upstairs was bitten to death by a cat, or maybe by a rat, I don't know. Sunday morning we heard Lee Mama shouting and shouting. I ran upstairs and saw that the yellow parrot had fallen on the ground all covered with blood. It's foot was also broken. Feathers were all over the place. I picked one up and Sister said:

"So dirty, don't touch it."

But the feathers were clean and very pretty too.

When we went downstairs again I saw Hsiao-hwei open the door just a little and stick her head out. Then when she saw us coming down the stairs she quickly closed the door. I said to Sister:

"Hsiao-hwei is evesdropping."

Sister told me not to pay any attention to her. Sister said that at school Hsiao-hwei does not study and does not answer even when the teacher asks her question, just bites her lips all the time. After classes she doesn't play around, just stands alone under a tree. Her face is so very white.

I have to go to Sunday school now and if I am late I cannot get a picture. Wishing you goodbye,

Liu Hsiao-ti.

Respectfully written on March 5th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

You said that I have made progress in my letter writing, and I am very happy. Mama says for me to practice by writing more letters.

Today, I want to tell you something very shameful. On Tuesday we had a holiday and I was in the big kitchen helping Mama with the houswork. Later Chen Mama and Papa came in to do their cooking, then Ho Mama and Lee Mama also came in. We were all cooking there. Chen Papa was very happy and I saw him touch Chen Mama's face. Chen Mama was giggling. I told Mama and Mama pushed me.

"It is too crowded in the kitchen here, you children should not stay here, go out. Go out!" She pretended to be angry with me.

So I went out. Then after we had finished our lunch and Mama and I passed through the hall we saw Chen Mama and Chen Papa eating their lunch in their front room. Chen Papa again touched Chen Mama's face and he also kissed her. My Mama told my Papa and they laughed. Sister also laughed. My Mama said:

"Isn't it disgraceful, right in public!"

Don't you think this is shameful? That day Chen Papa bought some gold melons and Sniffles had one in his hand, taking big bites of it as he ran into our room saying:

"You don't have any gold melon, but I have some." I said:

"I don't want to eat gold melon. My Mama says it's not good to eat too many gold melons." He said:

"Liar, nothing better to eat than gold melon." I said:

"Don't you come to my house again." He said:

"My Mama and Papa are going to a dance, they are going to take me." I said:

"Liar!" He said:

"I am not a liar either!"

Then Chen Mama and Chen Papa went out and they did not take Sniffles either. I told him a poem.

Sniffles, Sniffles
Drink cold water, break a leg—
Cut your lips, take a wife with just one leg!
Sniffles is a liar!

He started crying and his nose ran and ran and he sniffled and sniffled. Then Hsiao-hwei came and dragged him back. The end. Goodbye.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti March 10th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

I want to ask you a question. Is it right to kill insects? I don't think it is right, is it? But Hsrao-hwei does this. She used sugar in the backyard to attract a whole lot of ants and then she used a match to burn them up. Is this right? Yesterday I sneaked after her into the garden and hid behind the big tree. I saw her burning the ants and she was very happy about it, talking to herself and pointing at them.

"All dead, burn you all up, kill all of you; see if you will listen to me or not."

See how fierce she is! And you tell me not to say bad things about her! Hsiao-hwei and Sniffles must be bad children so Chen Mama does not love them. If children do not listen to what they are told to do then grown-ups will not like them, isn't that right?

One day Chen Papa and Chen Mama were riot at home and even when we were going to have supper, Sniffles would not go home. My Mama said:

"Chen Hsiao-kang, is your mama back?" He answered:

"Of course not." My Mama said:

"You haven't had your supper yet, have you?" He said:

"My Mama and Papa are all out."

My Mama filled a bowl of rice for him to eat, asking him where did his Papa and Mama go to. He stuffed his mouth with vegetables and ate and ate before he answered.

"My Papa and my Mama had a fight last night. My Papa hit my Mama and my Mama hit my Papa … then … then I started to cry and my Mama used a comb to scrape my leg. She rubbed the comb In my leg as hard as she could and she said: 'It is all your fault, you little devil. You have spoiled my life and you cry!' It hurt so badly I cried more." I asked:

"Then what happened?" He answered:
"Then … then I went to sleep."
My Mama looked at Sniffles' leg and there were many, many red spots on it, also splotches and splotches of blue. Mama wanted to put some mercurochrome on it. but he said:
"I don't want mercurochrome. My leg will get well by itself. Last time Papa stuck my leg with a pen and I bled and bled, but after a while it was all right. I am not afraid."
Sniffles was still eating and eating when Hsiao-hwei came softly in saying:
"You have no face, eating at other people's homes again. I will tell Mama. Go home. Go home." My Mama said:
"Hsiao-hwei, you come and have something to eat."
She looked and looked at our dishes of food on the table but shook her head fiercely.
"I have already eaten. Come home!" and they went home.
Hsiao-hwei and Sniffles must be disobedient children, else why should Chen Mama and Chen Papa beat them like that? Wang brother, don't you think I am right?

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti March 17th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:
Thank you for your photos and the book named Heart. Sister has already covered it with wrapping paper. Why does the author of this book have such a long name, it is so hard to remember.
Last Sunday, Ho-liang, Sister and I went to Sunday school together and I asked Hsiao-hwei if she wanted to go with us but she did not even answer me. She was staring at Lee Mama's little chicks. Lee Mama's little chicks had come out of the eggs she had bought and are so very pretty. When I stick my finger into the cage they bite my finger with their little beaks, so ticklish. Lee Mama said to us:
"When the chicks are grown big and have eggs, I will let each of you have an egg." We all shouted together:
"Yes, Yes!"
Hsiao-hwei, however did not say a word. Lee Mama then asked her:
"Hsiao-hwei, do you want an egg?" Chen Hsiao-hwei answered:
"I want a little chick." Lee Mama said:
"You like little chicks?" She said:
"I don't like little chicks at all." Sniffles broke in:
"I want, I want two little chicks." Sniffles is greedy. He ate one whole gold melon by himself and never gave anyone else a piece. Stingy little snob-nose!
Our Sunday school teacher told us that when we ate breakfast, lunch or supper we must pray to God to thank God for giving us food to eat. I raised my hand and asked what we should do when we eat an egg. Teacher said:
"You don't have to pray when you eat an egg." I then asked:
"Don't I have to thank Lee Mama?"
Sister pulled at my jacket. I couldn't stand up any longer so I sat down.
Ho-liang, Sister and I went home together. We saw Hsiao-hwei squatting by the gate tying up a frog with a piece of string. She put a big piece of wood on the frog's leg and cut it with a razor blade. The skin came off and the flesh was so white. I stood behind her and heard her scolding the frog:
"Egg of a Turtle! I'll kill you!" She then spit on the face of the frog. I said:
"You are really a bad egg!"
She Jumped with fright and then saw it was only me so she said:
"You're the bad egg. I'll kill you—see if I don't." I said:
"Teacher said that the frog is good and helps the farmers. Why should you hurt it? You are a bad egg!"
She raised the razor blade. I was very scared so I ran into the house. Teacher has told us that frogs, eagles and cows are all helpful. Why should she kill them then? Hsiao-hwei is really strange. You don't know how black and shiny her eyes are! Really scary! The end.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti March 20th.

*

Dear Wang brother:
Today in Chinese reading class Hsiao-kang could not memorize his lesson so the teacher said:

"Why don't you do your homework at home. Don't your father scold you?" Hsiao-kang said:

"My father is a politician—he doesn't have time." Everybody laughed. Wang Brother, what is a politician? Then teacher was very angry and said:

"But doesn't your mother scold you?" Hsiao-kang said:

"My Mama has very many social engagements (I got it right this time, didn't I?). Sometimes she has to invite the General's wife to play mahjongg."

Teacher was very angry and wanted to punish Hslao-kang. Hsiao-kang started to cry and wanted to go home and tell his father. He said:

"My father is a politician. He's a hair-dresser, so he's very important." Wang Brother, why is a hair-dresser important?\fn{A note reads: In Chinese a member of the Legislative Yuan is a li.fa wei-yuan and a hair-dresser is a li fa*. The characters are different, but the sounds are similar So it is easy for a child to mistake the two terms*.}

Teacher seemed to be afraid then and did not punish him. After class Hsiao-kang told us:

"I am not afraid of teacher." My Mama said: "What is a school teacher? If the teacher is no good you come and tell me!" Then Hsiao-kang said:

"Teacher's sister is a maid servant at the home of a friend of my father's, Uncle Huang. Huh!"

Then that nasty Kuo-fang, the one we call "Flatterer," said:

"Wonderful, wonderful! Teacher's sister is a maid servant!" You remember I wrote you about Kuo-fang. Really nasty-always has to p'ai-ma-p'i even for snob-nose Hsiao-kang!\fn{A note reads: P'ai-ma-p'i, literally "pat the horse's rear," is slang for flattery.}

After school was over, Sister and I went home. When we got to the gate we heard sounds of quarreling. Many, many people were crowded around the door of Hsiao-hwei's place. Ho Papa, Ho Mama, Lee Papa, Lee Mama and the new family that had just moved into the room upstairs. Everybody was watching. I could not see anything even when I jumped up, so I stooped down and looked through their legs. I saw Sniffles sitting in a corner crying. Chen Mama was also sitting on the ground crying. Her new dress was torn and my Papa was pulling at Chen Papa. Chen Papa's face had several red streaks. He looked so mad!

"All of you see if this is right. Not at home all day!" Chen Papa was really shouting.

"Day before yesterday, our son fell into that sewer outside the gate. If it hadn't been for Mrs. Liu, he would have drowned, I tell you! What kind of a home is this?"

My Mama dragged Chen Mama into our home. Chen Mama cried and cried and cried, and she cursed Chen Papa.

"Why doesn't he die? He beats me, but he's such a big shot, he can be out the whole day playing with women, going to wine shops. Why can't I go out? Why doesn't he die!"

Ho-liang was standing with me on the side and said in a loud voice:

"Day before yesterday I saw Chen Papa with a woman in a pedicab." My Papa said loudly:

"Hsiao-ti, go out, go out! It's too crowded here in this room."

So I had to jump up and go out.

My Papa and Chen Papa stood by the door talking. Chen Papa saw Hsiao-hwei and said:

"Where is your brother?" Chen Hsiao-hwei answered:

"I don't know."

Chen Papa suddenly jumped over and slapped Chen Hsiao-hwei on the cheek. Hard—it must of hurt.

"All day long you're in the clouds! You don't study and you don't look out for your brother. What do you do, you? If you don't listen to me I'll kill you."

Hsiao-hwei fell on the ground. The whole side of her face was red. She did not cry. You know, I think she must be very brave. She just clenched her teeth. My Papa said:

"She is only a child." Papa lifted her up. "Get up, get up. Hurry and go find your brother. Hsiao-ti, you go with her to find her brother."

So I went with Hsiao-hwei to look for Sniffles. When we reached the back yard Hsiao-hwei took a paper package out of her pocket and opened it up. A little mouse fell out on the ground and she stamped on it. I saw the mouse's leg all covered with blood. Hsiao-hwei put on a very fierce look and she pointed her finger at the mouse.

"See if you'll listen to me or not. I'm not afraid of you. See if I don't kill you!"

Then she spit violently on the face of the mouse. Afterwards we entered the house and saw Sniffles lying on the floor sleeping with a broken doll in his hand. This is terrible, my letter is too long. My hand is already tired. The end.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,

Liu Hsiao-ti March 30th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

April Four was Children's Day. That night, Papa and Mama took Sister and me to the circus to see the clown. It was so good. I think you must have seen it long ago. That night, everybody went out, Ho-liang and his family, the Lee family also all went out. Only Hsiao-hwei was hiding alone in her room. That day even after we had finished dressing in our new clothes, Sniffles still did not go home. So Mama asked him:

"Hsiao-kang, you are in my home every day. You come and be my son, all right?" Sniffles immediately said.

"Good, really and truly wonderful!" Then he looked at me and asked: "Hsiao-ti, is it all right?" Then he turned and ran home and ran back again with a real little trumpet and handed it to me.

"This is for you. I want give myself as a son to your family. My sister also, can she?" My Mama quickly shook her head.

"No, no—your Mama wouldn't let you go."

He was so disappointed.

"My Mama won't care. She scolds me every day says I have spoiled her life for her. Mama does not want me at all."

Then Mama, Papa and I all went out together. We had such a good time. We came back after ten o'clock that night and saw Sniffles sitting at the gate with the trumpet in his hand. My Mama was very startled.

"Hsiao-kang, what in the world are you still sitting here for? Hurry on and go to bed." He said:

"Can I come to your home to sleep? I don't need any covers. I'm not afraid of the cold and I am not afraid of mosquitoes. I am very good, I don't even cry at nights."

Mama took him back to the Chen's place by the hand and when she returned she sighed and said:

"Really pitiful—I just can't understand people like that!"

Last night I could not go to sleep. Why didn't Chen Papa and Chen Mama know that it was Children's Day? It is so strange.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti, April 5th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

It is a long time since I have written to you. Every day Sister asks me why I don't write to you, every day she scolds me. She locked that book Heart up in the drawer and won't let me take it away. Wang brother, you gave it to both of us, didn't you? Sister is horrible. She makes me sick! "Hsiao-ti, you wash your hands before I let you touch the book." Then she scolds me for dirtying the book. She also says that I can't understand it anyway. The other day, I told Hsiao-kang that you had given me a copy of Heart. He didn't believe me and wanted me to show it to him. Sister would not let me. I am not talking to her any more.

Hsiao-kang is very well off. Wang Brother, is a legislature (this time I wrote it right because I looked it up) a business man? Hsiao-kang had twenty dollars today to buy things to eat, he bought peanut candy and ice cream. He says that his father is always at meetings, every day he has meetings. So many people send him gifts. Wang brother, when I am grown up can I be a legislature? Then I will buy a good pen for Papa, a pair of the best rubber shoes for Mama, a pair of long trousers for you so you can give away those old ones you have and I will buy as many copies of Heart as I want and I won't give a single one to Sister.

Two of Lee Mama's little chickens got eaten up by the rats. Yesterday when I and Sister came home from school we saw Lee Mama—holding two baby chicks and shouting. I saw that the little chicks were all covered with blood, just like that day the parrot died. Wang brother, why do baby chicks stick out their legs so straight when they die? Did they use a lot of strength? That's what Ho-liang says—it's because they used a lot of strength.

When I entered the gate and went by the Chen's door I heard Hsiao-hwei singing as she jumped around, seeming very happy.

"Kill you, Kill you, you bad thing." This is what she was singing.

I stuck my head in and saw her great big eyes staring at me, very big and very black. Blacker than black ink. I was very scared and ran right home. I thought and thought and then said to my Mama:

"Mama, Hsiao-hwei killed the baby chicks." Mama said:

"It was a rat. Don't make up stories." I said:

"It is, it must be. I even heard her singing: Kill you, Kill you, kill you, you bad thing."

My Mama then started to talk with my Papa and paid no attention to me. I was so upset. I thought and thought and then ran to ask Hsiao-hwei.

"Hsiao-hwei, did you kill the baby chicks?"

She opened her eyes so big and pulled a little blade from her pocket:

"I'll kill you, you are talking nonsense, I'll kill you." This is what she said.

I was scared and ran back home. I heard her running after me and was so frightened that I fell on the ground. Then I saw that it was Sniffles running towards me. He said:

"I have told my Papa and my Mama to give me to your Mama. Is that all right, Hsiao-ti?"

I did not answer him, I just scrambled up and ran home. Wang Brother, I was scared to death that day.Even now when I am writing about it my hands are shaking. You must think my writing is becoming worse and worse. Goodbye.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti April 15th.

*

Dear Wang Brother:

I have two pieces of sad news. The first is that two more of Lee Mama's little chicks have died. We don't know how they died as there was no blood on their bodies and no bruises. Lee Mama found the bodies of the dead chicks at the side of the sewer by the gate. She was so upset and unhappy.

"How did this happen? There is no bruise. It is very strange." I said:

"Strangled, they must have been strangled." You know, choked.

Lee Mama said quickly: "What strangled them, who strangled them? Hurry up and tell me!"

I was scared to death.

"I won't tell, I don't know." Then when I went in I saw Hsiao-hwei standing beside their opened door staring at me. Her eyes were so black, really blacker than black ink. I was frightened to death. She scolded me.

"Hsiao-ti, if you dare tell any nonsense, I'll cut your leg right off with a razor blade. You don't know how much that'll hurt! So you do what I say!"

Back in my own house I thought and thought and didn't dare say anything.

The other sad news is about Hsiao-kang.

The other day he was late to school again and when he entered the school room he didn't even bow to teacher, just strolled over his desk very casually. Teacher got very angry.

"Hsiao-kang, you are late again. You never listen."

Hsiao-kang did not pay any attention and only stood up when Teacher went over to where he sat. Teacher then said:

"You must not be late again. Sit down."

The next day Hsiao-kang did not come to school. The day after that he didn't come either. The next day when we started Teacher came in and didn't say a word for quite some time. We were all getting scared because whenever Teacher was angry with us he would act like this. Then he said:

"I have to announce some very sad news. Your classmate Chen Hsiao-kang was run over by a car day before yesterday. We will now bow our heads for three minutes in mourning."

We were all very upset. Those three minutes were so very long. I thought of the way Hsiao-kang looked and it seemed that he could not be dead. I raised my head to steal a look at Teacher and saw that there were tears on his face. My heart suddenly hurt me and I started to cry. Many classmates began to cry also.

After class was over I was rather embarrassed. Kuo-fang, Kuo-fang is the "Flatterer," said:

"That day after school I went to play with Hsiao-kang and there were many guests at his home. Many pedicabs and cars at his gate. So very many. He told me that they were having a party. His father gave him ten dollars and told him to go out and play. We went together to buy something to eat. Afterwards I saw that it was getting dark so I went home. Hsiao-kang didn't go home because he said it didn't matter if he went home after seven thirty. Really scary! Luckily I went home or else I would be unlucky too."

All of us were scared. Wang brother, I can't believe that Hsiao-kang is dead. How can a person be dead all of a sudden? Wang Brother, next time I will make sure there are no cars before I cross the street.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Hsiao-ti April 18th.

*

Dear Wang brother:\fn{This letter is written by Liu Mei-ying, Liu Hsiao-ti's kid-sister.}

I almost can't hold my pen to write to you. It is too horrible.

Hsiao-ti was hurt by a car. He is now in room ninety-seven in the Surgical Section of Taiwan University Hospital. He has a high fever and talks feverishly all day long. We don't understand what he is talking about. I am so scared. Sometimes he keeps on calling: "Wang brother, Wang brother."

Wang Brother, do you have time? Please will you come to see him?

Two days ago someone hung up Ho Mama's tabby cat in the back yard. The cat's face, especially the eyes, were so cut up that the flesh and blood was all smeared together. The legs were also covered with cuts. Hsiao-ti blurted out that it must be Chen Hsiao-hwei who killed it (Chen Hsiao-hwei is the girl who moved here not long ago and is a classmate of mine). I told him to stop talking nonsense. I don't know how, but Ho Mama began to be suspicious of Hsiao-hwei and went to ask her. Of course, there was no result.

Yesterday morning when we went to school we saw Hsiao-hwei following up. Hsiao-ti kept telling me to walk faster and when we reached school he kept asking me to go home with him after school. I had to practice folk dancing for our school anniversary celebrations, so I had to tell him to go home first. I did not think there would be an accident. If I had only known this would have happened, I would have asked him to wait for me and we could have gone later.

Ho-liang said that as they walked home, Hsiao-ti kept telling him to walk faster. When they were almost home, Hsiao-hwei suddenly came up from behind with something bright in her hand, he didn't know what.

The minute Hsiao-ti saw her he started to fly away. Hsiao-hwei ran after him, and Hsiao-ti was screaming at the top of his lungs, hanging on to his school bag and running with all his strength. Ho-liang said that he started to run too, but before he caught up Hsiao-ti was already hit by a car.

Wang brother, I really hate myself. I should have gone home with him. I feel so bad, I don't know what to do. I have not been in school for three days. The doctor says that most probably there is no danger, but we will have to wait until the X-rays come out before being sure. Please, please, Wang brother, hurry and come. Papa and Mama are so upset they are going around in circles and don't have time to write to you. They ask me to send you their regards.

Respectfully wishing you happiness,
Liu Mei-ying April 25th.

P.S.

Yes, I forgot to tell you that this girl Hsiao-hwei has not come home for the past three days. Chen Papa did not come home all yesterday and Chen Mama was so angry she went in search of him and reported to police. But up till now there is still no news. You have no idea—everything is so upside down in our compound!

81.73 Operation Excavation\fn{by Ho Hsiao-chung aka Ho Tsu-wu (1934-)} Tsining, Shantung Province, China (M)
11

"Hey, stupid! Give it to me!" said Sgt. Liu, standing on a chair.

Accordingly, I handed up to him a tag marked with "250 lbs." on it. Under the melon shed he had decked out one of the squashes that was as big as a vacuum flask, with a propeller blade, a primer, a blasting cap with fuse and other important parts, all made of cardboard. It now resembled a magnificent mock bomb, true to life, with this tag attached to it. Sgt. Liu descended from the chair, admiring what he had done, saying,

"You know why we have built up this melon shed behind the day-room, boy? Folks around here may take a break and get a breath of cool air in here. No one is allowed to pick the squashes until they grow old enough to produce pulps which will be handed out to all the men of this unit. You may then either use them as a sponge when you take a shower or to scratch yourselves when you are itchy. Let the hand of those who steal them rot!"

"You are really something, Sarge," I said, showing thumbs up. "But I wonder how it would be if it were a real 250-lb job?"

"I'll tell you how. When this thing goes off within a hundred meters, you will certainly get killed. But you might keep yourself together if you throw yourself down on the ground right away. Should you fool around, you would surely be blown up piece by piece along with it!"

"Could this be so terrible?" I asked. "I would never guess it!"

"What are you talking about? It's not a scale weight! It could make a very big hole anywhere it is thrown. Furthermore, if it goes off, you'll get much worse than a sore eye if you accidentally come across it!"

As a rule, Sgt. Liu would often exaggerate to impress us. I turned to Sgt. Hu:

"Is that true?"

Sgt. Hu, lounging in a chair, grinned at me and nodded.

I knew why he was grinning. I was just a kid, not knowing much about anything except driving. Besides, I had another weakness: I liked to ask questions. That's why everybody called me "stupid." Though he would make fun of me sometimes, I still liked to come to him whenever I had any questions.

Sgt. Hu had been with the Air Force for most of his life. He was noted for being honest, energetic and reliable; all these virtues being manifested in his tireless work as a veteran mechanic. For all his seniority and experience, he never posed as a big shot in his field, nor said anything against any of us. Everyday, on duty, the Major would put one of the most comfortable chairs in the shadiest and coolest place in the shed, saying, "Sit down and take a rest, Sarge! Nothing is so important as to need you now."

Also as a rule, he would look around and if I were there he would never order anybody else around.

"Hey, stupid! Go and fetch the Sarge a couple of meat patties," said the Major.

"And pour us some tea, will you?" The others would follow suit and call out to me.

Talking about meat patties, folks here presumed that they were paid out of public funds, but as a matter of fact, they were at the Major's own expense. Only Sgt. Liu and I knew this because on pay day each month, I would be sent to the PX to clear the bills. This morning, when the Major, Sgt. Liu and I were passing by the PX, the manager told the Major, "Sir, you owe me twenty five dollars this month."

"Sorry, we must get to the apron right now," the Major said. "Forgot to bring the money. How about tomorrow?"

"The Major will certainly pay you. Don't worry, man!" Sgt. Liu yelled to the manager. "Keep that on your mind just for a while, will you?"

Sgt. Liu had three remarkable features: a huge body, a large mouth and a big voice. His face was always ruddy the year round and he liked to display his quick wit by playing on words. When he was asked how he had built up such strength and energy, he would say, "Fresh water plus optimism equals Vitamin P." I truly admired him! No wonder people said we had four aces in our troop; the Major's learning, Sgt. Hu's experience, Sgt. Chang's agility and Sgt. Liu's strength.

"Hello? Yeah. Yeah. Okay!" Putting down the phone, the Major told us, "Four planes are ready to go on mission. Let's go and fix the bombs."

They left us immediately. Sgt. Hu was still dozing under the shed.

*

"Stupid, pour some tea, will you? The Major and the boys have come back."

It was Sgt. Hu's voice. I thought he was still dozing but it seemed that he was more alert than I was. He threw a pack of "814" cigarettes on to the stone table.\fn{A note reads: CAF cigarette brand. "814" stands for August 14, the day the Chinese Air Force made a clean score in the first air duel during the Sino-Japanese war in 1937.}

I poured out two cups of tea.

Across the apron, smooth as a movie screen, two men were coming toward us. They looked so small that it seemed as if they were in a movie scene shot from a distance. Even taking large strides, the Major could still barely keep pace with Sgt. Chang but it showed the Major's determination never to fall behind anyone.

What impressed us most about the major was his mustache. His gray fatigues, well filled with his excess poundage, showed his years of hard work and distinguished service. Greasy and shiny, any pieces torn from it would be welcome by the barber for sharpening his razor blades.

By contrast, Sgt. Chang, walking beside the Major, had three striking features: long face, long neck and long legs, stumbling like a zebra. One of the down-to-earth men in our units, he would bring along with him all kinds of tools such as screw driver, pliers and so on, all jingling in his pockets, ready to get on the job when and if needed.

Four Saber jets, with a black bomb under each of its wings, soared skyward, swiftly and steadily.

Turning around, his hand shading his eyes, the Major looked up at the Saber jets shooting into the clouds.

"Four of them on the way!" the Major said, as he entered the melon shed. He removed his cap and wiped the sweat from his forehead. "Seem a little tired. Much tougher job to hook up bombs than to fix the rockets, and things like that."

"Have some hot water and a cigarette!" Sgt. Hu said, pointing to the tea I just poured for them. "How much does it weigh?"

"Five hundred pounds," said Sgt. Chang, reaching for the tea, but it was snatched by Sgt. Liu. So I poured him another cup and then went to squat down by Sgt. Hu.

"Sarge, is the 500-1b. job twice as powerful as the 250-1b. one?" I asked him.

"Can't you just keep your big mouth shut, kid?" It was Sgt. Liu's voice. Turning around, I saw that he was using an old magazine as a fan. “Stupid! I'll tell you how good the 500-1b. job is. If you want to dig a swimming pool at your house, you can save a lot of money by firing one as big as that!”

They all laughed at me, making me uncomfortable. A gust of wind blew through the shed. “Wonderful” everyone exclaimed. No one who had never worked hard under the hot sun could quite appreciate this sense of well being. The gourd over Sgt. Chang’s head swung in the breeze. and I could not help but say:

“Sarge, you’d better keep away from it. It is explosive and much worse than a sore eye if it hits you on your head.”

Sgt. Chang did not say anything, just grinned. But Sgt. Liu could not keep quiet: “All right, you can pay off your wet-nurse for good, kid. You have learned to talk now!”

He picked up a cigarette offered by Sgt. Hu, staring at me, while listening to the others laughing. After they stopped laughing he added: “Kid, if that was a real job, you would have been done with even though you had hidden yourself far behind that house.”

I could hardly swallow what he said, so I retorted: “Not exactly. It could as well be a dud. You never know!”

“A dud? Wen, you can get another one sure to go off together. Nobody would dare touch it.”

“You are not scaring me, Sarge!”

“If you don’t believe me, you may ask Sgt. Hu.” Turning around, I saw the Major chatting with Sgt. Hu, so did not have the nerve to interrupt.

As far as I knew, Sgt. Hu had six children, all going to school, ranging from secondary school to sophomore year in college. The Major, always thoughtful and considerate to his men, had been voluntarily conducting a “cram session” for Sgt. Hu’s children, free of charge.

Sgt. Hu was both a respectable and respectful man. He would say, “Respect others as you would like others to respect you.” When talking about the Major, he would say, “I don’t suppose I, in my lifetime, could ever repay the major for whatever he has so kindly done for me. I would like to do a good job both as a faithful subordinate and a good soldier. But the Major has been assigning me to this chair in this comfortable place instead of giving me any other demanding job.”

At first, I thought Sgt. Hu was right: One must try one’s best in getting a job done well. The more able you are, the more you become vexed by idleness. Then I realized the Major was also right when he said to Sgt. Hu, “You have worked very hard and quite enough for the CAF. Now you can benefit us with your advice. Maybe some day, we’ll need you when we have real trouble.”

We had to admit that the Major had a point there.

“Hey, stupid!” said the Major, suddenly thinking of something. “Go to the HQs, and draw the pay and rations for these sergeants. They said they would be issued today.”

“Okay, Sir.” Leaving the key to the three quarter ton truck and my pass to the Major, I borrowed a bicycle from Sgt. Chang. Being long-legged, Sgt. Chang had raised the bicycle seat, much too high for my size. No sooner was I about\fn{The text has: No sooner than I was about …} to put a foot on the pedal than I heard Sgt. Liu's loud voice. “Want me to lift you up there?”

*

It took me about 40 minutes to get the pay and rations.

As son as I reached the melon shed, I was stunned to see the Colonel there. The Colonel, corpulent, and jovial, usually reminded us of a laughing Buddha but today, he was quite another man, His face was tense, and he strode back and forth with lowered head and both hands behind his back, making his belly seem even more plump.

I was sure something was brewing. It seemed as if they had been discussing something without any apparent conclusion, each of them holding a cigarette between their fingers, frowning in an absent-minded way.

I wondered what was wrong with Sgt. Liu. He was sitting behind the wheel of the three-quarter-ton truck, leaning against the steering wheel. He seemed to have lost his voice.

“Colonel, Sir, they are on the way!”

When the Major reported this, everybody turned to look at the bamboo grove. There were several farm houses there, with little red flags surrounding them. Near the village, there was a GMC truck. Guards were being deployed, seemingly to encircle the village.

How strange. Soldiers were supposed to love and protect the people. This would certainly scare them instead.

“Major, did you tell them to evacuate all the civilians?”

The Major clicked his heels, his mustache wagging as he answered briskly:

“Yes, Sir. I have phoned the Company Commander that all civilians must be taken to the police station, immediately for transient care there.”

Nodding his approval, the Colonel asked Sgt. Chang, “Have you checked plane No. 6220?”

Usually, Sgt. Chang would slouch when standing, sticking out his neck, as if he didn’t want others to say that he had fenced off the sunshine. Now he came to attention, becoming almost a half foot taller.

“According to the report, Sgt. Hu is right in his judgment. We have found what’s wrong with the circuit.”

Nothing was special about an aircraft having some trouble, but I wondered what was all this about the farmers? I just couldn’t associate the two incidents. The more I thought, the more I was puzzled. But this was not the time for me to say anything.

“Something like this happened to me once before,” said Sgt. Hu, as he sat down on a chair.

“When?” asked the Colonel.

“When you were just a warrant officer.”

Sgt. Hu, holding the moistened cigarette butt between his thumb and index finger, was thinking very hard.

“Tell me about it, Sarge,” the Colonel urged.

“It was back in 1947 at Chengchow, an F-47 came in from a mission, just like this one. The difference was that the pilot didn’t know there was a bomb left in the bomb bay. As soon as he landed, the bomb I dropped on the runway and exploded.”

“What happened to the aircraft?”

“Only minor damage to the tail. Lucky enough,” said Sgt. Hu, shaking his head. “Nowadays, the plane has higher velocity, so a much stronger pull, so it will throw a bomb further.”

Oh no! Now I realized what had happened. One of the incoming planes must have had a bomb left in its bomb bay and the bomb must have dropped in the bamboo grove. No wonder everybody was so nervous and tense, planting little red flags, deploying guards and finally evacuating the civilians! Living with armaments for so many years, the more you hear people talking about them, the more you know about them. This job was no joke! I climbed into the driver’s seat, whispering to Sgt. Liu, “Sarge, who fixed that bomb today?” When he lifted up his head I backed away in fear. His eyes were red and his face ashy. Words seemed to be squeezed out of his teeth. “Son of a gun, are you trying to interrogate me? There is a long way ahead of you before you make a judge!” His spittle flew all over my face. As he leaned over the steering wheel again, I took out my handkerchief to wipe my face. No sooner had I put the handkerchief back into the pocket than I heard the Colonel’s voice.

“Major, do you know who fixed that bomb today?”

Sgt. Liu straightened up abruptly but before he could get up, the Major said: “I did, Sir.”

“No!” Sgt. Liu leaped downward, almost falling, over. He saluted the Colonel while reporting. “I did! Sir.”

“He is my subordinate, Sir. If he does anything wrong, I am to be blamed,” said the Major.

“It’s I who actually carried out the job. Sir.”

“It’s I who made the final check. Sir.”

“ …”

“ …”

Strange! What were they competing for? Not for a trophy, nor for a medal, nor anything like that. It didn’t have to take two to present this case.

Apparently, the Colonel was running out of patience. He was standing with his arms akimbo, his hand trying hard to stay on his waist until he finally hooked his thumb in his belt. Everybody knew that when ever he assumed this stance, he meant business. I was obvious that if anything went wrong, it would mean disaster for these farmers.

Unexpectedly, the Colonel began to smile. He raise his left hand to stop any further arguments.

“Frankly, nobody wanted this to happen. No should anyone be blamed for accidents caused by faulty mechanism. You guys may stop arguing now. There are several things for us to rejoice at. One, we have sunk two Chicom\fn{Chinese Communist.} supply vessels; two, the bomb near the village didn’t go off. Sgt. Hu, see what you can do about it. Let us learn something from this accident.”

What a man! Everyone of us felt much calmer after he had finished. It was so much wiser to give people a chance to make amends than to mete out punishment at every instance. There would be no fear that he would not be more careful the next time, even at the risk of his life.

Sgt. Hu chuckled the furrows on his weather-beaten face creasing up until his eyes were invisible. I guessed that Sgt. Hll was laughing at both Sgt. Liu and the Major for being so nervous. Having been with the Colonel for so many years, he knew the Colonel well and most probably had known all along what his reaction would be.

The Major felt so embarrassed that he got red all over his neck.

“I must attend a very important meeting.” Looking at his watch, he said, “You guys think about it and try to dispose of that dud. As soon you make a decision, give me a call, will you?”

“Yes, Sir,” we said, saluting him.

The Colonel, touched the brim of his cap with his right hand and left us. He also left us with a difficult problem to solve.

*

“Hey, stupid!”

For Heaven's sake! What was wrong with the Major? He called me at the top of his voice, loud enough to command a whole regiment. Only once in a blue moon could you find him yelling like that, with both eyeballs projecting, his brows raised at a forty-five degree angle, like two writing brushes. I was a little angry with Sgt. Hu. No matter what age or rank, man always had his pride. The Major may be youngerthan he was but he was a Major and Sgt. Hu should not have laughed at such a moment. Besides, the Major had only been trying to save us from any possible punishment.

“Stupid! What are you hiding there for? Go an get us a couple of benches. We are holding meeting.”

“Yes, Sir!”

As hastily as Sgt. Liu a moment ago, I leaped from the car, slipped on a round rock, and fell flat on my face.

Unsympathetically, Sgt. Liu said, “Why are you jumping? No swimming pool down there!”

“Hurt yourself? Better check,” said Sgt. Chan who always was the professional trouble-shooter.

Painstakingly, Sgt. Hu rose from the chair, trying to give me a hand. “This is the way of the unfledged youngster! Be more careful and you would have no trouble.”

“Come on, get up, kid,” the Major yelled and jumped up. “No one at your age should need an help. Take the responsibility for what you do. I a sick of those who make themselves a laughing stock.”

I realized that the latter part of this sentence was not being said to me. I wondered how Sgt. Hu felt. His wrinkled face slackened and became expressionless. The chair creaked as he leaned back in it.

“Major, it is easy to have accidents in our kind of job, being deformed by minor ones, and killed in major ones.” Sgt. Hu, was obviously trying to restrain himself, and went on softly, “So you have to cultivate. a habit of playing it cool and taking it easy.”

“Over-played coolness could turn into impudence.”

“What kind of theory is this?” Nobody would have expected Sgt. Hu to press on. “I doubt this is justifiable. One is a question of will power, the other is a question of judgement. No connection whatsoever between these two.”

“All right, Sgt. Hu,” outspoken Sgt. Liu interrupted. “The more you argue, the more you miss the point. We’ve not as yet dealt with the important problem of digging up so why go on arguing about unnecessary things.”

The Major kept quiet and left for the day room. Sgt. Liu and Sgt. Chang moved swiftly over to Sgt. Hu, the latter saying reproachfully: “Why were you guys talking like that before the Colonel? Are you crazy? I think the Major was really hurt.”

“Who’s crazy?” Sgt. Hu seemed confused.

Sgt. Liu, tuning his voice to a lower key, said, “Why the devil did you chuckle when the Major and I were arguing about hooking up the bomb?”

“Dammit! How can such a big man as you have such a small suspicious mind!” Sgt. Hu was as surprised as one of those heroes in a chivalrous romance—caught in an ambush. “Why did I laugh? You were all standing looking at me, but from where I was sitting I not only could see you, but also that bamboo grove behind you. Men and women, young and old, were climbing on to the truck and one of the farmers insisted on loading his buffalo on it. The guards were trying to stop him and both sides were tugging at the reins.”

“You take a better look. This is nothing but a canvas belt for the plane.”

By coincidence, the Major stepped out of the door with a canvas belt of about one and a half inch wide in his hand and overheard the last three words. Being quick-witted, Sgt. Chang hurried up to the Major and said, “We were not talking about you, Sir. You have misunderstood.”

“All right, all right, let’s get on the job. Sgt. Chang, bring along your tools, will you?”

“What we were talking about was that the truck. were evacuating the farmers—”

Sgt. Liu was trying to explain, but was interrupt by the Major.

“That is very good. Now let’s get do to business and stop talking about irrelevant things.” Standing there, the Major was pulling rank on us trying to recover from his humiliation of a few minutes ago. As a matter of fact, we had never seen the Major like this before. I was thinking that Sgt. Hu had been done an injustice. At his age, he could have retired from the Air Force several years ago, drawing a pension, enjoying himself for the rest of his life. Instead, he had again and again asked to be re-enlisted. and now to be humiliated like this. If I were him, I would certainly hit back in kind, and sharply. When Sgt. Hu was the chief man in the field of maintenance, the Major had been just raw recruit. No wonder they said that the young will displace the old. What can you say?

Placing the tool set on the stone table, Sgt. Chang took out a screw driver, and pliers from his pockets and threw them into it.

Squatting against one of the poles of the shed, Sgt. Liu was toying with a small rock.

These was no breeze and it was sultry in the shed. It had never been so quiet like this since the melon. shed had been built. Silence did not necessarily mean peace. I could sense the uneasiness in the air.

"Sgt. Chang." Rolling up the canvas belt, the Major put it into his pocket as he said, "What do you think we should do?"

"I guess," Sgt. Chang thought for a while before he continued, "when a bomb falls from the bay, it has to revolve about three hundred to five hundred times before the safety pin breaks off and it explodes. Maybe this bomb did not go off because it was too near the ground and didn't have enough time to revolve after it fell from the plane."

"Theoretically, it could be so." The Major agreed with what he said. He then yelled, "Sgt. Liu!"

Sgt. Liu didn't answer. The small rock in his hand was now well polished. After a while, he raised his head. This tardy reaction obviously irritated the Major.

"I don't think that little rock will tell you the ways and means to dispose of the dud."

"The way to dispose of it should be known by every army mechanic," the words burst from him. "In any country, for any kind of bomb, there is only one most reliable way to handle a dud: blast: it! Let me be responsible for what I did. No need to talk any more. Let me get at it!"

Sgt. Liu may have been right but his attitude toward his superior was certainly wrong. He should have said it in a friendlier and more respectful way. I could see that the Major's patience was running out. They glared at each other for a long while, the tension mounting. Fortunately, Sgt. Liu was the first to drop his head.

I sympathized with Sgt. Liu. There seemed to be a kind of pain gnawing inside of him because it was he who had hooked up the bomb, although nothing was wrong with the bomb itself. Air Force men did not mind when people said they were dandies, but they certainly become irritated when they are accused of being inefficient at their jobs. What had happen today was very upsetting and Sgt. Liu spoke out his feelings without thinking. When he realized that he had been very disrespectful and rude, he immediately stood up and apologized.

"Major, Sir. I'm sorry, please forgive me for having talked out of turn."

"I am partly to blame, too." The Major shook hands with him then turned to Sgt. Hu, saying, "Sarge, you are my senior in terms of age and experience. I'd like to hear what you think."

As a rule, Sgt. Hu would always scratch his head before he started speaking. Unexpectedly, he withheld from this habit by saying crisply, "I've no opinion, I'm sure you won't listen to Sgt. Liu, either."

"How do you know?" asked Sgt. Chang, the lowest ranking of them all.

"I think the Major wants to dig up the bomb. He got a canvas belt which he could use to fasten the bomb in the middle; and he asked you to bring along the tool set, indicating that he's going to disassemble it."

"Dig it up?" I couldn't help crying out. I remembered so well what Sgt. Liu had just said to me: "If it does not go off, get another one that is sure to detonate and let them go off together. Otherwise, nobody would dare to touch it. If you want to dig a swimming pool at your house, you can take one and blast it. You're sure to save a lot of money."

To say nothing of its power, it could make a hole as large as a swimming pool. It might be pretty risky to blast it. Of course it would be even riskier to dig it up and roll it back here.

"What are you screaming for?" the Major snapped at me. "Idiot! I told you to get us a couple of benches, but you just scream."

"Sir. Do you still want me to get some benches?"

"You go to hell!" Sgt. Liu glared at me. "It's all over now."

"No need. But the meeting is not over yet," Sgt. Hu said. "I think I have something more to say. Sgt. Chang just said that maybe the bomb had fallen out too late for it to have revolved enough rounds for it to blast off. That is only maybe! What if only one or a half round more is needed to blow it off. Then, if you just touch it, it would be disastrous. Major, did you think about this?"

"Yes. I've thought of it," the Major answered. "I also thought this could be a test for our ordnance service and for the honor of this unit. The village must not be harmed. This bomb was supposed to destroy the enemy. I certainly do not want it to inflict damage on anything that belongs to us. I'm sure we can remove it."

Hey! Like a shot is the arm these words pulled us together. Everyone of us, including me, nodded in agreement.

"I guess all of us agree with you, Sir." Jumping up from his chair and rolling up his sleeves, Sgt. Hu said, "Stupid! Put my tool set on the truck."

Before I even moved, the Major put a hand on the set and said, "Sgt. Hu, what are you trying to do?"

"Is there any need to ask?"

"No," the Major said; "you don't need to bother with this job."

"What kind of a job do I need to bother with then?"

"Why should I assign you to this job?" the Major said, waving his right hand at the rest of us. "All these guys are much younger than you, Sergeant."

"That's why I'm worried." Sgt. Hu strode over to grab hold of the tool set, elbowing off the Major.

"Please! Sir. I've been fooling around for two years here and I don't think I have many more years to fool around with. I must take this chance. If it means death, it doesn't mean much at my age."

The Major did not let go, and seemed to be getting really upset.

"This is a tough job. Not you, Sergeant. Can't you see that your hands are trembling even when holding a couple of meat-patties?" exclaimed the Major.

Perhaps because of his concern, the Major had not stopped to think that what he had said would probably hurt the old man. It was true that Sgt. Hu had already reached a good age, but he didn't like anyone to remind him of it in such a candid way.

Sgt. Hu's face dropped, so did the corners of his mouth. He slapped his chest hard and demanded rudely, "Tell me who else except I can do this kind of a job?"

This dumbfounded the Major. True, in terms of experience, no one, including the Major, could surpass him. Sgt. Chang was like a small town doctor who could not handle serious cases; Sgt. Liu, a quack doctor who was only good with words. Seeing his advantage, Sgt. Hu pressed on:

"Tell me, which of these guys can do it?"

The Major was being pushed a little too far and pointing to his own nose, he exclaimed:

"Me!"

"You?" Surprised, Sgt. Hu grinned crookedly and coughed, spitting onto the ground. This was very insulting indeed. Maybe the spittle was already there but it certainly was the wrong time to spit it out. The Major, his hands balling up into fists, held on to his anger. Sgt. Hu, as if he didn't care a dime, went on:

"In terms of rank, you are my boss, but in terms of experience, you are far behind me. Some of the aircraft under my care are not only strange to you, but also unknown to you. In those good old days—"

"No more of your bluff, Sergeant. Gone are the good old days! When I come to your age, I'll also be bluffing others!"

Suddenly, the Major got out of hand and rudely pulled at the tool set, causing Sgt. Hu to stumble several steps forward, almost falling over. Sgt. Hu and I jumped over to catch him. The Major said, even more arrogantly, "I have studied in the States and have acquired technical know-how in this field. What I am going to do will be strictly based on technical directives and principles. Tell me, soldier, what directives and principles do you go by? I know you have handled this kind of case before and didn't cause any accident. But I think that's because you were just lucky. That's all."

Sgt. Hu tried to break away from us but we held on tightly. He was trembling all over. He was too angry to utter a word.

At that moment, I felt the Major had turned out to be a hypocrite. He had pushed an old soldier too far. And those last self-satisfied words were even more unnecessary. No matter how well educated you are there is never any need to hurt other people's pride.

I was angry for Sgt. Hu, maybe because he had often been kind to me; maybe because he came from the same town as I did. If it were somebody else who had humiliated him, I would certainly have punched him right on the nose. But, this was the Air Force where military discipline had to be observed. I could do nothing except stay put like the others and watch the Major leave for the dayroom.

*

"Hey, Stupid! Come here!"

"Yes, Sir."

Moving on the double to the quonset hut, I saw the Major standing under the eaves, carrying a small shovel. I warned myself, "Never tangle with that one! Better not to even upset him!" Sgt. Liu and Sgt. Chang strolled over to give me moral support as the Major continued with his instructions! “Get to the kitchen and bring me a bucket of salt water. Then you go to the maintenance shop and get the crane truck. You are going with me.”

“Major, Sir.” 1 said nervously, “Sgt. Liu and Sgt. Chang are now standing by.”

“I want you to go with me.”

“But …” Knowing that this was a very risky mission, I tried to pull myself together and argued with him. “I only know how to drive Sir. I know nothing about mechanics.”

“Now listen carefully,” said the Major, his face cold. “That’s an order. Do I make myself clear?”

“We are not fighting on the front line. Why should you issue an order, Sir?”

“What do you know about war? Modern war has no front lines. Do you think only the pilots in the MIGs means fighting? You are wrong. Whatever job you do is fighting against the enemy!”

I could say nothing more, merely stand there, my heart beating fast.

Throwing the small shovel onto the ground, the Major signaled me to hurry up. “What are you waiting for? Move!”

Luckily I had moved my right foot or I would have lost my toes.

To tell the truth, I was stalling, hoping something would happen. Even if the Major could be provoked into a rage, slapping me in the face, I would still be grateful. Because in that case, he would stalk off by himself and leave me behind.

“What’s the matter with you? Are you paralyzed? Or are you suffering from polio?”

“The Colonel told us to call him when we have made a decision, didn’t he?”

“You don’t have to worry about that, man.” Maybe the Major thought I was clever enough for his voice became more moderate. “I just telephoned in the day-room. Now, move!”

“Sgt. Chang,” I shouted, pretending to be concerned.

“What the hell are you calling him for?”

“I was going to ask him to bring along the tools for you, Sir.”

“No, No!” The Major cried angrily. “Get me the car. Can’t you just mind your own business? I repeat; I already have all the tools I need long before the conference was held.”

Good Heavens! What else could I do since he had already made up his mind?

Suddenly, Sgt. Liu came over and put his hands on my shoulders.

“Stupid!” Sgt. Liu’s voice was rarely so gentle: “More practice, more experience. As an old saying goes, the nation maintains the army for a thousand days, but deploys it for one day. While you are young do something glorious to remember in your old age. See what I mean?”

I nodded. Sgt. Liu continued, patting me on my shoulder.

“You are as strong as a ramrod. You know you can’t back out now. I know you wont. Lift up your chin and square your shoulders. Get a move on! You’ll be promoted to a Sergeant, no doubt. I wish you every success!”

“Huh. Promoted like hell!”

“You’ll get promoted even if you go to hell. Don’t you worry about that!”

I felt icy cold. Hopelessly, I handed my wallet over to Sgt. Liu and said, “Turn in my ID card to the personnel office. Donate the 100 dollars I have left to the Free China Relief Association for our poor countrymen on the mainland. Mail my insurance card to my parents.”

*

“Hold it!”

Stepping on the brake, I turned off the engine. Looking around, I saw many small triangular red flags, here and there. Behind the mounds and deep in the ditches were guards.

The Major, with arms akimbo, looked at the bomb as though he were enjoying the antiques and treasures at the National Palace Museum.

Bombs were nothing special to us, but never had any looked so fearful as this one. It was stuck at a 45 degree angle in the mud, with only its tail end visible. Buried under were the safety pin, blasting cap and the primer.

The Major knelt down very slowly, and as gently as though he were stroking a cat he scraped away some of the mud around the bomb; his touch more gentle and soft than a girl embroidering. Every time he reached his hands toward the bomb, I felt so tense that my lungs seemed on the point of exploding and I held my breath until he had taken his hands off again.

Suddenly, my stomach revolted, and I felt like vomiting. My eyes darkened, chills went down my spine, and I sweat all over. I held up my head, leaning back on the driver’s seat, with my eyes closed.

Some time passed, then I heard the Major’s voice.

"Hey, Stupid! Bring me the salt water!"
I did what he asked, then hid myself behind him.
"What are you hiding for?" he demanded, throwing the tools onto the ground. "Think I am as bomb-proof as a piece of steel plate?"
Lifting the water bucket, the Major slowly poured the salt water around the bomb.
"I have often seen people salting pickles, but never bombs, Sir."
"Shut up, will you? Now, get in your car."
"Yes, Sir."
I realized how crisp was my answer. I felt there was something unusual in the air, as if the nearer you got to the bomb, the thinner the air had become.
As soon as I had settled myself behind the wheel, I saw the Major coming over, with the canvas belt in his hand, his eyes flashing determinedly. He said to me slowly and carefully.
"I want you to concentrate for only three minutes without thinking of anything else nor looking at anything else. Keep your eyes wide open while I work and listen carefully to my orders. Your reaction must be very prompt. I am sure you can make it."
"What do you want me to do, Sir?"
"When I tie up the bomb in the middle with this belt, you start the engine and lower the crane. As soon as the hook catches hold of the belt, you gently lift up the hook exactly as I say. And as soon as I say okay, you stop immediately; remember, this is most important."
"Sir, in case—"
"Shut up! We have no choice We've got to make it. We can't afford to fail."
He then turned away without another word. "Now. Start the engine, boy!"
At first, my hands were trembling. I looked at the plump Major who was kneeling on the ground with so much difficulty and saw that beads of sweat on his forehead were dripping on the ground. Yes, no use of worrying, cross the bridge when you come to it. Suddenly, I relaxed.
Having fastened the belt around the bomb, the Major ordered me to lower the crane. I did so, slowly and carefully until he signaled me to stop.
"Hey, Stupid!" Holding the already fastened knot. the Major said, "Whether or not we can ask the Colonel to throw a dinner party in our honor this evening entirely depends upon you now."
I knew the Major was trying to ease my tension by joking at this point between life and death. But in fact, I had already relaxed. If he as a Major, wasn't concerned with the problem of life and death, how could I, a mere Corporal, be so chicken-hearted? So I, in order to strengthen his faith in success, answered lightly.
"Don't worry! We will surely have the good fortune of eating a good dinner."
His mustachs twitching, the Major said, "All right. Go ahead, man!"
"Okay!"
Having geared up, I operated exactly according to his signals.
"Stop."
Almost simultaneously, I shut off the power and pulled out the key.
Standing up, the Major let out a deep breath. I went over and shook hands with him, his hands and overalls were all wet. He looked at me excitedly, as if bursting with things to say. But after a pause, he only patted me on my shoulder.
"Now go back to your quarters and take a good rest!"
"Sir?" I said while taking off my coat, "Now that I have been here with you, I don't want to leave you alone."
"Armaments are not in your line, man."
"At least I can help by handing you tools and give you some moral support."
"You came here at my order, didn't you? Now you don't have to risk your life when there is no need."
"Sir—"
"Don't try to find any excuse. Now, move!"
Knowing that the Major never stood for any arguments, I could not say anything more and began to put on my coat again.
"All right, Sir. But, before I leave, I must know if there is anything else I can do for you."
"Listen to this: First, tell Sgt. Hu not to be mad at me any more."
"Yes, I'll do that."
"Second, leave your cigarettes here. Mine got wet."

Handing my cigarettes to him, I asked, "What else?"

"Third, now turn around and move immediately. When you go as far as 10 meters away, I'll tell you what to do."

I did just as he ordered and tried to find out what he was going to do next. Not until I had reached a spot 30 meters away did I hear his loud voice: "To to obtain me a free ticket for the troop-cheering movies on Sunday!"

I was between tears and laughter. I never thought he would issue such a funny order. It was indeed something for all the men of his unit to remember for the rest of their lives.

Walking to the hideout near the maintenance truck, I turned back, and saw the Major waving good-bye. My eyes stung and I felt faint. Suddenly, I was lifted up in the air. A large hand was grasping me by the collar and dragged me into the hideout. It was Sgt. Liu, saying, "Come on, get in, boy. All of us are here."

*

In the open space across the runway, on the apron, on the roof of the hangar and on the balcony of the administration building were people watching in silence, waiting to see what was going to happen. The sun was going down, but no smoke puffed up out of the kitchen chimney. On the contrary, Sgt. Hu was puffing smoke furiously, one cigarette after another.

Itching to know what was going to happen, I stuck my neck out, hoping to see something, but there was nothing to see.

"See anything?" asked Sgt. Hu.

"No. Not a thing!"

"Two arid a half hours have passed. Something must happen," said Sgt. Hu, looking at his watch.

"What are you talking about?" Sgt. Chang said angrily. "You know why we are here, we wanted to get a closer look. Do you know why we wanted you to join us here? Because we hoped you could tell us what the Major is doing. But you have not said a word. Hell!"

"Don't you know this is a weakness of us Chinese?" Sgt. Liu remarked sarcastically. "He is trying to keep his know-how to himself."

"What can I say? What the Major does is entirely based on his so-called technical know-how and directives while what I do is considered just good luck." Sgt. Hu said bitterly. "Today, I'd better not talk about my experience since somebody thinks that I don't have to try my luck."

"You are very narrow-minded," Sgt. Liu said to Sgt. Hu, pointing at Sgt. Chang and me. "None of us has offended you. You are throwing mud at the wrong target."

Maybe Sgt. Hu realized what Sgt. Liu had said was reasonable. He continued: "Stupid here has told us very clearly what he did, he used salt water and the bomb is hanging up."

"Yeah," Sgt. Chang asked. "I wonder why he poured salt water and why did he hang up the bomb? And after the bomb—"

"Simple," Sgt. Hu explained. "Salt water has the highest degree of humidity which in turn can easily dampen the blasting cap. First, he hangs up the bomb in a perpendicular position; second, he wipes away the soil around the bomb; third, he removes all the soil right below the bomb, bit by bit, until the bomb is suspended off the ground; lastly, he fixes the safety pin and takes off the blasting cap."

"But what if he slips and moves the—"

"Don't be ridiculous, son! When you hear the explosion everyone of us will be going off along with it!" Sgt. Liu interrupted me reproachfully, as if I was not supposed to say a word during serious discussions.

"Sgt. Hu, if this is the case, the further he goes the greater the danger will be, is that right?" Sgt. Chang asked seriously.

"If my judgment is correct, he is reaching the most dangerous phase now," nodded Sgt. Hu.

After listening to what Sgt. Hu had said, I could no longer contain myself. I felt that, when necessary, I must go over to tell the Major to take a break; to come on over and consult with the sergeants. I felt I must do something before it was too late. I stood up but just as I was about to creep out I heard a loud explosion, really deafening. My left foot was caught by Sgt. Liu and I fell on all fours immediately. With his large hands, Sgt. Liu dragged me back into the hide out.

For a good long while, I couldn't get up from the ground. Technically, I thought Sgt. Hu should have been assigned to that mission. It's experience that counts in the field of technology. Insolence certain1y leads to disaster. Turning to Sgt. Hu, I asked,

"Does the Major have any relatives in Taiwan?"

"What are you talking about? The sound came from the hills. Somebody is blasting rocks up there," Sgt. Liu said coldly. “Stupid!”

“So are you! Why did you drag me in when you knew it was from the hills?”

“I dragged you,” Sgt. Hu said, “but it’s Sgt. Liu who pulled you back here. I was afraid that your appearance would distract his attention and that would be disastrous.”

“I should never have come back here. If anything happens, I will never know how the Major got killed.”

“Should you have been with him, you would even know much less than now.” Taking out my wallet from his pocket, Sgt. Liu threw it at me. “Boy, you may have your insurance card back now.”

I didn’t catch the wallet because it was thrown outside the hideout.

I went out to pick up the wallet and yelled: “The Major is coming out!”

The three sergeants scrambled out as fast as they could.

The Major was waving both his hands high in the air, with a cap in his right hand and presumably a pair of pliers in his left hand.

“The blasting cap must have been removed,” Sgt. Hu asserted. “It’s a blasting cap all right, in his left hand.”

Sgt. Hu was right. As we were pretty far away, the Major was apparently indicating to us that he had removed the blasting cap by waving his hands. I was standing there thinking while Sgt. Hu, flanked by the two other sergeants, had already started walking. I dashed off at top speed to where the Major stood. As I plunged into his arms, I felt my face was icy cold with his sweat drenched fatigues. He hugged me tightly, then lifting my face with both his hands, the Major said to me.

“Don’t cry, you are a big boy now. You’re Sgt. Hu’s, favorite and it will hurt him to see you like this.”

“That’s why I am crying,” I said. “You and Sgt. Hu have been so kind to me all these years, but I just don’t know how to make up the misunderstanding between you two. He is still angry with you!”

“Don’t worry, boy.” Wiping the tears from my face with his muddy hands, he said, “Like tears, a misunderstanding can be easily wiped out. Here they are now. Try to smile a happy smile.”

People were swarming toward the end of the runway until they were halted by the guards.

The Colonel's jeep appeared at the same time as the three sergeants.

“Wonderful job! Just wonderful!” Everybody, including the Colonel, shook hands with the Major, congratulating him heartily. All except Sgt. Hu. He was walking around the pit with his hands behind his back and then went to stand between the Colonel and the Major. Shaking his head, he said:

“That’s nothing! To me, that has nothing to do with advanced technology. Even Stupid here could have made it if I had taught him.”

“Sgt. Hu, you can’t say that.” The Colonel remonstrated in a kindly voice. “This was really a risky job, wasn’t it?”

“Don’t you think I could handle a risky job too?”

“I know you are better than the rest of us. I am quite sure you could have done it!”

Apparently much flattered by this compliment, Sgt. Hu turned condescendingly to the Major, “Did you hear that, kid?”

“Yeah. I did,” the Major answered sincerely.

“Sgt. Hu, you must not misunderstand your Major,” the Colonel said sternly. “He told me on the phone about what had happened between you two. In terms of experience, I should have sent you. But, don’t you know why he intentionally said things to make you angry so that you would not handle this job?”

“Why? To show off!”

“This proves that you are wrong. You know, at first I refused to grant him permission until he had made repeated requests. He knew this was a dangerous mission with the possibility of death. He justified his request by explaining that in case he got killed, he’s all by himself, while you have five children.”

Sgt. Hu was struck dumb. His lips trembled and there was a sheen of tears in his eyes.

The Major went over to Sgt. Hu and embraced him.

“All right. Let’s call it a day. Leave everything else for tomorrow,” the Colonel said, waving his hands happily. “Everybody get in the car and go to take a shower first. Then we’ll have a nice dinner party in the officer’s club. I’ll be waiting for you there at seven thirty.”

Sgt. Chang and Sgt. Liu got into the jeep, followed by the Major, leaving the front seat for Sgt. Hu. The Colonel called out.

“Hey. Get in, Stupid!”

“Sir.” Standing at attention, I said. “The jeep can only hold five.”

The Colonel laughed.

"Today, we must treat you as a hero. You deserve special treatment."
Hardship and weariness does not matter. Man has to live with love and sympathy.

83.86 Scaffolding\fn{by Shao Chien (1934-)} Chiangsu Province, China (M) 4

Liao Cheng-jung secretly felt that there was a definite difference in the way his father and his uncle (his father's younger brother) handled their wine. After a couple of drinks, his father's face would turn as red as a cock's comb, as if he alone had gulped down all the wine on the entire table. Third Uncle, on the other hand, would look just as usual, and would become even more humorous and sharp in his remarks, as if he were ready to take on anyone and knock a few holes in them.

"Don't be a sissy," Third Uncle insisted, "you've got to finish this cup."

"I still have to work this afternoon."

"Just this one bottle won't make any difference!" Third Uncle vigorously shook the almost-empty bottle. "I'll show you a somersault up on the scaffold when we get back to the job site."

He drew in a deep breath and tightened up his belt. "Haven't gained any weight even after being a manager myself these past few years—still running up the scaffold with the crew to look around at the scenery."

"Third Uncle, I surely admire your spirit."

"Our work is rough; unlike your old man who sits in the office working on the abacus." Third Uncle stuffed another piece of squid into his mouth and continued. "Speaking of your old man, I remember his ulcer. How's he doing these days?"

"Pa quit smoking."

"The old chimney doesn't smoke anymore." Third Uncle drained his cup. "Poor thing."

"Pa wanted me to thank you for the ginseng tonic you gave him. He said it's too expensive a gift."

"It's only a small token of respect for my elder brother, since my business is going so well." Third Uncle pulled out a handkerchief from his pocket and mopped the sweat on his face. "By the way, after being with me for one month, are you getting used to the work?"

"It's all right."

"I'm afraid it's quite different from school! Nowadays, all these young people read and study day and night for the sake of examinations, until their eyes are like goldfish eyes. Good thing you haven't had to wear glasses."

"I loved sports while in school." Liao Cheng-jung laughed.

"What we need is having someone like the Monkey King in Journey to the West who can crawl and jump, courageous but careful; and above all, able to handle the scaffold as if walking on the ground."

"That's not easy!"

"Well, just remember never to look downward."

Liao Cheng-jung nodded. The first time he had climbed up the four-story scaffolding was when he followed right behind Third Uncle. The simple wooden ladder was roughly made from unplaned boards nailed together with spaces in between looking somewhat like the skeleton of a fish lying across a large plate after a meal. He didn't feel anything unusual after walking up the first two stories on the scaffolding except for a slight rocking motion as if someone were trying to play a trick on a small boat. A few more steps up and for the first time he became apprehensive about the vacillating wooden boards beneath his feet. He fearfully wondered if they had been securely nailed together. What would happen if he should, by chance, step in between the boards? The more he thought about this, the more frightened he became. Both his legs felt weak and rubbery as he moved further up, not as quick and nimble as before.

"What's the matter, Cheng-jung? Can I give you a hand?"

Hearing Third Uncle's voice from above, Liao Cheng-jung felt very embarrassed. Since he was quite an athlete himself back in school, it would really be a laughing matter if he were, to be scared by this narrow wooden ladder. With no further consideration of whether the scaffolding was strong or not, he clambered up, two or three steps at a time. It was not until he stood up at the top of the scaffolding that he stopped to catch his breath. third Uncle looked sharply at him as if he could see through him.

"The world up here is very different." Third Uncle pointed to the people and cars down on the streets. "They surely look small … and this makes us who work up here feel much more important."

Liao Cheng-jung did not say a word; looking at the people hustling and bustling down there, he suddenly felt an out-of-this-world kind of happiness.

One evening, he could not remember exactly when, his father had walked into his bedroom, made him turn off the noisy rock music he was listening to, then seriously sat down by his bed and said: “It doesn’t seem right to see you idling at home now that you’ve graduated. Of course, it doesn’t make any sense for you to get permanent employment until you’ve completed your military service. I think you might as well find a temporary job with your third uncle.”

Liao Cheng-jung was indeed quite excited over the fact that his father wanted him to go to his uncle’s to learn a few things. In his mind his father was real square like a dictionary while his uncle was active like a swing. Furthermore, he understood Third Uncle to be generous, outspoken and never hampered by the trifling bounds of etiquette. When Third Uncle was young, he had tried many jobs and had been to many places, trying to make a fortune, but his hopes never came true. Perhaps he had gotten tired of leading a gypsy life so he finally settled down doing scaffolding work. The rapid increase in population certainly had contributed to the overall building boom and scaffolding work was a necessity in the construction business. Thus Third Uncle’s business picked up so fast that he could hardly handle it and the dreams of his youth had unexpectedly come true at middle age, like bird droppings falling on his head from the air.

His father’s suggestion of working for Third Uncle was exactly what Cheng-jung had hoped for and maybe his father noticed Cheng-jung’s delighted expression. His father picked up a towel and laid it on Cheng-jung’s pillow, saying:

“One thing you must be very, very careful about: your uncle smokes too much, also drinks too much, much too unrestrained.”

“Oh!” Cheng-jung’s eyes shifted quickly to the messy quilt on his bed as he felt this was a hint at his own smoking habit. But after he left for his uncle’s, his father would not find any more cigarette butts around the house, so would stop nagging him.

As his thoughts came to this point he lifted his glass to toast Third Uncle, feeling how precious it was to be able to drink wine. He tried to imitate the way Third Uncle drank as if gulping down the whole cup. But he was not as experienced as his uncle and some of the wine dribbled out of his mouth down his chin.

Liao Cheng-jung quickly wiped it off with his hand as Third Uncle went to the cashier to pay the bill. He then removed Third Uncle’s jacket from the hanger, walked toward the pick-up parked on the street and stood there waiting. He could not hear what Third Uncle was saying, but he could see how the big-mouthed woman laughed until her neck bent over, like a turkey waiting to have its neck chopped off. People had said Third Uncle had been particularly fond of girls when he was young and he could see that this was true.

Third Uncle lighted another cigarette as he started the pick-up.

“It helps digestion to crack a joke after a meal,” he said. “Let’s go to the job site first.”

“Yesterday afternoon they had built up to about four-story high. Maybe it’s about six-story high by now.”

“If we don’t get ahead in this business, Mr. Hsu of the construction company will get after me, even cursing my ancestors,” declared Third Uncle. “By the way, how’s the crew working?”

“Working hard and full of pep.”

“There are certain things you never can tell on the surface.” Third Uncle became serious; the smile on his face was suddenly flattened as if by a steamroller. “There was some trouble about three months ago.”

“Yeah! Heard about that.”

“No matter how fast this car went, it didn’t help.”

“Death is unpredictable,” Liao Cheng-jung remarked.

“He was a good guy,” Third Uncle continued. “No matter how high he went, he could sing a song from beginning to end.”

“Any relatives?”

“Wife and kids.”

Liao Cheng-jung heaved a sigh. “He must have been your right-hand man.”

“Right arm, for sure,” added Third Uncle. “I’ve got something in the pocket of my jacket. See if it’s still there.”

Liao Cheng-jung stuck his hand into the pocket and a stack of bills fell out onto his knees. He asked with a look of surprise, “Handing out paychecks?”

“We’ll go to the job site first and then swing by Ah-fa’s house.”

Liao Cheng-jung could see clearly how much Third Uncle had been saddened by Ah-fa’s fall from the scaffolding. Ah-fa had been with Third Uncle ever since he was only fifteen years old. For the past ten years, they had worked very closely together; sometimes Ah-fa would help Third Uncle get home when he was so drunk that he could hardly tell east from west, south from north. Many people had guessed Third Uncle would pick Ah-fa to be his son-in-law; but his daughter, being a well-educated girl, had her own ideas. The possibility of this marriage had collapsed when the daughter finally married a high-school teacher, and later she herself also became a teacher.

After ten minutes or so, the pick-up arrived at the job site. From afar, one could see the high and slender scaffolding. There was also an addition of a huge movie billboard, showing a girl in a bathing suit running along the shore and the billowing white surf was so real it seemed as if it would wash away the thin scaffolding. Liao Cheng-jung got out of the pick-up, and lifted his head to admire the movie billboard, saying:

"The scaffolding has 'borne' some fruit."

"A friend of mine runs an advertising agency and was concerned about having no place for his pet project. I said: 'I'll give you a place, OK?'"

Liao Cheng-jung put on his sunglasses. He felt the sun was too strong, as if it would burn up the retina of his eyes.

"The large colorful picture surely adds some life to both the scaffolding and the building behind."

"You're right!" Third Uncle kicked a piece of wood that lay in the way.

There was a pile of sand in the field. Third Uncle grabbed a handful of sand and threw it away. The scaffolding was like a brown shell, built up one story after the other. Right in the middle of the first story there was a charcoal burner, a rice cooker, a water pot, and two old Japanese tatamis lying against the wall together with a couple of quilts. There were no handrails on the ladder. A few steel bars on top of the construction stuck out crookedly into the air.

Third Uncle carefully examined each bamboo pole used in the scaffolding; he used a short steel bar to tap the bamboo poles and the sound was clear and crisp.

"Top quality bamboos from the mountains."

"You'll be concerned to see them change color through wear and tear and the weather."

"Don't worry. They are as strong as these steel bars."

As they walked out of the empty building, they saw three people working atop of the scaffolding. Third Uncle. waved at them as he started to climb the wooden ladder.

"Third Uncle," Liao Cheng-jung called. "Someone told me you could build a two-foot high scaffold with bamboo chopsticks to let people stand on it."

"Huh."

"Is that true?"

Third Uncle turned his head to look at Liao Cheng-jung with his piercingly sharp eyes.

"You don't believe it?"

"Well, I'd have to see it with my own eyes."

"No problem."

Third Uncle lighted another cigarette and handed it to Lao Chen who was straddling on the scaffolding.

"See any dancing recently?" asked Third Uncle.

"Not much."

"Seeing too much of that sort of dancing can make one blind."

"I'm not blind."

"Watch out also for your heart," added Third Uncle. "That's far more dangerous than straddling the scaffolding."

Liao Cheng-jung almost burst out laughing. Third Uncle had a natural-born sense of humor; with just a few words he could manage to break through the wall of reserve which usually exists between people.

When they reached the top of the scaffolding, they saw both Big-head and Ah-hsiung carefully tying the connections with wiring, twisting and turning continuously for quite sometime before stopping. Liao Cheng-jung looked down from the sixth story and noticed all the people and cars on the streets appeared to be particularly tiny. He felt somewhat dizzy after a while so he quickly moved his eyes toward the scaffolding.

"Should be finished today."

"Great!" Third Uncle exclaimed enthusiastically. "Let's go celebrate tonight."

"Maybe some other time," replied Ah-hsiung. "I've got something to do tonight."

Third Uncle pondered for a while, looking toward the sky which was a soft tender blue, and said: "Come over, let's talk."

"Boss, are you giving me a raise?"

"You never know," Third Uncle replied, laughing. Ah-hsiung, holding on to the bamboo poles along the sides, walked quickly toward Third Uncle. Liao Cheng-jung could see clearly Ah-hsiung's muscles beneath his old undershirt. Third Uncle put his arm affectionately around Ah-hsiung's shoulders. It appeared to Liao Cheng-jung that Ah-hsiung was an honest and sincere fellow.

"Ah-hsiung, I'm on my way to visit Ah-fa's family." said Third Uncle.

"The boss's visit will mean a lot to them."

"Ah-fa was our fellow worker," said Third Uncle sorrowfully. "You all have brotherly feelings for each other. Have you been to see his wife, Ah-tsai, these days?"

"A few times."

"Ah-tsai is a good woman and it is our duty to take care of her."

"The children are also very lovable; one of them loves to have me hold him."

"I hope you go to see them often." Third Uncle said seriously. "Let me be straight with you and don't you get angry. The woman needs a husband, and the children need a father. If you don't feel it's too much for you, perhaps you two are meant for each other."

"But …" Ah-hsiung spoke haltingly.

"This is a new age, everyday you can see so many new buildings rising up from the ground." Third Uncle patted him on the shoulder. "Ah-hsiung, we in the scaffolding business sometimes can hardly meet the demand. I think you should also be modern in your thinking."

Ah-hsiung wanted to say something, but Third Uncle did not give him a chance, as he was pushing Liao Cheng-jung to begin descending, "Let's go to the pick-up."

He opened the car door, took out the plastic water bottle, and poured the water straight into his mouth as if he were watering flowers.

"The sun is about to set," said Third Uncle. "It's very beautiful."

"Beautiful like hell!" Third Uncle threw the bottle back on the car seat. "The scorching summer sun is about to peel off the skins of the men working on the scaffolding."

Before getting into the car, Liao Cheng-jung helped Third Uncle load up some unneeded boards and wires. He also gathered from their conversation that the crew would be moving to another job site after one day's break.

As the pick-up drove back through the streets, Third Uncle pointed out those buildings for which he had built the scaffolding. He even gave each of them a nickname such as "fatty," "bamboo-shoot," "twisted-dough fritter" etc. But as soon as the buildings were completed and beautifully finished, the scaffolding was then torn down to be used as fuel for cooking. He continued:

"Cheng-jung, do you know our scaffolding work has made quite a few contributions?"

"That I don't understand," replied Liao Cheng-jung.

"Young men and girls from the city hide themselves behind our bamboo fences to whisper love-talk. Some people finding no toilet nearby even use the place as an outhouse."

The car came to a halt at a stoplight. "Why in the world am I talking so much nonsense?" said Third Uncle.

"I don't think it's nonsense," replied Liao Cheng-jung.

"Something must be bothering me." Third Uncle scratched his head. After making a turn, the car came to a narrow old street along which were many low houses made of brick or wood. Liao Cheng-jung had been to some towns and villages in the country and had seen similar buildings. When it came to a festival day, people could easily over-crowd and burst the seams of a street like this.

Ah-tsai's house was inside a lane. Third Uncle had to park his pick-up outside the lane. He borrowed the pair of sunglasses from Liao Cheng-jung.

"Too small," he said, "but better than none." He cracked his knuckles.

When they walked into the house, Ah-tsai's oldest boy, Little Ping, came to hold Third Uncle's hand and called him, "Grandpa." Third Uncle quickly held the boy in his arms. Ah-tsai heard voices and came running from the kitchen. Liao Cheng-jung could see that Third Uncle knew this family very well.

"Who is it?"

"It's me," replied Third Uncle. "And this is my nephew, Cheng-jung."

"Have a seat," said the woman in a flurry. On the old sofa was a pile of children's clothes, but Third Uncle sat right straight on it. Maybe he didn't even notice what was on the sofa since he was still wearing the sunglasses.

"How are you doing, Ah-tsai?" He asked affably.

"Just missing one person," said the woman, "and fewer clothes to wash."

Third Uncle was toying with the frame of the sunglasses.

"Ah-fa and I had some great days together. We built a large altar for the Buddhist festival in Hsinchu City. For more than a month, some seventy to eighty thousand people walked over that altar and it still held up well."

"He mentioned that to me before." Her voice was becoming hoarse.
Third Uncle brought out the money from his jacket.
"Here is $30,000. Please take it."
"I already took some last time."
"Never mind. Come to me again if you have any difficulties." Third Uncle stood up. "By the way, has Ah-hsiung been here yet?"
The woman nodded and smoothed out her faded dress.
"He is a good fellow," Third Uncle began to walk toward the door as he continued, "diligent and works hard to advance himself, but he is no match to Ah-fa in drinking."
Liao Cheng-jung lowered his head as he walked out of the house. Third Uncle never had much book learning, but he sure admired him. The sun was paling fast and Third Uncle returned his sunglasses. Holding them, Liao Cheng-jung noticed they were moist.

151.20 Excerpt from The Corner Forsake By Love\fn{by Zhang Xian (1934-)} Shanghai, China (M) 4

Even though it was the last year of the seventies in the twentieth century, love—in the eyes of the young people of Tiantang Commune—was a strange and mysterious word, embarrassing to mention. That was why, when the new Youth League secretary pronounced the word during a meeting in the commune hall to oppose the "buying and selling of marriages," the entire audience was startled. The young fellows winked mischievously at each other and broke into loud laughter, while the girls, hastily lowering their heads, blushed, giggled, and exchanged bashful glances.
But the delicate young woman, Shen Huangmei, sitting in the corner by the window—the party Youth League group leader of the Ninth Team, Tiantang Brigade—did not smile. Her face was pale. Her large, melancholy eyes gazed aimlessly out the window. She acted as if she heard nothing, as if nothing concerned her. Suddenly, however, her eyelashes quivered, exerting themselves to shake off the crystal-like things that wet them. "Love"—the word she could not understand—was at that moment strongly stirring the heart of this nineteen-year-old girl. She felt humiliated, sad, inexplicably fearful. She thought of her elder sister Cunni, whom she missed terribly, yet would always blame. Ah, if only there had been no Xiao Baozi; if that incident hadn't happened, everything would have been fine! Her sister would have sat beside her, laughing heartily like a boy. After the meeting, her sister would have pulled her along with her strong arms, and together they would have picked out two bundles of orange thread in the commune cooperative and returned home to embroider their pillows. . . .
Of the five sisters, Cunni was the most fortunate. She had come into the world immediately after the bumper harvest of 1955. When she was a month old, her family could easily afford a banquet table.\fn{In China, when a child is one month old, parents who can aford to throw a banquet, the size of which is measured by the number of tables of guests. Very few farmers are able to afford even one table. The fact that this banquet was given for a girl baby shows that her father is very progressive. } The young father, Shen Shanwang, held up the precious little bundle wrapped in a patterned quilt and said in high spirits:
"I took Linghua to the midwives' station and then went off for a moment to deposit some money in the credit cooperative. When I came back, the baby had been born! Nobody could believe that the delivery had been so smooth the first time! Some said that we should name her Shunni.\fn{Smooth Girl.} I thought, 'For poor farmers like us, it was a miracle that we had money to deposit in a bank!' Having had her at this time, we thought we should call her Cunni.\fn{Deposit Girl.} Wait till she grows up; we'll have even better days!"
The happiness that flowed from his heart was infectious; it spread to everyone who came to congratulate the new parents. At the time, he was the deputy leader of Kaoshanzhuang Cooperative.\fn{Literally: "The Cooperative at the side of the Mountain."} Optimistic, competent, he radiated courage and strength. The pear trees he had grafted in the orchard over the hill had produced a bumper harvest the first year they bore fruit. And, as for wheat and corn, they had more than enough, even after taxes. In the little village of twenty-odd households, everyone was as happy as he. Just like him, they confidently looked forward to a bright future.
When Huangmei was born five years later, conditions were very different. Kaoshanzhuang Cooperative had been incorporated into Tiantang Commune as the Ninth Team of Tiantang Brigade. The fine name Tiantang\fn{Paradise.} had been given to the brigade personally by the party secretary at the county level, who had reasoned, "Communism is paradise, and the people's commune is the bridge."

At the time, all the commune members, including team leader Shen Shanwang, firmly believed that paradise was only a few feet away. All they had to do was wholeheartedly cut down all the collectively owned pear trees together with all the gingko nut and chestnut trees around the houses,\fn{The nut tees around the houses would have been privately owned.} and with the greatest haste deliver the wood to the backyard furnace operated by the commune—\fn{This refers to the attempt to make steel in backyard furnaces during the Great Leap Forward, the campaign begun by Mao in 1958 to catapult China into communism and the position of a major industrial power. Central features of this campaign were the formation of people's communes from agricultural cooperatives that had been established in the early years of the Republic and an emphasis on economic development through "self-reliance" as well as greater collectivization. During the Great Leap Forward, communes were told to produce steel in backyard furnaces, and massive construction and land reclamation projects requiring the labor of vast numbers of peasants were undertaken. For a variety of reasons—among them severe droughts and poor central planning based on inflated reports by local officials—the program was not a success. Today the official view of the Great Leap Forward is that it was overly ambitious.} as if, as soon as that marvelous puffing stove ejected bright, beautiful flowers of steel, they would easily stroll across the "bridge" and enter communism.

But aside from a pile of iron that occupied cultivated fields and turned tons of trees into ashes, there was no other effect. Moreover, due to a drought, they couldn't even collect seedlings for the wheat and corn.

The taro roots that replaced the pear trees were as thin as the tips of Cunni's fingers. When Linghua, who was big with child, returned after begging for food at a nearby village, Shen Shanwang had already been dismissed from his post because he had "attacked the great effort to process steel." When his second daughter was born—a weak little baby—Shen Shan wang gazed at her with a bitter smile on his swollen face and sighed,

"Who told her to arrive in this lean year? What a Huangmeizi!"\fn{Lean Little Sister.}

Perhaps because her mother had been well-nourished when she was born and nursed, Cunni grew and thrived. She could grow just by eating leaves, and generate energy just by drinking cold water! Before her sixteenth birthday, she had already developed into a healthy, robust young woman. With a wooden pole,\fn{For carrying baskets of things, or lumber.} she replaced her sickly mother who had given birth to three more sisters, and helped her father shoulder the responsibility of the family. In the most strenuous activity of the year—carrying lumber down the mountain to the state lumber farm—she ranked third highest in work points among the women workers. She left for the fields before dawn, and returned under the starlit sky. After gulping down a large bowl of taro or corn meal, she would fall off to sleep without a thought. Even when, at the annual distribution of income, the figure for the family's overspending was greater than ever and they could not get a cent of cash, she was still just as optimistic as ever, not knowing what worry was. On the spur of the moment, she would put her arm around Huangmei, pressing her full breast tightly against her sister's frail body and lightly hum an old folk song that had been popular in her mother's day.

There are often strange things in life that happen only once in a great while and yet have obvious origins. They take people by surprise, yet they are not really anything extraordinary. Take deformities, for example. Whatever strange forms they take, there is always a physiological reason for them. People are surprised by them just because their occurrence is so rare. What happened between Cunni and Xiao Biaozi was just that.

Xiao Baozi was the only son of Uncle Jiagui at the east end of the village. His real name was Xiao Bao, and he was the same age as Cunni. This strong young man worked with fearful energy. One time, when he was carrying lumber, a cold rain began. Aunt Jiagui slipped and fell in front of him and broke her pole. Xiao Bao helped his mother to her feet. Then he tied the two piles of wood together over his bare shoulder, and—gritting his teeth and panting and puffing—carried the wood all the way down the mountain. The wood weighed in at three hundred and five catties. People were amazed. They said, "That Xiao Bao is really something—just like a little leopard!" So that is how Xiao Baozi\fn{Little Leopard.} became his nickname.

In the early spring of 1974, the team cadres went off to the commune early one morning to criticize Confucius\fn{This took place during the height of the anti-Lin Piao, anti-Confucius campaign.} while the strong labor power\fn{I.e., all strong, able-bodied adults.} went to work at the reservoir. Caretaker Grandpa Xianger kept Cunni behind to help him put the storage room in order. The old man directed the young woman's work, nagging and complaining all the while.

"The cadres come around once and point their fingers: 'There!' We busy ourselves the whole year cutting through mountains and chipping away at rocks and then a flash flood comes along and whoosh! Everything is washed away! Next year, the cadres come again and point their fingers: 'There!' They have no regard for the harmony of wind, water, and earth."

"Isn't that like 'the foolish old man who moved the mountain?'"\fn{A story that was often quoted by Mao to illustrate that with the right motivation and effort, anything can be accomplished.} Cunni asked, disinterestedly continuing the conversation.

"As if moving a mountain will fill bellies! … Come, first sieve this pile—slowly—don't spill it! … Look at this corn grown over the roots of the pear. It is so lean, who knows whether it will sprout?" The old man complained about the corn seedlings.

"Isn't that 'taking grain as the basis?'"\fn{A Party line, meaning that self-sufficiency in grain should be given priority.} the young woman answered, still distracted. Her heart wandered. Though putting the storage room in order was light work, it was a great deal more fun to carry soil with the young men at the reservoir.

At that moment, a sturdy figure appeared in front of the storage room.

"Let me do some work, Grandpa Xianger."

"Xiao Baozi!" Cunni cried out happily. "Didn't you sprain your leg carrying stones yesterday?"

Grandpa Xianger said, "Go back home and rest!"

"I can't stand lying around," Xiao Baozi smiled earnestly. "So long as I don't carry heavy loads, a little light work won't hurt!" While he spoke, he picked up the winnowing spade to help Cunni with the sieving.

Grandpa Xi anger happily squatted on the side and smoked a cigarette. Then, remembering that he needed to ask the carpenter to come and repair the plow, he gave a few orders and left. Activities like cleaning out the storage room and sieving seedlings were really no tasks at all in the hands of two such quick and diligent nineteen-year-olds. In a very short while, the seedlings had been packed, and the taro spread out to dry. Xiao Baozi said,

"Let's rest awhile!"

He spread his cotton jacket out on top of a full sack, and lay down on top of it. Cunni wiped her sweat and sat down on a sack facing him. She had taken off her cotton jacket a long time ago, and was wearing a dark green sweater that had been part of her mother's dowry. Though it had been taken apart and washed many times and patched with several different colors of yarn, and though it was getting too short and too tight for her body, in the eyes of the young women in the Ninth Team, the sweater was still an enviable luxury.

Xiao Baozi stared at her healthy face reddened by the sun; he stared at her full bosom. A strange, itching feeling that he had never experienced before arose in his heart. It excited him, but made him apprehensive. So, distractedly, he tried to make conversation.

"The day before yesterday Wuzhuang showed a movie. Didn't you go?"

"Of course I didn't go. It was too far away!" Trying to avoid his burning stare, she lowered her head and began pulling at the loose ends on her sweater sleeves.

Wuzhuang is a brigade in Linxian County. To get there, you have to go over two big hills. Even young fellows like Xiao Baozi had to walk more than an hour to reach it. It was not regarded as a rich team; the value of ten work points the previous year had been only thirty-eight fen. But this was enough for the members of Tiantang Commune to cluck their tongues in envy.

What attracted the young men most was the train station thirty kilometers west of Wuzhuang. Last spring festival, Xiao Baozi had gotten together with a few fellow workers to go there to see the train. The round trip had taken half a day, and they had waited at the station for two hours. When they had finally seen the dark green passenger train zoom past the station, they were satisfied. Members of the Ninth Team rarely had such an opportunity. As to actually boarding the train, only the commune accountant, "Xu the Blind,"\fn{A nickname; he wasn't really blind.} would have had that enviable experience.

"I didn't want to go anyway," said Cunni. "Tunnel Warfare, Mine Warfare, The Battle from North to South—I've seen them eight hundred times! I can recite every word in the scripts …"

Xiao Baozi stretched and sighed, "If you don't go, what else is there to do? The playing cards are already in shreds. I tried asking a friend to go through the back door at the commune supply cooperative, but he still hasn't been able to get more."

Apart from going to the movies and playing cards, the young people had nothing to do after work. The team subscribed to a provincial paper, but it only came into service when Xu the Blind held a meeting.\fn{Because most of the team members were illiterate.} And even he would always mispronounce "Confucius says" as "Confucius days." Of course, nobody would correct the only intellectual in the team. In the past, it had been popular to sing folk songs about love, but now these were considered "immoral" and forbidden.

Suddenly, Xiao Baozi excitedly sat up.

"Hey, Xu the Blind says that in foreign movies he has seen … Huh! That was really something!" He clucked his tongue and snickered. "There are …"

"What?" Cunni could not help asking, seeing the amused look on his face.

"Hee, hee, hee … I can't say it." Blushing, Xiao Baozi kept laughing to himself.

"What is it? Come on!"

"Okay, I'll tell, but don't you scold me!"

"Come on! Say it!"

"There are—" He stifled his laughter until he was doubled over. Cunni already anticipated the terrible thing he was going to tell. She picked up a clod of soil. Sure enough, Xiao Baozi gathered up his courage and proclaimed:

"There are men and women hugging and kissing! Hee, hee, hee …"

"Yich, disgusting!" Cunni blushed and quickly threw the clod of soil at him.

"It's true! Xu the Blind said so himself!" Xiao Baozi dodged the attack.

"Shameless!" Another clod of soil. The earth, mixed with particles of corn, fell on his shoulders and down his neck. He retaliated. A handful of soil dropped down Cunni;s open collar. The young woman pretended she was cross.

"Damn you!"

Xiao Baozi smiled, embarrassed. He took off his shirt and wiped his muscular chest with it. Cunni stiffened her mouth to show her an- noyance, and began to take off her sweater, intending to shake off the particles of soil sticking to her chest …

That instant, Xiao Baozi froze as if electrified. He stared blankly, his breath stopped, and a gush of warm blood rushed to his head. It was because when the young woman took off her sweater, her shirt was pulled up, exposing half of a pale, full, and bouncing breast.

Like a leopard springing from its cave, Xiao Baozi leaped forward. He embraced her tightly as if he had completely lost his senses. Startled, the young woman tried to lift her arm to block him. But when his burning, quivering lips touched her own moist lips, she was overcome with a mysterious dizziness. Her eyes closed and her outstretched arms were paralyzed. All her intentions to resist disappeared instantly. A kind of primitive reflex burned like a fierce flame in the blood of this pair of materially poor, spiritually barren, but physically robust young people. Traditional morality, rational dignity, the danger of breaking the law, the shame in a young woman's heart—all of these, everything, in a moment were burnt to ashes. …

119.76 1. The Fox Fairy's Wedding 2. To Be The Best 3. The Foxes 4. The Pear Tree 5. Whiskers And Bright Eyes 6. The Fisher's Tale 7. The Night Singer 8. M'lady 9. The Butterfly: Nine Folktales\fn{by Michael David Kwan (1934-2001)} Peking, China (M) 43

1

In the center of the town where I grew up, there used to be a deserted mansion. The place had been abandoned so many years ago that no one remembers the people who once lived there. By day curious passersby would sometimes peep through the cracks of the moldy wooden gate, but nobody ventured near after dark, for the house was said to be inhabited by Fox Fairies.

Magistrate Yinn, who became quite famous as the arbiter of right and wrong in the Emperor's court, came from the same town. We attended the Academy together, and a merry bunch we were, spending more time in taverns than at our books.

I remember it was a month or two before the Imperial Examinations. A group of us gathered at a tavern near the abandoned mansion to calm our pre-examination jitters. Yinn was in high spirits. He was one of those irritating people who excels without any apparent effort. I was quite the opposite and frankly jealous of his confidence. As the afternoon faded into dusk, those who had to make their way home past the haunted mansion were anxious to leave, for Fox Faeries might be abroad.

"Fox Fairies!" scoffed Yinn, rolling his eyes eloquently. "What rubbish! And coming from educated, sophisticated young men!"

That remark caused a great hubbub.

"There are Fox Fairies!" I cried before I could stop myself

"What is a Fox Fairy?" Yinn rounded on me with laughter in his eyes. I summoned up all the old wives' tales I'd ever heard.

“Why, they are very old foxes—”

“How old?” Yinn was already the stickler for detail that would make his name in later life.

“Hundreds of years old—” I countered.

“How can a fox live that long?” mused Yinn.

“By living in harmony with its environment,” I said trying not to sound lame. Though the others were silent I sensed their amusement at my discomfiture. Yinn called for another jar of wine. When it arrived he filled our cups before returning to the debate on Fox Fairies.

“If I live in harmony with my environment,” said Yinn with a gesture that encompassed the room, “I would be a fairy too. In the pickled state one becomes larger than life, therefore, supernatural!”

The others crowed with laughter.

“It’s not that simple,” I plunged on. “The ancient fox acquires wisdom and the gods permit it to take on human form between dusk and daybreak—”

“But to what purpose?” Yinn pursued straight-faced.

“It’s a test to see if the fox is worthy of evolving into a human—”

“Something like the Imperial Examinations!” someone gibed.

Everybody laughed.

“Fox Fairies bewitch people,” I cried, hot under the collar, “and they become creatures of the night too!”

Yinn laughed in my face.

“Since you don’t believe there are Fox Fairies,” I shouted, “spend the night in the haunted mansion and I will buy you a feast like you’ve never tasted before.”

It was a mean-spirited wager, for we all knew Yinn was poor and struggled to keep up with the rest of us. Yinn looked at the gloating faces around him. Those who had been laughing with him a moment earlier had switched sides. He deliberately downed another cup of wine, wiped his mouth on his sleeve, and replied,

“I accept.”

The group grew somber. Another crock of wine helped calm our quiverings.

*

It was completely dark when Yinn threw his cloak around his shoulders and swaggered in the direction of the haunted mansion. The rest of us followed at a safe distance to make sure he went in. When we saw him climb over the wall, we retreated to the tavern to wait for dawn.

I shall do my best to tell the story as I heard it from Yinn years ago. A sliver of moon filled the garden with strange shadows. Small unseen creatures scurried among the underbrush. Ghostly brambles plucked at him out of the dark as Yinn picked his way toward the mansion along a cobbled footpath slick with moss. The door gave with a shriek of rusty hinges, rousing a swarm of bats that flapped noisily about him for an instant. Then there was silence so thick you could cut it with a knife. The mansion was festooned with cobwebs and reeked with decay.

Yinn groped his way up a rickety staircase to a terrace overlooking the garden that had gone to seed. He found a spot that was clear of debris, wrapped himself in his cloak, and with a brick for a pillow, settled down for the night. Although he was determined to stay awake, the wine he had imbibed began to work on him. Lulled by the wind murmurs in the trees, Yinn soon fell asleep.

Hours later Yinn was wakened by the barking of foxes. One at first, answered by many others from far and near. Then he heard the sound of movement hurrying toward the house. In a moment footsteps not unlike his own sounded in the rooms below. Laughter and voices filtered up the staircase, though he could not catch the words. Yinn broke into a cold sweat. At that moment he wished he hadn’t accepted the wager to spend the night in this wretched house. For that matter, he wished he was anywhere but where he was.

Footsteps were coming up the stairs. Yinn huddled deeper into the folds of his cloak. Through slitted eyes he watched the top of the stairs. A young man dressed like a servant appeared, holding high a lamp, turning it this way and that peering into the gloom. Yinn caught a glimpse of a narrow, sharp-featured face crowned with sleek black hair done in a knot at the top of the head. The long, slanted eyes glowed yellow in the lamplight. The nostrils flared as he sniffed the air. The lips pulled back revealing sharp white teeth and the curiously pointed ears convinced Yinn this was no ordinary being. An old man with an imposing mane of silver white hair and a long flowing beard followed.

“What seems to be the matter, Steward?” the old man inquired in a cultivated voice. The servant raised his lamp and surveyed the terrace one more time.

“There!” he hissed pointing in Yinn’s direction.

The old man peered after him.

"It's only a human," he said equably. "Hold the lamp closer so I can see him more clearly."

The Steward approached gingerly and raised the lamp so that the light fell upon Yinn's face. The old man studied it, brows furrowed in thought. The old man had the gentle air of a scholar about him. Whereas his Steward had a cunning, almost mean look.

"Let me get rid of him, Master!" the Steward hissed.

"The human will not harm us," the old man replied in the same gentle tone. "Let us get on with our business."

The Steward started to protest, but the old man motioned him to be silent.

"Our guests will be arriving soon and there is work to do," he reminded the Steward. Seeing the other's crestfallen look, he relented a little.

"Have one of the pageboys watch him, but he mustn't be disturbed," he said. "I'm to be notified the moment he wakens."

Yinn screwed his eyes tight shut. His body ached in every muscle, but he gritted his teeth and forced himself to be still, convinced as long as the Fox Fairies believed he was asleep he would be safe.

The air was suddenly filled with the barking of foxes. Hundreds of them seemed to be converging upon the mansion. As suddenly as it started, the barking stopped. In a moment footsteps were scurrying past him mingled with the murmur of conversation and laughter. Music sounded somewhere in the house. Finally, the tantalizing aroma of food overcame fear.

Yinn opened his eyes.

He found himself on a terrace of gleaming white marble. Splendid red lacquered pillars supported a finely carved ceiling, under a roof of pale green tiles that glowed in the moonlight. In the garden, wonderfully gnarled pines leaned darkly over beds of moss. Red and white carp swam lazily in the pond. Night-blooming flowers scented the air.

This must be the way it used to be, thought Yinn. He was so engrossed that he did not notice the pageboy ordered to watch him, running off to report his waking.

A voice beside him startled Yinn out of his reverie. After introducing himself as Master Hu—a surname that has the same sound as the word for "fox"—the old man, wreathed in smiles, added,

"Kind sir, you must join my guests. It is my daughter's wedding, and a mortal among us on such an occasion is a good omen."

Yinn glanced through the open doors of the great hall, at the brocades, silks, and jewels of the guests assembled within.

"I couldn't," he stammered, more self-conscious of his disheveled appearance than afraid.

The old man seemed to read his mind, for he would not be put off. An elegant lady, slightly younger than the old man, emerged from the hall as they spoke.

"Here is my wife," said the old man by way of introduction. "Perhaps she can persuade you to join us."

The lady beamed. Her fathomless black eyes seemed to reach into his soul, and Yinn's resistance melted. She took his arm and drew him gently to the high table set at the far end of the great hall.

"You shall sit in the place of honor," she insisted.

The table was set with the finest porcelains and ivory, and spread with a dazzling array of food. Yinn thought of the fox's usual diet and shuddered. However, his hostess pressed such delicate tidbits upon him that he soon forgot his qualms. Once he was used to them, Yinn decided he had never been in better company. His fellow guests were not only elegantly turned out but highly intelligent. Indeed, their witty and wide-ranging conversation was worthy of the most fashionable salons in the town. Furthermore, he was accepted as an equal. Yinn forgot his companions were creatures of the night and began to enjoy himself.

A fanfare sounded outside. The guests rose as a body, craning their necks at the door. The old man beamed with pleasure as a handsome youth came striding across the room with all the assurance and grace of a young fox. After they had exchanged salutations, the old man drew the bridegroom to the seat beside Yinn.

"Come, my boy," he said. "Entertain our guest of honor, till the bride arrives."

More food and wine was served. All the niceties of a wedding feast were observed. Presently, the old man leaned toward his wife and in a whisper loud enough to be overheard inquired,

"Is it not time?"

"It is, my Lord," she twinkled and, turning, whispered instructions to her maid. As the servant left the room, laughter stopped and conversations broke off in mid-sentence. A hush of anticipation fell upon the room.

"What's happening?" inquired Yinn. The bridegroom had risen to his feet, flushed and eager.

"My bride is coming," he breathed.

The door to an adjoining room was flung wide. She was small, delicately formed, robed in red silk that enveloped her like a sheath of flame when she moved. The bridegroom bounded across the room to take her hand. A wave of applause swept the hall as the handsome young couple made their way slowly among their well-wishers, exchanging pleasantries. Yinn's heart hammered painfully against his ribs for she was the most exquisite maiden he had ever seen. Indeed, she was his ideal of feminine beauty and grace come to life. He couldn't keep his eyes off her. He almost swooned with joy when she came to sit beside him. He seemed to drown in her eyes, to be privy to her thoughts. The rest of the room faded away. Nothing existed for Yinn except this beautiful young girl. He was only vaguely aware of the old man ordering the Steward to fetch the gold goblets for a toast.

The Bride filled the goblets from a matching beaker.

"This is a very special wine," she said, offering Yinn the first goblet.

"Saved many years for just such an occasion," added her father.

It was a heady, full-bodied vintage with a subtle bouquet that coiled warmly through him. The joy of the new couple filled him with a nameless longing. The room took on the haze of a dream that he wanted to go on and on. With a pang he realized that the bride and groom were leaving and his ideal of beauty and grace would be lost forever. He downed the last of the wine. The goblet that she had handed him was the only tangible evidence of this night. He resolved to keep it as a remembrance of the exquisite girl who had captured his heart.

The other guests were taking their leave. As his host and hostess busied themselves seeing them out, Yinn slumped across the table pretending to be overcome by drink, but stealthily tucking the goblet into the voluminous sleeve of his robe.

The hall was soon empty except for the old couple and the Steward directing the servants cleaning up.

"Everything we borrowed must be returned to their proper owners," the old man reminded his Steward as he sank into a chair at the far end of the room to talk quietly with his spouse.

"My Lord, our guest of honor has fallen asleep!" Yinn heard his hostess remark to her husband.

"It's just as well," murmured the old man with an almost perceptible note of regret in his voice. "If he remembers anything of this night, I hope it will be as a pleasant dream—"

A heated exchange between the Steward and one of the servants cut him short.

"Is something wrong?" asked the old man.

"One of the gold goblets is missing!" cried the servant. The old man rose to his feet.

"That's impossible," he said to the Steward. "It must have been misplaced. Look again."

"We've searched the house—" countered the Steward. "Search again."

"But it's almost daybreak!" cried the Steward.

"Then waste no time!" The old man's tone brooked no argument.

The servants scattered through the house. Yinn remained slumped across the table, forcing himself to breathe evenly, watching the others from behind his eyelashes. In the distance a cock crowed. The old man tilted his head toward the sound. Otherwise, he showed no signs of agitation. His wife traced a fingertip across her cheek, and moistened her lips nervously with the tip of her tongue. The old man laid a comforting hand on her shoulder.

"Don't worry. They'll find it."

But they did not.

The cock crowed again.

The servants clustered fearfully at the door of the room, gibbering at one another.

The Steward's eyes narrowed as they settled on Yinn.

"Master, the human must have taken it!" he cried. His voice had become guttural, and he seemed to have difficulty forming words. "Let me search him."

"No!" The timbre of the old man's voice had also changed. "The human must not be disturbed!"

The Steward's nostrils quivered impatiently.

"Master, I … smell it … on him," he insisted.

"Perhaps he is right," the old man's wife murmured through the handkerchief she held to her face. "You mustn't hesitate, my Lord! It grows light!"

The cock crowed again.

"Please, Master! Before … it's … too … late," growled the Steward. His features were slowly reverting to those of a fox. The old man looked at Yinn long and hard.

"My friend wouldn't steal," he asserted.

"He's not your friend," wailed his wife, "he's a human and humans are greedy!"

Doubt clouded the old man's face. Twice Yinn felt the old man standing over him, as if about to wake him, and then, sighing deeply, moved away.

"The goblet is lost," he sighed, "but only for a while. It will be returned to its rightful owner when the time comes."

Outside the sky was turning light. One by one the servants, the Steward, and even their mistress were turning into foxes. As the first streaks of sunlight touched the mansion, the old man's features melted into that of a gray fox that disappeared down the stairs.

Yinn kept still a moment longer. When he was sure he was alone he picked himself up. The great hall was heaped with rubble where the roof had caved in. The terrace was littered with broken tiles and the garden choked with weeds. Not a trace of the glittering festivities of the night before remained.

That was Yinn's story when he joined us at the tavern.

"Fox Fairy's wedding, indeed!" I sneered, out of sorts, after a wretched night worrying while Yinn was having the time of his life. I was not a gracious loser. "Let's see the goblet."

From the folds of his cloak Yinn produced a small gold goblet, the likes of which I had never seen before or since. When I finally found my tongue, I croaked rather lamely,

"It's the most beautiful goblet I've ever seen."

A profound change came over Yinn after that escapade. He submerged himself in his studies. He shunned company, preferring solitude. Now and then he would go to the haunted mansion, and gaze at it, lost in thought. It was bandied about that Yinn was bewitched. Nevertheless, he took top honors in the Imperial Examination, just as he said he would. Soon afterwards he was appointed magistrate of Fei and left our town. I failed the examination, went into the family business, and stayed.

*

Two decades would pass before I crossed paths with Yinn again. Meanwhile, he became a famous judge in the law courts. Though I followed his career with interest we did not correspond. Therefore, a note announcing his return to our town, and inviting me to dinner at our old haunt, both surprised and delighted me.

The tavern we knew in our youth had become a fashionable restaurant, and Yinn had reserved its finest private room. I was astonished by his appearance. Whereas I had grown fat and gray, Yinn seemed hardly a day older than when we last met. We passed a pleasant evening reminiscing on the old days. Inevitably the conversation turned to the night he spent in the haunted mansion.

"Do you remember that beautiful goblet?" he asked.

"How can I forget?" I chided. "It cost me a feast."

"It has gone back to its rightful owner," Yinn smiled mysteriously, "just as the Fox Faery said it would …"

Shortly after he had arrived at Fei, a merchant named Chu invited Yinn to a banquet celebrating the birth of a daughter. At the end of the feast, Chu bade his servant bring out a set of gold goblets for a toast. When the servant appeared with the goblets and one was missing, Chu flew into a rage.

"I've been robbed!" he cried. "These are heirlooms that have been in the family for generations!" And rounding upon his hapless servant, threatened him with a sound flogging unless he produced the missing goblet at once. Hearing the commotion, Yinn offered to mediate. When he had both sides of the story, he asked to examine one of the goblets.

"I think I may be able to help," he said. He took paper and brush and wrote a note.

"Take this to my house and bring what my steward gives you."

The servant flew to the magistrate's house and a short while later returned with a brocaded box. Yinn presented it to Chu. To his amazement, the box contained a goblet that exactly matched the others.

"Which brings me to the reason for returning to this town," Yinn added at the end of his recital. "I recently married and plan to buy a certain house and live here."

There was a peculiar twinkle in his eyes as he gazed out the window at the mansion looming darkly down the street.

"Surely … not … that place," I shuddered.

"No other," smiled Yinn. "I've waited a long time."

I couldn't be sure whether he meant he had waited a long time to marry or to buy the house. Yinn pressed a finger to his lips, and then, very deliberately, he winked.

We promised to keep in touch, as people do, but never did. There was talk not long afterward that a stranger had bought the mansion and was actually living in it. However, nothing was done to make it livable, nor was anyone ever seen going in or out. Brave souls who passed it at night claim to have seen lights and heard music and laughter from within. I was curious but never got up the courage to investigate.

During a thunderstorm, one summer's night, the old mansion was struck by lightning and burned to the ground.

I never saw Yinn again.

2

Lao Mu wrestled a bare living from the same few acres of mean earth as his father before him. He was only thirty but seemed older. Too poor to find a wife, he lived alone, with only an old ox for company. Lao Mu grew taciturn, shy, and unsociable. But his love of the earth and his affinity to the wild creatures of the fields, the woods, and the sky sustained him.

Every autumn hunting parties went through the woods that bordered the land he worked, leaving maimed creatures to die in the underbrush in their wake. Lao Mu was cutting down corn stalks one afternoon when a fox streaked out of the woods and disappeared in the direction of his cottage.

"Did you see a fox?" shouted one of the beaters who came pounding after it, ahead of the hunters.

Lao Mu glanced dully at him and went back to what he was doing.

"I say, did you see a fox?" the man roared.

Lao Mu pointed in the opposite direction to where the fox had gone.

"It went that way," shouted the beater, pointing in the direction Lao Mu indicated, as his master joined them.

"Then let's be off before it gets away!" the hunter, who was Lao Mu's landlord, said in a high, affected voice.

Lao Mu watched the hunting party out of the corner of his eye till they were out of sight before sauntering home. A rude fence made of odd bits of wood and sorghum stalks surrounded his cottage. At one side was a lean-to where he kept the ox. Beside it was a haystack, which used to be as neat as a pin. Something had dug a hole in it, causing it to tip forward at a drunken angle. Lao Mu squatted down and peered into the opening partially hidden by whisps of straw. Just as he expected, a large fox was hiding there. Its glossy chestnut-colored coat and muzzle, streaked with gray, indicated it was probably quite old. Its right paw was bleeding.

"You'll be safe here, fox," Lao Mu murmured.

The fox lifted its snout and gave its tail a flick as though it understood.

Lao Mu broke up a wuowuoto (a cone-shaped bun made of corn meal) and placed it by the opening in the haystack, together with a dish of water. He didn't know what else he could give the poor creature except what he ate himself

Next morning Lao Mu found a nice fresh cabbage and two oranges on his doorstep. Someone had put them there during the night, for they were wet with dew. He was especially delighted with the oranges, for they did not grow in the north.

In the following days, Lao Mu shared whatever food he had with the injured fox, and mysterious gifts of fruit and vegetables appeared on his doorstep. Sometimes, when he came in at dusk, he found the cottage had been swept. Unseen hands had also lit a fire in the hearth and set a kettle of tea to brew over it. These occurrences did not perturb Lao Mu. He was a simple man who believed one's good or evil deed comes back in an unbroken cycle. He attributed the gifts to the fugitive hiding in his haystack, for he believed foxes could work miracles. He thanked the fox for each gift, and its greenish eyes seemed to respond with pleasure. Thus a friendship began between man and beast.

The fox gradually recovered. One morning when Lao Mu went to the haystack, it was gone. That day Lao Mu went to work with a heavy heart. He had gotten used to the wild creature. He missed talking to it, telling it things he wouldn't dream of revealing to another soul. For under his dull, placid exterior Lao Mu seethed with dreams and aspirations. Though the conversation was one-sided, he sensed the fox understood. Before the fox came into his life, he used to talk to the ox, but the self-absorbed ox had different sensibilities. It was not the same, and Lao Mu felt terribly alone.

Lao Mu spent the day burning corn stalks and returning the ashes to the earth. At dusk he was eager to head home, for he was famished. As he came onto the footpath leading to his cottage, he almost collided with a gentleman dressed in a rich, brown robe topped by a short, gray mantle. The gentleman nodded and smiled.

"Are you lost, sir?" Lao Mu muttered ducking his head.

"Why, no," the other chuckled. "I'm on my way home."

"I've never seen your lordship hereabouts before," stammered Lao Mu.

"I'm not a lordship," the gentleman corrected him with a twinkle. "Call me Mister Huli."

Lao Mu stole a glance at the gentleman whose name sounded like the word for "fox." The man was ageless, with gold flecks dancing in the depths of his greenish eyes that seemed somehow familiar.

"I live nearby," said Mister Huli, taking Lao Mu by the elbow as though they were old friends. "I've been shopping in the village," he said holding out his basket.

Lao Mu glanced at its contents in spite of himself. He had forgotten the taste of pork and wine!

"Come, dine with me," invited Mr. Huli. Though every fiber in his body yearned to accept, Lao Mu demurred.

"Perhaps your wife is waiting?" asked Mister Huli softly. Lao Mu shook his head, turning quite red.

"Oh dear!" exclaimed Mister Huli momentarily embarrassed; then he brightened. "In that case there's no reason why you shouldn't come." Mister Huli's grasp on Lao Mu's elbow tightened. A puff of wind blew dust in Lao Mu's face, causing him to blink.

Next moment he found himself in a long, narrow room that was simply but elegantly furnished. The wood of table and chairs glowed with warm lights. The scrolls on the walls and the few ornaments scattered about lent the room an air of peace and tranquillity. A delicately carved moon door draped with silk curtains separated it from an inner chamber from which wafted the aroma of food being prepared.

"Welcome to my humble home," said Mister Huli. He seated Lao Mu in the place of honor facing south and, placing a tray of sweetmeats and tea before him, urged his guest to take some refreshments while they waited for dinner.

Lao Mu was overwhelmed. The gentry had always treated him with contempt, so he simply did not know how to react. Mister Huli soon put him at his ease. Presently the curtain separating them from the inner room parted, and Mister Huli led the way to a table that groaned with food. The host picked at the food but pressed the choicest morsels upon his guest. The warm honey-colored wine dissolved the last of Lao Mu's reserve.

"Either I'm dreaming," he babbled, "or I'm tipsy!"

Lao Mu woke on his kang (or sleeping platform), not quite sure whether he had dreamed the events he remembered so vividly or whether they had really happened.

It was not till the north wind was blowing that he met Mister Huli again. The old gentleman showed Lao Mu the cache of roots and herbs he had gathered that day, naming each and comfortably describing its medicinal properties.

"I could show you many things. There is wealth in those woods, if one has the knowledge," said Mister Huli, fixing Lao Mu with a meaningful gaze, "and an opportunity to serve one's fellow man too." he concluded, twirling a mysterious looking root between his fingers.

All the blood rushed to Lao Mu's head. Everything he knew, he learned by trial and error. There was so much he longed to know but lacked someone to ask. Mr. Huli seemed approachable, but admitting ignorance to oneself is one thing whereas putting it into words for another's ear is something else. Sensing his hesitation, Mister Huli lowered the hood of his cloak so that only his greenish eyes showed.

"We shall talk again," he said with laughter in his voice. A wind came up, and he disappeared into the swirling dust.

Lao Mu was restless in the short, dark winter days that followed. He went into the woods in search of the herbs Mister Huli had shown him, but it was hard-going, for he did not know where to look. Thus, he was overjoyed when he came upon Mister Huli on a similar errand.

"We are well met indeed," Mister Huli chortled. "You can help me. I need a pair of strong hands to dig some roots," and he held out his scarred right hand to Lao Mu. "It's not much use," he sighed ruefully.

Lao Mu wanted to say something appropriate but couldn't find the words, so he nodded. The two went deep into the woods, Mister Huli pointing out this and that as they went. Lao Mu's mind raced after him, committing every word to memory. As the sun dipped beneath the horizon Mister Huli announced,

"You will dine with me. Afterward we will sample a tea made from roots you helped me gather."

Lao Mu bobbed his head in eager consent. He had learned so much that afternoon, he thirsted for more. Later, over tea, Lao Mu listened, mesmerized, while Mister Huli talked. Out of the blue Mister Huli asked,

"If you could have one wish, what would it be?"

Startled, Lao Mu blurted out the first thing that came to mind.

"To be … the best."

Once spoken, those words made him squirm.

"What do you mean by the best?" Mister Huli asked softly, but his question seemed like an explosion.

Lao Mu searched the room for an answer. Mr. Huli followed his gaze. Watching his parents work themselves to death, Lao Mu swore he would not end up the same way. Being the best was having a life like his landlord, Wang, whose house he visited timidly once every quarter to pay his rent and taxes. Finally he mumbled,

“To have … land … To be … respected. To live decently …”

Mr. Huli’s face clouded momentarily, then his voice sounded in Lao Mu’s brain,

“I will teach you, if you put yourself entirely in my hands. But,” he warned, “knowledge is a two-edged sword that can either enrich or destroy you.”

“Command me, Master!” cried Lao Mu falling on his knees and banging his head against the ground.

Mister Huli raised him gently.

“No need for groveling,” he admonished.

Lao Mu’s education began at once. Mister Huli appeared at dusk each day, and the next instant, Lao Mu would find himself in the older man’s book-lined study.

Mister Huli opened a whole new world to Lao Mu. He discoursed on the past and the present and how that knowledge could be used to gain an inkling of the future. But Mister Huli was also practical. He taught Lao Mu how to nurture the land, to rotate crops, where to dig for water. Lao Mu soaked up everything like a sponge. When winter faded into spring he was eager to put what he learned into practice.

During the season of toil Mr. Huli did not appear. However, a fox came to the edge of the woods from time to time as if to watch him from a distance. Next autumn, Lao Mu’s niggardly scrap of land responded with a bountiful harvest. When the gray pall of acrid smoke from slash burning filled the air, Mister Huli returned.

“Master,” Lao Mu cried, running to greet him. “I have such news!” For the first time in his life he did not worry about paying his rent and taxes. His larder was full. There were even a few strings of coins hidden under a loose brick in a corner of his kang, earned from selling herbal remedies.

Mister Huli seemed pleased, but there was still much to learn he told Lao Mu. The lessons began again.

Several winters later, Wang, the landlord, fell on hard times, and Lao Mu bought the land he worked at a good price, plus another small parcel that had been lying fallow. Lao Mu’s life was changing. His success earned him the villagers’ grudging respect. Soon they were going to him for advice on this and that. Even the marriage broker started coming round with offers. Lao Mu took everything in stride. Finally, he thought he was on the way to realizing his dream. However, deep inside there was a nagging feeling that something was missing. He broached the question to his mentor at the first opportunity.

“Master, when will I really be the best?”

Mister Huli’s eyebrows rose so high they almost disappeared into his cap.

“It’s not a question of ‘when,’” he replied, “but how you feel here,” and he lay a hand gently over Lao Mu’s heart.

“How should I feel?” cried Lao Mu. The only model he had was Wang, his former landlord.

Mister Huli pursed his lips in thought. Lao Mu waited with bated breath for him to speak.

“Perhaps you should be introduced to polite society,” Mister Huli finally said.

“When?” inquired Lao Mu eagerly.

“This very evening,” Mister Huli grinned. “We shall attend a banquet, which 1 think you will find. . . instructive—”

“But 1 can’t,” wailed Lao Mu, “I haven’t the clothes and—”

Before he could finish, a whirlwind deposited him in the foyer of a grand house. In a mirror he caught a reflection of himself and he couldn’t believe his eyes. His face was scrubbed, his hair was lacquered, he was dressed in an elegant brown robe, and a full purse made a pleasant bulge in his pocket. Why, he and Mister Huli might have passed for father and son!

“Do not accept a third cup of wine,” said Mister Huli in a low voice, “and do not tarry when 1 bid you to leave.” Before he finished speaking their host was bearing down upon them.

“What shall I do?” stammered Lao Mu in a panic, for their host was none other than Wang.

Mister Huli greeted Wang warmly and introduced Lao Mu as his protégé.

“Have I had the pleasure before?” Wang asked searching Lao Mu’s face.

Lao Mu glibly passed himself off as a recent arrival from the south. His impersonation of a gentleman traveling for pleasure was flawless. His manners and his witty repartée drew approving smiles all around. Seated between a man of letters and a man of business, Lao Mu realized how little it took to impress those shallow, venal men. He partook of the endless dishes that were placed before him, but he refused the wine.

When a wine from the south was presented, the unctuous businessman, noticing his abstinence, pressed a cup upon him. Lao Mu could not refuse. As the wine trickled down his throat the room filled with a golden glow like sunlight filtered through fog on a winter’s day. Lao Mu saw himself, a few years older, building a new house. Not a mansion but a far cry from the cottage he lived in nevertheless. Squares of red paper with the double happiness symbol written in gold adorned doors and windows, signifying an imminent wedding. The golden fog cleared, but the happiness lingered.

"This is indeed a wonderful wine!" he heard himself saying.

"Then you must have more," urged his companion.

Mister Huli's warning sounded in Lao Mu's brain. This is only the second cup, he thought, and drank again. Once again a golden mist enveloped him.

This time he saw himself older still, living in the mansion where he was feasting. His wildest dream had come true! Lao Mu saw himself swaggering through the rooms. Everything was his. Flatterers dogged his steps, hanging on his every word. Finally he was the best.

Suddenly the scene changed. Fawning smiles turned into looks of cunning, greed, envy, and hate. Grasping hands plucked at him from all sides like ravenous birds of prey.

He was relieved when the vision faded.

"They've all gone to the gaming tables," murmured his table companion. "The two of us must finish this excellent wine."

Before Lao Mu could refuse, the man had refilled his cup. He downed it shakily, in spite of Mister Huli's warning.

Instantly, choking gray fog enveloped him, filling him with such dread that he began to weep.

"I didn't think you were the sort that weeps in his cups," his companion chuckled nastily. "Come. A spot of gambling will cheer you!"

At that moment Mister Huli's voice sounded loud and clear.

"Come with me!"

Mister Huli was waiting at the door, stern and unsmiling, but the other was equally insistent. Lao Mu was drawn to the noise and gaiety of the gaming tables like a moth to a flame.

"Come at once!" Mister Huli sounded angry.

"Just one throw of the dice!" Lao Mu cried defiantly.

The mist before his eyes dispersed. He watched the dice roll across the table as if through the wrong end of a telescope. A deluge of voices overwhelmed him. He watched helplessly as hands snatched up the coins he threw on the table, then seized his purse.

"No!" he shouted, striking out blindly at those nearest him. "You can't take everything I've got!"

An ominous silence fell upon the crowd.

"Thrash him!" his host was the first to break the silence.

The veneer of civility fell away with horrible swiftness. They gave Lao Mu a sound beating before tossing him out of the house.

Bruised, his fine clothes in tatters, Lao Mu trudged home. The lamp was trimmed, the fire lit, and a kettle of tea simmered over the flames when he arrived. Lao Mu never thought he could be so glad to be beside his quiet hearth. It came to him that all he needed was within his own four walls, and the best that life can offer is a tranquil heart.

3

Wong Shung's troubles began with the war. The invaders left his town in shambles, but he stayed on. Being a good cabinet maker, he was sure of a reasonable living once reconstruction began. While the town was still reeling, stragglers from the warring armies descended upon it like locusts. What they could not carry away they destroyed. Wong Shung watched helplessly as his home and shop were reduced to ashes. Still Wong Shung would not budge from the place generations of Wongs called home.

Misfortune comes in threes. When the plague carried off his family, all he could think of was staying alive. He tied a few possessions he salvaged from the ruins of his home in a bundle, strapped it to his back, and trudged out of the town. Being a frugal man, the cache of coins hidden under the floor of his bed chamber made a comforting bulge in his pocket. A craftsman can make a living anywhere, Wong Shung reassured himself.

The road that led out of the town was crowded with people leaving for the same reason. Wong Shung had no plans except to leave the place that had become too painful to live in. Ten miles out, the road forked. He unstrapped the load from his back and sat down to gnaw a dry bun, and to figure out which way to go.

"Hey, brother!" a stranger shouted. "Come with us! There's a rich town down the road. We'll all make a living there!"

Wong Shung shook his head. Too many people were headed in that direction. He would be better off taking the road that branched off the other way.

The road ribboned through ruined farmland toward a bluish-purple smudge of mountains on the horizon. The farm houses he passed were burned out shells. The light began to fade from the sky. Birds gossiping in the trees fell silent. The wind lowed like a desolate ghost in the black emptiness that engulfed him.

Wong Shung sat down in the lee of a huge boulder at the side of the road. He was discovering how ill-prepared he had been when he set out, for he had eaten all the food earlier in the day. In spite of the rumblings of his stomach, he wrapped himself in his cloak and, pillowing his head on his belongings, tried to sleep.

As he drifted off, a noise woke him. For a moment he lay quite still, until his sluggish brain told him what he heard was the hoof beat of approaching horses dragging some kind of vehicle. Wong Shung quickly hefted his possessions, pulled his voluminous cloak over them, and retreated behind an untidy stack of sorghum leaves and stalks in the field nearby. Within minutes a pair of black horses pulling a carriage, traveling without lights, careened around a bend in the road. It carne to an abrupt stop near the spot where Wong Shung lay shivering with fright.

The driver leaped off as agile as a cat. First he went over to his horses, whose muzzles he stroked tenderly, whispering to them as though they were children. Then he turned to the fields and stood sniffing the air.

"Come out, come out, whoever you are," he called in an odd sing-song. He seemed to stare right at Wong Shung.

Wong Shung scarcely breathed. He screwed his eyes tight, as though by shutting him out the cloaked figure standing at the edge of the road would disappear.

The man chuckled.

"I know you're there."

These days it pays to be cautious, Wong Shung thought. The man might be a heartless brigand who would just as soon rob and kill you as give you the time of day! Wong Shung would have burrowed into the ground if he could. Since he could not, he lay like a limp rag, hoping the other would go away. Behind his tight shut lids, every sound became magnified. The man had stepped back to the coach, talking to someone in a low voice. Just as he thought the coach was about to move on, a foot landed lightly beside his head. Next moment, a hand seized Wong Shung by the hair and hauled him to his feet.

"Well, what have we here?" chortled his captor.

"Just a poor wayfarer, my Lord," quavered Wong Shung. "Please don't hurt me! I can't bear pain!"

"My Lord!" the man mimicked. A woman's tinkling laugh issued from the darkened coach. Wong Shung tried to struggle free, but the other quite easily lifted him off the ground and dragged him on tiptoes toward the coach.

"I won't hurt you," said the coachman in a good-humored voice, "if you promise not to run away."

Wong Shung quickly nodded. The other pinned Wong Shung against the black lacquered side of the coach with his body, blocking any possibility of escape.

"What did you find, brother dear?" the young woman's voice sounded from within the coach.

The man pressed his face close to Wong Shung's.

"A man,"" he replied shortly.

"What is he like?"

"Medium."

"What on earth does that mean?" the young woman's voice rose a pitch.

Wong Shung thought it meant "ordinary," the way people use words such as "nice" and "pretty" when they really mean something could be better. In a flash of anger, he tried to push the man aside, thinking he could bolt into the night. But the man was too strong for him. One long-fingered hand coiled around his neck and the other seized him by the seat of his pants. Next moment, Wong Shung landed on the seat beside the driver's with such a thud that he felt his brain had been jarred loose. In a daze, he realized the coach was careering down the road. The driver whipped his team into a fine froth. Wong Shung hung on to his perch till his knuckles ached. It was all he could do to keep from being flung off The driver shrieked a peculiar sounding song at the sky, which roused flocks of sleeping birds into noisy flight.

Finally the driver allowed the horses to slacken their pace. Wong Shung breathed a sigh of relief

"Who are you, sir?" Wong Shung gasped. Now that his eyes had adjusted to the dark, Wong Shung saw a narrow face with high cheekbones; a long, delicate nose; and a wide mouth.

"You may call me Fox, for Fox Fairy," said the man. Jutting his chin at the coach he added,

"She is my sister, Hu Mei."

"You make sport of me, sir," Wong Shung did his best to sound indignant. Ancient foxes who take human form at night only exist in fairy tales, he told himself Nevertheless, he shot his companion another nervous glance. Except for the eyes that seemed to pierce Wong Shung's very soul, his captor was no different from any other human.

"Where are you taking me?" The driver studied him before answering,

"Anywhere is better than where you came from."

Wong Shung was at a loss for a rebuttal.

"Don't sulk," said the driver over his shoulder. "There is nothing as unappetizing as a balky guest who is expected to stay a while."

Wong Shung's hair stood on end.

"It's no good holding me for ransom," he said breathlessly. "There isn't a soul left in the family to pay. You might as well let me go." The driver shook his head and sighed.

"Wong Shung, you are such a ninny! Relax!"

Wong Shung's eyes went wide. How did the man know his name! The man chuckled.

"I know a lot about you."

Fox shook the reigns, and the coach went barreling through the night again. Wong Shung was glad when it came to a halt in front of a large house. Fox leaped off and hurried inside. Presently he returned with a lighted lamp. He reached up and plucked Wong Shung off the coach.

"Light the way for my sister," he said, handing him the lamp. "I'll see to the horses. The servants are asleep."

He held the coach door open, and a heavily cloaked young woman alighted. For a moment her hood cast a deep shadow across her face. As she paused and turned, the light caught a small, heart-shaped face, dominated by a pair of luminous, amber-colored eyes; a small mouth; and a pert but stubborn little nose. She was a classic beauty. Fox's booted foot, applied firmly to Wong Shung's rump, propelled him into the house ahead of the young woman.

The young woman directed him down a long corridor to a room. The air was stale. The furniture was shrouded in sheets heavy with dust. The young woman surveyed the huge, unlived-in room disdainfully. With an imperious gesture she indicated she wanted a window opened. Wong Shung leaped to comply, conscious of being observed as he wrestled with the rusty latch. The window swung open suddenly. Wong Shung turned almost colliding with the young woman who was right behind him. Holding the lamp high, she examined him as if he were an exotic animal. Just then Fox entered from somewhere in the depths of the house.

"What took so long, dear brother?" the young woman asked petulantly without taking her eyes off Wong Shung. The fingers of one slender hand drumming the top of a table beside her showed her impatience.

"The horses had to be seen to," replied Fox. "I expect you want to retire …" he added.

Hu Mei shrugged impatiently. Fox took the lamp from her.

"You will sleep in here," he said to Wong Shung, raising the lamp above his head, spinning on his heels to show off the room. "Use the kang or the chaise, whichever you prefer. Do not touch anything else. And don't even think of escape."

He escorted his sister from the room, leaving Wong Shung in the dark.

Now that he had a good look at his strange captors, Wong Shung was less afraid. They certainly fit tales about Fox Fairies who take the form of a beautiful woman or a dashing young man. However, he resolutely dismissed the notion as nonsense. It was easier to believe the pair were merely using superstition to throw him off balance. Meanwhile, having a roof over his head was far better than sleeping in the open. As Wong Shung went to shut the window against the night air, he noticed shadows moving against a lighted pane across the courtyard. Voices carried in the stillness.

"Are you sure this one is suitable?" Wong Shung heard Hu Mei say in a lilting voice. He could hear her brother's voice indistinctly from somewhere further in the room. Whatever he said evidently displeased his sister. Her tone became quite angry, even shrill. The shadows flickering across the patch of light showed that both were agitated. As he came closer, Wong Shung heard Fox say in a placating tone,

" … but he has other qualities. You need someone who …"

They moved out of earshot again. Then the light went out.

Stretched out on the kang, Wong Shung pondered what he had overheard. He was certain brother and sister had been discussing him. The man who called himself Fox obviously fancied he knew a great deal about him, but it was Hu Mei's opinion that mattered, and it had to do with his appearance. Instinctively his hand went to his face.

"What is the matter with the way I look?" Wong Shung wondered.

A fortune-teller once said his high forehead and bushy eyebrows that met across the bridge of his nose were signs of talent and intelligence. And he was an excellent craftsman and wood carver, even if he said so himself. It's true his head is squarish, but his heavy jaw indicates strong-mindedness. (So far, so good.) But the squat nose with the flared nostrils, the thick, dark lips, especially the round eyes undid all that. They made him look bovine. The last image in his mind as he drifted off was Hu Mei scrutinizing him, head tilted mockingly to one side.

The sun was high when Wong Shung awoke. A three-tiered food carrier stood on a table with utensils laid out for one. A jug of water and a basin stood just inside the door. For the moment he was too famished to consider anything but food. He wolfed a plate of warm meat dumplings and a bowl of noodles in a rich broth, followed by two bowls of an excellent tea, before he read the note on the table.

"My sister and I hope you will be comfortable in these surroundings. As soon as we decide on a commission, we shall communicate it to you personally. In the meantime, our servants will see to your needs."

A quick look around the room revealed that under the dust covers, the once elegant furniture was dilapidated from long neglect. It was evident that new furniture was needed. However, one does not kidnap a craftsman to furnish one's house, thought Wong Shung indignantly. The more he thought about it, the angrier he got. The door to the room was lightly shut. He opened it and yelled for the servants loudly, but no one came. Undistinguishable sounds sent him darting down the hallway, shouting, opening and shutting doors. The rooms on either side were all dusty and empty. Finally it dawned upon him he was alone.

Who are these people? What do they want? Why do they live in isolation? One question led to another. What if they are Fox Fairies? Fear reared its ugly head again. Wong Shung decided he must make the best of the daylight hours, when Fox Fairies are helpless, to get as far away from this place as he could. He retraced his footsteps to the room where he had slept, picked up his bundle, and went down the corridor in the opposite direction, looking for the entrance foyer he remembered from the night before. In one room Wong Shung came upon a red wood cabinet with shiny brass fittings that looked new but had a broken latch. Curiosity made him look inside. What he saw made Wong Shung's jaw drop. He leaned his head against the cupboard, took a few deep breaths, and looked again.

Inside were gold ingots stacked in a pyramid. There was more gold than he dared dream of, and it was within reach!

"Gold is the key to the future!" flashed through Wong Shung's mind. Suddenly, everything was possible.

Wong Shung tiptoed across the room with his heart in his mouth, and pressed his ear to the window. All he heard was sparrows chirping and wind rustling the trees. He tried a door that led outside and opened it a crack. The narrow strip of courtyard that came into view was as neglected as the rest of the house. There was no sign of another living soul.

Still, he had to be sure. He stole across the courtyard to a large window with an elaborately carved frame that must have been the room where Fox and his sister had been the night before. Silence. He wet a fingertip with spittle and applied it to the rice paper window covering, working it gently until he made a hole large enough to peep through. Two large foxes lay curled on the floor, sound asleep.

Wong Shung broke into a sweat. He hurried back to the cupboard, dumped his precious tools on the floor, rolled up as many gold ingots as he could carry in some clothes, and strapped the bundle on his back. Instead of trying to find the entrance to the house, he clambered up an old chestnut tree in the middle of the courtyard, then swung onto the roof He slithered lizard-fashion onto its peak and looked over the edge. A clump of trees screened the house from open fields beyond. Wong Shung slid down the other side and dropped lightly onto the ground. He had no idea where he was, nor did he care. His only thought was to get as far away as possible from the foxes' house before sunset.

Wong Shung tried to comfort himself with the thought that it was war and its awful aftermath that forced him to steal. Besides, what good is gold to a pair of foxes?

But was he sure Fox and Hu Mei were the sleeping foxes he saw and not rich eccentrics? An inner voice reminded Wong Shung there is one set of laws for the poor and another for the rich. The rich would exact a terrible penalty if he were caught.

Pursued by disquieting thoughts, Wong Shung discovered that a thief is friendless. Afraid of being caught, constantly on guard against those who might try to separate him from his ill-gotten gains, he avoided the main thoroughfares. In spite of the gold, he was cold, and hungry, subsisting on wild berries, sleeping in abandoned fields.

Finally, Wong Shung struck a bargain with a good-natured muleteer. In exchange for loading and unloading his cart along the way, the muleteer agreed to take Wong Shung as far as he was going.

Weeks later, Wong Shung arrived at a depot along the Grand Canal. He exchanged one gold ingot for cash at a merchant house and bought passage on a barge leaving for the south.

The northern plain where he was born was far behind, but Wong Shung was still fearful. He wandered restlessly until he found a quiet little town near Lake Dong Ting and settled. With a small part of his gold, he bought new tools and set up a workshop. The rest he buried under the floor of his house. He worked hard, lived frugally, and did not seek the company of other people.

Wong Shung gradually became renowned not only as a cabinet maker but as a wood carver. Hu Mei's image had been so indelibly imprinted upon his mind that he was compelled to reproduce it in wood carvings of such refinement, beauty, and grace that the pieces seemed to breathe. Before long, his work was in such demand that he had to take apprentices to help fulfill his commissions.

Wong Shung's art became his life. The rewards it brought were only a secondary consideration. He was known as a pleasant man, with a ready smile and a kindly word for everyone. However, a peculiar stillness set him apart. He was hard to know. Wong Shung became a recluse.

Ten years passed. Late one night there was a knock on the door. Wong Shung never received visitors after dark. However, a new apprentice answered the door. A moment later he announced a gentleman to see the master. Wong Shung was about to rebuke the boy, but the visitor had already followed him into the room. Wong Shung stood with his mouth open as the man who called himself Fox crossed the space between them in a few quick strides.

"I am delighted to see you," cried Fox as he pressed a coin into the apprentice's hand and waved him from the room. He waited till they were alone before he picked up a candle to examine Wong Shung's face.

"You've changed," murmured Fox.

Wong Shung's face was lined. The glossy black hair was mostly gray. Furthermore, his eyes were weak, and the tremor in his hands forced him to work less than he liked. On the other hand, Fox looked not a day older than Wong Shung remembered.

"I'm a Fox Fairy," Fox twinkled mischievously, reading Wong Shung's thoughts. "We neither age nor die. However," he added, beaming, "you are exactly the way I hoped to find you! Successful. Respected. Well-to-do."

Wong Shung did not know what to make of that remark. He screwed up his courage and took the plunge.

"I'm sorry I stole your gold," he blurted. "I was desperate. I will pay you back with interest if you will allow me a day or two to make arrangements—"

His visitor let out a short, derisive laugh.

"If I wanted the gold, I would take it," he said hopping nimbly from one spot to the other, landing unfailingly on each of Wong Shung's hiding places under the floor.

Wong Shung blanched. Through a great buzzing in his ears, he heard Fox say the gold was payment in advance.

"What do you want?" quavered Wong Shung. Fox smiled broadly, in no hurry to divulge what was on his mind.

"In exchange for the gold, which is of no use to us," he began teasingly, "my sister and I crave that which is of no use to you."

While Wong Shung pondered that riddle, Fox padded about the room, examining various likenesses of his sister, both finished and in progress. He stopped before a life-size sculpture of the young woman dancing, turning it this way and that to catch the light. It was the first of countless representations of Hu Mei that Wong Shung had made. In his own mind it was his finest. For that reason he guarded it jealously.

"My sister will be flattered," murmured Fox appreciatively.

Wong Shung was dismayed. If his visitor demanded It, he would have to give it up, and its loss would break his heart. .

The conversation took another tack.

"It is time my sister was wed," announced Fox, his gaze traveling from the statue to Wong Shung.

Wong Shung was single. All these years he had pined for an ideal mate, without ever identifying what it was he yearned for. In a flash, he knew. That Fox would bring up the matter at all was a sign that whatever differences might exist were no longer important.

For a brief moment Wong Shung was about to ask for Hu Mei's hand. Then he glimpsed himself reflected in the glass door of a cupboard, and reddened. He was old before his time. He wished he were young and vigorous again, but it was too late. Fox watched him, a knowing smile tugging at his lips.

Wong Shung brusquely thrust that impossible thought from his mind.

"You will need the gold for your sister's dowry," Wong Shung said in an effort to divert Fox's attention from the statue. Fox settled himself in a chair with a weary sigh.

"It's not as simple as that," he began. "You see me as I was during the period known in your history as the Warring States."\fn{A period of some 500 years, conveniently demarcated from 771-221BC.}

"That was more than a thousand years ago," breathed Wong Shung, "nobody lives that long."

"Fox Fairies do," said Fox. "My sister is a little younger. However, being forever young and beautiful becomes a burden eventually."

"A burden I would give my soul for," muttered Wong Shung.

Fox continued as though he hadn't heard.

"By day we are foxes. At night we are like you, except we are doomed to be mimics and observers. My sister and I have wandered every inch of All Under Heaven, tasted all the pleasures, but we are unfulfilled. We long to be real participants of the human condition."

Wong Shung thought to himself, if I could have youth and an infinite life span, I would ask for nothing more. Fox picked that thought right out of Wong Shung's mind.

"Fear usually separates my kind from yours. Evidently, you are an exception."

Wong Shung was not listening. His thoughts were racing.

"Love will overcome everything," he murmured.

"I believe you are truly devoted to my sister." Fox shook Wong Shung gently by the shoulders. "Eternal youth is yours if you marry my sister."

Fox's last remark sounded like a clarion. Wong Shung did not hesitate to accept.

"You will go with me this very night to where my sister is waiting. There you will be wed. You will live with her and care for her. I shall be away," his gesture indicated his travels were unimportant except to himself. "My sister will help you become a creature of the night like us …"

"What will happen then?" stammered Wong Shung.

"Why, you will have the immortality you crave. Let us seal the pact."

Fox's smile felt like a cold hand clutching his heart.

Fox pulled out a hairpin from his top knot, stabbed his thumb and bade Wong Shung do the same. They pressed their bloody thumbs together, and the deed was done.

Wong Shung's eyes grew heavy. He shut them for an instant. When he opened them he was in a different place. Everything was new and exciting. Instead of his dusty smock he wore a bridegroom's ceremonial robe. He snatched up a mirror and gaped at the reflection. He was as he had been when he was twenty, only his features were softened, more refined.

"Come," Fox chuckled from across the room. "You mustn't keep your bride waiting!"

Wong Shung and Hu Mei were married. Fox departed as soon as was polite after the ceremony.

"You have what you desire," he said, holding his sister's hand in both his, "now I must seek mine."

"Go in peace," she smiled serenely.

Though an uncommon passion bound them, for a while Wong Shung could not adapt to the Fox Fairy's life entirely. During the day, when Hu Mei sank into a deathlike sleep, the newly acquired ability to be somewhere merely by wishing it allowed Wong Shung to visit the house where he had lived and worked. Unrecognizable, he mingled with art fanciers who thronged his studio offering ridiculous prices for works he had left behind. Wong Shung's sudden disappearance was quickly construed as death. Death made him legend, which itself is a kind of immortality.

Wong Shung and Hu Mei lived in the passionate contentment of lovers for whom time had no meaning. As Wong Shung adapted to his new life, like a butterfly emerging from a cocoon, Hu Mei began to age. Imperceptible at first, the process accelerated once it took: hold. Hu Mei was serene. However, Wong Shung was filled with anguish as his beautiful young wife withered before his eyes.

"You made a bargain," Hu Mei reminded Wong Shung gently. "You agreed to take on the burden of endless life that I might find love and everlasting peace."

Hu Mei disappeared into the ether, but Wong Shung lives on … and on … and on …

4

Farmer Chang went into town once a year, and he went in style. For days before, his orchard and farmhouse buzzed with activity. The farmer's shiny pate glowed importantly as he stamped from house to yard to fields and back again, shouting orders left and right, sending his farm hands scurrying in all directions.

“Everything must be just so, or there’ll be the devil to pay!” he shouted.

The mule cart was spruced up with a coat of fresh red lacquer. The mule was scrubbed and curried till its coat glistened. Its harness was polished and hung with copper bells that jingled merrily, and festooned with ribbons that matched the color of the cart. The groom, a boy of twelve, was told to get a haircut and a bath and given a new cotton jacket befitting the servant of a prosperous farmer.

On a crisp autumn day, after his pears were harvested, Farmer Chang loaded his cart and set out for town. As he passed through the streets, harness bells jingle-jangling, the beetle-browed farmer perched high on his cart cracked his whip, while the groom piped in a high, reedy voice,

“Buy Farmer Chang’s pears! Farmer Chang’s pears! Best in the county!”

“Best in the world is more like it,” muttered Farmer Chang, and ordered the boy to shout louder. “Put some feeling into it! And shake that bell harder! People must know Farmer Chang has come to town!”

People stopped on the sidewalks or poked their heads out of windows to watch the bright red cart pass.

“Oooh, look how fat and prosperous Farmer Chang has become,” someone observed.

“What a fine mule and cart,” exclaimed another.

A few waved and shouted greetings, but Farmer Chang looked neither right nor left. His eyes were stony in his expressionless face. He wanted no truck with the townsfolk, for they had not been so welcoming when he was down on his luck. Now he only wanted their money.

Farmer Chang had worked hard for as long as he could remember. He started with a tiny plot of land and a few miserable trees from which he barely made a living, but he dreamed of developing the finest pears in the county. Day and night he thought of nothing but his trees. His wife, a quiet, patient soul, toiled with him, nurturing the trees as if they were children. The years blurred into one another. Poverty and toil took their toll. One autumn just as the pears were turning luscious and golden, Farmer Chang’s wife took ill and did not stir from her bed. Her husband ranted at her furiously. She gazed at him with eyes filled with such indefinable sadness that he finally sputtered into silence.

“Perhaps I will be more help to you from beyond,” she whispered.

Turning her face to the wall, breath left her.

She was buried without ceremony at the foot of the orchard, whence, according to the necromancer, she would continue to oversee Farmer Chang’s little domain. He marked her resting place with a small mound, for ground is precious, and placed before it a blank stone tablet.

“What’s the point of engraving it?” he reasoned. “I know she’s there and so does she. It’s enough.”

The woman’s death did not touch Farmer Chang. Instead he was vexed that she died just when he needed an extra pair of hands, for the crop was heavy that year.

That was the turning point in Farmer Chang's career. From then on each crop was better than the one before. the fame of his pears spread, Farmer Chang grew prosperous. He bought more land, planted more trees, built himself a proper house, and hired farm hands. Though he was successful, his soul shriveled. He cared for no one. He had no friends. His orchard was his life, and the money he earned he hoarded in a secret place under the floor tiles of his room.

Farmer Chang’s mule cart meandered through the town till it reached the market square. There it stopped. The Farmer and the groom raised an awning over the cart to shade the pears from the midday sun.

“I’m ready for business!” the Farmer announced in a loud voice, holding up a pear in each hand for all to see. Many of the townsfolk had followed the Farmer as he made his stately progress through the streets. Business was brisk, though buyers were aghast at the price.

“You want my pears, you pay my price,” sneered Farmer Chang as he snatched the coins from his customers, dispensing his wares as though they were blessings.

A mendicant monk came to the square begging food. He looked at the farmer’s fruit longingly.

“The man’s prosperous,” thought the monk. “Surely he wouldn’t miss one pear.”

He joined the queue. When he finally stood before Farmer Chang, he bowed, saying in a low voice, “Master, I’m hungry and thirsty. In the name of Buddha would you spare me a pear?”

Farmer Chang’s eyes snapped wide with amazement. Was he hearing things? Clearly not. For there was the monk, repeating what he had just said in a thin, whiny voice.

“What! … “What! …” gasped Farmer Chang. “Give away a pear!”

He had never heard anything so preposterous!

The monk went on bowing and begging. His ragged robe sent up such a stench that people began to back away. Seeing that he might lose customers because of this wretched fellow, Farmer Chang bellowed,

“Go away, you cabbage-faced bundle of misery! Get away from here!”

The monk just went on bowing and muttering.

“Take care how you provoke me,” cried Farmer Chang, “or I’ll thrash you within an inch of your life!”

Farmer Chang meant what he said, but the monk was equally stubborn. Even when the Farmer’s whip came whistling down on his head and shoulders, he stood his ground. The lash drew blood. There was a cry of outrage from the crowd, but nobody tried to interfere. A gentleman passing by in a litter heard the commotion, called out to his bearers to stop, and alighted to see what was afoot. He was disgusted by what he saw.

“Stop!” he shouted.

Farmer Chang’s whip faltered in midair.

“What’s the meaning of this violence?” demanded the gentleman.

A dozen voices piped up immediately. The gentleman pieced together the story as best he could.

“If that’s all the fuss is about,” he said, eyeing Farmer Chang contemptuously, “I’ll buy him a pear.”

He selected a large pear and threw a coin to Farmer Chang. Then, gently leading the monk away from the cart, handed him the fruit.

“Remember me in your prayers,” the gentleman said as he climbed back into his litter and went his way.

The monk took his pear to the opposite side of the square. Sitting on the ground, he wolfed it, stem, core, and all, except for one tiny seed. He found a stick and used it to dig a small hole in the hard packed earth, laid the seed in it, and covered it with loose soil. From a shop nearby he begged a cup of water and poured it over the newly planted seed.

“What are you doing, Master?” asked the shopkeeper.

“This town has been good to me,” replied the monk. “A kind gentleman gave me a pear when I was hungry and thirsty. I planted its seed so that the fruit might refresh other wayfarers.”

“That’s a noble thought,” the shopkeeper scratched his head, “but the ground is hard and barren; nothing will grow in it.”

“It will grow,” smiled the monk. He sat down beside the spot where the pear seed was planted, shut his eyes, and began to chant.

The shopkeeper looked on skeptically. Suddenly he thought he saw movement in the earth, as if something was pushing its way up. He rubbed his eyes and looked more closely. A small, white shoot was poking through the soil. The shoot began to grow before his eyes. In a moment it had grown into a sapling with leaves and branches.

“A miracle! A miracle!” the shopkeeper shouted, beside himself with excitement.

His cries brought people sprinting across the square from every direction to cluster around the monk. Those who were tardy jostled and tried to climb onto the shoulders of the people in front to catch a glimpse of the magic tree. The monk went on chancing, oblivious of the hubbub around him. The tree grew. Buds appeared and burst into bloom. The blossoms fell and fruit began to form. Soon the tree was so laden that the boughs were breaking.

Meanwhile, the altercation with the monk had so upset Farmer Chang that his heart beat painfully and his breath came in short, rapid gasps. He sat down in the shade of his cart, barely able to swallow the cup of tea his frightened groom pressed to his ashen lips.

“Look after the customers,” he gasped. “I’ll rest a while.”

He dozed. He came to with a start, for he no longer heard the boy, ringing his bell and shouting his wares. Worst of all, there weren’t any customers. He got to his feet shakily and called the boy’s name. There was no answer. Then he noticed the crowd at the other side of the square.

“Something terrible has happened,” he thought. “I’d best stay with my cart.”

However, his curiosity was piqued. He stopped the first person who passed his way and asked what was going on.

“A strange monk planted a magical pear tree that grew and bore fruit right before our eyes,” exclaimed the stranger. “Even now he’s distributing the fruit. I swear it was the best pear I’ve ever had!”

“That’s impossible,” scoffed Farmer Chang. “I grow the best pears in the county.” He would have liked to say “the world,” but something made him hold back.

“They’re better, and they’re free,” the stranger gloated.

That remark was enough to send Farmer Chang waddling across the square as fast as his legs would carry him. Sure enough, a pear tree stood where there used to be empty space. All around him happy people were munching pears, dribbling juice down their chins and onto their tunics. The same dirty, ragged monk was handing out the fruit. Farmer Chang hung back for a moment. By then the tree was almost stripped. His curiosity was too much to bear. Farmer Chang sidled up to the monk with an outstretched hand and a sheepish grin.

“Now I can return your kindness, sir,” bowed the monk.

He plucked the last pear and handed it to the Farmer.

Farmer Chang tucked the fruit in his sleeve and beat a fast retreat. He was dying to taste it, but no one must see him. For, didn’t he grow the best in the county, if not the world?

He ducked behind his cart, out of sight of the crowd, and bit into his pear. It was as crisp, sweet, and juicy as his own. In fact, he couldn’t tell the difference. He gobbled it down in a fever of excitement until only the seeds were left. He took them into the light and examined them carefully. They were identical to those he developed through years of trial and error. A dreadful thought entered his mind.

“It’s a trick,” he muttered under his breath.

Then he noticed his mule was loose, for one of the tracers of his cart had been broken off. With a wildly beating heart, he raised himself on tiptoes, and peered into his cart.

“It’s empty!” he cried.

A blinding light flashed before his eyes. The monk had somehow stolen his pears. He shouted for his groom, but the boy was gone.

Farmer Chang trotted angrily back across the square. The crowd had dispersed. The shopkeeper was sweeping up some branches and leaves. Farmer Chang’s eyes went round with amazement.

“Where’s the monk?” he stuttered, “and my groom?”

“He left,” answered the shopkeeper. “The boy who helped him distribute the pears went with him.”

Some said the monk went in one direction, others averred he had gone in another. Actually nobody knew. All that was left was a pear tree standing in the corner of the market square, its branches lifted in prayer toward the sky. If one looked closely, one would find flecks of red lacquer embedded so deep in its bark that neither wind nor rain would ever fade it.

5

She called him “Whiskers” because he had the most dashing pair of mustaches she had ever seen. He called her “Bright Eyes”

Because the laughter in her eyes filled him with joy. They lived in the back of a genera1 store, where the air was always laden with the smell of honey, spices, fruits, and a dozen grains. It was a noisy, dusty, busy place with something going on all the time. But it was warm and dry.

“And food is plentiful,” Whiskers pointed out. “It’s not easy for a couple of mice to find a place to live in the city.”

Bright Eyes agreed everything he said was perfectly true. However, she was a country mouse, who was used to different surroundings. She missed the changing colors and smells of the seasons. Here it was always the same. In the country she came and went as she pleased. Here she had to be careful. Particularly of the giant whom Whiskers grandly referred to as his “pet.” He was huge. Why, his toe was longer than her body! He was so tall that Bright Eyes had never seen his face, for a gigantic paunch that jiggled and swayed whenever he moved hid his face from view. But Whiskers claimed he glimpsed it once.

“For a human, it’s not a bad face,” said Whiskers stroking his mustaches.

“Does the pet have mustaches?” blinked Bright Eyes.

Whiskers glanced at her archly.

“Pets don’t as a rule.”

They always knew when the pet was coming because the ground shook, their furniture rattled, and their wedding picture on the wall promptly went askew.

“Oh dear! Oh dear!” cried Bright Eyes. “There it goes again.” She righted the portrait with a sigh. “Oh how I long for the peace of open spaces.”

For that day, the pet was stomping about and shouting more than usual. In fact, the place was more a-bustle than she had ever seen.

“It’s all right,” soothed Whiskers. “The pet is happy.”

“Happy!” exclaimed Bright Eyes, covering her ears. “Oooh, what ghastly noises he makes!”

“That’s called ‘singing,’” Whiskers wrinkled his nose. “Personally, I don’t much care for it, but humans do it when they’re happy. Aren’t you glad I’m a mouse?”

He drew Bright Eyes to the entrance of their burrow, and together they peered out at the goings-on. Some of the clerks were sweeping and scrubbing. Others were hanging up red bunting. Still others were pasting squares of red paper with gold squiggles onto the walls. The Pet darted here and there with remarkable swiftness for such a large person, overseeing everything in a great booming voice, bursting into snatches of song from time to time, in a high, shrill voice.

"See those red squares they're putting on the walls?" Whiskers pointed out for Bright Eyes. "That's the symbol for double happiness. It means the pet is getting married."

He put his arm around his little wife and gave her shoulders a squeeze.

"We are going to have a pettess."

"A pettess!" giggled Bright Eyes. "Maybe things will be different from now on."

And things were different. It grew quieter. There was less dust in the air. The pet seemed less heavy footed and didn't shout quite as much as he used to. However, he made it up with his singing, which put the two mice's teeth on edge. The pettess glided about in dainty slippers embroidered with bright red peonies and glossy green leaves. Bright Eyes particularly liked the scent of rose water that followed wherever she went. The pettess spoke with a soft musical voice. She was always unhurried and calm. She had the alcove opposite the mice's burrow cleaned and painted and made into a shrine for the Kitchen God. Every morning she placed little dishes of fruit and cakes on the altar, lit candles and incense, and prayed for the safety and happiness of all those who lived under their roof At night when the store was shuttered, the two mice would venture forth to nibble on the food left for the god.

Bright Eyes was dubious about touching the offerings at first, but it was hard to resist Whiskers' reasoning.

"The pettess will think the Kitchen God ate it," he said, "and she'll be pleased. Humans are not very smart. We know an image drawn on a piece of paper can't eat."

As time went by the two mice got bolder, and then they got care- less. One day the pettess placed a dish of fresh millet cakes on the Kitchen God's altar. They smelled so good that Bright Eyes was on pins and needles waiting for the day to end.

"You mustn't go out until it's dark," cautioned Whiskers, for he could see mischief gleaming in the other's eyes, as he prepared to go out foraging. Bright Eyes gave her head a toss, and retorted,

"You're going out."

"I'm the man of the house," replied Whiskers, deliberately weighting the word 'man.' "It's my job to bring home the bacon—or whatever."

"Then bring some millet cake," Bright Eyes' chin went up at a challenging angle.

"I will," promised Whiskers as he peered out the burrow to see if the coast was clear. "But you must wait till after dark."

"By then they'll be stale," Bright Eyes stamped her foot. "Or maybe the Kitchen God will have eaten them!"

"Don't be silly!" scoffed Whiskers. He gave Bright Eyes a quick peck on the cheek and scurried out before she could say anything more.

Left alone, Bright Eyes tried to concentrate on her chores, but the scent of those millet cakes drove her to distraction. Stealthy footsteps sprinting past the burrow made her peer out, just in time to see one of the boys who did the sweeping up snatch one of the millet cakes off the altar and stuff it whole into his mouth.

Bright Eyes gasped in horror. At this rate there won't be any left by nightfall!

There wasn't a moment to lose. She streaked out of the burrow, scampered up the altar, and just as she was about to sink her teeth into a millet cake, the pettess appeared.

"A mouse! A mouse! Aaaaah!" shrieked the pettess.

The store was turned into bedlam. It was all Bright Eyes could do to dart back into the burrow. She rolled herself into a tiny ball and cowered in a dark corner, as the pet and his staff went about with brooms and sticks hunting for the mouse. Once Bright Eyes had caught her breath, the dreadful thought came to her that Whiskers was out there. He could be in terrible danger, and it was all her fault. Oh, those hateful millet cakes, she thought. I shall never think of them again if only Whiskers is safe!

As a matter of fact, he was. Being wise to human ways, he sauntered home when the commotion died down, as though nothing had happened, with the food he had found, together with a piece of millet cake.

A few days later the pet brought home a gift that delighted the pettess no end. She cooed and gurgled and made silly noises at it. The two mice overheard her say quite distinctly,

"Mimi will keep the mice away!"

"They've got a cat!" cried Whiskers and Bright Eyes in unison.

Mimi was small-boned, sleek, and gleaming black, with four white paws and a bib. Two great eyes with yellow crescents in them dominated her small, crafty face. A white spot like a birthmark over the right corner of her mouth gave her a rakish air. She moved with a fluid, regal grace, her eyes like beacons searching out every nook and cranny of the store. It did not take her long to discover where her favorite foods were stored, and the coziest corner to sleep in. Of course, she also discovered where Whiskers and Bright Eyes lived, and made the expected cat noises that pleased the pet and the pettess.

But Mimi had a mind of her own. She was careful to keep up appearances, making a great show of taking charge of the mouse situation. So long as the mice kept out of her way, she was content to live and let live. With salted fish and pressed duck to tickle her palate, mice were not even an option on her menu.

Nevertheless, Mimi was a worry. Whiskers was particularly concerned about Bright Eyes, who tended to be flighty and careless. The adventure with the millet cakes could have ended in disaster. Though he scolded and she was contrite, Whiskers knew that when the mood for mischief came upon her there was no stopping Bright Eyes. He decided they had to move.

"But where?" cried Bright Eyes.

"I don't know," replied Whiskers stroking his mustaches thoughtfully. "Perhaps somewhere with a view …"

That last remark was not lost on Bright Eyes.

"Can we go and live in the country?" chirped Bright Eyes, all agog.

"I said 'a view,'" Whiskers tried to sound noncommittal, "nothing about the country. It's mainly to keep you out of harm's way." He pulled a long face.

Bright Eyes sighed, completely deflated. She knew how much Whiskers liked their present home and how he hated to leave it. If only the pet hadn't brought Mimi into the house!

Finally Whiskers found an empty burrow in the far corner of the back garden that was almost perfect. To be sure, it was a bit far to carry home the groceries, but there were advantages. There was plenty of sunlight and fresh air. Flowers from spring to autumn would please Bright Eyes. Best of all, Mimi would be far away because the pettess never let her out of the house.

As summer ripened into autumn Whiskers and Bright Eyes moved into their new abode. That same day a large snake, its scales shimmering with gold flecks, slithered into the garden, dusty and tired after a long journey. Finding a cool spot in a bamboo grove, it coiled itself up for a nap. Its presence was noticed at once by the rooster who patrolled the garden with a majestic gait. He warned his hens, who noisily rounded up their chicks at once. Their clucking startled the frogs sunning themselves by the pond, who leaped onto the lily pads floating in the center, or vanished into the water. The owl perched in the dark branches of a gnarled old pine snapped awake from a deep sleep.

"Who?" he said querulously, swiveling his head this way and that, trying to look alert, except he didn't see well in the light.

Whiskers and Bright Eyes, however, were too excited about their new home to notice.

The snake was heavy with food, for she had dined well on two frogs and a bird's egg on the way. She was faintly annoyed by the flurry that her presence caused. All she wanted was sleep.

"It's the price one pays for being beautiful," she sighed, for she was vain. "Think green," she told herself: and instantly she was the same color as the bamboo leaves that shaded her. With another sigh, she composed herself for sleep, when something made her open one pale eye just a slit. Then wider and wider.

Two mice were coming out of a burrow.

"How convenient," thought the snake as her eye shut again. She could feel the touch of autumn in the air. It was time to find a winter place.

"How delicious!" she murmured as she drifted off. Though she was partial to frogs and eggs, a steady diet of them got tedious. Mouse would be such a nice change! And a place to live afterward. She felt blessed indeed.

One morning after Whiskers had gone out to forage, and Bright Eyes was busily sorting and putting away their provisions for the winter, she was startled by a rustling sound. Someone was coming through the door. Presently a creature stood before her unlike any other she had ever seen.

"Who are you?" shrilled Bright Eyes. "What are you doing in my house?"

"Oh, I am sorry," murmured the snake. Her large, pale eyes quickly took in the room. The hideous furniture and the tasteless pictures will have to go, she thought. But all in good time … all in good time. Instead she smiled, showing a pair of glittering fangs.

"I thought the house was empty," continued the snake. "I was looking for a place to stay."

"Well, it isn't," replied Bright Eyes a little more sharply than she intended. "Whiskers and I just moved in," she added tartly.

The snake slithered in a little further, her sleek body swaying ever so gently while her inquisitive tongue darted this way and that.

"Hmmmm," she hummed softly. "Such a cozy spot you have …"

The stranger was making Bright Eyes nervous. The way that slender tongue glided down her face and body made her tremble. But those pale, pale eyes seemed to nail her to the floor so that she could hardly move.

"I'm called Bright eyes," she stammered. "I'm a mouse."

"I am Fang," cooed the snake. "Madam Fang to you, and I am not a mouse."

"Hello, Madam Fang," murmured Bright Eyes, wondering how to get rid of this unwanted visitor.

"I think I'll stay a while," said Madam Fang haughtily, slithering in a little further, completely blocking the entrance to the burrow.

"Whiskers will be home soon," Bright Eyes quivered.

"How nice," Madam Fang's smile became even wider. "He'll be just in time for lunch!"

She reared up. Her eyes, glowing like a pair of pale moons, seemed to fill the room. Bright Eyes shivered, unable to move or speak. Then with a loud swish Madam Fang swooped down on Bright Eyes and swallowed her whole. Bright Eyes kicked and struggled, but she was inside the snake, and the more she struggled, the deeper she slid down a horrible black tunnel that was squeezing the life out of her.

At that moment Whiskers was happily trotting home when he noticed something black and glistening protruding from his burrow. Tiny gold lights darted off it as it writhed and flicked.

Whiskers' blood ran cold. He dropped the food he was carrying and ran as fast as his legs would carry him toward the burrow.

"Bright Eyes! Bright Eyes!" he cried. But all he could see was the end of the snake's tail turning and flicking. The snake was obviously smacking itself on the ground, forcing something down that it had just swallowed. Whiskers leaped on the tail and sank his teeth into it.

Madam Fangs squealed as a shaft of pain traveled from the tip of her tail up her slender body and exploded in her head. She was being attacked from outside, while inside, the mouse was putting up a fight that really startled her. In a panic, she tried to pull her tail in, while her attacker was trying to drag her out.

"It must be the other mouse," thought Madam Fang. "I'll fix his wheels."

She whirled around only to realize that Bright Eyes made such a bulge in her body that she could no longer get through the narrow opening; Nor could she free her tail from her attacker's grip. Aside from the excruciating pain, her attacker was tearing off the lovely scales she was so proud of. She had to get out of there somehow, she thought desperately.

With tooth and nail, Whiskers tore the scales off the snake's tail and sank his teeth into the flesh. Madam Fangs was shaken by a great spasm of pain. Her jaws flew open, and Bright Eyes plopped out. Madam Fangs gazed at her prey dully. She opened her jaws to swallow the mouse again, but something else was attacking her now. The Rooster, seeing Whiskers' brave efforts, had joined the fray, pecking at the snake's tail with all his might. Madam Fangs was really alarmed, for her attackers were dragging her out of the burrow.

Whiskers darted past her to comfort Bright Eyes, who was dazed and bedraggled but none the worse for wear. Madam Fangs, however, found herself gazing into the Rooster's angry red face.

"It was a mistake," she tried to explain, glancing at her damaged tail out of the corner of her eye. "I'll be on my way now."

She tried to sidle away, but the Rooster shook his head menacingly, blocking her way. The hens, who were never far from him, closed ranks behind him.

"Oh dear! Oh dear!" thought Madam Fang. "What a pickle I'm in!"

Running feet were approaching, and the chickens drew back. Madam Fangs breathed a sigh of relief: which quickly turned to horror. A very large human loomed over her with a broomstick raised ready to strike.

"Don't harm it," she heard a soft, musical human voice say.

"Oh, all right!" grumbled the large one. "Just the same, I don't like snakes. Particularly not in your garden."

With a swipe of his broom, the pet sent Madam Fangs flying through the garden gate to land with a loud plop in a muddy ditch on the other side of the road. The snake lay quite still until the world around her stopped spinning. Nervously, Madam Fangs looked about. She was filthy and smelly. Her beautiful tail, not to mention her pride, was in tatters.

"Nobody must see me in this state," she told herself. When she was sure nobody was watching, she slinked away.

"Oh, Whiskers," hiccuped Bright Eyes, "I was ever so frightened."

"I can't leave you a moment without you getting into trouble," scolded Whiskers, trying to sound stern, but really relieved that Bright Eyes was safe.

"Oh, Whiskers," said Bright Eyes after a while. "I don't like it here anymore. Can we go back to our old place?"

"After all my trouble!" cried Whiskers. "I thought you wanted sunlight and fresh air and flowers and all that!"

"Please, Whiskers," begged Bright Eyes. "I promise to be careful … I promise …"

Whiskers grinned and stroked his mustaches.

"I'll think about it. I'll think about it," he said.

6

Wang Fu had fished the same stretch of the Li River all his life. After an unusually long wet season a dozen years ago, the river changed course. The fish stock dropped so alarmingly that most of the fishers moved with the river while others took up another trade. Wang Fti did neither.

"You are so stupid and stubborn!" his wife complained.

Wang Fu nodded dully. The best way of shutting her up, he discovered, was agreeing with her. But his wife was in no mood to be put off.

"Liu San is learning to be a carpenter," his wife dinned in his ear. "But you! You're shiftless. Why don't you go further downstream instead of trying to catch fish where there aren't any!"

That was not true. Wang Fu would not go on fishing the same stretch of river if there weren't any fish. It was merely that their numbers had dwindled. Also, Wang Fu was careful not to take more than he needed to support his wife and himself Neither did he keep young fish that would mature and propagate their own kind. Thus, he eked out a frugal living. However, he had not caught a thing five nights in a row.

"Oh, what a trial this man is!" wailed Wang Fu's wife, rolling her eyes to heaven. "We shall starve!"

"It will be better tonight," mumbled Wang Fu.

"Better!" That word set his wife off again.

Wang Fu's wife did a quick sum in her head. She had carefully secreted a few strings of coins under a loose brick in her kang, but that was for her old age. If Wang Fu's luck did not change, they would be in real difficulties! She ranted till she was quite red in the face, then flapping her arms like a disgruntled hen, retreated to her kitchen to vent her spleen on the pots and pans.

At dusk Wang Fu pulled on his cape woven out of reeds, gathered up the bundle of food his wife prepared for him, and headed for the river. On his way he stopped at the wine shop and bought a small jar of rice wine.

Wang Fu kept his bamboo raft lashed to an old sycamore that leaned over a large, flat rock on a sandbar in a sheltered elbow of the river. Once the river teemed with rafts, and the light of flaming torches bounced merrily off the rippling black surface of the water as night fell. Now only the wind in the trees, the rush of the river, and the cry of an occasional night bird broke the silence. He missed the laughter and the easy camaraderie with the other fishers, but his roots were here, and he was loath to leave it.

He lit a fire beside the flat rock. After he had made his raft and net ready, Wang Fu placed a small dish of food on the flat rock and sprinkled some wine around it. Then he clapped his hands thrice and banged his forehead three times on the ground.

"Oh, River God, accept these unworthy offerings," he prayed, "they are all I have. Bless my labors this night. I do not ask for more than enough to keep body and spirit together. Have mercy, O River God."

He got on his raft and poled it to the middle of the river. Shining his weight from side to side, he nosed the craft into the current, which carried it toward the next bend in the river. There he lit a torch fixed to the raft's prow and cast his net. Sometimes he did not have to wait long for the fish to rise. That night, like the five nights before, his net filled with weeds that grew beneath the surface of the water. He poled the raft back to his camp with a heavy heart. Patiently he picked off the weeds and lay them out on the rock to dry beside the fire. They would eat water weeds the next day, he thought grimly. Then he went back to the river to try again.

Close to dawn Wang Fu returned exhausted but empty-handed. He tossed a handful of twigs on the embers of his fire and settled down to munch his food. It is cold in the hours before daybreak. Wang Fu was grateful for his reed cape and the jar of wine to help ward off the growing feeling of despair. Had there not been a moon he might not have noticed a man gliding soundlessly through the underbrush. It's probably a traveler, thought Wang Fu as he snuggled into his reed cape waiting for sleep.

A few nights later he saw the man again, sitting on a log near his camp. Wang Fu could tell by his long, flowing robe that he was a gentleman. With little imagination and no curiosity, Wang Fu quickly lost interest. That night he had cast his net twice, and twice pulled in nothing but weeds. All he could think about was cleaning his net and setting out again.

Nevertheless, Wang Fu felt the man's gaze on his back as he worked, and it made him uneasy.

"Excuse me if I don't stop to chat," he said without turning around. "A man has to make a living, and I'm not having much luck tonight."

As he carefully plucked the weeds tangled in his net, he wondered whether he had somehow offended the River God. Perhaps his offerings were too meager for what he took from the river. That thought sent a quiver of dismay rippling through him. What would become of him if the River God refused him fish? The river was not only his livelihood, it allowed him to be his own man. Wang Fu could not bear the thought of living like poor Liu San, who couldn't call his soul his own since he apprenticed himself to a carpenter.

"There are fish in the river, if you go about it the right way," a voice cut across his thoughts.

Wang Fu dropped his net and peered into the dark. The firelight was in his eyes, and all he could make out were the tips of a pair of thick-soled shoes. Wang Fu leaped to his feet.

"What … what …" he stammered.

"I startled you," the stranger smiled reassuringly. "I think I might be able to help." Wang Fu started to say something, but the other gently cut him off.

"Let me explain."

At close range the man looked older than Wang Fu had thought. Indeed, his gown was longer than gentlemen of his class wore nowadays. With the tip of his finger the stranger traced a curved line in the sand.

"Let's say this is the river," he began. "We are here," he made an X to mark the place, "and this is where the fish are." He pointed at another spot, pausing while his last remark sank in. "You must go to the fish because they won't come to you."

Wang Fu's chin dropped to his chest. He had never been farther down the river than the next bend.

"But they've always come up here!" Wang Fu insisted, doggedly staring at the crude map in the sand.

"They won't any more," said the gentleman with certainty.

"Why?" Wang Fu searched the other's face.

"Maybe they're bored. Fish need to be treated as intelligent creatures too," was the reply.

Wang Fu never doubted the intelligence of fish. Sometimes he was not sure of his own.

"Take me on the river, and I will show you," said the gentleman with a wink.

"I can't do that," Wang Fu muttered, and his shoulders sagged. "Couldn't you just tell me what to do?"

Fixing Wang Fu with a piercing gaze, the other quickly stripped down to a loin cloth.

"Now we are equal," he chortled. "Come!"

There was nothing for Wang Fu to do except scramble after him. The stranger untied the raft and poled it expertly into the stream, as familiar with the river as if he had been born to it. He knew where every rock, tree stump, or root lay treacherously under the surface, ready to shred the flimsy craft. The river narrowed. Its murmur became an excited babble. They skimmed along faster and faster.

Wang Fu clung to the edges of the raft until his knuckles were white and numb, his teeth chattering with fright. He had never been this far down the river before. The stranger, however, shifted his weight easily with each swell, laughing up at the star-speckled sky. It seemed an eternity before the river broadened, becoming peaceful again. The stranger unlashed the paddles tied to the sides.

"We'll row a little ways," he said, "then you light the torch and cast your net."

Being told what to do did not sit well with Wang Fu. Nevertheless, something about the stranger's tone compelled him to do as he was told. Presently the stranger put up his paddle. They had come to a place where Wang Fu could not touch bottom with his pole.

"Cast when I tell you," said the stranger. Next moment, he slipped off the raft and disappeared into the shiny, black water.

All the blood rushed to Wang Fu's head. What if he drowned! Just as Wang Fu decided to flee that place, the stranger's head broke the surface a few hundred yards ahead.

"Cast!" he shouted.

Wang Fu obeyed as if in a trance. The stranger disappeared again. Suddenly the water in front of the raft was churning as fish raced toward the spot where he had cast his net. In a great sweat, Wang Fu began hauling it in, arms, legs, and back straining against the weight, heart pumping so hard that he thought it would pop out of his chest. Finally the net was secured, and the river was calm.

In the excitement, he had forgotten his companion. With wildly trembling hands Wang Fu trimmed his torch and waved it this way and that, anxiously probing the dark. There was no sign of the man. The thought that he might have drowned set Wang Fu's teeth chattering again. He wanted to leave that dark stretch of river, but somehow he could not move. Just then a rustle of movement made him turn to the shore. There, at the river's edge, stood the stranger. With a great effort Wang Fu found his voice and shouted,

"Hey! Hey! I thought you drowned!"

The other replied with a clear, ringing laugh.

"Wait! I'll come in for you!" cried Wang Fu, reaching for a paddle.

"No!" the stranger called back as he slipped into the trees beyond.

"Hey!" shouted Wang Fu, "Wait!"

"Go back!" came the reply.

"I haven't even thanked you!" cried Wang Fu, but the stranger had already vanished.

That night's haul was the biggest and the best of Wang Fu's entire life. The next night before he went down to the river, he demanded a few extra coins from his wife for some good wine for the River God.

"River God!" scoffed his wife. "It's my prayers to the Kitchen God that turned things round."

For once, Wang Fu stood up to his wife.

"I earned the money," he reminded her, "and I'm going to spend some of it the way I choose!" The look on his face so startled the wife that she gave Wang Fu the coins he demanded.

"You make sure the River God gets the wine," she yelled after him.

That night after he had made his offering to the River God and prepared to set out, the stranger came strolling by.

"Hey!" shouted Wang Fu, flapping his arms to attract his attention.

"Hey!" the stranger waved back, "I've come to fish with you."

The stranger took charge as he did the night before. Again they came back with a good haul. Afterward, as the two sat by the fire to rest, Wang Fu shyly unwrapped his meager bundle of food.

"It's only fresh leeks and pancakes," he said, "but my woman always puts sesame oil in her pancakes."

The stranger tore off a chunk and chewed it with obvious enjoyment. Wang Fu poured some wine into a bowl and handed it to him.

"No, thank you," the stranger demurred, though his eyes brimmed with longing.

"Don't stand on ceremony," insisted Wang Fu. "There's enough for the two of us."

"No thank you," the stranger replied with infinite sadness.

Wang Fu was abashed.

"I … I … was … only trying to be friendly," he muttered miserably. "You've been so helpful driving the fish into my net … and … I have no way to thank you …"

The stranger clapped him on the shoulder.

"I had fun!" he chortled. "That's enough."

From then on Wang Fu and the stranger fished together. It never occurred to Wang Fu to ask his name or where he lived, nor was it volunteered. The stranger would not touch any part of the money Wang Fu made.

"I have no need for money," the stranger said, "but I will ask two favors. You must never tell anyone about me, or where you fish."

Wang Fu nodded.

Months passed. One night when they met by the river, the stranger seemed preoccupied, not his usual ebullient self Wang Fu was concerned.

"Maybe you shouldn't go on the river tonight," he suggested.

"Nonsense," the other responded. "A bit of exercise will do me good." However, he was moodily silent all the way down the river to their usual destination.

"You haven't told anyone about this place, have you?" the stranger suddenly asked.

"No!" exclaimed Wang Fu, eyes wide. For the moment the stranger busied himself making fast the raft. Then, turning, he said,

"Wang Fu, you drive tonight and I'll cast."

Wang Fu had wanted to try his hand at driving the fish for some time but never had the courage to suggest it. Now he leaped at the chance.

"Why, I'll be glad to!" he cried, but something in the stranger's face—or was it a trick of flickering torch light—gave Wang Fu pause.

He shook it out of his head, filled his lungs with air, and dived into the water. He went down the way the stranger told him. His weightless body glided easily through the black silence, guided by the light of the torch, glowing like a dozen fractured moons high above. He moved in rhythm with a strange music that seemed to swell around him, pulling him ever deeper until he became one with the river. His movements became slower and slower until they stopped. Calmly he watched air bubbles rising slowly to the surface. A joy so complete engulfed him that all he wanted was to sit at the bottom of the river, surrounded by the music of the deep. Slimy green weeds stealthily creeping up his legs shocked him out of his reverie. Frantically he tore at them, but the harder he tugged, the stronger the weeds kept him anchored. He tried to scream for help, but he had no voice. The lights dancing high above flickered and went out.

Wang Fu came to, face down on the familiar sandbar. A strong pair of hands kneading his shoulders and back made him retch until he was empty.

"Thank you for saving my life," Wang Fu gasped, instinctively knowing it was the stranger leaning over him. "I am … even more … in your … debt."

"Don't be too hasty to thank me," said the stranger. With a great effort Wang Fu turned over to gape blankly at his friend.

"You will understand, presently." The stranger's shoulders sagged with weariness. He covered Wang Fu with his reed cape, and threw a handful of sticks onto the fire.

"Once there was a young daredevil," the stranger's voice sounded strangely hollow. "He wasn't a bad person. Just high-spirited and thoughtless. He liked wine more than he should, and when he was in his cups did silly things. That year the rains didn't stop when they should. The river was rising, ready to flood. He should have been helping the townsfolk pile sandbags along the bank. Instead, this young man was in a tavern playing drinking games with his friends. They were all quite drunk," the stranger sighed ruefully. "By that time, the river was cresting. Someone suggested going down to watch it flood. One of the group offered to give a feast for anyone who dared cross the river by an old wooden bridge that stood swaying over the raging waters. The young man, who was always game for a dare, scrambled onto it. Before he was halfway across, the pilings gave way, sending the bridge crashing down.

"The young man was swept into the Underworld. The Lord of Shades would not accept him before his time, so he sent the young man to the River God. The River God felt vaguely responsible, but the young man had not completed his life's tasks. Neither had he fulfilled his obligations nor realized his potential in the world of the living. Consequently, the River God condemned him to wander until he could lure someone to a watery death to take his place …"

The stranger fell silent.

The two men faced each other without a word. Wang Fu was the first to break the silence with a shudder of recognition.

"How long has it been?" he asked.

"A century is a blink of an eye," replied the other. "Being stuck between two worlds is terrible, so I had to find a substitute," confessed the stranger. "I watched you a long time, before I went to work. First I kept the fish away. Then I pretended to be your friend. Finally I tricked you into diving …"

"I don't have much to live for," muttered Wang Fu recalling that moment of rapture at the bottom of the river. "Why did you bring me back?"

"You trusted me, gave me the unconditional friendship that I never experienced before in your world," said the stranger. "That's why I couldn't let you die. Rest. I will trouble you no more."

With that, he vanished into the night.

Wang Fu slept without dreams. At dawn he woke, and having given thanks to the River God for his bounty, trudged off to market with his haul. At the end of the morning, he went home with his empty baskets slung on his back. As usual his wife was waiting at the door with her hand out. As usual he dropped his purse in it without a word.

Wang Fu's life did not change visibly, yet nothing was the same. For a short time he had a friend who shared his labor and his simple food. Now that friend was gone, and Wang Fu was the poorer for it. He fished, alone as he used to. Often he thought of the deep pool the stranger showed him. He longed for its inviting indigo darkness. Most of all he yearned for the strange, haunting music and the wonderful lightness of being. Since he could not bring himself to go there, he went back to the meager catches he hauled in from his familiar stretch of river.

"You lazy, good-for-nothing!" his wife badgered. "If I were a man, I would show you a thing or two!"

"Maybe you can, anyway," Wang Fu snapped back. "I could have—"

"Could have what?" shouted the wife, arms folded across her chest.

His wife's scorn drove him back to the deep pool. Wang Fu fastened his raft to the stump of a half-submerged tree jutting out of the water. He did not light the torch. Darkness enveloped him in its velvety embrace. The river lapped invitingly against the raft. Weariness and fear fell away. Peace was only inches from the tips of his toes. A voice hailed him just as he was about to slip into the dark water.

"Hey! Is that you?" cried Wang Fu excitedly.

"Who else?" the stranger guffawed out of the dark.

"I've missed you!" Wang Fu shouted, quickly lighting his torch. "Come closer, so I can see you."

"You can only see me if you leave your world," laughed the stranger. "The River God made me Guardian of the river because I couldn't let you die."

"I'm ready," retorted Wang Fu vehemently. "There is nothing to keep me here."

"Remember what happens to those who leave before their time." the stranger warned. "You must find the strength to endure."

Wang Fu gulped, his eyes suddenly misting.

"Stay where you belong," the stranger's voice rose from the river. "Each full moon, I will fish with you. Go now …"

"How will I know you if I can't see you?" Wang Fu spoke to the river.

His own voice bounced back out of the dark. Nothing more.

They say on nights of the full moon a dust devil would come whirling down the riverbank, and Wang Fu would follow it on his raft wherever it led. When he came ashore before sunrise his baskets would be brimming. Wang Fu's Dust Devil's catches soon became a local legend. When he was buried, a dust devil appeared over the grave and was seen skipping merrily down the river.

Near the place where there is believed to be a deep pool, it disappeared.

7

A stiff wind whipped the fine spring rain into swirling bluish gray mist. The barge appeared like a mirage behind the grunts and shouts of the boatmen on the towpath, dragging her up Chien Tang River. I knew it was Master Tang Hao the moment I set eyes on him, standing alone on the prow. He was a tall, spare man. A writing case slung over one shoulder made an ungainly bulge under his long, gray cloak. A pathetic bundle of belongings lay at his feet. As I picked my way down the slippery embankment to the quay, the barge dropped anchor, and passengers swarmed ashore.

For a moment I lost sight of my master's guest. I found him at the edge of the dock, deep in thought. I hurried over to him, babbling a welcome speech on behalf of my Master that I had memorized the night before.

"I have a carriage waiting," I pointed up the embankment, and snatching the bundle from his hand, quickly proceeded up the slope. Master Tang squished along behind me. Finally, we were settled in the carriage and the driver urged the horse into a lazy clip-clop.

My Master's annual instructions concerning his various properties in Hangzhou arrived as usual on the second day of the new year. He is a meticulous man who leaves nothing to chance. As estate agent, I was expected to execute his orders precisely, and report twice a year. Otherwise, my reclusive Master did not wish to be disturbed. I had worked for him almost a decade, but it was the first time that the villa on West Lake was mentioned.

"You are to reopen Lakeside Villa. Make it livable by the first day of the third month," my Master wrote. "However, the east wing of the main courtyard must remain sealed. Master Tang Hao, a scholarly gentleman, who is recovering from a lengthy illness, will take up residence there for an unspecified duration. He requires rest and tranquillity. You are to engage a reliable servant to see to his comfort. Lay in provisions in keeping with hospitality, without being extravagant." He gave detailed instructions as to which of his accounts kept with local merchant houses were to be used.

"I leave everything to your discretion," he concluded. "Master Tang has the run of the villa with the exception of the aforementioned east wing."

The last sentence was written in bold characters for emphasis.

I stole a glance at Master Tang Hao. In answer to my solicitude, he murmured a few words, whose inflection betrayed the fact he was not a native of our province and probably learned our dialect out of necessity. The brevity of his response showed he did not wish conversation, so we rode in silence.

Lao Liu, the general factotum I hired to oversee Master Tang's needs, had lit a brazier in the main room. Pine cones and needles laid over glowing coals filled the air with a resinous warmth. Having shown Master Tang his quarters, I left, promising to return in a day or two. However, he was to send Lao Liu to me if he required anything at all.

In all the years I have served him, I have never met my Master or any of his clan. The family had been prominent merchants of Hangzhou for generations, until they suddenly quit the city a dozen years ago. Rumors were rife at the time but died after a while, as they generally do. My Master, who inherited the family fortune soon after, lived in the capital. The others scattered to the four winds. None ever returned. Although Lakeside Villa is listed on the register of my Master's holdings, he never mentioned it. Since he did not tolerate questions, I did not inquire.

Opening the villa, however, proved to be more difficult than I expected. Roof and windows had to be repaired or replaced. A coat of paint was required inside and out. Rooms had to be aired, furniture cleaned and made serviceable. Finding men willing to work there was a problem.

"Unspeakable things were done in that house," the elder of a nearby village growled at me balefully. "Evil never dies."

"What are you talking about!" I bristled.

"Ask your master," the old man rubbed his hands together as though he were washing them and stalked away.

In spite of fear and superstition, I hired a crew by offering outrageous wages. However, nothing would induce workers to stay the moment the shadows lengthened in the afternoon. Nevertheless, the job was done according to my Master's wishes. I persuaded Lao Liu, who cooked for the work crew, to stay on. He went from town to town picking up whatever work he could, and the job meant a roof over his head and three squares a day for as long as Master Tang stayed.

A week or ten days passed before I visited the villa again. I found its tenant dozing in the courtyard. Even in sleep he looked haggard. The fine bones of nose and cheeks were almost visible under the pasty, translucent skin. The eyes were sunken and black rimmed. The only touch of color was in the full-lipped mouth. The long-fingered hands folded on his lap were thick-veined, strong, and callused, unlike the soft, ineffectual hands of a scholar. His clothes, though well kept, were years out of fashion. Round his neck he wore an amber amulet carved in the shape of dragon and phoenix entwined. There was something oddly poignant about that ornament, for half was missing. The state of his shoes showed he walked more often than he rode. Master Tang was probably another failed candidate of the Imperial Civil Service Examinations, in search of a patron. My Master had a soft spot for genteel vagrants.

Master Tang snapped awake, instantly alert. He greeted me without rising. Nor did he offer me the empty chair. After the usual pleasantries, I asked if his quarters were satisfactory.

"Yes, yes," he replied with a wave of the hand. "Except one thing."

Then he told me about the night singer.

"Night singer?" I echoed.

"I hear her late at night," explained Master Tang Hao, "from over there."

I followed his gaze to the sealed east wing that looked forlorn in contrast to the rest of the courtyard. Nothing had been done to it since it was not to be used.

"You must have heard a nocturnal bird," I said, reeling off the names of a few common night-warblers.

"One that also plays the lute," Master Tang shot back sarcastically.

"Or, you might have—"

"Dreamed it," Master Tang snatched the words right out of my mouth. "That might have been the case before; but I'm much better now … much better."

I leaped at the opening to broach the question that was uppermost in my mind.

"What was the matter?" I asked, weighing my words with sympathy. Master Tang Hao dismissed the question with an impatient gesture. Taking another tack I asked,

"Does the singing disturb you?"

There was a faraway look on his face when he said,

"A woman singing, accompanying herself on the lute is very … soothing."

I was sufficiently intrigued to bring it up with Lao Liu.

"Night singer!" croaked Lao Liu in his curious raspy voice. "Why, he accused me of getting drunk and singing late at night! His nibs apologized later." He tapped his temple and winked significantly.

"Were you drinking?" I asked, for I smelled cheap liquor on his breath.

"Just a tiny drop," he rasped. "This place gives me the creeps. But I swear on my ancestors' bones, there isn't any 'Night Singer.' If there was, I would have heard it, wouldn't I?"

I decided the night singer was nothing more than a figment of Master Tang's imagination.

A few days later Lao Liu carne to me in great excitement. That afternoon I rode out to the villa. Master Tang Hao had broken into the east wing. I found the double doors had been pried open, and roughly secured again with a piece of firewood thrust through the looped door handles. Master Tang Hao, who was writing in the main room, waved me into a chair, while his brush glided in a swift, continuous movement down the page. When he looked up I was struck by the change in him. The black circles round the eyes were gone, and so was the haunted look in their depths.

"It's a new poem! I've found my muse again!" he crowed, obviously pleased with himself.

I dragged my mind back to the reason for my visit and stated my business as solemnly as I could. Master Tang heard me out with an amused smile. Realizing I was not making an impression, I blustered,

"I shall have to inspect the rooms, and ascertain—"

Next moment, Master Tang was dragging me to the east wing. As he flung the door open, the rancid smell of disuse smote me in the face. Part of what must have been an antechamber had been crudely walled up, leaving a long, narrow space, bare except for a ruined scroll hanging on the facing wall. It would appear a mischievous child had gone over it with ink and brush. However, the black swirls that covered it had such vitality, it seemed to throb with life. I was mesmerized; lost in a tangle of black tentacles that seemed to reach out for me.

"The Night Singer is in there," Master Tang whispered in my ear. His hand made wild swirling motions in the air.

"Those brambles imprison her."

I blinked hard to rid myself of the tangled black lines that weaved and danced before my eyes. I stumbled out of the room, leaving Master Tang gazing fixedly at the scroll, humming a tune under his breath. For a moment in that stuffy room I was taken in. However, in the light of day, I knew it was just a ruined painting that conjured up strange ideas in a diseased mind. I feared Master Tang was mad. I must make him leave before he does any real damage, I thought.

A handful of coins persuaded Lao Liu to keep an eye on our guest and to report anything out of the ordinary. A few days later Lao Liu came to me with a note. Master Tang Hao requested me to purchase five or six exotic herbs, a clay pot, and several calligraphy brushes of various sizes.

"It is imperative I have these materials as soon as possible," he wrote.

I had to scour the apothecary shops and the stationers of Hangzhou to assemble everything on the list. However, a particularly fine brush Master Tang asked for eluded me. Fate must have guided me to a dingy stationer's shop in the old part of town.

"I might have such a brush somewhere," the shopkeeper murmured, surveying his unkempt premises. He bustled about, opening and shutting cupboards, foraging in mysterious drawers, clucking, and muttering to himself

"I used to bring in this type of brush for a particular customer," said he from behind a partition where I could hear him moving boxes. "A talented young lady who wrote and sang poetry in Soong dynasty style. She wasn't rich, but this is the only type of brush she used. She had such a fine hand that I sometimes let her pay with pieces of calligraphy."

Presently he emerged with a slender box lined with silk on which was nestled a brush whose reddish horse hair tip was fashioned into a bulb ending in a needle-fine point.

"The lady who ordered it was called Xiaoyu—Jade of the Dawn," he prattled. "She was a lovely little thing! Her father sold her as a concubine to the oldest son of a wealthy merchant."

He shook his head and sighed.

The next afternoon I went to the villa with my purchases. Lao Liu greeted me like a fellow conspirator.

"He's in the east wing," he whispered.

I found Master Tang Hao seated cross-legged on the floor, gazing at the ruined scroll. At first he was oblivious of me, then, with a shudder, he came to.

"Have you got the things?" he cried without preliminaries.

I handed over my parcel. He unwrapped it, muttering, "yes … yes …" at each item. His excitement gave me goose pimples. When he had examined everything, he smiled, and it seemed a shaft of sunlight touched his face.

"My lady will be pleased," he breathed.

My ears pricked up. My Master had given run of the villa to him but to no one else. This may be my excuse to rid myself of my Master's peculiar guest.

"Who is the lady?" I asked.

"Lady Xiaoyu, who sings to me in the night," replied Master Tang, with a strange gleam in his eye.

That moment we seemed to inhabit different spheres. It was the second time I heard that name in as many days. Was it coincidence, or had I stumbled onto something beyond my ken?

An inexplicable curiosity compelled me to examine some old ledgers the previous estate agent had left me. I kept turning pages until I came upon the words “Lakeside Villa.” The entry, dated a dozen years earlier, showed bricks, mortar, plaster, whitewash, and tools had been purchased for work done on the east wing. However, there was no record of artisans’ wages. Instead, half a dozen male servants were given sizable stipends and sent to the family’s holdings in distant provinces a few days later. A winding sheet was also purchased without a coffin. Indeed, there was no mention of a funeral. During the same period horses, wagons, and several carriages were acquired, consistent with the family uprooting itself soon after. There the accounts for the villa ended.

A sixth sense drove me back to the villa. It was after nightfall. Lao Liu opened the gate, waved me in the direction of the east wing and scurried for the kitchen, hands clapped over his ears. I followed him.

“What’s going on?” I hissed shaking him by the shoulder.

“Don’t you hear her singing?” whimpered Lao Liu, a wild look on his face.

All I heard was the wind in the trees and the soft lapping of the lake against the shore.

“It’s driving me mad!” groaned Lao Liu. “I won’t stay any longer!” Between chattering teeth he told me how Master Tang Hao had brewed his herbs and applied the liquid to the mysterious painting.

“Slowly those brambles, or whatever he calls them, melted away.” Lao Liu’s tone was filled with wonder. “Then I heard her singing …”

The door and windows of the east wing were wide open, and the light of the waxing moon flooded the room. Master Tang Hao sat before the scroll; an ecstatic smile lit his face. The black lines that obliterated the painting were gone, except for a few tenacious tendrils clinging to the corners. An ethereal young woman gazed out of it, lips slightly parted as if about to sing. One slender hand cradled a lute while the other plucked its strings. In the uncertain light I thought the artist had painted something that appeared to be a fragment of a charm hanging from her neck. Though I had never seen the portrait before, the feeling of recognition made me shudder. I seemed to hear the lady’s voice, barely audible, but warm and insistent. My inner self strained after her words.

“You hear her too,” breathed Master Tang Hao without moving. His words jolted me back to reality. Even as I denied anything of the sort, I felt the eyes in the portrait fixed upon me. The lady’s voice sounding in my brain filled me with exquisite pain. Master Tang Hao’s eyes were on fire when he added,

“She will be free when the moon is full!”

I felt I was drowning. With a huge effort I propelled myself out of the room and fled.

That night I rooted through my Master’s papers. In a bundle of correspondence bearing his father’s seal were a number of letters from Wang Xin, a marriage broker, concerning the acquisition of a concubine for my Master. The young lady in question was the beautiful and talented daughter of a cultured family who had fallen on hard times. There was an impediment. The girl had already been promised to another. However, the father, who was in desperate straits, was willing to overlook certain niceties for a price.

Negotiations dragged on. The Old Master doted on his son. So gifts of money, silks, jewels, and even a small house were made to one Wu Tiansiang as a marriage portion for his daughter Xiaoyu.

There it was again! Xiaoyu! I was delving into matters I instinctively felt should be left alone, yet I was powerless to desist.

Wu Tiansiang’s house was not hard to find, but the family had moved away a long time ago.

“He fancied himself a gentleman, with all the airs and graces,” a neighbor who spoke to me sneered. “But he sold his daughter to the highest bidder. They say the girl tried to escape the rich man’s villa on the lake with her betrothed. Something went wrong—”

He paused. I slipped him a few coins and he continued.

“The young man hired a boat for the night, which he would row himself. There’s nothing unusual about that, except the boat was found capsized the next morning and there was no sign of the young man. There was gossip he had been killed.”

“Wasn’t there an inquiry?” I asked.

“What for?” the man answered my question with one of his own. “They say he was from out of province, one of hundreds who came for the civil service examinations. Without money or connections who would bother! Nevertheless, the rich man pulled up stakes soon afterward. Then Wu Tiansiang quietly sold his house and left too.”

I seemed to have reached a dead end.

I thought of the marriage broker. Wang Xin had also gone from the place where he used to live. The family was reticent. However, when I mentioned my Master's name, a gleam of interest flashed in the eyes of a nephew.

"My uncle has lived in a monastery for the last ten years," he volunteered. A few coins and he supplied its name. The look in the man's eyes told me nothing more was forthcoming.

Master Wang Xin was one of several old men who lived in the monastery and did menial tasks in exchange for food, shelter, tranquillity, and a decent burial when he dies. The monk who pointed him out working in the garden said,

"We believe he is possessed. By day he is silent, but he sings at night. Always the same tune." He murmured a blessing and withdrew.

Master Wang Xin's face was as wrinkled and dry as a prune. At first he showed neither interest nor surprise at my presence. Suddenly something flickered behind those opaque black eyes. Out of the blue he said,

"He couldn't win Xiaoyu's heart, so he had her portrait painted to enslave her soul." He leaned close to me and whispered,

"That night he was supposed to be away, and the other was coming for her in a boat." For a moment his attention wandered. Then he added,

"Only he never got there." Wang Xin grabbed me by the collar and hissed in my face,

"He was killed!"

"By whom?" I stammered.

"The one you work for," he said quite distinctly. "The girl's father got wind of the plan and told me, and I told your master. I needed money!" His face crumpled into a grotesque mass of crisscrossed lines.

"He walled her up alive in his ancestral shrine. Then he destroyed her portrait so that her soul will never rest in peace."

Wang Xin's eyes went blank. He had forgotten me.

It was a long ride back to the city. I stopped for a jug of wine to calm my nerves. It was dark when I left the tavern. The flower-scented night was pleasant, and I was in no hurry. As I clopped along, the full moon rose. Between the trees a sliver of West Lake gleamed in the distance. Suddenly Master Tang Hao's mysterious remark came back to me. I dug my heels into the horse and galloped toward the lake.

The villa was completely dark, but the gate was open. I shouted for Lao Liu. There was no answer. The door to the kitchen had been torn from its hinges. Inside, smashed furniture and utensils were strewn about, evidence of a fierce fight. The struggle had clearly continued across the courtyard, for I stumbled over a sleeve torn from a cotton tunic like the one Lao Liu wore.

I ran to the east wing. A peculiar stain, like the shadow of another person, defaced Xiaoyu's portrait. A sickening smell of decay came from a hole smashed through the facing wall. I covered my nose and mouth and peered through the opening. Inside was a crumbling ancestral shrine. Shreds of a linen winding sheet and a lute lay in the dust. What else I glimpsed has been blotted from my mind.

Sounds of movement outside startled me but no one was there. I sprinted out the gate and down the path to the lake. Master Tang Hao was poling a skiff away from the shore. A veiled woman sat in its prow. I started to call out to them, but my voice froze in my throat. The woman turned, and as she lifted her veil a cloud drifted across the moon, plunging us in momentary darkness. When it passed, the lake shimmered smooth as glass.

The following morning an overturned boat was found floating on the lake. Nearby, tangled in weeds at the bottom were the skeletons of a man and woman locked in eternal embrace. They crumbled into dust when they were brought to the surface. Each wore half of an amber pendant.

I closed the villa, and my Master accepted my explanation for Tang Hao's departure without comment.

I thought things would be the way they used to be, but that is not the case.

In the dark hour before dawn, I hear a raspy, faraway voice singing a tune imbedded deep in my consciousness. Every note pushes me closer to the edge. There is no escape. I will have to go back to Lakeside Villa.

But not today. Not today …

8

Li Shu leaned back in his chair and tilted his face to the sun streaming through a high window. Behind his tight shut lids, molten globes of light sent rivulets of warmth coursing through his frame. He shuddered as knots of tension in bone and muscle began to unravel. Little sounds filtered through his drowsing brain, detached and far away. For the moment he was at peace.

Lady Chan, seated at her desk across the room, glanced up from the pile of bills and invoices she was scrutinizing as her husband shifted position. A shadow of concern passed briefly across her face. Satisfied that he was comfortable, she returned to her work. The gallery where she sat afforded a clear view of the bustling general store below, while an ornate screen hid her from those she observed. It was widely known, though never publicly acknowledged, that Lady Chan not only ruled Li Shu's household but ran his business as well. For Li Shu was a clever but indolent young man who would have run it into the ground.

Since his marriage five years ago, his wife brought order if not purpose into Li Shu's life. Under her stewardship, the business prospered. Lady Chan prided herself on knowing who her customers were and anticipating their needs. Furthermore, she knew her staff. A new broom sweeps clean. She quickly weeded out the flatterers and the panderers who buzzed around her husband like bluebottle flies around a honey pot and sent them packing. The rest she won over with her sincerity, her fairness, and her acumen. Her husband had to admit she ran the business better than he ever could.

Hovering between sleeping and waking, a pair of almond-shaped eyes, upward tilted at the corners, floated to the surface of Li Shu's consciousness. Like a reflection in water they beckoned, remote yet tantalizing. He sighed. His wife across the room looked up again.

Lady Chan knew her husband well. The trouble with Li Shu was that he was unfocused. He took the Imperial Civil Servants' Examination but failed to distinguish himself Then he tried painting, for which he had shown some promise. His doting parents had given him a studio in a quiet lane on the other side of town and stocked it with everything an artist needed. For a time, Li Shu went there every day, but he did not produce anything worthwhile. Most of the time was frittered away, in the company of other would-be artists and poets, waiting for a bolt of inspiration to strike. When Lady Chan married him, she knew full well she was not sought after for her beauty or the size of her dowry. It was the qualities she possessed, which Li Shu lacked, that made her the ideal mate for the heir to the family business. She married without illusions, but she was captivated by Li Shu's beauty and easy-going charm and soon came to love him passionately.

Often when Nanny was combing her hair at bedtime, Lady Chan would ask,

"Nanny, have I been a good wife?"

The old servant, who had come with her as a bride, pursed her lips and murmured something inaudible.

"Nanny?"

"Just keep asking," the old woman replied, not missing a stroke.

Lady Chan was asking herself that same question now, but never with more uncertainty. Ever since the last rent day a month ago, she sensed a change in Li Shu. He was usually home from the country by nightfall. That time he did not return until the following morning, weary and out of sorts. When she inquired where he had been, he was short with her for the first time in their married life.

"A man has the right to spend time with friends without having to account for every moment!" he shouted.

The rent money he turned over to her was short.

"I spent some," he said.

"On what, honored husband?" she pressed.

"This and that!" he flayed the air with his arms. "It doesn't matter."

"Oh, but it does," she countered. "The rent money belongs to the business."

"The business! The business!" he cried. "Can you think of nothing else? What about me?"

Those last words reverberated in her mind. In her zeal for her husband's financial well-being, had she lost sight of the man? That thought sent waves of dismay through her. She kept a well-ordered and comfortable home. She was attentive about Li Shu's likes and dislikes. She thought she had left no stone unturned where her husband's happiness was concerned. Evidently something was amiss. She would ask Nanny where she had gone wrong. Nanny always had an answer.

For once Nanny had no ready answer. If she did, she was reticent.

"Nanny!" Lady Chan's tone took on an impatient edge. The two women's eyes locked in the dressing table mirror. Nanny gave her mistress's long, glossy hair a tug before she applied her comb to it again.

"Nanny," Lady Chan softened. The old woman's mouth was pursed into a tight knot. It was a look that Lady Chan knew from childhood. Nanny would speak when she was good and ready. Lady Chan studied her own reflection as she waited. Hers was not an unpleasant face, but somewhat flat. Everything about it was round; the single-lidded eyes set too close together; the curved arches of the painted brows; the small, snub nose. In contrast with the rest, the wide, thin-lipped mouth seemed out of place. However, with her hair worn loose, her face did not seem quite as broad and plain. Surreptitiously, she essayed a smile, hoping Nanny would not notice.

But the old woman obviously did, for she gave her hair another tug and leaning close to her mistress's ear whispered,

"He has a person living in the studio."

Lady Chan's hands flew to her throat. The color drained from her cheeks one moment, and blazed the next. Nanny went on combing. With an effort Lady Chan asked Nanny's reflection,

"What person?"

"A female person," replied Nanny testily. "Young and quite pretty."

Lady Chan whirled about and seized Nanny's hand.

"How do you know?"

"I followed him," said Nanny. To justify herself she added, "He has been acting strangely ever since he came back from the country last rent day."

Her husband had indeed been behaving strangely. He was lethargic all day but seemed filled with feverish restlessness when the sun went down. He slipped out of the house as soon as the evening meal was over and did not crawl into bed until almost daybreak. He slept badly; grinding his teeth and muttering. Once or twice Lady Chan thought she heard him murmur in his sleep,

"M'lady … M'lady …"

She was touched, thinking he was dreaming of her. Now she wasn't sure.

Lady Chan examined her husband's face from across the room. He did not look well. Come to think of it, he had not looked well since she discovered the two tiny punctures on his neck.

"It's nothing," Li Shu had reassured her. "Probably some insect bite."

Nevertheless, he quickly pulled up his collar to hide them. As he slept with his head turned to one side exposing his neck, she could see quite plainly the punctures had not healed. In fact they were oozing, the flesh around them purplish and bruised.

Another sigh from the sleeper snapped Lady Chan out of her reverie. She cleared her throat just loud enough to wake Li Shu. He came to, dazed and disoriented.

"You were dreaming, honored husband," Lady Chan smiled with her lips, but her eyes quickly registered Li Shu's discomfiture. He mumbled something as he rearranged his robe, shifted his body in his chair, ready to doze again.

"Honored husband, the parchment you ordered has arrived," she said, holding up the bill.

Li Shu's eyes snapped wide. He knew Lady Chan was waiting for him to say something, but he didn't trust his voice.

"I would have ordered it for you, if you told me." There was an unmistakable note of reproach in Lady Chan's tone. "I will have it sent to the studio," she added.

"There's no need," Li Shu said quickly. "I will attend to it myself."

"One of the delivery boys can take it."

"I said I will attend to it myself!" Li Shu cut her short.

Their glances clashed. Li Shu was the first to look away.

"It's a present for a friend," he explained.

It was the opening she had been waiting for.

"Who is she?" asked Lady Chan.

His stricken look cut her to the quick. Li Shu ran his hand wearily across his face. There was a feeling of relief: now that the moment he had been dreading was upon him.

It was Indian summer and hot the day he rode out to the country to collect his rent. Li Shu was a city dweller for whom the countryside held no enchantment. The landscape behind a scrim of yellow dust was monotonous. The people were dirty and uncouth, always whining about their appalling living conditions, which he could do nothing about. His Steward used to do this chore until Lady Chan dismissed him because some of the rent money stuck to his pockets. Li Shu would have overlooked it, but Lady Chan had to make an example of the poor fellow. From then on rent collecting became his responsibility.

"A monthly excursion to the country would be a pleasant change, honored husband," Lady Chan was always reasonable. "Besides, a landlord must keep track, or those peasants will cheat him blind."

As usual he could not. fault her. Nevertheless, trips to the country were not his idea of a pleasant pastime, and he made sure his wife was aware of it.

"I shall have a special dinner prepared for you when you return," she said to mollify him, reeling off a list of his favorite foods. It would have been the same uneventful trip as usual if his horse hadn't lost a shoe on the way home. The village smithy had to be cajoled out of the tavern in the midst of a boisterous drinking game, to restart the fire and shoe the animal. Li Shu swallowed a few bowls of raw sorghum wine while he waited, which put him in a somnolent mood. Matching its master's humor, the horse ambled on at an easy pace, till, with a start, Li Shu noticed the shadows had grown long and the sun was rapidly dipping toward the horizon. The city gates would close for the night and he would be shut out if he didn't hurry. He urged the horse into a gallop. As he rounded a bend, a figure muffled in a long, black cloak darted across his path. The horse shied and would have thrown a less skillful rider. As it was, it took all Li Shu's strength and willpower to bring it to heel.

"Are you hurt, idiot?" Li Shu shouted angrily as he circled back.

A quivering mound of black cloth lay on the road, whimpering. The horse rolled its eyes and snorted, as the cloaked figure struggled to its feet.

"Are you hurt?" bellowed Li Shu. "I have no time to lose!"

The figure stood before him quivering without a word.

"Let's have a look at you."

With the tip of his whip Li Shu flicked aside the hood that hid the other's face. A pair of enormous almond-shaped eyes, tilted upward at the corners gazed up at him. The face, framed by glossy black hair, seemed to glow in the fading light. It was a face that he had never seen before, yet somehow he knew its every line. It was the most beautiful face he could ever hope to find. But it was the eyes that mesmerized him, that drew him into a whirlpool of unaccustomed emotions to which he abandoned himself without any scruples.

"Where are you going, unattended, so late in the day?" he asked gently.

The girl's lips parted as if to speak, but didn't. Instead, the eyes suddenly brimmed.

"Please don't cry," Li Shu stammered. "I didn't mean to be harsh back there. Are you hurt?"

"I'm all right," she murmured, burrowing into her cloak so that only her eyes showed. "Please go."

"I can't leave you here," he glanced quickly at the empty expanse around them. "The countryside is full of brigands. You'll never reach the city gates before they close."

"I'll be all right," said the girl from behind the folds of her cloak, fighting the quaver in her voice.

On an impulse, Li Shu reached down and swept her onto the saddle before him and spurred his horse into a gallop. She cried out and struggled at first. But he held her fast. Suddenly the fight went out of her, and she nestled against him like a captive bird. They rode in silence. Everything passed before Li Shu's eyes in a blur. A curious scent like bitter almonds sent the blood roaring through his veins. Every fiber in his body was singing. Never had he felt so alive. Instinct took him to the studio.

"And that is all?" Lady Chan asked equably.

Li Shu nodded, but the look on his face was like a knife thrust through her heart.

That night was a flashing kaleidoscope of sensations and emotions in which Li Shu drowned, died, and was reborn. Nervously he adjusted his collar to hide the two little punctures that were the marks of indescribable ecstasy. Through the ringing in his ears he heard Lady Chan say,

"Since this person is essential to my honored husband's happiness, she should be brought into the household. I shall make arrangements today."

"You mustn't," cried Li Shu. "She does not wish to be a part of anyone's household. She is like a … like a …" he fumbled for words.

"She is a butterfly that cannot be caged?" suggested Lady Chan.

She was so small, delicate, and beautiful that all Li Shu wanted was to hold her and protect her from whatever it was that made her take flight.

"I will stay if that is your wish," she had said with surprising resiliency and strength when they spoke of the future the morning after. "However, nothing in your life must change."

Li Shu started to protest, saying the studio was not a suitable place to live in. She countered by saying she would turn it into a place where he could take his ease whenever he wished. Besides; she was also an artist. Indeed, the pathetic bundle of clothes she carried also contained an ancient box of paints and brushes.

"They are the only things I value from the past," she murmured. She would not hear of formalizing their relationship.

"I must be free," she said, fixing Li Shu with her eyes. "Otherwise I shall die."

She came from a background of genteel poverty. Her father had sold her as a bride to the local warlord, known for his capricious cruelty. However, before she was delivered to her lord and master, she had escaped.

"So, she is a runaway," sighed Lady Chan, "and betrothed to the warlord, no less." She waved aside her husband's rebuttal. "We all know he is a monster, but do you realize the consequences of what you have done? When he finds her—and he will—he will kill the lot of us. Including your revered parents," she added for emphasis.

"What is her name?" Lady Chan was suddenly businesslike.

"I don't know," mumbled Li Shu reddening. It was the truth. When he asked her name, she replied,

"The name I was born with is dishonored. The one I am destined to bear, I despise. Therefore, I have no name."

"What shall I call you?" he whispered, cupping her face between his hands.

"Whatever you wish," she said. He thought a moment.

"I shall call you … M'lady."

He repeated it several times, rolling it off his tongue with infinite tenderness.

She laughed, and it was like the tinkling of a little silver bell.

Lady Chan stiffened. Her worst fear was confirmed. Her husband was smitten with the girl. But her voice was calm when she spoke again.

"For all our safety, she must leave the studio. Hide her where she can't be traced back to you."

"I will think about it," said Li Shu without much conviction. Inwardly he knew he would do nothing for the time being, no matter the consequences. For he noticed that M'lady had grown wan and listless.

"It's being cooped up," she said with a languid smile. "I wish I could walk about the streets in broad daylight like any ordinary person!"

"But you can!" cried Li Shu. "I shall accompany you, and no one will dare harm you. I promise!"

She shook her head.

"That will put you in danger. I couldn't bear it if harm came to you. I must go away."

Li Shu's heart lurched within him at those last words. Frantically I he cast about for something to relieve her boredom. He smacked his forehead, when he looked about him.

"You could paint here!" he cried. Eagerly he flung open cupboards and drawers to show her their contents. "Everything you need is here!" he cried. "Use them!"

"I have," she countered. "It's only a poor effort." Shyly she produced a small ink and brush sketch of Li Shu. He complimented her for the likeness, but when he begged to have it she refused.

"I did it for myself. That way a little of you remains with me when you are absent," she said. Seeing his crestfallen look she added,

"I will do one of myself before I go."

"You must not speak of leaving," cried Li Shu.

"But go I shall," she replied, stroking his cheek with her thin, birdlike hand. "It's inevitable. When I am gone the portrait will remind you of me."

Then taking a more cheerful tack, she asked him to buy her some parchment, as fine as human skin, for her portrait. She smiled, and the tiny greenish lights dancing in the depths of her eyes dazzled him so that he had to shut his own. A red mist engulfed him that left him chilled to the bone, weary, and disoriented when it receded. He remembered vaguely writing an order for the parchment before stumbling to his living quarters in a courtyard behind the shop. The rest was a blank.

Now that the parchment had arrived, Li Shu chafed to deliver it, but M'lady had insisted he must not alter his daily routine on her account and that he was not to go to the studio until after dark.

"If you love me as you say, then you will abide by this simple request," she said earnestly.

"Why?" cried Li Shu. She tweaked his nose and chuckled.

"Because it's best for all of us," she said.

So he waited till dark before he hurried to the studio with the roll of parchment under his arm. M'lady was pathetically grateful for his gift. She unrolled it carefully on the long table used for painting, examining it carefully inch by inch. Her breath came in short, sharp gasps, and the finger tip that glided down its length trembled with excitement.

That evening M'lady was more animated than she had ever been, darting about the room, chattering all the while. Yet in the flickering candlelight, Li Shu was startled at how changed she was. She looked haggard. He thought he detected the beginning of lines across her forehead and around her eyes that he had not noticed before. Nothing she said penetrated, until suddenly he found himself in the street with the gate locked in his face. A flash of annoyance faded to disappointment, then to resignation. He leaned his head wearily against the jamb. His feet seemed too heavy to lift, his legs too wobbly to carry him away from there.

By and by when he was himself again, he trudged home. The streets were empty. The shops all shuttered and most of the houses dark. He was aware time had passed, but he had no recollection how. Only M'lady's parting words stayed with him.

"You must not come here until I send for you," she said. "I must be left alone a while to paint."

"How long will it take?" he cried.

"It takes time," M'lady smiled.

Li Shu did as he was bid. He stayed away from the studio though he seethed with impatience.

Lady Chan watched his misery helplessly. He was by turns irascible then apologetic for his rudeness. He seemed to shrink before her eyes until he was a shadow of himself.

In spite of the terrible fatigue, Li Shu roamed the streets aimlessly. Lady Chan did not try to stop him, but she had Nanny dogging his footsteps at a safe distance. Li Shu receded into himself A transparent veil separated him from the rest of the world.

Thus, he was dazed and bewildered when a pair of hands suddenly shot out from the throng in the street and slammed him against a wall. The back of his head striking a hard surface shocked him back to reality. Li Shu found himself staring into the angry face of a mendicant monk.

"You are bewitched!" thundered the monk, white whiskers bristling and spittle flying in all directions. "An aura of evil surrounds you! You are damned!"

Li Shu stared at his attacker, too overcome to speak. The monk seized the collar of his robe and pulled it down. To the crowd that gathered around them, the monk said in a quieter voice,

"Just as 1 thought. The evil one has been draining your blood."

He pointed at the two festering wounds on Li Shu's neck. The crowd let out an audible gasp and backed away.

"I have pursued this evil creature for a long time." The monk pressed his face close to Li Shu's and whispered urgently into his ear.

Li Shu shuddered. His mouth opened and shut like a fish out of water.

"You're mad!" he finally croaked, struggling free from the monk. The monk's face was grim, but he did not try to detain Li Shu.

"You have the choice between life and death, but you choose death. So be it."

He sauntered down the street, leaving Li Shu clinging to the wall for support, gasping for air. Had he been alert he might have noticed his wife's Nanny hurrying after the monk.

Li Shu could hear his own heart beating as he hurried toward the studio at a half-trot, propelled by what he had just heard. The gate was bolted from within as he expected. He went around to the back where part of the wall had crumbled, which he had meant to repair but never did. Breathless with excitement, he squeezed himself through the breach into the small courtyard at the back of the studio. On hands and knees he crept up to the window. There was a faint sound of movement within. Once or twice he thought he heard someone gibbering and chuckling. He wet a fingertip with spittle and applied it to the rice paper that covered the window, working it gently until there was a hole to peer through. What he saw made his blood curdle. Dizzily he scrambled through the hole in the wall again, hailed a carriage for hire, and headed home.

Li Shu's teeth were chattering when Lady Chan helped him into bed. He clung to her, wild-eyed with terror. Lady Chan made him comfortable with her usual quiet efficiency.

"There, there," she soothed, stroking Li Shu's feverish forehead, "you've caught a chill wandering the streets without a cloak in this weather."

Lady Chan's presence was a comfort. She was constant, unchanging no matter what happened. He clutched her hand in both his.

"Help me!" he gasped, "I'm afraid!"

"Of what, honored husband?" cooed Lady Chan. "You're home, lying in your own bed."

He wanted to tell his wife about the monk; then he caught sight of Nanny standing behind her with a bowl of something hot in her hands, and he stopped. He did not like Nanny. Worse than that, he did not trust the woman. He would wait till they were alone. In the meantime, he allowed himself to be propped up with pillows, and Lady Chan spooned a brackish, brown liquid into him.

"The nastier it tastes, the more effective it is," said Lady Chan, as though she were coaxing a child. Li Shu tried to respond, but his tongue was so numb it would not form the words. He lay back and shut his eyes. He dozed. Once more he was peering through the tear in the window screen of the studio, hungry for truth. His heart refused to believe that the hag with the stringy hair and burning eyes he saw drooling over a painting spread out on the long table was M'lady. It had to be an impostor in her clothes, for M'lady is young and beautiful.

"You live because she needs you," the monk's implacable voice sounded again in his ear. "From time to time she must rejuvenate herself by painting a portrait of herself on parchment, which will become her new skin. But to go on living she must also have a new heart. She will take yours when it suits her. Then you will join her as a creature neither dead nor alive, but forever damned. Lead me to her while there is still time!"

Li Shu thrashed about in his delirium. He tried to cry out, "She is not an ancient vampire," but he could not. The monk faded into a gray void. Li Shu sighed. Suddenly his clothes felt so tight he had to struggle out of them. Free at last, he stood beside the bed, light and insubstantial, gazing down without surprise at his other self lying there.

Lady Chan was slumped in a chair nearby, eyes shut. He followed the path of a pearl-like tear trickling down her cheek unheeded. When he tried to brush it away, he found he could not. Nor did she hear when he called her name. He moved with the long loping strides of an antelope. A sensation that filled him with childish delight. He did not have to open the door. He simply went through it. Once outside, he bounded lightly across rooftops, his shouts of joy rang to the skies.

"M'lady! M'lady!"

The cry from his heart found an echo. She came to him with the greenish flecks dancing in her eyes, and eagerly he surrendered to the red mist that enveloped him.

A force, stronger than anything he had ever experienced, suddenly reeled him back, and he lay once more in his bed. A painful weight pressed down on his chest so that he could hardly breathe. Through slitted eyes he took in the room flooded with daylight. He sensed there were people about, though they were beyond his field of vision. The fire door of the potbellied stove in the center of the room must have been open, for his nostrils twitched at the smell of burning paper. Presently it clicked shut.

"I hope that's the last of her letters."

Li Shu recognized his wife's voice, but his head was so heavy he could not shift it to see who she was addressing.

"Surely she must realize by now that he will not go to her," Lady Chan continued. "A sensible person would leave."

"Ah, need I remind you, dear lady, she is not," a man's voice held low, answered.

The voice sent ripples of fear through him. With an effort he made a sound that was half groan and half bleat. A finger pried open one eye. At the same time a hand grasped his wrist firmly but gently. In that instant Li Shu recognized the monk.

"Is he coming to?" asked Lady Chan. "He looks as though life is draining out of him."

"Perhaps it is, dear lady," whispered the monk as he released Li Shu's wrist, "in spite of our efforts."

"But these … things," cried Lady Chan, "were supposed to keep her at bay!"

Li Shu forced his eyes open a crack wider. Bunches of herbs festooned his bed. Now he understood where the strange pungent smell wafting through the air was coming from. Instinctively, he knew it had something to do with M'lady. He would have torn them down if he had the strength.

"They will stop her for a while," the monk responded. "Right now she communes with his spirit," he paused as if to forestall something Lady Chan was about to say. "We can control the body but not the spirit. The creature will become desperate, for her new skin will wither without a new heart."

That last remark filled Li Shu with loathing for the speaker. He had to admit M'lady puzzled him. For instance, she had quickly ferreted out his favorite foods and prepared them for him, but she never partook. Nor would she allow him in the house till nightfall. There had to be a logical explanation, if only he had the strength to pursue it.

Lady Chan let out a low groan.

"I've heard her pacing and whimpering in the courtyard at night."

"Ah!" there was a note of triumph in the monk's voice, "we are drawing her out."

Li Shu was sure now some diabolical plot was being hatched against M'lady while he lay helpless. He must warn her somehow. Li Shu stirred. The monk's hand seized his wrist again.

"Our sleeper wakes," he whispered.

Lady Chan's plain, round face blocked out everything else. Li Shu hadn't the strength to refuse the brown, brackish liquid she fed him. Presently she laid him back, and he drifted off. The shadows were stretched long across the courtyard when Lady Chan emerged from Li Shu's chamber with Nanny close on her heels. Muffled in long cloaks, the two slipped out of the house, walking briskly toward the city gate.

"Oh, my pet, let me go instead. It's no place for a lady," pleaded Nanny.

Lady Chan never flinched from anything unpleasant she had to do.

"No!" she shot back. "It's a matter of life and death for my husband. It concerns no one else but me. Let us press on!"

Nanny glared at her mistress's back balefully, knowing better than to contradict her. Once through the city gate, they turned onto a dirt road that branched off the main highway. Even before they reached it they could smell the garbage dump. Fumes writhed from it, gyrating in a mocking dance in the afternoon sun.

"Wait here," Lady Chan commanded the disgruntled Nanny over her shoulder.

Fighting down waves of nausea, Lady Chan scrambled up the hillock of rotting matter. Inwardly she railed against the monk for having sent her on this mission. She would have turned back except for the monk's challenging words reverberating in her mind.

"I can be of no further help, but one wiser than I can. Ultimately, only you can conquer this ancient evil," said the monk. "It will take all the strength you can muster. Most of all, it requires limitless and unconditional love."

The look he gave her made her quake. She gritted her teeth and swore she would do whatever he commanded,

"Even at the cost of my life!" she cried.

Clawing her way up the slippery, shifting side of the hillock, a stubborn streak that would not let her admit defeat drove her on. Lady Chan wondered dully if pride alone was enough to conquer this wretched hill? With every step she sank deeper into the slime. Already she had lost her shoes to the evil smelling muck. Now her petticoats and robe, saturated with moisture, weighed her down. She lost her footing, pitched forward and slid down the slope. She picked herself up, dazed and blinded momentarily by the low-lying sun, and started again. Sweat mixed with tears of desperation and humiliation bathed her cheeks.

A barking laugh from somewhere high above her jerked Lady Chan's face in that direction. Shading her eyes against the sun, she saw a grotesque figure perched on the top of the hillock, more like a gigantic spider than a human being. Her heart missed a beat, but she fought the quaver in her voice and called out,

"I seek the holy hermit."

The creature leaped in the air, did a wild jig, and chortled mockingly,

"She seeks the Holy Hermit!" Coming to a stand still, he added in a high-pitched squeal,

"Doesn't everyone?"

Lady Chan swallowed hard, for as her eyes grew accustomed to the light she could see the man was as filthy as his surroundings and probably mad. She drew a deep breath and asked,

"Are you the holy hermit?"

"Who else might I be in this hallowed place?" the man shot back. "Come closer that I might see you!"

Lady Chan looked dubiously at the way ahead, and her heart sank. A mocking laugh from above made her clench her teeth. She hoisted up her skirts and bare legged, attacked the slimy slope again. The human spider watched her, laughing, shouting insults and encouragement between snatches of weird incantations barked at the indifferent heavens.

Lady Chan fell again. Her hair, which had come undone, was a mass of sticky tendrils that fell across her face, blurring her vision. Indeed, her face was so covered with grime that only the whites of her eyes showed. She struggled on blindly, step by painful step, her heart fluttering like a captive bird in her chest. At times earth and sky seemed to change places. Then the light was in her eyes and the wind upon her face.

"So!" cried the holy hermit from beneath his thatch of stiff; grime-spiked hair. "What do you seek?" Then, adopting a teasing manner, he answered his own question.

"Methinks you have come to marry me!"

Lady Chan felt her cheeks burning. Before she could let loose an angry retort, the holy man leaped to his feet and closed the distance between them in one bound. He took her chin in one hand and jerked her face to the light.

"Not pretty," he pronounced letting his hand drop. "No matter. I am not the marrying kind."

"I am already married," stammered Lady Chan.

"More is the pity," returned the Hermit, "for the husband."

Hot tears scalded Lady Chan's eyes. She fought them back, determined not to give this rude creature the satisfaction of seeing her cry.

"Well, what is your errand?" shouted the Hermit. He seized her by a handful of hair and dragged her to the edge of the slope. "If you have no errand be gone!"

Lady Chan twisted free. The shifting slime underfoot brought her crashing down upon her knees. The last vestiges of pride shattered. In great wrenching sobs she told her story. The hermit listened, dancing a jig and shouting wild incantations all the while. Then turning serious at the end of Lady Chan's recitation, he said in an almost gentle voice,

"Gather me some white fungus, and some black."

"Where will I find them?" hiccuped Lady Chan.

The hermit seized her by the hair again and dragged her around the top of the hillock, pointing here and there, shouting,

"Look! Hither and yon! Here and there! Everywhere!"

He let go of her abruptly, plopped himself down and, assuming the lotus position, was completely still. Neither tears nor entreaties could move him to utter another word. The sun was rapidly racing toward the horizon. Lady Chan got down on hands and knees, foraging in the filth for the fungus. To her amazement, she found them growing from the rankest filth, gleaming with a strange iridescent beauty. She tore off a strip of her petticoat to hold them.

"A dozen of each will do," said the hermit as if he spoke to the wind. "Then go!"

"But what shall I do with them?" Lady Chan quavered.

"You will think of something," the hermit muttered. His head fell forward, and he began to snore.

Lady Chan stood shaking with exasperation. She would have stamped her feet in rage if the mush were not slowly sucking her under. The hermit was sound asleep, and daylight was waning fast.

Nanny cried out in dismay when her mistress stumbled off the noisome hillock clutching her cache of fungus. Lady Chan found Nanny's horror unaccountably amusing. Filthy and barefooted, she felt liberated. Without a word, she strode purposefully toward the city gate, head held high. It was Nanny who slinked behind hiding her face in shame.

Bathed and dressed in fresh clothes, Lady Chan examined her precious handful of fungi. The white ones were shaped like clusters of stars, while the black ones were curled and corrugated like cock's combs. Away from their natural habitat they emitted a sweetish, faintly steamy smell. In fact she found it rather soothing. She sent: Nanny to the temple to ask the monk what she was supposed to do with them, but he had gone away. However, the hermit had said she would think of something.

She sat down beside her husband's sickbed to ponder that. Gazing at Li Shu's ashen cheeks, she fancied she saw him laid out in his coffin. Perhaps the fungus was an elixir to break M'lady's spell. Once that idea took root, Lady Chan flew into action. She set a kettle of water on the potbellied stove to boil and dropped the fungi into it. They hissed when they hit the water, quickly turning into a gelatinous mass that dissolved. Soon a sweet, heady perfume that made Lady Chan's head spin filled the room. She shut her eyes, and was instantly asleep.

There must be a windstorm, thought Li Shu, for the rattling of the window brought him out of a deep sleep. By the light of the guttering candles he could see something was cooking on the stove. Another odor, stronger than the herbs that festooned the room, tickled his nostrils and made his eyes water. His wife stirred in her chair. She too had been wakened by a noise.

A scratching sound came from the window. A nocturnal bird must be pecking at the rice paper thought Li Shu. Then his eyes went wide with fright. He could hear someone breathing outside. The window paper broke with a loud tearing noise. A woman's hand reached in, groping for the latch, encountered a bunch of herbs fastened to it, and drew back with a cry of surprise and pain. Sweat beaded Li Shu's brow. He tried to heave himself out of the bed, but something held him down. He could not move, nor did he have the strength to cry out. Whoever it was hovered outside muttering, pacing rapidly up and down. Suddenly, the window burst open, and a disheveled woman climbed through it giggling and gibbering. The candles had gone out. Li Shu could not see the woman's face, but recognized the scent of bitter almonds.

"M'lady! M'lady," he gasped.

"I have come for you, Li Shu," she replied in a voice that dripped honey. "Why have you abandoned me?"

Li Shu tried to answer, but his wooden tongue would not shape the words.

She approached the bed cautiously, uttering irritated sounds at the bunches of herbs that barred her way.

"Come to me," she pleaded stretching out her arms. "You promised me your heart, but you are false like all men!"

Li Shu shook his head feebly. M'lady's arms dropped to her sides. Her body coiled like a cat's and she leaped upon the bed, bringing down bunches of the herbs as she landed. For a moment an invisible web seemed to fall upon her, causing her to cry out.

Lady Chan shot to her feet. In the dark she could barely make out a figure straddling her husband, one hand clutched around his throat, the other tearing at his nightshirt. Blind with terror Lady Chan reached for the pot simmering on the stove. Distracted by the movement, the crouching figure turned, whereupon Lady Chan flung the contents of the pot in M'lady's face.

M'lady's piercing shrieks were horrible to hear. When the sound subsided, Nanny crept into the room. She found it in shambles. The air was foul with the acrid smell of something burning. Her master and mistress were in a dead faint but apparently unharmed. No one else was there.

Months passed before Li Shu fully recovered from his mysterious illness. Neither he nor Lady Chan ever mentioned the events of that night or M'lady. They blocked it from their minds. It was as though nothing had happened.

A year later Lady Chan persuaded Li Shu to sell the studio. He did not object since he never used it. However, before showing it to a prospective buyer, Li Shu decided to visit the place, to be sure there was nothing he wanted to keep. He found a roll of parchment tied with a red ribbon. He recognized the clumsy double knot with which it was tied at once. His own handiwork stirred memories. He threw it in the fire with the rest of the rubbish without looking at it.

The truth is Li Shu was no longer sure M'lady ever existed. Nor could he conjure up the face that was once so dear, except the upward tilting eyes, black as the night, with curious green flecks flickering in their depths.

However, two tiny scars remained on his neck for the rest of his life.

9

At the age of thirty, Ning had already failed the Imperial Civil Service Examination twice. His father, who wanted him in the family business, did not encourage a third attempt.

"We have been tea growers for generations," coaxed the Father. "That continuity must not be interrupted by whim!"

"Surely, the Ancestors would be just as honored if I were a Minister, or the local Magistrate!" Ning argued. In the end his Father gave in to Ning's wheedling, but not without conditions.

"You must swear before the Ancients," said the Father with a deep frown, "if you do not succeed, you will settle into the family business, marry, and produce offspring to carry on the family name."

Ning grudgingly took the oath. This time he passed the preliminary examination and was summoned to the provincial capital to write his final thesis. Ning was elated, convinced it was a sign the Ancients were on his side. He arrived at Hangzhou in a buoyant mood and tramped the city from one end to the other seeking lodgings. Every square inch of space was taken. Footsore and dispirited, he was in despair. Maybe the Ancients were trifling with him, bringing him so close to his goal, only to thwart him. How could he write the thesis that would make his fortune without a place to live?

He was drowning his troubles in a tavern when he overheard a conversation about an abandoned house in the hills overlooking Chien Tang River. Ning decided to find it. He lost his way several times, but persistence eventually paid off

The house was almost in ruin. Beyond the entrance courtyard was another with rooms built facing each other on the east and west sides. A slip of paper with the words KEEP OUT inked on it was pasted to the door of the one facing east. So Ning took the other.

Ning settled in. From time to time he glimpsed a shadowy figure moving in or out of the room facing his. Whoever it was chose to stay aloof, which suited him. He was glad of a roof over his head and solitude to write his thesis.

For the first few days he struggled fruitlessly. On a grim, rainy day he suddenly tapped into a wellspring of inspiration that seemed endless. The steady drumming of rain on the roof merged with the stream of thoughts that spilled from the well-formed tip of Ning's brush. Later in the day the rain stopped. Silence severed the thread of concentration. Ning stretched, easing the ache in his shoulders. He was thirsty. Reaching for a bucket, he headed out to the well.

The garden beyond the courtyard had gone to seed long ago. Weeds and brambles obscured everything except a path to the well that seemed to have been trampled through the rough growth quite recently. The well stood at the edge of a terrace that had partly crumbled away. The rope fastened to the rusty winch was worn but serviceable. As he bent down to draw water, a movement at the corner of his eye made Ning look up. A butterfly gently opening and folding its mottled wings of gold and purple, perched on the cobblestones, poised for flight. Ning watched it lift into the air, gliding and dipping around him as though observing him from every angle. Suddenly it veered away and disappeared into a dense grove of green-black pines that screened the lower half of the garden from view.

The butterfly's departure left Ning strangely bereft. He tried to settle down to his thesis again, but he could not pick up where he left off. There was a strange fluttering in his breast, as though a butterfly were imprisoned there. He could not sit still. The squeaking of a rusty hinge across the courtyard was an excuse to lay down his brush. He opened his door just as the occupant of the room across was about to go in.

He was a grim-faced man. Deep-etched lines from the corners of his eyes to the curve of his chin gave him a sardonic look. The haughty, aquiline nose and the wide, thin-lipped mouth added a dash of brooding remoteness. The long, lank hair pulled back and tied with a ribbon at the nape of the neck, the tunic, pants, and thick-soled boots he wore were in keeping with a man of action. Ning introduced himself eagerly.

"No doubt you are writing the Imperial Examination," the stranger said in a surprisingly cultivated accent.

Ning babbled when he was nervous. The other hushed him with an impatient gesture.

"Have a bowl of wine with me, an hour hence." The invitation sounded more like a command. "An hour hence," repeated the stranger as he shut his door firmly in Ning's face.

"Who does he think he is!" thought Ning angrily. He resolved to stay away. Soon the smell of cooking wafted through his window. What is wine without food! Ning's rumbling stomach overcame his pique. He splashed some water on his face, ran a comb through his hair, changed into a fresh robe, and crossed the courtyard precisely an hour later.

The stranger's room was identical to Ning's, except it was festooned with bunches of herbs whose various aromas mingled dizzily in the air. Charms to ward off evil spirits, written in a bold, fluid hand, covered the walls. A dilapidated bench stood to one side heaped with scrolls. Several appeared to be charts of the constellations. The only object not covered in dust was a sword in a leather scabbard hanging over the kang.

The two men sat crossed-legged on the kang with food and wine laid out between them. Ning's host had not introduced himself earlier, nor did he trouble to do so now. Conversation came in short, disjointed spurts, as it usually does between strangers. When they had polished off the plain but hearty fare and a passable wine, the silences became tedious. Ning was tempted to make his excuses and leave. However, too much wine and the overlapping perfumes of herbs fogged his brain. Everything blurred.

Ning woke with a throbbing head. It was dark and raining again. He fumbled in the dark until his hand encountered a candle, which took real concentration to light. The evening was a jumble of ambiguous impressions, bits of which flashed sharp and clear in his mind. He lay back trying to piece together what he could remember about his neighbor.

"He's too old to be seeking a position in the civil service," Ning muttered to himself. Since he had been living in this lonely place, he had started talking to himself.

"He could be a necromancer." The charts in his room seemed to point in that direction. Ning brushed that notion aside when he remembered the sword hanging on the wall.

"He's a paladin!" he said out loud. That did not add up either, for the man carried himself like a gentleman.

"So where does that leave us?" Ning answered his own question. "Nowhere."

Ning remembered only one remark from their conversation. His host had warned him not to venture out of his room after dark. Ning had laughingly asked why.

"For your own good," was the answer repeated several times. Ning could have kicked himself for not pursuing the subject. No matter. He had no intention of venturing out into the dark, wet night. He snuggled into his quilt and prepared to go back to sleep. A scratching sound outside the door gradually insinuated itself into his consciousness.

"Who is there?" Ning called out.

The sound stopped. As Ning lay back it started again.

"Is someone there?" Ning called again, his throat oddly dry.

The sound stopped again. Ning heaved himself off the kang, and flung the door open.

A girl stood on the threshold, her tiny frame drooping with weariness. Rainwater trickled off her hair and down her heart-shaped face. Her almond eyes, fringed with long, graceful lashes, brimmed with fear. Ning softened instantly.

"Come in," he said gently. She sidled past him, eyes demurely averted. The guttering candle ruled the room with darting shadows.

"Please sit," Ning said, indicating the kang where he slept, ate, and worked. "As you can see, I don't have much." Noticing a faintly condescending smile cross the girl's face, he added, "This is only temporary." His nervousness made her giggle.

"You'll be an official at court one day," the girl said.

"You're laughing at me again," Ning blurted, and instantly felt foolish.

"Not at all," said the girl, who could not have been more than seventeen or eighteen. "I can tell by the curve of your brow, the arch of your nose, the shape of your mouth," her gesture encompassed Ning's person, "your bearing."

Ning chuckled all aquiver. He loved flattery.

"I shall light the brazier and make tea," he stammered, busying himself.

The girl seated herself on the edge of the kang, her tiny feet barely touching the ground. She had removed her wet traveling cloak. Under it she wore a robe of pale yellow silk splashed with purple flowers befitting a lady of rank. However, at that moment, she was more like a wet butterfly, spreading her wings out to dry.

Ning had the brazier lit and the tea kettle humming in a trice. The girl prattled merrily. She said she was on her way to her grandmother's and got caught in the rain.

"Lightning frightened the poor horse and it bolted. I'm a good equestrian," she said emphatically. "Anyway, I am safe now." She sipped her tea, smiling at Ning with her eyes.

They talked desultorily for a while.

"I am so weary," said the girl, eyeing Ning's rumpled quilt. "May I sleep here?"

Ning was thunderstruck.

"That's impossible," he blustered, his arms flapping in agitation.

The girl's tinkling laugh made him bristle. What do I know about her? he asked himself Suppose she is a great lady! In that case, her mere presence would spell doom not only for him but his entire family and their servants too.

"Woe betide me!" Ning groaned in spite of himself

"And all because I want to spend the night in your room!"

The derisive gleam in the girl's eyes convinced Ning she was making fun of him.

"My lady had better leave," he muttered stiffly.

"Leave!" the girl's eyes went wide, "just when I was getting comfortable!"

Ning picked up her cloak, which he had spread on the floor near the brazier to dry, and held it out to her, his eyes fixed to the ground. He knew that if he looked at her his resolve would crumble. She had to go!

"Perhaps a little something will change your mind," the girl murmured. From the folds of her robe she drew a silk purse and jingled it under Ning's nose.

"Now, can I stay?"

Ning gulped, and shook his head. The girl returned the purse to its hiding place, snatched the cloak from Ning's hands, and headed for the door. She stopped on the threshold, one hand on the latch.

"Look at me," she commanded. "I want you to look at me."

She stamped her foot. Ning hung his head

"You are a hard man," sighed the girl. "Maybe that's why I like you."

A gust of wind blew out the candle as she let herself out. An elusive but distracting fragrance remained in the room after she was gone. The mysterious young girl who briefly had intruded upon his solitude created a disturbance he had never experienced before.

In the days that followed, Ning forced himself to write, but he produced only words without art or content. The thought of coming so close to his goal and having it slip through his fingers filled him with self-loathing.

The stranger also seemed restless. He practiced with his sword long, strenuous hours, until the weapon became an extension of the man. He ignored Ning, as though they had never met. However, one evening as he was going to his room, he said loud enough to be heard,

"The path of righteousness is narrow, fraught with danger. Be watchful."

Ning was about to ask what he meant, but the stranger had shut his door.

Later, as he struggled with his thesis, the girl stole into his room, smiling with her eyes. The gush of words that rose from his heart, died on his trembling lips. Ning watched transfixed as she dipped a new brush in water to soften its bristles, rinsed his stone, and ground fresh ink. When the ink was ready, and she had tested the point of the brush for the correct softness, she placed the implements before him on the rough planks laid across bricks that served as a writing surface.

"Write," she whispered gently. "I will sit here and watch."

Ning took a deep breath and picked up his brush. Miraculously, ideas began to flow again. He lost track of time. She unobtrusively kept his ink fresh, a clean brush close at hand, and a new candle ready. Ning worked through the night. When the first rays of sunlight touched his window, he laid down his brush, expecting to find her curled up under his quilt on the other side of the kang. Instead, the tea kettle spewing steam was the only sign that someone else had been in the room.

Ning's life took a new turn. Day became night. During the day, he slept the dreamless sleep of exhaustion. The girl woke him at dusk. There was no need for words between them. Their souls communed in perfect harmony. He wrote till daybreak without noticing when she slipped away.

Finally the thesis was done. Dressed in his best formal gown, his hair done in a scholar's knot on the top of his head, tied with a sober black ribbon, Ning hurried into the city to submit it, confident he would pass. He was also sure he could not live without the girl. On the way back, he stopped at a shop and selected a hairpin fashioned out of mother-of-pearl. Though he knew nothing about her, not even her name, he would propose marriage that very evening.

However, that evening the girl did not appear. Nor for several evenings thereafter. As daylight faded into another dismal night, the fluttering of a butterfly outside his window startled Ning out of his despair.

"Butterflies aren't nocturnal," he thought, but there it was. The butterfly lighted on the edge of the terrace flexing its wings, as if waiting for him. On an impulse, he went outside. However, the moment he drew near it darted away. Ning followed it into the pine grove. The trees grew so close that their branches shut out what was left of the light. Just when he thought he had lost it, the butterfly appeared, almost close enough to touch. Ning plunged after it again, not knowing or caring where he was going, until his forehead struck something cold and hard.

He had run into a wall that marked the lower boundary of the garden. The sound of voices came from the other side. Ning groped his way along, for it was completely dark. Finally he came to a gap where part of the wall had fallen down. On the other side was a stand of ancient bamboo between whose leaves and branches he could make out a cobblestone terrace lit by a dozen lanterns. Two women were seated there, surrounded by pots of yellow and white chrysanthemums that glowed like stars against the dark shrubbery beyond. The younger of the two was dressing the older one's hair.

"What a ruin this face has become!" complained the crone in a high cracked voice, examining herself in a mirror she held in her hand. "Once upon a time I even turned the Emperor's head."

"Be still, Granny," soothed the other, who looked to be in her late thirties. "When I finish you will look the way you used to!"

"I will soon die!" the old crone's voice rose almost to a shriek. Suddenly she seized the other's hand.

"Granny, don't." The younger woman snatched her hand away and hid it behind her back.

"I knew it, Crystal!" cried the old crone. "You are withering too!"

Crystal averted her face.

"When you could have finished him off, you went soft," the crone shrilled. "Now we are doomed! Oh, the incompetence!" The old crone was working herself into a rage. "The ingratitude! After all I lavished upon you!" Her last remark was heavy with contempt.

The woman called Crystal crumpled to her knees, whimpering.

"Fortunately the girl will save us," quavered the crone. Her head drooped onto her breast as if it were too heavy for her scrawny neck to hold up. A moment later she lifted her head, nostrils quivering.

"I think I smell something," she whispered. "Can you smell it?" she demanded.

"Perhaps the child is back," murmured the other.

"That child!" the crone whined, "I shall whip her!" She flayed the air angrily. The effort exhausted her, for she slumped again in her chair.

A light footstep sounded on the flagstones.

"There you are, naughty child," Crystal scolded. "Granny grows restless when you're tardy."

"It's hard to find the right stuff," replied a young girl. Ning could not see the speaker, but he recognized her voice.

"Give it to me quickly!" cried the crone.

Ning caught the click of a lid against a bowl. The crone made gurgling sounds as she drained its contents in one draft.

"Granny, you didn't leave me any," whined Crystal.

"You don't deserve any," the old woman cackled. To the girl she said in a commanding voice, "Hold up the mirror for me." She examined herself, gesturing for the girl to turn the mirror this way and that.

"See, some of the lines are fading." She leaned back with a sigh. In an imperious voice, she order the girl to fetch more!

"Yes!" Crystal chimed in, "I must have some too!"

The girl took a step forward, fell on her knees, and pressed her forehead against the ground. Now Ning was sure it was the object of his affections.

"Please don't send me out again," the girl whimpered. "I'm frightened."

"There is nothing to fear," the old crone cooed. "All you have to do is separate the man from his sword. Then!" She snapped her fingers meaningfully and cackled.

"I can't!" wailed the girl, wrapping her arms around the old one's legs.

"Then take the other one," snapped Crystal.

"What other one?" asked the old crone sharply. "Have you been keeping something from me?" Her eyes darted fire as her gaze swept from Crystal to the girl and back again.

Crystal seized the girl by the scruff of her neck.

"Look at that face, Granny! She has betrayed us!"

The girl tried to cover her face with her hands, but the woman pried them loose.

"There is another man in the house," cried the woman vehemently, "young and vigorous." She held the girl's face close to the crone's. "She has been hiding him from us because she fancies him!"

Ning bristled with rage. It was all he could do to keep from leaping over the wall and confronting the women.

The old crone's bony fingers cupped the girl's face.

"I see it's true," she murmured disconsolately. She whirled around and struck Crystal across the face.

"First, it was you. Now, this one! I am surrounded by traitors!" she cried.

Ning could not bear to watch any more. Blindly he groped his way out of the pine grove. The light in his window made his breath catch. He sprinted across the terrace and flung open the door. She was seated on the kang, her chin propped on her knees. He stood on the threshold unable to move. She chuckled, and ran to him. He lifted her in his arms and carried her back to the kang.

In the languorous hour after love she whispered,

"Tomorrow night I will not be with you." Ning started to protest, but she made him listen.

"Don't be alone," she said. "Buy some wine and drink with your neighbor."

He objected saying he scarcely knew the man and didn't care for his company. She laid a playful fingertip on his lips.

"Do it for me. Make him drunk; then take his sword."

"Why, that's stealing!" exclaimed Ning.

She kissed him softly.

"He is an evil sorcerer," she whispered, her lips against his. "The sword will separate us forever."

He clutched her to him fiercely, vowing nothing could take her from him.

"The sword will destroy me," she sobbed. "In time you will understand! Only it will be too late."

She pushed herself away from him. Ning's qualms vanished.

"I will do it," he cried, gathering her into his arms.

Ning woke with the sunlight in his eyes. An earring on his pillow told him the passion of the night before was not a dream. He lay back content. Their vows of love hovered like dust motes dancing in the air.

Ning hurried into town. He bought a jar of good wine and some cooked meats to go with it. When he returned with his purchases late in the afternoon, his neighbor's door stood wide.

"I was expecting you," said the stranger from within.

Ning stammered, shifting his weight from one foot to the other.

"You'd better come in," said the stranger grinning at his discomfiture, "before good food and drink go to waste!" With a sweep of his hand he cleared a space on the kang.

"There! Not very elegant but it will do," he said, deftly lifting the jar of wine from Ning's grasp.

They ate and drank merrily. Ning never allowed the stranger's cup to go empty. His capacity was astounding. As the level of the wine in the jar dropped, their conversation became more rambling.

"Good and evil take on the weight and form we assign them," began the stranger without preamble. Ning was finding it hard to keep up with the stranger's tirade. The room began to curl at the edges, the kang heaved like a boat on a rough sea, and he longed for sleep.

"This sword is the only weapon against an ancient evil I have pursued for a long time," said the stranger.

Ning snapped to at that remark. For the moment, the kang stopped heaving. The stranger had taken the sword off the wall. Now it lay unsheathed and gleaming across its owner's lap. Blearily Ning remembered his errand.

"May I hold it?" Ning asked.

"You may not," the stranger rumbled.

Ning reached for it nevertheless. The stranger seized his wrist.

"Next time I will take your hand off!" warned the stranger.

A quick glance told Ning the man did not make idle threats. The stranger was launched on another rambling speech when a raven came through the open window and lighted on a beam overhead. The stranger followed its flight without interrupting himself. Only his grip on the sword tightened. Suddenly the room shuddered, scattering remnants of food and wine across the kang. The next shock bowled Ning over. A howling wind roared through the room. Before his astonished eyes the raven grew to an enormous size, eyeing the two men below, emitting clicking sounds. With a wild cry it swooped down upon the stranger, but the smallness of the room and the bunches of herbs festooning it hampered the bird's movements. Its prey easily rolled out of its reach. Ning wedged himself into a corner, scared sober. The stranger slid off the kang, chanting an incantation, sword at the ready. The bird hopped across the floor, its baleful eyes darting from side to side. The distance between the combatants quickly shortened. With a desperate cry the bird lunged, drawing blood. The stranger whirled about, his sword tracing a shining circle around him. The bird attacked again with deadly precision. The stranger stood his ground, fending off the blood-crazed creature with punishing blows. The battle see-sawed, with the advantage shifting from one to the other. Both man and bird were soon drenched in blood.

Reeling with weariness, the stranger hefted his sword with both hands. With a terrifying squeal the bird, dragging an injured wing, hobbled in for the kill. Mustering what strength he had left, the stranger charged. They met head on. The bird let out an almost human scream and fluttered to the ground, impaled on the stranger's sword. For a moment the woman called Crystal lay where the bird had been. A sickening odor of burning flesh filled the air as she crumbled.

Ning was glad to be behind the bolted door of his own room again. He was shaking so hard he could not light the candle, so he sat shivering in the dark. When a hand reached out and touched his, he cried out in terror.

"It's only me," whispered the girl. They clung to each other, muttering incoherent words of comfort.

"The Old One will come to wreak vengeance," the girl trembled. "If you love me, do me one last favor."

"The sword!" Ning whispered in despair.

"It does not matter now," said the girl, struggling from his arms. "The Old One is a witch who has lived for centuries. Those whom she enslaves drain the blood of humans for her to drink. That is how she stays alive. In return she promises her minions eternal youth and beauty. I was vain and foolish, so I became her slave."

Ning cried out for he could not believe what he was hearing. But the girl made him listen.

"I came to kill you that rainy night. Had you allowed me to stay, or accepted the gold I offered you, the Old One would have drunk your blood. But you did not take advantage of me. Your generosity saved you."

Ning shook his head in disbelief

"A bundle of bones is buried between two elm trees in a clearing in the woods nearby," she continued breathlessly. "That is where I lie. If you love me, take my bones across the river. Give them a decent burial and I shall be free. You will be safe too on the farther shore, as the Old One cannot cross water."

"What about us?" cried Ning. "I want to marry you—"

"That cannot be," replied the girl sadly, "for I do not belong in your world."

"Were our vows of love mere illusion?" Ning persisted.

The girl shook her head miserably.

"We will meet again in another time … another place."

Ning started to say something, but his voice ricocheted off the walls. He was alone. He crept to the door, opened it a crack. The stranger's window was a square of light. From within came the sound of chanting. Ning ran from the courtyard into the woods.

Ning had no idea where he was going. It was pitch dark. A force stronger than he propelled him. He plunged on, crashing through the underbrush, tripping, falling, picking himself up and continuing, till he came to a clearing where two elms stood. He found a stout stick and began to dig between them. He did not have to dig long before his stick struck something that did not feel like earth. He widened the hole with bare hands. Just as the girl had said, his fingers encountered a bundle of coarse fabric. Carefully he pulled it out of the earth and clutched it to his breast. The instinct or prescience that guided him evaporated. He stood listening to the night sounds not knowing what to do. Over the thundering of his heart, he heard the sound of water and remembered. The river!

He tied the amazingly small bundle of bones across one shoulder and plunged headlong in the direction from which the sound came.

The starless night was thick and black. The trees and the underbrush tore at him. Treacherous vines clutched at his ankles. It was as though the woods were trying to hold him fast. Ning's breath came in harsh rasps. The pain in his chest spread like a slow-burning fire, turning his legs to putty. When he could run no more, he scrambled on all fours. Sometimes the sound of the river was on his right, then on his left, but never nearer. He was going around in circles.

Overcome by weariness, he fell face down on the dew-wet ground. All he wanted was to lie there, never to move again. A faint fluttering in the air close to his face made Ning open his eyes. A butterfly hovered inches from his nose, its frantic fluttering seemed to convey something. Ning struggled to his feet. The butterfly flew up, dancing in the air. Too weary to think, Ning let his feet carry him wherever the butterfly led, pushing himself through the blackness, arms churning the air like a windmill. As suddenly as it had appeared the butterfly vanished, but he could feel moisture in the air, and the rush of water was loud in his ears. He had found the river.

The sky was turning a deep indigo. The night was almost over. In the faint light the river did not seem wide, but the current was swift. He could just make out the slick, wet stones of a ford going across.

He started toward it, each step making a sucking sound as he sank into thick, clinging mud. Suddenly an old woman's voice called from the dark woods behind.

"Young man, I am lost. Won't you please give me a hand?"

Ning gritted his teeth and pressed on. The mud made every step an effort.

"Young man," the old woman's voice was full of pleading, "I will perish!"

Ning's heart was lodged in his throat. He dared not stop, for with every step he sank a little deeper.

"Young man, I am utterly alone," cried the old woman, "Help me!"

With a loud splash Ning fell forward into the river.

The old woman on the bank let loose a fearful howl of rage. The trees thrashed. The rocks trembled. The river, churning with fury, dragged him under. Twice Ning bobbed to the surface, gasping for air, and twice he was sucked under again. The river was carrying him back to shore.

"Give me what is mine," the old woman laughed triumphantly, or you die."

"Never!" cried Ning as another wave pulled him under. The next time he came to the surface, Ning was thrown against a half-submerged rock. Though the river continued to buffet him, he wrapped his arms around it as tight as he could, and the rock held him up. The old crone was out of breath. As her howling subsided, the woods gradually became still, and the river calmed. Leaning heavily on her cane the old crone tottered toward where the reeds grew. Instantly her cane became stuck in the mud, She grasped it with both hands trying to free it, but the mud would not let go. The more she worried it, the tighter it held. She lost her footing and slid into the mud. Her shrieks set the river churning again, but only for an instant, The old crone had sunk knee deep in mud. Though her mouth opened and shut, not another sound came out of her.

There was a sudden movement. The stranger emerged from the dark, his sword flashing ominously. The old crone hissed and spat, clawed the air like an angry cat, but she was stuck fast.

Ning let go of the rock, and struck out for the farther shore. The old crone let out a despairing howl. There was a flash of light followed by a loud crack. When Ning looked back from across the river, the stranger stood wearily clutching the blade-less hilt of his sword. All that was left of the old crone was a tattered robe floating slowly down stream. The stranger raised his hand in farewell and disappeared into the woods.

*

Weeks later, Ning arrived home, having first buried the bundle of bones he had carried all that way in a corner of an orchard nearby. His father pulled a long face, convinced Ning's tattered and dirty condition meant he had failed again.

"At least you're none the worse for wear," growled the old man.

Months later, just when the father was about to press him into joining the family business, Ning was notified that he had not only passed the Imperial Civil Service Examination but he had been appointed magistrate of his hometown, replacing the incumbent, who was too old to preside over the court.

Ning became renowned for the wisdom and fairness of his judgments. While the father had ample reason to be proud of his achievements, he was chagrined by Ning's refusal to marry. Years later Ning bought the orchard, to which he had become attached. He planted two elms in a corner and placed two stone benches in their shade. It became his retreat, where he went to read and meditate. When he died, he was buried there according to his wishes.

It is said that two butterflies appeared, danced a while over the new grave, then disappeared into the sunlight.

1935

20.75 At Middle Age\fn{by Shen Rong (1935-)} Hankou, Sichuan Province, China (F) 30

1

Were the stars twinkling in the sky? Was a boat rocking on the sea? Lu Wenting, an oculist, lay on her back in hospital. Circles of light, bright or dim, appeared before her eyes. She seemed to be lifted by a cloud, up and down, drifting about without any direction.

Was she dreaming or dying? She remembered vaguely going to the operating theatre that morning, putting on her operating gown and walking over to the wash-basin. Ah, yes, Jiang Yafen, her good friend, had volunteered to be her assistant. Having got their visas, Jiang and her family were soon leaving for Canada. This was their last operation as colleagues.

Together they washed their hands. They had been medical students in the same college in the fifties and, after graduation, had been assigned to the same hospital. As friends and colleagues for more than twenty years, they found it hard to part. This was no mood for a doctor to be in prior to an operation. Lu remembered she had wanted to say something to ease their sadness. What had she said? She had turned to Jiang and inquired, "Have you booked your plane tickets, Yafen?"

What had been her reply? She had said nothing, but her eyes had gone red. Then after a long time Jiang asked, "You think you can manage three operations in one morning?"

Lu couldn't remember what she had answered. She had probably gone on scrubbing her nails in silence. The new brush hurt her fingertips. She looked at the soap bubbles on her hands and glanced at the clock on the wall, strictly following the rules, brushing her hands, wrists and arms three times, three minutes each. Ten minutes later she soaked her arms in a pail of antiseptic, 75 per cent alcohol. It was white—maybe yellowish. Even now her hands and arms were numb and burning. From the alcohol? No. It was unlikely. They had never hurt before. Why couldn't she lift them?

She remembered that at the start of the operation, when she had injected novocaine behind the patient's eyeball, Yafen had asked softly, "Has your daughter got over her pneumonia?"

What was wrong with Jiang today? Didn't she know that when operating a surgeon should forget everything, including herself and her family, and concentrate on the patient? How could she inquire after Xiaojia at such a time? Perhaps, feeling miserable about leaving, she had forgotten that she was assisting at an operation.

A bit annoyed, Lu retorted, "I'm only thinking about this eye now."

She lowered her head and cut with a pair of curved scissors.

One operation after another. Why three in one morning? She had had to remove Vice-minister Jiao's cataract, transplant a cornea on Uncle Zhang's eye and correct Wang Xiaoman's squint. Starting at eight o'clock, she had sat on the high operating stool for four and a half hours, concentrating under a lamp. She had cut and stitched again and again. When she had finished the last one and put a piece of gauze on the patient's eye, she was stiff and her legs wouldn't move.

Having changed her clothes, Jiang called to her from the door, "Let's go, Wenting."

"You go first." She stayed where she was. "I'll wait for you. It's my last time here." Jiang's eyes were watery. Was she crying? Why?

"Go on home and do your packing. Your husband must be waiting for you."

"He's already packed our things."

Looking up, Jiang called, "What's wrong with your legs?"

"I've been sitting so long, they've gone to sleep! They'll be OK in a minute. I'll come to see you this evening."

"All right. See you then." After Jiang had left, Lu moved back to the wall of white tiles, supporting herself with her hands against it for a long time before going to the changing-room.

She remembered putting on her grey jacket, leaving the hospital and reaching the lane leading to her home. All of a sudden she was exhausted, more tired than she had ever felt before. The lane became long and hazy, her home seemed far away. She felt she would never get there.

She became faint. She couldn't open her eyes, her lips felt dry and stiff. She was thirsty, very thirsty. Where could she get some water? Her parched lips trembled.

"Look, Dr. Sun, she's come to!" Jiang cried softly. She had been sitting beside Lu all the time.

Sun Yimin, head of the Ophthalmic Department, was reading Lu's case-history and was shocked by the diagnosis of myocardial infarction. Very worried, the greying man shook his head and pushed back his black-rimmed spectacles, recalling that Lu was not the first doctor aged about forty in his department who had fallen ill with heart disase. She had been a healthy woman of forty-two. This attack was too sudden and serious.

Sun turned his tall, stooping frame to look down at Lu's pale face. She was breathing weakly, her eyes closed, her dry lips trembling slightly.

"Dr. Lu," Sun called softly.

She didn't move, her thin, puffy face expressionless.

"Wenting," Jiang urged.

Still no reaction. Sun raised his eyes to the forbidding oxygen cylinder, which stood at a corner of the room and then looked at the ECG monitor. He was reassured when he saw a regular QRS wave on the oscillometer. He turned back to Lu, waved his hand and said, "Ask her husband to come tn. A good-looking, balding man in his forties, of medium height, entered quickly. He was Fu Jiajie, Lu's husband. He had spent a sleepless night beside her and had been reluctant to leave when Sun had sent him away to lie down on the bench outside the room. As Sun made way for him, Fu bent down to look at the familiar face, which was now so pale and strange.

Lu's lips moved again. Nobody except her husband understood her. He said, "She wants some water. She's thirsty."

Jiang gave him a small teapot. Carefully, Fu avoided the rubber tube leading from the oxygen cylinder and put it to Lu's parched lips. Drop by drop, the water trickled into the dying woman's mouth.

"Wenting, Wenting," Fu called. When a drop of water fell from Fu's shaking hand on to Lu's pallid face, the muscles seemed to twitch a little.

*

Eyes. Eyes. Eyes …

Many flashed past Lu's closed ones. Eyes of men and women, old and young, big and small, bright and dull, all kinds, blinking at her.

Ah! These were her husband's eyes. In them, she saw joy and sorrow, anxiety and pleasure, suffering and hope. She could see through his eyes, his heart. His eyes were as bright as the golden sun in the sky. His loving heart had given her so much warmth. It was his voice, Jiajie's voice, so endearing, so gentle, and so far away, as if from another world:

I wish I were a rapid stream,
If my love
A tiny fish would be,
She'd frolic
In my foaming waves.

Where was she? Oh, she was in a park covered with snow. There was a frozen lake, clear as crystal, on which red, blue, purple and white figures skated. Happy laughter resounded in the air while they moved arm in arm, threading their way through the crowds. She saw none of the smiling faces around her, only his. They slid on the ice, side by side, twirling, laughing. What bliss!

The ancient Five Dragon Pavilions shrouded in snow were solemn, tranquil and deserted. They leaned against the white marble balustrades, while snowflakes covered them. Holding hands tightly, they defied the severe cold.

She was young then. She had never expected love or special happiness. Her father had deserted her mother when she was a girl, and her mother had had a hard time raising her alone. Her childhood had been bleak. All she remembered was a mother prematurely old who, night after night, sewed under a solitary lamp.

She boarded at her medical college, rising before daybreak to memorize new English words, going to classes and filling scores of notebooks with neat little characters. In the evenings she studied in the library and then worked late into the night doing autopsies. She never grudged spending her youth studying.

Love had no place in her life. She shared a room with Jiang Yafen, her classmate, who had beautiful eyes, bewitching lips and who was tall, slim and lively. Every week, Jiang received love letters. Every weekend, she dated, while poor Lu did nothing, neglected by everyone.

After graduation, she and Jiang were assigned to the same hospital, which had been founded more than a hundred years earlier. Their internship lasted for four years, during which time they had to be in the hospital all day long, and remain single.

Secretly, Jiang cursed these rules, while Lu accepted the terms willingly. What did it matter being in the hospital twenty-four hours a day? She would have liked to be there forty-eight hours, if possible. No marriage for four years. Hadn't many skilled doctors married late or remained single all their lives? So she threw herself heart and soul into her work.

But life is strange. Fu Jiajie suddenly entered her quiet, routine life.

She never understood how it happened. He had been hospitalized because of an eye disease. She was his doctor. Perhaps, his feelings for her arose from her conscientious treatment. Passionate and deep, his emotions changed both their lives.

Winter in the north is always very cold, but that winter he gave her warmth. Never having imagined love could be so intoxicating, she almost regretted not finding it earlier. She was already twenty-eight, yet she still had the heart of a young girl. With her whole being, she welcomed this late love.

I wish I were a deserted forest,
If my love
A little bird would be,
She'd nest and twitter
In my dense trees.

Incredible that Fu Jiajie, whom Jiang regarded as a bookworm and who was doing research on a new material for a spacecraft\fn{Approximately two months from today (01/12/03), China plans to launch her first manned spacecraft, thus becoming the third nation in the world to have accomplished this feat.} in the Metallurgical Research Institute, could read poetry so well!

"Who wrote it?" Lu asked.

"The Hungarian poet Petöfi."\fn{Sándor Petöfi, nee Sándor Petrovics (1823-1849), successively a Hungarian poet, actor and soldier, was born in Kiskõrös in Pest County. He published his first poem in 1842, and died in battle in Roumania, having secured his fame with a volume of poems which he published in 1844; a long epic poem about peasant life in Hungary, János the Hero (1845); and the poem, Rise, Magyar (1848, which became the Hungarian National Anthem).}

"Does a scientist have time for poetry?"

"A scientist must have imagination. Science has something in common with poetry in this respect."

Pedantic? He gave good answers. "What about you? Do you like poetry?" he asked.

"Me? I don't know anything about it. I seldom read it." She smiled cynically. "The Ophthalmic Department does operations. Every stitch, every incision is strictly laid down. We can't use the slightest imagination—"

Fu cut in, "Your work is a beautiful poem. You can make many people see again …"

Smiling, he moved over to her, his face close to hers. His masculinity, which she had never experienced before, assailed, bewildered and unnerved her. She felt something must happen, and, sure enough, he put his arms round her, embracing her tightly.

It had occurred so suddenly that she looked fearfully at the smiling eyes close to hers and his parted lips. Her heart thumping, her head raised, she closed her eyes in embarrassment, moving away instinctively as his irresistible love flooded her.

Beihai Park in the snow was just the right place for her. Snow covered the tall dagoba,\fn{Apparently the Temple of the White Dagoba, built to commemorate the visit of the fifth Dalai Lama, the spiritual leader of tibetan Buddhism, in 1651, is meant.} Qiongdao Islet with its green pines, the long corridor and quiet lake. It also hid the sweet shyness of the lovers.

To everyone's surprise, after her four-year internship had ended, Lu was the first to get married. Fate had decided Fu Jiajie's intrusion. How could she refuse his wish that they marry? How insistently and strongly he wanted her, preparing to sacrifice everything for her!

I wish I were a crumbling ruin,
If my love
Green ivy would be,
She'd tenderly entwine
Around my lonely head.

Life was good, love was beautiful. These recollections gave her strength, and her eyelids opened slightly.

After heavy dosages of sedatives and analgesics Dr. Lu was still in a coma. The head of the Internal Medicine Department gave her a careful examination, studied her ECG and her case-history, then told the ward doctor to keep up the intravenous drip and injections of opiate and morphine and to watch out for changes in her ECG monitor to guard against more serious complications due to myocardial infarction.

On leaving the ward he remarked to Sun, "She's too weak. I remember how fit Dr. Lu was when she first came here."

"Yes." Sun shook his head with a sigh. "It's eighteen years since she came to our hospital, just a girl."

*

Eighteen years ago Dr. Sun had already been a well-known ophthalmologist, respected by all his colleagues for his skill and responsible attitude to work. This able, energetic professor in his prime regarded it as his duty to train the younger doctors. Each time the medical college assigned them a new batch of graduates, he examined them one by one to make his choice. He thought the first step to making their Ophthalmology Department the best in all China was by selecting the most promising interns.

How had he chosen Lu? He remembered quite distinctly. At first this twenty-four-year-old graduate had not made much of an impression on him. That morning Department Head Sun had already interviewed five of the graduates assigned to them and had been most disappointed. Some of them were suitable, but they were not interested in the Ophthalmology Department and did not want to work there. Others wanted to be oculists because they thought it a simple, easy job. By the time he picked up the sixth file marked Lu Wenting, he was rather tired and not expecting much. He was reflecting that the medical college's teaching needed improving to give students a correct impression from the start of his department.

The door opened quietly. A slim girl walked softly in. Looking up he saw that she had on a cotton jacket and slacks. Her cuffs were patched, the knees of her blue slacks were faded. Simply dressed, she was even rather shabby. He read the name on her file, then glanced at her casually. She really looked like a little girl, slightly built, with an oval face and neatly bobbed glossy black hair. She calmly sat down on the chair facing him.

Asked the usual technical questions, she answered each in turn, saying no more than was strictly necessary.

"You want to work in the Ophthalmology Department?" Sun asked lethargically, having almost decided to wind up this interview. His elbows on the desk, he rubbed his temples with his fingers.

"Yes. At college I was interested in ophthalmology." She spoke with a slight southern accent.

Delighted by this answer, Sun lowered his hands as if his head no longer ached. He had changed his mind. Watching her carefully he asked more seriously, "What aroused your interest?"

At once this question struck him as inappropriate, too hard to answer. But she replied confidently, "Ophthalmology is lagging behind in our country."

"Good, tell me in what way it's backward," he asked eagerly.

"I don't know how to put it, but 1 feel we haven't tried out certain operations which are done abroad. Such as using laser beams to seal retina wounds. I think we ought to try these methods too."

"Right!" Mentally, Sun had already given her full marks. "What else? Any other ideas?"

"Yes … well … making more use of freezing to remove cataracts. Anyway, it seems to me there are many new problems that ought to be studied."

"Good, that makes sense. Can you read foreign materials?"

"With difficulty, using a dictionary. I like foreign languages."

"Excellent."

That was the first time Sun had praised a new student like this to her face. A few days later Lu Wenting and Jiang Yafen were the first to be admitted to his department. Sun chose Jiang for her intelligence, enthusiasm and enterprise, Lu for her simplicity, seriousness and keenness.

The first year they performed external ocular operations and studied ophthalmology. The second year they operated on eyeballs and studied ophthalmometry and ophthalmomyology. By the third year they were able to do such tricky operations as on cataract cases.

That year something happened which made Sun see Lu in a new light.

It was a spring morning, a Monday. Sun made his round of the wards followed by white-coated doctors, some senior, some junior. The patients were sitting up in bed expectantly, hoping this famous professor would examine their eyes, as if with one touch of his hand he could heal them.

Each time he came to a bed, Sun picked up the case-history hanging behind it and read it while listening to the attending oculist or some senior oculist report on the diagnosis and treatment. Sometimes he raised a patient's eyelid to look at his eye, sometimes patted him on the shoulder and urged him not to worry about his operation, then moved on to the next bed.

After the ward round they held a short consultation, at which tasks were assigned. It was generally Dr. Sun and the attending oculists who spoke, while the residents listened carefully, not venturing to speak for fear of making fools of themselves in front of these authorities. Today was the same. All that had to be said had been said and tasks were assigned. As he stood up to leave, Sun asked, "Have the rest of you anything to add?"

A girl spoke up in a low voice from one corner of the room, "Dr. Sun, will you please have another look at the photograph of the patient in Bed 3 Ward 4?"

All heads turned in her direction.

Sun saw that the speaker was Lu. She was so short, so inconspicuous, that he had not noticed her following him in the wards. Back in the office where they had talked at some length, he had still not noticed her presence.

"Bed 3?" He turned to the chief resident.

"An industrial accident," he was told.

"When he was admitted to hospital a picture was taken of his eye," Lu said. "The radiologists' report said there was no sign of a metal foreign body. After hospitalization the wound was sewn up and healed, but the patient complained of pain. I had another X-ray taken, and I believe there really is a foreign body. Will you have a look, Dr Sun?"

The film was fetched. Sun examined it. The chief resident and attending oculists then passed it round.

Jiang looked wide-eyed at her classmate, thinking, "Couldn't you have waited until after the meeting to ask Dr. Sun to look at that? If by any chance you're wrong, the whole department will gossip. Even if you're right, you're implying that the doctors in the Outpatients Department are careless, and they are attending oculists!"

"You're right, there's a foreign body."

Sun took back the picture and nodded. Looking round at the others he said, "Dr. Lu has not been long in our department. Her careful, responsible attitude is admirable, and so is her hard study."

Lu lowered her head. This unexpected praise in public made her blush. At sight of this Sun smiled. He knew it took great courage and a strong sense of responsibility for a resident oculist to challenge an attending one's diagnosis.

Hospitals have a more complex hierarchy than other organizations. It was an unwritten rule that junior doctors should defer to their seniors; residents should obey the attending doctors; and there could be no disputing the opinions of professors and associate professors. So, Sun attached special importance to Lu's query, since she was so very Junior. From then on his estimate of Lu was, "She's a very promising oculist."

Now eighteen years had passed. Lu, Jiang and their age group had become the backbone of his department. If promotion had been based on competence, they should long ago have had the rank of department heads. But this had not happened, and they were still not even attending doctors. For eighteen years their status had been that of interns, for the "cultural revolution" had broken the ladder leading to promotion.

The sight of Lu at her last gasp filled him with compassion. He stopped the head of the Internal Medicine Department to ask, "What do you think? Will she pull through?"

The department head looked towards her ward and sighed, then shook his head and said softly, "Old Sun, we can only hope she'll soon be out of danger."

Sun walked back anxiously to the ward. His steps were heavy, he was showing his age. From the doorway he saw Jiang still beside Lu's pillow. He halted, not wanting to disturb the two close friends.

In late autumn the nights are long. Darkness fell before six. The soughing wind rustled the phoenix trees outside the window. One by one their withered yellow leaves were blown away.

Sun, watching the whirling yellow leaves outside and listening to the wind, felt gloomier than before. Of these two skilled ophthamologists, two key members of his staff, one had collapsed and might never recover, the other was leaving and might never return. They were two of the mainstays of his department in this prestigious hospital. Without them, he felt his department would be like the phoenix trees buffeted by the wind. It would deteriorate from day to day.

*

She seemed to be walking along an endless road, not a winding mountain path which urged people on, nor a narrow one between fields of fragrant rice. This was a desert, a quagmire, a wasteland, devoid of people and silent. Walking was difficult and exhausting.

Lie down and rest. The desert was warm, the quagmire soft. Let the ground warm her rigid body, the sunshine caress her tired limbs. Death was calling softly, "Rest, Dr. Lu!"

Lie down and rest. Everlasting rest. No thoughts, feelings, worries, sadness or exhaustion.

But she couldn't do that. At the end of the long road, her patients were waiting for her. She seemed to see one patient tossing and turning in bed with the pain in his eyes, crying quietly at the threat of blindness. She saw many eager eyes waiting for her. She heard her patients calling to her in despair, "Dr. Lu!"

This was a sacred call, an irresistible one. She trudged on the long road dragging her numb legs, from her home to the hospital, from the clinic to the ward, from one village to another with a medical team. Day by day, month by month, year by year, she trudged on …

"Dr. Lu!"

Who was calling? Director Zhao? Yes. He had called her by phone. She remembered putting down the receiver, handing over her patient to Jiang, who shared her consulting-room, and heading for the director's office.

She hurried through a small garden, ignoring the white and yellow chrysanthemums, the fragrance of the osmanthus and the fluttering butterflies. She wanted to quickly finish her business with Zhao and return to her patients. There were seventeen waiting that morning, and she had only seen seven so far. Tomorrow she was on ward duty. She wanted to make arrangements for some of the out-patients.

She remembered not knocking but walking straight in. A man and woman were sitting on the sofa. She halted. Then she saw Director Zhao in his swivel-chair.

"Come in please, Dr. Lu," Zhao greeted her.

She walked over and sat down on a leather chair by the window. The large room was bright, tidy and quiet, unlike the noisy clinic, where sometimes the children howled. She felt odd, unused to the quietness and cleanliness of the room. The couple looked cultured and composed. Director Zhao was always erect and scholarly looking, with well-groomed hair, a kind face and smiling eyes behind gold-rimmed spectacles. He had on a white shirt, a well-pressed light grey suit and shining black leather shoes.

The man sitting on the sofa was tall and greying at the temples. A pair of sun-glasses shielded his eyes. Lu saw at a glance that he had eye trouble. Leaning back against the sofa, he was playing with his walking-stick. The woman in her fifties was still attractive, despite her age. Though her hair was dyed and permed, it did not look cheap. Her clothes were well-cut and expensive.

Lu remembered how the woman had sized her up, following her about with her eyes. Her face showed doubt, uneasiness and disappointment.

"Dr. Lu, let me introduce you to Vice-minister Jiao Chengsi and his wife Comrade Qin Bo."

A vice-minister? Well, in the past ten years and more, she had treated many ministers, Party secretaries and directors. She had never paid attention to titles. She simply wondered what was wrong with his eyes. Was he losing his sight?

Director Zhao asked, "Dr. Lu, are you in the clinic or on duty in the ward?"

"Starting from tomorrow, I'll be on ward duty."

"Fine," he laughed. "Vice-minister Jiao wants to have his cataract removed."

That meant she was given the task. She asked the man, "Is it one eye?"

"Yes."

"Which one?"

"The left one."

"Can't you see with it at all?" The patient shook his head.

"Did you see a doctor before?"

As she rose to examine his eye, she remembered he named a hospital. Then his wife, who was sitting beside him, politely stopped her.

"There's no hurry, Dr. Lu. Sit down, please. We ought to go to your clinic for an examination." Smiling, Qin Bo turned to Director Zhao. "Since he developed eye trouble, I've become something of an oculist myself."

Though Lu didn't examine him, she stayed a long time. What had they talked about? Qin had asked her many personal questions.

"How long have you been here, Dr. Lu?"

She hadn't kept track of the years. She only remembered the year she had graduated. So she answered, "I came here in 1961."\fn{The year I turned eighteen.}

"Eighteen years ago." Qin counted on her fingers.

Why was she so interested in this? Then Director Zhao chipped in, "Dr. Lu has a lot of experience. She's a skilled surgeon."

Qin went on, "You don't seem to be in good health, Dr. Lu."

What was she driving at? Lu was so busy caring for others, that she had never given any thought to her own health. The hospital didn't even have her case-history. And none of her leaders had ever inquired after herhealth. Why was this stranger showing such concern?

She hesitated before answering, "I'm very well."

Zhao added again, "She's one of the fittest. Dr. Lu's never missed a day's work for years."

Lu made no answer, wondering why this was so important to this lady, and fretting to get back to her patients. Jiang couldn't possibly cope with so many alone.

Her eyes fixed on Lu, the lady smiled and pressed, "Are you sure you can remove a cataract easily, Dr. Lu?"

Another difficult question. She had had no accidents so far, but anything could happen if the patient didn't co-operate well or if the anaesthetic was not carefully applied.

She couldn’t recollect whether she had made a reply, only Qin’s big eyes staring at her with doubt, unsettling her. Having treated all kinds of patients, she had got used to the difficult wives of high cadres. She was searching for a tactful answer when Jiao moved impatiently and turned his head to his wife, who stopped and averted her gaze.

How had this trying conversation finished? Oh, yes, Jiang had come to tell her that Uncle Zhang had come for his appointment.

Qin quickly said politely, “You can go, Dr. Lu, if you’re busy.”

Lu left the big bright room, which was so suffocating. She could hardly breathe. She was suffocating.

*

Shortly before the day ended, Director Zhao hurried over to the internal medicine ward.

“Dr Lu’s always enjoyed good health, Dr. Sun. Why should she have this sudden attack?" his hands in his pockets, Zhao asked Sun as they headed for Lu’s ward. Eight years Sun’s junior, Zhao looked much younger, his voice more powerful.

He shook his head and went on, “This is a warning. Middle-aged doctors are the backbone of our hospital. Their heavy responsibilities and daily chores are ruining their health. If they collapse one by one, we’ll be in a fix. How many people are there in her family? How many rooms does she have?”

Looking at Sun, who was depressed and worried, he added, “What? … Four in a room? So that’s how it is! What's her wage? … 56.50 yuan! That’s why people say better to be a barber with a razor than a surgeon with a scalpel. There’s some truth in it. Right? Why wasn’t her salary raised last year?”

“There were too many. You can’t raise everyone’s,” Sun said cynically.

“I hope you’ll talk that problem over with the Party branch. Ask them to investigate the work, income and living conditions of the middle-aged doctors and send me a report.”

“What’s the use of that? A similar report was sent in in 1978,” Sun retorted politely, his eyes on the ground.

“Stop grumbling, Dr. Sun. A report’s better than nothing. I can show it to the municipal Party committee, the Ministry of Health and whomever it concerns. The Central Party Committee has stressed time and again that talented people and intellectuals should be valued and their salaries increased. We can’t ignore it. The day before yesterday, at a meeting of the municipal committee, it was stressed that attention should be paid to middle-aged personnel. I believe their problems will be solved.”

Zhao stopped when they entered Lu’s room.

Fu Jiajie stood up as Zhao entered. He waved his hand in greeting and walked over to Lu, bent down and examined her face. Then he took her case-history from her doctor. From a director he had turned into a doctor.

Zhao, a noted thorax expert, had returned to China after Liberation. Very enthusiastic politically, he was praised for both his political consciousness and his medical skill, joining the Party in the fifties. When later he was made director, he had to take part in so many meetings and do so much administrative work, that he seldom found the opportunity to see patients except for important consultations. During the “cultural revolution,” he had been detained illegally and made to sweep the hospital grounds. The last three years, as director again, he had been so tied up with daily problems that he practically had no time or energy for surgery.

Now he had come specially to see Lu. All the ward doctors had gathered behind him.

But he didn’t say anything startling. Having read the case-history and looked at the ECG monitor, he told the doctors to note any changes and watch out for complications. Then he asked, “Is her husband here?”

Sun introduced Fu. Zhao wondered why this charming man in his prime was already going bald. Apparently, a man who didn’t know how to look after himself couldn’t look after his wife either.

“It won’t be easy,” Zhao told him. “She needs complete rest. She’ll need help for everything, even to turn over in bed. Help twenty-four hours a day. Where do you work? You’ll have to ask for leave. You can’t do it all by yourself either. Is there anyone else in your family?”

Fu shook his head. “Just two small children.”

Zhao turned to Sun, “Can you spare someone from your department?”

“For one or two days, maybe.”

“That’ll do to begin with.”

His eyes returning to Lu’s thin pale face, Zhao still couldn’t understand why this energetic woman had suddenly collapsed.

It occurred to him that she might have been too nervous operating on Vice-minister Jiao. Then he dismissed the thought. She was experienced and it was highly improbable that an attack had been brought on by nervousness. Besides, myocardial infarction often had no obvious cause.

But he couldn't dismiss the notion that there was some kind of a link between Jiao's operation and Lu's illness. He regretted having recommended her. In fact, Jiao's wife, Qin Bo, had been reluctant to have her right from the beginning.

That day, after Lu's departure, Qin had asked, "Director Zhao, is Dr. Lu the vice-head of her department?"

"No."

"Is she an attending doctor?"

"No."

"Is she a Party member?"

"No."

Qin said bluntly, "Excuse my outspokenness since we're all Party members, but I think it's rather inappropriate to let an ordinary doctor operate on Vice-minister Jiao."

Jiao stopped her by banging his walking-stick on the floor. Turning to her he said angrily, "What are you taking about, Qin Bo? Let the hospital make the arrangments. Any surgeon can operate."

Qin retorted heatedly, "That's not the right attitude, Old Jiao. You must be responsible. You can work only if you're healthy. We must be responsible to the revolution and the Party."

Zhao quickly butted in to avoid a quarrel, "Believe me, Comrade Qin, although she's not a Communist, Lu's a good doctor. And she's very good at removing cataracts. Don't worry!"

"It's not that, Director Zhao. And I'm not being too careful either."

Qin sighed.

"When I was in the cadre school, one old comrade had to have that operation. He was not allowed to come back to Beijing. So he went to a small hospital there. Before the operation was through his eyeball fell out. Jiao was detained by the followers of the gang\fn{The Gang of Four, as the four leading directors of the Cultural Revolution were called after their downfall in 1976 and subsequent imiprisonment.} for seven years! He has just resumed work. He can't do without his eyes."

"Nothing like that will happen, Comrade Qin. We've very few accidents in our hospital."

Qin still tried to argue her point. "Can we ask Dr. Sun, the department head, to operate on Jiao?"

Zhao shook his head and laughed. "Dr. Sun's almost seventy and has poor eyesight himself! Besides, he hasn't operated for years. He does research, advises the younger doctors and teaches. Dr. Lu's a better surgeon than he."

"How about Dr. Guo then?"

Zhao stared. "Dr. Guo?" She must have made a thorough investigation of the department.

She prompted, "Guo Ruqing."

Zhao gestured helplessly. "He's left the country."

Qin wouldn't give up. "When is he coming back?"

"He's not."

"What do you mean?" This time she stared.

Zhao sighed. "Dr. Guo's wife returned from abroad. When her father, a shopkeeper, died, he left his store to them. So they decided to leave."

"To leave medicine for a store? I can't understand it."

Jiao sighed too.

"He's not the only one. Several of our capable doctors have left or are preparing to go."

Qin was indignant. "I don't understand their mentality."

Jiao waved his stick and turned to Zhao. "In the early fifties, intellectuals like you overcame many difficulties to return here to help build a new China. But now, the intellectuals we've trained are leaving the country. It's a serious lesson."

"This can't go on," said Qin. "We must do more ideological work. After the gang was smashed, the social status of intellectuals was raised a lot. Their living and working conditions will improve as China modernizes."

"Yes. Our Party committee holds the same view. I talked with Dr. Guo twice on behalf of the Party and begged him to stay. But it was no use."

Qin, who was about to continue, was stopped by Jiao who said, "Director Zhao, I didn't come to insist on having an expert or a professor. I came because I've confidence in your hospital, or to be exact, because I have a special feeling for your hospital. A few years ago, the cataract in my right eye was removed here. And it was superbly done."

"Who did it?" Zhao asked.

Jiao answered sadly, "I never found out who she was."

"That's easy. We can look up your case-history." Zhao picked up the receiver, thinking that Qin would be satisfied if he got that doctor. But Jiao stopped him.

"You can't find her. I had it done as an out-patient. There was no case-history. It was a woman with a southern accent."

"That's difficult." Zhao laughed, replacing the receiver. "We have many women doctors who speak with a southern accent. Dr. Lu also comes from the south. Let her do it."

The couple agreed. Qin helped Jiao up and they left.

Was this the cause of Lu's illness? Zhao couldn't believe it. She had performed this operation hundreds of times. She wouldn't be so nervous. He had gone over before the operation and found her confident, composed and well. Why this sudden attack, then?

Zhao looked again at Lu with concern. Even on the brink of death, she looked as if she were sleeping peacefully.

*

Lu was always composed, quiet and never flustered. Another woman would have retorted or shown her indignation at Qin's insulting questions or, at very least, felt resentful afterwards. But Lu had left Zhao's office as calm as ever, neither honored to be chosen to operate on Vice-minister Jiao nor humiliated by Qin's questions. The patient had the right to decide whether or not he wanted an operation. That was all there was to it.

"Well; what big official wants you this time?" Jiang asked softly.

"It's not definite yet."

"Let's hurry." Jiang steered her along. "I couldn't persuade your Uncle Zhang. He's made up his mind not to have the operation."

"That's nonsense! He's traveled a long way to get here and spent much money. He'll be able to see after the transplant. It's our duty to cure him."

"Then you talk him round."

Passing by the waiting-room, they smiled and nodded at the familiar patients who stood up to greet them. Back in her room, while Lu was seeing a young man, she was interrupted by a voice booming,

"Dr. Lu!"

Both Lu and her patient looked up as a tall sturdy man advanced. In his fifties, he was broad-shouldered, wearing black trousers and a shirt and a white towel round his head. At his cry, the people in the corridor quickly made way for him. A head above everyone else and almost blind, he was unaware that he attracted so much attention as he groped his way in the direction of Lu's voice.

Lu hurried forward to help him. "Sit down, please, Uncle Zhang."

"Thank you, Dr. Lu. I want to tell you something."

"Yes, but sit down first." Lu helped him to a chair.

"I've been in Beijing quite a while now. I'm thinking of going home tomorrow and coming back some other time."

"I don't agree. You've come such a long way and spent so much money—"

"That's just it," Uncle Zhang cut in, slapping his thigh. "So I think I'll go home, do some work and earn some more workpoints. Although I can't see, I can still do some work and the brigade's very kind to me. I've made up my mind to leave, Dr Lu. But I couldn't go without saying goodbye to you. You've done so much for me."

Having suffered from corneal ulcers for many years, he had come to the hospital to have a transplant, a suggestion proposed by Lu when she had visited his brigade with a medical team.

"Your son spent a lot of money to send you here. We can't let you go home like this."

"I feel better already!"

Lu laughed. "When you're cured, you can work for another twenty years since you're so strong."

Uncle Zhang laughed. "You bet I will! I can do anything if my eyes are good."

"Then stay and have them treated."

Zhang confided, "Listen, Dr. Lu, I'll tell you the truth. I'm worried about money. I can't afford to live in a Beijing hotel."

Stunned, Lu quickly told him, "I know you're next on the list. Once there's a donor, it'll be your turn."

He finally agreed to stay. Lu helped him out.

Then a little girl of eleven accosted her. Her pretty, rosy face was marred by a squint. Dressed in hospital pyjamas, she called timidly, "Dr. Lu."

"Why don't you stay in the ward, Wang Xiaoman?" She had been admitted the previous day.

"I'm scared. I want to go home."

She began to cry.

"I don't want an operation."

Lu put one arm around her. "Tell me why you don't want an operation."

"It'll hurt too much."

"It won't, you silly girl! I'll give you an anaesthetic. It won't hurt at all." Lu patted her head and bent down to look with regret at the damaged work of art. She said, "Look, won't it be nice when I make this eye look like the other one? Now go back to your ward. You mustn't run around in a hospital."

When the little girl had wiped away her tears and left, Lu returned to her patients.

There had been many patients the last few days. She must make up for the time she had lost in Zhao's office. Forgetting Jiao, Qin and herself, she saw one patient after another.

A nurse came to tell her she was wanted on the phone.

Lu excused herself. It was the kindergarten nurse informing her, "Xiaojia has a temperature. It started last night. I know you're busy, so I took her to the doctor, who gave her an injection. She's still feverish and is asking for you. Can you come?"

"I'll be there in a minute."

She replaced the receiver. But she couldn't go immediately since many patients were waiting. She rang her husband, but was told that he had gone out to a meeting.

Back in her office, Jiang asked, "Who called? Anything important?"

"Nothing." Lu never troubled others, not even her leaders. "I'll go to the kindergarten when I'm through with the patients," she thought as she returned to her desk. At first she imagined her daughter crying and calling her. Later she saw only the patients' eyes. She hurried to the kindergarten when she had finished.

"Why did it take you so long?" the nurse complained. Lu walked quickly to the isolation room where her little daughter lay, her face flushed with fever, her lips parted, her eyes closed, her breathing difficult.

She bent over the crib.

"Mummy's here, darling."

Xiaojia moved and called in a hoarse voice, "Mummy, let's go home."

"All right, my pet." She first took Xiaojia to her own hospital to see a pediatrician.

"It's pneumonia," the sympathetic doctor told her. "You must take good care of her."

She nodded and left after Xiaojia had been given an injection and some medicine.

In the hospital everything stood still at noon, the out-patients having left, the in-patients sleeping and the hospital staff resting. The spacious grounds were deserted except for the chirping sparrows flying among the trees. Nature still competed with men in this noisy center of the city, where tall buildings rose compactly and the air was polluted. In the hospital all day, Lu had never been aware of the birds before.

She couldn't make up her mind where to take her daughter, hating to leave the sick child alone in the kindergarten's isolation room. But who could look after her at home? After some hesitation she steeled herself and headed for the kindergarten.

"No. I don't want to go there," Xiaojia wailed on her shoulder.

"Be a good girl, Xiaojia …"

"No. I want to go home!" She began kicking.

"All right. We'll go home."

They had to go along a busy street with recently pasted advertisements of the latest fashions. Lu never so much as glanced at the costly goods in the shop windows, or the produce the peasants sold in the streets. With two children, it was hard to make ends meet. Now, carrying Xiaojia in her arms and worrying about Yuanyuan at home, she was even less eager to look around.

Arriving home at one o'clock, Lu found a pouting Yuanyuan waiting for her.

"Why are you so late, mummy?" he asked.

"Xiaojia's ill," Lu answered curtly, putting Xiaojia on the bed, undressing her and tucking her in.

Standing at the table Yuanyuan fretted, "Please cook lunch, mummy. I'll be late."

In frustration, Lu shouted at him, "You'll drive me crazy if you go on like that!"

Wronged and in a hurry, Yuanyuan was on the point of tears. Ignoring him, Lu went to stoke up the fire, which had almost gone out. The pots and the cupboard were empty. There were no left-overs from yesterday's meals.

She went back into the room, reproaching herself for having been so harsh on the poor boy.

In the past few years, keeping house had become an increasing burden. During the "cultural revolution" her husband's laboratory had been closed down and his research project scrapped. All he had needed to do was to show his face in the office for an hour in the morning and afternoon. He spent the remainder of his day and talents on domestic chores, cooking and learning to sew and knit, lifting the burden entirely from Lu's shoulders. After the gang was smashed, scientific research was resumed and Fu, a capable metallurgist, was busy again. Most of the housework was shouldered once more by Lu.

Every day at noon, she went home to cook. It was an effort to stoke up the fire, prepare the vegetables and be ready to serve the meal in fifty minutes so that Yuanyuan, Fu and herself could return to school or work on time. When anything unexpected cropped up, the whole family went hungry.

She sighed and gave her son some money.

"Go and buy yourself a bun, Yuanyuan."

He turned back half-way.

"What about you, mummy?"

"I'm not hungry."

"I'll buy you a bun, too." Yuanyuan soon came home with two buns and gave one to his mother. He left for school immediately, eating his on the way.

*

Biting into the cold hard bun, Lu looked around at her small room, which was twelve metres square. She and her husband had been content with a simple life, living in this room since their marriage, without a sofa, wardrobe or a new desk. They had the same furniture they had used when they were single.

Though they owned few material possessions, they had many books. Aunt Chen, a neighbour, had commented, "What will the two bookworms live on?" But they were happy. All they had wanted was a small room, some clothes, and three simple meals a day.

Treasuring their time, they put their evenings to good use. Every night, when their neighbors' naughty children peeped into their small room to spy on the new couple, they invariably found them at work: Lu occupying their only desk studying foreign material with the help of a dictionary and taking notes, while Fu read reference books on a stack of chests.

The evening was not wasted when they could study late quietly and undisturbed. In the summer, their neighbours sat cooling themselves in the courtyard, but the smell of tea, the light breeze, bright stars, interesting news and conversation—none of these could lure them from their stuffy little room.

Their quiet life and studious evenings ended much too soon. Lu gave birth to Yuanyuan and then to Xiaojia. Their lovely children brought disorder and hardship as well as joy to their lives. When the crib was later replaced by a single bed and the tiny room filled with children's clothes, pots and pans, they could hardly move about. Peace was shattered by their children laughing and crying.

What could an oculist achieve without keeping up with foreign developments in the field? Therefore, Lu often sat reading behind a curtain in the room late into the night.

When Yuanyuan began school he had to use their only desk. Only when he had finished doing his homework was it Lu's turn to spread out her notebook and the medical books she had borrowed. Fu came last.

*

How hard life was! Lu fixed her eyes on the little clock: One five, one ten, one fifteen. Time to go to work. What should she do? Lots of things needed winding up before she went to the ward tomorrow. What about Xiaojia? Should she call her husband? There was no telephone booth near by and, anyway, she probably could not get him. As he had wasted ten years, better not disturb him.

She frowned, at a loss what to do. Perhaps she shouldn't have married. Some claimed that marriage ended love. She had naïvely believed that, though it might be true for some, it could not happen to her. If she had been more prudent, she would not have been weighed down by the burdens of marriage and a family.

One twenty.

She must turn to her neighbour Aunt Chen, a kind-hearted woman who had helped on many occasions. Since she would not accept anything for her services, Lu was reluctant to trouble her.

Still she had to this time.

Aunt Chen was most obliging.

"Leave her to me, Dr. Lu."

Lu put some children's books and building blocks beside Xiaojia, asked Aunt Chen to give her the medicine and hurried to the hospital.

She had intended to tell the nurse not to send her too many patients so that she could go home early, but once she started work, she forgot everything.

Zhao called her up to remind her that Jiao was to be admitted the following day. Qin called twice asking about the operation and how Jiao and his family should prepare mentally and materially. Lu was hard put to it to give an answer. She had performed hundreds of such operations and no one had ever asked her that before. So she said, “Oh, nothing special.”

“Really? But surely it’s better to be well prepared. What if I come over and we have a chat?”

Lu quickly told her, “I’m busy this afternoon.”

“Then we’ll talk tomorrow in the hospital.”

“OK.”

When the trying conversation had ended, Lu had returned to her office. It was dark before she had finished her clinic.

Arriving home she heard Aunt Chen singing an impromptu song:

Grow up, my dear,
To be an engineer.

Xiaojia laughed happily. Lu thanked Aunt Chen and was relieved to find Xiaojia's temperature down. She gave her an injection. After Fu returned, Jiang Yafen and her husband, Liu, called.

“We’ve come to say goodbye,” said Jiang.

“Where are you going?” Lu inquired.

“We’ve just got our visas for Canada,” replied Jiang, her eyes fixed on the ground.

Liu’s father, a doctor in Canada, had urged them to join him there. Lu had not expected them to go.

“How long will you stay? When will you come back?” she asked.

“Maybe for good.” Liu shrugged his shoulders.

“Why didn’t you let me know earlier, Yafen?” Lu turned to her friend.

“I was afraid that you’d try to stop me. I was afraid I’d change my mind.” Jiang avoided her eyes, staring hard at the ground.

From his bag, Liu produced some wine and food and said in high spirits, “I bet you haven’t cooked yet. Let’s have our farewell banquet here.”

It was a sorrowful farewell party that evening.

They seemed to be drinking tears instead of wine. To be tasting the bitterness of life instead of delicious dishes.

Xiaojia was asleep, Yuanyuan watching TV next door. Liu raised his cup, eyeing the wine in it, and said with feeling:

“Life—it’s hard to tell how life will turn out! My father was a doctor with a sound classical education. As a child I loved old poetry and longed to become a writer, but I was fated to follow in his footsteps, and now over thirty years have gone. My father was extremely circumspect. His maxim was ‘Too much talk leads to trouble.’ Unfortunately I didn’t take after him. I like talking and airing my views, so that landed me in trouble and I got bashed in each political movement. When graduated in ’57, by the skin of my teeth I missed being labeled a Rightist. In the “cultural revolution,” it goes without saying, I was flayed. I’m Chinese. I can’t claim to have high political consciousness, but at least I love my country and really want China to become rich and strong. I never dreamed that now that I’m nearing fifty I’d suddenly leave my homeland.”

“Do you really have to go?” Lu asked gently.

“Yes. Why? I’ve debated this with myself many times.” Liu shook the half-full cup of red wine he was holding. “I’ve passed middle age and may not live many years longer. Why should I leave my ashes in a strange land?”

The others listened in silence to this expression of his grief at leaving. Now he suddenly broke off, drained his cup and blurted out, “Go on, curse me! I’m China’s unfilial son!”

“Don’t say that, Liu. We all know what you’ve been through.”

Fu refilled his cup. “Now those dark years are over, the sun is shining again. Everything will change for the better.”

“I believe that,” Liu nodded. “But when will the sun shine on our family? Shine on our daughter? I can’t wait.”

“Let’s not talk about that.” Lu guessed that Liu felt impelled to leave for the sake of his only daughter. Not wanting to go into this, she changed the subject. “I never drink, but today before you and Yafen leave I want to drink to you.”

"No, we should drink to you." Liu put down his cup. "You're the mainstay of our hospital, one of China's up-and-coming doctors!"

"You're durnk," she laughed. "I'm not."

Jiang, who had been keeping quiet, now raised her cup and said, "I drink to you from the bottom of my heart! To our twenty-odd years of friendship, and to our future eye-specialist!"

"Goodness! You're talking nonsense! Who am I?" Lu brushed aside this compliment.

"Who are you?" Liu was really half tipsy. "You live in cramped quarters and slave away regardless of critiicism, not seeking fame or money. A hard-working doctor like you is an ox serving the children, as Lu Xun said, eating grass and providing milk. Isn't that right, Old Fu?"

Fu drank in silence and nodded.

"There are many people like that, I'm not the only one," Lu demurred with a smile.

"That's why ours is a great nation!" Liu drained another cup.

Jiang glanced at Xiaojia sound asleep on the bed, and said sympathetically, "Yes, you're too busy attending to your patients to nurse your own little girl."

Liu stood up to fill all the cups and declared, "She's sacrificing herself to save mankind."

"What's come over you today, boosting me like this?"

Lu wagged a finger at Fu.

"You ask him if I'm not selfish, driving my husband into the kitchen and turning my children into ragamuffins. I've messed up the whole family. The fact is, I'm neither a good wife nor mother."

"You're a good doctor!" Liu cried.

Fu took another sip of wine, then put down his cup and commented, "I think your hospital is to blame. Doctors have homes and children like everyone else. And their children may fall ill. Why does no one show any consideration for them?"

"Fu!" Liu cut in loudly. "If I were Director Zhao, I'd first give you a medal, and one each to Yuanyuan and Xiaojia. You're the ones victimized to provide our hospital with such a fine doctor—"

Fu interrupted, "I don't want a medal or a citation. I just wish your hospital understood how hard it is to be a doctor's husband. As soon as the order comes to go out on medical tours or relief work, she's up and off, leaving the family. She comes back so exhausted from the operating theatre, she can't raise a finger to cook a meal. That being the case, if I don't go into the kitchen, who will? I should really be grateful to the "cultural revolution" for giving me all that time to learn to cook."

"Yafen said long ago that your 'bookworm' label should be torn off." Liu patted his shoulder and laughed. "You can study one of the most advanced branches of science for space travel, and put on a stunning performance in the kitchen—you're becoming one of the new men of the communist era. Who says the 'cultural revolution's' achievements were not the main aspect of it?"

Fu normally never drank. Today after a few cups his face was red. He caught hold of Liu's sleeve and chuckled, "Right, the 'cultural revolution' was a great revolution to remould us. Didn't those few years\fn{ 1966-1976.} change me into a male housewife? If you don't believe it, ask Wenting. Didn't I turn my hand to every chore?"

This embittered joking upset Lu. But she could not stop them. It seemed this was now the only way to lessen their grief at parting. She forced herself to smile back at her husband.

"You learned to do everything except sew cloth shoe-soles. That's why Yuanyuan keeps clamouring for a pair of gym shoes."

"You expect too much," said Liu with a straight face. "However thoroughly Fu remoulds himself, he can't turn into an old village woman carrying a shoe-sole around everywhere!"

"If the 'gang of four' hadn't been smashed, I might really have carried a shoe-sole to the criticism meetings in my institute," said Fu. "Just think, if things had gone on like that, science, technology and learning would all have been scrapped, leaving nothing but sewing cloth shoe-soles."

But how long could they keep up these wry jokes? They talked of the springtime of science since the overthrow of the gang, of the improved political status of intellectuals although they were underpaid, of the difficulties of middle-aged professionals. The atmosphere became heavy again.

"Old Liu, you have lots of contacts, it's too bad you're leaving." Fu roused himself to slap Liu on the back. "I hear home helps get very well paid. I'd like you to find me a place as a male domestic."

"My leaving doesn't matter," Liu retorted. "Just put an ad in that new paper The Market."

"That's a good idea!"

Fu adjusted his thick-rimmed glasses. "The advertiser is a university graduate with a mastery of two foreign languages. A good cook, tailor and washerman, able to do both skilled and heavy work. His health is sound, his temper good, he's bold, hard-working and willing to accept criticism. And, last of all, his wages can be settled at the interview." He laughed.

Jiang was sitting quietly, neither eating nor drinking. Watching them laugh, she wanted to join in but could not. She nudged her husband.

"Don't talk like that, what's the point?"

"This is a widespread social phenomenon, that's the point." Liu made a sweeping gesture. "Middle age, middle age. Everyone agrees that middle-aged cadres are the backbone of our country. The operations in a hospital depend on middle-aged surgeons; the most important research projects are thrust on middle-aged scientists and technicians; the hardest jobs in industry are given to mIddle-aged workers; the chief courses in school are taught by middle-aged teachers—"

"Don't go on and on!" Jiang put in. "Why should a doctor worry about all that?"

Liu screwed up his eyes and continued half tipsy, "Didn't Lu You say, 'Though in a humble position I remain concerned for my country?' I'm a doctor no one has ever heard of, but I keep affairs of state in mind. Everyone acknowledges the key role of the middle-aged, but who knows how hard their life is? At work they shoulder a heavy load, at home they have all the housework. They have to support their parents and bring up their children. They play a key role not just because of their experience and ability, but because they put up with hardships and make great sacrifices—as do their wives and children."

Lu had listened blankly. Now she interposed softly, "It's a pity so few people realize that."

Fu, who had been speechless, filled Liu's cup and declared cheerfully, "You should have studied sociology."

Liu laughed sarcastically. "If I had, I'd have been a big Rightist! Sociologists have to study social evils."

"If you uncover them and set them right, society can make progress. That's to the left not the right," said Fu.

"Never mind, I don't want to be either. But I really am interested in social problems. For instance, the problem of the middle-aged." Liu rested his elbows on the table, toying with his empty cup, and began again. "There used to be a saying, 'At middle age a man gives up all activities.' That was true in the old society when people aged prematurely. By forty they felt they were old. But now that saying should be changed to 'At middle age a man is frantically busy!' Right? This reflects the fact that in our new society people are younger, full of vitality. Middle age is a time to give full play to one's abilities."

"Well said!" Fu approved. "Don't be in such a hurry to express approval. I've another crazy notion." Liu gripped Fu's arm and continued eagerly, "Looking at it that way, you can say our middle-aged generation is lucky to be alive at this time. But in fact we're an unlucky generation."

"You're monopolizing the conversation!" protested Jiang.

But Fu said, "I'd like to hear why we're unlucky."

"Unlucky because the time when we could have done our best work was disrupted by Lin Biao and the 'gang of four,'" Liu sighed. "Take your case, you nearly became an unemployed vagrant. Now we middle-aged people are the ones chiefly responsible for modernization, and we don't feel up to it. We haven't the knowledge, energy or strength. We're overburdened—that's our tragedy."

"There's no pleasing you!" laughed Jiang. "When you're not used, you complain that your talents are wasted, you live at the wrong time. When you're fully used, you gripe that you're overworked and underpaid!"

"Don't you ever complain?" her husband retorted.

Jiang hung her head and did not answer.

All Liu had said had given Lu the impression that he felt impelled to leave not entirely for his daughter's sake, but also for his own.

Once more Liu raised his cup and cried, "Come on! Let's drink to middle age!"

*

After their guests had gone and the children were asleep, Lu washed up in the kitchen. In their room, she found her husband, leaning against the bed, deep in thought, his hand on his forehead.

"A penny for them, Jiajie." Lu was surprised he looked so depressed.

Fu asked in reply, "Do you remember Petöfi's poem?"

"Of course!"

"'I wish I were a crumbling ruin …' Fu removed his hand from his forehead. "I'm a ruin now, like an old man. Going bald and grey. I can feel the lines on my forehead. I'm a ruin!"

He did look older than his age. Upset, Lu touched his forehead.

"It's my fault! We're such a burden to you!"

Fu took her hand and held it lovingly. "No. You're not to blame."

"I'm a selfish woman, who thinks only about her work." Lu's voice quivered. She couldn't take her eyes away from his forehead. "I have a home but I've paid it little attention. Even when I'm not working, my mind is preoccupied with my patients. I haven'' been a good wife or mother."

"Don't be silly! I know more than anyone how much you've sacrificed!" He stopped as tears welled up in his eyes.

Nestling up against him, she said sadly, "You've aged. I don't want you to grow old …"

"Never mind. 'If my love green ivy would be, she'd tenderly entwine around my lonely head.'" Softly he recited their favourite poem.

In the still autumn night, Lu fell asleep against her husband's chest, her lashes moist with tears. Fu put her carefully on the bed. Opening her eyes she asked, "Did I fall asleep?"

"You're very tired."

"No. I'm not."

Fu propped himself up and said to her, "Even metal has fatigue. A microscopic crack is formed first, and it develops until a fracture suddenly occurs."

That was Fu's field of research, and he often mentioned it. But this time, his words carried weight and left a deep impression on Lu.

A dreadful fatigue, a dreadful fracture. In the quiet of the night, Lu seemed to hear the sound of breaking. The props of heavy bridges, sleepers under railways, old bricks and the ivy creeping up ruins—all these were breaking.

2

The night deepened. The pendent lamp in the room having been turned off, the wall lamp shed a dim blue light.

Before her eyes flitted two blue dots of light, like fireflies on a summer night or a will-o'-the-wisp in the wilderness, which turned into Qin's cold stare when she looked carefully.

Qin, however, had been warm and kind when she summoned Lu to Jiao's room the morning he entered the hospital.

"Sit down please, Dr. Lu. Old Jiao has gone to have his ECG done. He'll be back in a minute."

All smiles, she had risen from an armchair in a room in a quiet building with red-carpeted corridors reserved for high cadres.

Qin had asked her to sit in the other armchair, while she went over to the locker beside the bed and got out a basket of tangerines, which she placed on the side table between the chairs.

"Have a tangerine."

Lu declined. "No, thank you."

"Try one. They were sent to me by a friend in the south. They're very good." She took one and offered it to her.

Lu took it, but held it in her hand. Qin's new friendliness sent a chill down her spine. She was still conscious of the coldness in Qin's eyes when they had first met.

"What actually is a cataract, Dr Lu? Some doctors told me that an operation is not suitable for all cases." Qin's manner was humble and ingratiating.

"A growth which progressively covers the eyeball, destroying the sight." Looking at the tangerine in her hand, Lu explained. "It can be divided into stages. It's better to have the operation done when the cataract is mature."

"I see. What happens if it isn't done then?"

"The lens shrinks as the cortex is absorbed. The suspensory ligament becomes fragile. The difficulty of the operation increases as the lens is liable to be dislocated."

Qin nodded. She had not understood nor tried to understand what she had been told. Lu wondered why she had bothered to ask questions. Just passing time? Having started her ward duty only that morning, she had to familiarize herself with the cases of her patients and attend to them. She couldn't sit there, making small talk. She wanted to check Jiao's eyes if he returned soon.

Qin had more questions for her.

"I heard there was an artificial lens abroad. The patient needn't wear a convex lens after an operation. Is that right?”

Lu nodded. “We’re experimenting on that too.”

Qin inquired eagerly, “Can you put one in for my husband?”

Lu smiled. “I said it’s still at the experimental stage. I don’t think he’d want one now, do you?”

“No.” Of course she didn’t want him to be a guinea pig. “What is the procedure for his operation?”

Lu was baffled. “What do you mean?”

“Shouldn’t you map out a plan in case something unexpected crops up?” As Lu looked blank, she added, “I’ve often read about it in the papers. Sometimes surgeons form a team to discuss and work out a plan.”

Lu couldn’t help laughing. “No need for that! This is a very simple operation.”

Disgruntled, Qin looked away. Then she turned back and pressed her point patiently with a smile, “Underestimating the enemy often leads to failure. This has happened in the history of our Party.” Then she got Lu to describe certain situations which could cause the operation to fail.

“One has to think twice about patients with heart trouble, hypertension or bronchitis. Coughing can create problems.”

“That'’ just what I feared,” Qin cried, striking the arm of her chair. “My husband’s heart isn’t good and he has high blood pressure.”

“We always examine the patient thoroughly before an operation,” Lu consoled her.

“He has bronchitis too.”

“Has he been coughing lately?”

“No. But what if he does on the operating-table? What shall we do?”

Why was she so anxious, Lu wondered, looking at her watch. The morning was almost gone. Her glance fell on the white lace curtain hanging beside the French windows and tension gripped her when the footsteps approaching the door moved away again. After a long time, Jiao, a blue and white dressing-gown round his shoulders, was helped in by a nurse.

Qin commented, “It’s taken you a long time!”

Jiao shook Lu’s hand and flopped down exhausted in the armchair. “There were lots of examinations. I had a blood test, an X-ray, and an ECG. The staff were all very kind to me. I didn’t have to wait my turn.”

He sipped the cup of tea Qin handed him. “I never thought an eye operation involved so many tests.”

Lu read the reports. “The X-ray and the ECG are normal. Your blood pressure’s a bit high.”

Qin piped up. “How high?”

“150 over 100. But that doesn’t matter.” Then she asked, “Have you been coughing recently, Vice-minister Jiao?”

“No,” he answered lightly.

Qin pressed, “Can you guarantee that you won’t cough, on the operating-table?”

“Well …” Jiao was not so sure.

“That’s important, Old Jiao,” Qin warned him gravely. “Dr. Lu just told me that if you cough, the eyeball can fall out."

Jiao turned to Lu.

“How can I be certain I won’t cough?”

“It’s not that serious. If you are a smoker, don’t smoke before the operation.”

“OK.”

Qin pressed again. “But what if you should cough? What will happen?”

Lu laughed. “Don’t worry, Comrade Qin. We can sew up the incision and open it again after he stops coughing.”

“That’s right,” said Jiao. “When I had my right eye operated on, it was sewn up and then opened again. But it wasn’t because I coughed!”

Curiosity made Lu ask, “Why then?”

Jiao put down his cup and took out his cigarette case, but put it away again remembering Lu’s advice. With a sigh he related, “I’d been labelled as a traitor and was having a difficult time. When the sight went in my right eye I had an operation. Soon after it started, the rebels came and tried to force the surgeon not to treat me. I nearly choked with indignation, but the doctor calmly sewed up the incision, threw the rebels out and then removed the cataract.”

“Really?” Stunned, Lu asked, “Which hospital was that?”

“This one.”

A coincidence? She looked at Jiao again to see whether she had seen him before, but could not recognize him.

Ten years ago, she had been operating on a so-called traitor when she had been interrupted by some rebels. That patient's name was Jiao. So it was he! Later, the rebels from Jiao's department, collaborating with a rebel in the hospital, put up a slogan claiming that "Lu Wenting betrays the proletariat by operating on the traitor Jiao Chengsi."

No wonder she hadn't recognized him. Ten years ago, Jiao, sallow and depressed, dressed in an old cotton-padded coat, had come to the hospital alone as an ordinary patient. Lu suggested an operation and made an appointment, which he kept. When she began operating she heard the nurse saying outside, "No admittance. This is the operating theatre."

Then she heard shouting and noises.

"Shit! He's a traitor. We're against treating traitors."

"We won't allow stinking intellectuals to treat traitors."

"Force open the door!"

Jiao, indignant, said on the operating-table, "Let me go blind, doctor. Don't do it."

Lu warned him against moving and quickly sewed up the incision.

Three men charged in, while the more timid ones hesitated at the door. Lu sat there immobile.

Jiao said the doctor had thrown them out. As a matter of fact, Lu had not. She had sat on the stool by the operating-table in her white gown, green plastic slippers, blue cap and mask. All that could be seen of her were her eyes and her bare arms above the rubber gloves. The rebels were awed perhaps by her strange appearance, the solemn atmosphere of the operating theatre and the bloody eye exposed through a hole in the white towel covering the patient. Lu said tersely from behind her mask, "Get out, please!" The rebels looked at each other and left. When Lu resumed work, Jiao told her, "Don't do it, doctor, they'll only blind me again even if you cure me. And you may get involved."

"Keep quiet."

Lu worked swiftly. When she was bandaging him, all she had said was, "I'm a doctor." That was how it had happened.

The rebels from Jiao's department, coming to the hospital to put up a big-character poster denouncing her for curing a traitor, had created quite a sensation. But what did it matter? She was already being criticized for being a bourgeois specialist. These charges and this operation had not left much impression on her. She had forgotten all about it, until Jiao had brought it up.

"I really respect her, Dr. Lu. She was a true doctor."

Qin sighed.

"Pity the hospital kept no records then. I can't find out who she was. Yesterday I expressed my wish to Director Zhao to have her operate on my husband." Lu's awkward expression made her add, "I'm sorry, Dr Lu. Since Director Zhao has confidence in you, we will too. I hope you won't let him down. Learn from that doctor. Of course, we've a lot to learn from her too, don't you agree?"

Lu had no alternative but to nod.

"You're still young," Qin said encouragingly. "I heard you haven't joined the Party yet. You must strive for it, comrade."

Lu told her frankly, "I don't have a good class background."

"That's not the way to look at things. You can't choose your family but you can choose what you do with your life." Qin was eloquent and enthusiastic. "Our Party does pay attention to class origins, but not exclusively. It's your attitude that counts. When you draw the line between yourself and your family, get close to the Party and make contributions to the people, then the Party will open its doors to you."

Lu crossed the room to draw the curtain and examined Jiao's eye. Then she told Jiao, "If it's all right with you, let's do the operation the day after tomorrow."

Jiao answered briskly, "All right. The earlier the better."

It was already after six when Lu took her leave. Qin hurried out after her.

"Are you going home, Dr Lu?"

"Yes."

"Shall I arrange for Jiao's car to take you?"

"No, thank you." Lu declined with a wave of her hand.

*

It was almost midnight, the ward was very quiet. A single wall lamp cast a pale blue light on an intraven- ous drip, from which the medicine was dropping, as if the only sign of Dr Lu's life.

Fu, sitting at the side of the bed, stared blankly at his wife. It was the first time that he had sat alone with her since her collapse, probably the first time that he had looked at her so intently for the past dozen years.

He remembered that once he had fixed his eyes on her for a long time, and she had asked, her head on one side, "Why do you look at me like that?" Sheepishly he had turned his eyes away. That was when they were courting. But now she could neither move her head nor speak. Vulnerable, she was unable to raise a protest.Only then did he notice that she looked surprisingly frail and old! Her jet-black hair was streaked with grey; her firm, tender skin, loose and soft; and there were lines on her forehead. The corners of her mouth, once so pretty, were now drooping. Her life, like a dying flame, was petering out fast. He could not believe that his wife, a firm character, had become so feeble overnight!

She was not weak, he knew that well. Slim in build, she was in fact fit and strong. Though her shoulders were slight, she silently endured all hardships and sudden misfortunes. She never complained, feared or became disheartened.

"You're a tough woman," he had often said to her.

"Me? No, I'm timid. Not tough at all."

Her answer was always the same. Only the night before she had fallen ill, she had made, as Fu put it, another "heroic decision:" that he should move to his institute.

Xiaojia had quite recovered by then.

*

After Yuanyuan had done his homework, the children went to bed. At last there was peace in the small room.

Autumn had come, the wind was cold. The kindergarten had asked parents for their children's winter clothes. Lu took out the cotton-padded coat Xiaojia had worn the previous year, ripped it apart, made it bigger and sewed on a new pair of cuffs. Then she spread it out on the desk and added a layer of new cotton padding.

Fu took his unfinished article from the bookcase and, hesitating for a brief second beside the desk, sat down on the bed.

"Just a moment," Lu said without turning her head, hurrying, "I'll soon finish."

When she removed the coat from the desk, Fu remarked, "If only we could have another small room. Even six square metres, just big enough for a desk."

Lu listened, lowering her head, busy sewing. After a while, she hastily folded up the unfinished coat and said, "I've got to go to the hospital now. You can have the desk."

"But why? It's late," he queried.

She said, while putting on her jacket, "There will be two operations tomorrow morning and I want to check how the patients are. I'll go and have a look at them."

She often went to the hospital in the evening in fact. So Fu teased her, saying, "Though you're here at home, your heart's still in the hospital."

"Put on more clothes. It's cold," he urged.

"I won't be long," she said quickly. With an apologetic smile, she continued, "Two funny patients, you know. One's a vice-minister. His wife's been worrying to death about the operation and making an awful fuss. So I must go to see him. The other's a little girl. She told me today that she had a lot of nightmares and slept badly."

"OK, doc!" He smiled. "Get going and come back soon!"

She left. When she returned he was still burning the midnight oil. Not wanting to disturb him, she said after tucking up the children's quilt, "I'm going to bed first."

He looked round, saw she was in bed and again buried himself in his papers and books. But soon he sensed that she had not fallen asleep. Was it perhaps the light? He bent the lamp lower, shielded the light with a newspaper and carried on with his work.

After a while, he heard her soft, even snoring. But he knew that she was faking. Many times, she had tried to pretend she slept well, so he could feel at ease studying late. In fact he had long since seen through her little trick, but had no heart to expose it.

Some time later, he got to his feet, stretched and said, "All right! I'll sleep too."

"Don't worry about me!" Lu said quickly. "I'm already half asleep."

Standing with his hands on the edge of the desk, he hesitated, looking at his unfinished article. Then he made up his mind and said, closing all the books, "I'll call it a day."

"How about your article? How can you finish it if you don't make full use of your nights?"

"One night can't make up for ten years."

Lu sat up, threw a sweater over her shoulders and said in earnest, her head against the bed board, “Guess what I’ve been thinking just now?”

“You oughtn’t to have thought of anything! Now close your eyes. You’ll have to cure other people’s eyes tomorrow.”

“It’s no joke. Listen, I think you should move into your institute. Then you’ll have more time.”

Fu stared at her.

Her face was glowing, her eyes dancing. Obviously she was very pleased with the idea. She went on, “I’m serious. You’ve things to do. I know, the children and I have been hampering you.”

“Come off it! It’s not you—”

Lu broke in, “Of course it is! We can’t divorce. The children need their father, and a scientist needs his family. However, we must think of some way to turn your eight working hours into sixteen.”

“But the children and the housework will all fall on you. That won’t do!”

“Why not? Even without you, we can manage.”

He listed all the problems, to which she answered one by one. Finally she said, “Haven’t you often remarked that I’m a tough woman? I can cope. Your son won’t go hungry, your daughter won’t be ill-treated.”

He was convinced. So they decided to have a try the next day.

“It’s so very difficult to do something in China!” Fu said, undressing. “During the war, many old revolutionaries died for a new China. Now to modernize our country, again our generation has to make sacrifices though hardly anyone notices it.”

He kept talking to himself like this. When he put his clothes on the back of a chair and turned to get into bed, he saw that Lu had fallen asleep. With a faint smile on her face, she looked pleased with her proposal, even in her dreams.

*

But who would imagine their trial would fail on the very first day?

The operations were sucessful, though Lu’s private plan failed.

That morning when she had entered the ward ten minutes early as usual, Dr. Sun was already there waiting for her.

“Good morning, Dr. Lu,” he greeted her, “we’ve got a donor’s eye today. Can we fit in the corneal transplant?”

“Excellent! We’ve got a patient who’s anxious to have the operation done as soon as possible,” Lu exclaimed in delight.

“But you already have two operations scheduled for this morning. Do you think you can manage a third?”

“Sure,” she replied, straightening up as if showing him that she was perfectly capable.

“OK, it’s settled then.” He had made up his mind. Holding the arm of Jiang, who had just arrived, Lu headed for the operating theatre. She was in high spirits, walking with a spring in her step, as though on an outing.

The operating theatres of this hospital, occupying a whole floor, were large and impressive. The big characters OPERATING THEATER in red paint on the beige glass door were striking. When a wheeled stretcher bearing a patient was pushed through this door, his relatives remained outside, anxiously looking at the mysterious, perhaps even frightening place, as if Death were lurking about inside.

But in fact, the operating theatre was a place of hope. Inside, the walls along the wide corridor were painted a light, agreeable green. Here there were the operating theaters for the various departments. The surgeons, their assistants, anaesthetists and theater nurses scurried to and fro lightly. No laughter, no chatter. This was the most quiet, most orderly area of the large hospital, into which more than a thousand patients poured every day.

Vice-minister Jiao was brought into one of these theaters, and then put on a high cream-coloured operating table. His head was covered by a sterilized white towel. There was an olive-shaped hole in it revealing one of his eyes.

Lu already in her overall sat on a stool near the operating table, her gloved hands raised. The height of the stool was adjustable. Lu, being small, had to raise it whenever she operated. But today, it had already been adjusted. She turned and glanced at Jiang gratefully, realizing she had done it.

A nurse pushed the surgical instrument table nearer to Lu. The adjustable plate was now placed above the patient’s chest, within the surgeon’s reach.

“Shall we start now?” Lu asked watching Jiao’s eye. “Try to relax. We’ll first inject a local anaesthetic. Then your eye will feel numb. The operation won’t take long.”

At this, Jiao suddenly cried out, “Steady on!”

What was wrong? Both Lu and Jiang were taken aback. Jiao pulled away the towel from his face, striving to raise his head. He inquired, pointing at Lu:

"It was you, Dr. Lu, who operated before on my eye?"

Lu quickly raised her gloved hands lest he touch them. Before she could speak, he went on emotionally, "Yes, it was you. It must have been you! You said the same words. Even your tone and intonation are the same!"

"Yes, it was me," Lu had to admit.

"Why didn't you tell me before? I'm so grateful to you."

"Never mind …" Lu could not find anything else to say. She cast a glance at the towel, beckoned the nurse to change it. Then she said again, "Shall we start, Vice-minister Jiao?"

Jiao sighed. It was hard for him to calm down. Lu had to say in a commanding tone, "Don't move. Don't speak. We'll start now."

She skilfully injected some novocaine into his lower eyelid and began the operation. She had performed such operations umpteen times, but every time she picked up her instruments, she felt like a raw recruit on the battlefield. Lu held out two tapering fingers to pick up a needle-holder which looked like a small pair of scissors. She fixed the needle to the instrument.

"What's the matter?" Jiang asked softly. Instead of answering, Lu held the hook-shaped needle up to the light to examine it.

"Is this a new one?"

Jiang had no idea, so they both turned to the nurse. "A new needle?"

The nurse stepped forward and said in a low voice, "Yes, a new one."

Lu had another look at the needle pin and grumbled, "How can we use such a needle?" Lu and some other doctors had complained many times about the poor quality of their surgical instruments. However, faulty ones appeared from time to time. Lu could do nothing about it. When she found good scalpels, scissors and needles, she would ask the nurse to keep them for her for later use.

She had no idea that all the surgical instruments had been replaced by new ones that day, but unfortunately there was a bad needle among them. Whenever such things occurred, Lu's good-natured face would change, and she would reprimand the nurse. The young nurse, though innocent perhaps, could not defend herself. There was nothing to say in the circumstances. A blunt needle not only prolonged the operation, but also increased the patient's suffering.

Frowning, Lu said quietly, so that Jiao could not overhear, "Bring me another!"

It was an order, and the nurse picked out an old needle from a sterilizer.

The theatre nurses respected Lu, while at the same time being afraid of her. They admired her skill and feared her strictness. A doctor's authority was established through his scalpel. A good oculist could give a blind man back his sight, while a bad one might blind him permanently. Lu had no position, no power, but through her scalpel she wielded authority.

The operation was almost complete, when Jiao's body jerked suddenly.

"Don't move!" Lu warned him.

"Don't move!" Jiang repeated quickly. "What's the matter?"

"I … want to … cough!" a strangled voice sounded from under the towel.

This was just what his wife had feared would happen. Why choose this moment to cough? Was it psychological? A conditioned reflex?

"Can you control it for a minute?"

"No, I … I can't." His chest was heaving.

There was no time to lose! Lu hurriedly took emergency measures, while calming him down. "Just a second! Breathe out and hold your cough!"

She was quickly tying up the suture while he exhaled, his chest moving vigorously as if he would die of suffocation at any moment. When the last knot was done, Lu sighed with relief and said, "You can cough now, but not too loudly."

But he did not. On the contrary, his breath gradually, grew even and normal.

"Go ahead and cough. It won't matter," Jiang urged again.

"I'm awfully sorry," Jiao apologized. "I'm all right now. Carry on with the operation please."

Jiang rolled her eyes, wanting to give him a piece of her mind. A man of his age should know better. Lu threw her a glance, and Jiang bit back her resentment. They smiled knowingly at each other. It was all in the day's work!
Lu snipped off the knots and started the operation again. It continued without a hitch. Afterwards Lu got off the stool and sat at a small table to write out a prescription, while Jiao was moved back on to the wheeled stretcner.

As it was being pushed out, Jiao suddenly called to Lu, like a kid who has misbehaved, his voice trembling slightly.

Lu stepped over to him. His eyes had been bandaged. “Anything I can do?” she stooped to ask.

He reached out, groping. When he caught hold of her hands, still in their gloves, he shook them vigorously. “I’ve given you much trouble on both occasions. I’m so sorry …”

Lu was stunned for a brief moment. Then she consoled him, looking at his bandaged face, “Never mind. Have a good rest. We’ll take off the bandage in a few days.”

After he was wheeled out, Lu glanced at the clock. A forty-minute operation had lasted an hour. She took off her white gown and rubber gloves and immediately donned another. As Lu turned to let the nurse tie the gown at the back, Jiang asked, “Shall we continue?”

“Yes.”

“Let me do the next operation,” Jiang begged. “You take a short rest, then do the third.”

Lu shook her head and said smilingly, “I’ll do it. You’re not familiar with Wang Xiaoman. The child’s scared stiff. We became friends during the last few days. Better leave her to me.”

The girl did not come into the operating theater on a wheeled stretcher, but was almost dragged in. In a white gown, which was a bit too large for her, she was reluctant to go anywhere near the operating-table.

“Aunt Lu, I’m scared. I don’t want the operation. Please go and explain to my mother.”

The sight of the doctors and nurses in such strange clothes terrified her. Her heart was pounding, as she tried to wrench away from the nurses, pleading with Lu for help.

Lu walked towards the table and coaxed her with a grin, “Come on, little girl. Didn’t you promise to have this operation? Be brave! There’s nothing to fear. You won’t feel any pain once you’ve been given some anaesthetic.”

Xiaoman sized up Lu in her funny clothes and gazed at her kind, smiling, encouraging eyes. Then she climbed up on to the operating-table. A nurse spread a towel over her face. Lu motioned the nurse to tie up her hands. As the little patient was about to protest, Lu said, perching on the table, “Xiaoman, be a good girl! It’s the same for all patients. Really, it won’t take long.” She gave her an injection of the anaesthetic while telling her, “I’m giving you an injection and soon your eye will feel nothing at all.”

Lu was both doctor, devoted mother and kindergarten nurse. She took the scissors, forceps and other instruments which Jiang handed to her while keeping up a running commentary for the benefit of the girl. When she severed the straight muscle which caused the squint, Xiaoman’s nerve was affected and she became nauseous.

“You feel a little sick?” Lu asked. “Take a deep breath. Just hold on for a minute. That’s better. Still sick? Feeling any better? We’ll finish the operation very soon. There’s a good girl!”

Lu’s words lulled Xiaonian into a trance while the operation continued. When she had been bandaged and wheeled out of the room, she remembered what her mother had told her to say, so she called out sweetly, “Thank you very much, Aunty.”

Everyone burst out laughing. The minute hand of the clock on the wall had just moved half an hour.

Lu was wet with sweat, the perspiration beading on her forehead, her underwear soaking. Wet patches showed under her armpits. She was surprised at this because it was not hot. Why had she perspired so profusely? She slightly moved her numb arms, which had ached from being raised for the duration of the operation.

When she removed the operating gown again and reached out for another, she suddenly felt dizzy. She closed her eyes for a minute, shook her head several times and then slowly eased one of her arms into a sleeve. A nurse came to help her tie the gown.

“Dr. Lu!” the nurse exclaimed suddenly. “Your lips are so pale!”

Jiang, who was also changing, turned to look at Lu.

“Goodness!” she said in astonishment. “You do look very pale!”

It was true. There were black rings under her eyes, even her lids were puffy, She looked a patient herself!

Seeing that Jiang’s startled eyes remained fixed on her, Lu grinned and said, “Stop fussing! It’ll soon be over.” She had no doubt that she could carry on with the next operation. Had she not worked like this for years?

“Shall we continue?” the nurse queried.

“Yes, of course.”

How could they afford to stop? The donor’s eye could not be stored too long, nor the operation be delayed. They had to go on working.

“Wenting,” Jiang stepped over to Lu and suggested, “Let’s have a break for half an hour.”

Lu looked at the clock. It was just after ten. If they postponed it for half an hour, some colleagues would. be late for lunch, while others had to rush home to prepare a meal for their children.

“Continue?” the nurse asked again.

“Yes.”

Doctors of this and other hospitals who were undergoing further training thronged the door talking to Lu. They had got special permission to see her operate.

Uncle Zhang, helped by a nurse, clambered on to the operating-table, still talking and laughing.

The table was a bit too small for him and his feet and hands dangled over the sides. He had a loud voice and talked incessantly, joking with a nurse, “Don’t laugh at me, girl. If the medical team hadn’t come to our village and persuaded me to have this operation, I’d rather die than let you cut my eye with a knife. Just imagine! A steel knife cutting into my flesh, ugh! Who knows if it will do me some good or not? Ha Ha …”

The young nurse tittered and said softly, “Uncle, lower your voice please.”

“I know, young lady. We must keep quiet in a hospital, mustn’t we?” he still boomed. Gesticulating busily with one hand, he went on, “You can’t imagine how I felt when I heard that my eye could be cured. I wanted to laugh and, at the same time, to cry. My father went blind in his old age and died a blind man. I never dreamed that a blind man like me could see the sun again. Times have really changed, haven’t they?”

The nurse giggled while covering him with a towel. “Don’t move again, Uncle!” she said. “This towel’s been sterilized, don’t touch it.”

“All right,” he answered gravely. “Since I’m in hospital, I should obey the rules.” But he was trying to raise his strong arms again.

Worrying about his restlessness, the nurse said, holding a strap, “I’ll have to tie your arms to the table, Uncle. That’s the rule here.”

Zhang was puzzled, but soon chortled. “Truss me up, eh?” he joked. “OK, go aheadl To be frank, lass, if it were not for my eyes, I wouldn’t be so obedient. Though blind, I go to the fields twice a day. I was born a lively character. I like to be on the go. I just can’t sit still.”

This made the nurse laugh, and he himself chuckled too. But he stopped immediately when Lu entered. He asked, cocking up his ears, “Is that you, Dr. Lu? I can recognize your steps. It’s funny, since I lost my sight, my ears have grown sharp.”

Seeing him full of beans, Lu could not help laughing. She took her seat, preparing for the operation. When she picked up the precious donor’s cornea from a phial and sewed it on to a piece of gauze, he piped up again, “So an eye can be replaced? I never knew that!”

“It’s not replacing the whole eye, just a filmy membrane,” Jiang corrected him.

“Can’t see the difference.” He wasn’t interested in details. With a sigh, he continued, “It needs much skill, doesn’t it? When I return to my village with a pair of good eyes, the villagers will say I must have met some kind fairy. Ha Ha! I’ll tell them I met Dr. Lu!”

Jiang tittered, winking at Lu, who felt a little embarrassed. Still sewing, she explained, “Other doctors can do the same.”

“That’s quite true,” he agreed. “You only find good doctors in this big hospital. No kidding!”

Her preparations over, Lu parted his eyelids with a speculum and said, “We’ll start now. Just relax.”

Zhang was not like other patients, who only listened to whatever the doctors said. He thought it impolite not to answer. So he said understandingly, “I’m perfectly all right. Go ahead. I don’t mind if it’s painful. Of course, it hurts to cut with a scalpel or a pair of scissors. But don’t worry about me. I trust you. Besides—”

Jiang had to stop him, still smiling. “Uncle, don’t talk any more.”

Finally he complied.

Lu picked up a trephine, small as a pen cap, and lightly cut out the opaque cornea. Cutting a similar disc of clear cornea from the donor’s eye, she transferred it to Zhang’s eye. Then she began the delicate task of stitching it with the needle-holder. The suture was finer than a hair.

The operation went smoothly. When she had finished, the transplanted cornea was perfectly fixed on the surface of the eye. But for some little black knots, one could never tell it was a new cornea.

“Well done!!” the doctors around the operating table quietly exclaimed in admiration.

Lu sighed with relief. Deeply touched, Jiang looked up at her friend with feeling. Silently, she put layers of gauze over Zhang’s eye.

As he was wheeled out, Zhang seemed to awaken from a dream. He became animated again. When the wheeled stretcher was already out of the door, he cried out, “Thanks a lot, Dr. Lu!”

The operations had ended. As Lu was pulling herself to her feet, she found her legs had gone to sleep. She simply could not stand up. After a little rest, she tried again and again, till she finally made it. There was a sudden pain in her side. She pressed it with her hand, not taking it seriously for it had occurred before. Engrossed in an operation, sitting on the little stool, for hours at a time, she was aware of nothing else. But as soon as this operation had ended, she felt utterly exhausted, even too tired to move.

*

At that moment, Fu was cycling home in haste. He had not intended to return that day. Early that morning, Fu, at his wife's suggestion, had rolled up his bedding, put it on his bicycle carrier and taken it to his office to begin his new life.

By noon, however, he was wavering. Would Lu finish her operations in time? Imagining her dragging herself home to prepare lunch for the children, he suddenly felt a pang of guilt. So he jumped on his bicycle and pedalled home.

Just as he turned into their lane, he caught sight of his wife leaning against a wall, unable to move.

"Wenting! What's wrong?" he cried out, leaping off to help.

"Nothing. I'm just a bit tired." She put an arm round his shoulder and moved slowly towards home.

Fu noticed that she was very pale and that beads of cold sweat had broken out on her forehead. He asked uneasily, "Shall I take you to hospital?"

She sat down on the edge of the bed, her eyes closed, and answered, "Don't worry. I'll be all right after a short rest." She pointed to the bed, too weak to say anything.

Fu took off her shoes and coat.

"Lie down and get some sleep. I'll wake you later."

He went to boil some water in a saucepan. When he came back to fetch noodles, he heard her say, "We ought to have a rest. Shall we take the children to Beihai Park next Sunday? We haven'' been there for more than ten years."

"Fine. I'm all for it!" Fu agreed, wondering why she should suddenly want to go there.

He gave her an anxious glance and went to cook the noodles. When he returned, food in hand, she had already fallen asleep. He did not disturb her. When Yuanyuan came home, the two of them sat down to eat.

Just then, Lu began groaning. Fu put down his bowl and rushed to the bed. Lu was deathly white, her face covered in sweat. "I can't fight it," she said in a feeble voice, gasping for breath.

Frightened, Fu took her hand asking, "What's wrong? Have you any pain?"

With a great effort, Lu pointed to her heart. Panicking, Fu pulled open a drawer rummaging for a pain-killer. On second thoughts, he wondered if she needed a tranquilizer.

Though in great pain, she was clear-headed. She signed to him to calm down and said with all her remaining strength, "I must go to hospital!"

Only then did Fu realize the seriousness of her illness. For more than ten years she had never seen a doctor, though she went to the hospital every day. Now she was obviously critically ill. As he hurried out, he stopped at the door and turned to say, "I'll go and get a taxi."

He rushed to the public telephone on the corner. He dialled quickly and waited. When someone answered, he heard a cold voice saying, "No taxis at the moment."

"Look, I've got a very sick person here!"

"Still, you'll have to wait half an hour."

Fu began to plead, when the man rang off. He tried to call Lu's hospital, but no one seemed to be in the office of the Ophthalmic Department. He asked the operator to put him through to the vehicle dispatch office.

"We can't send you a car without an offical approval slip," was the answer.

Where on earth could he track down the hosiptal leaders to get an approval slip?

"But this is urgent! Hello!" he shouted into the receiver. But the line had already gone dead.

He phoned the political department which, he thought, ought to help him out. After a long time, a woman picked up the receiver. She listened patiently and said politely, "Would you please contact the administration department?"

He had to ask the operator to put him through to the administration department. Recognizing his voice, the operator demanded impatiently, "Where exactly do you want?"

Where? He was not sure himself. In a begging voice, he said he wanted to speak to anyone in the ad. ministration department. The telephone rang and rang. Nobody answered.

Disappointed, Fu abandoned the idea of finding a car. He headed for a small workshop in the lane making cardboard boxes, hoping to borrow a tricycle and trailer. The old lady in charge, hearing of his predicament, sympathized with him, but unfortunately could do nothing, for both her bicycles were out.

What was to be done? Standing in the alley, Fu was desperate. Sit Lu on the bicycle carrier? That was impossible. Just then, Fu saw a van coming. Without muchthought, he raised his hand to stop it. The van came to a. halt, and the driver poked his headout, staring In surprise. But when he heard what was happening, he beckoned Fu to get into the van.

They went straight to Fu's home. When the driver saw Lu being dragged towards the van supported by her husband, he hurried to help her get into the cabin. Then slowly he drove her to the casualty department of the hospital.

*

She had never slept so long, never felt so tired. She felt pain all over her body as if she had just fallen from a cloud. She had not the slightest bit of strength left. After a peaceful sleep, her limbs were more relaxed, her heart calmer. But she felt her mind go blank.

For years, she had simply had no time to pause, to reflect on the hardships she had experienced or the difficulties lying ahead. Now all physical and mental burdens had been lifted. She seemed to have plenty of time to examine her past and to explore the future. But her mind had switched off; no reminiscences, no hopes. Nothing.

Perhaps it was only a dream. She had had such dreams before …

One evening when she was only five, a north wind had been howling. Her mother had gone out, leaving her alone at home. Soon it was very dark and her mother had not returned. For the first time, Lu felt lonely, terrified. She cried and shouted, "Mama! … mama! …" This scene often appeared later in her dreams. The howling wind, the door blown open by a sudden gust and the pale kerosene lamp remained vividly in her mind. For a long time, she could not tell whether it had been true or a dream.

This time, it was not a dream but reality. She was in bed, ill, and Jiajie was attending her. He looked flaked out too. He was dozing, half lying on the bed. He would catch cold if not awakened. She tried to call him, but no sound came out of her mouth. There was a lump in her throat choking her. She wanted to pull a coat over him, but her arms did not seem to belong to her.

She glanced round and saw she was in a single room. Only serious cases were given such special treatment. She was suddenly seized by fear. "Am I …"

The autumn wind rattled the door and windows. Darkness gathered, swallowing up the room. Lu felt clearer after a cold sweat. It was real, she knew, not a dream. This was the end of life, the beginning of death!

So this was dying, no fear, no pain, just life withering away, the senses blurring, slowly sinking, like a leaf drifting on a river.

All came to an end, inevitably. Rolling waves swept over her chest. Lu felt she was floating in the water "Mama … mama …"

She heard Xiaojia's call and saw her running along the bank. She turned back, reaching out her arms.

"Xiaojia … my darling daughter …"

But waves swept her away, and Xiaojia's face grew vague, her hoarse voice turned into sobbing.

"Mama … plait my hair …"

Why not plait her hair? The child had been in this world for six years, and her one desire was to have pigtails. Whenever she saw other girls with pigtails adorned with silk ribbons, admiration overwhelmed her little heart. But such requests were ignored. Mother had no time for that. On Monday morning, the hospital was crowded with patients and, for Lu, every minute counted.

"Mama … mama …"

She heard Yuanyuan's calling and saw the boy running after her along the bank. She turned back, stretching out her arms.

"Yuanyuan … Yuanyuan …" A wave swept over her. When she struggled to the surface, there was no sign of her son, only his voice in the distance.

"Mama … don't forget … my white gymn shoes …"

A kaleidoscope of sports shoes whirled around. White and blue sneakers, sports boots, gym shoes, white shoes with red or blue bands. Buy a pair for Yuanyuan, whose shoes were already worn out. Buy a pair of white gym shoes and he would be in raptures for a month. But then the shoes disappeared and raining down were price tags: 3.1 yuan, 4.5 yuan, 6.3 yuan …

Now she saw Jiajie chasing after her, his running figure mirrored in the water. He was in a great hurry, his voice trembling as he called, "Wenting, you can't leave us like this!"

How she wished that she could wait for him! He held out his hand to her, but the ruthless current raced forward and she drifted away helplessly.

"Dr. Lu … Dr. Lu …"

So many people were calling her, lining the banks. Yafen, Old Liu, Director Zhao, Dr Sun, all in white coats; Jiao Chengsi, Uncle Zhang and Wang Xiaoman in pyjamas. Among the other patients, she only recognized a few. They were all calling her.

I oughtn't to leave. No! There are so many things I still have to do. Xiaojia and Yuanyuan shouldn't be motherless. I mustn't bring Jiajie more sorrow. He can't afford to lose his wife so young. I can't tear myself away from the hospital, the patients. Oh no! I can't give up this miserable, yet dear life! I won't drown! I must fight! I must remain in the world. But why am I so tired? I''ve no strength to resist, to struggle. I'm sinking, sinking …

Ah! Goodbye, Yuanyuanl Goodbye, Xiaojia! Will you miss your mother? In this last moment of my life, I love you more than ever. Oh, how I love you! Let me embrace you. Listen, my darlings, forgive your mummy who did not give you the love you deserved. Forgive your mummy who, time and again, refrained from hugging you, pushing away your smiling faces. Forgive your mummy for leaving you while you're still so small.

Goodbye, Jiajie! You gave up everything for me! Without you, I couldn't have achieved anything. Without you, life had no meaning. Ah, you sacrificed so much for me! If I could, I would kneel down before you begging your pardon since I can never repay all your kindness and concern. Forgive me for neglecting you. I often thought I should do something more for you. I wanted to end my work regularly and prepare supper for you. I wanted to let you have the desk, hoping you would finish your article. But it's too late! How sad! I've no time now.

Goodbye, my patients! For the past eighteen years, my life was devoted to you. Whether I walked, sat or lay down, I thought only of you and your eyes! You don't know the joy I felt after curing an eye. What a pity I shall no longer feel that …

*

"Arrhythmia!" the doctor monitoring the screen exclaimed.

"Wenting! Wenting!" Fu cried out, fixing his eyes on his wife, who was struggling for breath.

The doctors and nurses on duty rushed into the room.

"Intravenous injection of lidocaine!" the doctor snapped an order.

A nurse quickly injected it, but before it was finished, Lu's lips went blue, her hands clenched, her eyes rolled upwards.

Her heart stopped beating.

The doctors began massage resuscitation. A respirator was applied to her head, which made a rhythmic sound. Then a defibrillator went into operation. When her chest was struck by this, her heart began to beat again.

"Get the ice cap ready!" the doctor in charge ordered, the sweat on his forehead.

An ice cap was put on Lu's head.

*

The pale dawn could be seen outside the window. Day had broken at last. Lu had lived through a crucial night. She now entered a new day.

A day nurse came into the room and opened the windows, letting in fresh air and the birds' merry singing. At once the pungent smell of medicine and death were dispelled. Dawn brought new hope to a frail life.

Another nurse came to take Lu's temperature, while a medical orderly brought in breakfast. Then the doctor on duty dropped in on his ward round.

Wang Xiaoman, still bandaged, pleaded with a nurse, "Let me have a look at Dr. Lu! Just one peep."

"No. She nearly died last night. No one's allowed to see her for the time being."

"Aunt, perhaps you don't know, but she fell ill because she operated on me. Please let me go and see her. I promise not to say a word to her."

"No, no, no!" The nurse scowled.

"Oh please! Just one glance." Xiaoman was close to tears. Hearing footsteps behind her, she turned and saw Old Zhang coming, led by his grandson.

"Grandpa," she rushed to him, "will you have a word with this aunt? She won't let me …"

Zhang, with his eyes bandaged, was dragged over by the little girl to the nurse.

"Sister, do let us have a look at her."

Now with this old man pestering her too, the nurse flared up, "What's the matter with you people, fooling about in the wards?"

"Come off it! Don't you understand?" Zhang's voice was not so loud today. He went on humbly, "We've a good reason, you know. Why is Dr. Lu ill? Because she operated on us. To be frank, I can't really see her, but to stand beside her bed for a while will calm my nerves."

He was so sincere that the nurse softened and explained patiently, "It's not that I'm being mean. Dr. Lu's seriously ill with heart trouble. She mustn't be excited. You want her to recover very soon, don't you? Better not disturb her at the moment."

"Yes, you're quite right."

Zhang sighed and sat down on a bench. Slapping his thigh, he said regretfully, "It's all my fault. I urged her to do the operation as quickly as possible. But who would've thought …" What shall I do if anything happens to her?"

He lowered his head in remorse.

Dr. Sun hurried to see Lu too before starting his work, but was stopped by Xiaoman.

"Dr. Sun, are you going to see Dr. Lu?" she asked.

He nodded.

"Will you take me along? Please."

"Not now. Some time later. OK?"

Hearing Sun's voice, Zhang stood up and reached out for him. Tugging Sun's sleeve, he said, "Dr. Sun. We'll do as you say. But can I have a word with you? I know you're extremely busy. But I still want you to listen to what's been bothering me."

Sun patted Zhang on the shoulder and said, "Go ahead."

"Dr. Lu's a very good doctor. You leaders ought to do your best to cure her. If you save her, she can save many others. There are good medicines, aren't there? Give her them. Don't hesitate. I hear you have to pay for certain precious medicines. Lu's got two children. She's not well off. Now she's ill. I don't expect she can afford them. Can't this big hospital subsidize her?"

He stopped, holding Sun's hands, slightly cocking his ear towards him, waiting for his answer.

Sun had a one-track mind. He never showed his feelings. But today he was moved. Shaking Zhang's hands, he said emotionally, "We'll do everything possible to save her!"

Zhang seemed satisfied. He called his grandson to come nearer, and groped for a satchel which was slung across the boy's shoulder.

"Here are some eggs. Please take them to her when you go in."

"It's not necessary," Sun replied quickly.

This put Zhang's back up instantly. Gripping Sun's hands, he raised his voice, "If you don't take them to her, I won't let you go!"

Sun had to accept the satchel of eggs. He decided to ask a nurse to return it and explain later. As though guessing what was in Sun's mind, Zhang continued, "And don't ask someone to bring them back."

Forced to acquiesce, Sun helped Zhang and Xiaoman down the stairs.

Qin, accompanied by Director Zhao, approached Lu's room.

"Zhao," the woman talked while walking, rather excitedly, "I was like a bureaucrat. I didn't know it was Dr. Lu who had operated on Old Jiao. But you should have known, shouldn't you? Luckily Jiao recognized Lu. Otherwise we'd still be in the dark."

"I was sent to work in the countryside at that time," Zhao replied helplessly.

Shortly after they had entered the room, Sun arrived. The doctor on duty gave a brief report of the emergency measures taken to save Lu the previous night. Zhao looked over the case-history, nodding. Then he said, "We must watch her carefully."

Fu, seeing so many people entering, had stood up. But Qin, unaware of his presence, quickly sat down on the vacant stool.

"Feeling better, Dr. Lu?" she asked.

Lu's eyes opened slightly but she said nothing.

"Vice-minister Jiao has told me all about you," Qin said warmly. "He's very grateful to you. He would have come himself if I hadn't stopped him. I'm here to thank you on his behalf. Anything you fancy eating, anything you want, let me know. I can help you. Don't stand on ceremony. We're all revolutionary comrades."

Lu closed her eyes.

"You're still young. Be optimistic. Since you're sick, it's better to accept it. This—"

Zhao stopped her by saying, "Comrade Qin Bo, let her have some rest. She's only just regained consciousness."

"Fine, fine. Have a good rest," Qin said, rising to her feet. "I'll come again in a couple of days."

Out of the ward, Qin complained frowning, “Director Zhao, I must give you a piece of my mind. Dr. Lu’s a real treasure. If you had been more concerned about her, she wouldn’t have become so ill. The middle-aged comrades are the backbone of our country. It’s imperative to value talented people.”

“Right,” was Zhao's reply.

Gazing after her receding figure, Fu asked Sun in a small voice, “Who’s she?”

Sun looked over the frame of hisspectacles at the doorway and answered, frowning, “An old lady spouting revolutionary phrases!”

*

That day, Lu was slightly better and could open her eyes easily. She drank two spoonfuls of milk and a sip of orange juice. But she lay with her eyes blank, staring at the ceiling. She wore a vacant expression, as if indifferent to everything, including her own critical condition and the unhappiness of her family. She seemed weary of life.

Fu stared at her in mute horror for he had never seen her like this before. He called her again and again, but she only responded with a slight wave of her hand, as though not wishing to be disturbed. Probably she felt comfortable letting her mind remain suspended.

Time passed unheeded. Fu, sitting at her bedside, had not slept for two nights. He felt exhausted. Dozing, he was suddenly awoke by a heart-rending scream, which shook the whole ward. He heard a girl wailing next door, “Mama! Mama!” and a man’s sobbing. Then there came the sound of footsteps as many people rushed to the room.

Fu hurried out too. He saw a wheeled stretcher being pushed out of the room, on which lay a corpse covered with a sheet. Then the nurse in white pushing the stretcher appeared. A girl of sixteen with disheveled hair stumbled out, shaking, and threw herself at the stretcher. Clutching at it with trembling hands, she pleaded, tears streaming down her cheeks, “Don’t take it away! Please! My mother’s asleep. She’ll soon wake up! I know she will!”

Visitors made way for the wheeled stretcher. In silence, they paid their respects to the deceased.

Fu stood rooted amid the crowd. His cheekbones stuck out prominently in his haggard face. His bloodshot eyes began to fill with tears. Clenching his fists, he tried to pull himself together, but shook allover. Unnerved by the girl’s shrill cries, he wanted to cover his ears.

“Mama, wake up! Wake upl They’re taking you away!” the girl screamed madly. Had she not been held back by others, she would have pulled off the sheet. The middle-aged man following the stretcher repeated, sobbing, “I’ve let you down! I’ve let you I down!”

His desperate cries were like a knife piercing Fu’s heart, as he stared at the stretcher. All of a sudden, as if electrified, he dashed towards his wife’s room. He went straight to her, threw himself on the bed. He murmured with closed eyes, “You’re alive!”

Lu stirred, awakened by his heavy breathing. She opened her eyes and looked at him, but her eyes didn’t seem to focus.

He felt a shiver of fear and cried out, “Wenting!”

Her eyes lingered on his face coldly, and this made his heart bleed. Fu did not know what to say or do to encourage her to hold on to life. This was his wife, the dearest person in the world. How long ago was it since he had read poems to her in Beihai Park that winter? During all these years, she had always been his beloved. Life would be unthinkable without her! He must keep her with him!

Poetry! Read a poem to her as he had done then! It was poetry which had helped him to win her before! Today, he would recite the same poem to remind her of sweet memories, to give her the courage to live on. Half-kneeling beside her bed, he began to recite with tears in his eyes:

I wish I were a rapid stream,
If my love
A tiny fish would be,
She’d frolic
In my foaming waves.

The verses seemed to have touched her. She turned her head towards him, her lips moving slightly. Fu leaned over and listened to her indistinct words: “I can no longer … swim …”

Choking back his tears, he continued:

I wish I were a deserted forest,

If my love
A little bird would be,
She'd nest and twitter
In my dense trees.

She murmured softly, "I can no longer … fly …"

His heart ached. Steeling himself, he went on, in tears:

I wish I were a crumbling ruin,
If my love
Green ivy would be,
She'd tenderly entwine
Around my lonely head.

Tears, blind tears silently poured down her cheeks and fell on the white pillow. With an effort, she said, "I can't … climb up!"

Fu threw himself on to her, weeping bitterly. "I've failed you as a husband …"

When he opened his tearful eyes, he was astonished. Again she remained with her eyes fixed on the ceiling. She seemed unaware of his weeping, his appeals, unaware of everything around her.

On hearing Fu's sobbing, a doctor hurried in and said to him, "Dr. Lu's very weak. Please don't excite her."

Fu said nothing more the whole afternoon. At dusk, Lu seemed a little better. She turned her head to Fu and her lips moved as if wanting to speak.

"Wenting, what do you want to say? Tell me," Fu asked, holding her hands.

She spoke at last, "Buy Yuanyuan … a pair of white gym shoes …"

"I'll do it tomorrow," he replied, unable to check his tears. But he quickly wiped them away with the back of his hand.

Lu, still watching him, seemed to have more to say.

But she only uttered a few words after a long time, "Plait … Xiaojia's hair …"

"Yes, I will!" Fu promised, still sobbing. He lookedat his wife, his vision blurred, hoping she would be able to tell him all that was worrying her. But she closed her lips, as if she had used up her energy.

*

Dear Wenting,

I wonder if you will ever receive this letter. It's not impossible that this won't reach you. But I hope not! I don't believe it will happen. Though you're very ill, I believe you'll recover. You can still do a lot. You're too young to leave us!

When my husband and I came to say goodbye to you last night, you were still unconscious. We'd wanted to see you this morning, but there were too many things to do. Yesterday evening may be the last time we will meet. Thinking of this, my heart breaks. We've been studying and working together for more than twenty years. No one understands us as well as we do each other. Who would imagine we would part like this?

I'm now writing this letter in the airport. Can you guess where I'm standing at this moment? At the arts and crafts counter on the second floor. There's no one about, only the shining glass counter in front of me. Remember the first time we traveled by air, we came here too? There was a pot of artificial narcissuses with dew on their petals, so lifelike, so exquisite! You told me that you liked it best. But when we looked at the price, we were scared off. Now, I'm before the counter again, alone, looking at another pot, almost the same colour as the one we saw. Looking at it, I feel like crying. I don't know why. Now I realize suddenly, it's because all that has gone.

When Fu had just got to know you, I remember once he came to our room and recited a line by Pushkin, "All that has happened in the past becomes a sweet memory." I pursed my lips and said it wasn't true. I even asked, "Can past misfortunes become sweet memories?" Fu grinned, ignoring me. He must have thought inwardly. that I knew nothing about poetry. But today I understand. Pushkin was right. It exactly reflects my mood now. It's as if he wrote the line for me! I really feel that all the past is sweet.

A jet has just taken off, its engines roaring. Where is it going? In an hour, I'll be climbing up the steps into the plane, leaving my country. With only sixty minutes to go, I can't help weeping, and my tears wet this letter. But I've no time to rewrite it.

I'm so depressed, I suddenly feel as if I've made the wrong decision. I don't want to leave everything here. No! I can't bear to leave our hopsital, our operating theatre, even that little desk in the clinic! I often grumbled that Dr. Sun was too severe, never forgiving a mistake. But now I wish I could hear his criticism again. He was a strict teacher. If not for him, I wouldn't be so skilled!

The loudspeakers have just wished passengers bon voyage. Will mine be good? Thinking of boarding the plane in a moment, I feel lost. Where will I land? What lies in store? My heart's in my boots. I'm scared! Yes, scared stiff! Will we get used to a strange country, which is so different from ours? How can my mind be at peace?

My husband's sitting in an armchair brooding. Busy packing the last few days, he had no time to think. He seemed quite firm about the decision. But last night, when he stuffed the last coat into the suitcase, he said all of a sudden, "We'll be homeless from tomorrow!" He's not spoken since then, and I know his mind is still divided.

Yaya was most happy about this trip. She was nervous and excited, and sometimes I felt like hitting her. But now she's standing at the glass door watching the planes landing and taking off, as if reluctant to leave.

"Won't you change your minds?" you asked that night when we were at your place.

I can't answer that question in one sentence. Liu and I have been discussing it almost every day for the past few months. Our minds have been in a turmoil. There are many reasons, of course, urging us to leave China. It is for Yaya, for Liu and myself. However, none of those reasons can lessen my pain. We shouldn't leave, when China has just begun a new period. We've no excuse for avoiding our duties. Compared with you, I'm a weaker character. Though I had less trouble than you in the past ten years. I couldn't bear it as you did. I often burst out when viciously slandered and attacked. I wasn't stronger than you. On the contrary, it shows my weakness. Better to die than be humiliated, I thought. But there was Yaya. It was surprising that I was able to brazen it out in those days, when Liu was illegally detained as an "enemy agent."

All these are bitter memories of the past. Fu was right in saying, "Darkness has receded, and day has dawned." The trouble is, the evil influence of many years can't be eradicated overnight. The policies of the government take a long time to reach the people. Resentment is not easily removed. Rumours can kill a person. I dread such a nightmare. I lack your courage!

I remember that you and I were cited at that meeting as bourgeois specialists. When we left the hospital afterwards, I said to you, "I can't understand all this. Why should people who have worked hard in their field be crushed? I'll refuse to attend such meetings as a protest!" But you said, "Forget it! If they want to hold a hundred such meetings, let them. I'll attend. We'll still have to do the operations. I'll study at home." I asked you, "Don't you feel wronged?" You smiled and said, "I'm so busy, I've no time to care." I admired you very much. Before we parted, you warned me, "Don't tell Fu about such things. He's in enough trouble himself." We walked a block in silence. I noticed that you looked very calm, very confident. No one could shake your faith. I knew that you had a strong will, which enabled you to resist all kinds of attacks and go your own way. If I had half your courage and will-power, I wouldn't have made such a decision.

Forgive me! This is all I can say to you now. I'm leaving, but I'm leaving my heart with you, with my dear homeland. Wherever I go, I'll never forget China. Believe me! Believe that I'll return. After a few years, when Yaya's grown up and we have achieved something in medicine, we'll come back..

I hope you'll soon recover! Learn a lesson from your illness and pay more attention to your health. I'm not advising you to be selfish. I've always admired your selflessness. I wish you good health to make full use of your talents!

Goodbye, my dearest friend!

Affectionately,

Yafen

*

A month and a half later, Dr. Lu had basically recovered and was permitted to go home.

It was a miracle. Ill as she was, Lu, several times on the brink of death, survived. The doctors were greatly surprised and delighted.

That morning, Fu jubilantly helped her put on a cotton-padded jacket, a pair of woollen trousers, a blue overcoat, and wrapped around her neck a long fluffy beige scarf.

"How are things at home?" she asked.

"Fine. The comrades of your Party branch came yesterday to help clean the room."

Her thoughts immediately turned to that small room with the large bookcase covered with a white cloth, the little alarm-clock on the window-sill and the desk …

She felt feeble and cold, though so warmly dressed. Her legs trembled when she stood up. With one hand gripping her husband's arm, the other touching the wall, she moved forward leaning heavily on Fu. Slowly, she walked out of the ward.

Zhao, Sun and her other colleagues followed her, watching her progress along the corridor towards the gate.

It had rained for a couple of days. A gust of wind sighed through the bare branches of the trees. The sunshine, extraordinarily bright after the rain, slanted in through the windows of the corridor. The cold wind blew in too. Slowly Fu, supporting his wife, headed for the sunlight and the wind.

A black car was waiting at the steps. It had been sent by the administration department at Zhao's request.

Leaning on her husband's shoulder, Lu walked slowly towards the gate …

64.1 Kitty Is Dead\fn{by Chao Shu-min aka Lu Ai (1935-   )} Peking, China (F) 10

She is crying, it really is she who is crying, deep and hard, suppressing the sound of unparalleled grief. Could this be her crying? It must be she! Although the bedroom light isn't on, she is surely inside.

"Madame! Director!"

No one answered, but the sound of crying went on as before. But why? I was only gone a little more than two hours, what could have happened? Could it be one of her parents? No, it couldn't be. If that was it she would have gone back to her own family. Maybe it's her husband … oh no! Ten …

"Madame! Director!"

"The mournful sound of crying began again and the chair moved. I was right! She is inside, but isn't willing to let me help her. It doesn't matter then: she's at home, I've called to her many times, so if anything happens it's not my responsibility. Now I'm wary of anything, anything that could happen that night implicate me. Living on the inside for more than two years was already enough, more than enough. Two such long, long years, such insufferable years, that I never want to return. So, as I was leaving no one said the tabooed, "See you again."

And the husband? He was here at dinnertime, but where has he wandered off to now? No, it couldn't have anything to do with him. In spite of the fact that she's usually a little bit cold, if anything actually had happened with her husband she would have early on gone to the place where she should go. Even if she stays at home friends of theirs would come to see her and stay with her. What is so nerve racking is that there's no way to help her. What she is doing is so unlike her—too unlike her. Normally she is not very easily moved, which means whatever it is that has happened she must consider to be very serious.

Standing outside her door like a fool was pointless. The bedroom, study, and guest room doors were all closed: pitch black inside and out, it was suffocating. Go downstairs! Though both upstairs and downstairs were as lonely as death, at least there were still a couple of lights on the living room. I flipped through the newspaper, through a magazine—stop! The sound of turning the pages was so grating. Kitty! Kitty! Where have you run off to? Usually she loves to meow, but now I just don't know where she's skittered off to. And the husband? The husband is in the wrong too: something has happened at home, his wife has been hurt this way but once again he's unyielding, unmanageable, and awkward. At a time like this he shouldn't have gone out to wander in the night.

I had vowed that I would repay Madame, but now I can't help her at all. Being a very nervous person, I really wanted to go and say: Director! You're usually so open minded, you can usually endure so much normal people can't stand, what is worth making you act like this?

But she wouldn't listen to me. What did I expect? After all. I'm a convict who she has helped look after. Taking in a female convict just out of prison to manage your house isn't something any ordinary person would do. What she really needed at the time was a relatively high class maid—but she didn't have to hire me. I believe that only because she's a good hearted soul who is concerned about the destiny of mankind did she request the New Life Protection Committee for a female convict, just released on a commuted sentence, that she could hire as "house manager." Although I just fit those qualifications, I still felt it was an act of kindness as well as purpose. Otherwise, where would I, a girl. all alone on Taiwan whose family is entangled in Vietnam, go? Before being released, the judicial authorities had corresponded with the relatives and friends of each of those whose sentences had been commuted, telling them to take these people back and accept them. But since I had done those crazy things my classmates and friends had repeatedly admonished me not to do, they already cut off all contact with me. My family had fallen into enemy territory: I wasn't sure if they were dead or alive, and I had no one to notify. I know they thought of contacting the Overseas Chinese Association but I opposed it. Having done something wrong myself was my own responsibility; how could I bother anyone else? So, that's why I went and applied when I heard that Director Hao was looking for a house-hold manager. To be honest, a household manager is what is normally called a maid, but what's wrong with being a maid? Anyway, the first thing I had to do was find a place to hang my hat any tune up my disposition before I could re-enter this society. All my prison buddies thought it strange—a university student! Why was I willing to be a servant? What's wrong with being a servant? You have to depend on your own strengths and capabilities to earn a living, moreover, there was this attitude of Director Hao's: that she was willing to let a convict, fresh out of prison, into her family was, needless to say, an expression of confidence in my resources as well as a gesture of magnanimity and trust. Because of this, I was willing to do anything for her; I'll never forget that day! It was July fourteenth! Early in the morning I picked up my simple luggage and went straight to her h0use to start work. She said:

"You've come! I really regret that I didn't go to meet you but I wasn't willing to let anyone—including my chauffeur—know where you've come from. Only this way will you feel completely natural and composed when you meet them face to face. From here on in there's no need for you to demean yourself because of the past; you've already paid an appropriate price for your impulsive moment. Though it wasn't worth it, you've already paid. Enough! After you've been here a while you can resume your studies or find a more suitable profession."

Wonderful! No scathing statements to make me feel insecure, she made me calm down immediately and want to repay her kindness in full. The first thing I thought of telling her in repayment was that to present this untidy, haggard countenance of hers to people was very unwise. But no! I had learned not to overstep my bounds so I didn't say anything. She had already perceived my doubts and said:

"You came early today, I haven't even had a chance to wash my face! Wait until I get washed and I'll tell you what to do, starting with breakfast."

She picked up a small notebook covered with grease and handed it to me to look at. The work which needed to be done was scribbled down in the notebook. The first was making breakfast; Mr. Chuang, her husband, eats two poached eggs, one cup of coffee, and two pieces of toast every morning. I'm really good at brewing coffee; the boss of the company I used to work for liked best to drink the coffee I had brewed. If we hadn't been drinking coffee together so often, how could …?

I picked up the coffee pot and glanced at the coffee.

"Today you don't have to make any coffee. He's … not at home."

My doubtful, questioning eyes locked with the expression in hers. You can't know the significance and understanding which flowed between us in that instant. I almost blurted out, woman! This is a woman! I don't know how many questions were camouflaged by that façade of professional achievement. Was it possible that Director Hao, famous and over thirty, had this haggard expression?

She told me the last and most important job was taking care of Kitty, Kitty being a small white cat with black paws and, unluckily, a patch of black between her eyes, which gave her a fierce look. Northerners\fn{People from North China.} describe an appearance which people don't tend to like by saying,

"If grandma isn't fond of it, uncle won't like it at all."

In the cat world, Kitty surely belonged to this category. But the Director—oh no! I have to call her Mrs. Chuang—because her husband doesn't like to hear that word. As soon as Madame mentioned Kitty her eyes lit up. She gladly explained Kitty's preferences to me.

"Kitty likes to eat whole fish. She doesn't like it in fish soup or mixed with rice. If the fish isn't fresh enough it just won't do—she would rather have beef as a substitute. She will only drink canned whole milk, and it must be the "Carnation" brand—diluted milk powder won't do either, and you can't fool her. She has a bath once every two weeks. Because you have to use special flea powder, it takes two people to bathe her. And you must watch the weather: when you've finished bathing her, use a hair dryer to dry her fur. The red towel on the back of the bathroom door is hers."

Having passed on the duties of the first day, we closed with the discussion of Kitty's everyday life. Madame washed her face, but before she had finished eating breakfast there was already a black car waiting for her outside. She bolted breakfast down, took time out to laugh at Kitty who was squatted on the table drinking milk, and quietly murmured something to her, but Kitty only paid attention to lapping her milk. When she unexpectedly lifted her head and let out two peeps, "meow, meow," a tender expression drifted onto Madame's face. I reminded her that there was a car waiting, so, glancing at her watch, she pushed away her glass and bowl and ran upstairs. When she came down the stairs a while later she was a completely different person: no wonder it's written in Liang Shih-chiu's book, God gave woman one face, and she paints on another. This time Madame was the same one seen in the newspapers and on the news on television: after she is made up it's not right to call her Madame, she should be called Director. Even her manner of speaking was different from the one she had just had; she said:

"Miss Ho, due to your coming today, my whole timetable is running late. Of course there's quite a bit I've yet to explain thoroughly to you, but let's just take it slowly! I think we'll get along very well. At noon I have to receive a foreign guest so I won't be back. Now, as to what you should do, why don't you just do what I told you according to the book."

Then she left, clickety-click.

Gluttonous Kitty didn't even lift her head. To tell the truth, I really didn't like this cat, but because Madame was fond of her I was prepared to learn to be fond of her too. From the look of things, Kitty didn't consider me much of a friend either: as soon as she finished drinking her milk, she walked off, minding her own business. Good riddance! As long as she doesn't get lost, then I've no other responsibility.

Madame had gone and an uncertain me was left. I felt she hadn't been detailed enough: she'd barely instructed me to clean the house, do the laundry, cook, feed the cat, answer the phone, moreover she hadn't said a word about what time her husband would probably come home, how to look after him, or what he does and doesn't like to eat. All I could do was to pick up that oil splattered notebook and take a look. There were two pages which were covered with the names of dishes, there was a page where all the items concerning the running of the house were listed, and one page was the record of the emperor Kitty's daily life. Several other pages were very sloppily written; some restaurant addresses, Ah Ch'iao, Ah Mei, and other people's I. D. numbers, the prices of meat and vegetables, the phone numbers of the gas company and the water service station—all was recorded in the notebook. It even included those kind of 119, 110 emergency te1ephone numbers. I had some serious doubts: if those misses who helped manage the house ran into an urgent situation, would they have the presence of mind to flip through this notebook?

Having skimmed through this notebook, I still had only a vague idea of what I should do. Nevertheless, I groped around, determined not to be undone: in English and French classes in school I always got eighties and nineties. The economic analysis which my classmates were so afraid of I always passed, so what difficulty could there be in managing a family of two adults and one cat?

In thinking about it now I realize I overestimated myself: although the job itself wasn't difficult, it was impossible for me not to be influenced by the conflicts caused by the complicated psychology and subtle emotions which were involved. It made me so tired, so nervous! A good night's sleep doesn't alleviate this kind of fatigue and worry.

That day I picked up the rooms upstairs and brought the dirty clothes downstairs to wash. I kept thinking about how compelling Madame's assurance in me was. Although she knew I wasn't a murderer or robber, I had no relatives and no background in Taiwan. Though previously my family had been quite prosperous living overseas, and though she had studied my references, I still felt that anyone who would be willing to place her entire home in my hands was certainly an unparalleled and extraordinary person. Her success in the professional world depended not as what the rumors said, on luck and opportunity. While thinking, thinking all this over, the sound of footsteps rang out outside. I didn't even have time to dry my hands, but hurried to the front to take a look. I remember asking the most stupid question!

"Sir, who are you looking for?"

Really, so stupid! From looking at Madame I had imagined her husband to be the kind of middle aged gentleman who can get anything done with a tilt of his hat, a flick of his wrist. He might either be retiring or maybe witty, but in any case, a so-called scholar, probably a scholar with a manner tinged with self importance. But he had none of this kind of studious air: he looked like a pre-pubescent boy! Really, according to today's standards he would still be considered a youth!

He was cornered by me in the living room, noted my dripping wet hands and spent a considerable time looking me up and down, lowering his eyebrows which had jumped out of place.

"Another new one, so you're called 'Ah' what?"

I'm called "Ah" what? Obviously Madame didn't explain my situation to him. Why didn't she say anything? He's the male head of the house, he should understand!

"So you're the master! My name is Ho Pao-ch'ang."

"Oh! Ho Pao-ch'ang! Ah China has gone and you've come. Okay! Okay!"

Okay! What was that supposed to mean? Strange way of talking, and completely different from Madame in that his genuine inclinations were unfathomable. At that point I realized immediately that I should stop philosophically analyzing his character and get down to reliably carrying out my duties.

"Sir, would you still like a cup of coffee with two pieces of toast and two poached eggs?"

"No! I don't need anything. I've eaten—sat up talking last night at a friend's so now I want to sleep a while."

Having said this he headed upstairs. As Kitty fled down the stairs he rudely kicked at her and Kitty let out a frightened howl. This horrified me: though Kitty wasn't the most lovable animal in the world she was his wife's pet! How could he treat her this way? Neither my startled expression nor Kitty's shocked appearance seemed to phase him at all: he unsteadily continued up the stairs.

"Sir. what would you like to eat? Madame won't return at noon, so I'll fix whatever you'd like to have."

"Anything, anything will do."

Anything! A totally disinterested, impatient tone of voice is demoralizing. He stays up talking at a friend's all night, brutally kicks at Madame's dearly beloved little white cat: what kind of attitude is that? I could barely resist calling him on it for Madame's sake, but what good would appealing to him do? It wouldn't help anything; all I can do for her is to manage the various tasks of the household well. So, when I finished the laundry, I took the vegetables from the refrigerator and prepared them, then straightened up the downstairs, fed the cat, and even polished the refrigerator. Yet, by the time I'd finished cooking, Sir still hadn't gotten up.

Everything was done, all that was left to do was to take care of Sir's lunch, but he hadn't gotten up yet so I had nothing to do. Having gotten quite bored I suddenly discovered that underneath the tea table was a total mess. Oh! What a treasure chest that was! Chinese and foreign magazines were stashed in a pile all together. Trying to put them in order I found a lot of them straight through until twelve twenty when Sir came downstairs. When he saw the magazine in my hand it was his turn to be surprised.

"Well! I can see you aren't like 'Ah' whatever her name was. I guess you went to high school? You can read Newsweek?"

"College! Junior in college!"

"Are you putting yourself through?"

"No, no, I'm not in school right now."

I know that some families don't like to use work-study students so I quickly started me—thinking up an excuse.

"That's a pity. Why aren't you in school anymore?"

"I … I …"

How could I answer? Should I tell the whole story to this man who doesn't know any of my past history?

"From your accent it sounds like you're an Overseas Chinese."

"Yes! I'm an Overseas Chinese—my family is in Vietnam."

"Oh! You're a Vietnamese Overseas Chinese. Well, don't be sad, just take it easy. We'll help you get back to your studies—at the very least you can take some night classes."

He had perceptively guessed another aspect of it. This man wasn't the insensitive person I had thought he was at first, and the way he used the word "we" was so cute. He didn't seem at all like a person who would kick Kitty. And what about Kitty? She had already dodged him by going way far away behind the big sofa.

It's never very pleasant to eat alone. From the look on his face as he sat faced with bowls and dishes he didn't want to reach for, it just might be misconstrued that they were all things that would choke him to death. Afraid to watch, I avoided it by darting into the kitchen.

"Hey!"

Hey? Is he calling me?

"Sir, what is it?"

"Please turn on the TV for me."

Dinner in front of the TV, the most popular thing going now.

Why did the news have to be just starting when I turned the set on? At that moment they were broadcasting the news about releasing the prisoners with commuted sentences. I was sure I wasn't on that film clip, I didn't have to worry. I always did my best to avoid the camera and I'd already changed my appearance. I kept on reassuring myself this way.

"Ah whatever your name is, besides these dishes what else can you make?"

He scared me to death! I still thought he might have discovered me on the news, but as it turned out he hadn't. Watching him placidly picking at the dishes, I relaxed.

"My name is Ho Pao-ch'ang, but you can call me either Pao-ch'ang or Ah Ch'ang, Sir. I can make any ordinary dish, but I'm not too confident about fancy banquets."

"Dishes like this are fine. So, if I invite a few friends back here for a party it wouldn't be any problem for you to fix a few things to eat?"

"If you let me know beforehand, putting together some regular dishes won't be any problem."

"Ordinary dishes are fine."

After this he sat watching TV intently, munching on spicy chili chicken.

I didn't cook according to the recipes in Madame's little notebook. The dishes in it were all things like fried pork and sweet and sour fish which he was probably sick of eating. I took the chance of making a small change in style and just happened to hit upon the husband's taste. I don't know if that will turn out to be a way to help Madame.

"Turn it off! Turn it off!"

Turn it off? Oh's pointing at the television. The news was just broadcasting a film clip of his wife chairing a committee, and the reporter had aimed the camera at Madame for several seconds. Although I turned off the television immediately, Sir's face had already frozen over: he quickly pushed away his bowl and stormed upstairs.

By the time Sir came back downstairs it was already five thirty, but the warmth of the sun had yet to diminish, so he went out again.

"Pao-ch'ang, I won't be back for dinner."

"All right!"

What could I say besides all right? I couldn't say: your wife will be getting home from work soon, you shouldn't go out. I also couldn't ask, Sir what time he'd be home—what would I tell Madame? There was nothing I could do and the thought I'd especially put into what I should prepare the couple for dinner had lost whatever significance it had had.

The black car brought Madame home: her whole face was a pallet of make up and grease and she looked terribly weary—one of the prices of being famous. She didn't take the time to say anything to me, but scampered upstairs. She came downstairs after a while, looking much more relaxed, having changed out of the constricting Chinese dress and removed all her makeup. She looked at her watch, then at the clock on the wall, but checked whatever it was she was about to ask. I still had perceptive power about things like this, and remembered to do all I could to choose the least provocative words to report to her.

"Director, your husband came home shortly after you'd left. He said he'd been talking at a friend's and had already eaten breakfast, so he just went upstairs to sleep. He slept until noon, when I made lunch for him. Sir went out again at five thirty. He said he wouldn't be back for dinner."

"Oh!"

What a complicated 'Oh'! She picked up the paper without making a sound, undecorously flopped back on the sofa with her legs dangling. This picture of her would surely shock the reporters that are used to seeing her. Kitty skittered out from I don't know where and climbed into Madame's lap. It didn't make Madame feel too warm and she let a purring Kitty rub against her anywhere. Occasionally she reached out to pet her with an expression of complete satisfaction and enjoyment on her face.

There was still only one person at the dinner table, but this time Madame had changed places with her husband: the fine food didn't give her even a tinge of delight. It was fortunate that Kitty was there pacing back and forth, meowing. Madame told me to pick up Kitty's dish, in which she placed the fish head and tail for Kitty to eat.

"Madame, Kitty's already been fed."

"Can't you see? She still wants to eat! Naughty Kitty, everything I eat you think is. good. Hey little Kitty, I guess you slept all day again! You're so full of spirit, but just calm down a while and let me eat!"

The conversation was gradually directed away from me and toward Kitty; I wanted to protest, but not because she was neglecting my existence as a "maid," but rather because she shouldn't be the kind of person who murmurs to cats—this would be unacceptable were it ever discovered.

The phone rang.

"Hello, who would you like to speak to?"

"Has Director Hao gotten home yet? I need to ask her advice about a few things."

I handed the phone over to her.

"Hello, this is Director Hao. Oh, we should have talked about this at the office. I'm sorry, I had a meeting to go to this afternoon as well as a commencement ceremony—well, there is no problem in principle. You just have to make sure it tallies with the general regulations. We don't want any conflict with the law. If I can help of course I will. Why don't you stop by the office tomorrow afternoon! If I'm not there check with my secretary. I'll turn everything over to him."

Her tone of voice was totally different from the one she used in chatting with Kitty—makes you wonder if what she says is only lip service. This kind of talk doesn't come from the heart, and with the added layer of a professional tone and that laugh, it was really discomforting. At least it doesn't belong in the family niche. If I were her student or her friend, that kind of intonation would make me fidget, but if I was her daughter or her husband I would feel out of touch and distant. It's a good thing she has no children.

Having finished the call Madame went back to the table to eat dinner. Gathering up a few mouthfuls with her chopsticks she said:

"Pao-ch'ang, you cook pretty well!"

"Before … I had specially studied cooking because my cousin and I had planned to open a restaurant in the States after I graduated."

"Is that so! Do you still plan to go?"

What could I say? It had already been more than two years since I'd had a letter from my cousin, and all contact with my family in Vietnam had been lost, hence I'd lost the possible financial backing. But more than that, these two years had turned me into another class of person in this society: would my cousin and the others accept me? Isn't it that only if they're willing to accept me can I receive a law abiding citizen ID card which I would need to operate? Though our government had forgiven me and acknowledged that a person who had committed a crime because of one false move could start again and be an upstanding citizen, would a foreign gov-ernment be willing to recognize this? Since I had made up my mind to accept no pity and not become a burden, this road was absolutely out of the question.

"No! I decided that after things have settled down I'd like to find a night class to finish my studies, so I can depend on my own ability to make a living."

"Good! I'll be willing to help you."

Madame, your husband used "we"; what you said was "I." Your hearts are similarly generous, but if you always have this kind of attitude you're going to suffer in the long run. Suddenly I thought of something Sir had said.

"Madame, Sir said that later he wanted to bring some friends back for a little party, and asked me to cook something up."

"Really? All right!" An unintentional enjoyment played at the corner of her smiling mouth, also at the smile wrinkles around her eyes:

"Pao-ch'ang, do it well, don't be afraid of any extra work. Whenever we have guests I'll give you a bonus beyond your regular salary."

Madame, I'm willing to do it, and not because of any bonus. My only hope is that you and your husband can go back to being happy, having a home that feels like a home.

"Madame, I don't want any bonus, I'm happy to do it. I told your husband that cooking ordinary dishes is no problem, but I'm not ready for a large banquet. Madame, it's only that I'm not quite clear on what your husband's friends would like, so when the time comes I'll have to got to you for instructions."

I though I had stated this gently enough, but Madame glared at me. At the time I thought: Madame, why is this necessary? My intentions are good, it's my first day and I've already run into a batch of problems. I've been through a lot, and to be honest, though I may be much younger than you, it's just possible that I have a deeper understanding of men than you do. I know the type of creature that men are. Even if they can find a hundred different reasons to go out and play around, they are not willing to light on their own doorstep. Moreover, power and fame have left a gulf between you, and you lack children to strengthen the bond and dilute the loneliness in the house.

The comedy series was over and the TV news began: a film clip of what was on at noon was rebroadcast, and Madame's face appeared once more on the screen. Madame put down her chopsticks and her eyes, riveted in attention, were filled with a strange hue of enjoyment. When this piece of news was over, Madame finished the last few bites of dinner, stood up, and lightly hummed some nameless song. Ostensibly watching television, she gently caressed Kitty when she strolled by; so relaxed, so happy.

From the looks of things, Madame was certainly well satisfied with her life as "Director Hao," but I also sensed that Sir was repressing a hefty resentment toward their present lifestyle which bordered on being intoler-able. Before I had even been there for one full day I'd already witnessed several manifestations of the buried discordance. The incidents suggest that it's not that Madame wouldn't like to do welt, but she couldn't think of a way to please both of them, which compels her husband to use every attitude of indifference he can muster to boycott his wife. It may be that he isn't doing it intentionally, but all the spite in his heart which he can't articulate him unconsciously inflict pain on her. For Madame, bouncing along on the sea of officialdom just may have gotten too easy going, and the complacence in her mind may have diluted the seriousness of these family crises.

Because I'd been living with them under the same roof, in the past months I had an even deeper understanding of them. I know that they were classmates throughout college, though, surprising enough, Sir was two classes higher than she, and after he'd gotten his advanced degree they went back home to get married. Both husband and wife had similar ambitions to public service, but due to the limitations imposed by natural endowments and per-sonality, their careers took different paths. Especially due to the advantages that Madame had as a woman, their opportunities were different too, Gradually, when Dr. Chuang appeared in public he came to be referred to as "Director Hao's husband."

It's funny, but ninety five percent of the women who have independent careers don't care at all if they are referred to as someone's wife, but men are very insecure when called X's husband. Naturally, Mr. Chuang was no exception, especially because all the speeches, meetings, contract signings, christening and commencement exercises, ceremonies, chairmanships, and activities abroad which the Director had in connection with her work not only took up her office time but also infringed on after office hours, At first Madame had no alternative but to be absent from lunch and dinner, but later her husband avoided meals purposely. On weekends and holidays he would visit his friends, even willing to sleep on the rug and eat plain noodles. Some of this I discovered myself, some was reported to: me by the old woman doing odd jobs who lived behind us. She said the husband and wife used to argue loudly, but recently it had stopped, which in itself is cause for exceptional worry. When heated arguments go on between a husband and wife at least it indicates that there are mutual demands being made—mutual hope. When the surface presents the calm of a cold war, one of them has already given up hope, and one of them is deliberately inflicting pain. Madame, oh Madame! You seem to have already gotten used to finding satisfaction with your public prominence and fine deportment: at home you pass your time with an understanding cat, hence there is always something to fill the gaps in your mind, your time, and your feelings. Therefore, you disdain reality.

So many times I've looked at you imploringly, hoping you'd stay at home like so many other wives, rid yourself of the professional, collegial tone you bring home from your various occupations, and change into some casual loose-fitting clothes; sit next to your husband and babble incessantly, amuse him, or say nothing at all, just be with him. But no! Madame, you change from fancy dress into a Chinese dress, so busy posing for everyone's admiration at the various occassions and social appointments, leaving a furious man at home. Sometimes I hear him give Chang or Li a call, hoping for some place to go. When he's looked everywhere and there's still no place, he sits a while, stands a while; he reads a book, or the papers, writes something—but I know nothing sinks in, and he never finishes writing. This is the way he spent his vacation. Sometimes he even got to the point of thinking about chatting with me, but I would dodge him by hiding in the pantry off the kitchen. I understand he's just bored and lonesome nothing in his mind at all, yet lots of things are not intended at the beginning. I don't intend to ever hurt myself again by hurting someone else. Though that little room was hot, it was still better that I hide. I would sit there fretting and fuming: I sympathized with Madame, but afterwards I began to sympathize with Sir as well, a perfectly nice man having been driven to this. Had he been a run-around there'd have been plenty of places to go for entertainment, and if that ever comes to be, Madame, not even nine oxen could drag his heart back!

From the time I knew that Madame hoped that her husband would stay home peacefully, several times during the ninety five degree summer vacation weather I was busy in the kitchen from morning till night, and after finishing with that I still had to wait for the guests to leave to pick up the shambles, all to help the Madame keep her husband at home. Madame also outdid herself receiving the guests, and sometimes friends would bring their wives, children and whole families with them which meant I was even busier and more exhausted, and spent that much more effort and energy, so Madame gave me a bonus above and beyond my regular pay. Female guests tipped me, Sir and his friends would thank me, some would politely call me Miss Ho, and it went so far that really close friends called me Miss Ho too. But none of this was the real reward: the real reward was the the gradual melting of the icy curtain which hung between husband and wife. This was the result I was most pleased with: my heart was full of gratitude.

Unfortunately, just at the time when Madame was scheduled to visit Korea by an invitation she had accepted two weeks before her husband was still suffering from a cold. Madame had no choice but to go, so the frosty season resumed. For Madame's sake, I laid aside my theory of avoiding suspicion by never being in a position which implies suspicion in order to serve Sir. I asked his friends to come and have some fun willl him, keep him company. But it was no use, Sir's heart had frozen solid again. Madame made two long distance calls home; when I answered, once he pretended to be asleep when I called him to the phone, and once he refused to answer. When his cold was better, once again he often stayed out all night. When he was home Kitty was so pitiful: when Sir was upstairs, she couldn't go upstairs; when he was in the dining room, she didn't dare go in the dining room. She couldn't make a sound either: once when she kept on crying, Sir hauled her by the tail and hurled her outside into the storm. From then on Kitty loved to roam outside which provided me with yet another job every morning: to hunt high and low for Kitty. But it was to no avail: every time I found her and brought her back she would just wander off again. When Madame came back and discovered what had actually happened she planned to use gentle affection to reclaim Kitty's heart, but it was already too late. Kitty had discovered that the outdoors was not only free and not at all terrifying, but it was a lovable world replete with companions. As far as I was concerned, Kitty had gotten even less endearing, and I need not mention how Sir felt. Only Madame was left to pamper and indulge her.

Madame had been gone almost ten days. After she got back their life resumed as it had been when I had first come. On the surface all seemed "quiet on the western front," but it was an unnatural calm: two people facing each other at meals, the husband's face rigid, the Madame's air insipid. It was only when Madame's face appeared on the screen would Sir hatefully shout, "Turn it off!" or when Kitty was reprimanded would Madame's face temporarily cloud over; but a word was never uttered. This atmosphere of internal tension and external calm was really insufferably stifling: if it wasn't that I had nowhere else to go, I would never have stayed on. Days here seemed to be even more intolerable than those inside the prison. To mention repaying Madame was ridiculous: how could a humble third party ever manage that? How could I show my gratitude?

I really couldn't understand: here were two people who hadn't gotten to the point of breaking off all rela-tions — they didn't even seem to have considered it—yet why did they want to go on hurting each other like that? Sir used a cold shoulder to avenge his wife's careless neglect and superior reputation. Thus, Madame intensified her "I couldn't care less, happy as a lark" attitude to avenge her husband's boycotting her. The situation got worse and worse: I wanted so much to tell them that revenge is a horrible ploy. Not only does it hurt other people, but it hurts yourself even more. I've been through it! I'm the louse who stabbed a person who cheated with both feelings and money, yet his wound healed and he won a reputation as the "prodigal son returning home," wecomed by his wife and children to pass his days peacefully. On the other hand, I sacrificed my reputation and my studies, I hurt my family, but more than all of that, I lost two years of freedom. Thinking it over now, no matter how I look at it—rationally, emotionally, or from my concept of values—it still measures up as stupid and not worth it from any of the three perspectives.

Living on the inside those two years I searched every corner of my mind for an answer, always thinking I'd see the light. Never again would I harbor rancor in my heart for the heartless man who profited from my misfortune. never again would I set a fire of hatred on the body of a doll in processing, never again would I pessimistically resist the regulations and measures of the inside of a prison, and never again would I think of somehow trying to get even with that bastard once I got out of jail.

After my peaceful awakening I became the most cooperative "classmate" of the woman's prison: I became the voluntary teacher outside of class for the students of the Hung Teh Supplementary School. That's when I discovered that the world could be very different: some people shared food with me that had been sent by their families, others shared useful articles with me that had been bent by their relatives. Even that spiteful, fierce old lady opium dealer didn't dare bully me any more because of everyone's attitude. I began to regret it: why did I want revenge in the first place? If I hadn't stabbed him, if his conscience never stopped tormenting him, if he felt the discomfort of shame for the rest of his life because of me, why was it necessary for me to punish him? Due to that stab he considers that every mistake he had made had been nullified by the injury I inflicted on him. Oh, I was so stupid!

Anyway, I should be grateful that God let his wound heal without any complications, otherwise I … Madame! Do you have to pay the same price before you can realize this? How did what happen tonight come to be? After dinner I washed my hair because I wanted to go mail a letter. But when I got back two hours later, how could the world have changed so completely? How could Madame, who never changed her tone of voice or the expression on her face, be locked ill her room, weeping bitterly? Why? What had Sir said after all, what had he done? Or what had Madame said or done to lead to this frightful outcome? No! It's unsettling! I still have to go upstairs and find out what really happened!

"Madame! Madame!"

There was no answer. She wouldn't answer—what did I expect? If Madame's feelings had been hurt only her husand's consolation would do any good, especially if a collision with him was what caused the disaster in the first place. But Sir? He couldn't have—after all, it's his wife, how could he have gone out?

"Madame, why are you so sad? Why don't you tell me? Tell Pao-ch'ang, you'll feel better if you get it out, I won't tell anyone!"

The sound of crying got even louder, and as before there was no answer.

It was hard to bear to hear her choking with sobs. I've said that I wanted to repay her: there's no way for me to resolve the other problems, but can't I make her stop wasting herself like this, even temporarily? I kept searching my mind for the reason: is her husband having an affair? Is that what made this happen to her? Did they argue, and did her husband mention splitting up? Could that be it? Could it?

"Madame, Why? Nothing is worth such heartache. Your husband couldn't be having an affair, if he'd wanted one he'd have done it long ago. Everyone I've seen him with are upstanding men. Did you have a fight with your husband? Don't think its such a horrible thing. Your husband is at home alone and lonely all day, suffering pitifully enough. If he said a few sentences to vent it out that's all right—it's better to argue a few tines than be deadlocked in silence every day. Or did something disturbing happen outside? Outside concerns are even less worth acting like this. Your sacrifice is already big enough. It's not worthwile to tote back your heartbreak. Madame! Don't cry! Madame!"

After all this Madame just cried even louder. Suddenly there was the sound of something falling. Oh no! Madame can't get hurt, I've got to go see what's happened.

Pushing the door open I went in: Madame was prostrate on the bed, her dresser lamp kicked to the floor. I was shocked! This is Madame? This is Dr. Hao? This is Director Hao?

"Madame, don't do this, Madame!"

"Pao-ch'ang! Pao-ch'ang! What am I going to do? Kitty's dead, Kitty was hit by a motorcycle and killed!"

Oh God! So that's it—Kitty is dead. When the cat you love so much dies of course it's sad, but to cry so bitterly with grief as excessive as if your parents had died is wrong! It's contrary to nature!

"Pao-ch'ang, you see, what am I going to do? What am I gojng to do? Kitty is dead!"

"What are you going to do? What kind of talk is that? You are Dr. Hao, Director Hao, you have a profession, a home, a husband how can you talk like that? Madame, Kitty is dead. I know you're sad, but you don't have to go on like this, you'll hurt yourself. This isn't a bit like the regular you."

"No! No! I want Kitty! Without Kitty what other joy do I have in my life? No! No!"

"Madame!"

I couldn't abide this hysteria. I said, almostt harshly:

"Aside from Kitty you should have a great deal jou in your life: you have a father, a husband, a profession, a home, as well as friends and students—you have everything! Kitty is no match for all this! It's a good thing thing Kitty is dead!"

"You — — !"

A disheveled Madame irately picked herself up.

Damn! I had acted on impulse again, but Madame, I just couldn't resist. You're wrong! Wrong! If you ask me again I'll say it again. Nothing could be better than to have that cat die.

"You, you evil hearted woman, how could I have treated you as I have. I misjudged you, you … you're a depraved, evil person!"

Madame! What you say is unfair. You're a person of erlucation and position—you shouldn't hurt people like this. You should be grateful for what I said. I won't haggle about it, but your attitude is abnormal. I still have to say it!

"Madame, I'm sorry, I acted impulsively again, I offended you. It doesn't matter, firing me will be fine, but I still want to say that Kitty is no substitute for a husband, just as friends are no substitute for a wife. No matter how much you hate me for saying it, I still have to say that it's good not to have that urgly cat around."

Leaving a shocked Madame behind, I walked out. The first thing I'll have to think about is finding someplace to go, but the world is large, I guess there'll always be room for me someplace! But I don't plan to go to the New Life Protection CuInmittee; I'm afraid they'd ask too many picky questions about this secret, this affair which is so bitter and painful for the people involved, but such a hilarious story to spread a round for normal people.

A ghost floated out from the library which nearly planted me downstairs with fright. Oh! So Sir hadn't ever gone out in the first place!

"Pao-ch'ang, why don't you go take a rest. I'll take care of this."

He said this ten times more nicely than anything he'd ever said in the past, and even went so far as to pat my hand which was resting on the banister. He stepped toward the bedroom, pushed the door open, and went in. Before I'd gotten down to the bottom of the stairs I heard an even louder explosion of crying come from the bedroom, that kind of a thorough release. I, who had tasted a hundred different flavors of life, understood completely.

"It's a good thing that Kitty's dead!"

I insisted on saying this, though tommorrow I'd have to pack up for good for this sentence; although I'd already endured insults for this sentence I'd say it again!

77.84 & 78.14 1. In The Middle Of The Night 2. The Banyan Tree\fn{by Chou Huey-min (1935-)} Kiangsu Province, China (M) 23

1

What was that noise? She couldn't say. Still half asleep, her eyelids felt heavy. She wanted to open them but it seemed too much effort. She was aware that she had awakened—from sleep but not from a dream: she seldom dreamt.

Although her life wasn't as regular as a clock it did fall into a standard pattern. For example, she was always in bed before eleven o'clock. She lightly extended her hand, groping toward the other side of the large double bed. It was still empty; evidently it was still not very late. As she drew back her hand, she forced her eyes open a crack. The alarm clock on the bed-stand pointed to exactly twelve thirty.

She had no idea what had awakened her. Occasionally she was awakened by his entry when he came into the bedroom: but very, very rarely. Besides, most of those occasions were back when he first began to stay up all night. She used to worry about his working so hard and slept rather fitfully. He stayed up all night because he had to but he wanted her to sleep well. She'd been married to him ten years and thoroughly understood his temperament: since he didn't want to disturb her, all she could do was do her best not to be disturbed. Sometimes she was actually awakened by his careful entry but said nothing and pretended she was still asleep.

Now, she ought to go back to sleep. She yawned a few times and rubbed the sleep from her eyes, but she no longer felt sleepy. Without her noticing it, the heaviness in her eyelids had dissolved and the eyelids themselves were now able to open freely.

When she had turned off the lamp, the room was in complete darkness. Now, however, once her eyes had grown used to the dark she was aware of a slight glow of light diffused through the room. This was due to the light that crept through a few cracks in the door from the next room. She had lived in this apartment two years and knew the entire layout even with her eyes closed. Outside the door was the hallway. The opposite door was the child's bedroom. The next door down the hall was the living room and opening out of the living room was his study.

There was no sound. Probably he was just getting deep into his work. She seemed to see a curling wisp of smoke slip in through a crack in the door and diffuse itself through the bedroom. She had grown used to the smell of cigarette smoke. She couldn't do anything about his habit of smoking, just as she couldn't do anything about his habit of working all night. It was only in the last few years he'd begun doing that and as time went on, he kept at it later and later. He claimed that at night the faculties were most alert.

Her position in the household was hardly that of a parasite. She was a thrifty and industrious housewife, but her work was not productive; she could do nothing that would bring in more income. She felt wholly dependent on her husband and, accordingly she felt a profound respect for his profession. If he saw fit to turn night into day because of it she would not venture to express any dissatisfaction.

Despite the distance that made it impossible to hear any sound of activity from the study, she nevertheless imagined she could hear the scratching sound of his pen as he swept it over the paper in rapid strokes. Ever since they had been married he had always written in the evening. Immediately after their marriage, due to their straightened circumstances, they had occupied only a single room. His desk was not far from the bed and, in the evening, as she listened to the scratching of his pen as it scattered words across the page, she could not have said whether the sound gave her more anguish or more consolation.

For the ten years during which he had been anxiously groping for the right vehicle for his writing he had passed through many stages: when he found he was getting nowhere in one genre he would switch to another. He had given up free verse to write prose articles: from prose articles he had switched to literary essays; from literary essays to fiction and finally to writing scripts—movie scripts. He had finally found the path to glory. The night was profoundly still. Of all the multifarious daytime noises only one kind was left; occasionally an automobile passed down the street. In the absence of any other allusion a strict monotony prevailed. Wasn't this the best time for sleeping? And yet he specifically chose to be wide awake; he wanted to use the time when other people are asleep to write his scripts. He had always preferred to write in the evening but at first he never continued very late. She used to sit beside him keeping him company, in winter knitting a sweater, in summer crocheting a tablecloth. In silence she shared his joys and sorrows. In spite of their poverty there was happiness in their life together.

She was still happy of course—and no longer poor. But life had drawn them apart, had interposed a certain distance between them. The exigencies of life had forced him to use the daytime for appointments and transfer his writing wholly to the evening hours. His increased income had enabled them to improve their standard of living. They had bought this apartment on the installment plan, and now the study was some distance from the bedroom. She could only get a whiff of the wispy cigarette smoke but could no longer hear the scratching of his pen.

When you stopped to think of it, poverty had its good points. Now if they only had one room she would be able to observe his figure bent over the desk. She would be able to tell from his manner whether the springs of inspiration were blocked or flowing freely. She would be able to call to him:

"Come to bed, now. You can write more tomorrow."

He would always agree and not be stubborn. But now he shut himself in his room and she didn't dare disturb him without permission. Otherwise she would be inviting unpleasantness. Even if he gave her a chance to get a word in she could no longer talk to him that way. How could he write it tomorrow? Didn't she know the studio was anxiously awaiting this script? Didn't she know that tomorrow he had to see an independent producer about another script? She had better go back to bed. These were matters she didn't understand.

It was true that she didn't understand. She sighed softly and turned slightly in the bed, seeking a more comfortable position. What he said was true. It was better for her to get her sleep and mind her own business. She knew nothing about scripts, nothing about writing. Just the same, he used to ask her opinion. When he had a problem with his work he used to consult her freely and sometimes even take her advice. Although she knew nothing he would listen to her and praise her and it seemed she had sometimes helped him solve his problems.

Nonetheless she had nothing to resent. That had been a long, long time ago. As time went by his knowledge and hers had progressively less and less in common. He had been making progress all these years. From being obscure and unheard of he had developed into a well known writer of movie scripts while she continued to be an ordinary housewife. If she wanted to read one of his scripts she had to go buy a ticket when the movie was playing. Once she had been his only reader; now his audience numbered thousands, tens of thousands. He no longer needed her criticism. He no longer attached any importance to her point of view. Once he had invited some friends to the house and they talked about the art of writing. She sat quietly on the side, listening without saying a word. It came to her then very deeply that he was already an authority while she understood nothing.

Their standard of living had certainly and steadily improved but she retained her old habit of economy. Every day she did her own housework. There wasn't a speck of dust in the whole house. She got up very early and worked hard all day. As a result, when evening came she was as tired as could be. She never lost any sleep. She fell asleep as soon as she went to bed. He often made fun of the way she slept and envied her ability to sleep so soundly. He couldn't manage it. The longer he stayed awake the more alert he became. He was tall and thin which made him prone to nervous tension and insomnia. In the drawer of his desk was a bottle of tranquilizers prescribed by his doctor. She didn't like to see him use such things. She had heard they could be habit-forming, She had tried to persuade him of this but he paid no attention. His drawer contained other remedies also: he depended heavily on various kinds of vitamins to keep up his energy.

As for her she'd never had anything to do with medicines: had never been sick a day in her life. If she had an occasional ache or pain she would bear it without any medication until it cured itself. In the last two years that had changed. She was always suffering from upset stomach and headache. But she bore it as usual and didn't want to complain to him. Her apparent robust condition made it impossible for her to get any sympathy from him anyway. Once she had told him she wasn't feeling well. To avoid worrying him she had expressed it in a careless and indifferent tone. He showed no concern when he heard this but merely laughed and said:

"Look how husky you are! How could you be sick?"

"Husky." Not a very appropriate word. She wasn't a piece of livestock—a cow or a horse. Yet he described her almost as if she were a domestic animal to be attached to a wagon or plow. Well, it was true enough. Over the years she had lost her willow-waist, her slender figure. Her waistline was already twenty-nine inches. And that was last year's measurement. By now it might be even larger. Not only her waist. From many standpoints she was constantly getting evidence that she was no longer as young as she used to be. Her skin was slack, her eyes blurry and two of her teeth had been replaced by false teeth. When she was young she had not been lacking in beauty but: now it was her turn to find beauty only in others.

She wasn't by nature prone to jealousy. Tolerance and magnanimity were highly developed traits in her character. Yet there was a certain area of her consciousness that was inflexibly hardened. There were plenty of young and beautiful girls in the world and toward them she felt no random jealousy; but as for those movie stars who were constantly coming into contact with him—against them she bore a deep grudge. It wasn't that she lacked confidence in him, she only had some misgivings: when a man came into daily contact with heavily made up, glamorous and enticing movie stars, was it possible for him to remain completely unmoved?

He had already guessed her attitude. He had repeatedly explained that his contacts with them were unavoidable: that they were strictly business and nothing more.

Business. Was it more of a loss or a gain for him to have chosen such a business? She really couldn't say. Certainly his income had increased but then so had his personal expenditures. He bought one suit after another: he had so many interviews with important people he couldn't afford to neglect his personal appearance. Cigarettes were part of his standard equipment; and when he invited guests to the house he served them bottle after bottle of imported wine. In the daytime he always had business which kept him away from home. In the evening he worked and worked instead of sleeping. All this was a loss to her: a tremendous loss of time that they might have spent together.

But after all what did she have to complain of? Didn't all her friends envy her? She and her husband got along well, they never quarreled. Their son in junior high school was diligent and well-behaved. He gave her no trouble. Her husband worked hard at his profession. She kept busy with her housework. To pass one's life in this way, wasn't it what most people dreamed of? For her to try to get him to cut down on his work and restrict his outside contacts—wouldn't that be asking too much?

To be satisfied with enough is the key to happiness. Having reached this conclusion she again shifted her attitude in the bed. Normally she slept well and thought about things as little as possible. Tonight was just the opposite: she went on thinking of one thing after another and seemed to have banished sleep to a remote distance.

Let him write his scripts! Meanwhile she should have a nice, long, peaceful sleep for herself. Although her life was ordinary there were many enjoyable things about it. In the morning she would slip on some clothes and tiptoe out (just as he, a few hours earlier, had tiptoed in). Her toilet articles were all in the bathroom. After getting washed and dressed she would start sweeping the apartment. His study was all but sacrosanct. She didn't dare touch his manuscripts, but she could carefully empty the ashtrays and make his desk clean and tidy. Afterwards she would slip quietly out to the market where she employed all the resources of her ingenuity. Not only did she try to buy only things he would find delicious but aimed at variety, trying never to repeat herself. After she got back and lunch was cooking, then there would begin to be signs of life from the bedroom. Often he would recall some pressing engagement and dash out. Sometimes there would be a phone call. The party at the other end of the line would invite him so insistently he could hardly refuse. So he would go off and leave her. If only he could eat his lunch in peace at home, even if they didn't find anything to talk about, it would have been a great consolation to her.

As time went by he had become more taciturn. When she tried to get him to talk she could succeed in eliciting only the most laconic of replies. Quite often he would say "I don't know" regarding matters she knew very well herself. If it happened once it happened a hundred times. He seemed to feel that the three little words "I don't know" would stave off any further trouble as far as he was concerned. She had nothing to say. What answer was there to "I don't know."?

When he behaved so indifferently she couldn't help feeling annoyed. When had he begun to change? She couldn't remember any more. He used to be quite talkative. Especially before they were married. He would tease her about everything and make her laugh. Afterwards, it seemed that, year by year, they had talked out everything there was to say. He gradually grew silent. What should take a sentence he said in a few words. What should take a few words he was content to signify by a gesture. He seemed to emphasize his own dignity by his silence. Because of this, feeling wronged and resentful, she had one day asked him earnestly:

"Do you know what it's called when a man and woman care very much for each other?"

He looked at her with a slight frown and the words "I don't know" fell lightly from his lips. The tight corners of his lips seemed to be suppressing a smile as though he thought it odd she should still ask him such a romantic question.

She turned over again. Strange that she still hadn't gotten to sleep. One shouldn't think. Thought is the worst enemy of sleep. Her mistake had been starting to think while still in that half-asleep, half-awake stupor. Otherwise she wouldn't have woken up and lost so much sleep. It had only been ten or fifteen minutes but she considered sleep very important and even such a short period counted for her.

Now she understood how people developed insomnia. The more you thought you ought to get to sleep the harder it was to do so. What did it really matter if one missed a little sleep occasionally? Actually it would be better if she slept a bit less. Even if her weight dropped from a hundred thirty pounds to a hundred twenty-five, she would still be about ten pounds overweight. When she was a young girl she had only weighed ninety-seven pounds. Light as a feather, small-hipped and slender, her tiny waist but one span. A sobering thought! Heaven only knew when she began to put on weight. If those thirty pounds had been added to her all at once she would have been frightened out of her wits. Like everything else we get used to; day by day, little by little it becomes established. Come to think of it, her increase in weight was probably due to the baby. After that none of her old clothes fitted any more and she had never returned to her previous measurements. Her twenty-two inch waist was like something remembered from a dream.

So she had lost her twenty-two inch waist and gotten that lovable little baby: she was more than satisfied with that exchange! Ten years is not a short stretch of time and usually contains a considerable amount of hardship and trouble: having the baby, his several bouts of sickness had worn her down but now he had become a healthy child and everyone said he was adorable. Life had its losses and its gains. Certainly in the last ten years she had lost a great deal that was of value but what she had gained more than made up for what she had lost. On the whole she was quite satisfied with what she now had.

The wind had again pushed open the window that didn't close properly. At regular intervals she heard it clatter though not too strongly. Apart from the noise that didn't matter much she was also aware of the wind whirling its way in through the window.

Pulling herself out of bed and exploring with her foot before each step she groped her way to the window. She had intended only to close the window and go back to bed but after she opened the curtains she lingered, looking at the glass which was glistening and wet. It was raining out.

The rain was fine as silk. By the dim light of the street lamp she could see it slanting against the window panes. It was always like this in winter. Before you knew it, it had stopped raining. Raining and clearing, raining and clearing: sometimes it went on for several days and brought unseasonably cold weather that never occurred when the sky was clear.

The damp and glistening evening gave her a cold feeling. She picked up a bathrobe and drew it over her. She was very sensitive to heat and cold—especially after she had suffered from an attack of backache and headache.

He didn't take nearly as good care of himself as she did. For this reason he caught cold much more often. She couldn't tell how many times he caught a cold every winter! For example when the weather was cold and rainy like this he never bothered to put on any warm clothing. Right now he probably didn't even know it was raining. In his stuffy room with all the windows closed, was the inspiration flowing or was he struggling to eke out one word after another?

She really ought to go back to bed but she couldn't bear to. She couldn't bear to be warm and comfortable while he toiled alone in his study. She turned on the light and picked up a sweater. She must go and have a look at him. If he seemed pale and worn she would try to persuade him to come to bed. If he frowned and seemed to disapprove of her suggestion she would tactfully try to get him to put on the sweater. If he didn't object too much she would try to persuade him to let her prepare a snack for him. If he told her impatiently, "If I'm hungry I'll fix something myself," she would show no disappointment. What could he "fix?" In the kitchen he never made anything but a few crackers and milk.

She softly opened the door. She hesitated a little before going out. The floor lamp in the living room was on. He turned it out only when he went to bed. The floor lamp stood beside the sofa. When he got up in the morning or after dinner he used to lie on the sofa and read the newspaper. At present his tall lean figure was not to be found on the sofa. There was nothing but a few newspapers strewn carelessly upon it.

As she went across the room she picked up the sheets of newspaper and carefully folded them. Today the newspapers all carried the news of his movie companies projected films for the coming year. There would be twelve in all: six modern and six historical. All would be in technicolor. Naturally they would star the company's most famous actors and actresses. This news interested her and she would have liked to talk to him about it but he withheld all comment: he had no time to talk about it. A full schedule for the studio meant he would be kept busy. The studio relied on him a good deal; of the twelve films several would certainly be assigned to him. This year again they could count upon having a considerable income.

Since he would be busy it was all the more necessary for him to take care of his health. She walked rather gravely and firmly toward the study. She was his wife: if she didn't take care of him, who would?

The door of the study was closed. She cleared her throat and then called to him but he didn't answer. That's the way he was.

Even if he wouldn't go to bed, or put on the sweater or eat a bite she still had to see him. She sighed and turned the doorknob. She put on a bashful smile and got ready to say "Excuse me" as soon as the door was open.

The door slowly opened to her pressure. She opened her lips but the words "Excuse me" didn't come out. There was no occasion for it. Her smile froze. Her eyes, as they stared into the interior of the study, filled with distress.

The study was actually empty.

The lamp was turned on. The desk was littered with manuscript but there was no one in the swivel chair.

Where could he be?

She stared dumbly. Everything seemed to stand still: her breathing, her pulse. After a time she recovered but still didn't come back to normal. Her breathing and her pulse continued to be much faster than usual. Fast and irregular. Heat seemed to emanate from her heart and flow upward as far as her throat which became quite dry.

She swallowed hard. She was aware of the beating of her heart which sounded louder than the ticking of the grandfather clock. It was too strange!

There was nobody in the study! Who can encounter the wholly unexpected without a sense of shock? Especially a person like herself who lived such a humdrum everyday life would naturally be very much upset. Nonetheless her nerves were steady enough. She neither fainted nor screamed. Moreover, in spite of the shock to her confidence in him, she was unwilling to believe the worst.

When she turned around it was in the hope of a miracle. With bewildered and unsteady steps she made her way to the bathroom. The bathroom door was open, the interior dark. Well then the kitchen? Perhaps he was quietly raiding the icebox.

She ran to the kitchen as she would have if she had smelt something burning. She leaned on the kitchen table and panted for breath. Here too, she had failed to find the anticipated miracle.

Their son's room? She flicked on the light and looked around. In her troubled state of mind she wasn't even able to appreciate the adorable expression on the child's face as he slept.

She returned to the bedroom, completing the circuit.

Could he be playing hide and seek with her? As she looked down at the cold blanket lying on the bed she had to admit she was completely at a loss and without a clue.

Her breathing was forced and heavy. She couldn't stand here gaping forever. She was still clinging to that sweater so that it almost seemed to be imbedded in the flesh of her hand. She put down the sweater. She noticed the palm of her hand was moist; her spine was also moist with perspiration. She was no longer worried about catching cold, or about anything else in this world. For her there was only one problem. Where was he?

She again left the bedroom but not with the light footsteps of a short while before. Her steps now were heavy and uncertain. She stared vacantly about her, not knowing what to do. She desperately needed to know where he had gone but she had no way of finding out, no place to look. All she knew was that, in the dead of night, while she was asleep, he had stolen out of the house.

Where in the world could he have gone? She opened the front door which he had left locked. How wonderful it would be if, as soon as she opened it he came hurrying back in and gave her a rational explanation for his excursion. When she opened the door there was no one in sight. Only a gust of cold wind came bursting in. The night was very still. The trees along the street formed dark patches amid the illumination. She gave up hope. Hastily she slammed the door shut. In this world there are no such happy coincidences as the one she had hoped for.

However, coincidences do happen. Wasn't it in fact a coincidence that she had happened to wake up tonight and find that he'd gone out?

This thought struck her with peculiar force and was accompanied by physical symptoms. Again heat began to generate in her heart and surge upwards—to her throat and even to her head. A buzzing sound began in her ears and her head felt as if it were about to explode. Was it such a coincidence? Who knows whether he did this every night? Perhaps he had at least already done it many times. Once among all those times she had happened to catch him, that's all.

Why was she jumping to such conclusions? She soothed her bosom with her hand, breathing heavily. The worse things she suspected the more she tormented herself. But what ground did she have for any more optimistic interpretation? On her faith in him? This faith which she had preserved intact so many years had suddenly been swept away. She dropped limply onto the sofa. After undergoing such intense excitement her body felt drained of all energy. She had to rest. Although the living room was enclosed on all four sides she felt as if she were in a boundless desert, all by herself, with the sensation of being abandoned.

She leaned her head on the back of the sofa. She felt like a wounded animal pausing briefly to rest. Quite as a matter of course her eyes came to rest on a photograph hung on the opposite wall. She knew it only too well; she had been looking at it for ten years. It was their wedding picture. The photographic style of the picture was already outmoded. The style of their wedding costumes was also outmoded. Just ten years out of date. Only the face in the picture was much fresher and smoother than it was now. As she smiled the corners of her eyes and mouth had tilted graciously upward. Her chin had been round and smooth as an eggshell. And now? She unconsciously rubbed her hand across her face. Even without looking in a mirror she knew that her former glory had all passed away. The corners of her eyes and mouth now drooped downward. Her jaw was now creased by a double chin. Her skin was no longer smooth as satin. She really had no idea when all those wrinkles had made their imprint. Neither did she have any idea when her pores had become so enlarged. In the daytime she usually covered her skin with powder. In the evening this was no longer necessary and she washed it all off before going to bed, restoring her natural appearance. Like a withered blossom, her original pink complexion had become dry and yellow. On her cheekbones dark spots had broken out. As she moved her hand over her face she felt a pang of regret. Even if he hadn't gone out. Even if he were still in the study, what good would it do? She was so ugly now!

She had been so for a long time and had never had any feeling of insecurity. In everyday family life how could one put on make up and be glamorous? Even actors on the stage had to take off their make up some time. Even if one treated life as a stage, still the family was behind the scenes. When husband and wife were together there could be no curtain between them. For ten years they had been growing accustomed to every aspect of one another: the mistakes, the ugliness, the good, the bad. She had no way to preserve what couldn't be preserved. So why hide from him her ungroomed appearance?

Suddenly she realized the fallacy of this attitude.

She had thought that when two people had lived together for a long time there was no need to care about appearance. Wasn't it so? He hardly ever looked at her and when he did it was only a passing glance, completely indifferent. The ardent looks and the long passionate gazing into one another's eyes which had been so prominent in the days of their courtship and early in their marriage had long since ceased. Sometimes she thought back on those things with wistful nostalgia but they still seemed very far away. Perhaps he had the same feeling. Perhaps, without her being aware of it, he had been conscious of the growing staleness of her glances as they lost their former softness and sweetness. That's how life was. One couldn't be eternally young nor could one be eternally head over heels in love. She had consoled herself with these reflections until she no longer minded. Since she could no longer attract his notice she had given up making herself pretty. Now, in an instant, she had reversed her previous opinion. How stupid she had been! Of course the real reason she hadn't been able to attract his notice was that she was no longer worth noticing. Everyone likes to appreciate rare and beautiful objects. Naturally, they hardly cast a glance at what is old and worn out. Although her looks had been fading year after year, the world was still fresh and glamorous. In the circles in which he moved how many fresh and glamorous faces there were, alluring and seductive, attracting the eye and agitating the heart! Especially those movie stars he was always meeting; they changed their dresses several times a day; they constantly put on fresh make-up so that they were lovely as butterflies; hair-dos and facials were more important to them than eating. With all their make-up washed off, she might well be more attractive than they. If any of them were as good as her that was because they were younger. Wait till they got to be her age, they wouldn't be much to look at without their external finery.

The problem was that he only looked at their external glamour and had no chance to see them as they really were. By contrast, seeing her as she really was, he found her ugly. To get to the heart of the matter, wasn't it her own fault he found her ugly? Ten years of marriage had worn down her loveliness till she looked as haggard as she did today. As she looked at the picture on the wall, self pity brought tears to her eyes. All the happiness which she had been cherishing had suddenly vanished. It had left her heart as he had stealthily left the house. Her heart was left in a hopelessly inextricable tangle. Doubt and suspicion had kindled a bonfire which had burned all her harvest. She couldn't help feeling that the ten years of her life she had shared with him had been nothing but giving and sacrifice. All her giving, all her sacrifices had led only to this result. It certainly hadn't been worth it.

This question—the one of whether or not it would prove "worth it"—was one to which her parents had given careful thought ten years before. Fate certainly played tricks on one! At that time when she had been in all the bloom and loveliness of her youth, there had been many young men besides him who had shown an interest in her. But she, without the least hesitation, had chosen him. Now when the flower had reached the time when it must wither and had discovered its mistake—what could be salvaged from its ruin, now?

In those days, when she was still a young girl, she had thought her parents point of view materialistic and out of date. Only now when she had a child of her own did she realize that children owe everything to their parents. The year when she had first met him she was only twenty years old, naïve and innocent, able to think, of nothing but romantic dreams of love. Her parents who were mature and experienced people had objected to her choice. They had objected to his humble origins, his uncertain occupation, his frail stature, his self-assured and self-deprecating conceit. By remaining firm for two years she had finally triumphed over her parents objections. Afterwards, observing their happy married life, her parents regretted their earlier interference. Especially in the last two years, now that her husband had risen in his profession and their standard of living had risen, her parents were especially gratified by the success of her marriage. If they knew how she was suffering now, abandoned and alone in the middle of the night, how astonished they would be!

Tears obscured her vision with a thin mist. Through the mist she stared at the bridegroom pictured by the side of his lovely bride. Suddenly she winked her eyes as a feeling of indignation swept over her. This feeling of indignation, this sense of injustice arose from the perception that time, which proverbially spared no one had spared him so much. It wasn't that he hadn't changed since the picture was taken but compared to her he had changed so little. Time had even repaired many of his earlier flaws. Previously he had been excessively thin with sunken cheeks and tousled hair. His present appearance no longer exhibited these shortcomings. He had now come up to standard weight and this gave his tall stature a dashing appearance. His hair was now well-groomed. Although some gray hairs were beginning to appear they only emphasized his professional success and added to his air of distinction. The skin of a man seemed to be as durable as a pine tree that remains ever green, ever flourishing. Although lines might be deeply carved in it, the complexion remained smooth and clear unlike the mottled skin of an aging woman. Originally it had not been for his handsome appearance that she had loved him but for the strength of his fighting spirit. Through the years she had grown too used to him to perceive how much his manner had improved. His grave and profound air in both speech and behavior had great dignity. A slight astigmatism had forced him to begin wearing broad-rimmed glasses which made his eyes appear larger and added a certain brilliance to them when he looked at anything. Chronologically he was five years older than she but she felt he looked younger than she did—especially as she was right now.

Why couldn't she force herself to take a brighter view of this matter? After all writers were very nervous people. Maybe he had run into some problem arid gone impulsively off to consult a friend about it. Perhaps he had just felt a need to get out and breathe some fresh air. But then she remembered that it was raining out. Even if he'd felt nervous and wanted to get out he would certainly have hesitated to do so in the middle of a cold and briny night like this. If he had ignored the inclement weather he must have had a strong motive.

Her face became shadowed with her forebodings. She sighed heavily. Try as she might to take an optimistic view, she couldn't help returning to her darker suspicions. Maybe the rain had just begun? Maybe he had found the rainy night poetic and had gone out to enjoy its atmosphere? Maybe it hadn't been his own idea to go out; perhaps a friend had telephoned and asked him to go over?

Rousing her torpid body she forced herself up from the sofa and went into the study. A shiny black telephone stood on the side of his desk. As soon as it rang he had only to put out his hand and pick up the receiver. Perhaps that was what had happened tonight.

Not only was this thought unable to relieve her feelings but it even gave birth to a new suspicion in her mind. Suddenly all the previous phone calls which she had thought nothing of at the time, gave her a great deal to think about. Who knew who it might be who had called him?

Of course there were! Even at the time she had known some of them were women! Sometimes when she had answered the phone she had heard women's voices. Some familiar, some strange; some sultry, some low and soft; all of them had made her feel a little uncomfortable.

His having sneaked out this evening was proof that he had many things he was hiding from her. Anyone can change, especially a man who has become successful. Previously he had never cared for dancing. Perhaps now he was going from bad to worse; perhaps right now he was holding the slender waist of a dance-hall girl and dancing with passion!

Suddenly her breathing became irregular again. Could those haunts of sirens and his sneaky, low-classed friends be corrupting him? Oh no! It was quite impossible! Why did she invent such problems to make herself unhappy? He had never had any bad habits of gambling or dissipation. Not only that but before he'd met her he had never had a girl friend or any experience of love. For this reason she had always considered him as simple as a blank sheet of paper. And now the white paper had been dyed black by the night. People are naturally curious. Maybe it was because he had never tried this sort of thing before that he had now succumbed to the temptation to see what it was like.

Was he mingling with women who sell their bodies? Even at the thought of such degradation her bosom seemed to explode and she felt nauseated. She really couldn't understand men. They seemed to be human but they acted in a way that was unworthy of human beings. That class of women were to be found in every city and every generation had produced them—a proof that the majority of men found them necessary. He, too, was a man. What would prevent him from doing what other men did?

If she wanted to blame somebody she should blame herself for being too careless and easy-going, for putting too much faith in him and giving him too much freedom. She had furnished him with the opportunities of which he had taken advantage. If his clothes had all been kept in the bedroom he wouldn't have been able to go out at will like this.

Still plunged in regretful meditation she walked resolutely across the room and opened his closet. She had always considered his closet as an inviolable sanctuary. Many of the objects he kept there were things he valued as souvenirs. He kept them neatly ranged in separate categories and there was no need for her to tidy them up. Whenever she happened to open it to put something in or take something out he always protested, "Don't disturb my closet!" as if he had gold stored in there that he was afraid she would steal. Gradually she had come to feel that it was a place she must not enter. Now she broke into the forbidden territory. Not only had she lost all feeling of its sacred inviolability but she even viewed it with a peculiar loathing. Without a glance at the rest of the closet she looked at the side where his suits were hung. At first she hadn't been conscious of anything wrong with this arrangement. He had suggested that if he kept the clothes he was always using in the study it would be more convenient. In the house he always wore pajamas and a bathrobe. If he were to get a sudden phone call, requiring his immediate departure it would be more convenient, for a man of his lazy habits to have a change of clothes close at hand. It hadn't occurred to her that too much convenience might lead to abuses. Otherwise he would never have been able to pull the wool over her eyes so long. His bathrobe and pajamas were hastily thrown in a corner of the closet. Examining his suits she found that the gray one was missing; it just happened to be his newest suit.

The fact that he had gone out wearing his newest suit only added to her suspicions. Normally he was very careful with his suits and only wore a new one for very important engagements. What could be so important to make him wear one on a rainy night like this? Every thing pointed to the conclusion which she most dreaded but kept inevitably recurring. There must be a woman involved.

A woman. What sort of woman? Someone she knew or someone she didn't know? She felt something pressing on her heart and smothering her. At this moment of inconclusive speculation she felt stirring in her an anger against every woman in town.

The more she considered, the more complicated the problem became. The more she analyzed it the more serious it appeared. If he had gone with some friends to make a night of it or if he'd set out on the spur of the moment to pick up whatever girl he could find, that would be comparatively simple. But she was afraid he had gone to keep a rendezvous with a girl friend.

As she closed the closet, her hand trembled slightly she felt a cramp in her stomach and her legs grew rubbery His image occupied her heart; but now that her heart was being torn asunder by fearful speculations, his image was also becoming dismembered. She had given him all her love and had taken for granted that he gave her all of his in return. So he had really given her only bits and pieces, odds and ends of his affection. She gasped out a few sobs. She ought to be crying but she had no tears. Certainly it was something to cry about: to have had the wool pulled over her eyes and to have been deceived—and probably for a very long time. This certainly wasn't the first time he had gone to meet that woman, and she had known nothing about it all along, and all that time they had been laughing at her behind her back.

She was staggering as she turned around. If she hadn't grabbed the back of the swivel chair she might well have fallen to the ground. Never in her life had she felt such tension and anguish. The most intense suffering in a woman's life was supposed to be childbirth. She remembered that when she had given birth to the baby she had gone through ten hours in the delivery room. She'd thought she might die. Even if she had died she could hardly have suffered any more. But that was over and once over, although a little painful to recall, it seemed like nothing compared to her present suffering. Physical suffering soon dissolved but what remedy was there for mental anguish?

She sat down in the swivel chair, panting for breath. Once in her life she had been as desperately helpless as she was now. It was the second year after her marriage. He was teaching in a high school and had been assigned to a room in a teacher's dormitory where the kitchen was shared with their neighbors. It's a good thing they did share the kitchen; otherwise there would have been a major fire. They were using a kerosene stove. Being young and inexperienced, she had turned up the kerosene when it was about to give out without extinguishing the flame. The whole stove went up in flames. The sight of the terrible conflagration held her speechless a few seconds; then she began to scream. If another teacher's wife hadn't come and put out the fire with a blanket— [it] was too terrible to think what might have happened. Afterwards she had sat down as if paralyzed, as she was doing now, patting her bosom and panting incessantly; more deeply impressed by the danger she had been in the more she thought about it. A more ludicrous aspect of the episode was that her idea at the time had been to splash the fire with water from a basin, a project which had she carried it out could only have resulted in the entire building going up in smoke.

In her past experience of anguish and tension she had always screamed or cried out. This time the experience was more excruciating than any she had ever had before but she remained silent. At most, the sound of a few half-suppressed sobs, echoing in the empty silence of the room, gave a slight indication of her intense feeling. In the past, no matter what had happened, she had always had him at her side. His solace had always given her strength! Even if he scolded her she had felt happy. But now he had gone God knows where and left her here alone. Every minute, every second was unendurable.

She shook her head in a dispirited way, reflecting the troubled state of her body. The swivel chair gave a corresponding swing. Usually he would sit in this swivel chair, swinging gently to and fro with a light rhythmic motion, at the same time, deeply meditating. Sometimes leaning his cheek against his hand, sometimes puffing at a cigarette, his attitude of deep meditation was quite striking. .

A man's working efficiency depends to a large extent on his surroundings. His ten scripts had all been completed in this room. She spun slowly through the full cycle of the swivel chair. The study had the best location of any room in the apartment. Outside the window there was nothing to obstruct the view and the noise coming up from the street was relatively remote. In this room, at the dead of night, all was still. Even the walls contributed something to the stillness. They were painted a dark shade of blue which he had chosen himself: not only still, but solemn like his face which was so hostile to light conversation or laughter. How could one be happy without light conversation and laughter?

The books in his bookcase were quite numerous. As befitted a professional writer, every type of book was represented. A few were books he had borrowed from friends and never returned but most were the result of his steady acquisition. When they were poor he had bought books to read; when they became more wealthy he acquired them for show. In her spare time she also read for relaxation but only novels and drama. She never looked at poetry or essays. There were also works of foreign literature which interested her even less.

He didn't read them either. Where could he find the time? He had no time for anything. Turning night into day didn't help. The morning is a good time to get things done. The time of day that should be used for business he had converted into his time for sleeping; the time that should be spent sleeping he spent on his work. Work! work! Were nocturnal rendezvous also part of his work?

Ranged along the wall above the bookcase were a row of framed pictures. One was outstanding: high collar, long beard, collar ornamented with elaborate ruffles that, to her mind, resembled some instrument of torture. That was the object of his worship, Shakespeare. He had begun worshipping Shakespeare when he switched to writing scripts. Previously he had worshipped Turgenev and Gide. There had also been Shelley and Doyle, Hegel and Nietsche. Still he had never hung up their portraits. It wasn't hard to find artistic portraits of them, the problem was getting them framed. It was best to do without anything they didn't really need. She didn't know where in the world he had picked up this picture of Shakespeare. His mind was set on becoming the "Shakespeare of China;" only he would be in advance of Shakespeare as since Shakespeare's time the stage had been replaced by a more advanced medium, the moving picture.

In spite of her present bitterness toward him she couldn't deny his intellectual ability. In the picture-frame next to that holding Shakespeare's portrait was a photograph of him receiving an award for the best film drama of the year before last. He was dressed in new, white evening clothes and holding the gold statuette in his hand. He was beaming with satisfaction. The statue had been taken by the company to be put on exhibition. It should belong to the company; if the company hadn't spent so much money on promotion and public relations it never would have won the two Oscars, one for the best direction and one for the best screenplay. These things weren't really important but it was better than getting nothing. This had been the beginning of a run of good luck for him.

The newspapers competed with one another to get interviews with him. They called him "an astounding new voice" among the younger writers. She clipped all these interviews for him with deep appreciation and gratification. Lord knew how many years his "astounding new voice" had been crying in the wilderness before anyone noticed it.

The award had certainly brought him luck. People seemed to have a kind of herd instinct that led them to follow blindly whatever was the current fashion. It seemed that now nobody else but him would do for the most important scripts of the company and independent producers also often sought him out to consult him about new scripts. His old movies which had been failures were now re-released and hailed as masterpieces.

As far as his writing was concerned she had the utmost confidence and trust in him. Still as time went on she had discovered that he didn't have so much creative genius as ingenuity. It wasn't that he was so prolific that she had come to accept his productions as a matter of course; no, the problem was that everything he wrote seemed to come from some "source:" either from folk stories or from classical or modern fiction or from something he had found in foreign films or literature. Although she knew nothing about art, still she felt sure that the important thing in art was invention. And there was nothing in his scripts that he had invented. Actually she didn't know whether he should be considered a dramatist or a dramatic craftsman.

The swivel chair slowly turned and faced the desk. The manuscript of his work in progress lay on its broad surface. A book he was consulting lay open beside it with a passage clearly underlined in red ink. The passage had been transcribed, word for word, into his manuscript. She remembered that last night he had already gotten this far. Evidently he had done no work at all this evening. What he had done was made evident by the empty tea glass he had finished and the cigarette butts lying in the ash tray. Evidently he had sat here vacantly for some time before going out. Since he wasn't working, what in the world could he have had on his mind?

When they had been poor, he had little time but managed to accomplish a great deal. Now it was just the opposite. His accomplishment was minimal and he wasted a great deal of time. During the years when he was teaching school, he was in the classroom all day and busy correcting the students' assignments and preparing the material for his courses in the evening. He had very little free time and yet he never stayed up too late. All the teachers in the school had to attend the flag-raising ceremony each morning and getting up in time for it was a major difficulty for him. He then used to write with lightning swiftness, his hand fairly flying across the page. Often he would finish a whole short story in one evening and have it in the mail, return postage and all. After that he would mail it again and again, each time leading only to disappointment, until finally he would put is aside and forget it. At that time his desk was the property of the school. It was a very old fashioned type, small and old with the varnish flaked and peeling off. There were only three drawers, very shallow, the contents of which were too numerous, stuffed to the brim. Several times she had wanted to burn part of this material but he insisted on keeping it. When the baby became old enough to walk he once crumpled and tore one of his manuscripts. Although he was very angry, he couldn't blame a baby too young to know any better. All he could do was complain that the desk was too low. He had finally gotten a specially high desk, with drawers on both sides going all the way down to the floor. It could accommodate almost any amount of things. It was made out of pumelo wood and was brightly polished. The drawers were specially made of camphor wood and gave off a special fragrance when opened. Still she appreciated the old desk more. Although they were poor then they enjoyed a simple happiness of spirit. He had no secrets from her.

Before she opened the drawer, she held her breath for a fraction of a second and listened. Although she knew perfectly well that he could not appear suddenly, she still felt a little apprehensive. He had expressly forbidden her to go peeking into his things when he wasn't there and had become quite angry on the two or three previous occasions when she had violated this prohibition. She had only taken a curious glance without any particular motive but he had severely reprimanded her that it was unethical to pry into the personal belongings of another person. She self-consciously gave way on the point and accepted this with a smile without contesting his opinion; in her heart, however, she felt he was wrong. Man and wife are one flesh—why should he consider her as "another person?" The fact was he had long ceased to be one with her in heart and mind.

Had they been one in heart and mind he wouldn't have locked the drawers. She pulled vigorously a few times but they didn't budge. Then, for lack of any better approach she knocked tentatively on the outside of the drawer hoping the sound would somehow reveal the secret of what was within. She had sometimes caught a glimpse of the contents of the top drawer when he opened it momentarily for some casual purpose. She had seen only glue, scissors, pieces of paper: perfectly ordinary objects. But she had never had a good look. Perhaps it might also contain pictures of girls, love letters, perhaps even love-tokens or souvenirs such as a lock of hair. She had once cut a lock of her own hair to give to him. It was during the period when her parents disapproved of his courtship and they sometimes went so far as to forbid her to see him. With careful forethought she had snipped off a lock of her hair and sent it to him enclosed in a letter in which she told him that when he looked at this lock of hair it would be as if he were looking at her herself. He had kept it thereafter right up to the time they were married; then he had taken all such keepsakes and turned them over to her. Most of them she had kept for him. During these years of their married life, they had moved several times; where had she put those keepsakes? She wasn't sure anymore. Anyway, he had never asked her. Apparently he had completely forgotten about it. Probably his attitude was: now that she belonged completely to him, why should he be concerned about just one lock of her hair.

With a cold smile she pulled at the lock. Who could say what might be in that drawer? How stupid she had been! Why hadn't she ever stolen his key? That's what she would do now. Tomorrow morning while he was still fast asleep she would very quietly have a look at the inside of the drawer. Then, with the evidence in her hand, she;d see what he had to say.

She went on to the next drawer and found it unlocked. This was proof that it contained no secrets; and yet there might be a few clues. He was an indifferent husband but his attitude toward his desk was far from indifferent. Although not too neat, the contents of the drawer were arranged in layers. After digging through one layer you arrived at another. She hastily glanced through the piles of manuscripts and letters. Her feelings were tense, her thoughts conflicting. She hoped to find something and yet she hoped she wouldn't find anything.

The scrapbook containing the clippings she had made was also in the drawer. It was thoroughly familiar to her so there was no need to examine it—and yet, the thought suddenly struck her that if she were to go through it with a new awareness she might, in fact, uncover some clues. When his name first began to appear in the newspapers she had thought it well worth while to clip and preserve all references to him as souvenirs. From both newspapers and magazines she would clip the relevant portions and also a strip giving the date of the issue to place next to the item as a caption. It made a fine display.

Once impaled on the horns of the monster of jealousy it was difficult to break free. As she went through the scrapbook this time every photograph filled her with anxiety and anguish. She felt as if every person pictured there might be the cause that had impelled him to leave her. She studied the photograph on the first page for a long time. It had been taken at a studio party. At that time he hadn't yet been assigned to any script and so he was a very inconspicuous item in the picture. He was standing in the background where neither the lights nor the focus of the picture were directed upon him. His face was dark and blurred. Unless you looked very carefully, you couldn't tell it was he. The glance of a viewer was much more drawn toward the figures in the front row. On the right was the obese studio manager with his pot-belly and the face of a laughing Buddha. Much more attractive to the eye were the two glamorous faces next to him.

She blinked her eyes. The sight of Chiang Chu and Ting Ni seemed to hurt them. Without reading the caption she knew the occasion was the fifth anniversary of the studio. On hand were the outstanding stars of the studio including Chiang Chu, Ting Ni and many others.

In the accompanying news stories there was no mention of him. Why had she kept it as a souvenir? And she'd even put it on the first page! Although she knew it had nothing to do with her, still she had decided to clip it; the thought made her feel more and more unhappy. That was four years ago. He had just begun to break into the movie world. This had been a rare chance for a little publicity, especially to be seen in the company of the studio manager and famous stars. He held a glass of champagne in his hand and seemed unaware his picture was being taken since his eyes were not on the camera.

What was he looking at? She bent attentively over the picture. The light was reflected from his eyes in a way that made it impossible to follow his gaze. Still, her sensitivity assured her he was obliquely glancing at the two lovely movie stars in the front row. Could it be that he had a special relation with one of them? Though inundated by an overwhelming wave of jealousy, she retained a degree of reason. Admiring beautiful women was a favorite occupation of all men. Whenever she glanced at this album she also had inadvertently noticed the two beautiful movie stars. From his place in the picture it was clear that he was separated from them by an immense gulf in status. At that time not one of his scripts had yet been accepted while they were the glamorous idols of an adoring public. Still, she had heard titillating rumors about the private lives of movie stars before they achieved stardom, and even after they became famous there were often traces of romantic scandal. Could one of them have costarred with him in some back-stage drama?

She vehemently flipped over the page. The photos that followed did nothing to ameliorate her ill humor. On the contrary, it deepened and deepened the further she went. The texts and photographs she had clipped became more appropriate. The texts referred to his screen dramas. In the pictures he was no longer standing in a corner.

Ignoring the pictures in which he posed with other men she relentlessly sought out those where he was accompanied by a woman. She was astonished at the extent of her previous blindness. There was a picture with Lin Ju-pao. Why hadn't she ever noticed before that he had his arm around her? Her eyes opened wide, she fixed her attention on his detestable arm. Actually there was nothing out of the ordinary. His arm wasn't actually touching her shoulder but only resting on the back of the chair. Still, why, when they were sitting quite properly, did he have to extend his arm like that. Clearly he was up to no good.

And look at his eyes! Wasn't there a romantic gleam in the corner of his eye and a romantic twist in his smile? Previously she had interpreted his look as a smile of satisfaction. He had been chosen best screen-writer. He was at a banquet in celebration of the occasion, sitting next to the star of his prize-winning screenplay. Naturally he felt this the climax of success. There had been nothing in it that should disturb her. Now, however, seen in the light of her new uncertainty it embodied a very disturbing problem indeed. She had never had anything against Lin Ju-pao, but as she gazed at the photo she was completely stupefied. Could there be a secret liaison between the best screen-writer and his leading lady?

Her suspicions didn't stop at Lin Ju-pao. There were plenty of other suspects in the pages which followed. The flock of young starlets that surrounded him, their smiling faces fresh as spring blossoms, were all newcomers being groomed by the studio. Each of them had a chance to become a great star. Getting ahead in the movies was no simple matter and those girls had a lot of tricks up their sleeves. They not only knew how to be nice to the manager and how to attract the director; they also realized the value of good personal relations with the script writer. When they smiled at him and called him "big daddy" wasn't that because they realized he was worth buttering up and in the hope that he would add a few lines to their part or build up the importance of their role?

She made a face at the picture. Those little imps were supposed to be schoolgirls but in fact they were over twenty. The new generation of young girls was really appalling! From childhood they became adept at concealing their real age. Hung Ying, who wore her hair trailing down over her shoulders, was already married and had a child. Yet she continued to play the role of a sixteen-year-old. From the look of Wu Mei's well-shaped behind you'd think she couldn't be more than seventeen. She had heard that Hung Ying had had a tough life. She had lost both parents while very young and been brought up by her uncle. He was very avaricious and arranged for her to become the concubine of a wealthy business man. Finding it impossible to win her affection, the businessman finally agreed to her constant pleas and allowed her to fulfill her life-long ambition of becoming a movie star. A girl who so early in life had been forced to live with a man she didn't love would not feel strongly committed to fidelity. In view of this aspect of Hung Ying's background, wasn't it possible she was having a secret affair with him?

Besides Hung Ying, Wu Mei was also a possibility. Though she played the ingenue both on and off the screen and seemed as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, her mature body was a bombshell. The two scenarios he had written this year both starred Wu Mei. She was very earnest about her work and was constantly consulting him about the correct interpretation of her roles. Could he come into constant contact with such a girl without being affected?

Danger! Danger! Every woman she considered seemed to be dangerous in one way or another. She closed the album. She regretted she couldn't throw it on the floor and stamp on it. She wanted to stamp on the faces of all those glamorous girls. But then she thought better of it. Of course she couldn't really do that. Even if she were to destroy this scrapbook of clippings it had cost her so much trouble to collect, that wouldn't harm a single hair on the heads of those women.

From hating glamorous movie stars she went on to hating the whole movie industry. Her hatred for the movie industry made her hate the scripts her husband wrote. She regretted that she couldn't crumple up all the manuscripts on the desk. If it weren't for those manuscripts what could he use for a cover? If he hadn't had the excuse of sitting up to get his work done, how could he have slipped out?

She picked up the manuscript and held it in her hand, hesitated a moment and then put it down again. Crumpling his manuscripts would not only not solve their problem but would lead to new problems. Their daily subsistence depended on his screen-writing. To destroy his manuscripts would be like throwing out the bread in the bread box or demolishing their apartment. Besides that, destroying his manuscripts would do nothing toward finding the real reason he had gone out and left her in the middle of the night.

She listlessly rose from the swivel chair. This study was now the site of her agony. Really, a comfortable life caused more estrangement between man and wife than a life of poverty. She remembered the first time they had come to watch the construction of the apartment. The outer shell had just been completed and the interior had not yet been divided up into rooms. All these walls and doors that now filled the apartment served as barriers and helped him in his bad behavior. For all she knew, it had been like this every night. She never knew when he slipped out. She never knew when he came back.

Again she was overcome with agitation and slumped onto the sofa. In spite of her grief, it seemed funny when she thought it over. He had gone out to have a good time and here she was sitting up all alone waiting for him and losing a lot of sleep.

Well, just the same, she'd rather die than go back to bed. This was his home and sooner or later he'd come back like a bird to the nest. She wanted to observe how he turned the key noiselessly in the lock and tiptoed into the room only to be stopped cold when he saw her.

Suddenly a shiver ran through her. Her whole body shrunk as if with cold. She felt as if he had already entered and were standing before her, distress showing in his stiffened features. When that time actually came, what would she do?

"Why are you sitting here?" Anticipating a quarrel, he would begin by asking her.

Perhaps his expression would be apologetic. Perhaps he would feign innocence. She would fix him with an intent and hostile stare.

"Need you ask? I'm waiting for you. Tell me where you've been off to."

If she mobilized her feelings for such a direct confrontation as soon as he entered, how would he reply?

"I've been taking a walk."

"A walk! What nonsense!" Should she say this with an ironic smile or with a roar of fury?

"Really! The longer I sat here the staler I got. I couldn't write a word. I was hoping a walk might bring me some inspiration."

"You went out for a walk in the middle of the night hoping to find inspiration! Do you think I'm so easy to fool?"

The male animal is very irritable and easily aroused to anger. His face would redden, his cheek muscles tense downwards, his eyelids blink and his eyes set in a cold glare. She could easily imagine his anger. He seldom became angry but when he did his aspect was really terrifying.

"Fool you? Why should I try to fool you? Do you mean to say that I should have woken you up after you'd gone to sleep?"

"You shouldn't have gone out at all."

"Have you chained my ankle so that I can't go out? What nonsense! If I feel like going out, I'll go out."

"Of course you have your freedom. But you didn't need to say you were looking for inspiration."

"What do you think I was looking for, then?"

"A woman!"

She soothed her trembling lips with her hand. Her breathing had suddenly grown heavy. If she actually brought all her suspicions out into the open like this, what response would she get?

"Rubbish! What ideas you have!" he would argue vigorously. In idle chatter with her friends they had once joked that "Never admit anything" was the strategy usually adopted by men against the accusations of their wives. But he didn't have the patience to employ strategy. Given his character, chances were one would have to face his anger instead.

"Looking for a woman? Suppose I were looking for a woman, what have you got to say about it?"

A shiver ran through her. Her eyes stared. Her breathing stopped. No. She must not directly express the suspicions she harbored in her mind. A direct attack would be the most stupid approach. She would trap herself in an unfavorable position, turning an advantage into a disadvantage. If he were to answer her in this way what could she do? If she gave a meek and soothing answer it would be a sign of weakness. If she remained firm and determined, their quarrel would develop into a situation of permanent incompatibility.

Among her friends and relatives there was no lack of examples. There was her distant relative Mr. Fei who had been the most hen-pecked of husbands. Once, as part of a business deal, he had gone with some companions for a night on the town. Mrs. Fei found out and raised the devil of a rumpus about it. The worm turned. Mild Mr. Fei exploded and divorced her the next day. Mrs. Fei had complained and wept to her about it. Although she had felt very sorry for her there was nothing to be done. In a way she couldn't help blaming her. From the beginning she had tried to tell her that raising a fuss and quarreling wasn't the way to solve the problem. But she wouldn't listen—until finally the honor of being Mrs. Fei was transferred to another and, on the whole, less worthy person.

She herself had enjoyed, for ten years, the honor of being the wife of a screen-writer, first a struggling, then a prominent one. She had no intention of giving that up. If she didn't remain cool and calculating she might follow the footsteps of Mrs. Fei in forcing a bitter quarrel and might even suffer her ultimate fate. What Mrs. Ch'iang said the other day was true: that when men are comfortable and well fed they become lascivious. The love and warmth of their early years of marriage were only burnt-out ashes. His desire for novelty made him despise the wife he had grown used to. He could hardly wait to find an excuse to get rid of her. He wanted to incite her to jealousy, quarrels, separation. Those were the three stages of his plan. After he had gotten rid of her he could take a young and beautiful wife. Now that he enjoyed financial security he no longer valued a wife who was a good housekeeper. Now that he had such ample opportunities for meeting them he could easily marry a movie star. A very cozy arrangement for both of them! Ah ha! I'm afraid it won't be quite that easy! After all her work and suffering! She certainly wouldn't fall for their trick!

She had once seen in a newspaper a translation of a foreign article on marital problems. It had been a long time ago and she hadn't paid too much attention to it at the time, anyway. In her overconfidence she had never guessed it might one day be applicable to her own life. Although she didn't remember it very clearly she could recall it in vague outline. The article had maintained that far from "clearing the atmosphere" arguments between husband and wife had a very unwholesome effect. That it increased the husband's bad impression and stiffened attitudes on both sides. If you wanted to recapture his heart, it argued, the best approach was to move him by your calm and gentle understanding. Without accusations or reproaches one should welcome him with a warm and gentle smile and be anxious to make him feel cozy and comfortable.

"Huh, why are you sitting here?"

"I woke up. Couldn't sleep. Thought I'd sit for a while and have a look at the newspaper."

She picked up the evening paper and smiled. It was a very unnatural smile; still, it was a smile. To receive your enemy with a smile is the highest type of conduct. When he returned she would act like this. Concealing her feelings and asking no questions she would merely welcome him as she always did when he came in.

"Oh, so you're back. Is it cold out? Still raining?"

Then she would come forward and help him off with his coat. After all, he was only human. If his wife received him this way, wouldn't he feel shame and regret?

She put down the newspaper. Her emotions were in a hopeless tangle. She had no talent as an actress. She couldn't repress her anguish and pretend to be happy. In her present state of feeling, as soon as he appeared she would probably break out weeping and begin to scold him. Weeping and scolding, she would be reminded of all their years of happiness—with results that were unforeseeable. Not to mention the response it might evoke in him, it might also wake their son. Hearing his parents quarrel might have an unfavorable psychological effect on the child. Then there were the neighbors. Perhaps they would laugh at them. Why wash one's dirty linen in public? It only lost one's dignity and self-respect.

The sound of soft footsteps from outside triggered the rapid beating of her heart. She held her breath as the footsteps passed on to the next door. As the sound faded away she remained grimly staring straight ahead. She wondered what time it was. Although her thoughts had been galloping very swiftly, time had been passing much more slowly than usual. Only a little while ago she had been hoping he'd hurry home.

Now, her attitude had already changed and she was rather afraid of his return.

When one is in a hopeless position one tends to blame others and at the same time to blame oneself. Instead of discovering his callous infidelity, wouldn't it have been better if she had remained unconscious of the whole thing? Why did she have to wake up? And why did she have to get up and go to look after him? If she could have gotten back to sleep right after waking up she would never have discovered the secret of his nocturnal exodus. Following the philosophy that "a lie is as good as the truth if you believe it completely" she could have gone on living in a fool's paradise.

She gave a melancholy yawn. This protracted tension had left her a bit weary. She knew very well she wouldn't be able to get to sleep but still anything would be better than this intent waiting as if to catch a thief.

The thief in this case was a clever one. To catch a clever fellow it was necessary to have a plan; and she was like a completely untrained policeman who when it came to the test would be frightened out of his wits and make a mess of everything.

The urge to flee took possession of her. She staggered out of the living room and made a dash for the bedroom. The problem was an important one. There was no hope for a hasty solution.

Curled up in bed, she closed her eyes. It was best to imagine that all this had never happened; that what she had just gone through had been only a dream. If only that were true! She heaved a sigh. She wondered whether human life, on the whole, contained more happiness or more suffering. Sometimes, when she didn't want it to be a dream, it turned out that she was actually dreaming. At other times, when she fervently hoped that what she was experiencing was only a dream it proved to be only too real.

She began to sob softly and gradually the sound became more intense. It would have been inaccurate to say this was because he had abandoned her. More precisely it was because she felt that all her happiness was gone forever. With the entry of this unhappiness into her heart she felt that something had gone out of her life which could not be replaced.

As for him, he'd be back.

2

As Yao-ah was about to leave, Mr. Wu, the owner of the shop, was looking over the engine of a Ford that would need bumper repairs the next day. Mr. Wu looked up and reminded him again:

"I want you to be back by tomorrow night, at the latest. Ah-tung and Chiu-shan can't finish the job without you."

Chiu-shan and Ah-tung lay beneath the car that they were repairing. He kicked their feet, the only parts of them that were visible. They poked out their heads to see what he wanted.

"I'm going now. Don't bother to bid for either of the hui\fn{A note reads: A hui is one of the most common ways to borrow money in Taiwan for little or no interest. It consists of a group of people who each pay a fixed amount of money into a group fund each month. Every member of the hui takes a turn every month to collect the total amount of money in the hui There are a variety of ways to determine whose turn it is to collect the money each month. In this case, one must bid for it. The amount one bids is the amount of interest one is willing to pay each member of the hui. The person who bids the highest amount receives the money first. The person who bids the smallest amount receives the money last. The longer one waits to collect the money in the hui the lower one's rate of interest is. Thus it is more profitable to wait.} day after tomorrow. We'll just forget about it for now."

In a burst of happiness over Yao-ah's decision Ah-tung waved his arms above his head. Chiu-shan kicked him and said:

"Don't let the evil spirits lead you astray!"

As the public bus sped along the Kaoping Highway, mango and coconut trees rushed toward him and then flew off at angles on both sides. He counted one farmhouse after another and every rice paddy. He felt an intense sadness which was probably the feeling that is called "nostalgia." In the distance he saw narrow rows of betel-nut trees. He saw an old hunchbacked farmer returning home late from the fields carrying a hoe. It was like the image of his father which had been entering his dreams so often recently. Every time his elder brother Ah-hsiung wrote a letter to him he always said such things as:

"Dad has really become thin and he's just a little over sixty," and "Dad has had a relapse of that bad cough and he won't go to the doctor."

He would then dream of his father at night and the father in his dreams became weaker and weaker each day. He was afraid he would never resemble that sturdy broad-backed farmer again.

This was the first time he had returned home in two years. The vacation over the Chinese New Year lasted five days and Ah-tung and Chiu-shan both went home to Chiayi. He voluntarily gave up his own vacation time in order to help Mr. Wu with the shop and to allow him to take a trip around the island with his family. He said it was because Mr. Wu and his family had treated him so well. On the fifth day of the New Year his elder brother came to see him. He mentioned nothing of his father's recriminations, saying only that his mother missed him very much. As Ah-hsiung was about to leave he relayed another message from his mother:

"Your father's condition is getting worse and worse every day and it's all caused by worry. Don't upset him like this. Come home when you have a chance."

That evening Mr. Wu and his family came back from their trip. In spite of all of the talk and laughter and the many gifts they brought for him, he didn't sleep well that night. A city is something which knows no fatigue; it wasn't until three or four in the morning that things grew quiet. When he heard the sound of several crickets chirping in the corner of the room he could not hold back the tears in his eyes. He couldn't stop thinking about his mother's message to him.

On the sixth day of the New Year the shop reopened and they were busy until dusk. When the grayish sky grew dark he couldn't help but look up and gaze blankly into the distance. As he gazed he stopped the work he had at hand. A customer asked him what he was looking at.

"Smoke," he said.

To his surprise the customer pulled out a cigarette and offered it to him. He shook his head and started working again. They didn't understand.

He had an indelible image in his mind. It was in the deep green evening mists above the thick forests of bamboo a thread of smoke curling from the chimney of his old house or from the wood fire in the big stove. Now thin and fine, and then in puffs; now whirling masses, and then stretching out wide into the distance. He loved most of all the scent of the earth and the fragrance of the grass that was mixed with the smell of the smoke.

A long time had passed since he had smelled that familiar scent. What entered his nostrils daily now was the offensive smell of exhaust fumes. He was preparing to invest in an auto repair shop with Ah-tung and Chiu-shan next year. Half of his wages were invested in two reliable hui thai Mrs. Wu had organized, the other half he sent home. Each time the money arrived home he would get a letter the following day from Ah-hsiung, but only because his mother had pressed him to write. His mother asked his brothel to tell him not to send home too much money, to save a little for himself, and to make sure he was eating properly and keeping warm. When he read her letters, his mood was one of sentimentality mixed with discouragement. After he left home his father had never sent as much a word to him.

He had received a letter from Ah-hsiung today. Originally he had planned to ask Chiu-shan to bid for both of the hui the day after tomorrow, but he couldn't stand arguing with Chiu-shan and Ah-tung about it any longer and gave in to them. The situation was already beyond hope anyway.

When he got off of the bus the sky was completely black and the people in the village were engrossed in a television soap opera. He didn't know any of the people he passed along the road. He walked up to the old banyan tree and couldn't help but sit upon its trunk. This ancient tree was on the road that led to the train station. The shape of the tree was quite extraordinary. The roots were twisted into the shape of a little throne. The whole thing looked like someone who had fallen down with his backside firmly planted on the ground while his upper torso remained stubbornly erect. According to what his father said, when the banyan tree was young a typhoon had torn it up out of the ground, roots and all, but it struggled through and continued to live. That is how it had grown into its present shape. The leaves of the banyan were like big sunshades. When he was little he had swung on the aerial roots that hung down from the tree. In elementary school he had played hide-and-seek around the tree while waiting for sweet potatoes\fn{A note reads: Roasted sweet potatoes are a favorite treat among children in Taiwan's countryside.} to bake. By the time he was in middle school he had often sat beneath the banyan tree and sang The Bodhi Tree:

I have dreamed many a sweet dream,
Under the shade of this tree.
All of my favorite sayings
Have I carved on the trunk of this tree.
When I am sad or happy
To this tree I often come,
Just like I have come today
And have lingered on 'til dawn.

Once he dreamed that the banyan tree wandered off to the city with him, but it couldn't stand all of the noise and finally withered up and died.

Moonbeams were scattered on the new asphalt road which was like a country maid dressed in new clothes whose simple beauty is a delight to behold. The road was in the midst of change, as were the people in the village. There was only the banyan tree which possessed an unchanging intimacy. He felt the smooth knots on the trunk of the tree which glowed in lustrous brown hues. He called softly to the tree:

"Banyan, old banyan."

In the dreams he had while away from home the aerial roots of the banyan tree looked like arms beckoning to him.

On the main road directly opposite the banyan tree was one of the rice paddies of his ancestral estate, which was separated from the road by an irrigation ditch. Everyday at noon the, farmers would rest from their labor in the shade of the tree. His father was always there among them changing gossip. The fertile land three fields over also belonged to his family which was well irrigated because it was next to the pump. After the plowing was done, large groups of men and women would go there to wash their faces and rinse off their feet. His mother and the other farm women would take their laundry there and stand all along the cement bank in the water and wash clothes and chat. His mother and father became quite well respected members of the village because they possessed such good land. Not long ago Ah-hsiung wrote to him saying:

"We've been offered a good price for the land already. Ch'ing-shu wants the land beside the road, and since Shui-chi has offered the highest amount for the land near the pump, we can probably count on his buying it."

He sat beneath the tree and when he considered the fact that they would, after all, sell the last two pieces of land in the ancestral estate\fn{A note reads: According to Chinese tradition, property which has been passed down to one by one's ancestors cannot be sold without seriously offending the ancestors with whom one must deal in the "other world." In doing such a thing one also disgraces the living members of the family and deprives future generations of property which should rightfully be theirs.} he couldn't help but feel heavy at heart.

When he had originally suggested selling the land they would only have had to sell the banana grove and the field with the stream running through it. But now they would have to sell the only two remaining pieces of land. Although it was no fault of his own, it still troubled him and he didn't know how his father could bear it.

The splashing sound of water—he delighted in it. He walked to the edge of the irrigation ditch and drew up a handful to wash his hands. He loved its bracing chill and its green grassy scent. The rice seedlings in the field were already half a foot high. They swayed in the breeze looking as though they were teasing each other. If one listened carefully one could hear that plants too have a language of their own. The night, this field, the splashing water, the croaking frogs and the chirping insects were all things that had nurtured a part of him.

*

He walked beneath the grapefruit tree near the shed where his uncle dried tobacco. He hesitated for a moment. Not far away, a pallid light poured out from the door of his house onto the cement of the winnowing square. Mountains of rice straw were stacked at the edge of the winnowing square, so that the evening wind carried with it the fragrance of straw. The moon shone in the sky; it was a very peaceful night. Finally he took a deep draught of the air that was heavy with the scent of grapefruit blossoms and slowly walked up to the house. The winnowing square was surrounded by the noise of the family's television which covered the sound of his footsteps. Just as he entered the door his father looked up from his desk. He took off his glasses, put down his abacus and with restrained excitement nodded and said indifferently:

“You’re back.”
He went toward him awkwardly. “Dad …” he said haltingly.
He became choked with emotion as soon as the words left his mouth. The hair on his father’s temples had turned completely white. His cheekbones were hewn into sharp angles. In less than two years he had become an entirely different person. There was nothing left of the spirit and drive with which he had trained people to perform the Sung Chiang martial dance in front of the temple two years ago. Was this the man who had pushed ahead of everyone else and with a thunderous voice had declared himself to be the official in charge of the ceremonies at the temple? His father’s silence made him think of stagnant water and dry, brittle wood. It made him sad. He would rather have seen his father pointing to the door in a violent rage as he had done two years before, cursing him saying:
“Get out! Get out! You were born as a punishment to me. Go far away so you don’t disgrace your ancestors anymore.”
Now all that he said was:
“Go see your mother, she’s in the kitchen. I have to figure this bill all over again.”
The voltage was weak and they still hadn’t installed a fluorescent light in the kitchen where the light from a small twenty watt bulb glowed dimly. His mother was cooking up some pig feed when she heard his call. She got up from her place at the stove and clasped his hand, beginning to cry. When she lowered her head to wipe her tears on her sleeve, he saw white hairs combed back into the loose knot of hair at the back of her head. She persistently wiped away the tears that stopped and then eventually started to flow again.
“Have you seen your father?”
“Yes.”
“What did he say?”
“He didn’t say anything, he was adding up some bills.”
“Bills …” she sighed. “It’s a real pity he’s been worn down like this until … and you can’t blame him.”
“I don’t blame him. Where is Ah-hsiung, Mom?”
“He took Li-o back to the sanitarium; we don’t want her to find out about tomorrow.”
“Where’s it going to be tomorrow?”
“At Uncle Meng-ho’s house.”
“How can Dad stand all of this?”
‘He finally realized that he has no other alternative. If he had realized it before, then we wouldn’t have the troubles we have now.”
What his mother muttered was not out of ill will but more out of resignation.
“And you can’t blame your father entirely …”
He already had some idea of what his father must be going through. Never again would he think that his father was foolish and vain to believe that each generation must struggle to bring honor and glory to the family and the ancestors. His father was of a different era and had his own way of living. Unfortunately he had met with an irrevocable fate and like a wild beast that has been bound fast, he struggled with his last ounce of strength before he would yield an unwilling assent to the situation.

*

When he woke up in the middle of the night and went outside to go to the outhouse, he discovered that the night was very beautiful. The faint sound of snoring came from all sides. While he enjoyed the cool breeze and the freshness of the dew he felt an inexpressible longing and affection for his home. City nights made him want to sleep from the minute he got into bed until daylight.
He returned to his bedroom, but now it was impossible for him to sleep. He could hear the sound of restless tossing and turning and the grating noise of his father’s dry cough coming from his parents’ bedroom.
After a long while, when he was in a half-dreaming, half-waking state, he heard the faint sound of an opening door and light footsteps. In the silence he could hear the sound of the footsteps moving farther and farther away.
He was puzzled by this and opened his eyes. A thought suddenly flashed through his mind. He leapt out of bed, threw on his coat and groped his way in the: darkness past the doorway of the bedroom and went through the living room door which squeaked when he opened it. As he was just about to step out his mother called him.
“Yao-ah, where are you going?”
“I heard Dad go outside and it’s the middle of the night. Where is he going? He wouldn’t …?” He shivered, unable to finish his sentence.

"No, he wouldn't. Don't worry about him. He hasn't been able to sleep very well these past two months. He often goes outside for a walk in the middle of the night."

"Well, I think I'd like to go out there to check on him anyway."

"All right. Do you know where to find him?"

He nodded that he did. When he walked out of the door he was greeted with the coolness of the night air that he found so refreshing. The earth was still fast asleep and the sky was vast. The mid-autumn moon and a few stars shimmered with a cool brightness. Unless one lives in the country it is impossible to comprehend the mystery and the beauty of night. Without the soothing calm of night where could one find the spirit and energy to struggle through the day? He walked quietly, afraid that he might disturb his neighbors. The only noise that he heard along the road was the faint grunting of sleeping pigs.

Near the fields the sounds of frogs and insects became louder. He knew where his father had gone. Last night he had told him that the rice seedlings in the field beside the road were growing beautifully. His father's only comment was:

"Good land produces good crops. If you were to plant hulled rice in this field it would grow. It's really—"

At this she purposely interrupted his father and asked:

"Are they still growing bananas in the two parcels of land at the back of the village?"

"No. You-shu bought the land and then made a fish pond of it. He's breeding wu-kuo fish. They may be cheap fish, but I hear he's making a lot of money. The land that Ah-ken bought will also be turned into a fish pond as soon as he harvests the banana crop. There are a lot of people breeding fish now. If one person makes a lot of money then everyone else wants to follow along. I'm afraid they might end up like we did the year we planted bananas."

His father suddenly stopped talking about that difficult year. The money that they borrowed to build their home was to have been repaid with the money they were to have made on the banana harvest. Unfortunately the banana crops were destroyed by a typhoon that year. Aside from their own banana orchard they had also invested in futures in all of the banana orchards in the area, but they didn't harvest even half of what they had planned on.

The house that they built was really too luxurious, and they spent too much on his sister's wedding and her dowry. Their financial state was like a torn net: one hole can easily be repaired, but if there are many holes, repairing one will pull open another. In such a case it's not merely that the net can't be fixed any more, but that it is absolutely useless.

Way off in the distance he saw his father bent over in the field digging up the earth here and moving it there and then tamping it down. He walked up to his father's side without the old man's knowing it.

"Dad!"

His father looked up with a start. He was as embarrassed as if someone had just discovered some great dark secret about him.

"You're up early. The paddy dikes are leaking in these two fields. If it's not pressed down firmly enough all of the water in the paddy is going to leak out."

"Why bother with it? This field isn't even ours any more."

His father stood up straight and looked off into space for a long time, and then walked over to the side of the irrigation ditch and rinsed off his hands. He went over to the smooth flat rock where the women washed clothes, sat down and lit a cigarette. The tip of it glowed brightly and then was dark again.

A suffocating silence filled the air. He silently followed him, not daring to say a word and deeply regretting what he had just said.

"It's like the way you feel toward your own children. Even if you have to give them to someone else to take care of, you still want to do as much as you can for them," said his father suddenly in a low voice.

Why had he never, until now, thought of these fields as another set of his father's children, his flesh and blood? If one's only alternative is to give one's children away to someone else to raise, how could a parent bear to do so without great difficulty? He thought of the last several years, of his own arrogance, he always knew best. He couldn't begin to count all of the times he had opposed and offended his father. He looked at him guiltily.

"Let's go," said his father stubbing out his cigarette, standing up and starting back on his own. He looked intently at his father's stooped-over frame and the slight limp in his walk. He wanted to superimpose this unfamiliar image onto the familiar one in his mind, but his vision became more and more blurred.

The most violent argument he had ever had with his father was just after the Chinese New Year. He had returned home the day after he had been discharged from the army, and had slept straight through until noon. He had been awakened by the sound of a familiar voice in the living room. At first he couldn't recall who it was, but as he was about to go out and say hello he suddenly heard the voice say:

"Everyone knows that if anyone can do it, it's you. But I will definitely have to inconvenience you at the beginning of the next month. You don't want to see our daughter Mi-hsueh go without a dowry, do you? Even if she doesn't have a motorcycle, at least she needs a television, a refrigerator, a washing machine, and a sewing machine with all of the special attachments. Do you know how much money we need to buy all of these things? Just think, if I don't collect a little bit here and a little bit there … and we have to consider all the cakes that were sent out.\fn{A note reads: It is customary for the family of the groom to send cakes to the bride's family for distribution to their friends and relatives at the time of the engagement. The bride's family must subsequently take this expense into consideration when planning the dowry.} We're not rich by any means, but how else can we maintain our self respect? You've been through this before so you must certainly understand. It's like being on the verge of starvation and slapping yourself in the face until you're swollen just to make people think you're well fed."

"Yes, I understand the problem. Weddings are always better if you're a little extravagant, but please give me a little longer. The beginning of next month is too soon. We still haven't harvested the rice crop. How can you expect us to find so much money in such a short time?"

"All right, let's say the end of next month. But don't make me wait any longer."

"I won't, I won't. I'm not the kind of man to go back on a promise. It's just that the interest on our debts keeps getting higher and higher and our medical expenses are so heavy. Otherwise we wouldn't make you wait so long."

"That's true, I know. How has Li-o been recently?"

"She's a lot better, but she hasn't entirely recovered yet. She has to convalesce for a while longer, otherwise I'm afraid she'll have a relapse. If she has any sort of emotional upset it will start up all over again."

"Has her husband or her mother-in-law gone to see her?"

"Do you think people like that are capable of compassion? They left her in a grass hut in the very back of their land. If some friends from this village hadn't noticed her she probably would have died there."

"Li-o certainly isn't the type to complain. She suffered through all of that and never uttered a word to you."

"It's a pity she didn't complain. Tell your daughter Mi-hsueh that if something is troubling her to talk about it and not to keep it all bottled up inside. You have to let people know you're in trouble if you want them to help."

"It sure takes all kinds. Who would have thought that this would have happened to Li-o. She was the prettiest girl in our village. All of the things in her dowry were certainly the best and the most modern electrical appliances. The only thing lacking was a car, but they just weren't satisfied. They beat her until she was black and blue. Only someone from their village would do something like that."

"Every time I think of it my heart aches. In the beginning we thought they were nice people. His mother is a mid-wife and he's a pharmacist. They're both educated people so we let Li-o marry him. I never would have imagined it, but a widow with an only son can really make life unbearable."

"Well, you shouldn't think that a good education makes a good person. The more education you have the more wicked you become. If simple people like us were to do such things we'd be afraid of being struck down by lightning. The only son of a widow has a lot of responsibility. If he's the only thing his mother has, what makes you think she's going to sit back and watch your daughter take him away from her?"

"That's not always the case. What about Sheng-shu? Do you think he's uneducated? He's a doctor and also happens to be a very nice person. Or take Aunt Mu: she's a widow and she loves her daughter-in-law as if she were her own daughter."

"I know, I know, it all depends on the individual person. Li-o used a lot of money too, didn't she?"

"We gave her as much money as she wanted. If she hadn't been so afraid of troubling us, then she would never have lost her mind. It was enough to break my heart when I saw my own daughter didn't even recognize her own parents. The poor thing."

"I heard that Chih-ah and Hsiang-ah need their money now too. Why don't you sell one or two pieces of your land, otherwise the interest on your debts is going to kill you."

"What? You, you … that's our ancestral estate. How can I sell it?"

"I'm sorry, I didn't mean anything by that. Don't take it seriously. But please keep my request in mind. I'm really sorry. I'd better go now."

After the guest had gone out the door, Yao-ah entered into the living room looking pale. His father was on his way out.

"Dad," he said.

"What do you want?"

"Are you going to borrow more money?"

“I’m going to find your uncle. He’ll help me to find enough to make ends meet for a while.”

“How long do you intend to keep scrounging around for money like this? Dad, you might as well sell some land. It will clear up all of debts and you won’t have to pay so much interest.”

“Sell land?” His father hesitated for a moment, sighed and said, “we’ll talk about it later. I have to go out now.”

“We’ll talk about it later.” He had thought happily scratching his short-hair. Maybe his father would change his mind after all. He thought it over as he ate. He didn’t know how much his father’s debts amounted to, but if they were to sell two rice paddies, two banana groves and the land with the stream running through it, that should be enough to pay back all of their debts, his sister’s medical expenses, and there would even be some left over. Then they could move to the city, buy a store front and with his three years of technical school and the two years of training he got in the army he could open up an auto repair shop. If he could hire two skilled workers, then his dream would be complete. If there was still not enough money, they could sell the house to make up for the difference. If his parents and his brother were going to move to the city anyway, who would be left to live in it? This building was the pride of the compound; the tiles were porcelain and the beams were carved and painted. It was a good combination of Chinese and western architectural styles. If there was anything unsatisfactory about the place it was the antique stove in the kitchen. They didn’t have a gas stove, but this small defect was hardly enough to detract from its value.

The biggest debt that year had been the cost of building the house; one usually spent twice as much on it as they had planned. Great care was taken in the construction of the house and the cost of it was even more than they had originally expected. When it was finished, they had a housewarming party and invited enough people to fill twenty-eight tables. Half a year later when his sister was married they invited what seemed like half of the village to the wedding reception. His father claimed that since he was in charge of all of the ceremonies at the temple and the instructor of the Sung Chiang martial dance, and since half of the village always came to him for help of one sort or another, it wouldn’t do for someone of his social standing to throw just an ordinary wedding party. He also claimed that since the price of bananas was high at that time and there would be a harvest in another six months, why should they worry about paying back the money? Unfortunately there was a big typhoon that year and the interest on their debts piled up, as did the amount of their debts.

His sister’s mental illness began just before he was about to go into the army. It was then that he broached the subject of selling land with his father for the second time. His father shouted at him in an angry voice:

“So you’re talking about selling my land again, you damned wastrel! You haven’t even inherited it yet and you’re all ready to sell it. The next thing you know, you won’t even want to hold onto the land where your mother and I want to be buried. It never occurred to you to get a job, did it? You’re too busy trying to figure out the value of my property. You’re going to be the death of me yet.”

“All I’m saying, Dad, is that if you have debts, pay them back so you don’t end up owing more and more.”

“If you want to repay debts, you should earn the money to repay them. Who ever heard of selling land to repay debts?”

“How long do you plan to take to earn this money? Weren’t the banana crops completely destroyed two years ago; all you did was send them right back to Heaven. That was nothing but a waste of energy. If you sell the land now you can always buy more later. Otherwise these interest rates are going to finish you off.”

His father made no reply.

“And furthermore, who says you have to work the land? I can earn more money in the city just as easily, and I don’t have to work from dawn until dusk or expose myself to the weather. And I don’t have to worry about: crop failures. Ah-fu and Ah-bin got jobs in the city. They looked so good when they came back here that everyone was gawking at them. Feng-ah and Ho-ah only worked as laborers, but they’re wearing brand new clothes now, too. Aunt Wei’s daughter hadn'' been working in the export processing plant very long before she found herself a good husband. They come back here all of the time to see her parents. And then there are those like Li-o who aren’t even twenty-five and have already been pushed to the point of a nervous breakdown.”

“I’ve had enough of your defiance. No matter what you say, it’s obvious that the only thing that interests you is making it rich in the city. And I’m sure that’s what’s behind all of your plans to sell my land. Fine, fine. But may I ask what your brother is going to do if you sell the land? Where will your mother and I have to go? And think that more than ten years of education has been wasted on you.”

“I’ve thought about all of these things. If Ah-hsiung wants to farm, we can put aside half of the land for him. If he doesn’t want to, then we can both move to the city to work. As for you and Mom, if Ah-hsiung and I work in the city, then we’ll have enough money to support you. What’s the point of laboring your life away in the country?”

“Well you certainly make it all sound very nice. And I suppose the streets in the city are paved with gold. Do you actually think it’s so easy to find a job in the city? I’m going to break both of your legs the next time you bring up the subject of selling my land. Maybe that will keep you from disgracing our family.”

He didn’t dare to bring up the subject of selling land again after that. Every time someone came to see his father about a debt he would leave the house in a huff and go sit beneath the banyan tree to sing like a wanderer who didn’t have a care in the world.

That tone of obstinacy was no longer in his father’s voice. During the two years that he served in the army the family’s debts increased rather than decreased and his father had all the trouble he could handle just dealing with creditors.

His father hadn’t come home for lunch at noon. He paced around his room. After the sun had disappeared behind the mountains his father returned looking distraught. He had probably been unable to get the money that he needed. Thinking that this might be a good opportunity, he said:

“Dad, we were talking about selling the land this morning—”

“What? Selling the land? What are you talking about?”

“Didn’t you agree to talk it over with me later? I think that if we sell the land we can pay off all of the debts and there will still be some money left over. I’ve finished my time in the army and I have some technical skills. If I go to the city and open an auto repair shop, Ah-hsiung can help out in the business too. Then you and Mom can come to the city and relax. It would be better than staying here—”

“The only thing you can think about is selling my land, isn’t it? Doesn’t anything good ever come out of your mouth? If I’m going to talk to you about selling my land, I might as well be talking to you about selling my soul. If I didn’t recall the fact that you’ve already been in and out of the army, and that you’re not a baby any; more, I’d grab the broom and beat you out of the door!”

“Dad, don’t be so stubborn. How can the value of farm land ever compare with the rising value of city land? One of my friends in the army told me that his family bought some land in Kaohsiung. In one year it doubled in value. Kaohsiung is a big city and it’s developing now. If you want to buy land there you have to do it before it’s too late. Dad, you live in the country, so you don’t understand how an industrialized society works.”

“Well, I don’t believe in an industrialized society if it’s built on selling land. I’m from the country and I want to stay in the country for the rest of my life. You go where you want to go, and don’t bother talking to me about selling land anymore. Get out, just get out, you damned wastrel!”

He had failed. He looked at his father's face that was, livid with rage and said:

“Okay, okay, I’m going, and I’m never coming back. I’m never coming back to see you crushed by your debts.”

He stormed out the door and made his way to the banyan tree where he froze for a night and then finally left at dawn.

He stayed away for nearly two years.

*

His mother and father hadn’t been gone very long before he decided that he couldn’t help but go to Uncle Meng-ho’s house too.

His father was seated in a straight-backed chair on the left. On the right was Uncle Meng-ho, who had just begun speaking to the people who were listening attentively to him.

“I’m not in charge of selling Jung-ah’s land, but I’ll serve as a witness to any business transactions that go on here. I have a detailed account of everything that’s being sold here. First of all, I want each of you to present Jung-ah with the I.O.U.’s. Then the entire amount of money will be divided up among you according to an even ratio. Everyone will get their fair share, nobody’s going to be shortchanged. What do you say?:

“Can you tell us how much the land was sold for?”

“Yes. The land near the pump was sold for NT$125,000. The land near the road was sold for NT$157,000; the land with the stream running through it was sold for NT$30,000; altogether that comes to NT$312,000."\fn{A note reads: The rate of exchange is slightly under NT$40 to the dollar.}

“Doesn’t Jung-shu still have two banana groves in the back of the village?”

“He sold them a long time ago. You were in Taipei then, Aunt Pen, and if it hadn’t been for the fact that you were going to get some money out of this, I doubt that you would have even remembered your way back here.” said someone coldly.

“Yes, it sure is a long trip down from Taipei.”

"Those two groves were sold to raise money for my sister's medical expenses, and we had to use every cent of it the minute we got it. If we still had that land do you think we'd try and hide it from you?"

"Mind your manners, boy!"

"Everybody knows that these two banana groves were sold for Li-o. Jung-ah has had to spend a lot of money, and we all know what a generous man he is."

"According to Uncle Meng-ho's calculations, the entire amount of money from the sale of Jung-ah's land is not enough to pay back all of his debts, so are we just going to forget about the amount that can't be paid?"

"What else can we do? Chih-ah, all of you demanded that it be done this way in the beginning. Do you want them to sell their house and move away too? Now I know this is a matter of primary importance to all of you, but I can say in all honesty that the money be borrowed was not just squandered away—it was the interest that did him in."

Uncle Meng-ho shook his head and looked at Father.

"Jung-ah, it's not that I want to say I told you so, but when I advised you to sell the land to pay off your debts, you wouldn't listen to me. The only thing you could think of was your pride. Eventually you could have bought back the land, and Yao-ah wouldn't have left home then either."

"Well, I guess I kept waiting for a good harvest. Isn't paying off a debt usually a pretty simple matter? How was I to know that one disaster would lead to another? Yao-ah was right, but how could I agree to such a thing at that time? I had everything going for me until I hit a streak of bad luck at this old age, and the next thing I knew I was being forced to sell all of my property. How do you expect me to take something like this?" he said and then burst into a spasm of coughing.

"You'd better take care of yourself with a cough like that. Haven't you taken him to see a doctor, Tien-ah?"

"Uncle Meng-ho, I've tried in every way I could to get him to go, but he just won't listen. He says he can't bear to show his face on the street any more."

"Losing face should be the least of your worries with a cough like that. You're stubborn and you'll probably never change. But your health is important; money's no good without the man to spend it, you know."

Uncle Meng-ho's son, Ch'ing-ta, had made up a list of Dad's debts, and he asked Dad to look it over. Suddenly Ah-hsiung said:

"Dad, where did this one come from?"

"Which one?" everyone asked excitedly.

"The forty thousand owed to Ching-shen."

"What's so strange about it? Isn't that the money your mother borrowed from me when you were paying the balance on your house?"

"But I already paid back ten thousand on your husband's birthday."

"Oh yes, I forgot about that. But thirty thousand with interest comes to forty thousand."

"What? Ten thousand in interest? For how long?" someone asked.

"Three per cent comes to nine hundred a month. Are you trying to say that it doesn't add up to ten thousand a year?"

"Then we want three per cent interest on our loans too."

"Don't be ridiculous. Everyone has set their own rate of interest. How can everyone go by three per cent?"

"That's outrageous anyway. How can you charge interest as high as three per cent?"

"Who's being outrageous? At least I was willing to lend them money. I know all about people like you. Every one knows how much money you have but you'd like the world to think you haven't got a cent. You were just lucky that Jung-ah took pity on you the last time you needed help."

"Let's not talk about pity right now. If we're going to charge interest let's do it at the rate of two per cent. Nothing good ever came of usury anyway."

Sheng-shu was trying to work out a settlement, but Ching-shen didn't know a good thing when she saw it.

"What do you mean that nothing good ever came of usury? If it weren]'t for the high interest rates do you think people would be rushing down here from Taipei with money to lend? If you're talking about usury, two per cent is just as bad as three."

"That's enough! If you keep up this arguing, I'll just wash my hands of the whole affair. Jung-ah, do you have any objections?"

"I don't have anything to say. It doesn't matter if it's two or three per cent. They are all my friends and relatives and they did what they could for me and I'm grateful for it. I'll do whatever you think is best."

"All right. Since Jung-ah doesn't have anything to say about this, then I'll say something. In all fairness, two and three per cent interest on a loan to your own friend or relative is pretty unreasonable. Especially when you know he's having a hard time of it. Since all of you asked me to settle this, I think you ought to charge a 1.5 per cent interest rate. What do you think?"

Some of the people in the crowd agreed while others complained that it would be too great a loss. Uncle Meng-ho stressed that if they didn't do it his way, he would have no further part of it. Finally everyone agreed after a long involved discussion. Everyone surrounded Ch'ing-ta while he figured it out in detail on an abacus. It wasn't until then that Uncle Meng-ho spotted him standing silently in the doorway and exclaimed:

"Yao-ah, I didn't know you were here!" His mother quickly said:

"Yes, he came home last night. I told him to stay home and watch the house tonight, but I see he didn't pay any attention to that."

"Well, he's not a child any more. He should know about these things. How's work?"

"Not bad. His boss knows how hard he works and really thinks quite a bit of him."

After Ch'ing-ta finished calculating and everyone had seen the figures, they argued again and in the end it was the good-hearted old Meng-ho who made all the proper adjustments to get the lowest possible figures and then asked for his father's opinion. Dad just shook his head, hesitated for a moment and then slowly said:

"The situation has come down to this and I really don't have anything to say about it. But I do have one request to make of Uncle Meng-ho and all of you. The land beside the road across from the banyan tree was the land from the ancestral estate that my Dad left me, and that was the most difficult piece of land for me to give up. After I die I know I won't be able to face my ancestors if I have given up that land. I hope Ch'ing-ta can promise me that if I have the means in the future, that he will sell that land back to me," he said and then began coughing again.

Dad inhaled with great difficulty through his nostrils, his eyelids fluttered and his face twisted into a mass of wrinkles. He was unable to say anything else. Uncle Meng-ho pulled at his beard and nodded his head.

"Jung-ah, don't worry. As long as I have at least one breath in me, I'll bear witness to Ch'ing-ta's promise. Won't I, Ch'ing-ta?"

Ch'ing-ta stood to one side and resignedly nodded in agreement.

After Ch'ing-ta had divided up the money and the receipts of the deeds, he gave them to Uncle Meng-ho and Dad to examine for errors. Then he passed them around for everyone to look at. At the end Uncle Meng-ho gave his father a small wad of money and said:

"I would like to end this by saying that Jung-ah has always done what he could for our village. Everyone knows that he is a generous man and that there is only bad luck to blame for all of the trouble that led up to this. I asked Ch'ing-ta to set aside this NT$1,000 before we began today. It's not very much, but we want Jung-ah to have it."

Uncle Meng-ho stuffed the money into Dad's pocket. Dad had remained calm throughout the proceedings of the day, but now his eyes began to redden and Mom began to sob loudly. The expression on Ah-hsiung's face was as hard as if it had been hewn of stone. Only he felt that there were no veins for the blood in his body to rush to.

Everyone silently picked up their share of the money. Suddenly Ching-shen, who had left unnoticed earlier, came rushing in excitedly.

"Uncle Meng-ho! Wait a minute! Last May Tien-ah borrowed NT$1,000 from me to buy cakes for festival. Lowering my interest on the rest of the money from 3 per cent to 1.5 per cent has cost me too much money, so you're going to have to get my thousand back for me."

Everyone was silent for a moment and the only thing that could be heard was the ticking of the clock.

His father took the NT$1,000 from his pocket and gave it back to Uncle Meng-ho with trembling hands.

"If you borrow money you always have to pay it back sooner or later. Uncle Meng-ho, I'll give this to you to take care of. Excuse me now, I—have to go."

Dad's face looked gray in contrast to his white undershirt. He looked as if all of the blood in his body had suddenly stopped flowing.

Yao-ah's temples were pounding, as was his heart, which he felt would burst from his chest at any moment. He couldn't stand it any more and pushed his way up to the front. Ching-shen, who had just behaved so rudely moved away in fear. His mother, who was crying loudly enough to wake the dead, held him back. He threw himself down before Uncle Meng-ho with tears streaming down his face and said:

"Uncle Meng-ho, we're not going to sell that land by the road, we're not selling."

"Don't be silly, stop crying; I understand, but—"

"Uncle Meng-ho, I'll buy it back immediately. I can get the money in two days. I'll think of something. Please help me, just wait two days."

Uncle Meng-ho, who had tears welling up in his eyes patted him on the shoulder.

"Come on, get up; I'll make sure it works out. Come on, get up now."

He turned around and embraced his mother and father.

"Dad, Mom, don't worry. I'll think of something. I'll be back in two days. Ah-hsiung, you take care of them, I've got to go now."

He bowed to Uncle Meng-ho and dashed out of the door and onto the hot winnowing square, trying to put all of the confusion of the moment out of his mind. He knew that where there was a will there was away. He was in the prime of his youth, like the sun at its zenith. The auto repair shop could wait, he thought, considering his father, who was like a sun sinking in the western sky. He broke into a run and rushed in the direction of the banyan tree.

78.101 Diary Of A Warden\fn{by Qi Ping aka Lu Qiping (1935-)} Nanchang, Jiangxi Province, China (M) 5

In the joyous days following the downfall of the "Gang of Four," Mao Qiankun, the newly reinstated Party secretary of the Iron and Steel Factory, had a large banquet in celebration of events gone by. He invited several of his former wardens and prepared for the special occasion a dish of symbolic value—crabs.\fn{A note reads: In China, crabs historically symbolize evil figures and in this case represent the "Gang of Four." The implicit pun also refers to the way crabs walk—sideways, which in Chinese also means high-handed, oppressive ways of behavior.}

All the guests had arrived except one—Xiao Wang. He apparently could not make it because he was called away on an urgent meeting. But he sent someone in his place to bring a "present" to the host. The present was smeared with ashes and dust, as if it had been dug out of an underground pit. It was wrapped with several sheets of newspaper; beneath the first was a thick layer of brown wrapping paper; and inside that was a plastic bag containing a diary with yellowish-green mold here and there on the cover.

The following were the contents of this diary:

January, 1975

Today, I accepted an "honorable but difficult" assignment: taking custody of a capitalist-roader.

I say "honorable" because the person to be taken into custody is a big shot, not only manager but also Party secretary of an iron and steel factory employing thousands of workers. His name was "on file" at the Municipality for being a "traitor" and "secret agent"—super material!

I say "difficult" because this capitalist-roader happens to be especially stubborn and sly. Two years ago, he was sentenced to do penal labor at the No.2 furnace, and he managed to incite a large group of people to engage in subversive activities. Then he was isolated for a second time just as the revolution was entering the "criticize Lin Biao and Confucius" stage.\fn{A note reads: A political movement launched by the "Gang of Four" in early 1974 to discredit Premier Zhou Enlai and other veteran revolutionaries.} There he again corrupted several wardens. The four wardens before me had all been trapped. Would I, the fifth, be able to resist him and keep my head above water? This was the rigorous test which as a demobilized, soldier, had to face.

Meng Feng told me these details about the capitalist-roader. He was Vice-Chairman of the Revolutionary Committee of the Iron and Steel Factory who was in charge of the special investigatory group. Over fifty years old, with a plump, jovial face, he had a deep dimple on each cheek. Althougb he gave the impression of being very amiable, at the end of our two-hour discussion, Vice-Chairman Meng drew in his smile and recited several paragraphs from Chairman Mao's directives regarding special investigative work. He then said to me in a solemn tone:

"Comrade Wang, the job you are about to undertake is a very difficult one. I hope you will not fall to live up to the trust placed in you by the organization."

I jumped up excitedly, clicked my heels to attention and answered boldly:

"Please have faith, Chief, in my promise to fulfill the assignment." After speaking, I became self-conscious about the removal of my collar and cap insignia which made me only one of. the common people. My embarrassment did not escape his sharp eyes. He patted my shoulder and said:

"You havc been quite a soldier. Upright and straightforward. I like your style. I hope you always stay this way."

The door swung open, and a person over thirty rushed in like a gust of wind. He wore a flat crewcut. His flesh bulged like that of a weight lifter. While the early spring weather had me wearing a thick cotton-padded coat, he had on nothing but a woolen sweater, and even perspired in it. Vice-Chairman Meng introduced him in a tone of respect:

"This is Comrade Zhao Abao, Chairman pf our factory's revolutionary committee and commander-in-chief of our ten thousand fighters of "red flag iron and steel."\fn{A note reads: A factional organization existed during the Cultural Revolution which started in 1966.} Then Vice-Chairman Meng introduced me to him.

"Well, well!" Commander Zhao extended me his rough and hairy hand. My right hand was at once gripped tight as if by a pair of large pincers: He squeezed with greater and greater pressure as if testing my wrist strength. I held my breath, and did my best to reciprocate his handshake. He withdrew his hand in satisfaction, and gave me a matter-of-fact blow on my chest, saying good-naturedly:

"Good man! Do your best, and you will not fail to be rewarded when you have done your job." Then he whipped out of the room the same way he came in.

In the afternoon, I reported for duty to the special investigatory group, The leader of the group was a big fellow with a pock-marked face. He looked at me silently, opened a note-bopkand solemnly announced my duties:

"First, take custody of the capitalist-roader. Second, don't allow him to escape.. Third, don't let him commit suicide." I saw that the group leader was not qualified for his position. I could only take precautions to prevent him from escaping or committing suicide. How could I "not allow" him to do so?

After he finished reading, the pockmark-faced group leader waved his hand and said:

"You can begin your work tomorrow."

That night, lying on, a bunk bed in the dormitory, I contemplated my new life and fresh assignment. I could not fall asleep for a long time; it reminded me of the night before enlistment into the army.

*

What did the capitalist-roader I was to guard look like? When I entered the small room in which he was locked up, Bihu of the special investigatory group was giving him a haircut. He was a small and shriveled up old man, with a yellow-gray face, and two asymmetrical eyes, one large and one small. The large and spiritless right eye stared fixedly at you, while the smaller, brighter left eye constantly blinked. His eyebrows were thin, his front teeth protruded out of his lips, and his hair was already gray, but very hard and erect, like a third-grade bristle brush.

Xiao Fan, who alternated shifts with me informed me quietly:

"His original name was Mao Qiankun, but we all call him 'capitalist-roader.' How can a man like him have the same surname as our great leader?" Only eighteen or nineteen, Xiao Fan was quite handsome. He came to serve as a warden half a month before I did.

I sized up the solitary confinement ward—it was ten square meters or so, probably a former storeroom. It had four brick walls and a small window facing east, which framed the chimney of the factory in the distance. A few thin and rough laths were nailed on the window, which from the standpoint of preventing the escape of the capitalist-roader, hardly seemed sturdy enough. Presumably it was because the room was guarded and the special investigatory group's office was just above it that even with such shoddy preventive measures, they did not worry much about the old fellow's escaping.

There were two single wooden beds in the room, one for the capitalist-roader, the other for the warden. A small writing table and a long bench were beside each bed. Posters advocating "leniency to those who confess their crimes and severity to those who refuse to do so" were pasted on the wall.

Both Xiao Fan and Bihu had gone, and there were only the two of us left in the room. He turned to me, the large eye staring fixedly, the smaller one blinking incessantly. Considering that I would soon have to "eat, live and work together" with this repulsive capitalist-roader, my assignment was indeed "honorable but difficult."

*

My duties as a warden were simple and monotonous. Xiao Fan and I took turns going on duty, keeping the capitalist-roader company. According to the rules, each of us had to do twelve hours a day; but we could be flexible. The important thing was that one of us was always there.

The daily life of the capitalist-roader was also mechanical and routine. First thing he did every morning was half an hour's exercise to the broadcast. The rest of the morning was spent studying, while in the afternoon he was supposed to write his confessions. According to Bihu, he was formerly tried once every three to five days, but later on, when it was found that nothing could be squeezed out of him and there were too many people waiting to be tried, he was left alone and was often not taken out for questioning for two to three months.

For the capitalist-roader, an inflexible routine was not so inflexible. Before daybreak when I had barely opened my eyes, I could hear Mao Qiankun's voice counting, "One, two, three, four; two, two, three, four …" The counting was interspersed with gasps, and cracking movements of his arms and legs. He was creating a hodgepodge of calisthenics and traditional Chinese shadow boxing. He did whatever he felt like, and exerted all his strength. When he finished, he was drenched in sweat. Then he washed his face, brushed his teeth and ate breakfast. (According to the rules, we brought him his meals.) He read books and perused newspapers the whole morning. The book he was reading was Anti-Dühring\fn{The popular title: officially, Herr Eugen Dühring's Revolution in Science (1878, translated in 1934; several chapters published as a basic Socialist exposition under the title Socialism: Utopian and Scientific in 1892).} by Engels. He read a line, then recited it, just like a primary school pupil would his lessons, covering only two or three paragraphs of the book each day. When the newspaper came, he concentrated on it, reading everything from the first page to the last, from the news items and editorials to the weather forecast, not allowing one line of the small print escape him. Sometimes he even held the newspaper up to the light and peered at it as if searching for a secret from between the fibers of the paper. Most of the time, he read, then sighed, then gazed out the window in silent repose.

After lunch, he usually took a short nap with his clothes on. Then he walked around the room for a whole hour in a very peculiar way. He went from one corner of the room to the other, stopped, turned around 180 degrees, then walked back again. His pace increased with each trip. At the end of lone hour, his face was as a rule covered with sweat. The capitalist-roader was obviously a firm believer in the principles of survival.

In contrast, he wasn't nearly as earnest when it came to writing confessions. Instead he liked to doodle. Once I stole a glance at what he was writing and found the paper full of the two characters jian chi, meaning "to persist." Some were written horizontally, others vertically, some in large print, some in small, with still others in imitation song style and script. How could this be called confession writing? It was sheer resistance. I contemplated talking to him, but remembering that I was still a newcomer I managed to suppress my anger.

After the initial observation I knew that. my opponent was a formidable figure. I was suddenly seized by a strong wave of curiosity, I imagined how he would try to entice me and draw me in with his tricks, and how I was to beat him at his own game and force him to surrender at the critical moment, just as in the scenes of a movie thriller. I worked out many different schemes to deal with him and became anxious for him to play some tricks this very day so that I could test my own powers of judgment.

I glared at Mao Qiankun, itching to take up arms with him, but he continued reading his book, perusing his newspaper and writing his so-called "confessions" in solitude, as if I were not even there. Could it be that he was also silently spying on me, trying to discern my weak points? Although he sat upright in a very concentrated manner, my every movement seemed to inspire a subconscious reaction from him. This old fox is not an easy one. You may have 1,001 tricks up your sleeve, but I have one foolproof method to top them all. I have eyes like torches that can burn right through you. I, a radar operator who has gone through eight years' training in the army, will never fall into your trap or be beaten by your ambush. This was what I thought to mvself.

*

He was still like a deaf-mute, but I couldn't hold my breath any longer. In military strategy, reconnaissance by firing is often used to compel the enemy to expose their position. I also formed such a plan to force him to speak. I took out a volume of Anti-Dühring. After a while, I pretended not to understand it and paced around the room as if deep in thought. In time, I came near Mao Qiankun, and by chance found that he was also reading the same book. Then I said offhandedly:

"Ai! This Dühring was truly a swindler. His 'world-schematism' has made my head all muddled."\fn{A note reads: "World schematism" is a term first invented by Herr Dühring to describe his belief in tbe oneness, indivisibility and unity of a being. Engels criticizes this concept in his Anti-Dühring.}

No answer.

"Hey! Can you help me explain it?" I asked. He finally held up his head and said slowly:

"According to my understanding, it is a reflection of subjective idealism."

"Uh … can you give me an example?"

"An example?" he stared at me with penetrating eyes, as if to determine my sincerity. A trace of sarcasm appeared at the corner of his smile, and he said:

"I hope you don't mind if I tell you something."

"Of course not. Out with it."

"It seems to me that you yourself have 'world-schematism' in your head."

"I?!"

"You never knew me before, and you had no knowledge of my background, but you have already taken me to be your class enemy. Is this not a reflection of 'world-schematism?'"

Quite a blow—for our first encounter! All the plans I had made became obsolete. I was dumb-founded, yet I couldn't be angry. He had warned me beforehand.

I was mortified by my defeat in our first battle and lost interest in reading. I looked at the book, but was thinking about a counter-move.

Suddenly I heard Mao say that he wanted to go to the lavatory again. That made it the third time this morning. How could he have so much to excrete? I followed him down the corridor to the lavatory. He pushed open the door and went in. I waited outside, I soon heard faint sounds of paper being torn up, I looked inside through the crevice of a window blind and saw that he was hastily throwIng a ball of shredded paper into the toilet; with a quick pull at the watertank string, the roll of paper was washed away.

It was too late to prevent him from doing away with the torn paper, so it was just as well that I played innocent and accompanied him back to the solitary confinement ward where he became again absorbed in a newspaper article, then hurried stealthily back to the lavatory and made a careful examination. I found that there was a small slip of paper stuck to the side of the toilet. On this slip of paper were the blurred words:

"Your former bodyguard …"

Apparently the paper contained the draft of a letter written to a bigwig. Who was this bigwig? Why was Mao Qian-kun writing to him? How did he plan on mailing the letter?

All these questions were riddles to me. But at least I had obtained undeniable proof of his "unlawfulness." In today's contest with him, we finally came to a draw: one to one.

*

Saturday. All workers who had gone off duty were hurrying home. I alone was loitering on the broad streets of this large steel city. Two years ago, to support the "third line" construction, my parents, younger brother and sister bad all gone to an inland mountain district.\fn{A note reads: "Third line" refers to the interior provinces in China far away from the eastern coasts.} So I was left without a home.

"Honk!"

The sound of a car horn made me aware that a "Shanghai" brand limousine had stopped behind me. The car's new coating shone with a bright sheen. The door opened, revealing Vice-Chairman Meng's plump, round face; smiling, he beckoned to me with his hand.

"Hey you! Nowhere to go on a Saturday night? Let's go to my place."

Being the immediate subordinate of this high-level cadre, I felt somewhat restrained and uneasy. But I couldn't refuse. I still had to show respect by accepting his invitation.

The car brought us swiftly to a secluded apartment building in the urban district. Vice-Chairman Meng ordered the driver to return to the factory, and led me inside. He explained to me that the former owner of the apartment was a reactionary capitalist who was deprived of the property during the Cultural Revolution. He said with a sigh:

"This revolution has been a good thing! We have to be thorough about change. If we were cautious, always afraid of this or that, this apartment house would still be in the hands of the capitalists, and not the people."

The apartment was quite spacious, but very simply furnished. There was only one unvarnished dining room table, several wooden benches and a wooden chair. The whole room appeared empty and uncoordinated; it had that special feel common to the quarters of many old cadres—it was in good condition but not luxurious. Vice-Chairman Meng enthusiastically motioned me to sit down. The first question he asked me was:

"What's your impression of Mao Qiankun?"

I replied: "In the first place, he is very afraid of death. Secondly, he is quite stubborn."

The Vice-Chairman uttered an "oh" sound to show his obvious interest, and encouraged me to go on. I poured out to him all my observations during the last few days, and showed him the slip of torn paper with the blurred characters. Then I added my results of today's investigation:

"I used to think that his scribbling of the characters meaning persistence was only a way to vent his frustrations or to pass time, but now I find the matter is not that simple. Today he wrote continuously on these sheets of paper. The arrangement of the characters is generally the same: on the upper right-hand corner are a few small characters in the imitation Song style; in the center are two lines of large regular script; on the lower left-hand corner are some medium-sized characters in running hand, while on the lower side are tiny characters in regular script. This shows that he was drawing a picture of some kind."

"Picture?! What kind of picture?" Vice-Chairman Meng asked impatiently, stretching his neck forward and knitting his brow.

"I'm not quite clear. I intend to continue my investigation." I replied.

"The details you have just reported are very important, Yes, very important," he said. He paced the room with his hands crossed behind his back, his eyes gleaming with a peculiar brilliance. His chin was quivering with emotion.

"This Mao Qiankun is quite something!" he exclaimed. "The evidence of his being a traitor and secret agent is already quite substantial, yet he refuses to admit his guilt. We already suspect that he must have some kind of backing. Now we've got him—traitor, secret agent, capitalist-roader, plus underground operator. Mao Qiankun may be as slippery as an eel but he can no longer escape our revolutionary punishment." I pointed out solemnly:

"We only have a clue. We could never frighten away the snake by beating the grass!"

"Of course," he said. "Let's stop right here. You've had vigorous training in the army. You've got keen eyes and a good head. In just a few days, you've managed to come up with such important clues. I can now set my mind at rest by putting him in your hands." Then he called: "Rixiu! Quick! Bring some tea and cigarettes for the guest!"

A girl, about twenty-three or twenty-four, came out from tbe inner room. She wore two long braids. Her movements and speech were like those of an actress. She brought me a cup of green tea, a pack of cigarettes and a box of candies as was the custom for receiving guests in urban homes. Vice-Chairman Meng proudly introduced her to me:

"This is my daughter Rixiu. She is also working in the iron and steel factory. In 1974, our factory leaders decided to perform a 'surgical operation' on the No.2 furnace. They got rid of the 'cancerous' cadres and let some more youthful ones take over. Commander Zhao forced me to strengthen the leadership by including my daughter. I had no choice but to obey."

Who would think that such a nice girl like her was also a worker at a steel factory, moreover a leader? I could not help looking her up and down. Rixiu shook her head mischievously, throwing back one of her long braids, as if to say: "What's the matter? Don't I look like one?"

Vice-Chairman Meng let out a long breath, and picking up the thread of our conversation of a moment ago, said:

"This Mao Qiankun is by no means easy to deal with. I worked with him for more than twenty years, but still was not able to see through him."

"Even you, Vice-Chairman Meng, have worked with Mao Qiankun?" I asked in surprise.

"Hmmm," he said, nodding his head somewhat reluctantly. "When this city was just liberated, he was transferred to the iron and steel factory as chief of the military control group. I was an officer under him. To tell you the truth he was my sponsor when I applied to join the Party … and I did many wrong things as his subordinate. Only with assistance of the revolutionary rebelling organization was I able to draw a line between us in our political inclinations and ideology."

I suddenly remembered the question about the laths the window, and anxiously pointed out to him:

"The laths in his room are too thin, and they are poorly nailed on window. If—"

"You're afraid of his running away? This fear is necessary." Vice-Chairman Meng shook his head. Then some unknown reason, a meaningful smile worked its from the corner of his mouth, and he said:

"In truth, if were to run away, the matter might be settled easily …"

This seemed to me unfathomable: The pockmarked group leader told me explicitly not to allow the capitalist-roader to escape. Why did Vice-Chairman Meng say that "if he would run away, the matter could be settled more easily?" I wanted to pursue the question, but he immediately changed the subject.

*

The intermIttent drizzle was putting me in a bad mood.

After breakfast, I turned on the light and was thinking of forcing myself to settle down and read the newspaper when suddenly Bihu came in and asked me to go outside. He whispered to me that Mao Qiankun's daughter had come to see him, and told me to keep a look-out and to take immediate action should I find anything wrong.

Mao Qiankun's daughter was short and slender. She had a pale face and was already hunchbacked. She looked at me, her melancholy eyes filled with hostility, then buried her head into her father's chest.

Mao Qiankun's expression at this moment was very complicated. His blinking left eye was now as steady as his right. one. But he very quickly controlled himself and forced back his tears. Then he began to look his daughter over carefully from head to toe. He stroked her back tenderly, as if he wanted to straighten it.

"At such a young age, why are you already hunchbacked?"

The girl smiled sadly and said: "I can't help it." Then she obediently straightened out her back. After a while, she said slowly:

"Daddy, I graduated from the Foreign Languages School."

"Oh," Mao Qiankun replied, his left eye blinked as if he were surprised at how quickly time had passed. Then he asked: "You were learning Spanish?"

"Mmmm."

"Have you been assigned yet?"

The girl sighed and lowered her eyelids. "As a matter of fact, all the foreign affairs departments were short of people, but because of my poor family connections, because you are … I will be given a post either in the mountains or in the countryside."\fn{A note reads: The current substitute expression for an agricultural assignment.} The girl started to weep and could not go on.

"Then where to?"

"It's not been decided." The girl wiped away her tears with the back of her hand and mumbled: "Day before yesterday, the Party branch committee secretary suddenly sent for me and told me that there were three roads ahead of me, and it was up to me to choose one of these roads."

"What three roads?"

"The first road is for me to expose thoroughly your counter-revolutionary activities by willingly submitting evidence to the Party committee concerning your crimes as a traitor and secret agent. That way I can stay in the city. The second road is to cut off our relationship as father and daughter; then I can go to a state farm. If I don't draw a clear line between us, but insist instead that you are a revolutionary cadre, then I have to live and work with a production team in a hillside village."

Her complaints were getting more and more intolerable. Was she not slandering the policy of letting intellectual youth go to work in the mountains and countryside? I was very angry, and so I stood up and cut her off, shouting:

"You are talking nonsense! How dare you speak in such a way about your Party branch committee secretary?"

"You can find out for yourself if you don't believe me!" the girl suddenly turned around and shouted back at me. I of course would not allow myself to be outdone.

"I certainly will inquire. What is the name of your school and who is the Party branch secretary?" I demanded. I had hoped to frighten her with my threatening words, but who would have thought that they would only make her more indignant? She jumped up; her eyes were on fire. Her once pale face was now flushed all over.

"Go," she said. "I'll take you there right now. Moreover, our Party branch secretary told me that the decision of our school authorities about me was made at the request of your iron and steel factory."

To my surprise, her firm tone and her outspoken and fearless manner overpowered me. The girl was not telling a lie; she had no need to do so. Could there exist such open defiance of Chairman Mao's instructions, such misuse of the directive to go to work in the mountains and in the country-side as a measure of punishment or exchange?! I didn't know what to say just then.

Mao Qiankun, for his part, remained quite composed; he did not consider what his daughter had said to be at all strange. The girl suddenly grabbed his shoulder and asked innocently:

"Daddy, have you ever really been a traitor or secret agent?"

"What do you think?"

The girl thought about it for a moment, shook her head and then said, "You don't look like one."

"You are such a silly child. Can you tell a traitor or a secret agent by his appearance?"

"No, what I mean is that all traitors and secret agents wish that the Party and the whole country would go to hell. But you taught me when I was very young to love Chairman Mao and the Chinese Communist Party. You yourself worked day and night—"

"Positive words may only be a cover-up."

"Yes, our teacher also said so." The girl knitted her brow. "They say that it is a kind of protective coloring used by traitors and secret agents to camouflage themselves. They couldn't have survived otherwise."

Mao Qiankun nodded his head.

"It's quite true," he said. "But once, you returned home very late at night, called me and mamma up from our beds, and with tears of joy said to us, 'Premier Zhou came to our factory today! He was still as affectionate and as brilliant a talker as before. He went to every workshop and shook hands with everybody. Moreover, he asked us whether we could double or triple our production. Our country, he said, was desperately in need of iron and steel! Without iron or steel we could not defeat our enemy. Without iron or steel we could not build socialism!' Since then, you seemed to have been afflicted with some kind of illness; you talked about nothing but iron and steel. Your words caused calluses to grow in our ears … I don't think you were pretending. You don't know how to pretend."

Mao Qiankun was silent for a long while. Then he again stroked his daughter's hunched back,

"Ah! Your back …"

The girl again straightened up her body; but soon becamehunched again, saying regretfully, "I can't help it. Just like one's family background—you can't change it."

"No!" Mao Qiankun loudly rebuked his daughter. The severity of his voice frightened even me. "Wherever you go, you must keep your back straight!"

His words seemed irrational; yet the girl nodded her head as if she understood. She straightened up her back, and was not hunchbacked again before she left.

When there were just the two of us left in the room, Mao Qiankun looked blankly at the door, as if deep in meditation. I intended to finish reading the newspaper article on Criticisms of Confucianism and Appraising Legalism, but for some unknown reason, I couldn't concentrate.

Bihu again beckoned me to go out of the room. He asked me what Mao Qiankun and his daughter talked about. Offended, I replied:

"I don't know." Bihu said in surprise:

"Weren't you in the room the whole time?" I became unaccountably angry, and said:

"Among the responsibilities given me by the pockmark-faced group leader, there is none to monitor the prisoner." I was so excited and my manner so hostile when I spoke these words that Bihu, although he was angry with me, could only conclude our conversation by saying:

"Ugh! Just look at yourself!"

*

I was assigned a room. It faced south, covered an area of eighteen square meters, had a kitchen, a bathroom and a balcony. This new worker's house was situated right in the neighborhood of the iron and steel factory, only five minutes to and from work. I knew that housing in the city was very difficult. A number of young men and women were forced to postpone their weddings because of a lack of housing. How could the iron and steel factory be so liberal in allocating houses?

Bihu became aware of my doubt. He bragged about our factory leaders:

"Look, a row of five-story houses. Aren't they magnificent? They were obtained by our Commander Zhao and Vice-Chairman Meng through cooperation with the housing control department. We gave them some iron and stecl, and we got these houses. Aren't our factory leaders resourceful?"

"Do you have a room too?"

"Of course, just next to yours." Knowing that Bihu was also single, I proposed:

"Let's share one room, and return the other one." Bihu waved his head back and forth, saying:

"No, no, our factory's houses are also very scarce; we shouldn't be so generous. Moreover, this room was especially allotted to you by Vice-Chairman Meng. Look, it even has a better eastern exposure than mine." Then he deliberately lowered his voice and whispered mysteriously in my ear:

"Vice-Chairman Meng has taken a special interest in you. He may have the intention of making you his son-in-law. Do your best, young man. Once you have his backing, you will have nothing else to worry about, Nowadays, you can't get on without a backer, ha ha! …"

His words disgusted me, I hastened to cut him short:

"Don't talk nonsense."

Bihu's small eyes narrowed into slits. He puckered his aquiline nose, and said with even more abandon:

"Hmph! I know what I'm saying. Take Mao Qiankun's meeting with his daughter day before yesterday. If the warden had been anybody else, well, it would be strange if he were not dismissed. But because it was you, the Vice-Chairman just said, 'This young fellow has no experience. Let him take some time to recollect what happened.' To tell you the truth, you are obligated to tell me in detail what happened that day. This is part of your work." I said:

"With me monitoring them, what could they say?"

"Just tell me something, anything, so I can make a report to complete my duties."

"I really didn't listen very carefully."

Bihu was getting angry. ":Then what were you doing?" he asked.

"I was reading the newspaper."

"What kind of news had you so spellbound?"

"I was reading a story about the struggle between Confucianists and Legalists." I felt I might as well make something up on the spot.

“Ha ha!” Bihu let out a piercing peal of laughter. I held my breath, afraid that he would see through my lie. However, he only said: “The struggle between Confucianists and Legalists! My, my! Why are you interested in things like that? It’s only a hoax with which to deceive people!” Then he again burst out into mad laughter. He was laughing at my naïvete and childishness.

*

The long awaited Fourth National People’s Congress was finally convened. I held the newspaper with both hands, looked at the thin and emaciated countenance of our beloved Premier Zhou Enlai, and tears filled my eyes. Mao Qiankun subscribed to the newspaper at his own expense. Usually I could only read it after he had finished with it. But today, since the paper contained such important news, plus a photo of the premier, I couldn’t help but grab it first and read it through from beginning to end.

It was not enough to read the paper just once, so I decided to buy a copy for myself and keep it as a .souvenir. After notifying the special investigatory group upstairs, I sped to the nearest newspaper stand in the neighborhood. When I arrived, I was shocked to find that there was already a line of people almost half a mile long.

Having finally bought a copy for myself, I left happily without bothering to collect my change. When I returned, I found Mao Qiankun with his face buried in the newspaper, heaving his shoulders convulsively. Tears had drenched and even soaked a hole through the paper. When he saw me enter the room, he hurriedly dried his eyes with his sleeves, and then began to do his self-designed exercises (though it was not his usual time for doing them). Finished with the exercises but still panting, he spread out some paper and began to write furiously. What was he writing? Evidently, it was not his confessions. Neither was he writing the characters which meant persistence in different styles. I knew this because, when I walked towards him, he hurriedly covered up the paper with his sleeve and drew randomly on another sheet of paper. But I didn’t say anything this time.

*

“The capitalist-roader has run away! The capitalist-roader … has … run … away! Quick! … Catch … him!”

Mao Qiankun took off on the paved road while I followed closely behind. I kept shouting while chasing him, hoping that someone might hear my cries and help me stop him. But it was already past midnight, and there was not a shadow of a man.

The ordinarily lethargic and idle Mao Qiankun suddenly became quick and agile as a cat. With body bent at the waist, arms waving in the air, he ran, with short and rapid steps through the windy and rainy street like a shuttle. I called for help but could get no response. I had shouted my throat hoarse and tired out my legs and feet, but he did not seem to care. He ran on and on and on! While we’re on the subject, I must admit that the incident was really all my fault.

After supper, Mao Qiankun, as was his habit, stood beside the window and gazed up at the sky. Suddenly his expression changed. His left eye blinked furiously, and he pressed his face against the wooden laths on the window. His behavior was extremely unusual. With the patience I had acquired in the army during training as a radar operator, I observed him carefully and in silence.After a while, he could no longer control himself. He slapped his coarse bed board and cried:

“Something’s gone wrong! Something’s definitely wrong!”

I put my questions coldly:

“What’s gone wrong and who is responsible?” He explained:

“The No.2 furnace. Look! It’s that furnace just opposite this building. The temperature is too high!"

“It’s good to have a high-temperature furnace.” I made this amateurish remark rashly. “Hasn’t it been said that only raging fire can produce pure steel?”

“That depends on the actual conditions. The No. 2 furnace is a piece of old equipment. It hasn’t been carefully maintained in many years. It can’t bear such a burden.” Then he waved his fist and stamped his foot, saying: “If anything disastrous should happen, I don’t know how you’ll be able to account for it!”

Being a layman when it came to steel production, I could not evaluate his opinion. But I was offended by his arrogant manner. So I said coolly”

“Hmph! It’s your Confessions you should pay more attention to.”

My words evidently angered him. With his face all flushed with exasperation, he said:

“You and your lot are throwing the country’s properties down the drain. Should something happen to the No.2 furnace, I’ll hold you responsible!” I was furious and counter-attacked:

“Mao Qiankun; don’t forget your present status. You are a capitalist-roader, and yet here you are flailing your arms about, criticizing others. It won’t do.” He stamped his feet and shouted:

“My case has not yet been decided. I have not yet been expelled from the Party. I am still one of the iron and steel factory's personnel. If I see a problem, I have the right to point it out. No one can pressure me into silence." I said:

"The factory's revolutionary committee is well organized. Production is under control. There's no need for you to worry."

"If you really had a mind for production, you could spare me the worrying."

A thought suddenly occurred to me:

"You have been here for more than a year. How do you know that the temperature of the No.2 furnace is too high?"

"The chimney of the No.2 furnace is just in front of this window. How couldn't I know? Just by looking at the smoke coming out from the chimney, I can tell that the furnace temperature is too high."

"Why can't I tell?"

"You don't understand these things."

"You know more than I do?"

"I have been in the iron and steel factory for more than twenty years. Of course I know more than you."

How conceited! I countered pointedly:

"I admit that I know less than you do. But what about the many experienced workers at the No.2 furnace? Do they also not know?" He let out a long sigh:

"All those who have professional knowledge have been removed from their posts." I added:

"There are so many old workers and technicians. How can they all be deposed?"

He stared with his right eye, showed the whites of his left, and his chin quivered, so he could not speak. After a long while he finally said with a trembling mouth:

"I don't want to bicker with you. But I formally request—no, I formally beg you to report at once to our leaders, and I ask them to take immediate steps. Otherwise it will be too late."

The last few words were spoken in a very low voice. I saw that he was dead serious about the matter and I concluded he might have good reason to be so. Anyhow I should report to our factory leaders. I therefore consented:

"Well, I'll go and tell them about it."

Bihu happened to be on duty in the special investigatory group. After hearing me out, he shook his bald head impatiently and said:

"This is just like the man of Qi in the old legend who was haunted by the fear that the sky might fall! Mao Qiankun is not our factory leader. What has the furnace temperature got to do with him?"

I suggested that Bihu make a report. He very reluctantly lifted the telephone receiver and called Vice-Chairman Meng. From the pained expression on his face I could tell that he was probably met with rebuff. Sure enough, Vice-Chairman Meng said that since the movement to "criticize Confucius and Lin Biao" began, there were rumors that Legalists could only engage in revolution and didn't know production. The revolutionaries of the No. 2 furnace decided to smash such shameless slander by action, namely, to set a new record with the old equipment of the No. 2 furnace. The fact that Mao Qiankun was making such a fuss at this very moment indicated that he had an ulterior motIve. So, Vice-Charman Meng said, we must keep vigilance against the new movement of our class enemy and not let ourselves be deceived.

On hearing Vice-Chairman Meng's analysis, I became aware of Mao Qiankun's deliberate attempt at deceit. When I went back to the solitary confinement ward, I purposely walked up the stairs with heavy steps and closed the door with unusual force. Mao Qiankun approached me and asked eagerly:

"How do things stand? Did you make a report?"

"Yes," I replied, sitting jerkily on the bed. "The No. 2 furnace has no problems at all."

"No problems?"

"Not only are there no problems, but it is setting a record in production."

"Setting a record! No wonder they keep going like this. This is killing a hen to get eggs!"

"Killing a hen to get eggs?"

"Yes, the furnace is already very old and not well-maintained; yet they want to work it as long as they can. They'll have an accident before a record is established. Even if nothing serious goes wrong, the furnace will be of no use after a record has been set."

"Is it as serious as that?"

"It is indeed serious!"

I felt embarrassed. After listening to the two sides, both of which seemed reasonable enough, I, an ignoramus on the subject, found it impossible to decide whom to believe. Putting aside the question whether Mao Qiankun meant well or ill, one can't expect to set records without adopting safety measures. The leadership had to be notified at once.

I again hurried upstairs. The bulging cheeked Bihu impatiently handed me the telephone receiver. I had no choice but make the call during which the following dialogue place:

"I want to speak to Vice-Chairman Meng."

"He's in a meeting."

"Then please find the leader in charge of production."

"He's also in a meeting."

"Can you please ask him to come out for a while?"

"No I can't."

"I have some important business, in connection with the No. 2 furnace."

"The meeting is about class struggle. It is much more important than your No. 2 furnace."

Then, click, the line was dead.

Seeing how disturbed I looked, Mao Qiankun immediately understood. He emitted a long sigh, saying:

"We have done our duty."

Resuming his usual manner, he spread out his quilt, unbuttoned his clothes, took off his shoes and covered himself up with his blanket from head to foot. I also took off my clothes and went to bed, but had no desire to sleep. I gazed outside the window at the chimney of the No.2 furnace in the distance. It looked like a guided missile pointing proudly at the blue night sky. Sparks sporadically spurted out from the mouth of the chimney and soared to the sky, now bright, now dim, as if the chimney itself were trembling and shaking, ready to blast off. I did my best to assure myself that this was only an illusion: the chimney could not take off and nothing would happen to the furnace. But my heart was beating faster and harder. I felt as if a small hammer were pounding through my chest.

Suddenly I heard a creaking noise. Mao Qiankun got up abruptly. I couldn't see him in the dark, but I could see a spark of light. No, it wasn't a spark.. It was one of Mao Qiankun's eyes. He turned quickly around, got out of bed, and put on his clothes and shoes. His movements were as fast as the wind.

I quickly turned on the bedside light. The light on, I could see that Mao Qiankun was already dressed and was about to pull open the door. I jumped down from my bed with the speed of military maneuver and, taking one long stride towards him, grabbed the hand that was turning the door knob. I asked in a stern voice:

"What are you doing?"

"I want to go have a look!"

"Where to?"

He pointed outside the window. I knew what he meant and was about to get out of his way. But my duties as a warden instantly sobered me up. I forcibly removed his hand from the door knob and said sternly:

"You can't go!" Gasping, I added another warning: "Don't forget you are a capitalist-roader under investigation."

"No, I can't; I can't let an accident happen at the furnace!" he muttered as if he were in a dream. With dazed eyes, a heavy breath and foaming mouth, he again dashed towards the door.

I got hold of his wrist with one hand, and with the other took out the keys and locked the door. He stared at me with bloodshot eyes, and desperately pushed me in an attempt to obtain my keys. Failing to do that, he tried to force open the door. When that also failed, he ran round and round the room like a besieged beast in its cage, trying to find a way out.

Considering that such a deadlock was no way to settle the matter, I suddenly thought of a change in strategy that would give me some respite. I said to Mao:

"Don't be in such a hurry. I'll go contact them again, and ask them to take urgent measures."

I was afraid he might escape, so I locked the door from the outside. I went upstairs and found that the door of the special investigatory group office was also locked. Bihu who ought to have been on duty, was no where in sight.

I ran downstairs angrily, and looked for Mao Qiankun to discuss the situation. Upon entering the room, I saw that the window was wide open, the wooden laths had been broken and there was no sign of the capitalist-roader.

Damn! The capitalist-roader had run away! I rushed to the window and saw a dwarfish figure running in the direction of the No. 2 furnace. Yes, it was him! I dressed myself quickly, opened the door and ran with long strides after him, crying out:

"The capitalist-roader has escaped! Quick! Catch him!"

I was, after all, younger and stronger than Mao Qiankun. I had undergone daily training in mountain climbing when serving duty on an island, developing strength in my legs. Indeed the distance between us was shortened after a little while. It seemed that he had tripped on a stone for he started to stagger, which meant that I could easily grab him with one quick charge. Then suddenly a thought occurred to me: he must be using the No. 2 furnace as a cover in his attempt to escape! I considered his escape in conjunction with his strenuous daily exercises, and concluded that he must have been preparing for today's occasion from the very beginning.

A gust of night wind cleared my head. Calmly, I surveyed the surrounding terrain. If Mao Qiankun were trying to get away, he would have to have some accomplices that could protect him. Who were they? How were they going to help him? I would very soon be able to obtain an answer. It would be an excellent opportunity which might never be had again. Then I thought: wouldn't chasing him and shouting madly for help be the same as frightening away the snake by beating the grass? So I slowed down my steps and stopped shouting. Mao Qiankun, however, was still running furiously against the wind. He appeared not to have seen me. I leaped behind a cement electricity pole and searched carefully around me, but found nothing suspicious. So I took advantage of the terrain's topographical features to keep my distance, but also keep him carefully in view. I passed the dumping grounds for burnt charcoal and cast iron before arriving at the No. 2 furnace.

I heaved a sigh of relief. Mao Qiankun had not deceived me after all. The whole workshop was flaming red. Heat waves billowed out, scorching everything nearby. Sweat and grease coated faces of the panic-stricken workers scrambling about. Amid the bustling could be heard cries of

"It's leaking, it's leaking!"

"No, it's cracked!"

"Quick, report to …"

"Someone telephoned but there was no answer!"

"It's no use to call! We'd better just get out of here!"

"Is it a leak or a crack?"

"The crack is getting bigger!"

"Quick, quick!"

Some workers screamed, others stamped their feet. There were also those who ran towards the furnace, and when they got there did not know what to do and could only back out. One man went to fetch a fire extinguisher, Another pointed out to him that it was useless; the man then let go of the fire extinguisher and took up an emergency ax. A female worker embraced a public thermos bottle and busied herself with it. It was apparent that they all wanted to take part, even at the risk of their lives, but no one knew exactly what to do.

Was the chaotic situation due to a lack of leadership? No, it didn't look that way. To be sure, there was someone standing in the center of the crowd taking charge. Judging by the slenderness of the person's back, it was a woman. She extended her arms in an effort to calm the gathering down, but her presence only added to the general confusion. She instructed two individuals to climb to the top of the furnace to investigate, but they swore that the trouble could not be from there. They even quarreled with her. Among the remaining people, some tried to mediate while others sumpathized with one side or the other. The arguments became more heated. The girl squatted down on the ground and began to weep, her shoulders heaving up and down, leaving aside the workshop and the serious danger facing it.

As an amateur to the steel industry, witnessing the circumstances described above caused me to break out in sweat. The girl suddenly turned her head around. Was she not Rixiu? She wore bulky canvas work clothes. Her pretty face was covered with tears and grease. She appeared to be both distraught and disgraced, like a child appealing to her parents after being bullied. Such a big workshop placed under her care. Wasn't it a sham of official affairs?

Mao Qiankun, who stood ahead of me, had of course seen the whole thing. He at once jumped up on a big iron block, raised an arm and cried:

"Settle down, everyone!"

His voice was not loud, but it had a great impact. The crowd very quickly calmed down. Rixiu also stopped weeping. All the people in the workshop looked up to the skinny old man with their eyes respectful, trusting and obedient. In the brilliant light of the flames, his perspiring head seemed glazed; his whole body looked like a bronze statue. With stern eyes, he surveyed the entire scene and peered at the site of the accident with a hand serving as eye-shade. Majestically, he ordered two workers to put on asbestos clothes arid investigate the details of the accident. He told another worker to go to the nearby workers' dormitory to summon more help. Yet another was ordered to watch fluctuations of tbe meters, and a woman worker was instructed to take care of the telephone. The remaining people were divided into two groups; some experienced workers together with a number of young and strong chaps were organized into an emergency repair squad, wearing asbestos clothes or dampenedgunny sacks, the rest formed a service group to transport tools and materials.

The two workers sent to “reconnpiter” came back and made a report with many technical terms. Mao Qiankun waved his hand to the emergency repair squad and said:

“Start!”

The emergency repair squad members marched rapidly in a file towards the spot of the accident; the scene was quite similar to that of old army soldiers armed with bangalores going to blow up a pillbox. I, a youngster who was once a soldier, felt I should belong to the repair squad. I therefore got hold of a dampened gunny sack and put it on my head. But due to my lack of technical know-how and my unfamiliarity with the terrain, I kept bumping into people and getting in their way. The vigilant Mao Qiankun pointed at me with his forefinger and said:

“You, go to that group!”

“That group” was of course the service group; it consisted entirely of women and old men. I was unwilling to join their company. But Mao Qiankun stared at me with threatening eyes and menacing eyebrows; his manner was comparable to that of a general on a battlefield. I had to withdraw obediently from the emergency repair squad and follow the service group members to transport firebricks.

Coincidentally, Rixiu was behind me. She had now freed herself from the trauma and burden of leadership. She seemed content to carry bricks and not to mind the fact that Mao Qiankun had taken the “power” from her hands.

Workers arrived one after another with clothes draped over their shoulders and shoes dragging on their feet. Perhaps it was because Mao Qiankun stood above everyone else, or because he seemed a natural center in this emergency repair battle, all the people who had come to help instinctively reported to him for duty. He directed them to join one of the two groups, according to the conditions of the worker and the requirement, of. the emergency repair work. Two workers were burned by the raging fire and were carried away. Mao Qiankun gestured to send the wounded quickly to the hospital, and ordered some other workers to continue the emergency repair. Under his direction, the work was carried on smoothly.

The intense struggle lasted about an hour. Then good news began coming in: the opening had been blocked. Still later, any possibility of danger was eliminated. The people in the workshop heaved sighs of relief; smiles began to appear on their grease-staimed faces. The workers, in groups of two and three, embraced and slapped one another, celebrating their victory. Suddenly, a middle-aged worker standing beside me remarked to another person:

“Hey! Isn’t that the capitalist-roader Mao Qiankun?”

The person spoken to was a young man. He curled his lip and answered:

“So what if he is a capitalist-roader! Wouldn’t it have been a bigger mess tonight without him?” Amid the noise of celebration, Mao Qiankun gently leaped from the iron block, pulled my sleeve and said:

“Let’s go.”

“What?” I was lost in the pleasure of the moment. and failed to catch his meaning right away.

“We have to return to the solitary confinement ward.”

We dragged our weary legs home. The cold wind blowing against our faces already reddened by the fire made us shiver. Mao Qiankun, no longer young in age, walked with difficulty behind me. Once he almost tripped. I hurried to lend him a hand. Together we limped back home, and when we arrived, the day was already breaking. I brought him a basin of hot water to wash with, and a bowl of boiling hot rice gruel from the canteen. Then I draped my army overcoat around him. For the first time, he smiled at me in gratitude. His smile was so sincere and full of feeling. I suddenly felt that Mao Qiankun, sitting there in my army overcoat, was not at all an abominable old fox, but an able and powerful old cadre. Even his asymmetrical eyes (I found out only yesterday that his right eye had been shot blind during the war and had been replaced by an artificial one) appeared to be quite affectionate and kind.

It was really a pity that he had been a traitor and secret agent, otherwise …

*

This afternoon, Bihu came in, placed one hand on the back of my ear and said mysteriously, even with a touch of jealousy:

“You little devil, you’ve done it! He’s again sent for you.”

“Who’s sent for me? Where am I supposed to go?"”I asked, not knowing what he meant.

Bihu, full of flattering smiles, said, “Don’t play dumb.”

I lay open my palms as an expression of my continued ignorance.

"I've just received a call. You're to go to the home of Vice-Chairman Meng at half past six tonight." So saying, he winked at me and slapped my shoulder.

I went at the appointed time and rallg the door bell. Rixiu opened the door. She extended her hand to me like an old friend, saying:

"Well, Xiao Wang, it's very obvious you were trained in the army. You're right on time."

Rixiu was especially well-dressed today. Her hair was carefully combed. Sky-blue ribbons were fastened at the end of each braid. Her high-heeled shoes sounded rhythmically on the waxed floor. In contrast to her awkward appearance the previous night she now seemed quite a different person.

More astonishing things followed. After the greeting, I went to sit down on the hard wooden bench. Rixiu, however, opened a small door to what looked like a closet in the corner of the room, and beckoned to me:

"Come inside, please."

What then I saw surprised me. There was a large room inside the small door, at least fifty or sixty square meters in size. The painted walls were lined with carved boards. Velvet curtains draped either side of the steel French windows. A large electric fan hung connected to a crystal chandelier. On one side of the room was a grand piano, on the other a double bed and a complete set of redwood furniture. Only in the movies had I ever seen such luxurious accommodations.

Rixiu turned on the lamp and let me sit down on a leather-covered sofa. She explained:

"This was the reception room of a reactionary capitalist. The furniture was also his. During the Cultural Revolution he was forced out of his home. The house was then given to my father. These things are public property; they are here temporarily. It's better that they're here rather than in a storeroom where they'd just occupy space and deteriorate. So here they are." Rixiu rattled on and on, and in conclusion added in a serious voice:

"My father has told me that besides Commander Zhao and a few intimate friends, no one is allowed to come in here. As for you …"

She did not finish her sentence.

This unusual reception and excessive hospitality made me feel quite uncomfortable. Remembering the degrading words Bihu said to me, I slided quickly to the corner of the sofa, and tried to find something to say:

"Where's your father?"

"He's gone to the Municipality to attend a meeting."

"Why did he send for me?"

Rixiu pressed her lips together and smiled:

"Can you guess?"

"No, I can't."

"Of course, it's about the escape of the capitalist-roadel through the window."

Vice-Chairman Meng must be investigating who was responsible for the incident. I felt uneasy and tried to defend myself. "The wooden laths were very carelessly nailed to the window; I had pointed this out quite some time earlier."

Rixiu laughed heartily. Then she whispered to me mysteriously:

"As a matter of fact, you did a very good thing."

"What!" I thought she was referring to the emergency repair of the furnace that night. But on the contrary, she said:

"My father and Commander Zhao have both been very worried these past few years. They can't come to a decision and close Mao Qiankun's case with the evidence now in our hands. Further investigation can't produce any more results. We still have to keep him in custody. On the other hand, it would be good to let him get away. Now with his running away, this offence, plus his past record, is enough to pass a verdict on him."

I stared at her with wide-open eyes. I couldn't believe my ears. A layer of coolness wafted off my back. I couldn't believe that this frivolous young girl, who just last night displayed such helplessness in the face of crisis, could express such an "informed opinion." I was determined to get to the bottom of the matter:

"Then, the window laths were nailed on carelessly on purpose?"

Rixiu laughed again, and then said seriously, "I didn't say that."

The door opened. The stout Vice-Chairman edged in. Upon seeing me, he was both surprised and uncomfortable. He gave Rixiu a look of contempt. Then he asked me with a straight face:

"You've come early!" I stood up and replied:

"Didn't you tell me to come at half past six?"
"I?"
Rixiu interjected in a hurry:
"Daddy, it's I who told him to come earlier, because I was afraid he might not be able to find our house in the dark."
"It's all right that he's come." After that Commander Zhao came in and lay down on the sofa with a look of self-importance. He took out a final page proof of the newspaper and said:
"Have a look."
The paper carried a banner headline report of our steel factory's emergency repair of the No. 2 furnace. The article reported how capitalist-roaders had followed the revisionist line for a long time, how they had engaged in large-scale control and oppression of workers, and how they had concerned themselves only with the fulfilment of plans and neglected the maintenance and repair of equipment, nearly resulting in a serious accident. Then it went on to describe how the newly-born revolutionary authority held high the red flag and relied on the masses, and how the leading cadres went deep into the scene of the accident and took bold steps to carry out the emergency repair, finally succeeding in turning danger into safety, etc., etc. The newspaper also contained a photograph of the workers at the No. 2 furnace engaged in normal production after the trouble was taken care of.
After reading through the proof, I felt at a loss. Was I dreaming? How could I believe any of it?
Vice-Chairman Meng, who was watching me all this time, asked sinisterly:
"What do you think of it all?"
"I think the newspaper report is false. I and the capitalist-roader were both there that night—"
He cut me short.
"I know all aboui it, although not from any report you've submitted."
"I feel—"
"You feel that the newspaper should give an account of the capitalist-roader, should report how he jumped out from the window and how he directed the emergency repair, isn't that right?"
"I think—"
"Then, what will the report advocate? What will it criticize? Whose ideology will it uphold? Whose reputation will it destroy? Have you considered these questions?"
I scratched my head.
"Comrade, we must look at everything from the standpoint of political policy. Take for instance the matter of the No. 2 furnace. When we briefed our superiors, we reported what actually happened. We didn't want to rob others of their merit! But the newspaper article was revised and approved by the municipal Party committee secretary himself. Do you know what that means? You must think this question over carefully, otherwise, you might commit an error!"
The last sentence was evidently spoken in a threatening tone.
I was not convinced. So I said, "Say what you may, you can't misrepresent facts—"
Vice-Chairman Meng suddenly jumped up and started pacing around the room with his hands behind his back. Then he gazed at me with half-closed eyes and said,
"Speaking of facts, I meant to ask you a question: how was it that a big, strong person like you couldn't keep an eye on an old man like him? Mmmm?"
Commander Zhao entered the battle too. He stubbed out his cigarette butt, rolled up his sleeves, bent one leg and stretched the other, and having taken such a wrestling posture, exclaimed ferociously:
"Someone reported that you let him run away! Of course we don't believe it. But you should do something to show the masses where you stand."
"How do I do that?"
"Very simply," said Vice-Chairman Meng. "The article will appear in the newspaper tomorrow. A mass meeting of the whole factory will be held in the evening to criticize and struggle against Mao Qiankun. After that, he will be handed over to the organ of people's dictatorship to be dealt with according to law. You will have to expose him at the meeting in your capacity as eye-witness."
"What am I going to expose?" I still pretended to be in the dark.
Vice-Chairman Meng looked at me with doubtful eyes; he was trying to find out whether I was telling the truth. Commander Zhao, however, was more outspoken. He said:
"You can say at the meeting how Mao Qiankun escaped by breaking through the window. Be assured that a draft will be prepared for you. You can just read it out loud."

I nodded, “Now I know.” I thought I knew. At least I thought I should know.

*

I did not sleep a wink last night. Before daybreak when the sky was particularly dark, I got up and took over my shift before I was due. Judgment is to be passed on Mao Qiankun tonight. There are many things to be done.

My substitute, Xiao Fan, also appeared not to have had any sleep last night. His eyes were bloodshot, and he looked peculiar. After relieving the shift to me, he said to me, “Let’s go outside.”

Xiao Fan led me to an out-of-the-way place behind the house. After making sure that there was no one round, he asked me sternly:

“We are going to criticize and struggle against the capitalist-roader tonight?”

“Uh-huh.”

“After that, judgment will be rendered to him?”

“Yes.”

“You are going to expose him at the meeting?”

“Uh-huh.”

Suddenly a fist blow was dealt to my left cheek; sparks appeared before my eyes, and my body swaggered. I heard him scolding me furiously:

“You beastly-hearted fellow!”

I had not thought it possible that the usually gentle Xiao Fan could have dealt such a blow. I stroked my burning cheek and stared at him. Scornfully he stood on his own ground, ready for my return blow.

I spat out saliva mixed with blood, and went away without turning my head around. I did not want to explain. He will know tonight.

Back in the ward Mao Qiankun still did his exercises very conscientiously, not knowing he was in for some bad luck. I remembered our dispute about “world schematism” a while back and blurted out:

“Capitalist-roa—I mean, Comrade Mao Qiankun, how soon will this, this historical misunderstanding reach a conclusion?”

No sooner had I said it than I regretted. Would he understand my amorphous remark?

“Very soon.” Mao Qiankun not only understood, but added, “because the length of each warden’s shift here is getting shorter and shorter.”

“What has the length of the wardens’ shifts got anything to do with the matter under discussion?” Now it was I who failed to understand.

“To be fair with you, in this small ward of mine, four wardens have been ‘corrupted.’ The fifth is you and your period is getting shorter and shorter. Doesn’t that prove that the question will soon come to an end?”

I pondered his words, and remembering the blow dealt my cheek, I could not help adding, “and now there’s a sixth—Xiao Fan.”

“Yes. This explains that all those who go against Mao Tsetung Thought will sooner or later expose themselves and have an ignominious end, no matter how well they disguise themselves. This is a law of history.”

“Old Comrade Mao, tonight they are going to take steps against you. Have … have you anything to tell me?”

On hearing this news, Mao Qiankun was neither surprised nor alarmed. He leisurely took out a roll of paper from a hole in his cotton-padded jacket, and carefully handed it to me, saying:

“Please send it out for me.”

I took it and looked it over. It was a lengthy letter which reads as follows:

> Dear and respected Premier Zhou:
>
> On reading the political report you made at the Fourth National People’s Congress, I learned that a high tide of socialist construction would soon arrive with the coming of spring. Although there may still be twists and turns on our way towards progress, I firmly believe we will ultimately triumph. This is an objective law, which cannot be altered by man’s wishes. In order to realize the objective of the four modernizations\fn{A note reads: A plan to achieve the modernization of China’s industry, agriculture, national defense, and science and technology by the year 2000. First enunciated by Zhou Enlai at the Fourth people’s congress (13-17 January 1975), the plan became a dominant policy of the Deng Xiaoping regime in the late 1970s. Also referred to as “the New Long March” in an attempt to revive the spirit of the Party’s epic Long March from Jiangxi Province to Shaanxi Province in 1934-1935).} as soon as possible I have used my days of isolation to summarize systematically my experiences and understanding, both positive and negative, in my work on the iron and steel front during the last ten years and more. I have drawn up a plan for a speedier development of the iron and steel industry as a small present to the cause of the four modernizations …

The letter was accompanied by a table showing the system of organization, a treatise on the policy, methods, and regulations for strengthening the management of the enterprise, plus a diagram on how to operate the mechan-ical equipment of the whole factory with explanations of the best place for each workshop. The diagram was quite familiar to me! Yes, Mao Qiankun's scribblings of the characters "persistence" in various styles of writing in previous days were just the draft of this diagram. The letter was signed "your former body-guard, Mao Qiankun."

"You used to work for the Premier?" I asked with a respectful voice.

"Yes, for several years."

"Do they know?"

"Yes."

"Why do they treat you this way if they know?"

"It's precisely because they know that they're doing it." His tone was quite matter-of-fact and his voice not loud. But it seemed that a nuclear bomb had exploded above my head. I stared at Mao Qiankun, dumbfounded, and looked around the solitary confinement ward. It then dawned on me that the struggle before us extended far beyond the boundaries of the iron and steel factory.

Like a radar operator who had finally spotted his target, I felt that blood was boiling in my chest, heating up my whole body. Although I had no cap and cuff insignia and no gun in my hand, I decided to fight bravely like a soldier.

I held his hand tightly and said with deep feeling:

"Comrade Mao Qiankun, I thank you wholeheartedly. Thank you for teaching me an unusual lesson and helping me learn many things that are not found in books."

Mao Qiankun smiled affectionately, and said earnestly:

"As to thanking anybody, we should thank the likes of Zhao Abao and Meng Feng, big and small, who had taught our Party and our country an unusual lesson!"

*

My diary must stop here. It had to be hidden from tbe enemy. Our "battle" will commence tonight. I must make necessary preparations.

As for my next step, I propose to continue "writing" my diary by concrete actions in class struggle.

79.1 Death Ray On A Coral Island\fn{by Tong Enzheng (1935-)} Sichuan Province?, China (M) 14

I suppose, dear readers, you have not forgotten the mysterious accident that occurred not so long ago to the twin-engined plane, Morning Star. From the information supplied by the press you learned that at the time of the accident the machines of the plane were operating normally; the plane's radio connection with the airfield was never interrupted; the long-range alarm radars of not a few countries all showed that no other planes were in the vicinity and there was no sign of any guided missiles being used. Yet Morning Star exploded at a height of eight thousand meters in the air, its burning body landing in the Pacific Ocean.

The newspapers announced: "The location of Chen Tianhong is not known." I am that Chen Tianhong, whose location was reportedly unknown. In the following account I am going to tell you not only the cause and the details of the accident, but also my experiences—experiences which caused me much remorse and reflection—on a certain island in the Pacific after the accident.

*

I am a foreign-born Chinese. Since my youth, I have been very attracted to my socialist motherland. I devoured Chinese newspapers and periodicals; the land where our forefathers labored and lived constantly beckoned to me. I cheered China's every success and urged her on to further progress. Several times I planned to apply for permission to return to China, to contribute my youthful energy to the cause of her construction, but I was prevented from doing so because of my parents' ill health. After I graduated in physics from the university I worked in the private laboratory of my teacher, Professor Zhao Qian. Professor Zhao, also a Chinese, was a world-known nuclear physicist. Apart from occupying a public post, he used his savings to establish a small but well-equipped laboratory to pursue his personal interests.

Two years later, my father died, followed shortly after by my mother's death. I felt that the time to return to my motherland had come. I expressed my intention to Professor Zhao and offered my resignation. He heard me out, but then sadness crept into his fully furrowed face.

"My boy," he said, "you should go back to China. We Chinese have a saying, 'Even if a tree is ten thousand feet tall, its fallen leaves will gather round its roots.' If I were younger, I would also return to China. But I hope you will wait a few more months, until we have completed the assemblage of the high-voltage atomic battery. You can then take it with you. It is the result of the strenuous efforts of my whole life. I wish to present it as my final contribution to our motherland."

The voice of the old professor became choked, and I was so moved I was speechless. The small-sized high-voltage atomic battery was the fruit of many years of research work. Its specialty was that it could generate enormous energy, in a very short time. It was therefore invaluable in military, industrial and astro-navigatory activities. When it was nearly completed, quite a few companies offered to purchase its patent for unbelievably high prices. Should Professor Zhao agree to sell the patent he would at once become a millionaire. But I knew that what kept Professor Zhao going through his many years of. tireless work has been his deep patriotism, and nothing else.

I therefore could not refuse Professor Zhao's request. I postponed my trip and helped Professor Zhao assemble the first sample high-voltage atomic battery. After an initial testing, we achieved our anticipated results. Our satisfaction could not be expressed in words.

I quickly obtained my visa and arranged a flight. Professor Zhao cheerfully prepared a whole set of blueprints and technical data, and personally arranged for the government-to-government transfer of technical information.

On the eve of my departure, Professor Zhao prepared a dinner and invited all the lab workers (most of them were my university schoolmates) to come to bid me farewell. Although they were of different nationalities, they all joined in my happiness in returning to my motherland. They continually proposed toasts to the prosperity and strength of China. The friendship between scientists affected me deeply.

It was nearly twelve o'clock when the dinner was over, I returned to my bedroom on the first floor. Professor Zhao as usual went into his ground floor, study to work two more hours before retiring.

Perhaps because I was contemplating my trip home the next day or because I had drunk several glasses of wine at dinner, I was so excited I could not fall asleep for a long time. Not until the clock on the wall struck two did I begin to feel sleepy. Just at that moment, two ear-splitting gunshots broke through the quiet night.

The gunshots were very near; they were fired within my building. 1 jumped up in my bed, put on my clothes and rushed downstairs. I saw a beam of light leaking out from a crack of the study-room door. I ran towards it and cried:

"Professor Zhao, Professor Zhao!"

There was no reply.

I pushed the door open and went into the room. I saw professor Zhao lying on the carpet. The light of the desk lamp shone on his ghastly pale face.

I ran towards him and gently helped him up. He had two gunshot wounds on his breast and his coat was stained with fresh blood.

"The gangsters … wanted me to give them … the blueprints," he said with his lips trembling.

I lowered my head, and listened hard to his feeble voice.

"I have burned them … My boy, you can now only take … the sample battery … back … back to our … motherland!"

His breath stopped. The long French window was wide open. A gentle breeze flicked his white hair.

The door of a safe in the corner of the room was open. A burning smell wafted out. I knew without having to look that the precious blueprints and information related to the battery were all burned to ashes. The safe, designed by Professor Zhao himself, had a hidden button below the key-hole. With a press of the button, the whole contents of the safe was automatically destroyed.

What had happened was quite clear. The gangsters stole into the study and tried to force Professor Zhao at gun-point to give them the blueprints. Professor Zhao destroyed them by pressing the button. Since they could not get what they wanted, the gangsters fired at Professor Zhao and then escaped.

This righteous scientist had nursed the invention with his life; now he was protecting it with his life. I could not help shedding tears as I looked into the professor's face, his semi-closed eyes. Anger filled my heart, a sort of vengeful anger that I had never experienced before in my simple laboratory life.

I reported at once to the police, and postponed my departure. I did not want to leave before the case was cleared. One week later, a middle-aged, staid police officer of the local police station called.

"Mr. Chen," he said, "we regret very much the death of Professor Zhao. All evidence indicates that the crime was cotmmitted by a delinquent in this city under the alias of George Zuo. He is under the orders of a secret organization of a certain powerful nation."

"A certain powerful nation?" I could not help asking. To my geographical understanding the country he was probably talking about was located very far from the South Pacific Ocean. I was not clear how our laboratory work could have anything to do with that country.

"Yes, that big power!" The police officer pointed meaningfully to the north. "Their fleet is constantly cruising near our seacoast; their influence is infiltrating this city. Many keen-sighted individuals have already given us warnings. I suppose you have read their articles in the newspapers, Mr. Chen?"

I could say no more, knowing that he was telling the truth: I remembered a certain columnist comparing the unbridled expansive activities of that big power to an over-extension of a bear's paw. Who would have thought that this sharp-nailed bear's paw would now stretch into our small laboratory, leaving it in crime and blood …

"Do they wish to obtain the secret of the high-voltage atomic battery?"

"Yes, the first company attempting to purchase the Patent of Professor Zhao's invention was one secretly controlled by that powerful nation. When their offer was rejected by Professor Zhao, they turned to robbing the secret by force. This is their normal means of action. Now Chen, you are the only person in the world who knows the secret. Their attention is now focused on you."

"What? Do they dare—" The police officer interrupted me, saying,

"They'll do whatever they like! Last year, they perpetrated three cases of political assassination and five kidnappings. We've done everything we can, but still cannot stop them. Mr. Chen, your request for an exit visa has been granted. To avoid further danger while you are here, I suggest you leave as soon as possible."

"But, Professor Zhao's case hasn't yet been cleared."

The police officer straightened his body, looking very serious.

"Mr. Chen," he said, "I assure you that, in the interest of my own country, and to avenge Professor Zhao, I'll do my utmost to arrest the criminal and have him tried. But what is regrettable is that, although we may have arrested George Zuo, the real criminal will still be able to hide himself within the walls of the embassy and escape from the hands of law!"

I thought the matter over, and remembered what Professor Zhao entrusted me with before his death. I knew that the police officer's advice was well-meaning.

"Thank you," I said finally, "I'll leave here as soon as I can."

"The sooner the better, Mr. Chen, and the more secretly the safer," the police officer told me. "To prevent them from, hijacking your plane, it's best for you not to travel on a regular airline," he added. "While you're still in this city, we'll do our best to ensure your safety, but after you leave here, it's up to you to take good care of yourself."

I took my leave by shaking hands with him. When driving back to my residence, I found two plain-clothes detectives following me in another car. I knew that the police officer was fulfilling his promise.

After consulting with my friends, I finally decided to take the high-voltage atomic battery and fly directly on the Morning Star plane. Morning Star was a small aircraft owned by Professor Zhao's laboratory and used as a means of contact with foreign scientific organizations. I was a licensed amateur pilot, and had many times before navigated this plane as part of the work assigned to me by Professor Zhao.

Early the next morning, my friends secretly escorted me to the airfield. On our way, I did not for a moment remove my eyes from the rearview mirror. I did not know whether it was my paranoia, or just a coincidence, but I discovered that besides the car of the plain-clothes detectives behind us, there was also another vehicle, a light green Ford, that twice mysteriously appeared in my view.

*

I smoothly piloted the Morning Star and started flying. When the green fields disappeared from my sight and the boundless Pacific Ocean appeared before me, I cast a last glance at the foreign land which had nursed me, and silently bid farewell to my friends who remained behind. I could not help feeling a bit of sorrow in the depth of my heart.

Morning Star was a twin-engine arid four-seat passenger plane; its performance properties were up to par. At ten o'clock in the morning, the outlines of the X archipelago flashed past my plane's wings. The sun was shining brightly, the sky clear blue. I raised my plane to a height of eight thousand meters and increased its speed. I remembered a news item in the newspaper some days ago about a large fleet of the powerful nation engaging in military maneuver in this part of the ocean: but I did not believe they would dare hijack my plane in the air above high seas. The engines of my plane were working smoothly and my mind felt quite at ease.

Suddenly I heard a clap of thunder pierce through the silent air. A saw-tooth shaped flash of lightning appeared at my plane's left wing. At such a height, and in such a clear atmosphere, it of course could not be natural thunder or lightning. But this unexplainable phenomenon repeated itself several times. My plane's left-side engine began to burn. The plane, dragging a long tail fire, rapidly descended. I did my best to steady the plane, simultaneously searching for a safe place to land. But I was surrounded by a boundless ocean, and did not have any choice. My plane crashed against the water surface and rebounded some ten meters up before it began to sink. Within these tense seconds, I managed to put on my life jacket and jump out of the cockpit, carrying with me the atomic battery hermetically sealed in a leather bag.

The sea was raging violently. One wave bolstered me up, and another threw me down. The salty and bitter sea water choked me and made breathing difficult. I was swept by sea currents and was soon far away from the scene of the disaster.

Two helicopters appeared above the wreckage of my plane. Several frogmen came down on a hanging ladder; they were obviously looking for me. Judging from the speed with which they arrived, the helicopters must have taken off from a warship anchored nearby.

It appeared that the bear's paw was reaching for me from eight thousand meters high in the sky. My accident must have been connected to the intrigues of the secret service organization in that country. When they found that I had secretly left the city, they hoped to send me to the bottom of the sea so that the secret of the high-voltage atomic battery could be lost to the world forever. "How despicable. But with what means had they destroyed the Morning Star?" When considering this question, I clutched the leather bag even more tightly. As long as I was alive, I would not allow these gangsters carry out their dirty tricks.

My watch had stopped. I did not know how much time had elapsed. At dusk, I saw a helicopter at a distance fly along the sea surface. Since I could not discern to what nation the aircraft belonged, I did not dare contact it. It was now dark. I found that my energy was waning rapidly. I hastened to take off my belt, and with it fastened the leather bag closely to my waist. Even if I fainted, I would not lose it.

Thus I drifted in the ocean for one day and two nights. In the earlier part of this period, I felt unbearably hungry and thirsty, but later I was only conscious of my extreme weakness. It was only through the support of a strong desire to fulfill Professor Zhao's behest that I was able to struggle upwards every time I was beaten down by a billow.

In the morning of the third day after the accident, I caught a glimpse of an island. As it was very small and only slightly above sea level, I reckoned that it was a coral island. Although the sea had already pushed me near it, I swam towards the island with all my remaining energy, being afraid of losing this chance to live. Finally, I came very near the coast. I swam into the bay. The water was as clear as a mirror; I could see the beautiful white corals lying at the bottom of it.

Just at this time, the corner of a fish's fin suddenly rose to the sea surface about twenty meters away from me. It was the fin of a big shark at least seven or eight meters long. It was obviously very hungry. After swimming twice around me, it suddenly adopted a position of attack. At this moment, I could see clearly the shark's small cruel green eyes and its two rows of sharp white teeth. I wanted to call for help, but my dried throat could not utter a sound. I wanted to escape, but the shark was blocking my way to the. coast. I froze. I would be unable to escape from death—and such a terrible death!

Just as the shark charged at me, a ray of blinding red light shot forth from the coast. It rapidly vaporized the sea water, causing sounds of explosion. A cloud of white vapor rose in the bay. The red light followed the shark closely; it leapt up to the water surface, and then sank down. Its white belly faced upwards; it mysteriously died. I was also burned by the hot sea water, but I managed to swim to the coast and come out of the water. My hands and feet were scratched by the sharp edges of the coral reefs; and blood was dripping from them. But I did not feel any pain. Then, I heard a man on the reef speaking to me in English:

"Who are you?"

I looked round, but could not find anybody. I could only reply to the hidden person:

"A Chinese who narrowly I escaped death."

"Chinese?" the man asked in surprise. Then he said in my native tongue: "Come up quickly!"

I tried to stand up, but I was completely exhausted. I felt dizzy; the high-voltage atomic battery hanging from my waist seemed to be as heavy as a thousand weights. I staggered, and lost my consciousness …

*

When I regained my consciousness, I found myself lying in a fairly well-furnished bedroom. The room had a complete set of teak furniture, consisting of a dressing table, a wardrobe, sofas, a desk, etc., which were very orderly placed. A combination console television, radio, tape recorder and stereo cabinet stood m a corner of the room. White curtains fluttered in the wind. The sound of sea waves beating against coral reefs could be heard.

I sat up. I found that my old clothes had been changed. My burns and scratches had been carefully dressed. On the tea-table beside my bed rested a microwave-hot tray of milk and sandwiches. I ate some food and felt quite refreshed. Then I remembered about the atomic battery and jumped quickly out of bed. On finding the leather bag safe and intact under the bed, my mind was set at rest. I walked towards the window, and saw on the two upper shelves of the bookcase some reference books on electronics and nuclear physics which were familiar to me; the two lower shelves were full of fantasy and pornographic novels. On a plastic shelf beside the stereo set, there were many tapes and records of music by the Beetles and other rock groups. A bust photo of a Chinese youngster was on the desk. He had a head of bushy hair, a narrow forehead, a square face, dark eyebrows and small eyes, and a sarcastic smile. Was he the owner of this room? The sight of him filled me with an unexplanable disgust.

Judging from its appearance, the room must be the bedroom of a playboy. The only thing that seemed to be incongruous was a new, sophisticated measuring instrument hanging on the wall. It was an instrument that measured radiation commonly used in a nuclear physics laboratory. But I could not figure out what it was doing here.

The door behind me opened; a man came in quietly. I turned around and saw a Chinese over fifty years of age. His hair was already gray. He had a broad forehead, high nose and two deeply sunken but very bright eyes. He was not tall. His movements were graceful and slow. One could tell at a glance that he was a man long used to mental labor.

"Please excuse me for not having knocked," he said very courteously. "I didn't know that you had woken up.

From his soft voice and his strong Fujian accent,\fn{Indicating he was from Fukian province.} I knew that he was the man who had spoken to me yesterday, the savior of my life.

"Thank you for having saved my life," I said. Before finding out more about my situation, I decided not to reveal my identity. "I am a traveler. In my voyage I accidentally fell into the water. May I ask where we are?"

"It was originally a small nameless island. Later, because I have been here such a long time, some people began to name, it after me, that is, 'Dr. Matthews' Island.'" He replied to my question, at the same time clapping his hands twice. "Let's go and sit outside where we can talk in greater detail. I don't have many guests on this island."

A servant in a jacket coat came in. From his black and stiff hair and olive-colored skin, I knew that he was a Malay.

"Please prepare some coffee," Dr. Matthews ordered. The servant bowed and went out silently.

Dr. Matthews explained to me: "He is called Amang; he has stayed with me for many years. The poor fellow is a mute. There are now only the two of us on this island. I used to have an assistant named Joseph Luo; this bedroom was his. Three months ago, he went away on vacation."

We went out of the bedroom. The room was connected to a patio shaded by green wisteria and beautiful tropical flowers. On the other end of the patio, there was a two-room suite. Dr. Matthews told me that the outer room was his study, while the inner one was his bedroom.

The patio faced the sea. Behind the patio was a white bungalow from the top of which several types of radio antennae extended in all directions. At the back of the bungalow, that is to say, on the other end of the small island, stood a reinforced concrete structure, half of which was built into the sea. Several high-voltage transmission wires were drawn. out from this structure. I was rather surprised to see such modern equipment on such a small, deserted island only a few square kilometers in area. Dr. Matthews seemed to have noticed my puzzled look. He explained to me:

"I'm a physicist. The white bungalow is my laboratory, behind which is an automatic tidal power station; it can use the ocean waves to generate electricity and needs no overseeing. The power thus obtained is enough to meet both my laboratory and living requirements."

We sat down on the canvas chairs placed along the side of the patio. Sitting here, we had a beautiful view of the whole coral island. In front of the island, there was a circular, tranquil reef lake with shallow and clear water. At the bottom of this lake was a layer of fine white sand which glistened brightly under the sunlight. The lake also reflected the blue and high southern sky, just like an emerald mirror. It was surrounded by a circular ridge of reefs, upon which were coconut trees swaying in the wind whose tall silhouettes looked especially beautiful against the background of the blue sky and white clouds. Beyond the circular reef was the boundless ocean, whose billows rushed against and struck at the coral reefs, splashed up sprays like fine rain. The whole coral island was embedded in a white belt of breakers. Here, everything, was peaceful, quiet. Yet, while sipping the coffee brought to us by Amang, and enjoying the beautiful natural scenery, I could not help wondering about many seemingly mysterious things.

"Who was this gentlemanly Dr. Matthews? Why must he seclude himself on this island? What is he researching? Who supplies him with the necessities for his work and daily life? For whom is he working?"

During our chat I brought up these questions tactfully but insistently.

Dr. Matthews smiled a sad smile. He seemed to have, kept a lot of things to himself. After a little while he said:

"If you can promise not to tell anybody after leaving here what I am going to tell you now, then I'll let you in on a secret."

I solemnly gave my promise.

"I don't know if you still remember an incident that occurred ten years ago," Dr. Matthews began. "An overseas Chinese engineer named Hu Mingli achieved wide recognition by inventing a new kind of laser range-finder. Just as the government of his country was going to award him a prize, he got into a fight with the governmental authorities over the actual application of his new invention. After that, the engineer suddenly disappeared. I am—"

"You are the engineer Hu Mingli?" I exclaimed.

Yes, although I was only a high school student ten years ago, I could still remember the controversial news about the famous engineer Hu Mingli. This news had given rise to various conjectures in journalistic circles. I never thought I would bump into this person here.

"Yes, I am that unfortunate person!" said Dr. Matthews, a forced smile again appearing on his face. It was the smile of a person who had been through a lot.

He then told me the story of the earlier half of his life in a low but impassioned tone.

Matthews was born into the family of a Chinese emigrant who had settled in Japan. In primary school, one of his teachers was a crippled soldier who had served in the Second World War. Everyone else in his family was killed by the atomic bomb thrown in Hiroshima. He himself had barely escaped from the battlefield, and though he was still alive, he had only one arm. Because of this, he was deeply opposed to war and constantly taught his students the ruthlessness it fostered. This education left a deep impression on young Matthews.

When Matthews graduated from high school, he left Japan for another country to study crystallophysics. He exhibited great talent in his research on laser, and after graduation he was immediately hired to work in a research organization, where he also achieved outstanding results. In fact, before he invented the laser range-finder, he had already invented several other things.

By that time Matthews was already a middle-aged man. The words of the primary school teacher were still deeply embedded in his mind. He hated war just as before. He did not concern himself with politics, or the direct results of his inventions. He thought he was conducting lofty scientific experiments for the benefit of mankind. That was all. An affluent life made him all the more oblivious to the activities of the outside world.

When the trial manufacture of the laser range-finder proved successful, the government of his country, as an incentive for him to work harder, decided to honor him publicly. Then, his superiors let him read some memoranda of the national defense ministry. One of these memoranda pointed out the possibility of using his laser range-finder as a bomb-release control on aircraft., or as a sighting device on tanks. Other memoranda mentioned other inventions of his, which had already been used for military purposes and obtained very good results.

So, that was it! They respected him and employed him only because the fruits of his work could all be used towards war.

Hu Mingli could not have felt more terrified even if the bomb had exploded right in front of him. He could not see straight nor utter a word. When he recovered his strength, he roared and protested. He said that he had been deceived, and demanded that the government apologize to him and destroy all military weapons which contained his inventions. He hurried to the capital and called upon various departments and offices, repeating excitedly the lesson taught him by his primary school teacher many years ago. At first, there were a few people who listened, but later, they became impatient. They started to avoid him on various pretexts. When he visited the national defense ministry for the last time and found that the persons receiving him were not the officers originally designated, but some doctors from a psychiatric hospital, he felt deeply insulted. After that he gave up the intention of discussing the question with these people.

But what should he do instead? Some newspapers had already published reports describing him as a psychologically disturbed person, a psychiatric patient. They did their utmost to ridicule him, and he was greatly infuriated. He personally received several groups of reporters and tried to explain the truth about the matter, but his words were so cleverly distorted that readers had more reason to believe the rumors. Although Hu Mingli was a specialist in laser, he was very immature in social matters. He took public opinion too seriously, and eventually the attacks made against him caused him to hate the world at large. He no longer felt like living in this society; he wanted to find a Utopia where he could forget all the ugly things in the utilitarian world.

Just as he was in the depths of depression and confusion, a friend of his named Blain came from Europe specially to console him. Blain was so good to him that he felt quite comforted. Blain used to be his college classmate. He was now assistant manager of the European Rofiel Electronics Company, a very large enterprise which had joint-stock companies in several countries.

Blain sympathized with Hu Mingli and respected his lofty ideals. He bitterly denounced the corrupt society; its leaders, he said, were a gang of war-mongers. He described himself also as a pacifist. It was for this reason that he participated in the work of the Rofiel Company which was a purely private concern with no governmental connections. The company's objective was not profit but the benefit of mankind and world peace. Finally, he proposed that Hu Mingli join the Rofiel Company in the noble cause of saving mankind. Hu Mingli was, in the end, lured into the network by Blain's sweet words.

"To respect other people's ideals," he said, "is the object of the Rofiel Company. If you are willing to join us, we can establish your laboratory in a secluded place, free of intervention from the outside world."

Hu Mingli agreed to his proposal. Thus, through Blain's discrete arrangements, Hu Mingli disappeared from society. Six months later, the Rofiel Company bought a nameless coral island in the Pacific Ocean and constructed a power station and a fully-equipped laboratory. Hu Mingli, assuming the alias of Matthews, secretly came to this island. At first, there were only two people on the island; Matthews and Amang. Later, Matthews let the son of an old friend of his, Joseph Luo join them and become his assistant.

Ten years had elapsed. Blain, for his part, kept his word. Apart from sea-planes regularly sending Matthews daily necessities, no one came to disturb his peace and quiet. The Rofiel Company had not demanded anything from him, aside from his self-designated research.

When Matthews finished his account, for a while I did not say a word. The name of the Rofiel Company was not new to me; it recently appeared in the news. Finally I remembered the contents of the article. It cited a good deal of data to prove that the Rofiel Company was a trans-national corporation which received a large amount of capital from that certain Power, and therefore was subject to its control.

As I had only just met Matthews, I could not be too blunt with him. So I merely suggested to him tactfully: "Dr. Matthews, have you investigated into the political background of the Rofiel Company? The newspapers have recently reported that it has connections with a certain power." Matthews replied angrily:

"I never read the papers. If the papers have so reported, it must be pure rumor. I believe Blain's words."

I could not go on with what I wished to say and so changed the subject.

"Dr. Matthews," I asked, "the Rofiel Company has spent so much money on you. Don't you think it wants to get something in return?"

"It certainly does," replied Matthews. "During this time I have made some small inventions which are all to be used for peaceful purposes. The company has obtained patent rights for them. From the viewpoint of business, it has not lost money."

I fell into silence, considering how to express my ideas next. As a person born in a capitalist society, I could appreciate the torment and pain suffered by such a righteous soul as Dr. Matthews. He was a lonely man cheated and oppressed by an unreasonable society. He could not find a proper road, and could only hope to escape from the realities of life like the religious hermits of old, by staying on the wide expanses of the Pacific Ocean. But can anyone escape from real life?

"Dr. Matthews," I could only say as mildly as possible, "war is a social phenomenon, and the cause of this phenomenon is the social system which permits one class of people to exploit another. Therefore, we must distinguish wars specifically. There are just wars and unjust wars. Moreover, in order to eliminate all wars eventually, we must, first of all, change the existing unreasonable society through revolutionary war. To abhor all wars without any distinction is not a proper way to solve the question."

"How complicated a question you have posed!" Dr. Matthews said, staring at me naïvely. "I don't understand your reasoning, and I don't want to understand. I only wish to use my remaining years to do some work for the benefit of mankind."

Looking at his honest face, I was filled with mixed feelings. I myself did not know whether I pitied, sympathized with, or worried for him. From his brief account, I instinctively felt that the matter just could not be as simple as be thought, nor Blain as good as he described. There must be something fishy going on. Unfortunately 1 could not tell exactly what was fishy: and moreover had no way of making Matthews believe me. A scientist like him usually judges right from wrong according to the rules of natural science. He believed only in facts, not in words.

Anyhow, I thought, I was obligated to warn him. Therefore 1 said:

“I don't think I need to point out to you, as a scientist, that it is very difficult to decide beforehand whether a certain scientific theory or instrument will be used for war or for peace. How can you be sure that your inventions, through resale by the Rofiel Company, will not .be used directly or indirectly towards war?”

“Blain has promised me that they will not,” said Matthews quite confidently. “The products of the Rofiel Company are principally for civil use. Even though it has entered into contracts with a few countries, they will only use my inventions to manufacture defense equipment for safeguarding peace.”

“Defense equipment for safeguarding peace?” This was indeed a play on words. I could not help asking: “Are not such tools military weapons?”

“Mmmm, yes,” Matthews replied unwillingly.

“To safeguard peace with military weapons? Isn’t this contradicting your attitude of opposing all military arms?”

Dr. Matthews knitted his brows and considered the question for a while. Finally, he shook his head and said:

“I have no way of debating with you. Years ago, a reporter said that I was deficient and childish in this respect; it appears that he was right.”

“Doctor,” I said, “please excuse my frankness/”

Dr. Matthews waved his hand and said, “You don't have to apologize. The language of science is always straightforward.”

I attempted to branch off from the subject of our talk.

“Dr. Matthews, was the weapon you used to kill the shark the other day a new kind of laser?”

He appeared to be hurt again by my words.

“Weapon? There are no weapons on this small island!” He stood up and said, “Why don’t you rest up for a few days. Soon Blain and Joseph Luo will come. You can leave here on their plane.”

As he left me, I noticed that his shoulders sagged slightly, and his steps were quite heavy.

*

Thus I began my monotonous life on this lonely island. Dr, Matthews was very busy; he shut himself up the whole day in his laboratory. According to what he told me, one of his inventions was near the trial stage. It was evident to me that our last conversation had left a deep impression on him. Since then, the few times we met, he was unwilling to discuss political questions with me. As to Amang, he looked after our needs during the day; in the evenings, he sat on reefs and played ancient, melancholy tunes on his flute. The sound of his flute reminded me of the silvery beaches under the moonlight, the palm-trees swaying in the gentle breeze and the white sails floating on the rippling waves. I knew that it was a lonesome soul baring his love for his motherland. It appeared that under the cold and indifferent exterior of this man, there was a burning heart.

In Dr. Matthews’ study, there was a fully stocked medicine cabinet. After two or three days’ treatment, the slight wounds were practically healed. But every time I went in to get some medicine, I was astonished by the massive quantity and superior quality of the equipment supplied to Dr. Matthews by the Rofiel Company. Apart from numerous books, there was a computer data bank which can be found only in large research organizations. All technical information from published sources—newspapers, journals, books—anywhere in the world was automatically monitored and deposited in the memory system of the computer. With the press of a button, whatever data or diagrams needed by the user immediately appeared on the fluorescent screen. So although Dr. Matthews was secluded on a deserted island, he was still in touch with the scientific circles of the whole world, and could at all times feel the pulse of scientific development. It was no wonder that his research work was continually making progress.

In an obscure bay on the back of the island, a motorboat of Dr. Matthews’ was docked. When I had nothing to do, I took this small boat out, to fish at sea. Beside the coral reefs, I had several times discovered sharks. This reminded me of the danger I encountered the other day. Common sense told me the shark was killed by a laser. But what kind of laser machine could produce so powerful a ray?

One afternoon, when I woke up from my noon nap, I heard someone knocking at the door. It was Dr. Matthews. He was still wearing his white lab coat. A pair of green sunglasses were pushed up to his forehead. He looked tired and excited. I could tell his latest research was fruitful. He was now immersed in the happiness of victory, and all happiness must be shared with\fn{The text has: by.} someone.

We sat down and started chatting. Matthews did not talk about his work, but only recounted some anecdotes about his many years in the laboratory. He had a good memory and a vivid way of description, so that I was quite enthralled. It appeared that he was trying to rest his brain through idle chatter.

Amang brought us our afternoon tea. Today he placed on the tray a birthday cake with cream frosting and ten iced candles. Next to that was a bottle of wine.

"Is it your birthday today?" I asked.

"Oh, no," Dr. Matthews said smiling. He stood up to shake hands with Amang. "Amang is very kind to me. Whenever I have completed a new invention, he always prepares a birthday cake. Today I have finished my tenth invention since coming to this island."

Dr. Matthews poured three cups of wine; he gave me one and another to Amang.

"Dear Amang, we two have depended on each other for everything. That means you have a share of labor in all my inventions too. Today, before my guest, I wish to express to you my gratitude."

We drank our wine. From Amang's very expressive eyes, I could discern his respect and love for Matthews. He folded his hands across his chest, bowed very low and then retired. We continued our conversation. When Matthews told me about an accident whereby radioactive elements escaped from the laboratory, I pointed to the dosage meter on the wall and said jokingly:

"Is this precautionary equipment the result of your having learned a lesson from that accident?"

Matthews laughed, saying: "There is no such equipment in my bedroom, but Joseph Luo is a bit nervous. Wait a minute." He stopped in mid-sentence, and walked quickly towards the dosage meter. I followed him and found that the intensity of radiation in the room was slightly greater than usual. I had not noticed, but it did not escape Dr. Matthews' sharp observation.

"You don't have any radioactive items, do you?" he asked doubtfully.

I remembered the high-voltage atomic battery under my bed. By then I had had a certain degree of rapport with Matthews. I therefore took out the battery and showed it to him. I told him that it was an invention of a teacher of mine which he had entrusted to me.

Dr. Matthews inspected the battery very carefully and asked me questions about its construction. He evaluated Professor Zhao Qian's invention and said with regret:

"If this battery could be connected with my laser tunneling machine, it would at once usher in a new era to all mining, tunnel construction and underground engineering work. How much benefit would it bring to all mankind!"

"What is the laser tunneling machine?" I asked.

Dr. Matthews looked at me stunned; he knew that he had made an indiscreet remark. But he was a man incapable of telling a lie. After a moment's consideration he told me resolutely: "It is my latest invention. If you're interested, I can let you have a look."

I knew that the riddle which was troubling me in the last several days would soon be solved. I :was of course very interested.

Dr. Matthews cheerfully took me into the laboratory. Here, apart from the oscillator, oscilloscope and calculator which are found in most laboratories, the most noteworthy thing was a semicircular operating platform in the center of the room; a milk-white fluorescent screen occupied the greater part of the platform, beneath which were several rows of meters, indicator lamps and buttons. From the ceiling immediately in front of the operating platform hung part of an instrument like a periscope, the other end of which was evidently placed upon the roof. On the stainless steel rack beside the operating platform was a laser machine. Dr, Matthews led me to this instrument, opened its cover and began to explain.

This was a new variety of the solid continuous laser But its working material was not the usual crystalline matte, or glass, but a new kind of plastic. Matthews had made many advancements in the part of the optical resonant cavity, so that the energy sent out was several grades stronger than the usual laser. Moreover, he had also solved the question of focusing high-potential light beams, and increasing transmission distance several times over.

"I planned this instrument for use by the mining industry and have therefore called it a tunneling machine," said Matthews. "All hard metals and rocks will directly gasify with the application of this laser. Henceforth, drilling rocks will be as easy as cutting cream with a knife. But this one can only transform, transmit and concentrate energy; it can't create energy. Therefore, in its actual application it must have a high-voltage power source and must be connected with heavy and cumbersome auxiliary equipment. Now, with your high-voltage atomic battery, this problem is solved."

"You killed the shark with this laser, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"You were on the beach then?"

Matthews walked to the operating platform, pressed the button and said, "I was sitting right here." The large fluorescent screen began to shed light, I suddenly found myself transposed to a coral reef. The sea was above my feet, I was surrounded by protruding reef rocks. I automatically dodged to avoid my clothes from getting wet by the sea waves, but then I realized I was still in the laboratory, except that there was a lifelike scene of a sea coast before me. I knew then it was a laser holographic TV.

Matthews smiled and said: "It is another invention of mine. That day, when I was working on my experiment, I saw you struggling at sea. A little while later, I saw that you were in great danger. As the situation was quite urgent, I could only kill the shark with my laser."

"How did you project the laser?"

Matthews pointed to the instrument that looked like a periscope: "By means of this refraction system I can accurately project the laser beam to any place on the sea surrounding this island."

"How do we communicate with the laser?"

"That's even more simple. I have installed on this island a sound reception and transmission system."

Looking at this new laser machine, I recalled an old story. More than two thousand years ago, when a Roman fleet threatened to attack the city of Athens in Greece, a Greek scientist, Archimedes, tried to converge the sun's rays by means of many hexagonal mirrors made with brass pieces to burn and destroy the enemy's fleet. Who would think that such a device fancied by Archimedes had now become a reality?

"Archimedes' dream!" I could not help exclaiming.

"No, it isn't a dream of Archimedes." Matthews undoubtedly knew this ancient story very well. "What Archimedes fancied then was a homicidal heat-ray weapon, but what I have invented is a tool for the benefit of mankind."

"Dr. Matthews," I said, "I have no intention of persuading you to convert your laser into a military weapon, but I cannot agree with you regarding your attitude towards military weapons. For instance, don't you think your saving me from the mouth of a shark was a humanitarian act?"

"It … certainly was," Matthews said hesitatingly.

"If you hadn't used your laser as an offensive weapon, would you have been able to save me?"

Matthews did not answer.

"This will show that the question is not whether not military weapons are forces of evil in themselves, but who has control of such weapons and for what purpose they are used. Isn't that right?"

Matthews shook his head and said: "Anyhow, men are not sharks. I can use my laser to kill sharks, but not men. Without my invention, there are already enough homicidal weapons in this world."

I said regretfully: "Doctor, there will ultimately be a day when you will know that there is great difference between your good intentions and reality."

"You're probably right. But I'm already old, and it's too late for me to change my way of life," Matthews said somewhat sadly. "But during the last ten years, I believe I have done something to elevate the life of mankind. I have improved the laser scalpel, invented a laser wielding instrument, and in respect to space discharge I have also done some research."

"Space discharge?" A thought suddenly occurred to me.

"That is a by-product of my research into long-range radio transmission. I have invented a high-power micro-wave oscillator, which can produce a very narrow beam of radio waves; with it I can create electric sparks on objects a great distance off. I haven't found any practical use for it, but the Rofiel Company is very much interested in this invention of mine."

"Good heavens!" I exclaimed involuntarily. "My plane, Morning Star, was brought down by just such an electric spark."

"What is the Morning Star plane?" Matthews stared at me. "You are not …"

Only until then I revealed to him my real identity. I told him about Professor Zhao Qian's misfortune and his behest; I spoke about the police officer's conjecture and the accident befalling Morning Star. Dr. Matthews asked me specifically at what height I was flying, the weather conditions and the location of the electric shock. I answered all these questions. Finally I added:

"At the time of the accident there was only a fleet of that certain power on the nearby ocean. After the accident, helicopters were sent out from the fleet to search for me. Considering the report about the special relation between the Rofiel Company and that country, I think there must be a great deal behind all this."

"No, it's impossible!" Matthews said and, staggering across the room, sat down dejectedly in a chair. I found that his face suddenly turned pale, and with obvious pain he pressed his breast with his hand. I was frightened.

"How do you feel?" I asked.

“Heart disease. Nothing serious, I’ve had it for years,” Matthews said in a low voice. “I have a drug in the medicine cabinet in my study. Please ask Amang to give me an injection of it.”

If I had known his physical condition beforehand, I would not have spoken to him so bluntly. I regretted it very much. Yet, when Amang had given him an injection and helped him return to his bedroom to rest, I still thought it necessary to ask him an important question:

“Doctor, does Blain know that the laser tunneling machine has been completed?”

“He knows only that I’m planning it, but doesn’t know that I have completed a sample machine.”

“What about Joseph Luo?” Matthews thought for a moment and said:

“In the last two months, I have been the only one working on the final stages of the project.”

“Then, before the facts about this matter are clearly known, can you prevent them from seeing this machine?”

“Yes, that can be done!” Matthews replied readily. “We can take it to my bedroom tomorrow. But it is very heavy. Amang and I aren’t strong enough to move it ourselves. You must also give a hand.”

*

During the next few days Matthews treated me very kindly. He frequently asked me about developments on our motherland. I found in our conversation that he was surprisingly ignorant of the outside world. Although he had within his reach advanced instruments of communication, he was not interested in anything unrelated to technical information. He seemed to have built an invisible wall completely separating him and the small island named after him from the rest of society. I recognized then the deceit behind Blain’s plans. He induced the pessimistic, world-weary side in Matthews’ character and helped him realize his ideals with a view to molding him into a simple tool of science, to serve their unspeakable objective.

One evening, Matthews and I were sitting in the patio enjoying the breeze and, appreciating the glory of the setting sun on the Pacific Ocean. As we were deep in conversation, the contours of a warship appeared on the distant horizon.

The vessel steered directly towards our island and cast anchor two kilometers off the coast. I found that it was a P class guided-missile destroyer belonging to the fleet of that certain big power that had been maneuvering recently in this part of the ocean. Matthews took up his binoculars, and saw on the warship the flag of that big power. He knitted his brow and said:

“A warship! What do warships come here for?”

A thought occurred to me.

“Doctor Matthews,” I said. “can it be that Blain and Joseph Luo are coming here?”

Matthews shook his head and replied: “Not likely. Why would they come on a foreign warship?”

I still insisted: “Whatever happens, you must not reveal my identity to anyone!”

“Of course I won’t.”

We saw a helicopter rise from the warship. Some people were obviously coming to visit this small island. I believed my words had had an effect on Matthews, and he had no doubt given consideration to a lot of questions, for he suddenly turned to me and told me to take the high-voltage atomic battery with me and hide myself in his bedroom, not to come out until he said so. I complied, but in my hiding place I could still see through the glass window everything that happened outside.

The helicopter landed beside the lake. When the cabin door opened, the first person that came down was a young man in a patterned shirt. I had seen his photo often on the desk of his room, and could tell at a glance that he was none other than Joseph Luo. The next person that made his appearance was a tall slender European, wearing a pair of gold-rimmed spectacles, with a refined, smiling face and a Slavic bearing in his movements. He must be Blain. Unexpectedly, from the helicopter there also emerged a navy officer and six sailors. What in the world did they come for?

The group came slowly towards us. The setting sun cast lengthy shadows in front of these people. A tense atmosphere pervaded this small, quiet island.

Matthews received Blain and the two other people in his study. The six sailors stood woodenly outside the door. I walked stealthily to the door leading to the study and peeked outside through a crack in the door.

“Please allow me to make introductions,” said Blain, pointing to Dr. Matthews and the navy officer. "This is the well-known Dr. Matthews. This is Captain Sapunov.”

Sapunov was a tall and stout person, wearing a white, well-starched navy uniform. He looked quite like a polar bear. Although he was full of smiles, they did not cover his overbearing manner. He very politely shook hands with Matthews and said in fluent English:

“Very much honored to meet you.”

“Please take your seats!” Matthews said coldly.

“Old friend, we haven’t met for a year; I think of you often!” Blain said affectionately. “You don’t look so well. Are you working too hard?”

“Teacher, you really must get some rest,” Joseph Luo interrupted. “The vacation Mr. Blain arranged for me was a first-rate one. I visited the night clubs of Tokyo, the bathing beaches of Honolulu, and the gambling houses of Monte Carlo. Now that’s living!”

“Vacation, that’s a thing for young people,” said Matthews. “How is it you’ve come on a warship?”

Blain laughed and said: “That's purely a coincidence. There’s an instrument in Captain Sapunov’s warship produced by our company, so he asked us to give it a trial run.”

“Isn’t it a space discharge instrument?” Matthews was still quite composed in his manner, but his voice belied anxiety. I began to feel worried for him.

Silence. Joseph Luo shifted uncomfortably in his chair.

“What space discharge instrument?” Blain asked with feigned ignorance.

“The kind of instrument that brought down the Morning Star!”

Matthews once said to me that the language of science was always straightforward. He never beat about the bush. In this case, his tactless move produced an unexpected result. Blain, not knowing Matthews had discovered their secret, was left speechless for at least ten seconds.

Sapunov knew it was now useless to deny it. He cleared his throat and replied on behalf of Blain:

“Doctor, we have contracted with the Rofiel Company for various instruments, among which there may have been some made according to your inventions.”

Matthews still stared at Blain: “Then, what about your promise to me?”

Blain defended himself in a hurry:

“These instruments are all tools for defense, they are not military weapons. Their manufacture does not conflict with our objective of preserving peace.”

Matthews did not pursue this question any further, but said in a feeble voice: “Let’s talk about the Morning Star. I’m only interested in technical questions.”

“That’s right!” Captain Sapunov exclaimed joyfully. “You are truly a great scientist! Ten days ago, a drug dealer, having committed a crime in our country, hijacked a plane and attempted to escape. My warship was just cruising in these quarters, and was therefore ordered to shoot it down with the ‘blaze of the God of Death’.”

“‘Blaze of the God of Death.’ What's that?” Matthews asked.

Blain explained: “It’s a defense tool made according to your principle of long-range discharge. But recent experience tells us that this weapon—I mean, this tool—doesn’t have much prospect. It’s very difficult to aim, easily interfered with, and its force is not as great as was expected. So, we intend to supply Captain Sapunov with other defense equipment. This is the reason for our calling on you, old friend.”

“What do you want me to do?” Matthews said, still feigning a matter-of-fact attitude. It was already dark. Matthews turned on the desk lamp and readjusted the lamp shade so that the light was directed away from his own face.

“We know that plans for your high-powered laser have been completed. The company is prepared to manufacture it. We’re now constructing for you an even more sophisticated laboratory in the mountains of Europe, and we hope you will take it over.”

Matthews lowered his head and said nothing. I knew that he felt regret and sorrow. Only now had he realized Blain’s true colors, that he had again been deceived for ten years. What he took to be virtue, friendship and reliability had now all of a sudden fallen to pieces, like a tower built of sand.

Blain had underestimated Matthews’ ability to distinguish right from wrong. His dallying with Matthews during the ten years had made him intoxicated with his own success. Now he misinterpreted Matthews’ silence as acquiescence. He was therefore overjoyed.

“I’m very glad,” he said, “that we have reached a new understanding. Mr. Joseph Luo has expressed his willingness to further cooperate with us. He has promised to hand over the technical data in connection with the plans of the high-power laser.”

On hearing Blain's words, Matthews angrily stared at Joseph Luo. He stood up, trembling all over with rage and spoke in a hoarse, vehement voice:

“You gang of robbers! You speak the nicest words and then do all the damnedest things in the world! Maybe you can deceive me, but you can’t deceive thousands upon thousands of other people! I’ve not realized until today that you are all beasts. It’s already too late. But as long as I’m still alive, I won’t let you take away my laser!”

Joseph Luo hurried to his side to support him.

"Teacher," he said, "don't be angry. Science is merchandise. We're not responsible for what other people do with our products."

Matthews pushed him away angrily:

"You are really vulgar. You've stained the honor of science! How much have they paid for your soul?"

Joseph Luo lowered his head, ashamedly turned away and dared not look directly at Matthews' fiery eyes again. Blain and Sapunov exchanged glances. Sapunov took a whistle and blew it once. Six sailors instantly appeared at the doorway. Blain said with a mild and even sweet voice:

"Old friend, don't misunderstand us. Everything we are doing is the interest of your sacred work, in the interest of the lofty cause of peace. We're now no longer sure about the security of this small island, and have therefore decided to blow it up. You'd better gather up your things and go away with us."

Matthews glanced over the gloomy faces of the navy soldiers and knew that they were about to kidnap him by force. He was infuriated, panting with great effort and crying in a deep voice:

"How vicious you are!"

He wanted to say more, but his feeble heart could no longer persist. He staggered back, stared fiercely at the enemy with eyes full of hatred and enmity, so that even the crafty old scoundrel Blain and the imperious and self-confident Sapunov felt terrified. In deathly silence, Matthews fell heavily to the ground.

Sapunov was the first to act calmly. He bent over Matthews to examine him, took out a white handkerchief, wiped his hands and said indifferently:

"He's gone!"

Having witnessed this tragedy, I felt my blood boiling, my guts torn. I clutched the door knob, and was about to rush out of the room to take revenge for Dr. Matthews but Sapunov's words froze me into composure.

"It's a pity," he said to Blain, "that we haven't got the high-voltage atomic battery. Otherwise, we would waste no time in turning his laser tunneling machine instantly into a death ray weapon."

Now I finally knew the cause and effect of this case: from the assassination of Professor Zhao Qian to the death of Dr. Matthews, these were all part and parcel of a master plot of that country to manufacture the death ray weapon. With the help of Joseph Luo, they could take possession of the plans of the laser, but they did not know Matthews had already produced a sample, much less that the high-voltage atomic battery was just in this room. If I rushed out to argue with them, I might lose my own life, which in itself was not too serious but might lead to their possession of two important products—that would be too great a loss. Therefore, I did my best to control myself and refrained from taking any action.

In my excitement, I unintentionally made some noise. Blain, who was standing nearest the bedroom door, suddenly took a watchful look and walked my way. I was so excited that I perspired all over and my heart jumped. I looked desperately around the room, trying to find something to defend myself with, but there was not even a wooden stick. How I wished I had a bomb with which I could end my life along with that of the precious laser and atomic battery and this gang of vicious animals!

Blain's hand was already on the door knob. He was now separated from me by only a few feet. I lowered myself slightly; all the muscles in my body were taut. I was determined to struggle with him to the bitter end. Just at this crucial moment, someone screamed causing Blain to turn around. It was Amang. He was bringing in a plateful of glasses and a bottle of wine when he saw his master lying motionless on the ground. He uttered from the depth of his throat an extremely sad cry that could only be made by a mute person. He pounced fearlessly on Blain and struck him down with one blow. Only then did the sailors became alert, and rushed to grab Amang and tie him up.

Joseph Luo stepped forward and helped Blain up. Half of his face was swollen and his mouth was bleeding. It appeared that this was the first time he had suffered a beating.

"Where are the blueprints?" he asked roughly.

"In … in the safe in the laboratory," Joseph Luo timidly replied.

At this time a sailor came and reported that he had just received a call from the warship saying that there was a new emergency and asking them to leave the island as soon as possible. On hearing this, Sapunov at once said to Joseph Luo:

"Go and get them, quick!" Then, pointing to Amang, he ordered a sailor: "Do away with this fellow! Set the explosives at once, and let the time bomb go off in one hour!"

Joseph Luo pointed to Matthews on the ground and asked: "How about him?"

Sapunov grinned. "What we are setting is a nuclear explosive device. It'll remove Dr. Matthews' island from the map forever. The blaze of atomic explosion will give him a grand burial ceremony and the depth of the sea will be his final tomb."

The sailors dragged Amang out of the room. A moment later, an ear-splitting sound of a gunshot announced the end of this faithful servant.

Hearing the gunshot, Joseph Luo shivered and walked away with bowed head as if he had just been punished. Blain partially covered his face with a handkerchief, sat down on a chair, spat angrily on the ground and exclaimed: "What damned luck!"

Sapunov walked over, patted him on the shoulder, laughed self-complacently and said:

"I say, Ivan," (this must be his real name) "you've done a pretty good job! You possess the spirit of a politician and the shrewdness of a capitalist! The seeds you sowed ten years ago have now yielded magnificent fruit! When we've succeeded in manufacturing the death ray weapon, we'll be able to shoot down the satellites, guided missiles and aircraft of our enemies and destroy their warships and tanks, easily and whenever we like. We'd then be not only masters of the whole earth but also masters of the universe! We shall prove that we are the honorable descendants of our great forefathers! Now, get up, let's go examine the laboratory. Don't leave a thing behind."

Blain stood up and followed Sapunov out to the laboratory.

I could not wait any longer. I left at once and carried Matthews into the bedroom where I placed him on the bed. I discovered that he had not stopped breathing; his heart was still beating feebly. I took out his medicine from the cabinet and gave him an injection. I was then both sad and angry; my attention was completely centered on rescuing the patient and I temporarily forgot the imminent danger we were in.

I heard Sapunov and his subordinates leave the laboratory and knew that they had obtained the blueprints. Then all the lights on the island were extinguished, which meant that the power station had been destroyed. A helicopter took off. They had left this condemned small island.

Bright moonlight shone in from the window. Quietness reigned all around us. Somewhere on this island, a timepiece was ticking, calculating the minutes and seconds when the explosion was to take place. In the bay, a small motorboat was afloat; it could still take me to safety. But I could not leave the helpless patient. To move him at this time would accelerate his death! I could only sit silently by his bedside, waiting for the arrival of the last moment. There was no fear in my heart, only deep regret. I was not able to see my great motherland, nor fulfill the behest of Professor Zhao.

Suddenly Matthews moaned and opened his eyes. He looked at me and tightly held my hand. His eyes were filled with tears. For a long time he could not say a word.

"Have they gone?" he asked tiredly at last.

I nodded my head.

"The blueprints?"

I again nodded painfully.

"Has the warship taken off?"

"Not yet."

Suddenly Matthews opened wide his eyes. He struggled to sit up, and with a superhuman effort, pointed to the laser in the corner of the room and said:

"Quick, push it towards the window!"

"Doctor, you shouldn't get any more excited," I said anxiously: "It could be a matter of life and death for you!"

"It's not a question of life and death for me alone," said Matthews panting, "but should they succeed in taking away the blueprints, it would be a question of life and death for thousands upon thousands of people!"

I could no longer disobey him. Three days earlier, Dr. Matthews, Amang and I had dismantled the laser and with all our might moved it part by part into the bedroom. Now, with energy born of anger, I alone pushed it towards the window.

I helped Matthews to the laser. He skillfully connected it with the nigh-voltage atomic battery and adjusted its strength to the maximum point. Under the strong electric current, the laser shot out a still brighter red light. Like a sharp sword of revenge, the laser ray pierced the silent night sky.

In the distant sea, the warship had weighed anchor and started to sail. Her outline began to disappear from the misty water surface. But the deadly laser beam was already following her. She had no way to escape from her fate of destruction.

At the first sweep of the laser beam, a row of coconut trees along the bank of the reef lake were cut in half and fell at once. Then Dr. Matthews tried a second time, but his hand trembled, so the beam touched the sea surface, and the water waves exploded, producing a mass of cloudy vapor which blocked out the moonlight. The third time

Matthews succeeded in pointing the beam at the warship. I saw a bright flash of light followed by a very violent explosion. The naval vessel began to sink in the midst of dense smoke and raging fire.

Matthews 1et go of the button, his body leaning to one side. I hurried to support him. This act of revenge had exhausted the last iota of his strength. His breath became more and more feeble. His pulse was almost imperceptible. Under the moonlight, his face was as pale as a piece of white paper. His lips trembled; he was trying hard to tell me—and all the people to come—the many things that filled his heart.

"Now I see," he said slowly. "If we didn't kill this shoal of sharks, there would, be no justice, no peace in this world."

He wished to say more, but death was already upon him. I saw his head suddenly drop down on his breast …

Within a period of half a month, I had personally witnessed the death of two scientists!

With tears in my eyes, I laid him down on the bed, and covered him with a white blanket. Then I remembered that I myself probably had ten to twenty minutes to escape death. I took up the high-voltage atomic battery and ran as fast as I could towards bay. The laser was too heavy. I had no way to bring it with me.

The motor-boat was still moored off the bank of the bay. I jumped into it, untied the cable, started the motor and steered the boat at top speed further out towards sea. The motor-boat roared and glided away, leaving a long trail of white foam behind her.

When I was four or five kilometers away from the coral island, I heard an earthshaking explosion behind me. The waves almost caused my small boat to stand up. I did my best to maintain its balance. When I turned back my head, I saw a white water column rise from the sea and shoot high into the sky. It was topped by a cap of black mushroom clouds formed by dense smoke. A moment later, the water column broke down, the smoke dispersed, and the wave of spray was scattered like rain. At last, the boiling sea became calm again, and there was only a bright round moon shining on the boundless ocean. The tragic Dr. Matthews' island was thus forever removed from the world. I steered the small motor-boat quickly in the direction of my motherland. My mind was full of hatred, but it was also full of confidence. I was prepared to begin my new life of struggle for the cause.

111.33 Excerpt from Wu Sang Fights The Tiger: A Folktale\fn{by Li Xintang (1935-   )} Yangzhou, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 2

… When\fn{This story, of which this is only a small potion, takes place during in the year 1119AD. Another segment is told by Wang Xiaotang (1918-   ).} the God-blessed Second Brother from Guankou, Wu Song, had received news from his elder brother, he bade farewell to his lord, and went off to Yanggu District in Shandong to find his brother. He had been on the road for more than a day, today he had reached the boundary of Yanggu District in Shandong. There was still more than twenty li to the city. It was in the middle of the tenth month, and the sun was slanting steeply towards the west. Our hero felt hungry and wanted to take a rest.

The moment he looked up, he saw in front of him a pitch-black and dead-dark town. As he came nearer he saw the wall piled up with flat bricks all the way to the roof and in the middle the round city gate. Above it there was a whitewashed stone with three red characters: Jingyang town.

Our hero shouldered his yellow bundle, lifted his staff with his right hand, and marched with big strides into the town. Who would imagine that when our hero came to this town he would begin drinking wine? He noticed a wine-banner hanging at the doorway of the inn, but he did not understand the meaning of the name of the wine, written on the wine-banner:

"Three bowls and you cannot cross the ridge."

This name had been made up by one of the former innkeepers. In general, a good wine, a good first-brew of gaoliang, would get a name like "The paralyzing spear" or "A gust of wind and you collapse" or "You will collapse and have to pay your bill." Well, this was called "Three bowls and you cannot cross the ridge," because the innkeeper wanted a name that sounded a little nicer. So when you entered this inn and lifted the wine mug to pour yourself a cup of wine, sh-sh-sh-sh, oh, my, what a good wine!

Well, it is not up to us lousy drinkers to gather this. But those who are good at drinking, they get it the moment they see it. When a good drinker sees this wine, what does it mean? The color is special! What color? "Dark green as phoenix tree, bubbling 'flowers' clinging to the edge, the fragrance attacking the nostrils"—that means a pure green color! And it keeps bubbling all the time.

Before when one wanted to buy some wine, the wine was measured in a can, for example one measure of wine; just like when we went to buy wine as children, if the wine did not bubble "flowers," he would plunge the can fast into the wine: "Plong!," down it went, and this foam was called "wine flowers." Actually this kind\fn{Of "flowers."} would disappear with one blow of the wind. But when you poured a cup of good wine, one "flower" would follow after another, one succeeding another, one after another, real "wine flowers" all the time.

"Wine flower" means a small bubble. Wine flowers beside one another all over the place. As soon as one who is fond of drinking sees this he knows: this is a good wine! This is one aspect.

Then there is also another aspect. This wine—Wu Song did not only see the wine flowers, but its flavor also assailed his nostrils. Oh, how good it smelled! It is not the perfume that our female comrades put on their face, so that nobody will notice a bad smell. Whenever they pass by, it smells awfully good. If we have not had the chance to smell it, we may feel a little disappointed. No, this was something different! It pierced the seven apertures. If you had a cold, you just had to smell it, and your nose would be cleared. When Wu Song who was so fond of drinking saw this wine, what do you think? Oh, my!

"Three mouths' smell!"

"Three mouths' smell," what does that mean? First it smelled, when he inhaled into his nose. Then, sup, it smelled when he took a sip into his mouth. Well, in former times, talking about those three bowls, that was in "square mouth" style so when we tell from the old books, what's the sense of using both hands? The wine cups were not so small, they were big: three cups equaled one wine mug, you had to lift them up with both hands, in this way: [informant demonstrates].

Who would imagine that when Wu Song began drinking, it was not like us, please have a drink, please, please, please have a drink, sup, we drink just a little, if we visit other people and eat together, I don't mean drink wine, but if we gulp down all the food, and eat their food all up!

Now Wu Song was a real drinker. When he wanted to drink, he lifted the cup [like this], and: quaff! If you turned his cup round, not one drop of wine was left. That is what is understood by a good drinker! People like us who are not able to drink like this, if we down a cup, quaff, off we go! Why? We tumble round this way. Well, that's a joke!

But as for Wu Song, that was real. When he downed this cup, it smelled good. That was the second "smell," the smell of taking the wine into his mouth.

But there should be ":three smells," oh, I forgot, what do you think the third smell is?

"Hiccup"—after drinking to his heart's content, he would hiccup and that would smell too! Not only he himself would feel it, but people around would also smell this good smell. This is called "three mouths' smell." I cannot go into details about it now.

Who would imagine that Wu Song was a wine-bibber? Our hero was only really fond of two things. The first thing was wine. From the time when Wu Song killed the tiger and all the way to the episode of the Two Dragons' Mountain, altogether the Ten Chapters of Wu Song, every time our hero meets with misfortune it is because of drinking, but I'm not going to perform all that.

Today he had been drinking, and he was acting in a drunken state. His character was so that he always tried to help the weak and cheat the mighty. If you were such a person, a person without strength, and another mean person would try beat you up, then Wu Song would help you, Wu Song would beat him up.

So therefore, in the first place he was fond of wine, and in the second place he was fond of helping others. In the entire Ten Chapters on Wu Song he always acts on behalf of others, never for his own profit.

The first chapter, the one we are telling now, I have performed that often in China. For what reason? Because whenever a person gets into trouble in his daily business, he may come over—how?—to listen to Wu Song Fights The Tiger. No matter what kind of trouble, we should study the spirit of Wu Song Fights The Tiger.

In the second place, you have Wu Song's fine morals. What fine morals? He acts without anybody asking him! As soon as he sees the advertisement about the tiger, he gets mighty angry, kills the tiger and does away with the evil for all the people.

If somebody asks you to do something, there is first the question of money—"Please, please!"—Will I get something for it? If not, I'll not do it. And the amount of money has to be quite big, because if I cannot kill it, my own life is in danger!

Wu Song was different. Wu Song went along on his own. Well, he had of course had too much to drink. When he saw that advertisement, he cried out:

"Aiya!"

"Aiya!" doesn't mean he was scared. It means: "Aha!" He felt ashamed towards the waiter in the inn Xiao'r.

"I thought he was running an inn of brigands. And I even beat him up!"

However, this situation—this situation made him angry. Why was he angry? '

"You tiger, you! You think you can block my way! A hero only knows how to move forward, there is nothing called retreat! I shall climb the ridge all the way to the top, and find that tiger, and fight it out! I shall kill the tiger and do away with the evil for all the people. That is the way we heroes act! If I cannot kill him, then let him eat me up and that's it!"

At this point Wu Song … well, this is called:

"If you do not enter the tiger's den, how will you get hold of the tiger's cub?"

A little while ago, under the influence of the wine, Wu Song had become a bit tipsy, and therefore, clearly knowing there was a tiger in the mountain, he obstinately climbed that tiger mountain. Wu Song marched off, he had his own mind. Now he was arriving at Jingyang Ridge. Jingyang Ridge is only about one li high. Normally, if he had not been drinking, he would leap and bounce to the top in one single breath, pu-pu-pu-pu.

Today it didn't work. He had drunk too much. Thirty cups! He was well aware that he was not in control of his head and feet. When he stepped on the ground it felt like stepping on a cotton bag. He had to take a rest now. He must take a rest, so he looked round. Beside the road he saw an old tree, well, just a tree, one man could hold around it, but it was several zhang high. At the foot of the tree there was a moss-grown stone, one meter broad, two meters long, and half a meter thick, and then I do not know how deeply it was embedded in the earth. Wu Song sat down to rest. …

150.239 Hi Lili Hi Li …\fn{by Shui Ching aka Yang Yi (1935-)} Nantung, Kiangsu Province, China (M) 6

Upon waking, Y finds the tropical morning sun perching upon his eyelids like a persistent mosquito. His pupils instantly contract like a cat's, and his eyelids feel stiff and heavy. He hadn't slept well last night. Tossing and turning just because someone had forgotten to turn tightly the faucet in the washroom next door. He felt as if the monotonous trickle, like the endless dripping of a water clock, had drilled a hole in his head and caused his old memories to spill. At this instant his skull, scooped clean of its contents, could roll a long way with one kick, like a dried coconut shell.

A stiff pain goes over Y's whole body—the symptom of an impending illness that he cannot trifle with or, worse, the omen of a natural or political calamity? For a Chinese living in the South Sea Islands, no place offers true security. Recently the celestial signs have boded ill: all those meteors and solar eclipses can only bring about a period of war and famine. No wonder cholera has broken out again and is getting more menacing every day in the city. Some old superstitions, however absurd, simply cannot be eliminated from one's subconscious. So then, he asks himself, what prompted you to leave the island bastion of your own country for this overseas island, sun-baked and barren? Huge tropical flowers, girls wrapped in rich-colored sarongs, exotic, percussive music—things that set Gauguin's\fn{Eugène Henri Paul Gaugin (1848-1903), French postimpressionist painter.} canvas aglow—can be found only in Tahiti. Here, you can see only stretches of primitive jungle or waves of the as yet uncharted sea beating against the coast.

Y looks at the picture of the crucifixion on the wall, which he has been too lazy to remove. The former tenant must have been a Christian, and a devout one, too, he thinks. The emaciated Christ, a crown of thorns on his drooping head and a torn cloth around his loins, is hitched up on the cross. One of his legs is drawn upward, and blood oozes from his palms and soles.

Under the dying stare of Christ is Y's desk. A ray of sunlight rests upon the book which Y was reading last night: a new biography of Oscar Wilde.\fn{Oscar Fingal Wilde (1854-1900), Irish-born writer and wit.} On its jacket appears the lust-ravaged face\fn{In 1894, at the peak of his career, Oscar Wilde was convicted of having engaged in sodomistic sexual relations with Lord Alfred Douglas, and sentenced to two years of hard labor in prison.} of Wilde which, pallid and swollen, offers a sharp contrast to the dolorous countenance of the crucified Christ.

Y walks to the washroom next door. The faucet is still dripping, leaving a rusty stain on the sink. The water must have changed color again. Thanks to the malfunctioning of the city government, the water supply frequently assumes the color of milk, occasionally that of urine. When Y turns on the faucet, as he has expected, a stream of yellow muddy water that faintly smells o urine gushes out. No shaving today, he tells himself, and get the washing done quick!

Toilet done, Y is walking back to his own room when he turns his head and notices on the cement floor the head of a rat. A few scattered blood stains right by it reinforce his belief that the debris must have been left by the Siamese cat making his regular prowl last night. The rat must have been of medium size, and although the head has been sawed off the body by the cat's teeth, it remains intact with its spars whiskers, its protruding teeth, and its beady eyes staring at the world with a sort of fatuous twinkle. There is an American poet\fn{Richard Eberhart; from his Collected Poems 1930-1960.} who, upon revisiting the site where a groundhog had lain dead three summers ago, could think

Of China and of Greece,
Of Alexander in his tent;
Of Montaigne in his tower,
Of Saint Theresa in her wild lament.

Y bends down to examine the triangular face of the dead rat and feels a slight attack of nausea.

Y returns to his bedroom and switches on his transistor radio, hoping to receive some news from the outside world and iron out the ruffled feelings of a blue Monday morning. But there is only the plip-plop of static noise; neither the suave voice of radio Australia's announcer nor the insistent, illogical message from the land of his ancestors can be heard.

"Must be due to the intervention of a sun-spot explosion," Y murmurs under his breath as he starts for the doorway.

A gray wall blocks his way, as if it marked the world's end, with no exit leading to any place, to any hope. Every morning, as he steps outside the door, he is seized by a sense of fear that he is being incarcerated ina prison, even though what he confronts is only a block of wall, a coarse ugly wall of plastered gray bricks.

Presently Y is pacing along the sidewalk of the asphalt main street. Bungalows remain exotic to him, perched as they are upon stilts, three feet above ground, to keep them from the malarial vapors rising from the earth. Roofs, walls, window lattices compose a somewhat unreal pattern of strange colors found only in fairy tales or in toyland.

The sun-baked earth send forth spirals of steam. This is truly a miasmal land of barbarians—to hear the gurgling sound of streams meandering down the mountains, one has to go elsewhere! Hearing the tap-tap-tap of his footsteps, Y feels the rubble rapidly rolling away from his soles. The sun has melted his shirt into a gluey sheet of pressed bean curd, and it sticks to his back.

A clammy sense of dread now clings to him like his shirt. No, how can the whole street be so deserted at eight on a Monday morning? Not a person, a car to be seen? Intuitively, Y links the implacable calm of the present moment to the strange sensation he had when he woke up this morning and asks himself: Could his uneasiness be traced to the unusual quiet around him?

He hastens his steps and feels the rubble rolling faster and faster from the sides of his shoes. The sense of fear now presses harder on him, as if he were passing through a graveyard at midnight. He turns around, and the main street, the bungalows, the coconut palms with their octopus-shaped heads of broad leaves, and the spirals of steam rising from the ground all look reassuringly the same as before. But where are the people? The people?

Heeding the premonition of a storm, Y examines the bungalows searchingly. The wooden windows are all tightly shut (glass window are not common here) as if the occupants were still sound asleep, and the doors all bolted.

Y cannot imagine what could have happened overnight. In this changeable, often (to him) treacherous world, something untoward always happens just when he is completely off guard. Quick, he tells himself, be off to the broadcasting station where you work and find out.

The thought gives him some comfort. Hurrying, he arrives at the radio station.

The iron-wire fence still surrounds the station but the wicket, as if someone has forgotten to latch it, is swinging back and forth. Y slinks in and latches the wicket behind him. a glance at the sentry box shows that the dark brown guard, a member of the local royal armed forces customarily stationed there in his blue-black French cap and blue-black denim shorts, is missing. Y hesitates for a while, his eyes hurt by the brilliance of a cluster of rosebushes along the fence set afire by the sun. A black sparrow with red eyes—all the sparrows here are like that—hops for a while before flying off into the sky.

Full of apprehension, Y goes toward the station, but even inside the building not a soul can be seen and not a sound heard. And the day, he remembers only too well, is Monday, a workday. As he approaches the second floor, he is so petrified by what he sees on the wall facing the staircase that unwittingly he backs down one step.

All over the white wall are assorted bloody handprints, one upon another in total confusion. Among these handprints is a line of words in Islamic script, also written in blood. Y cannot decipher the meaning of this, but from the exclamation marks—there are, altogether, three of them, each bigger than the preceding one—he instantly senses the threatening weight the line carries.

Insurrection? A coup? Oh, heavens, now he knows why the whole street is deserted and why the windows and doors are all shut! In this part of the world a newly independent state, once it enjoys an excess of democracy and freedom, will behave like a pauper who has won the biggest lottery prize. It will spurn reason and turn mad!

What time is this, Y checks himself, to indulge in ineffectual moralizing? He holds tight to the railing, to steady himself. At the same time, his left palm is upon his brow, in an attempt to collect his thoughts. His soles ae glued to one of the stairs for what seems a long while. In this eternal moment he doesn't know whether to retreat or advance. Retreat—who knows if the station is not already surrounded by rebels? Advance—what if his office has already been occupied by them?

The next moment Y finds the back of his head pressed against the tiled wall of the washroom because, he has convinced himself, this is the least important room in the building. Unless the rebels want to search the place, they would never bother to come here. But wait, what if they want to piss?

At this critical moment, he recalls with perverse futility a story he has read—was it by Sartre\fn{Jean-Paul Sartre (1905-1980), French philosopher, dramatist, novelist and political journalist.} or Camus?\fn{Albert Camus (1913-1960), French-Algerian novelist, essayist, dramatist, and journalist.}—which the anti-hero, a convict or fugitive, breaks jail and takes refuge in a washroom. Finally he surrenders because, with his cartridges all used up, he can no longer defy the law.

But I am innocent, he tells himself, why should I subject myself to this treatment? Why should I be in this sad but ridiculous quandary? What have I done?

At last Y summons enough courage to leave the washroom, hardly a place for a man to be captured in. He wants to preserve his dignity to the end. Moreover, even if he should be caught, he could always tell the rebels that he is but an alien resident. Maybe they would treat him not too badly, and perhaps do no worse than deport him. But—how could he account for his being an employee of the overthrown government?

While thus lost in thought, he has already stepped into the News room—too late to back out now. Luckily there are no armed rebels in the room. He heaves a sigh of relief and smells the more keenly the stale air that has been confined in the room overnight. But the air is at the same time foul and rank as if it were newly released from a refrigerator stocked with meats and vegetables which has not functioned for days. He turns on the switch for the electric fan on the wall. But its four blades refuse to move—apparently, the power supply for the city must have failed. Y then sinks into his boss's high-backed swivel chair. For better security he turns its back so that it faces the window.

Keeping his eyes on the door, he begins to dial the telephone, trying to get in touch with police headquarters to find out what really has happened. Thank goodness, the line has not been cut, but the noise from the receiver—bleep, bleep, bleep—deafens his ear. He holds the receiver some distance from his ear, but the insistent noises continues and no one answers. He counts the bleeps and then has to hang up.

He tries several other places: the newspapers, the telecommunication bureau, the municipal building. But there is no answer—only the monotonous ringing at the other end of the telephone.

Then the telephone suddenly rings loud and clear as an alarm clock. Excited, he grabs the receiver. Once again the buzzing deafens him but now he eagerly presses the receiver against his ear as if afraid he might lose contact forever.

But a few moments later the receiver no longer transmits any sound. The telephone line must have been cut. The telephone that was alive in his hand a moment ago is now dead. Dejectedly he holds on to the receiver for along time before replacing it.

Y can imagine that the party at the other end of the line must have also dejectedly replaced the telephone. He must have been as desperate as I, trying to get in touch with the radio station. Did he run into the same snag as I did? Why couldn't we make contact before the line snapped?

On the desk is a pile of teletype news from the Control room. Y scans it and finds that the latest items of news had come in by 9:30 last evening. Since then this small town has been out of contact with the world. He checks the teletype again to see if there is any news about the coup or insurrection. Then he realizes that should there be any it would be sometime after 9:30 P.M.

What can Y do? The town is now in a state of ominous calm preceding the storm, and they, whoever they are, have just cut the telephone line. Very soon they will send out men to occupy strategic points, including the broadcasting station. He had better get out of here before the rebels swarm in.

Where to go? Will it be safe in the streets? If by chance he should be shot dead, it would have been better to remain in this room and wait for the worst. No, he would be better to back at the dormitory. There he still has a few cans of food and can stave off hunger for a day or two. The tumult will sooner or later subside, whatever its outcome.

Then, distinctly, he hears someone starting a car. He is all ears, trying to tell from which direction the noise comes. It comes from across the fence and he hopes that the car will turn around to the front directly under his window so that he may have a clear view of who is behind the wheel. If it is not one of the rebels (they would presumably wear some kind of insignia), he will yell aloud to get the driver's attention and then he will be saved.

The humming of the starting motor gradually fills the room, and his hope rises with it. then, to his dismay, the car apparently swerves to the back of the building. The driver seems in such a hurry that he jams the gear several times before he catches up with the speed. The wheels scraping the ground send off a screech. Eventually the driver seems to have made his way out. The deafening noise recedes..

The room is restored to calm, and the foul air assails his nose with renewed intensity.

It must be one of my friends, he thinks, at least an acquaintance, who has left me in the lurch. Don't be too hard on him, though. How could he know I'm stranded here?

Very soon Y is plodding along once again under the sun, in the direction of his dormitory. He has chosen the side streets and back alleys, to avoid being a victim of stray bullets.

The white sun now radiates intenser heat so that Y feels like a patient dying of scarlet fever: dizzy, thirsty, talking incoherently to himself, and in the end almost fainting. Then he comes to, though his cheeks are feverish and his eyes glazed. They stare at the world as if reluctant to leave it.

For only a few days Y hasn't been to this street, but the grass on the curbside has grown to the level of his eyes. He passes by the iron-wire fence of a basketball field, along which the grass is even knottier and more luxuriant. Walking in its shade, Y feels as if the sun has suddenly darkened, even though the tallest blades of grass glisten skyward like uplifted swords. Made uneasy by this incredible overgrowth, he continues walking, enveloped in the smell of verdure. Occasionally he hears the rustle of wings among the leaves as the grasshoppers, disturbed by his approach, fly ahead for a more secure hiding-place.

He makes a turn, and right in the middle of the street a massive black thing confronts him. It bears some resemblance to a car. Upon closer inspection, it is indeed a car, but turned upside down like a beetle lying on its back, unable to reverse its position. On what remains of every broken windowpane are fine cracks like magnified crow's feet on an old man's face. The exposed engine, burned black, is totally mangled. Someone must have wrecked the car before setting fire to it.

Riot … violence … Y hurriedly retraces his steps even though his eyes continue to take in every sight like a camera. Blindly he makes several turns, completely unaware that, in case of a riot, his aimless dashing about can only court disaster.

Finally, after several such turns, his mechanical steps have carried him to the end of a street. Ahead of him lies a wide expanse with no buildings around it. It is paved all over with sharp, small fragments of stone on top of which floats a layer of powder-white stone-dust. The are directly beyond looks totally unfamiliar, and he is far more numbed with fear than when he discovered the overturned car. Quickly turning back, he sees a hospital with its front gate wide open. He walks in unhesitatingly: his common sense tells him that the hospital is as much a sanctuary for refugees as is the church for penitent sinners.

Gusts of cool breeze stroke his burning cheeks. He is now walking under a Moslem-style dome along a corridor with white-plastered walls. The sun floods exactly one half of the corridor while the other half lies in darkness. The apparently deserted corridor is pervaded with a slight but unmistakable medicinal odor. Y can hear his own rhythmic footsteps, which sound hollow under the dome.

Now he has reached the door at the other end of the corridor. A victim of shock, he cautiously inclines his head to listen at the door. When he has made sure there are no movements inside, he gently pushes it open.

The door opens on an enormous sickroom, with a row of beds extending on either side. White sheets, white pillows lying neatly where the sheets are tucked in, the white paint on the iron frames and legs of the beds, the white in-patient cards hanging on pegs constitute a symmetrical pattern in white. There are twenty beds on one side, Y counts with his eyes, and there are twenty on the other.

Y walks ahead along the aisle, his steps again sounding hollow in the vault-like room. The beds on either side look like Egyptian mummies swathed in white cloth, a monotonous and dizzying pattern suggestive of Pop Art.\fn{A visual arts movement of the 1950's and 1960's, principally in the United States and Britain.} Finally giddy, he trips and falls onto the last bed on the right row. His head against the soft pillow, he wants to take a nap: the happenings this morning have been too exhausting.

But he is immediately bothered by the sound of dripping which, upon first hearing, he takes to be that of his heartbeat. The noise, however, comes from the adjacent room, Ward No. 4. In desperation for a human companion, be he ever so sick, he gets up from bed and goes into the other room.

The medicinal odor is much stronger there. the ward is much smaller than the other, and also darker, because its blinds are tightly drawn. Each of the beds is screened from view by a white cloth curtain. Hung high on a hook outside the curtain of the second bed, however, is a bottle of saline solution. The drip-drop he has heard must have proceeded from this bottle because its mouth is no longer properly connected with the tube the injects the fluid into the patient's arm. It drips onto the floor. Looking downward, he sees an out-stretched brown had with its palm turned upward, though he cannot tell whether it belongs to a man or woman. As he rushes toward the extended hand, he stumbles upon a pail near the bed. A mop leaning against the pail hits the floor with a thud.

The pail soon regains its balance. Y peers inside and sees a layer of clammy, white fluid laced with streaks of blood and dotted with dark purple clots of what seem to be vomit. A fly hovers above the liquid before settling again on one of the clots.

Y realizes with the swiftness of lightning that he must have stumble into a special ward for quarantined cholera patients. Hasn't there been an outbreak of cholera in this city? What lies at the bottom of the pail must be vomit. The outstretched hand under the bottle must belong to a cholera patient—maybe he is dead already?

Y wants to get out fast. In his hurry he brushes aside the white curtain and catches a glimpse of the patient in white smock and cap. He lies prone, his head over the side of the bed. His posture suggests that death caught him while he was making a last valiant attempt to empty all the contents of his stomach into the pail. The tube must have gotten loose from the bottle during his last struggle

Suddenly a large amount of stomach acid gushes into Y's mouth. Covering it with his hand, he dashes out of the hospital through the enormous sickroom. Then he leans against a big tree outside the porch, and vomits mouthfuls of acid water because he hasn't had any breakfast this morning. But even though he throws up no food, the muscles in his throat feel sore after repeated contractions. Then, his vomiting done, he saunters to another big tree and sits upon its exposed roots. Heaving a sigh, he shuts his eyes to take a rest.

*

Y is now plodding along a seashore trail that leads to S town. He still cannot be quite sure what really happened in his own city. Coup? Riot? A severe epidemic of cholera? Perhaps all three concurrently? He must walk to S., a small town about twenty miles from where he lives, and get the news. Afraid that he might meet rebels if he took the main road, he has picked this trail, a pathway seldom trodden.

On his right lies the vast stretch of the South China Sea which has dozed under the sun, forlorn and forgotten, for thousands of years. Never have any sailboats or steamships emerged from its distant horizon. Even the pirates' ships do not stop here, because the island is too barren.

The sky is now gray, but the sea is grayer. The sun, however, shines on its surface and livens up its color. Heaps of cumulus clouds are piled up on the distant horizon.

Under his feet is a long stretch of sand whose silvery color indicates its high silicic content. The trail, therefore, looks as if it were paved with ashes—the kind of ashes poured from censers. The sand is dotted with pebbles, and here and there embedded among the pebbles are thistles flaunting their tiny, star-shaped white blossoms.

On his left, for mile after mile—maybe even hundreds of miles—lies the dark, primitive jungle.

A solitary pine emerges from the roadside, a noble specimen like those found in classical Chinese paintings. Leaning against its gnarled trunk, under its shade, Y steals a glance at his wrist watch.

It has stopped. Pressing its crystal against his car, he is unable to hear its familiar tick-tock—surely it has stopped. Its hands point to 9:30: hard to tell whether it stopped last evening or this morning. He winds it up and lets it run its own course, since he doesn't know the correct time.

Then it occurs to him that he as become almost another Robinson Crusoe\fn{The chief character of a novel by Daniel Defoe (1660?-1731), entitled The Life and Strange Surprizing Adventures of Robinsoe Cruseo, of York, Mariner (1719).} on a deserted island. Time has lost its importance for him; what difference does it make if he cannot tell the exact hour of the day?

But he cannot help wondering that, from the moment he rushed out of the Special Ward, vomiting and then leaning against the tree for a rest, until he started walking on the seaside trail, there could be no more than an hour's time altogether. Tilting back his head to watch the sun, he reckons that it must be between ten and ten thirty in the morning.

But suddenly the sun hides itself behind the clouds, and he fells somewhat chilly as a gust of wind rising from the sea blows against him. He no longer feels the heat of the sun even though it still shines on him. The sun behind the clouds looks to him as if it were screened by a sheet of dark-yellow translucent paper: it transmits only light, but no heat. His skin feels cold and clammy as if soaked in water. Could this be another eclipse? Three days ago as he left his office during the lunch hour, he remembers, the sun was in eclipse and transmitted only light and no heat, as it does now. The disgraced sun is no more potent than the moon. The sun in Dante's Inferno is probably like that. That noon, in proportion as the honking of cars and bicycles sounded muffled, the burden of terror in his heart increased util he felt as if doomsday were near. He knew, though, that the eclipse is but a natural phenomenon and cannot last more than half an hour, or an hour at most.

That noon he was walking in a bustling street; now, alone in a deserted spot under a vast sky, he feels even more helpless. He feels as if something heavy and hideous like an incubus were pressing hard on his chest. He wants to cry out, to dispel the nightmare, but he feels limp and impotent.

He gets up, looking beseechingly around him.

To his great relief, he notices a human form emerging from the primitive jungle and heading toward the seashore.

He cranes his neck for a better view. Whoever that person may be—rebel or citizen, male or female, Chinese or foreigner—he is going to greet him and make known to him his helpless condition.

The person advances, eventually becomes clearly visible.

It is a woman.

Her hair disheveled, her feet bare, here shabby clothes torn into rags that can hardly cover her, the woman might have just stepped out of a cave of our primordial past. Perhaps she might even be taken for the Eve of Genesis.

Y stares at her with dazed eyes, but the woman, totally oblivious of his presence, walks on unafraid and abstractedly. Shaking her bony arms as she swings her hips, she advances as if she were dancing.

She is dancing, because Y can overhear her humming a tone.

The cold sunshine, a desolate seashore, a world which has lost its sense of time, a crazy woman doing a step suggestive of the danse macabre.\fn{The dance of death, a popular gathering during the plagues in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance, represented on numerous cemetery walls.} … Shivering, Y is ready to retreat and flee the scene, but then he catches the tune the woman is humming: Hi Lili, hi Li … Yes, Hi Lili, hi Li … Y remembers now. Hi Lil, hi Li … Leslie Caron … an old film … puppet shows. The song R loved best to hum, the doll-faced R that has occupied a permanent place in his memory … could it be she?

It's she. It must be she. Y stares straight at the crazy woman advancing toward him. Those large, limpid eyes are now ashy dull … but even if she had been reduced to ashes, I can still recognize her.

Suddenly a thousand mixed feelings surge up in his heart so that all the words he would like to use are stuck in his throat. What has happened to him this morning is too absurd to account for in rational terms. He feels himself falling apart, perhaps no less crazy than RT. Looking into R's hazy eyes he sees the reflections of himself: huddled, small, and desperate. He slinks to her side and they're facing each other as if back in the good old days when they were locked in each other's arms, ready to join the other dancing couples for a Put Down Your Little Feet.

*

R (mechanically waves her bony arms): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (tiptoes round R. Then steals a glance at her for a second time): Oh, no.

R (unpertubedly touches her rags): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (clutches his shirt collar; summons up enough courage to talk): R, please wake up. Wake up. Do you know who I am?

R (jumps up like a doe, kicking off a whirl of powdered dust): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (follows her, pleadingly): Are you still mad at me? After all these years, now that we've met again, why're you still mad at me?

R Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (steps a little closer, wanting very much to touch her naked shoulder.)

R (totally unresponsive; bends over to pluck a star-shaped white flower and sticks it among her disheveled hair; then with a ringing voice louder than before): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (jumps up to grab R's shoulders with his tremulous hands; raises his voice to a hoarse pitch): You must answer me, answer me! (jolted, R stops her singing abruptly; with this also cease the natural sounds surrounding them made by the wind and the sea; through the silence one hears Y's hysterical voice): Tell me, how did you come here? Tell me, why do we end in this mess? What have we done to deserve a fate like this? Tell me, can we escape? Do we still have any future at all? Why don't you speak? Why are you so cruel? Why do you mock and torture me like this? Speak up! Please speak up! (reflected in R's opaque and lusterless pupils, Y sees his own face, which is a picture of pitiable helplessness, bewilderment, and desperation. He hates himself for that, and in no time two lines of hot tears course down his cheeks.)

R (detaches herself from Y's grip, picks up the interrupted tune; more cheerfully): Hi Lili hi Li … (A roll of thunder on the distant horizon; the soft cumulus clouds now look like fierce, bulbous-eyed giants.)

Y (disgruntled, wipes his tears with the back of his hand. Resumes the haughty manner of his former years): Hmm, Hi Lili hi Li …

R (excitedly faces the sea and raises her arms skyward as if invoking the rain god above for showers): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (attitude changed, side-glances at R in an appreciate manner): Hmm, not bad. (Chants a classical quatrain):\fn{The opening quatrain of Magic Strings, by the T'ang Dynasty (618-907) poet Li Ho.}

The witch pours the libation, clouds fill the sky,
In the flaming coals of the jade brazier the fumes of incense throb.
The God of the Sea and the Hill Nymph take their places,
Votive papers rustle in the howling whirlwind.

R (spins her body like a top, the torn rags whirling; sings even more shrilly): Hi Lili hi Li …

Y (infected by her enthusiasm, or rather, caught in her spell, whirls around her): Hi Lili hi Li … (black clouds lower, fraught with thunder and rain.)

R & Y (gambol like a pair of innocent children playing hide-and-seek on the outskirts of a town, now chasing after each other, now holding or clapping each other's hands. They skip and hop as if inebriated with the brew of Dionysus. They continue to cross the expanse of the thistles, heading toward the impenetrable darkness of the tropical jungle, singing): Oh, hi iLili hi Li … Ah, hi Lili hi Li … (again a roll of deafening thunder; the rain then falls like shooting spears.)

203.170 Father's Last Two Days\fn{by Shu Yi (1935-)} Qingdao, Shandong Province, China (M) 9

Recently I've changed my job. I've been put in charge of making preparations for the opening of "Lao She's Former Residence" to the public and also have responsibility for putting the author's papers in order.

The first task I set for myself after taking up the post was to have photographs taken systematically of all the places in Peking that had some connection with my father. Over the past few years the pace of construction in the city has increased tremendously and one can be sure that many old buildings will soon be knocked down. So if I wanted to get a series of photographs together then time was of the essence.

Photographic documentation of this kind would form an important part of the archives of Lao She's life and works. After all Lao She was born and grew up in Peking and had spent a lifetime writing about the city. So I made the arrangements with Mr. Li, editor of the publishing house, Mr. Zhang, a professional photographer and Mr. Wang, a Lao She expert. Off we set, carrying the camera equipment and with me in the lead, wending our way up and down the main streets and the narrow lanes of Peking.

One day we came to the former site of Taiping Lake in the northern suburbs of Peking, the place where my father had taken his own life. Eighteen years ago on a night in early autumn I'd sat here keeping vigil over my father, who had just died. It was a night I will never forget as long as I live. For eighteen years I'd not dared to come back, frightened of seeing anything that would reawaken the memories of that fearful time, that even now was etched indelibly on my mind. Those events of eighteen years ago were even more bizarre than a nightmare, more oppressive and more terrifying. How I wished it had all been a nightmare, for nightmares end eventually. But this was no nightmare, it was stark reality. I'd tasted the full weight of the bitterness that that reality carried with it; that heavy, inescapable, endless bitterness.

But I'd returned so that I could leave a record of this place for future generations. The place had changed considerably in eighteen years. Where was the park, the lake, the trees, the benches? Everything that had been there eighteen years ago had disappeared completely. Now, in their place, there was a very large subway train maintenance yard, enclosed by a wall with several spacious modern workshops inside. Where the outer Taiping lake had been there was now a large, flat yard about 100 metres wide which was criss-crossed with metal tracks neatly leading to each of the train sheds. We got permission to enter and headed west through the yard for quite a way until we came to a section of track.

Just then a brand new train came out from a train shed to the east and passed by us. Soon it moved into the tunnel and started out on its route. It felt as if this place was the trains' home, their true point of origin. This struck me very forcibly as this same place was also my father's final destination, the place where his life ended.

On the day we took the pictures it was very sunny and there was no wind. It was peaceful and tranquil. After the train had passed it seemed as though all that was left was the sunshine and the tracks, even the noise of the city was shut off by the wall. The anxiety I had felt suddenly dissipated, and all the tension left my body. I felt happy just to stay here standing silently in the sunshine, looking at the tracks and letting them carry me off to some faraway place.

No one spoke. Mr. Zhang silently focused the camera and pressed the shutter release. But then Mr. Wang suddenly made a proposal:

"We should put up a permanent memorial stone here, inscribed with the words, 'This is the place where the writer Lao She sacrificed his life.'"

For the word "sacrifice" he used the two characters she shen. My father's given name was Qingchun and his alias was Sheyu. She yu means to sacrifice oneself. Probably Mr. Wang had thought about this at length, so that when he uttered the word sheshen it really summed up the mood of the time, the place and the scene. Sheyu was the alias that Father picked for himself when he was in his teens. In their written form, the two characters she yu represent the two components which make up Father's family name. He wanted to make she yu, self-sacrifice, his lodestar throughout life: to selflessly offer himself up to this troubled world, to try and make it a better place. So, from that time on, he set himself on the path of sacrifice and resolutely walked that road throughout his life.

When Father was twenty-three he addressed a group of younger students. In his speech he said that Jesus had borne only one cross, but that Chinese youth should be prepared for a double sacrifice. They had to bear two crosses: one for the destruction of the old world, the other for the construction of the new world. This was probably Father's first "Self-sacrifice Manifesto".

In fact in 1938 Father had himself talked about his setting up a memorial stone, an idea similar to Mr. Wang's. Although he hadn't meant it seriously, nonetheless his determination to sacrifice himself for his country was real enough.

At that time the country was facing a national crisis. Writers and artists who were gathered in the three cities of Wuhan\fn{Now one unified cities, Wuhan was originally made up of three separate entities: Wuchang, Hankou and Hanyang} formed an All China Resistance League of Writers and Artists, and the warm-hearted and ever-persevering Lao She was elected as the head of the general office, but in effect his role was that of head of the whole league. The Resistance League had several hundred members, but only one, Xiao Boqing, had full time responsibilities. Later this role was passed to Mei Lin. All other members worked on a voluntary basis. Apart from writing, other tasks that members took on included holding all kinds of meetings, contacting local artists and writers in each area and setting up branch offices, editing the War of Resistance magazine, publishing a poetry magazine, an English-language magazine and a Resistance Literature series, distributing popular reading materials to each war zone, putting on benefit performances, publishing The Collected Works of Lu Xun, arranging for writers to visit the frontline—they were as busy as could be and achieved great successes.

This period was surely one of the times of greatest unity among men of letters in China's cultural history. Everyone paid their own expenses for travelling and attending meetings, and not one word of complaint was heard. Witnessing this lively scene Father was in seventh heaven. When he was elected to the council of the Resistance League he wrote an "inaugural pledge". He made a solemn pledge to the motherland, to the people, and to the friends and comrades who loved him, saying,

"I am only a foot soldier in the literary world. For ten years or more, night and day, day and night I have sat on my little stool, toiling at my desk. My pen is my gun which spills forth my blood onto the page. If there is anything to be proud about it is just this, my ability to work hard. A foot soldier has none of the clever stratagems of a general, but whatever a foot soldier should do I have done. That is the way I was before, that is how I am now, and that is how I will always be. The day I am put in my grave I hope someone will put up a memorial stone for me, with the following inscription: 'Here lies a foot soldier in the literary world who fulfilled his duties.' Just give me the order, and I'll be ready for the battle. Whether I live or die is of no account, as long as I fulfil my duties as a soldier!"

Father spoke of “sacrifice” on another occasion six years after he made his “pledge”. It was when the Japanese were closing in on Guizhou, and it looked as if they would attack Sichuan from the south. The whole of Chongqing was in commotion, with people from all walks of life preparing to move on again. When friends asked Father what he was planning to do though, he gave the straightforward answer that he had already prepared.

“I am not going anywhere. The surging Jialing river here in Chongqing will be my final resting place if the Japanese come.”

*

However in the event Father’s true “sacrifice” came at a time and a place where it least should have occurred, at the hands of people who least should have demanded it, and under circumstances that least should have arisen.

When Mr. Wang spoke of that word sheshen being carved on a memorial stone, I was immediately transported back to the shore of Taiping lake eighteen years ago. I was sitting on a bench in the southwest comer of Taiping park, facing east with the sun shining on my back. There was no one around. This was the far corner of the park. If you went any further west you would come to an even larger lake, but that was outside the park proper. In fact the lakes were not really separate from each other, and there was no wall between them. Instead a small bridge divided the inner lake from the outer lake, and there was a path around the inner lake. The place where I was sitting was on the border between the two lakes. There were several tall poplars growing alongside the path that ringed the inner lake, and several benches had been put out underneath them.

The outer lake presented quite a different a picture. No path had been made around the lake, and there were no embankments either. It was desolate and silent, a wild place, even a rather scary place. The borders of the lake were choked with weeds and thickets, which grew above waist height and merged with the reeds and sedge that grew in the lake. Further away from the water untidy willow trees grew together forming a natural protective wall. Visitors didn’t come here; it was a world that belonged almost completely to the animals and plants. It was in this other world that Father lay.

I turned my head, searching through the undergrowth to try and find that little dirt track where he lay sleeping. I don’t know whether it was the sun dazzling my eyes, or because I had something stuck in my eye, but I couldn’t make anything out clearly. That patch of yellow over there, was that the yellow of the sunlight or was it the yellow of a tattered burial mat? I didn’t know.

A young man from the Municipal Literary League was there to see to the handover; behind him was Father’s old driver standing by the car. They were both wearing red armbands. Obviously the young man now had charge of the car. They asked me my name and even instructed me to show them my identity card, although the old driver had been with our family for years and years. The only thing the young man said to me before getting in the car and driving away was

“Be sure to ‘deal with’ him as quickly as possible.” But as the car was moving off the old driver shouted out an important warning,

“There are wild dogs around here at night.”

Father was lying face up, his head pointing west, his feet east. His head rested partly on a clump of green grass, partly on a small dirt track. He no longer had his uniform tunic on, but his cloth shoes were still on his feet. There was no mud on them and no water in his stomach. He’d been lying there the whole day and the sun had long since dried out his clothes and shoes. He wasn’t wearing his glasses and his eyes were swollen. His clothes were in disorder indicating that his body had already been examined by a forensic doctor. There were huge bruises and large patches of coagulated blood on his head, neck, chest and arms. Quite simply he had been beaten black and blue.

Two days previously he’d been beaten up by Red Guards in the Confucian temple in Chengxian street. These ignorant and fanatical youths had decided that some priceless Peking Opera costumes had to be destroyed, burnt to ashes as quickly as possible, and they had picked the Confucian temple as the setting. They also planned to take along two or three of the leaders of the Cultural Bureau to be struggled against at the same time. The Municipal Cultural Bureau and the Municipal Literary League were close neighbours, so when the Red Guards were dragging out a few of the Cultural Burea’s leading cadres they thought they might as well bring out a few well-known literary figures from the Municipal Literary League who had already been “ferreted out” and throw them in the truck too. When Father, who was the chairman of the Municipal Literary League, saw that his friends and the leading cadres from the League had all been called out, he stood up of his own accord.

This integrity of his, of course was one of his most admirable characteristics but it also drove him to his death! A female student from Peking University who was “directing operations” at the scene shouted out,

“That’s Lao She! He’s their Chairman! He’s a reactionary authority! Throw him into the truck!”

In fact Father had just come out of hospital. Since summer began he had been in very low spirits and then one night he suddenly started spitting blood, almost a spittoon full. In the middle of the night we took him to the hospital and immediately he was admitted for treatment. When he had recovered enough to be discharged the doctor urged him to stay at home and rest for a few days, but instead he rushed back to the office straight away. Cruel fate was playing with his selfless spirit, he was rushing, rushing, but contrary to all justice, what he was rushing towards at the greatest possible speed was his own death. That day, 23 August 1966, was the first day he'd gone to work after leaving the hospital.

The dreadful scenes at the Confucian temple have already been related in detail by many authors and playwrights who were also beaten up in the same incident, but who survived. Put simply it was Father who was beaten the worst, the blood from his cut head turning his white shirt completely red. His head was roughly bandaged with the white sleeve from one of the Peking opera costumes, but blood had seeped through and his appearance was enough to shock anyone. When he heard what was going on the deputy mayor of Peking came rushing to the scene. In the far off distance through the throngs of people that surrounded Father he could see the apalling ill-treatment that was being meted out. Inwardly he raged in desperation that he has powerless, totally unable to protect Peking's best known author. But there was no means now of controlling the situation. An angry mob is as unpredictable as a fierce fire whose soaring flames dance and twist, with noway of knowing which direction they are likely to turn next.

Behind his glasses Lao She's eyes flashed with a chilling expression that set you shivering. His face was deathly pale, yet that look in his eyes—burning, courageous, resolute—was eloquent testimony to the pain he was suffering. Seeing the glazed look in the eyes of this, China's most humane and cultivated man of letters, all the kind-hearted people there were afraid. Those eyes were clearly speaking to them, sending a dreadful message: Lao She only needed to close his eyes, to lower his head and he could leave the madness of this cruel world!

Members from the Municipal Literary League were told that bringing Lao She back te the League's offices was their top priority. Little did they know that in rescuing him from this first trial they would only serve to force him into a second, even deeper abyss.

Several hundred Red Guards had massed at the League's offices. Father felt the full brunt of their belts, fists, boots, curses and spittle. My poor father's life was in the balance. In order to divert their attacks from herself a woman author encouraged those ignorant youths to ask my father some provocative questions. Father answered calmly and objectively, which of course was taken as a refusal to acknowledge guilt. These dignified answers just added oil to the flames and brought down an even more vicious assault upon him.

Father decided that he would not bow his head again, that he would not hold up the placard enumerating his "crimes" again, that he would not speak again. He looked up. His face was cut and bleeding, his expression one of anger and nobility.

"Bow your head! Raise the placard!"

Father used his last ounce of strength to angrily fling the placard to the ground. It hit the Red Guard who was standing in front of him. Immediately he was engulfed … yes, engulfed …

The members of the Municipal Literary League thought of a "clever" plan to snatch him from the hands of the Red Guards. They argued that his desperate rebellion was a counter-revolutionary act and that he should therefore be brought before the discliplinary authorities to be dealt with accordingly. So after some scuffling he was pushed into a car to be taken off to the nearby police station. The crowd, which had completely lost its senses, pressed up right against the car, raining blows down on its body and windows, so that it couldn't move an inch. Both the Red Guards and Father realized without a shadow of a doubt that that the naming of him as a "counter-revolutionary" had served only to push him irrevocably towards another world. There were quite a few girls amongst the crowd of youths who followed behind the car as it made its way to the police station.

Once inside, despite the efforts of the staff to prevent them, they continued to beat this dying old man well into the night. And so it happened that in the space of a day the people inexplicably, suddenly and forever lost the writer who they had loved and who they called a "People's Artist".

Mother was told to go and bring Father home. As they clung together in the pedicab which brought them back dawn was already breaking. Just before they had left, Father was informed that he should report at the Municipal Literary League the following morning and that he should bring his "active counter-revolutionary" placard with him.

*

The next day he did indeed leave for work on time, and he may even have taken the placard with him, but he did not go to the League's offices. In fact, after he left the house there was no further trace of him.

At dawn, before going to bed, Mother cleaned Father's wounds and they had a long talk. This is the last time they were together, and so it is, not inaccurate to call it a life-and-death talk. Father had already made up his mind to die but he could not directly reveal this to Mother. Yet his vague hints gave their heart-to-heart talk even more of the feeling of a farewell. When Father took off his shirt apd Mother saw how badly he had been beaten, she wanted to weep, but she didn't. She knew she must act, she must speak and not cry. She helped Father take off his vest which had stuck to his body because his wounds had started to scab. She couldn't pull it off so she got some hot water and cotton wool and after dipping the cotton wool in the water, bit by bit she soaked the wounds through the vest. Strands from the vest had cut right into his flesh. Her hands wouldn't move properly, she had no command over them. Her heart was trembling, so her hands and her whole body were trembling too. Her heart ached, what bitter pain! She couldn't hold back her tears any longer. Father said,

"The people understand me! The Party and Chairman Mao understand me! The Premier understands me the best of all!"

He really was a good man! He'd been so unfairly treated, suffered such outrageous torments, been subject to the most awful insults and yet he still spoke of people so warmly and trustingly!

But where in the world can you find such honest and kind-hearted friends? And where in the world can you find such resoluteness and trust?

Father told Mother not to worry about him and said that he would be fine by himself. In the morning he practically forced her out of the door and in the end she went off to work. Shortly after she had left he went out too.

Before he left the house Father went to my daughter's bedside—his beloved three-year-old granddaughter—and solemnly said goodbye to her. Only she and her elderly nursemaid were left in the house. Grandfather called his granddaughter to come to him, and bending over took her little hand in his. Slowly and gently he said,

"Say good - bye - to Grandfather!"

The little girl looked at her grandfather in puzzlement, she didn't understand what was wrong with Grandfather today, why he was coming to shake hands with her, why he was saying "goodbye" so hesitantly, enunciating the words syllable by syllable.

This was Father's farewell to his family, to all those who had loved him, a farewell to the common people whom he had loved for a lifetime and written about for a lifetime. The conversation that he had with his granddaughter was the last he had in his life. So his final words, his reluctant farewell, were spoken to an innocent and guileless child. What a good, kind man he was!

My daughter didn't understand the meaning behind her grandfather's words at all. She should have pulled him back, she should have shouted out,

"Don't go! Get Daddy to come home, get Auntie to come home! They'll hide you! Don't go! Granddad!"

But my daughter didn't shout out. Even if she hadn't called out at least she could have hugged him and given him a kiss … but she only said "bye-bye" and waved to him. She was too young, just too young! After that "bye-bye" Father left forever, never to return.

Father loved that little girl. Grandfather and granddaughter, one old and one young, would often spend time playing together. His little granddaughter was the only person that Lao She allowed to come into his study as she pleased, and any time she came she would be sure to find a welcome. Once, when Father was entertaining two English friends, my daughter was playing in the sitting room. The old man caught his granddaughter between his knees and pulled her to the sofa where he was sitting. In play, he gently knocked her on her head with her rag-doll.

"The future belongs to them!" he said.

The moment before he left the house for the last time it was to this same little granddaughter that he solemnly bade farewell. He was clear-headed and full of a purity of feeling because he was directly bidding farewell to the "future". Perhaps he was thinking: A chapter of history passes in the blink of an eye, all regrets, all worries will soon belong to the past, my time has come and there is nothing more to say. I should go now. So he let go of his granddaughter's hand and left … The future belongs to them.

*

Where did Father go to? No one can say for sure. When I was informed of the situation I rushed back from work. At home everything was in great disorder. There were Red Guards everywhere, from the entrance of our alley, right through the courtyard and into our own rooms. They had !heir leather belts at the ready for lashing at people with, and they'd stuck up big character posters all around the place. Since Lao She hadn't gone to work as ordered, they'd come to find him. They searched the whole house, every inch of it, every nook and cranny. I noticed that the trapdoors in the ceilings of all the rooms had been broken. Did they really think that Lao She was hiding up in the rafters, and that he'd escaped up there through a hole a few inches in diameter?!

It soon became obvious that he couldn't be hiding there, so where was he then? The tearaway youths racked their brains trying to work it out. At last they felt that something must have gone wrong and they all made off. After they'd gone I immediately drafted a letter, hurriedly disguised myself as best I could, and picking up my younger sister, rushed to the State Council reception centre. When a staff member came out I opened my overcoat so that he could see the proof—I had on the shirt that Father had been wearing the day before and had wrapped the opera costume sleeve that had been used to bandage his head around my waist.

The man listened carefully to what I had to say and accepted the letter, saying that the matter would be reported to the higher authorities immediately, and that we were not to worry any more. A few hours later Mother received a telephone call from the Premier's office informing her that the Premier had received the emergency report and that steps were being taken at that moment to locate Mr. Lao She. As soon as they had any news, they assured Mother, they would inform her immediately, but in the meantime there was nothing to do but wait patiently.

A day and a night passed in this way, with no word at all. The morning of the second day, 25 August, was also spent waiting and it was not until that afternoon that the Municipal Literary League phoned up to say that I should go over to their offices. They brought out a certificate and handed it to me. On it was written,

"Shu Sheyu of our League has divorced himself from the people by taking his own life. This is a specially issued certificate to this effect."

They had spent practically the whole day drafting this document and determining the "correct" analysis of Lao She's death. The most important thing, as far as they were concerned, was to make absolutely sure that all the responsibility was shifted from their shoulders. They then said I should go immediately to Taiping Lake outside Huokou to the west of Deshengmen gate to collect Father's body. They said that it would be best if I didn't mention this to Mother. It was obvious that they took the matter very seriously.

After the old driver had urged me to watch out for the wild dogs I asked the younger man to inform my mother when he got back to the League's offices that I was at Taiping Lake waiting for her. After that I sat down, guarding my dead father and waiting for my mother to arrive.

*

How had Father come to Taiping Lake? It was a riddle. And why had he come to Taiping Lake at all? Another riddle. I sat by the lake, with this puzzle going round and round in my mind.

Father had been discovered at dawn in the middle of the outer lake. A performer who lived nearby had come down to do his morning exercises by the lakeside and had spotted a body in the water a few feet out from the shore. He could only see the back of the head, which was showing just above the surface of the water. He ran and called for someone to come, but there was no-one around, only the lakeside dwellings of some fishermen in the distance. Finally some of the fishermen came over and they worked together to drag the body out of the water and pull it up on to the shore. The corpse was already icy cold.

On the shore the people found Father's uniform tunic, his glasses, his walking stick and his fountain pen. His identification card, on which was written his name and position, was in the pocket of his overcoat.

When it became clear who he was there was uproar among the onlookers. People thronged to the park the whole day. The news quickly spread through the northwestern suburbs of Peking. Staff from the Municipal Literary League, the neighbourhood police station and a forensic doctor all arrived at the scene. Someone brought that tattered old mat to cover the body up with.

The day before (i.e. 24 August), according to the park attendant, an old man had been sitting in the park for the whole day, from morning until night. Sitting there the whole day and scarcely moving at all. So in all likelihood the final scene of the tragedy took place ill the middle of the night. The old man still held a roll of papers in his hands, and at dawn there had been some other sheets of paper floating on the surface of the lake. Those sheets of paper were also carefully fished out of the water. On the pages several of Chairman Mao's poems had been copied down. The characters were the size of a walnut, carefully and neatly done in Lao She's inimitable hand. Was there not some final message written between the lines? This was an even bigger riddle. He had paper, a pen, the whole day's time, he had thoughts, things that he wanted to say, moreover he was a "writer".

Afterwards the Municipal Literary Association returned his uniform, fountain pen, glasses, and walking stick to us. But they never once let us look at those pieces of paper.

Taiping Lake was an out-of-the-way little park, with nothing special to recommend it. No ticket was required to enter and it had very few visitors. But in the space of a week, it had become a hallowed ground for martyrs: scores of people followed Father's example and drowned themselves there.

Taiping Lake did not feature in any of Father's works. I looked through all his books and could find no mention of it, even though the majority of his works used the names of real places in Peking as background. But I knew that he was familiar with this area. From September 1920 to September 1922, for two entire years, Shu Qingchun, as Lao She then was, at that time still in his early twenties, had been a private tutorial school inspector in the northern suburbs of Peking. His office was in the Huayan temple at Deshengmenwai and he was in charge of all the private tutorial schools in the areas of Xizhimenwai, Deshengmenwai, Andingmenwai and Dongzhimenwai.

At that time he went round all of the surrounding area. Was it then that he got to know Taiping Lake? More than likely. Everyone knows that the first book he wrote, Old Zhang's Philosophy, is set in Deshengmenwai. Man and the course of history are the same: sometimes, in confusion, they will move in circles, go through the same cycle, and return to where they began. Although it is really an upward spiral, in the end there's still a feeling of repetition. Father had become known through that story he wrote set in Deshengmenwai; after nearly fifty years it was to Deshengmenwai that he returned, back into nothing.

*

Twelve years after the tragedy at Taiping Lake I happened to be looking at a pre-liberation map of Peking one day and finally I discovered the reason why Father had gone to Taiping Lake. Taiping Lake was situated just outside the north-west corner of the old city wall, and it was very close to the alley by Guanyin temple at the north-west end of Xizhimen Street, just inside the city walls. The two were only separated by the city wall and the moat, and from the map looked to be very close to each other.

Guanyin temple alley was where my grandmother had spent the last years of her life. She lived there for ten years altogether in a big south-facing house that my father had bought for her. She died there in the summer of 1942. Suddenly it all became clear: Father had gone to find his own beloved mother.

Father was born into poverty. His father died when he was a child, and responsibility for bringing him up rested solely on his mother, who was of peasant stock. She was illiterate and had to take in washing and sewing, and work as a servant and manual labourer in order to bring up her family. She gritted her teeth and put her youngest son, Qingchun, into primary school, to become the only child in the Shu family who knew how to read and write. She also passed on to my father her qualities of integrity, kindness, warmth, industry, simplicity, honesty, love of flowers and of cleanliness, discipline, stoicism, determination, her retiring yet steadfast nature, and her character as a whole, which had an unyielding core beneath outward mildness.

Father adopted a peaceable attitude in dealing with people and situations, and he took it as a fact of life that he would always lose out. This was not a sign of weakness. Father could make do with anything, but his actions were governed by a basic priciple, and he would not step outside the boundaries that he had drawn up for himself. This was the unyielding core of his mildness. Father said,

"My true teacher, who gave me my character, was my mother. Mother was illiterate, and the lesson she taught me was how to live."

Sixty-seven years later, Father once more returned to rest at his mother's feet, to offer up his life to her. Perhaps this can be seen as a kind of repayment for that lesson in living. A conclusion to all she had taught.

*

Immediately after Father had died many different stories began circulating about his death. Rumours about the manner and cause of his death were rife. Japanese authors were extremely shocked by the tragedy and viewed his death as a great loss. Father lived on in their writing, and while the "Gang of Four" was still tyrannizing China, Japanese authors such as Tsutomu Mizakami and Kiyoshi Inoue published articles in remembrance of him. Kiyoshi Inoue, who was a friend of Father's, wrote a famous article in 1970 called "Pot" which was, in fact, a discussion of Father's death. In it he mentioned that the honoured Japanese writer, Mr. Hirokitsu, had expressed his lack of admiration for the Chinese character, as typified in the story of the Chinese man who would rather smash a priceless jade pot into a thousand pieces than give it to a rich man. But, when the news of Father's death reached Japan, Kiyoshi Inoue finally realized the true character of the poor Chinese man in the story Father had told him and Mr. Hirokitsu.

The Japanese woman author Kazuko Yoshisuke also wrote a long article called "The Mystery of Mr. Lao She's Death". Finally, the Japanese author Takatake Hiraki used Father's death as the theme for a novel entitled Shattered Jade which won the 1979 Yasunari Kawabata prize. They all earnestly hoped to find some deep meaning behind Father’s tragedy.

Ba Jin mentions Father’s death several times in the Record of Random Thoughts that he has been writing in recent years. He held that people simply couldn’t remain indifferent to the cruel way in which Father had died, and said, “Comrade Lao She is the finest example of the Chinese intellectual,” and added that there were lessons to be drawn from his death. Some well-meaning person said to Ba Jin:

“Don’t dwell on the past, you should look to the future and move forward.” But Ba Jin stubbornly replied:

“I remember everything that happened in the past very clearly.” In his article entitled, “Remembering Comrade Lao She” Ba Jin wrote,

“I remember his ‘last words’: ‘I love our country, but who loves me?’ I would like to grasp his hand tightly and say to him, ‘We love you, you will always be remembered, you will always live on in the hearts of the Chinese people!’” On 15 December 1979 Ba Jin said,

“Although to this day I am still not clear whether Comrade Lao She killed himself or was murdered, whether he threw himself into the lake full of resentment and hate, or was hounded to death, 1 am sure of one thing: the man is dead but the pot is whole, he has retained the most important thing—his integrity.”

Not long ago I read an article written by Comrade Huang Shang, in which he recalls a recent conversation he had with Ba Jin. They had been talking about Lao She’s death and Huang Shang said, “If you put me in Lao She’s place I wouldn’t have got into such a mess.” When he heard this Ba Jin retorted: “Don’t give me that!” in what Huang Shang describes as “a low voice with a severe tone seldom present in Ba Jin’s speech”.

It seems that essays are still being written about Father's death, and that the debate still continues.

*

To me Father’s death came so suddenly, like a bolt out of the blue, and of course it made my situation much worse. But after it had happened I never doubted for a moment that for Lao She there could have been no other course of action except the one he took at Taiping Lake.

Eighteen years ago when I sat alone keeping watch over Father’s body I accepted fate. For Father the outcome of the Cultural Revolution could only be this kind of sacrifice. Moreover, even as I was sitting on that bench by Taiping Lake, I could already see that there had been signs that something like this would take place, although at the time I had not paid much attention to them.

I remember that a few days before his death, I had returned home one Sunday and was talking with Father about the current situation. At that time the Cultural Revolution was in its preliminary stages, and the dreadful damage it would cause was still unimaginable. However, it was clear from Father’s words that he was already deeply troubled. And the way the situation developed unfortunately proved his words right, with his dire predictions being borne out by events. He said:

“The so-called ‘Cultural Revolutions’\fn{An allusion to the Crusades and the damage they caused the Eastern Roman Empire} that occurred in Europe in fact caused very serious damage to culture and the cultural heritage.” He said:

“I won’t put away my little antique bottles and pots, my calligraphy and my paintings. They are not the targets of the revolution, and nor am I. Who gave those children the right to destroy the “Four Olds”, to struggle against this, to smash that?” He said:

“People will die, especially people of spirit and integrity.” Having said this he brought up the example of two people who had been unable to bear the insults they had received in previous political movements and so had plunged head first into Shishahai Lake.

I gave no real thought at the time as to why he would want to bring up these two examples. After he had died I realized that contrary to the saying, “a careless word may be significant to the attentive listener”, in this case it was I, the listener, who had been careless, while Father had chosen his words carefully.

Even more significantly, Father wrote in his 1945 novel, Four Generations Under One Roof, about an old man called Qi Tianyou who died in exactly the same way as he himself died. This shocking similarity between fiction and reality seems to suggest that Father had already planned the manner of his death twenty years before the event.

At first glance, the deaths that Father mentioned and the way he described them seemed completely independent and unrelated. If there was any similarity between them it certainly didn’t seem noteworthy.

But these words all issued forth from his mouth and from his pen. I think that this indicates that in his mind he really had drawn a clear boundary, and when that boundary was over-stepped he had already fixed on what he would do. And I believe that a man of resolute character like himself, who would rather break than bend, could not escape tragedy. Even if he had hidden on 23 August, still he could not hide for a month, or two months, much less for the duration of the chaos which was to reign in the country for over ten years.

There are brave men in this world who would rather die than be dishonoured! I feel guilty, though, even if it had been no use, that I hadn't picked up on the clues he had given, and said something, however little, to try and talk him out of it. I believed in him, respected and admired him, I had absolutely no right to lecture him. It seems that I did not fully understand him, and that pains me and fills me with undying regret.

*

I don't know how long I sat on the bench that night. Daylight had already faded and all around me was pitch black. The park wasn't lit, and that night there was no moon and no stars to be seen. We two, father and son, one dead, one alive, were probably the only people left in the whole park.

It started raining, a light drizzle. I didn't move. Time passed and I wasn't sure whether it was the rain drops rolling down my face or tears. I loved that rain; because of it I did not have to hide my tears. I loved that rain, it could cry with me. I just felt a little cold.

I started to pity my father. For two days he hadn't eaten or drunk. Probably he had sat here numbly, in the same way as I was sitting at that moment, but for the entire day and half the night. And how had he passed that day and night? His head must have been full of complicated thoughts, painful and contradictory. When he closed his eyes surely he must have seen his whole life before him. When he opened his eyes, what was there? Nothing, a complete blank.

I didn't dare think further, and yet I couldn't get free of these kinds of thoughts. So I thought on, in fits and starts, and became more and more confused, until I was just left with a feeling of profound sadness for him.

There was no sound of traffic coming from the road. I thought that perhaps Mother would be arriving soon, so I stood up and went to the main street to meet her. In fact Mother and someone from the crematorium were arriving at Taiping Lake in a truck just at that moment. She didn't know where Father's body lay, and so, calling out my name, she started walking towards the outer lake. The urgency in her voice moved the park gatekeeper, and it was only with his help that they got Father up into the crematorium's car. Afterwards I hurried to the crematorium to fill out the forms. When I handed over the "certificate" (issued by the Municipal Literary League), the two girls on duty said,

"He's the first People's Deputy and member of the standing committee of the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference to be dealt with like this."

What they meant by "dealt with like this" is that his ashes were not allowed to be kept.

Father was thoroughly forsaken, even his ashes were obliterated. But the outside world was completely unaware of the misfortune that had overtaken him. At the very time of his death a foreign committee were preparing to award him a prestigious literary prize. When the news of Father's death was confirmed the prize was awarded to another outstanding author who was still alive. He was also an Asian. When the news went round everyone felt it keenly. How heavily Lao She's death weighed on everyone.

*

Even up to his death Father didn't believe that he had done anything wrong. And he didn't worry about being slandered and wrongly labelled as this or that, but rather about his attitude towards the people. He felt that he was blameless in this respect. And by his death he proved it.

Twenty days before his death Father had met Ba Jin in the Great Hall of the People. He said to Ba Jin earnestly,

"Please tell my friends in Shanghai that I have done nothing wrong!"

And it was in this belief that he participated in the movement. At the same time, it was in this belief that he faced the storm on 23 August. These words must have been the very last words that he thought of before he died.

Strangely enough, in the case of Father's writing, the more he loved and cherished it, the greater its power and influence, then the more severe the criticism it received. And most of that criticism came from Father's own friends, many of whom he had known years and years. Father was always very self-critical because he was an extremely modest person, and he never spoke effusively, especially about his own writing. He made no secret of his failings and would often say,

"What a mess I've made of that."

Looked at from a different angle this in fact shows that he was a straightforward and self-confident man. He assessed right and wrong on the evidence of his own eyes, and from this decided whether he should judge something harshly or praise it lavishly. As his thinking became more mature, his writing from the 1930s onwards no longer contained thinly drawn and idealized characters, and he no longer used simple plots where the conflict was resolved by the rich being killed and the poor being saved or by double-dyed villains being wiped out. He began to touch upon complex social problems in his work and approached his subject from a deeper historical perspective, attacking traditional morality and ethics, ideology and conventions and the social system which determined all of these. He wrote about people's good and bad points, and was a master at using lively language and vivid characters to dig out and expose the worst, most deeply buried and most life-threatening weaknesses and evil roots. This is particularly clear in the portrait he drew of Camel Xiangzi in the novel of the same name. On the one hand he wrote about Xiangzi's pride, his ambitions, his dreams, his staunchness and his power; on the other, he showed Xiangzi's degeneracy, his selfishness and his misfortune, describing him as the product of society's diseased womb, and as a wretch trapped in individualism's dead-end street.

In the end Lao She rejects Xiangzi, feeling that it is only in so doing that China can be saved and transformed into a better place.

On 24 August when father was walking by the shore of the lake what tormented him most was not his aching body nor the insults that he had suffered, but the fact that he had been misunderstood. After an entire day and half the night of turning the whole thing over in his mind his final thought was probably still,

"I haven't done anything wrong. The people understand me!" And then hardening his resolve to carry out the "good ... bye" that he had said to his granddaughter, he walked towards the tranquil water of the lake.

*

Father's death was a tragedy. His spirit of resistance through self-sacrifice, his dignified bearing under the most abnormal and bizarre circumstances had a tremendous impact. It brought forth a string of large question marks, and a string of even larger exclamation marks, as if he was admonishing: You were wrong, wrong!

When my friends and I had finished taking photographs of the site of Father's sacrifice we walked out of the site where the Taiping Lake had been. The noise of the city enveloped us again, the sunlight shone on Deshengmen gate.

I suddenly thought of the end of Teahouse. The death of Old Wang, the proprietor of the teahouse, and father's own death bore a startling similarity to each other. There was also the sunlight on the stage symbolizing better things to come which was the very image of the sunlight in front of my eyes.

I heaved a long sigh, sure of one thing: the tragedy was finally over.

1936

41.151 & 191.134 1. Excerpt from The Horse's Mouth 2. Excerpt from Grass Soup\fn{by Zhang Xianliang (1936-)} Nanjing, Xuyi County, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 15

1

… "I\fn{A note reads: Zhang Yonglin is sent off to undergo labor reform for the second time during the Cultural Revolution. Having endured persecution and humiliation, he discovers after getting married that he is impotent. After a day in the fields, he cannot bring himself to go home and face his wife. He wanders in the wilds, dejected and desperate.} know you don't really want to go back home."

A gray horse tossed its head and looked me straight in the eye.

"Take a look at yourself—here you are after only a month of married life and you're scared of sleeping with your wife. That's right now, isn't it? You're scared; scared of the night. As scared as I am of being harnessed to a cart."

"You can talk!"

I was so shocked that I fell flat on my arse, wetting the seat of my pants on the soggy turf.

The horse snorted in derision.

"If you could only see yourself now. You seem to have forgotten that blaring loudspeaker that hangs just outside my stall, and all the big-character posters I've munched in my time. The ink wasn't that nourishing, but the paper was good vegetable fibre, and tasted a lot better than some of the rubbish we're given to eat. I've come to realize that I was born into an unprecedented age of verbalizing. You humans may indeed be going downhill in every other respect, but you're all quite expert at manipulating language. It was no big deal for me to acquire the power of speech. Just a process of natural osmosis."

"Oh," I stammered, absolutely dumbfounded. "It's just … so very odd."

"That's what's wrong with you people," he commented. "Try to be like me, and learn the virtues of cool and silent observation. That's the way to survive peacefully in this world."

"Then what made you decide to open your mouth just now?" I queried.

"I know you don't want to go home," he snorted, "and it so happens that I don't want to either. At times like these I too feel the need to get away from everyone. We need to think things over in peace and quiet. Philosophy encompasses everything in the world, and, after all, the laws of nature that govern men and horses are much the same."

"If you say so," I agreed hesitantly.

He was right: deep down I really didn't want to go back. I felt like staying out in the wilds to work things out for myself.

"Perhaps I can be of some help," the horse offered in a clinical tone. "I may not have your 39 years of human experience, but in equestrian terms I'm an old nag, and as the saying goes, "an old horse knows the way." So maybe I can give you some advice."

"Since you're so perceptive, perhaps you'd like to give me your analysis of my situation."

He smacked his lips eagerly.

"I feel for you. Let's face it, we're both victims of a similar fate: as you probably know human beings castrated me too."

"I see, but I haven't been castrated. My member is still hale and hearty; it's simply stopped doing its duty. But why?"

"Before they got to me, all it took was the neigh of a filly or a whiff of her hind parts and I'd be head over hooves and off running. Nothing could hold me back. My tool never failed me, and I can assure you it always threw me into fits of ecstasy. But when they were through with me I lost all sense of sexual stimulation and I became completely indifferent to everything—"

"But I still feel the urge!" I cried. "When she first wanted to sleep with me I could get it up all right—the first, second and even a few other times. It's only recently that I've lost interest. I get frightened by my own impotence."

The horse neighed a series of strange chilling laughs.

"You set far too much store by such things; doesn't it make you feel crude and vulgar? Sexual impotence must inevitably destabilize your whole personality. You're an educated man; you must be aware of the fact that every man is an integral part of a complex ecosphere, and that it is necessary to analyze every individual system within the context of the whole. If one part of the system goes haywire, it only stands to reason that all the other systems will also be thrown out of kilter. At least you can fall back on your political beliefs, your ideals and lofty aspirations, can't you?"

"But I'm pretty sure none of that has anything to do with my condition," I replied halfheartedly. "Sima Qian, the Grand Historian of the Han dynasty, was castrated by imperial command as a punishment, yet he went on to write his great masterpiece—"

"Hah, hah."

The horse let out a raucous laugh and then snorted loudly.

"Quite the scholar, aren't you, my dear herdsman? You may be well read, but unfortunately in this case I'm afraid you're guilty of faulty logic. The 'palace punishment' they dished out to the old boy was a horribly wicked form of physical torture, but more likely than not it spurred him on to complete his chronicles. I'd even go so far as to speculate that if it hadn't been for his castration he would have never written the book. The world may have lost a set of genitals, but it gained a masterpiece. It's an example of that Mao quote you hear so often on the radio about 'some good coming out of something bad.'

"And here you are as strong and healthy as one of my own kind. They dragged you out to the execution ground but you came away unharmed. Physically you're perfectly healthy, it's just your mind that's all screwed up. The shock you suffered has left its mark on you and affected your entire nervous system. Do you honestly think you can compare yourself to the Grand Historian?"

"You're right, I know."

I lowered my head.

"But please continue."

"This is the very thing we have in common," the horse said to me with a sympathetic gleam in its eye. "My castration has robbed me of the urge to have sex, and I have had no choice but to abandon even the luxury of fantasies. It's because I'm not like the normal run of animals that I have been able to liberate myself from animal dumbness. In a way my achievement is not unlike yours. No one can deny the fact that during your long years of forced labor in the fields you have been able to familiarize yourself with the quotations of Marx, Engels, Lenin, Stalin and Mao. But on the other hand, you haven't had anything cut off—excuse me if I'm not expressing myself properly—well, at least not like the Grand Historian. However, like me you suffer an impairment; though mine is physical and yours mental, the end result is the same: we are both doomed to lives of under-achievement. We are fated to be subject to the whims of others, to follow their lead, to be whipped into compliance and to be rode over roughshod.

"Hee, hee, we're quite a pair: a eunuch and a castrated horse! Do forgive me, I often have considerable trouble keeping a rein on my sense of humour. Even in this respect we resemble each other. We both enjoy being ironical and indulging in caustic satire. We like to give ourselves over to harmless humor, irreverent rantings and wild exaggerations.

"I'll even go so far as to say that you intellectuals have allowed yourselves to be lobotomized, or rather that you have suffered the ill-effects of the linguistic acrobatics of the age. If only one out of ten Chinese males were a real man, this country wouldn't be in the mess it is. I don't know how you feel about it, but I'm bored stiff listening to that loudspeaker all day long. Do you really mean to tell me that with your highly developed linguistic prowess you humans can't come up with something better for your broadcasts?"

"So you mean, I'm done for," I finally said in a mortified tone.

"What do you mean done for?" the horse asked me sternly, raising its head. "You've had your go at life. You've worked, seen many things, eaten lots of meals, heard about all kinds of strange happenings: watched a head of government turn into a common criminal, and a petty hooligan become vice-chairman of a political party with tens of millions of members overnight, just to give a few examples. And after all that you drop dead. It's the same for everybody. And you've been relatively lucky; at least you've had the good fortune to live in an age of unprecedented absurdity. What more can you possibly ask for? Ah, perhaps you also had hopes of helping produce another generation?"

"No, I don't have any illusions on that subject. But as you just said yourself, if the country is endlessly staging farces, even if I did have offspring they would be condemned to re-enact the mean tragedy that has been my life. It would be better for them not. to be born at all."

I put my hands to my head.

"What I am trying to say is that a person should strive to make some contribution to the world, do something creative for his fellow men—"

"In heaven's name, get rid of the desire you have to create, whatever you do. Resign yourself to your place in the world. Be like me."

"According to what you say my wife's right. I'm useless, only half a man."

I felt my cheeks, they were icy cold with tears.

"Ah … that's right." He let out a long, deep sigh. "Why do men castrate us? Because they want to deprive us of the power to create, so we'll be entirely at their beck and call. If we weren't castrated we would still have our own free will. As it is, we often outsmart you humans. If we were whole how would you be able to manipulate and exploit us? Why go on with all this rubbish about creativity?"

I was speechless. I felt maligned and my stomach churned uncomfortably.

The horse suddenly tossed his head back in horror. His nostrils flared and he took a few deep breaths.

"I smell a hint of carnal desire. It's not something coming from you, but it envelops you like an aura. How very odd. Beware, herdsman. We should be going now. I don't want to see you suffer any further misfortunes. After all, you're one of the kinder ones." …

2

1

I don't know why this was the day I began writing a diary.\fn{Entry—11 July [1960]: Capitalist construction: hauled dirt clods} Nothing unusual had happened in the "farm" where I was being reformed. I had been sent in on 18 May 1958, and had already been here over seven hundred days.

I had adjusted to it, as if I'd been raised here and spent my life here. A sharp knife had sliced through the middle of my existence—the half of which I was now conscious had been tossed into this barren wasteland. Where the other half was I had no idea; I wasn't even sure if I had ever been whole before. Hacking away at the earth, the only painful sensations I had were physical. After hurting for more than seven hundred days I was numb. I no longer felt the pain, I only felt hunger.

If this thin diary did not exist, I might begin to wonder if that part of my life was real. People have poor memories. They deal with the present—whether it is joyful or painful. But the present and mankind within it are the consequence of the past, just as the future is the result of the past. The lives of men do not pass without a trace, disappear as though they had never been lived. Many living in China today dare not admit this—they dare not face the past, and some are unwilling to face elements of the present. For this reason I have felt that I should make this most real of diaries public, also that I should annotate it so that people can understand it.

On this evening of 11 July I have opened a small diary that I bought at the camp shop. Poised to write something in it, I am astonished by the pen in my hand. It may be that I want to write this diary simply because I own a pen.

A pen is not a tradable commodity in a labour reform camp. Nobody wants one, even in exchange for a tiny pinch of tobacco, or the smallest piece of flatbread. In a labour camp, the exchange value of an object depends entirely on whether or not it helps you survive. Things that have nothing to do with survival are of zero value.

Except for the pen, I had already traded everything that could help me survive for a little food. And I had already eaten the food. Preserving a body that had "life" in it in the purest physiological sense was all that mattered to me. If human beings could withstand the cold and live naked in the world, like monkeys, then I would long ago have taken off my pants and traded them for something to eat.

My pen was an imported brand. It gleamed among my few belongings. I felt, when I held it, that it gave off its own heat, a heat that was capable of warming your insides. This pen reminded me that I had once lived in a different world. Yes, that other world would come into my mind at times, but it would seem an illusion. It would bring with it an inexplicable melancholy. More importantly, the pen reminded me that skills I had learned in another world might be used in this one. When I had exhausted all other means of staying alive, I was tempted to try this pen.

The sparkling object was incongruous in a labour camp, so out of harmony with its surroundings. Yet it was the sole material connection I had with that other world. Its shimmering sparkle was a ray of hope.

I used the pen to survive. This diary was written in the interstices, the cracks of time, when I wasn't either working in the fields or writing something else. As I wrote it, the first thing I would think of was not what had happened on a particular day, nor of the thoughts I might have had that were worth setting down. Instead, I would think first of the events or thoughts that I must absolutely not write down. The social circumstances in which we were living at that time did not allow a person to have personal thoughts or private matters. Anything private had to be "handed over" to the Party. This included, of course, a diary. Depending on the degree of secrecy and the degree of evasion, the leaders would evaluate one's loyalty to the Party. People who willingly handed over their most unmentionable secrets were considered to be most loyal.

In order to express absolute loyalty, infinite loyalty, some people would fabricate anti-Party and anti-Socialist thoughts that they had never had. It was these people who eventually suffered most, who were thrown into the labour camps to be reformed. Among the multitude of "thought criminals", people who were sentenced because of their thinking, many had handed over diaries to the leaders which contained a few words or sentences that were incriminating.

So, experience taught people to be hypocritical. As political movements started rolling over the country, gathering in ever more people, the experience became general, to the point that dishonesty became a common practice among all Chinese. Dishonesty not only permeated our daily lives, it affected our standard of ethics and culture—not just then but also later.

Since written words were used to expose counter-revolutionary thinking, naturally words could also be used to whitewash oneself. Experience taught people how to use all kinds of written devices to transmit to the leaders information that might be useful to themselves. This was often done in an indirect way, but was another manifestation of general falseness. And so a diary could become a work of self-promotion, written not for oneself but for others to see.

In the 1960s, many diaries of martyrs or even living heroes were made public in China. These would be ffiled with the lofty spirit, the progressive thinking of their authors, and they would be prescribed as required reading, "study material", by the leaders. On the surface the author would seem to be a genuine individual, honestly setting down a record of his soul with only himself in mind. In fact, from the start he would be writing a recitation for his readers.

I did not want to become a martyr or a hero, but I also did not want to get into trouble as a result of this diary. Since I had decided to write it, it was imperative that I be prepared for the possibility that the diary might fall into someone else's hands. I had to think about how I might explain its entries, how I could safely be "responsible" for it. Consequently, the diary could be no more than a ledger.

Later the diary was indeed confiscated, during a political movement known as the One-Blow-Three-Counters Movement. After scrutinizing it, the leaders of the state farm where I was then working failed to find any serious problems, and so the diary did not become incriminating evidence when they sentenced me. Both the diary and I were allowed to remain in existence.

Today, this ledger-like quality has made my task much harder. Li Daoyuan, of the Northern Wei dynasty,\fn{386-534AD} is said to have spent many years verifying details before he completed his famous Notes on the Water Classic. But excavating events in the memory is no easier than searching through ancient books.

That period in my life is like a dream, hazy as mist—in order to make reality reappear as it was then, not only do I have to divorce myself from the present, allowing my mind to be steeped in the past, but I have to experience once again the trauma of that past.

Tormenting the mind and body in order to annotate a historical document is not something most scholarly writers experience. And yet I rejoice that I did not write this diary in more detail. If I had added just one more word in places, I would not be sitting here peacefully working today. Long ago the diary would have become part of the file of a dead man, and as such it would have been destroyed.

The notebook was confiscated in 1970, after which the inspectors began marking it up with queries. To this day I don't know why they did not cross-examine me. I indicate below where the marks were made, but the fact that they occurred in only two places shows how carefully this diary was written.

In 1980, after I had been rehabilitated, the diary was presented to me together with other documents. The other documents, performance records, self-examinations, statements by other people informing on me and accusing me, were all, as government regulations decreed, destroyed before my eyes. I begged that this diary be exempted and preserved. It has become the only connection I have now with that former world.

Can it be that that precious springtime in my life, expended in hard labour, has nothing more to show for itself than this? The yellowing pages, the fading ink of the characters lead me back, one by one, to past events. They make it impossible for me to doubt that these events did indeed make up my life.

I do not want to judge the past. I also do not want to use material that has only recently become available to enhance these notes. I want the diary to stand as an original manuscript, telling people just how far the world can fall. And how, even at that debased material and spiritual level, people go on living.

*

To go back to that first day, 11 July 1960. "Capital construction", which is what I have written for this date, in fact just meant building a house. We had no idea why, when we were starving, when convicts were dying in groups at a time, we should be mobilized to build a house. July is a relatively idle time in the north-west: the summer crops have been harvested and the autumn crops are already planted. In the past, farmers would use this time to recuperate. They would lay their weary bodies on the earth that sustained them, in the shade of willows, beside small brooks. Poets would look at this contentment and idealize it in verse, particularly when they themselves felt frustrated. Small farming villages have always seemed a lost paradise for Chinese.

But when the policy of turning farms into communes began, farmers no longer had a single day of ease. Since then not one of the year's three hundred and sixty-five days has been a rest day for them, let alone for convicts in labour reform camps. Hard labour is considered the only way to reform a man's thinking—like prescribed medicine, it can't be stopped for a single day.

The weather this July was particularly fine. People were starving, but the sun had not become any less robust because of that. She was as full and abundant as ever. I often think back to those pollutionless blue skies, those carefree fluffy clouds. We seldom see such unsullied skies today. From the "construction site" where we were going to build this house, that is, from a raised bank of earth, you could see the paddy rice glisten below like black-green satin. A hot breeze would come in, carrying with it the fragrance of the fields, making our feeble work song a little less exhausted.

Brothers, raise the earth-rammer!
Pound it hard!
Bastard if you don't pound hard!
Give it to her fucking hard!

Good weather and a good season could lessen the pain and hunger. This too may have been a reason I started to write the diary at this time.

Since the weather was so good, the propaganda bulletins that the leaders were issuing were especially hard to believe.

"Grain output has gone down in consecutive years as a result of natural disasters, so we are instituting a policy of 'lowered-rations-to-be-substituted-with-gourds-and-greens'."

No matter how outrageous, how ludicrous this seemed, nobody dared to ask the leaders for an explanation. Everyone appeared to believe the statement implicitly-what energy remained in our bodies was put into hard physical labour in order to reform.

Years later, I finally understood how the Chinese people, all together, could sink into the hell of famine for three whole years.\fn{The generally accepted figure for the number of people who died of famine or famine-related causes from 1960-1962 is thirty million. [So the translator of this book. In "Confessions: An Innocent Life in Communist China" the figure 20,000,000 occurs, with the same guarantee of general acceptance. Perhaps the true figure is by now unknowable. The first figure is approximately 5,000,000 short of the population of California in 2009; the second is about 3,000,000 short of the population of New York that same year. Something like 700,000,000 people lived in the People's Republic of China in 1962; so strictly in terms of life lost, these figures are utterly miniscule, even when compared to the population of the United States, itself barely 5% of the world's total:H]} The real reasons for what was happening were announced to us too late, but this was not an inconvenience to us. On the contrary, it allowed us the chance to appear surprised. It gave us the opportunity to arrange our recollection of those events as though they were a tragi-comedy, a farce, rather than a disaster.

Most of the labour reform convicts had been put through "heat treatment" in their original work-units. Like alloyed steel, they had been imbued with qualities that made them well suited for doing labour reform. Many actually felt fortunate to be in a camp and away from the heat treatment, as though coming to do labour reform was a favourable change. Just as a blind man might feel grateful to fall off a single-plank bridge and find himself in a shallow, dry ditch, the convicts felt quite relieved. Anything was better than being "criticized and struggled against" in the heat treatment. Before, a thousand-league precipice had been yawning under their feet. Saved from that, why should they question China's leaders now?

Whatever we're given to eat we'll eat, was their attitude. Even if the labour reform camp supplied no food at all, they were there by the grace of the leaders. And so, although the labour was performed without much enthusiasm, back in the barracks there was often laughter and high spirits.

The weather was good; this work we had been assigned was also good. Building a house, strictly speaking, meant no more than mixing earth and water and gumming together earthen clods piled up into a wall. A few boards and a reed roof were then laid on top. A house was a square-shaped shelter that could keep out the wind and rain, not much more. Later the phrase "Learn from Daqing"\fn{After the supposedly true testimonies of amazing results produced by a model collective farm of that name:H} was promulgated, and this kind of house was given its own term in the dialect of the northwest: it was called a gandalei, or "clod-pile".

"Hauling dirt clods" is a very simple kind of labour. The earthen clods we used for bricks were not really fired —we just dug them out of the ground with shovels, let them dry and then used them. As a result, each was irregular. Instead of a brick, you could only call it a clod. Each clod weighed about seven to ten kilos. I could haul three of them at a time, at the most four. My whole body, including my belt, weighed no more than forty-four kilos, so three or four clods weighed about the same as I did. I would carry this weight, not only the clods but also my own weight, and walk with it for some fifty to one hundred metres.

The simplest things in life often cause the most trouble. This may be why leisure-loving mankind has made work into a more and more complex thing. The irregular, multi-sided clods would roll around on my back, digging into my spine at every step. When I say spine, I mean the actual bones, since there wasn't a scrap of extra flesh on my entire body. I could hear the scraping of the dry hard clods against those bones—the sound was slightly sharp, giving it a derisive tone. Sometimes a sweetness would well up in my throat, but I never actually spat blood—the only visible blood was on my back, where the thin layer of skin had been scraped away. That didn't count, since I couldn't see it. If you could manage to carry on, the skin quickly grew a protective layer of calluses. Our name for them was "old silkworm cocoons". And if you couldn't carry on, you had to anyway.

Hauling clods also had its easy side. This came when you walked down the road on the return. People who work at any heavy job will get a commensurate reward—for example, the road back was exactly as long as the road going. It was often hard to contain an appreciation for the fairness of the laws of nature. And what a road! It was a dry road, no water, no muck. Not only could bare feet slapping against the ground feel the warmth and dryness of the earth, they could also raise little puffs of fine dust. After I set a load down, I could enjoy the sensation of being free.

*

The diary starts on the 11th of July, but I must describe the work in the paddy fields that I was doing before that, or the reader will not understand my sense of release. He will not know why hauling clods was such good work.

Rice paddies are seeded in May. By July the sprouts are already at the plucking\fn{I.e., transplanting} stage. Before this, we would already have weeded them countless times. The people in Ningxia have a saying:

"Rice pull nine, starved dogs you'll find."

This forced rhyme means that the more weeds and grasses you pull out of a rice field, the better the rice plants grow—and the more rice you grow, the less likely you'll starve. Fewer starving humans means fewer corpses for dogs to feed on.

While you weed, you serve two functions: pulling up grass and at the same time stamping the field, using your feet to crush down rotted plant matter so that it goes into the earth and fertilizes it. The relationship between weed-pulling and starving dogs may be far-fetched, but in order to follow this ancient bit of farm lore we had to immerse ourselves in water from May till July.

The rice fields of the labour camps were created out of virgin land. When you turned irrigation water on to such land, the weeds would leap upward for sheer joy. All kinds: sha-grass, ice-grass, gao-grass, reeds, even jiji-grass which will normally grow only in arid regions. To convicts who had to weed these things out, all the myriad plants of the earth seemed to have gathered at our feet, other than immortal's palms, which do only grow on the desert.

A pair of hands were all that was required. We weeded no differently from the time our ancestors first entered the Agricultural Stage of Society thousands of years ago. We would bend our backs and pull from before sunrise to the time the moon came up. If it was a particularly bright moonlit night and it was still possible to distinguish rice shoots from weeds, then we would just keep on pulling. Sometimes, however, the convicts would be weeding a field, and when they looked back they wouldn't see any rice. A vast sheet of black water would be all that was left.

The Troop Leader would then have hard work to do—he would have to run up and down the banks of the field, looking through the weeds to see if there were any rice stalks in them. Were the convicts intentionally sabotaging production? Pulling up rice shoots along with the weeds? Usually his efforts would be in vain—the young shoots would long ago have been murdered by the healthy weeds.

After more than seven hundred days of wielding a shovel and hoe, my soles and palms had passed through the bloody stage and grown a protective layer of calluses. Legs cannot accustom themselves to constant immersion, however. Certainly not in that water. Dense with rotted vegetable matter, salts and minerals, it was more a kind of supersaturated solution. The people of Ningxia described it accurately as "mud soup". Every time you stamped your foot, a stinking smell would erupt from the black mud that it disturbed. Such nasty smells were insignificant, but the mud soup held substances that burned and stung your skin. After half a day, your legs would be covered with a layer of red welts. A layer is the only term I can use for it, because you couldn't possibly count the sores individually. From the waterline downward, the leg would be a dense confusion of blisters. Very descriptively, Ningxia people called these "crazy-itching bumps".

As soon as the bumps came out on your legs they would start to itch, and this was not a normal sort of itching. It was an itch that worked its way into the soul, an itch that drove men to madness. Some convicts would hold one leg and jump around on the other while they howled, as though they had been severely burned. If you tried to scratch the bumps with your fingernails, you would find you were "scratching through thick boots", another descriptive phrase, used to mean that something has no effect. Scratching would not stop the itching in the slightest. The best thing might have been to rub the legs with sandpaper, but where were you going to find sandpaper in a labour camp? An alternative was to use a dry, hardened old towel, and rub like crazy.

Needless to say, legs are made of skin and flesh. They are not like metal rods—once you had scratched for a while you would scrape through the skin. At that point the itching would be replaced by pain, but this was much easier to bear. I later read a definition of the concept of itching:

"Itching can be considered a very slight form of pain."

The author of this dictionary clearly never seriously itched in his life.

The medical name for "crazy-itching bumps" was "rice-paddy inflammation". Though it was a simple, common form of skin infection, there was no simple, common medicine with which to treat it. In order to make it possible for us to keep on working, pulling weeds in the rice fields, we were issued machine oil, the kind used to lubricate tractor engines. We were told to spread this on our legs as a preventative, at least as a layer of something between skin and water.

Machine oil is adhesive—it stops up the pores of the skin and becomes inconvenient when you want to sleep at night. But the worst thing was that the machine oil was not effective. In the water it was not necessarily any better and out of the water it was definitely unsatisfactory. So the question was, should one paint on machine oil or not? Should one imprison the two legs for twenty-four hours a day, or simply itch? Each course of action had its persuasive arguments. This was the sort of quandary that drove the convicts crazy.

The best solution was to get out of the water. To get out of the mud soup. We would bind a thick wad of weeds with other weeds and then toss the bundle up on to the nearby bank, and every time we did this we glimpsed that oh-so-desirable dry land. We were like sailors, out at sea for days, finally catching sight of land on the horizon. It was so close to us and yet so remote. We never knew when we would be allowed to dock, to enjoy the land's dryness.

Today, 11 July, we had finally come to shore. The diary starts this day, although I may already have worked on land for several days. Like a sailor who has finally reached his destination, it was only possible to think of writing in this new frame of mind.

The fact that I had come back to dry land wa probably the main reaqson that I started the diary on this day.

2

Still hauling clods today.\fn{Entry—12 July: Hauled dirt clods, picked throgh greens, wrote eulogy "Shine On, Crimson Rays."} Hauling clods is the lowest-level job in building a house. All you need is legs, hands and the ability to walk—anyone can do it. You don't need to use your brain at all. There is no trick to it, and there is nothing like "responsibility". Even better, it involves walking on dry land.

I could now be considered doubly blessed. My back had turned to a bloody pulp and my bones hurt from the scraping. But that kind of hurting was hardly worth mentioning—it was no more than a very slight form of itching. The convicts who laid the bricks had it no easier than we did. They didn't have to carry loads that were the same weight as their own bodies, but they did have to use a bricklayer's cleaver to try to shape our clods. When they held up a clod and tried to figure out where to begin, their hands looked as though they were handling a red-hot coal.

It would have been hard for a physicist or an engineer to make a straight, free-standing wall out of those irregular lumps. The bricklayers would often curse the convicts hauling in the clods, telling them to bring proper, complete, brick-shaped ones.

"You go get them yourselves!" the clod-hauling convicts would say, pleased at their own sense of humour. These bricklayers weren't Group Leaders,\fn{Group leaders were convicts selected to be in charge of small groups of around 20 men} after all. Who cared about them! Clod haulers cared only about transporting clods to the side of the wall. That was it. Whether or not a clod was usable was someone else's business.

Convicts doing hard labour pay strict attention to their own task. Doing their job, they become nothing more than a tool—there is no need for them to consider the requirements of the next step in the procedure. Something so simple as not blocking the next step on purpose is sufficient to qualify a man for being an up-to-the-mark, model convict.

In "capital construction", those who wielded the brick-layers' cleavers were called "big workers". Convicts who transported the clods were called "small workers". Then there were some small workers, also convicts, who did odd jobs for the big workers, like mixing mud, hauling mud, handing up clods, etc. Each wall of the building was made of many-sided irregular clods, and all these diamond-faceted many-sided clods relied on nothing but dried mud to hold them together.

There is a joke about an irresponsible capital construction worker. He tells his mates, once a house is built,

"OK! You stand here and prop up the walls, while I go get the money. Don't let go until I've got it."

The point is that these buildings are only reliably standing when you lean against them and actually hold them up. The minute you move away, the thing falls down.

In a labour camp, of course, this way of doing things was impossible. There was no money to be fetched at the end of a job, and whoever built a wall that fell down would be in worse shape than the wall. He would be accused of sabotaging production.

What was one to do? The only solution was to use plenty of mud to try to glue the thing together.

“Whether it holds or not is all in a slap of mud.”

This was the big workers’ secret formula for success. The most irregular bricks served the function of filling in holes in the wall.

Fortunately the soil of the loess plateau makes a kind of mud that, once dried, becomes as hard and durable as if it had been fired in a kiln. It could probably withstand a grade-five earthquake.\fn{The Chinese do not use the Richter Scale but a scale increasing from one to five “grades”} Of course, building this way meant that you had to use a very large amount of mud—so the small-worker assistants had to work even harder, transporting and mixing earth and water. If these small workers relaxed for a moment they would be cursed by the big workers.

The big workers were important people in the process of capital construction—they had technique, and they had responsibility. As a result, the Troop Leader favoured them, and when they cursed the small workers he would help out and curse them too.\fn{Troop Leaders were not convicts and were in charge of several hundred men} No matter what had happened, the small worker was always at fault. Convicts who were big workers took this opportunity to use their power. If, for example, a big worker was at odds with a small worker, then the swearing at the small worker would be endless. The unfortunate underling, unable to do anything right, would have to put up with curses from the time the sun went up and work began until the sun went behind the mountains and everyone knocked off.

When a big worker started cursing, his use of language would be infinitely more vivid than when he simply made a speech to one of the groups. Not only would he want to sleep with the small worker’s mother, he would also describe every part of the mother’s body in exquisite detail. Both Troop Leaders and convicts were acutely appreciative of this graphic use of language; I too could become transfixed just listening to it. This was another benefit, an entertainment programme, that was not available when you were working in the rice paddies.

Convicts who were allowed to have a bricklayer’s cleaver and work as a big worker were usually those who had been trained in physical labour on the outside. Most of the small workers had been intellectuals. They were rightists, historical counter-revolutionaries or other thought-offenders, and this kind of person could only do things that required no physical skill. When they came into the camps, they were fit only for simple hard labour. Not only in working, but also in cursing, intelletual convicts were no match for convicts who were born to work. First, they were incapable of using the language that way. Second, they did not dare talk back, especially with the Troop Leader on the side of the big workers. As a result, when you heard cursing, on the construction ground or in a rice paddy, you could be pretty sure that its object was an intellectual convict.

Don’t think, however, that intellectuals let themselves be bullied all the time. There were many occasions when intellectual convicts attacked labourers in denunciation meetings. On the Outside people might not have had the slightest problem with one another, but on the Inside the conflicts were legion. This collective, this group of people, was like a mill for grinding ball-bearings. Everything thrown into it was ground against everything else. This was another one of the means of labour reform—forcing people into collisions with one another. Like a ball-bearing plant, the function of a labour camp is to process goods, to abrade them and mix them together until each unit is just like the others.

Yes, hauling dirt clods on your back is an excellent job. As an intellectual, not only would I not be cursed at, but I could have the pleasure of seeing others cursed. I could enjoy the artistry that went into flinging invective. To hurt and be cursed too was much worse than just hurting. Although those being cursed were my own kind, intellectuals, when your stomach is empty and your back is carrying a weight nearly equal to your own, sympathy and compassion are fairly well worked out of you. You could say that they have already been metabolized. And when you are at that point, seeing others in a worse condition can turn into a kind of comfort. The perception of suffering is relative to your point of view. You need only see that others are suffering more and your own suffering will suddenly feel less.

When you grasp that point, you begin to realize that whatever can be apprehended by the senses does not, by itself, exist. It is merely a function of your own mind. One cannot then blame God, Allah or the so-called leaders of a country for disregarding the people’s suffering, or for bringing endless tribulations upon a country. Nor can they be blamed for allowing some people to inflict on others what so many of those others considered to be pain. (Can’t you see the carefree nature of my short diary entry on this day?)

*

“Picking through greens” meant helping the chief cook prepare vegetables. The labour reform camp had four Stations—a Station was a sub-camp, a division of the camp as a whole. Each Station had eight hundred to one thousand men. The kitchens for making food for so many convicts were naturally quite large. The lower each man’s grain ration, the greater the expenditure of the camps on water and wild plants. It took quite a few hands to deal with all this: lighting the coal, drawing water, washing pots, picking through greens etc. The most envied job in the camps was being a temporary small worker in the kitchen. It was something like being assistant to the general manager of a large company on the Outside. Sick men, lying in the infirmary, would compete for the privilege if they could.

In a period when the rule was "lowered-rations-to-be-substituted-with-gourds-and-greens", vegetables became the main course of the meal, not the side dish. Indeed, people kept themselves going by eating nothing but vegetables. In order not to confuse the reader, I should add that the vegetables we ate were not the kind found on a menu. They were more likely to be found in a textbook on botany. Many varieties were available, like the weeds in the rice paddies; for example, there was just about every kind of grass.

It is true that I enjoy eating all kinds of grass, but I particularly favour bitter greens and purslane. Kukucai\fn{Bitter greens} and dandelions are in the "composite" family, like chrysanthemums. Dandelion greens have apparently become the rage on the tables of Europe and Japan. At that time we had no inkling of their fashionable future—we knew the plants simply as "grass", or "wild greens", and we ate a lot of them.

Grass that had been dug from the fields and carted into the kitchen had to go through a process of being picked through before it could go in the pot. The convicts who dug up the plants often handed over roots and all to the kitchen. They knew that they were going to eat these things, but that didn't make them more careful. Like everything else, there was a daily quota on the quantity of greens a convict had to dig up. Leaving the roots and dirt on greens would increase the weight. It was the same principle as hauling clods of earth and not caring whether or not they could be used in a wall.

"Picking through greens" was not a matter of dividing edible plants from inedible ones. There was no plant that had been dug up and brought in that we wouldn't eat. The term also did not refer to removing dead leaves and crushed stems—if you did that you were considered unfit for the job and the cook would yell at you. No, "picking" meant nothing more than shaking the dirt off the plants. And that was a splendid job. It was even better than hauling clods. When I did it all I had to do was bring along a clod of earth to use as a stool. I would sit beside a great pile of grass, then slowly, slowly, I would shake the plants stalk by stalk. If a piece of bitter greens or purslane was especially juicy and lovely, naturally I would taste it. By the time the greens were picked, I would have eaten my fill.

The weather was fine and hot. The sun did its best to shine out over the land and the people on it. I would move my pile of grass and my clod over to a shadier place—I doubt if people sitting under awnings at the beach could have been any more content. A lot of the grass would already be limp and shrivelled after being dug up, carted to the kitchen and left for a while. What I ate, however, was generally buried in the middle—it was grass that still exuded the moist fragrance of the earth. What's more, after being sealed in the middle of the pile, the juicier plants would sometimes have begun a natural fermentation.

In the outside world, people used to joke about a poor man who pretended to be living in luxury. Every time he finished eating, he would wipe his mouth with pork rind, so that when he went out people would think he'd just eaten meat. Here in the camps, the trick would be to see whether or not a convict's mouth was green. He would be envied and considered a lucky man if he had any chlorophyll on his lips.

The Troop Leader would often scrutinize the mouths of the convicts to see if they had stolen any greens. Clever convicts would wipe their mouths constantly as they ate on the sly, as refined and gentlemanly as though they were sitting at a formal dinner. If such a convict ran into an over-zealous Troop Leader, though, he was in trouble: the Troop Leader would crack open the suspect's mouth and study his teeth, exactly like examining the mouth of a horse. This was not, after all, a banquet hall: there was no water to rinse out your mouth! Generally, a convict examined meant a convict who was caught.

When a "greens eater" was caught, he would be photographed. I'll describe what that meant later: if the reader carries on, he will learn some interesting things.

I, however, did not have to worry. Assigning me to be a cook's assistant, to pick through greens, was essentially the same as giving me special treatment. And so my work on this day was not at all onerous: I hauled clods in the morning and picked through greens in the afternoon, both highly desirable jobs. Only convicts who enjoyed the status of "being looked after" could be so lucky.

*

These were generally convicts who had "preservation value", or convicts who had a particular use. The former included those who had been influential on the Outside, who had a certain standing, or those with whom the leaders of the camp were friendly. For example, one cadre who was sent here to do labour reform came from a province-level post in the government. Once in the camp, he did not have to do a single day of physical work. The leaders allowed him to teach juvenile delinquents. He had a private room, he didn't need to line up with the rest of us at mealtimes, and in the evening he wasn't required to listen to reports and lessons.

Then there was another man who enjoyed the reputation of being the model for a war hero in some novel. After Liberation he was Deputy Mayor in a southern city, but his luck turned when he came to the northwest—when he got to the camp, he found he had to compete with the pigs for their fodder. The camp leaders discovered this, though, and immediately assigned him to chief cook in the main kitchen. In no time at all he was fatter than any cadre.

The second kind of convict to enjoy special treatment were convicts with special expertise, some ability to do a task the camp could not do without. A driver of a heavy truck or an experienced field overseer fitted this category. These men were established as high-class convicts in the camps. It was necessary to make sure they stayed alive.

The reason for my special treatment was a temporary one.

Although I could be said to have a certain influence in the world—I had been singled out by name as a rightist in the People's Daily—that "influence" was completely negative. Therefore I should have been in the ranks of those who had no preservation value at all, quite unlike that cadre with a province-level position. Preservation value depended on whether or not a man's continued existence would advertise the greatness and the rightness of the policy of labour reform. Also on whether or not a man, in the future, could emerge from the camps to play some useful role in the organs of the Party and the government.

Among those of us in the creative arts who had committed crimes, however, there had never been a single model example of successful reform. On the contrary, if this kind of person were taken care of, were allowed to live, it would serve as a lesson to other writers that committing crimes was not so bad. Authors would be free to compete for the honour, thereby adding to the troubles of society.

Our leaders seem to have an instinctive suspicion of writers; they are also unconsciously jealous of them. Six years later,\fn{I.e., during the Cultural Revolution} this mentality was even more pronounced. By then, other than through some lucky fluke, no writer could avoid plunging to the lowest depths of misfortune.

Even at those depths, such flukes of luck could happen. I was now enjoying one. And since it was purely by chance that I was being looked after, I appreciated this feeling of being cared for. I benefited by thinking that I was possessed of some preservation value. From this, I developed a sense of gratitude to the leaders. This was unlike the experience of the province-level cadre who was given easy jobs the moment he entered the camps. Having always received special treatment, he was generally querulous and dissatisfied.

I ate greens openly, right out in public. I didn't even worry about letting the Troop Leader see me. To put it bluntly, inviting me to pick through greens was the same as inviting me to eat. In order not to be unworthy of the leaders' good intentions, I used the opportunity to eat like mad. I wanted to put into effect, to make reality, their kind-hearted plans for keeping me alive. My powers of digestion were substantial, and in fact wild grasses are easy to digest: no matter how much you eat, you never feel bloated. Both the leaders and I were fairly confident that I would succeed.

Why did the leaders suddenly decide to take care of me? Why, for the time being, did they place me among the ranks of those who had a preservation value?

The entry in the diary makes it clear: I was in the process of writing an article called "Shine on, Crimson Rays". It was a sort of news bulletin, or you could call it a eulogy.

The hero of the piece was the senior leader in our labour reform camp. He was the camp's Party Secretary and was known as an Old Revolutionary. Administratively, our camp was under the jurisdiction of the Public Security apparatus. As a result, the Party Secretary was not called a secretary but rather, in the military tradition, a political commissar. When I had just arrived at the camp in 1958, this Old Commissar made a deep impression on me. He was a perfect representative of our ideal, namely the class called workers-peasants-and-soldiers.

*

Before being sent here, I had written hundreds and hundreds of pages of self-examination. I had undergone innumerable criticism-and-struggle sessions, and had earnestly sworn that my ultimate ambition was to learn from the workers-peasants-and-soldiers so that I could remake myself, reform my worldview. Now I came face to face with a true role model. My two starving eyes must involuntarily have glowed.

The group of intellectuals I came in with had never done a bit of farmwork. That first fall harvest, in 1958, the Old Commissar personally taught us how to do it. How to hold a sickle, how to bind up rice stalks, how to load a cart. Hand to hand, man on man, he educated us in every aspect of our labour reform.

When several hundreds of thousands of mou\fn{1 mou – about one-fifth of an acre} of rice in our camp had been harvested but not yet moved to the threshing ground, while it was still spread out in the fields, the Old Commissar called a mobilization meeting. All the convicts from our Station gathered around the threshing floor and watched him personally demonstrate how to tie up a sheaf of rice. He used a chair to represent the sheaf. First he showed us how to lay the rope on the ground. Then he put the chair in the middle. Next he wound the rope around until he had secured the chair/sheaf. Once he had taught us how to tie the knot, he demonstrated how to fasten "back-loops" on the whole ensemble. He said that when this was properly done, a person could sit on the ground, place his back tightly against the sheaf with the back-loops around the arms, and easily get up from the ground.

"What you all learned in school before was rubbish, useless. What I'm teaching you now is real talent! What is knowledge?" he shouted to us. "Knowledge is the ability to make sure you get enough to eat! If you've filled your stomach with knowledge but still don't know how to grow a single kernel of grain, what kind of dog-shitting knowledge is that?!"

Nobody went to work that afternoon. We all listened with great respect to his lesson. He wasn't very tall, he had a swarthy complexion and his face was covered with wrinkles. But he had great energy. He would get excited performing in front of us—his hands and feet would be dancing as he talked and saliva would fly. His talk was extemporaneous. He had no prepared notes—when he thought of something he would just include it. The earthiest Shaanbei\fn{The poorest, northern part of Shaanxi Province} swearing would roll fluently from his tongue.

In addition to the regional flavour of his accent, his language was incredibly vivid. Listening to the reports and lessons of others in the evenings, for example the Troop Leader or Station Leader, we would often nod off to sleep. The minute the Old Commissar came up, we would be charged with excitement. Even being cursed by him felt like a kind of entertainment.

We were incapable of not submitting to his abuse and to his training, for he was a true educator, who used himself as an example. He was over sixty, and had a high position, yet he would go to the fields every day and pace up and down the banks between paddies, hands behind his back. His torso was fairly long, while his legs were short—at the most critical work events, his silhouette would be there, bending to the task. If he saw that some convict could not do the work, or wasn't putting enough effort into it, he would not curse the convict, he'd curse the Troop Leader.

Convicts would much rather be cursed by him than by the Troop Leader, though. When the Troop Leader yelled at people he added fists or a rope to the argument. Naturally, he didn't do it himself: he would have another convict do it for him. A convict always put more muscle into hitting another convict.

In contrast, if the Old Commissar did personally curse a convict who was doing some kind of work or other, he would take over the convict's sickle or shovel while he yelled, and demonstrate how to do it properly. He would have the convict stand to one side to watch, and so instead of getting hit the convict would gain a moments rest.

"Humans are the spirit of all things. You intellectuals even more so than others! So you should listen more carefully than anyone."

He generally started his lecture to us with this soliloquy. Once, when a convict would not plead guilty and submit to punishment, would not be reformed, he spoke to us of the need for intellectuals to be obedient.

"Those who are disobedient are not intellectuals. They don't deserve to be intellectuals! Do you see that tractor over there?" he shouted vehemently. "A tractor is a lump of steel, and a lump of steel is obedient! This morning at work, that tractor climbed up on the end of the field and then wouldn't budge. A whole group of men were there trying to fix it. It wouldn't move. I told them to step aside, and then I went up and gave it two hard kicks. As soon as the men started the motor, it took right away.

"Now humans, humans are not like a lump of steel: you can't keep people walking by kicking them all the time. They have to be obedient and walk by themselves. They can't be like lazy mules who stop when they're beaten, and move backwards when you try to get them to go forward."

When your normal leader makes a report, his mouth is always stuffed with the Classics, the words of Marx and Lenin, Stalin and Mao. By avoiding this, and even more by not frightening us with class analysis, the Old Commissar's talks made intellectuals who had committed crimes feel a new freshness, a rekindled warmth. People who had been immersed in books all their lives had never run into his kind of simplicity. They had never known peasant talk unadulturated by any theory. His reasoning, derived strictly from a life of farming, made it impossible for intellectuals to refute him from a theoretical point of view. All we could do, each and every one of us, was hang our heads in shame. True, how could humans, the spirit of all things, be disobedient like a lump of steel or like some barnyard animal?

We began to see that being obedient, especially to the leaders, should be a prominent characteristic of intellectuals.

During these lectures, he would often remind us of the difficult times at the pioneering start of this particular labour reform camp. He would be as casual and friendly as though we were talking about the weather. In those days, just a few years earlier, the land that the camp was now situated on was nothing but a stretch of watery wasteland, as far as the eye could see. Salt that had seeped up from underground blanketed the place in white; weeds grew taller than a man's head. When agriculturists were brought in to look it over, they simply shook their heads. They said the place wasn't worth spending time and money on to try to bring under cultivation.

But the Old Commissar obstinately stuck to this place—he liked it. He brought in a dozen demobilized cadres from the Army to look at it. They lived in tents and ate cold field rations (when he got to this point, we all started drooling). There wasn't a single piece of machinery back then—all they had were a dozen shovels, hoes and axes.

Step by step, they measured out several tens of thousands of mou of wasteland with their bare feet. They worked out where to dig the canals, where to build buildings, where there should be fields, where a vegetable plot. In the evenings, under the light of an oil lamp, they did their planning; in the daytime, with wooden stakes, they marked it all out.

Only after that stage were a tractor and a large group of convicts brought to the wasteland. To use the Old Commissar's words, it was then like "a thousand armies and ten thousand horses gathering for the battle. The first shots were fired in the opening round of setting up the camp." This was the one and only literary phrase he ever used, and it is possible that it was a slogan created by someone else. When he said it, though, it became his own—it resonated and meant something.

He never tried to deny that the first group of convicts, who created the camp, had died in droves.

"Back then hardship was real hardship. You'd see a man topple over while he was gnawing on a steamed bun. You'd touch him and find he was dead. Had he starved to death? No! Wasn't his mouth still full of bread? As long as you have a mouthful of something to eat, you don't die of starvation!"

So how had the man died?

He didn't say.

Leaders who had some experience in the matter seldom used the enticement of good times in the future to make people work. Instead, they used the hard times of the past to drive people on. The panorama of the future was much too indistinct, whereas the pain and trauma of the past were real. They had a very concrete power of persuasion.

When we had heard these stories a few times, the tribulations of our predecessors turned into a reason for us to have to endure hardship too. Even so, knowing that the earlier convicts had been through even worse comforted us. It made us feel lucky.

According to the Old Commissar, everyone who was just starting out, including himself, got crazy-itching bumps. He said that legs would inevitably develop these blisters if they were soaked in water that was irrigating land hyper-saturated in salts.

"You guys believe in science, don't you? Well, this is called a scientific law! Getting blisters on your legs is one of the ways to reform people. If you don't get blisters, you can't be reformed!" When convicts crawled out of the water and howled on the banks from the itching, he would just watch from the edge of the canal and laugh:

"That's right! Great! This will reform you even faster!"

The exclamations that he put at the ends of sentences can't be expressed in ordinary Chinese characters. You could hear in them the kind of happy astonishment that a father has on seeing his child begin to walk. As a result, when we died from itching and then returned to life again, we felt somewhat gratified. We intellectuals had been told by the country's senior leaders long ago,

"To make yourselves into New People you must shuck off your bodies and exchange your very bones."

Peeling off a layer of skin was nothing to that.

*

For a short time the labour reform camps instituted a policy of not rationing grain, of "eating to the limit". This was in the few months when a slogan was circulated around the country that said,

"Fill your bellies: eat as much as you can! Pull out all the stops for more production!"

At the end of that year, when grain became scarce and rationing was imposed again, the Old Commissar handled it differently from the other bureaucrats we knew so well. They would have waved the red-headlined document sent down from Above, made an announcement to everyone, then simply instituted the rationing.

Instead, the Old Commissar asked the Troop Leaders to gather all the convicts in an emergency meeting. It was right after breakfast, which we always took to our bunks to eat. He waited until every convict was there at the threshing ground and standing at attention. Then he ordered a group of cooks to go into the convicts' barracks

(these were called Numbers in the camps). They were to go from Number to Number, searching for food. After a long while, the cooks returned with all kinds of baskets containing the leftover steamed buns and rice that convicts had not finished eating. He had the cooks exhibit these things in the middle of the threshing ground. Then, with a face that was steel-gray with anger, he pointed to the baskets and shouted:

"A sin! A sin! Just look at that! We let you eat as much as you want, and you waste it! Don't you know that every grain of rice, every kernel of wheat is a farmer's drop of sweat and blood?! All that work just to be wasted by you?! Sinners! You're sinners! Starting from the next meal, every man gets put on rationing again! You kitchen workers, do you hear me? Fixed ration of rice at the next meal!"

China has an old proverb:

"The sins of Heaven can be disregarded—there's nothing you can do about them anyway. It's the ones you bring on yourself that will get you in the end."

Yes, you are responsible for the crimes you commit. So whose fault is it when you again have to tighten your belt and lock up your throat? One by one, we began to blame ourselves. Then we began to blame each other. Later, when the grain ration got smaller and smaller, when large numbers of people began to die, some convicts on the brink of death were still regretting their earlier sins: if they had not wasted so much grain before, surely there would still be enough to eat today. Surely it was our own fault that we were dying of starvation.

When there wasn't enough grain, naturally you had to eat grass. Listening to the Old Commissar, it seemed that eating grass was part of China's traditional food culture. When we started eating grass, the Old Commissar instructed us:

"Eating wild plants to get through times of scarcity is one of the inherent talents of us working people! Wang Baoxun ate bitter greens for eighteen years. When Xu Pinggui finally arrived, Baoxun became his number one wife.\fn{This is an allusion to a Tang-dynasty story and play, familiar, however, to the people in general} So what's the matter with wild plants! Back then everybody ate them to get by. They ate them until they got greedy—then they started eating fine vegetables.

"You all came here to be reformed, not to be landlords and capitalists! So everyone here eats grass, otherwise you won't get properly reformed!"

Before long, the convicts had no energy to work. Some simply lay down in the middle of a field. Then there were those who "pretended to be dead dogs" and didn't even go out to the field. A counter-revolutionary theory went round about that time, to the effect that the men had no energy because they were eating nothing but grass. When he heard it, the Old Commissar refuted this idiotic idea:

"Who says that grass hasn't got any nutrition? That you can't get any energy from it? Livestock eat grass, don't they? And don't they put out a lot more work than you do?!"

Convicts who had committed criminal offences and a small number of historical counter-revolutionaries were the only ones who had some doubts about this assertion. They continued to pass their counter-revolutionary theory around underground. Among the intellectuals, not one did not express utter belief in and servility to the Old Commissar. This was particularly true of rightists, and those among us who were zealously reforming themselves by extolling the "Short History of the United (Bolshevik) Communist Party" and "Dialectical Materialism". These people had the highest respect for him. It didn't matter if his lesson was about lumps of steel or the traditional food culture of China, his was a brand-new way of thinking.

If these intellectuals, trying so hard to reform their worldview, did not follow his example, then whose were they to follow? Intellectuals who came to the camps to be reformed had long since lost the ability to think independently, for themselves. They had endured endless struggle-and-criticism sessions, study sessions, reading groups, and they had lost self-confidence. They were dispirited and weakened. With his iron-clad assurance, his crude logic that permitted no doubts, this representative of workers-peasants-and-soldiers quickly prevailed over their timidity. The brains of China's intellectuals were turned into public toilets long ago, to the point that six years later Jiang Qing could even throw her menstrual pad inside.

*

The lessons of the Old Commissar had a considerable amount of "knowledge" that differed from what was written in books. But at that time one could only doubt what was in a book anyway. The capitalist class was the only one with any book education, and now we were to be re-educated by workers-peasants-and-soldiers. Knowledge turned out to have a class nature.

For example, capitalist-class knowledge said analogies between man and metal were inaccurate, also that man's intestines and stomach were different from those of livestock. Knowledge of the "class with no capital", i.e. proletariat knowledge, saw man and metal as the same type of thing, and recognized a commonality between men and livestock.

Which were you to believe? You had to believe the latter. It was not a question of common sense, it was a question of class.

What's more, a lot of things that capitalist scholars said could not be done had been made reality through the guidance of the proletariat worldview. Experts said they were impossible, but the common sense of workers-peasants-and-soldiers made them happen.

Take this labour reform camp right before your eyes as an example. A few years ago, many people had thought that the land was unsuitable for establishing a large-scale state farm run by the central government. Even Soviet experts argued that this place could not be cultivated. But the Old Commissar brought in a dozen cadres and workers and they turned white salt-flats into fields. Weeds still flourished in those fields, the land was bumpy and uneven, and the whole project had cost innumerable lives, but you could not deny that the fields produced crops. From a distance it looked as though the hoary salt-flats were clothed in green.

All this was undeniable. It made you sigh and say that what you had studied in the past was not complete. There were lacunae.\fn{Gaps} It made you acquiesce and agree that you simply must start again, by being re-educated by worker-peasant-soldiers like this Old Commissar.

Chinese intellectuals who have been educated in old-fashioned patriotism and nationalism have a trait that verges on fetishism. They have only to see construction projects such as factories, oil fields and farms springing up on what was originally raw land and they prostrate themselves in admiration. They see these as symbols of development, of an advancing country. They never consider the price that is paid or their effect on the natural environment.

In the evenings, when the moon was so bright it obscured the stars, on a threshing ground washed by the fragrance of grain, we convicts would sit in rows before the Old Commissar and listen to him like children listening to some uncle tell a story. He told us of things gone by. He said:

"Used to be I couldn't even read the character for 'big'. Up in Shaanbei when I followed Liu Zhidan into the revolution, I'd paste on the glue and he would stick up the slogans. Then he began to teach me a couple of the characters on those slogans. So I began getting a few words, slowly learning them. Now, fact is, if you intellectuals gave me a test I might not pass! Why? Tried my best to learn from revolutionaries, that's why. What I know is revolution. Lot more useful than what you're going to find in books."

With great warmth of feeling, he often mentioned the famous revolutionary Liu Zhidan.

"Liu Zhidan was a good man! Never mind that he was born into a landlord's family. Little master of a landlord, he was—but when he took to revolution, he wasn't afraid to die. He'd fight on the rivers and in the mountains for us poor people. What's that say to us? It says that a person just has to try—doesn't matter what family background he has, if he works at it no one can stop him."

These words would stroke us like a warm, gentle breeze, and for a short time they would revive starving, exhausted, hopeless men. Although they had lost any pride in their past, although their educations were clearly a disaster in light of the reality around them, there might still be a future. Listening to these heartening words, convicts from bad family backgrounds would feel tears come to their eyes.

*

I was one of those who sincerely admired the Old Commissar. He was different from the other leaders with whom I had come in contact, men who appeared profound but didn't have a thing inside. Every word he spoke seemed spontaneous and new. My remaining vestiges of poetic sensitivity told me that he was truly an artist. He was a model leader among workers-peasants- and-soldiers. I'd heard him give a number of reports, usually just after I had drunk grass soup and didn't feel quite as hungry as usual, and eventually I had the idea of writing about him. After all, didn't I have a pen?

Moreover, it was clear to me that some people were receiving special treatment. Certain convicts did nothing but easy jobs. Since envy was unpleasant, it occurred to me that I too should belong to the ranks of those looked after. I have never been athletic, even when I was younger. By this time there were only forty-four kilos of me left, and I was even less nimble. I was no match against others when it came to eating greens, and when it came to hard labour I was never going to surpass the rest. I had to avoid that path if I wanted to preserve my own little life.

Most people are smart enough to display their better side and to hide their faults. I knew that the only usefulness I had was the ability to write. That was the one pitifully meagre talent I had learned in the world Outside. If one was to write in this labour reform camp, the ideal scenario was to make this Old Commissar the main character. I decided to write an article that sang his praises and extolled his virtue. Never mind that he truly was worth writing about.

One day, after the Old Commissar had finished his lesson, I bravely marched up and gave a Troop Leader under him a message, describing this aspiration.

Nobody ever gave me an answer, nobody declared any position on it, but several days later the Troop Leader suddenly plucked me out of the Main Work Troop. He said that I was not to go with the rest of the men to the big fields. Instead, I was to do the work that these first entries in the diary mention, good jobs like hauling dirt clods and picking through greens. It was clear that I had been elevated to the status of being looked after.

And so, it became imperative that I use my free time, when I was not hauling clods or picking through greens, to throw myself into writing with all the grateful fervour I could muster. Since I was much more practised at writing than at hauling, I had the article written within a few nights.

By now, I had already begun to correct my final draft. …

77.23 Afternoon In The Study\fn{by Chang Ling-ling (1936-)} Kunming, Yunnan Province, China (F) 1

It's been quite a long time since I came to father's study to escape a dull and drawn out afternoon. The huge bookshelves standing against four walls were crammed with father's heavy philosophy volumes which looked like a troop of clumsy Russian soldiers casting their lengthy still shadows.

When it was sunny outside (the sunlight in the afternoon always looks lazy) the shadows thickened. I would curl up in the sleepy silence, reading Scott's legendary tales and Mrs. Browning's elegant love poems,\fn{Sir Walter Scott (1771-1832) and Elizabeth Barret Browning (1806-1861) are meant.} immersing myself in any kind of classical love stories—romantic love stories—to escape a long and tedious afternoon.

Summer days always weighed heavily upon me; peeping at me through the windows, and even father's philosophy books stared at me from the bookshelves. How long the afternoon was! It's been quite a while since I came to father's study to indulge myself once again in those books I loved when I was seventeen: enchanted by the crippled Byron, pointed-faced Pushkin and the tubercular Keats. Climbing to the top of the bookshelf, I would lose myself in the tragedy of Hugo's Notre-Dame de Paris, follow Don Quixote in his travels, and share Hemingway's adventures, I used to curl up in the shadows, bathing in Van Gogh's sunlight, or relaxing in the romantic atmosphere of A Sunday Afternoon on the Island of La Grande Latte.

But now, I will no longer be able to indulge myself in anything. Soon I'll have my own study, away from father's philosophy and logic. I will leave the study which I had reveled in. Younger sister is also leaving, to go abroad as a scholarship student in one of the large universities. And right at this moment, in the smothering heat of a summer afternoon, my younger brother is probably combing each company, restaurant, or luxurious hotel along the streets of Los Angeles, asking, "Do you have any jobs?" Younger brother, calling from the other side of the world:

"Mom, please explain to Pa, I'll get my Master's degree this fall. I'll conquer the feeling of white superiority. But Mom, I feel so sad. I saw Chinatown yesterday. The Chinese people there are looked down upon, living in a tiny grocery store, they have no desire to better themselves. I miss all of you so much. How I miss those days in our study!"

Those days in our study! They will never come again. Younger sister is leaving to start on the road of her own happy fate. Younger brother had said:

"Congratulations to sister, good luck always comes to the lucky."

Younger sister will be leaving to live on a scholarship in an overseas university. I am leaving, too, to build a study of my own. There won't be any of father's philosophy books in my study. I might feel lost. Just as younger brother is feeling lost in an alien land, infected with the prevailing mood of depression.

"Mom, I have just finished the spring term exams. I steal some time to go to the library and read the books father had put in my suitcase; of a sudden, I doubt whether that could be of any use to me at this moment. Because, Mom, summer vacation will be here now, and I'm still waiting for the confirmation of my summer job. All the answers from the companies are: we are very sorry to inform you that because you are not a citizen of the United States … I have decided to go with a throng of Chinese students to try our luck in Los Angeles. The scholarship terminates in summer vacation. I can't just drink iced milk and gnaw dry bread, burying myself in the laboratory of a dead town from which the people have gone to their summer resorts. I can't get my doctorate without a penny in my pocket. Mom, please explain to Pa, I've decided to go west to try my luck, but I will never forget what father told me in those days in our study."

So, each dull summer day, brother walked the streets of Los Angeles, throwing his oriental shadow of pride in front of the westerners who had been nurtured by a more worldly mercenary philosophy. At last, brother told us that he had found “two poor jobs,” typical jobs for Chinese students! Younger brother is lost in another country, deeply dejected by the infectious melancholy over there.

Oh, the days are gone when we hid in father’s study and dreamed of how we were going to discover the wonders of the future. We memorized Lee Li’s poems as if we were reciting tongue twisters. Occasionally, we listened to father’s pirate stories. We read Wuthering Heights. Our pleasure in criticizing the vulgarity in Dreams of the Red Chambers is lost. In those summer days in father's study, we spent long afternoons together, acting out many Little Women type of tragic-comedies.

For quite a long time, I haven’t wanted to go to father's study. I am tired of those gentle, sweet love stories, tired of serenades. It’s impossible to remain infatuated with the crippled Byron as I was at seventeen. I would prefer to leave the study, to face the reality of “the fantastic greasiness of an abstract painting.” With both sister and myself leaving, and brother lost, I no longer wish to bathe in Van Gogh’s sun any more, nor drowse in Seurat’s Island of La Grande Jatte.

The afternoon is so long and depressing. I don’t want to go to father’s study, for those heavy volumes of philosophy would stare down at me; and even their shadows are too lengthy and too quiet. I don’t want to curl up and drowse in that kind of somnolent, quietness. I would rather go search for the abstract images of the abstract paintings, to feel the present day hopelessness of modern poems, or to discuss cancer (why did Keats have tuberculosis?). My melancholy has become a cancer. I don’t want my brother to become depressed in summer days, to become dejected by father’s philosophy. I do wish we could all go back to father’s study and be together each long summer afternoon …

But, I am leaving, sister is leaving, and brother is lost on the coast of another continent.

83.22 The Big Event Of The Week\fn{by Philip Chou (1936-)} Shanghai, China (M) 9

“Daddy, get up, it’s seven o’clock already!”

At first all I heard was what sounded like the buzzing of a mosquito. But it kept repeating itself, and with each repetition the volume was turned up several notches, until about the twentieth repetition, when I realized that it was Chen-chen’s voice. She was standing beside me sounding reveille. I ached all over and felt as weak as a kitten, and since I was still sleepy, I pretended I couldn’t hear her, so I could stay in bed a while longer.

There was a momentary silence before the shouts started in again, “Daddy, get up! Mommy said to tell you it’s Saturday!”

“Saturday!” That single word had the power to turn a mollusk into a fire-breathing dragon—I was raring to go. Three minutes after jumping out of bed, I had already gone to the toilet, combed my hair and washed up, gotten dressed, and was heading toward the kitchen.

When I got there, Ch’iang-ch’iang, Chen-chen, and my wife were sitting around the table eating breakfast. I seldom greeted my wife in the morning, but since it was Saturday, and therefore important that I please her somehow, I changed my routine.

“Good morning, Hu-kua,” I said. Obviously, it hadn't worked. Without even looking up from her breakfast, she grumbled:

“Chen-chen called you no fewer than twenty-one times before you got up. You don’t have an ounce of get-up-and-go!”

“It’s only in the morning that I don’t have any get-up-and-go. That all comes out at night," I said contradictorily.

“At night?” She hadn’t caught it.

“That’s right. Don’t forget it’s Saturday. Tonight’s the night for ‘the big event of the week.’”

“Shame on you!” she scolded. “What a dirty mind you’ve got.”

Although she tried to sound serious, there was the trace of a smile in the corners of her mouth as she gave me one of her come-hither looks. That was a good sign. If I should somehow avoid upsetting her during the day, I was in for a treat tonight. I could barely contain my excitement.

The braised beef stew, which was our breakfast, was on the table, still in the pot. I dished myself a bowl of rice out of the electric rice cooker, then sat down.

The rice was so undercooked I couldn’t eat it. Since washing and cooking the rice was Ch’iang-ch’iang’s job, I said to him:

"Hey, Ch'iang-ch'iang, you barely cooked the rice." Then I turned to my wife and said to her playfully, "Hu-kua, I can see that Ch'iang-ch'iang hasn't learned my system of turning raw kernels into fluffy rice, if you know what I mean."

My wife allowed no one (me, my parents, and her parents included) to criticize her children. Ignoring my double entendre, she roared:

"Just how can you be so heartless! Ch'iang-ch'iang's only five years old, and he has to get up every morning at six o'clock to cook the rice. What do you expect from him, a catered banquet? Think back to what you were doing at the age of five!"

"When I was five years old," I said with mock seriousness, "I was my parents' pride and joy."

It was half past seven by the time we finished breakfast. The four of us piled into our old clunker, but my wife was no sooner seated than she hopped out of the car as though someone had lit a fire under her. As usual, she had to go back inside and take one more look around to make sure the gas was turned off and the windows were locked. When she climbed into the car the second time we were able to get on the road. Ten minutes later we made our first planned stop—Carl's Jr. Chen-chen, Ch'iang-ch'iang, and I stayed in the car while my wife went in and bought four take-out salads.

Since we worked seven days a week, ten hours a day, the main requirement where meals were concerned was simplicity. We ate braised beef stew, braised pork, or braised chicken for every meal at home, and no vegetables—they took too much time to clean and prepare. We made up for this dietary deficiency by stopping at Carl's Jr. every morning on our way to work. Carl's Jr., a fast-food place that's open 24 hours a day, mainly sells haburgers, but they also have take-out salads, which sell for $1.50 and include carrots, cucumbers, tomatoes, purple cabbage, lettuce, and alfalfa sprouts. Nutritionally, they are okay, but they taste so bad that when we first arrived in America, my wife had called this concoction of raw vegetables pig slop. If someone had told us then that this pig slop would one day become our daily fare we wouldn't have believed him.

Before long my wife was on her way back to the car with four take-out salads in her hands. She had an uncharacteristically happy expression on her face as she walked toward us, and when she was settled in the front seat of the car I asked her as I drove off:

"What are you smiling about?"

"This is my lucky morning. The girl at the counter undercharged me two dollars."

"Oh, no, you should give it back to her. If you don't, she'll have to make it up out of her own pocket when they discover the shortage." I didn't share her happiness.

"Let's be a little less sanctimonious, okay!" I hadn't swayed her. "If we had given one of our customers too much change, do you think he'd have handed it back?"

"Don't you always say that you never make a mistake? So how could you give too much change?"

"That's a fact." I eased the car onto the Highway 10, which was the part of the trip when Chen-chen, Ch'iang-ch'iang, and my wife ate their "pig slop." I didn't say anything more as we drove toward Los Angeles. Taking the Los Angeles Street exit off the freeway, we headed downtown. Several traffic lights later we reached the intersection of Fourth and Los Angeles, where the Midnight Mission was located. As always, the sidewalks were crowded with bums, some sitting, some lying down, and some half sitting and half lying down. Although they weren't exclusively men, they were all so dirty and smelly that you couldn't tell the women from the men either by sight or by smell. I turned left onto Fourth Street. The sidewalks on both sides of the street were also packed with bums—men and women—who were hanging around until about eleven o'clock, when they could go over to the Midnight Mission and line up for a free lunch.

This was LA.'s Skid Row, which I called "The Street of Bums." There were missions here run by seven different charitable organizations, all of which provided, free of charge, a place to sleep and two meals a day.

The promise of free food and lodging years ago had drawn swarms of bums to the area, and their influx had driven out the people already living there. In the twenty years between 1960 and 1980, eighty to ninety percent of the shops and hotels in the area had been boarded up, and no one came in there any more. When night fell, the place turned into a battle zone, with muggings and murders involving the bums a common occurrence. In 1980, some bold Chinese from Taiwan ventured into the area and, with no thought to their own personal safety, opened up wholesale toy stores. They chose this particular location primarily because of the low rent. Reportedly, back then you could rent 3,000 square feet of combined showroom and warehouse space for only $150 a month.

Much to everyone's surprise, these people who had come for the low rents were still alive a year later, and that was all the encouragement the not-so-bold Chinese from Taiwan (like me) needed to pick up and follow them here. After our arrival in early 1983, we located a Fourth Street location with 2,500 square feet of showroom and warehouse space, which also included a parking lot with eighteen spaces next door to the east. The rent was a very reasonable $400 a month.

Naturally, you never get something for nothing. When we moved in, there was more dust on the floor of the abandoned showroom than on the surface of the moon. The cobwebs were so dense we had to hack them down with a samurai sword. The pipes were all rusted through, and in the bathroom what water there was came not from the faucets but from the leaky ceiling. Owing to the lack of running water in the bathroom, years of shit had accumulated in the toilets until, in the dry heat of Los Angeles, it had petrified. We had to break it up with an electric snake, then take it out in hardened lumps.

Our landlord was a Jew, an 89-year old man who had one hand on his coffin and the other outstretched, palm up. In 1984 he doubled our rent to $800, and in 1985 adjusted it upwards to $2,500. He seemed to consider us "captive tenants," and finally we had to content ourselves with our captive status. The reason was simple: LA.'s Skid Row had turned into the wholesale toy center of Southern California. By rough count there were two hundred wholesale businesses run by Chinese alone, and all our customers came to us unsolicited. We didn't know who they were, where they lived, or what their telephone numbers were. To move out would be cutting ourselves off from them completely, so for us it was a case of: "There are thirty-six available strategies, and the best one is to stay put."

I parked in front of the store to let out my wife and the children so they could open up. Then I pulled into the parking lot. Our private watchman arrived just as I finished parking the car.

"Amigo," I greeted him.

"Amigo," he greeted me back.

Amigo means friend in Spanish, which is what the Mexicans speak. "Friend" is their customary greeting, just as "Brother" is ours. Most Chinese who run wholesale stores hire a Mexican or two to help out with the strenuous jobs. We Chinese call them amigo and hire them for the sake of economy. Since most of them are illegal aliens, they don't dare demand the salary the law prescribes. Take my watchman, for instance. We pay him $2 an hour, slightly more than half California's current minimum wage of $3.75.

Our watchman has to keep watch outside all day long, from nine in the morning till seven at night. His primary duty is to see that no disturbances, thefts, or robberies occur in the shop or in the parking lot. His secondary responsibility is to prevent customers of other shops from trying to park in our lot. Ours is the only business in the 400 block of Los Angeles Street that has its own parking lot, which we reserve for the use of our own customers; everyone else has to pay a parking fee of $5. This parking lot of ours has greatly increased our competitive edge. My wife knew what she was doing back then when she insisted on renting this particular site.

The other amigo in our employ—José—does the heavy work. He is late to work every single day, arriving at about a quarter after nine, invariably drunk. By the time he finally stumbles in, the rest of us are all in our places. My wife is seated behind the large desk in the middle of the showroom, from where she checks off the merchandise, writes out the bills of sale, takes the money, and makes change. The fate of our business hinges on her efficiency. If she moves too slowly, the customers will grow impatient and buy less, and maybe even turn and walk out. It's not like there aren't any other wholesale shops in the neighborhood! The proprietor of a wholesale business has to be proficient at keeping the flow of customers moving as fast as possible, ideally one right on the heels of the other. The only way to ensure survival in this business is to have the customers lead one another to the "chopping block." Fortunately for us, my wife has no peer in totaling up sales and writing out receipts. Her hands fly over the keys of a hand calculator with the virtuosity of Van Cliburn at his grand piano. Of course, "speed of hand" is only one trick of the trade. The hand must also be "ruthless" and "accurate." Conservatively speaking, we stock a minimum of 500 different toys in our store, and my wife has to know the wholesale price of each and every one of them. Not only that, she has to figure up the sales without making a mistake: if she charges a customer too little, he'll feign ignorance, but if she overcharges him, he'll know at once. Either way you can't win.

Since my wife occupies the only chair in the store, it's "standing room only" for the rest of us. Chen-chen, Ch'iang-ch'iang, and I are on our feet ten hours a day. Chen-chen's station is behind my wife, where she is surrounded on both sides by display racks filled with toy samples. Her job is to demonstrate how the various toys work. She has also memorized the numbers in English and Spanish, so she can answer whenever someone asks a price or some other simple questions. The more complicated questions fall to me. Her life shows just how hard it is to be a Chinese child in America these days—Chen-chen is only four years old!

Ch'iang-ch'iang and I station ourselves in front of my wife. My job is to fill the customers' orders, then place the merchandise in front of my wife for her to total it up, issue a bill of sale, and take payment. Once the merchandise has been paid for, it is Ch’iang-ch’iang’s turn: he boxes the merchandise for José, who puts the cardboard boxes on a dolly and wheels it out to the parking lot, where he loads it into the customer’s car. That, simply stated, is the way to do wholesale business, start to finish.

American businessmen operate under a simple credo: “In God we trust. Everyone else pays cash.” The wholesale toy business is one of these cash-and-carry operations. In the slightly more than two years we have been in business, this “cash only” aspect has had its “orchid” and its “onion” sides. Since this area has as bad a reputation as an area can have, small retailers who come here to do cash business must constantly be on guard. The men usually come here with their hundred-dollar bills hidden in their shoes. The stench of this money can clear out a room. The women, on the other hand, usually hide their hundred-dollar bills in their brassieres. The fragrance of this money can fil1 the same room.

At half past nine, the store came to life, with a crowd of twenty or more customers pushing and shoving. Several Mexican women near Chen-chen were exclaiming to each other, “Mira! Mira!” (Look! Look!) Chen-chen intoned prices in Spanish like she was reciting scriptures. She was surrounded by a symphony of toy sounds, from the bawling, the laughing, and the cries of mama of dolls, to the wailing sirens of toy police cars, the pow pow of toy guns, and the strange sounds of robots. She was, obviously, giving demonstrations. In front of my wife’s desk a man was taking off his shoe and a woman was reaching into her bra, both getting ready to pay. Meanwhile, I was running around filling merchandise orders and Ch’iang-ch’iang was boxing them up as fast as he could. José was pushing his dolly back and forth.

Just then a Cantonese man walked in.

“How much dat Lionbot?”

“Thirty-five dollars,” I answered.

“Thirty-five dollar? Too much. Next door sells thirty-four.”

“Then why don’t you buy them next door?” my wife cut in.

“Sold out. What say, you sell thirty-four? I buy six.”

“Okay, okay,” my wife said with an impatient wave of her hand.

The Cantonese paid his bill and walked out with six of the toy lion assembly kits. As soon as he was out the door, my wife turned to me and said,

“Go and ask the dance-hall girl next door why she’s selling them for thirty-four dollars when we all agreed on a price of thirty-five.”

“You’re not going to believe a customer, are you?” I said, trying to get her to change her mind. “He only said that because he wanted to knock down the price, right?”

“I don’t care. You go over and warn her that if I find out she’s engaging in any more of that cutthroat competition, I’ll personally go over and rip those nice cotton underpants right off her!”

The wholesale toy shops are nearly all family businesses, run by husband-wife, father-son, mother-daughter, or brother-sister teams. The one next door—Miss Lee’s—is the only one run by a single woman. Except for Miss Lee, none of the other women involved in the wholesale toy trade use make-up—they haven’t the time. Miss Lee is also the only one among them who likes to flirt, and my wife’s attitude toward her is neatly captured in the nickname she has given her—“the dance-hall girl.” Personally, I like Miss Lee. I only wish she would watch her language a little more. That’s another thing my wife can’t abide in her. On more than one occasion they’ve gotten into arguments, with vulgar words like “whore” and “slut” peppering their speech—even I don’t say things like that. If there’s anything I hate, it’s being sent over to Miss Lee's with a complaint. But since I would never consider disobeying one of my wife’s orders, I had no choice but to swallow my pride and head on over to Miss Lee’s.

“Miss Lee, just a moment ago a customer said you were selling Lionbots for thirty-four dollars. Was he telling the truth?”

“Fuck him! Anyone who sells them for thirty-four dollars has a whore for a mother!”

“That’s what I say. And my wife felt the same way, since she asked him why he didn’t buy them here if you’re selling them for thirty-four dollars. He said you were sold out.”

“Fuck him!” Miss Lee cursed as she pointed to the display rack to her left. “Look over there. As you can see, there are at least ten of them on that rack. You see there?”

“Yes, I see. It must have been a misunderstanding,” I said, trying to make my exit. But Miss Lee’s parting shot stopped me before I got out the door:

“You go back and warn that dried-up old bitch you married that the next time she comes looking for trouble, I’ll rip those nice cotton underpants right off her!”

“Yeah, sure, I’ll tell her,” I said weakly.

“Miss Lee says we’ve been taken in,” I reported to my wife when I returned.

“Miss Lee?” my wife cut me off. “Call her the dance-hall girl.”

“Right, right, the dance-hall girl, that is, didn’t cut the price.”

“She wouldn’t dare!”

An Iranian woman walked up just then and asked for three dozen Dinobots. I could only find thirty of them on the shelf, so I told José to go into the storeroom and get some more. He couldn’t find any.

“We’re six short,” I said to my wife. “What should we do?”

“Why do you have to come to me for something like that? Can’t you just go next door and borrow six from Mr. Chang?”

Miss Lee is our neighbor to the left, while our neighbor to the right is Mr. Chang, a man in his sixties who is in business with his son. He’s a gentle man with a ready smile, and my wife, who greatly respects him, calls him a wonderful person. I went next door.

“Mr. Chang,” I said, “do you have six Dinobots? We’d like to borrow them.”

“No, I’m sorry, I don’t,” he said without hesitation, a broad smile on his face.

Sneaking a quick glance around his showroom, I spotted at least twenty Dinobots stacked on the shelf. But since he had refused to lend any of them to me, what could I say? I returned to our showroom, but didn’t dare say what had really happened, for fear that it might lead to an argument.

“Mr. Chang said he didn’t have any,” I said casually to my wife. “So now what do we do?”

“So now what do we do? So now what do we do? Is that all you know how to say? Why can’t you go over and try the dance-hall girl?” she shouted.

“What did you say?” I couldn’t believe my ears. “Not five minutes ago you sent me over there to complain, and now you want me to go over and borrow something from her. Just where am I supposed to hide my self-respect?”

“You never had any to begin with!”

With discouragement written all over my face, I slinked back over to Miss Lee’s. It wasn’t the warmest welcome I had ever received.

“Now what? Now what? You back looking for more trouble?”

“No no no,” I hastened to say, with an obsequious smile on my face. “That creep a while ago who tried to stir things up nearly destroyed the good feelings between you and us, which is why my wife sent me over to try to make things right with you. She hopes you’ll be understanding and not take offense at what happened, heh-heh.”

“Heh-heh,” she mimicked my hollow laugh. “What kind of fool do you take me for? As I see it, the apology is phony, but your desire to borrow something is genuine. Am I right?”

Since she had me dead to rights, there was no point in trying to keep the deception going.

“Now that you mention it,” I said, shamelessly, “there was something. I’d like to borrow six Dinobots, as a matter of fact.”

“No one’s stopping you from going over and getting them,” she said, pursing her lips and pointing with her chin in the direction of one of the shelves.

I went back to our showroom carrying six boxed, unassembled dinosaurs. Before I got there I ran into Lin Ah-po, who was on his way to our showroom, walking unsteadily with the aid of a cane. The sight of Lin Ah-po has always distressed me. I can’t get over how sad it is that someone that old needs to keep a small business going just to stay alive. Not only that, my wife takes advantage of him, too.

“Hi there, boss. Have you eaten already?” Lin Ah-po greeted me. Even though he himself often goes hungry, he never forgets his Chinese manners, asking everyone he runs into whether they have eaten.

“Yes I have.” I rubbed my belly.

Life has not treated Lin Ah-po well. At least that’s what some people in the business told me. He spent much of his youth as a vagrant in a mid-Taiwan city until he fell afoul of the authorities, who put him away for a while. After getting out he signed on as a deckhand on a ship to steer clear of the people he had hung around with. Ten years ago, after saving up US$10,000, he decided to jump ship rather than return to Taiwan to live out the years left to him—he was afraid it would be all over for him if he confronted his past again. On the very day he jumped ship in New York, he was mugged by a gang of blacks who took every penny he had. Already past the age of fifty, he was clearly unemployable. Luckily for him, he was a Chinese in New York, whose Chinatown boasts so many restaurants. He could live on the food that was thrown out. In fact, he lived off restaurant leftovers for a number of years, sleeping at night in a Chinatown school, at a time when there were only two Chinese among all the vagrants in New York’s Chinatown.

He was one of the two. On one bitterly cold night the other Chinese froze to death. When it was reported in the newspaper, this news brought shame to the entire overseas-Chinese community, which had always been respected by Americans for the way it took care of its own. Some of the local organizations, like family and hometown associations, began to take a charitable interest in Lin Ah-po, wanting to avoid the additional embarrassment that would come if he froze to death too. They scraped together a little money and set Un Ah-po up in a small business. But as his health worsened and he could no longer tolerate the harsh New York winters, he moved west to Los Angeles. As nearly as I can figure, his situation hasn't improved much since he moved out here. Since he is still an illegal alien, he is ineligible for any government aid to senior citizens.

Lin Ah-po walked into our showroom and greeted my wife:

"Boss lady, have you eaten already?"

"Lin Ah-po, what do you want today?" My wife raised her head and gave him a quick look.

Lin Ah-po, who was quite breathless, steadied himself against the desk in front of my wife.

"I'm too old to be any good for anything," he stammered. "It's nice to be young like you folks. What do you have that's good? Pick me out any old thing that's good."

Lin Ah-po always asks us to pick him out any old thing that's good, but my wife isn't about to give him "any old thing." Instead, she loads him up with slow-selling items, rarely giving him any of the fast-moving merchandise. This has been the cause of several arguments between us, and on a couple of occasions the arguments have been so heated that even "the big event of the week" was canceled. But what good does it do to argue? My wife always declares self- righteously:

"If I don't unload the slow-selling stuff on him, who can I unload it on? If you have such a good heart, maybe you ought to go out and be a monk instead of a businessman."

Lin Ah-po paid his bill and left. I had been sad to see him come, and now I was sad to see him go.

The telephone rang. It was a Mexican customer asking if his 300 Cabbage Patch dolls had arrived. He was going to send them to Mexico. I told him they weren't in yet, although they should have been. I said I'd check into it and call him back. As soon as I hung up the phone I asked Ch'iang-ch'iang:

"What's Lao Kuan's phone number?"

"628-4379," answered Ch'iang-ch'iang, our little human computer. The phone number of every toy importer we dealt with was tucked safely away inside his five-year-old brain.

I dialed the number.

"Lao Kuan, Chou here. Have those counterfeit Cabbage Patch dolls arrived?"

"They arrived, all right, but my entire order of counterfeit Cabbage Patch dolls is now a batch of counterfeit headless dolls. Isn't that just awful?" He sounded awful, all right.

"What are you talking about?"

"Well, you know," Kuan explained, "that we sneak our Cabbage Patch dolls past U.S. Customs officers by putting the bodies and heads in separate shipping containers when we ship them over from Taiwan. Once the shipments have arrived safely we attach the heads onto the bodies. This time our luck went bad. The bodies got through without any trouble, but the heads were discovered in Customs and confiscated. That's what I mean by headless dolls."

"Tsk-tsk. How big was your loss?"

"Big. Over fifty thousand."

"My God!" I exclaimed. "But, like they say, that's the chance you take when you deal in counterfeit merchandise. The bigger the profit, the greater the risk. Isn't that right?"

"Okay, okay. The last thing I need after taking a beating like this is a bunch of philosophical nonsense. Don't you have any human sympathy?"

"Not today I don't."

I hung up. It was already eleven o'clock. Chen-chen suddenly announced:

"Mommy, I have to go to the bathroom."

"Wait till some of the customers go," my wife said.

"The customers will never go," Chen-chen said pleadingly.

"If the customers never go, then you'll never go," my wife bellowed.

The phone rang again. I answered. This time it was a Korean. He wanted 100 Mustangers.

A Mustanger is a toy made up of five little motorcycles that can be assembled together into a spaceman. He wanted to come right over and pick them up. These toys that change their shape—called Gobots and Transformers—are all the rage these days, so there's never enough to meet the demand. Since we only had a few left, I got the number from Ch'iang-ch'iang and made a phone call.

"Yang Ta-fu, Chou here. Send over another 500 Mustangers right away."

"Send send send," Yang Ta-fu said in a strange voice. "How can I send what I don't have?"

"You got a shipment two days ago. Are you telling me you're all out of them so soon?"

"Two-thirds were sold, the other third was stolen. Doesn't that sound like I'm all out?"

"Stolen? By whom?"

"How should I know? If I knew that, do you think I'd say they were stolen?"

"Where did it happen?"

"Right across from you. From the alley behind Lao Ch'in's. You know, I've always made his deliveries at the back door. Well, yesterday, when I drove around to the back door, no one answered when I knocked. You don't know how hard it is to turn a big delivery truck like mine around, and besides, that Fourth Street of yours is one way, which means I would have had to drive all the way around just to get to Lao Ch'in's front door. So I decided to walk around to the front and see what was going on. Lao Ch'in was so busy I didn't want to interrupt him. But he finally dragged himself away and went with me to open the back door. The truck was still there, just where I'd left it, but the fifty cartons of toys I'd brought with me were all gone. Talk about back luck!"

"So what are we supposed to do now that your merchandise has been stolen?"

"Listen to you! You don't give a damn about my loss, do you? All you care about is whether you get the stock you want. Where's your heart?"

"Wherever it is, it's black."

I hung up.

Tap tap tap. It was a familiar sound—a woman's high-heels. My heart leapt, my nostrils flared.

I was right. A South American woman in a low-cut dress appeared in the doorway. Her name was Maria. She had a typical Latin figure: short and heavy, with big breasts and hips and waist that's hard to locate. Americans call South Americans Latins. She was my "Latin lover."

When she spotted me from the doorway, she headed straight for me. Holding my head in her hands, she kissed me softly on the lips, then turned around, bent over, and kissed my wife on both cheeks as she handed her a merchandise order and said in English:

"I'd appreciate it if you would fill this order. I am very thirsty. Will you permit your husband to take me for a drink of water?"

Taking a pretty woman for a drink of water is good work if you can get it. Fortunately, our refrigerator is in the storeroom, and my wife won't allow customers to go in there alone, afraid they'll get a little sticky-fingered while they're there. So, with my wife's blessings, I accompanied Maria into the storeroom, where my wife couldn't see what we did—naturally, we were not on our best behavior, hugging and kissing until Maria gently pushed me away.

"I'd like a drink of water before we continue, okay?"

I opened the refrigerator and handed her a Coke. After taking a few swigs from the can, she said to me:

"Darling, I gave you my address and phone number last time. How come you never come over?"

"Maria, I would give anything to grow a pair of wings and fly straight into your boudoir. You must believe me when I say I tried to grow them, but I failed. And without wings, all that's left to me is the automobile. I've looked up your address on a map, and it would take me three hours to drive there and back. So if we were to spend two hours together, that would make a total of five hours. Do you really think my wife would give me my freedom for five whole hours?"

"If five hours is too long, then how about two? I could come into the city and meet you here."

"Even two hours is out of the question. To be honest, just having these two or three minutes alone with you, to feel your body next to mine and smell your fragrance is sheer ecstasy. You bring new life to my numbed senses, you soothe my wounded masculine pride, and for this I am eternally grateful. I have no right to ask more."

"You poor little fool, I love to hear you talk nonsense like that." She stroked my cheek. "But you mustn't give up hope. Someday we will be together in more intimate surrounding. You must never forget that I also supply twenty-four-hour service, just like Carl's Jr."

With that she turned and headed for the bathroom. Once inside, she lifted up her skirt without first closing the door—naturally—and I, as a proper "Son of Han," turned away to show that I was a gentleman who "avoids what was not meant for his eyes." Just because she placed no barriers between men and women was no reason for me to abandon my manners.

She took so long in there that when she finally did come out, my time was up. Not wanting my wife to grow suspicious, the two of us left the storeroom in a hurry. As her invoice was being totaled up, there was a slightly nervous look on Maria's face. My wife handed her the invoice, which she barely glanced at before reaching down the front of her dress and taking out some large bills to pay what she owed. Then, instead of counting her change, she just stuffed it down the front of her dress, called José over to give her a hand with her purchases, and left the store with him.

Every time I watch her disappear through the door I am struck by intriguingly contradictory feelings of loss and achievement. But then when I carefully analyze the situation, I am left with confused feelings. Based upon my incomplete understanding of such things, I have concluded that the mere sight of Maria produces a primitive, animal-like excitement in me. But when we start fooling around, and I have to be content with "scratching my itch" through my clothes (sometimes the "itch" actually gets worse), I'm so horny I can barely stand it. That is surely why the feeling of disappointment and loss, produced by unfulfilled desire, follows on the heels of her departure. That is number one. Although this sort of illicit behavior has never reached its logical conclusion, has never become an "affair of the flesh," it has nonetheless produced guilt feelings. The inescapable conclusion is that I am being unfaithful to my wife and disrespectful to the institution of marriage. My masculine image has suffered and my integrity as a husband has been injured, which is why afterwards I always have a nagging feeling that the losses have outnumbered the gains. That is number two, which, I suppose, takes care of the "loss" column.

What then of the "achievement?" Here's how I see it: The fact that I have been able to keep my entanglement with Maria a secret from my wife shows that I have gained at least one victory in the battle of wits between us. Even this solitary victory gives me a sense of pride. Additionally, since I need to prove to myself that my attraction to the opposite sex has not evaporated because of my marriage, Maria's display of passion toward me has been just the thing my vanity needed.

And there's more: through Maria I can get even with my wife. Ever since our arrival in the States my wife has been a different person altogether. She no longer acts like a wife—she no longer even acts like a woman! In her latest letter my mother-in-law praised her daughter in a tone of motherly pride as a "dynamic woman." Unfortunately, this time her words were right on target, for my wife has already begun to display all the shortcomings of a "dynamic woman." Let me give an example. At work a dynamic woman treats her husband as one of her hired hands, not as a colleague. This certainly describes my wife. At home a dynamic woman treats her husband as a part of the fixtures, not as a loved one. Again, this fits her perfectly. But no matter how my wife treats me, all I ever do is fume inwardly; and since I would never dare to complain, I am forced to gain retribution in passive ways. In this Maria has played a major role.

Yet in my more rational moments I can be repentant too, feeling that I was unjustified in trying to "get even" with my wife. Rather than setting out to change, she fell victim to the pressures of living in the materialistic environment of America and the insecurities of having to make a living in an unfamiliar city. If I am correct in this, then she cannot be held responsible for the changes she has undergone. To be absolutely truthful, if a culprit has to be identified, there is really no need to look any further than myself, since the idea to uproot ourselves and immigrate to America was mine, and mine alone. In fact, my wife tried to warn me before we left by reminding me of what happened to the actress Chen Chen and her husband Liu Chia-ch'ang.

Even today I can hear her words of warning. It was late one weekend night, just after she had come home from playing mahjong at a neighbors' home. Back then, when we were still living in Taiwan, I would go to work each day to earn the money my wife would gamble away the next. We carried out our duties to the best of our ability, and had no real complaints. She would come home every night and narrate the just-ended gambling battles in detail for my benefit. That night, she followed her narration of the various campaigns by handing me a copy of a movie magazine.

"Since you've got your heart set on going to America, there's an article here you should read."

"I don't want to read it. You tell me what it says."

"Okay, lazybones, I'll tell you what it says. It's about the restaurant Chen Chen and Liu Chia-ch'ang opened in Los Angeles, the House of Chen Chen. In the interview she said that the restaurant had kept them so busy for the first six months that they had been husband and wife in name only, never enjoying any of the pleasures of married life. You'd better think hard about whether you and I will be so busy after we get to the States that we'll have to give up any sort of married life for six months. Do you think you could take it?"

"Did Chen Chen say if she was able to take it or not?" I asked her playfully. Her veiled warning escaped me completely.

When we finally did arrive in America, our situation was even worse than Chen Chen and Liu Chia-ch'ang's.

We had no married life for a full year. The House of Chen Chen operated in the red and eventually went out of business. Our business also operated in the red for the first year.

By the time our family situation began to improve in the following year, our feelings for each other had nearly disappeared. Like someone who had neglected his studies for too long, it was not going to be easy to get back on track. Sometimes I'd try to get romantic, but I was so shy that the moment would quickly be gone. At other times my wife would make a bunch of excuses, and nothing would happen. Finally, following the Christmas rush of 1984, when our wholesale stock was depleted, we took a one-week vacation, which was just what we needed to take stock of our married life. I proposed that we bring our most private affairs out into the open, and even went so far as to recommend that we set up a timetable, work out a budget, put together a five-year plan, and things like that. During that vacation my wife learned all over again how to enjoy herself. In fact, she asked me, "Will we have to punch a time clock?" The more we carried on the sillier we got, and we were soon laughing so hard we could barely stand. Once we had defined the "official" role of the "marriage act," we began a discussion on the issue of frequency. I jokingly proposed,

"How about three times a day, once after every meal."

"We're not talking about taking medicine," my wife responded coquettishly. We doubled over laughing again. Finally we agreed on Saturday night as the "official" time, and since it was to be a once-a-week arrangement, we took to calling it the "big event of the week."

Over the next three months we didn't miss a single "big event of the week," but then other things began to take priority or we would have an argument, and the frequency kept decreasing until eventually it all but disappeared. Then, just when everything seemed to be falling apart, Maria walked into my life.

A scream from my wife quickly brought me back to the here and now. The scream had come from the storeroom. I looked over to my wife's station—she wasn't there. She must have slipped into the storeroom while I was watching Maria walk out the door and lost in my thoughts, where she had made a shocking discovery. Before I could even respond to her scream, my wife came tearing out of the storeroom and sat down angrily at her station.

"Hah!" she snorted loudly. "Just as I suspected. That Latin bitch stole fifty robot wristwatches while she was in the storeroom!"

Her words hit me like a sledgehammer. What? Maria had stolen some wristwatches? How could that be? Convinced that my wife was bringing false accusations against a good person, I leapt to her defense:

"You can't slander someone like that! Every time she comes in to stock up she spends at least a couple of thousand. What makes you think she'd even consider stealing something barely worth a hundred dollars?"

"Hah! That's what you think! There are three types of customers. The first type comes in only to make a purchase, the second comes in only to steal, and the third comes in with his options open. If he can steal something, he steals it; if not, he buys it. That bitch has to belong to the third category. Besides, have you noticed how big her bosom and her rear end are?"

"Yes, I've noticed," I admitted.

"Well, wouldn't they make perfect hiding places for fifty watches?"

"Just because she's got room to stash some watches doesn't mean she stole our watches." I refuted her contention with indisputable logic. And yet, I could already sense that my confidence in Maria was beginning to waver. Thinking back, I recalled how Maria had left the bathroom door open while she was inside, knowing that I would turn my back to her, and I also recalled that there was a carton of robot wristwatches right next to the bathroom. It would have been the easiest thing in the world for her to steal a few dozen wristwatches while I was being the gentlemanly "Son of Han." But if she actually had stolen them, did that mean that the passion she had professed for me had been a sham all along? It was a proposition that could shatter what little masculine self-respect I had managed to hold onto. It was not an appealing proposition.

What really took me by surprise was the sinister, mocking smile that was slowly spreading across my wife's face, an expression I had never seen before. Slowly, patiently, she revealed her secret to me.

"Okay, I don't have the time to keep twisting the knife any longer, so I'll go ahead and let you in on it. I've known all along how you and Maria carry on in the storeroom. If you think you can hide something like that from me you've got a lot to learn. Just think for a minute—when was the last time you were able to keep anything from me? I didn't feel like exposing you this time, that's all. Good or bad, Maria is still a customer, so it doesn't make any sense to offend her. Besides, since you never had more than a few minutes together in the storeroom, there wasn't a whole lot you could do anyway. I mean the 'big event of the week,' or anything like that. But I was suspicious of her from the very first day she set foot in this place. What could she have seen in you to cozy up to you like she did? You have no talent, no money, and no freedom, so what did she expect to get out of you? If I had a nice big bosom and rear end like that, do you think I'd fall for you? I knew she had something else in mind. And sure enough, when she walked out of the storeroom today she had a strange look on her face. I couldn't be sure that she had finally made her move, but like they say, a business is a battlefield, and, like a battlefield, it's better to kill a hundred innocent victims than to let a single guilty one go. So while she wasn't looking I added sixty dollars to her bill, then shortchanged her forty more when I gave her her change. And I was right—she was in such a hurry to get out of here with her guilty conscience that she didn't even look at her receipt or count her change. As soon as she was out the door I rushed into the storeroom to see for myself. That's when I discovered that fifty wristwatches were missing. Since Maria was the only outsider who went into the storeroom today, who else could have taken them? It's a good thing I was on my toes today and made the first move. Otherwise, we would have played right into that bitch's hands!"

My wife talked on and on, her every word, her every sentence, piercing my heart like daggers. When she had finished lecturing me, I felt like a prisoner in the dock who had just heard the pronouncement of his own death sentence. My eyes were glassy, my hands were icy, my legs were rubbery.

I stood there dumb-struck, the spitting image of a toy robot that couldn't move because it had no batteries.

A moment later I became aware of my wife yelling at me:

"What are you doing? Just what are you doing? I'd like to know what you're waiting for. Why don't you wise up? Your little games with Maria nearly cost us more than a hundred dollars. Considering what I could do, you've gotten off pretty easy so far, so you can stop that pouting and looking like your feelings are all hurt! There are a lot of customers waiting to have their orders filled, so what's the idea of ignoring them? You listen to me—you'd better get moving, and I mean now! If I see you looking like you've just lost your parents one more time today I'm going to rip that stupid look off your … that buffoon face of yours!"

It worked. Like a nine-volt battery, my wife's warning started me—the robot—working. But my actions were strictly mechanical. I managed to do a lot of things, but I had no idea for whom I was doing them, or why. Nor did I have any recollection of having done anything once it was finished. After working for a short while, my actions would begin to slow down noticeably, at which time my wife's angry shouts would give my batteries a quick recharge, and I would speed up again. I passed the day that way, moving about in spite of myself for several hours. Eventually all the customers were gone, and I helped close up shop (I think) before getting into the car and driving the family home. Once there we sat around the table and ate dinner.

Seeing Chen-chen and Ch'iang-ch'iang eat with such gusto gave me a momentary feeling of comfort. There, at least my children aren't going hungry! I hadn't shirked my responsibilities as a father, after all! But the sense of comfort was short-lived, for I noticed that Chen-chen and Ch'iang-ch'iang neither spoke nor played with each other while they ate. They weren't acting at all like children. Even at this tender age they had to shoulder part of the family's responsibilities instead of enjoying the pleasures of childhood that they deserved. So I really was a failure as a father! That thought brought me a momentary feeling of shame, which was also short-lived. From that point on, my feelings were totally numb.

After dinner my wife told Ch'iang-ch'iang to do something, but I couldn't hear what. it was. Her instructions to Chen-chen, on the other hand, came through as clear as a bell.

"Chen-chen," she said, "you go to bed now. Oh yes, didn't you say you've been having tummy-aches the past few nights? Well, if you have one again tonight, I want you to call for Mommy. As soon as you call Mommy, Daddy will be right there. Do you understand?"

Discretion being the better part of valor, I kept my mouth shut and went into the bathroom to take a shower.

When I had finished my shower and was passing through the living room on my way to the bedroom, my wife was there watching television. Wanting to patch things up, I said to her as I walked by:

"Hu-kua, it's getting late and you need your sleep. You have to take care of your body."

"Okay, okay, who needs your hypocrisy!" she said impatiently. "I'm sure your only concern for my body is how it affects your 'big event of the week.' You go to bed. I'm going to watch television until the stew that's cooking on the stove is finished, then I'll come to bed. Don't worry, I'll wake you up."

As soon as my head hit the pillow I realized just how tired I was, physically and mentally. Sleep quickly conquered my body, then my mind.

*

My dreams were interrupted first by someone shaking me by the shoulder, then by the sound of a woman's voice:

"Wake up, you damned sleepyhead, wake up!"

"What's wrong?" I asked sleepily. "Is it time to take care of the 'big event of the week'?"

"No, it's not. Chen-chen says her tummy hurts. It's down low. Get up and take care of her."
Fully awake by then, I jumped out of bed and headed toward Chen-chen's bedroom, guided by her moans.
"If I've told you once I've told you a thousand times," I said on my way out of the room, "that you have to let her go to the bathroom whenever she says she has to pee. But no, you tell her she's got to hold it. Are you satisfied now? What if she develops a bladder condition or a kidney problem, then what? Don't forget, we still can't afford health insurance."

188.51 Solace In Action: A Mother's Mission to Publicize The Truth\fn{by Ding Zilin (1936-)} Shanghai, China (F) 3

I am simply a Chinese intellectual and a mother who lost her son in the June Fourth massacre of 1989. Since the massacre, the Chinese government has talked constantly about respecting its citizens' "rights to exist." Yet on June 4, 1989, guns and tanks deprived countless outstanding young Chinese men and women of their "right to exist" in a single night. This is nothing but hypocrisy.
As the mother of a victim, there is no way for me to forget the boys and girls and men and women, including my own son, who died in pools of blood. I want the people of the world to know that they once lived in this world, that this world once belonged to them, and why and how they disappeared from it.

*

Late in the night of June 3, 1989, the West Road martial law troops came in from the western suburbs of Peking along Wukesong and Cuiwei Roads, shooting and killing as they made their way east to the head of the bridge at Muxidi. There they were blocked by over ten thousand people. Just after 11 p.m., the sound of machine gun fire began again and my 17-year-old son, Jiang Jielian, a second-year student at People's University High School, was in the first group of people to fall.
Earlier that evening, Jiang Jielian had seen the televised announcement that martial law troops were closing in and insisted on going to Tiananmen Square to help the students who were still there. My husband and I tried to stop him, telling him that it was too dangerous and that if anything were to happen to him, we would be left alone. But he insisted on going, replying that,
"If all parents were as selfish as you, would the country or its people have any future?"
He then took my red school badge, pinned it to his shirt, stuffed a couple of yuan and some change into his little wallet, and tried to console me by saying,
"I'm just going to take a look; I'll be right back, don't worry. I'll call you from a public phone as soon as I get to Tiananmen." Patting the school badge pulled to his chest he said,
"With this on they can't call me a 'hoodlum,' and the martial law troops won't harm me."
I'd locked the front door to keep him from leaving, so he crawled out the window in the bathroom and ran off despite my protests.
He left home at around 10:00 on the evening of June 3rd and rode toward the Square with a classmate. At Muxidi, tte two met up with hordes of people. When the martial law troops opened fire, these two children thought they were shooting rubber bullets! His classmate later told us that as they tried to hide in a subway entrance, Jiang Jielian was shot in the back and his classmate was grazed by the bullet as it exited through his chest. Jiang Jielian was only able to say, "I think I've been hit," before he collapsed with blood pouring from his wound.

*

Shot dead at around the same time was Hao Zhijing, 30, a science and technology policy and management researcher at the Chinese Academy of Sciences. He had returned from a visit to the United States in 1988 and had been married less than a year. He too was his parents' cherished only child. He was shot in the chest and taken by local citizens to Fuxing Hospital where he died. His family did not find his body until July 4.
Also among the mass of bodies that fell one after another in the continuous spray of machine gun fire at Muxidi was Xiao Bo, an instructor in the Chemistry Department at Peking University who had turned 27 that day. He had gone to Muxidi expressly to urge his students to return to school. Xiao Bo died leaving behind a pair of twins not yet 70 days old.
Also brought down at the same time was 27-year-old Yuan Li, an engineer in the Electrical Machinery Departmentof the Peking Machinery Industry Research Institute who had just received a visa to visit the United States. He was shot in the chest not long after leaving llis home in Ganjiakou at 11 p.m. Soon afterward, his corpse was labelled "Unknown Body #2" by the Naval General Hospital and placed in storage until his family found where it was on June 24.

Stored together with Yuan Li's corpse was "Unknown Body #3," later identified by his family as Wang Chao, 30, an employee of the Stone Corporation who had been married only a month.

"Unknown Body #1" turned out to be 19-year-old Ye Weihang, a third-year student at Peking High School Number 57 and student association chairman. He was shot in the right shoulder and chest at 2 a.m. on June 4, but did not die until he received a second shot, this time in the back of the head.

Twenty-seven-year-old Lu Chunlin, who entered the master's program of the Philosophy Department at People's University in 1986 and was the son of a southern Jiangsu farm famiIy, was also shot at Muxidi. Just before he died, he used the last of his energy to give everything he was carrying with him to a passerby to let the university know he had died.

As the troops charged toward Tiananmen, the number of sons and daughters of China stripped of their "right to exist" increased. Duan Changlong, a graduating senior majoring in applied chemistry at Quinghua University, had just found a job. His 46-year-old father had only this one beloved son. That evening, Duan left an experiment unfinished in the school laboratory and rode his bike from Houhaijia to the vicinity of the Palace of Nationalities at Xidan. There he came across the martial law troops blocked by the crowd. He pushed forward and was hit in the chest with a bullet. People took him to the nearby Postal College where he stopped breathing before receiving any medical care.

Also dying alongside Duan Changlong at the same time in the Postal College Hospital was a 19-year-old girl Zhang Jin. She was a student majoring in foreign trade. Jin and her boyfriend had hidden in a small alleyway near the Palace of Nationalities, but they were unable to avoid the slaughter. Just past midnight, Zhang Jin was shot twice in the head and fell at her boyfriend's feet. She died shortly after being taken to the Postal College Hospital around 1 a.m., June 4.

Among the other bodies at the Postal College Hospital was that of a senior in the Industrial Management Department at the People's University, Wu Guofeng. He was the only university student from his remote district in Sichuan Province. He left the school carrying a camera on the evening of June 3 and never returned

*

As the troops pressed on toward Tiananmen Square in the early hours of June 4, the killing continued. At Liubukou on West Chang'an Avenue, a tank pursued a group of students who had just withdrawn from the square and were walking along the sidewalk. Between six and eleven of them quickly lost their lives under the treads of the tank. Walking at the head of the group had been Wang Peiwen, 21, a first-year student in the China Politics College Youth Work Department.

Bringing up the tail end was Wang's classmate, Dong Xiaojun, who was not yet 20. Both were crushed to death by the tank. Their corpses were not even left intact.

The closer one got to Tiananmen, the more tragic the scene became. Wang Nan, 19, a second-year student in Yuetan High School, was hit at the Nanchang Avenue intersection. A bullet passed right through the helmet he was wearing but he did not die immediately. He collapsed at the street corner and his brains flowed out over the ground. A resident-organized rescue team went forward to help him but were stopped by the martial law troops who said that "rioters" were not allowed to aid anyone. According to an eyewitness, Wang Nan lay at the corner of Nanchang Avenue for about two hours before being removed to an unknown destination. His family searched over 20 hospitals in Peking before they finally found his body with the help of friends in the cold storage room at Pejing Huguosi Hospital on June 14.

It turned out that on the morning of June 4, a corpse collection team had hurriedly buried the bodies of Wang Nan and two other victims in a ditch on an empty lot to ilie west of Tiananmen in front of Peking Middle School Number 28. With the summer heat, the area began giving off a strange smell a few days later. Only after complaints by the school did the audtorities come to dig up the bodies. By this time ilie corpses had already begun to decay and were covered with maggots. Since Wang Nan had been wearing army clothes at the time of his death, ilie authorities suspected he might have been a soldier; not wanting to deal with such a matter too hastily, they had put his body in Huguosi Hospital.

*

All these victims were shot down on Olang'an Avenue to the west of Tiananmen Square. Many oiliers on the eastern side were also unable to escape a similar fate.

Yu Di, 32, an engineer at Peking Solar Energy Research Institute, had received an award for electrothermal coating. Between two and four in ilie morning of June 4, he was standing among a band of locals stretching from the corner of Nanchizi and East Chang'an Avenue to the History Museum and was in the first group to be hit by gunfire from the martial law troops. Eight of his internal organs, including his liver, kidney, and lungs, were damaged. Locals took him to Xiehe Hospital where he underwent a total of four major operations, including the removal of one kidney, but he never recovered; Yu Di passed away on June 30.

Another man shot at about the same time was 42-year-old Yang Minghu, an employee in the legal division of the International Trade Promotion Association who had just returned from a business trip to Guangzhou. He could not believe the news that shots were being fired outside and went to see for himself. He encountered gunfire in front of ilie Public Security Bureau on the eastern side of Tiananmen early in ilie morning of June 4. He was hit in the abdomen by an "exploding" bullet and was in extreme pain with his bladder and pelvis shattered. Although locals immediately took him to Tongren Hospital for emergency surgery, his high fever did not go down after the operation and he remained fully conscious as he moved closer to death before finally passing away in Tongren Hospital on June 7.

*

The argument has been made that the slaughter of June 3 and 4 was necessary to clear Tiananmen Square. Then why, I ask, did the indiscriminate killing of innocent people continue for several days after the martial law troops had already occupied the square?

On or about June 5, Zhang Xianghong, a second-year student in the International Politics Department at People's University, went to the end of the alleyway near her home with her sister-in-law, as they were anxious about Zhang's brother who was going out. They were chasing behind him, calling for him to return home when Zhang was hit by a round of ammunition fired by the martial law troops. Zhang died instantly in the arms of her sister-in-law.

An Ji, 31, of the Chinese Division's journal, Township Construction, was killed under similar circumstances. At a little past 11:00 on the evening of June 7, An Ji and a group of friends were seeing off another friend to Yangfangdian. As they passed the Peking Children's Hospital near Yuetan Park, martial law troops shouted at them to halt. An Ji and several odter young men ran to hide and in a burst of gunfire, he and another man in his thirties surnamed Wang were hit and killed. Both of them left behind old mothers, wives and young children.

These young men and women are only a small number of ilie victims of June Fourth that I know of. Relatives of some victims, fearful of official pressure, are unwilling to reveal publicly the names and circumstances of the deaths of their loved ones and thus they bear an even greater pain.

*

The June Fourth Massacre is already four years in the past [now six] and the dead are long gone, but what has it meant for the living parents, widows, and orphans? An epitaph on a tombstone in the Wanan Public Cemetery west of Peking reads:

Crying in sorrow for my son who had not yet come of age abruptly left this world.
Our family's star of hope suddenly fell from the sky.
How is the God in Heaven so unfair to call away a dedicated youth and leave behind his parents in their old age?
Our son was born on the seventh of July and ascended to heaven on the third of June.
A brief short life unfortunate from beginning to end.
The entire family is heartbroken, forever bereft of happiness and laughter
we erect this memorial in our grief:

These words articulate the anguished cries of the families of those killed. For the relatives of these victims, there is no longer any laughter; the only thing left is pain and tears. One elderly couple who lost their cherished son wear expressions of indifference and seldom speak, but deep in their hearts dley are uneasy. They have only one wish and so they pray that they can live a bit longer to see with their own eyes the day when the clouds will open and the fog will clear.

The government has adopted a policy of forbidding discussion in order to make people forget June Fourth. With the passage of time, the warmth and solicitude of people around the families of victims grows increasingly sparse, and the longing for a lost loved one even more suffocating.

There is one mother who has gradually grown quiet over these past four years. It is a fearful silence. She is unable to talk about the 19-year-old son she lost; she acts as though none of it ever happened, but in her heart she is suffering terribly and her whole personality seems to have been transformed.

Anodler mother is so pained that she does not want to go on living. She is close to having a nervous breakdown. When she can no longer control herself, in the middle of the night she goes to a deserted area and cries and screams madly.

There is another mother who normally restrains her sorrow, but at the Qingming grave-sweeping festival and on the anniversary of her son's death, she falls before his grnve and cries ceaselessly.

On these anniversaries, yet another mother is unable to stay in the house where her son once lived and walks aimlessly through the streets and alleyways unwilling to return to her home for long periods.

One widow found it impossible to hold back her bitterness and hoped to meet others with whom she could share her pain. So once when she was attending to the grnve of her husband, she quietly left her address on the funeral urns of others she did not know who had died in the same way. In this way she broke through her loneliness and helplessness.

*

I suffered the same fate as these mothers and wives and endured many grim, sad days and nights after June Fourth. My spirit and health were seriously damaged and I suffered repeated bouts of heart trouble. When I could bear it no longer, I broke my silence on the eve of the second anniversary of June Fourth by agreeing to an interview with ABC Television in which I pointed out the errors of fact in Premier Li Peng's interpretation of the June Fourth incident. I paid a heavy price for this, bringing on more than a year of persecution. On the eve of the third anniversary of June Fourth, I was expelled from the Chinese Communist Party and deprived of my job as a graduate student advisor.

A month after the massacre, the Chinese government-controlled Hong Kong newspaper Wen Wei Po published a story saying that appropriate funeral arrangements had been made for those mistakenly killed in Peking. Deputy Secretary of the Peking Minicipal Government Yu Xiaosong was quoted as saying that "the government is undertaking conscientious and careful arrangements" for their relatives and that they would be given compensation of between 10,000 and 20,000 yuan. Yu indicated that the children of victims would be supported by the government until they reached 18.

Despite repeated requests, however, no government official has ever announced die official verdict on whether my son was mistakenly wounded or was a "rioter." One mother I know of angrily requested that the audiorities list her deceased daughter as a "rioter," saying that it was better than just leaving the cause of her death completely unclear. Of all the relatives of victims I know of, not one has obtained an official conclusion on their loved one's cause of death or received any compensation.

During the political study and investigation campaign which followed the June Fourth Massacre, the C.C.P. political department in each work unit pressured the families of victims to take part in "study" sessions to raise their understanding, to maintain unanimity with the central government, and to acknowledge that "pacifying the uprising" was a reasonable action. Some families were forbidden to make their status as relatives of victims public and were prohibited from accepting press interviews under threat of being expelled from their deceased relative's work unit housing. Other families of those killed and wounded have been put under supervision and control. Neighborhood committees monitor their meetings with outsiders, foreigners in particular, and their incoming and outgoing mail. Some families have been interrogated frequently with severe surveillance, particularly during the Qingming Festival and June Fourth. When the families are sweeping the graves of their relatives at Qingming or June Fourth, a great number of military police are sent out to "maintain order;" legitimate memorial activities are restricted and a threatening atmosphere pervades the cemetery.

Some survivors, particularly widows and orphans, have had to seek help from the leaders of the work units where those killed and wounded had been employed. They were told that if the family signed a statement stating that their relative had died of natural causes, they would then receive 800 yuan in compensation, but otherwise they would not receive a cent. As for the money for raising orphans, even the most fair-minded of leaders have provided only 50 yuan a month. For a while, good-hearted friends provided financial help for the orphans and widows. But as time passed, it became difficult to continue this support, and now they have been virtually forgotten.

Four years ago our innocent loved ones were stripped of their right to exist by machineguns and tanks. During these four years, we have suffered from unimaginable material, spiritual, and physical pain. We have lost the right to enjoy a normal life and lost the right to express our opinions and viewpoints. Human rights, which should be universally enjoyed by all human beings, remain a luxury in present-day China, especially for those of us who are relatives of the victims of June Fourth.

256.129 1. A Distracting Sunday 2. A Rose-colored Evening Meal\fn{by Shen Rong (1936-)} Hankou, Sichuan Province, China (M) 12

1

One Sunday morning early in May, 1979, the university's Party Secretary Mu Zhijian was seated in an easy chair in his sitting-room reading the papers. Normally his work kept him too busy to do more than glance at the headlines. So each Sunday he read the most important articles published that week. This had been his habit for years. His three-year-old grandson Ganggang, leaning against his easy chair, grasped his arm in both chubby hands to pester him:

"Can't we go now? Let's go."

"In a minute." Mu made no move, intent on reading the paper.

"You promised to take him to the park for a ride on the aeroplane," put in his wife Wang Lei, looking out from the bedroom. "Hurry up and get going!"

"All right, straight away."

Mu put down the newspaper and padded in his slippers to the window. Outside it was a fine spring day. Pairs of birds were hopping and chirping on the jade-green boughs of the tall poplars. He stretched and said to himself with a smile,

"Yes, this is just the weather to go to the park."

Before the "cultural revolution", Mu had been the Party Secretary of this university. Still under fifty then, in his prime and full of drive, he was regarded as one of the most promising cadres in higher education. Now that a dozen years had passed and his temples were grizzled, he had come back to his post. Luckily he was still lit and energetic, confident that he could do a good job of work.

"Ha! Grandad's taking me to the park!" crowed Ganggang. Mu turned to pick up his grandson and at sight of his radiant face rubbed foreheads with him, then put him down and ordered:

"Go and fetch my cloth shoes and we'll leave. Can you do that?"

"Yes!"

Ganggang trotted on sturdy legs to his grandfather's bedroom, ducked boldly under the bed and pulled out the shoes. Scrambling up, a big shoe in each small hand, he trotted back again.

Just then from the hall they heard a soft knock on the door. Mu hurried to open it. There stood a man in his sixties. Tall and thin and wearing glasses for near-sightedness. Seeing Mu Zhijian he clasped both hands in salute.

"It's been a long time, Old Mu."

"So it's you, Old Dai. Come on in, I haven't seen you for years."

Mu stepped forward and shook him cordially by the hand, then cheerfully showed him into the sitting-room. Ganggang resented this unexpected guest, guessing that his arrival meant no trip to the park for him. He pouted, tears in his eyes. Ignoring his guest for a moment, Mu said coaxingly:

"Go and play with granny, Ganggang, there's a good boy."

"No. I want—"

"Do as you're told. I promise to take you to the park after I've had a talk with this visitor."

*

Old Dai, or Dai Jiyao, had been a history professor in this college, an expert on Ming history. Driven out during the "cultural revolution", he had now been assigned to the History Research Institute. Perhaps a common failing of all historians is to concentrate on the past rather than the present, or perhaps he had something on his mind which made him ignore the little boy's dismay and plump himself down on a sofa. Having handed over the pouting child to his wife, Mu brewed a glass of Dragon Well tea for his guest.

"What wind blew you here. Old Dai?" he asked with a smile.

"An ill wind," answered Dai, taking the glass with a nod, his expression not merely solemn but indignant.

Mu had not seen Dai for over ten years. Before that he had known him as a scholar who paid no attention to the outside world. People addressed him as "Master Dai" but behind his back called him a "pedant". Dai had rarely called on him. One summer when his roof leaked, he had preferred to catch the drips in basins rather than complain to the school authorities. Mu had made a self-criticism because of this, saying that he showed too little concern for the living conditions of senior intellectuals. So what ill wind could have blown this “pedant” to his door?

“I’ve come to find a back door,” announced Dai bluntly, to the Party Secretary’s astonishment. “I’ve spent all my life studying history behind closed doors. But now what can I do? You’re forced to look for back doors whether you like it or not. It’s preposterous, completely preposterous!”

Mu couldn’t help smiling. This scholar who didn’t know how to find back doors was certainly going about it the wrong way. With his vehemence and righteous indignation he looked not in the least like someone asking a favour. He said soothingly:

“Never mind. Tell me what you want, Old Dai.”

“You’ve a graduating student called Ding Dazhi, haven’t you?” Mu thought and nodded.

“Yes.”

“He comes from Beijing but was sent to the countryside. In ’76 he was recommended to study here.” Dai went on more slowly, “They say, when jobs are assigned, all graduates will be sent back to the province they came from. His father’s worried because he’s already found a unit in Beijing to take him. And he’s got his son’s old brigade to agree to release him. He asked me to take this up with you, Old Mu, to get the college to make allowances for him and keep him in Beijing.” Dai kept his head lowered as he spoke, not watching the reaction of his host.

*

As Mu listened he cast his mind back. Yes, one of the graduating students was called Ding Dazhi. An impressive-looking youngster, very active in school, with wide social contacts outside, but a mediocre student. He had struck Mu as very pushing.

In 1977, when the enrolment system was being overhauled, one student had put up a big-character poster criticizing the system of “recommendations” introduced by the “gang of four” which made it easy to get in through the back door and lowered the standard of the students admitted. He cited the case of a freshman who had ascribed the defeat of the Paris Commune to “failure to learn from Dazhai”.\fn{Dazhai was an agricultural brigade whose activities were held up to the people as a model for the whole country}Though no names were named, the whole school knew that it was Ding Dazhi who had made this howler.

Two days later Ding put up a poster too, stoutly denying that he had got into college through the back door. According to him he had been recommended by the poor and lower-middle peasants and approved by the county, commune and brigade—he had documents to prove this. Furthermore he accused the writer of the first poster of attacking the masses in order to side-track the whole investigation.

Two days after this the writer of the first poster put up a second. This time he named Ding Dazhi by name, and disclosed that the documents vouching for him had been procured by his father by bribing his brigade cadres.

This enraged Ding Dazhi. Mu’s first task on his reinstatement was settling this dispute. It took a whole week and a whole series of meetings to mobilize Party cadres to persuade the two opponents to call a truce and concentrate on denouncing the “gang of four”.

Now, to get a Beijing assignment, this Ding Dazhi and his father had once again shown their resourcefulness, finding a unit in Beijing to take him and getting his brigade to release him. They had even recruited honest Dai Jiyao to come and plead their case! What did Ding’s father do, to be able to pull all these strings?

*

Silence fell in the sitting-room. Having stated his purpose in coming Dai had no more to say. Mu puffed at his cigarette, thinking hard.

“Old Dai,” he finally said, “this Ding has a bad reputation. He got into college by the back door.”

“Really? I didn’t know that.” Dai leaned back, taking out a handkerchief to wipe his nose, at a loss for words.

“Now he wants to go through the back door again. What kind of behaviour is that?” His eyes on Dai, Mu unconsciously raised his voice.

“You taught here for many years, Old Dai. Before the ‘cultural revolution’ how many graduating students refused the jobs to which they were assigned? Very few indeed. Now some of them openly say they’ll go only to Tianjin, Nanjing, Shanghai or Beijing.”

“Are there really students like that?” Dai shook his head.

“You’re a historian, Old Dai. Today we ought to learn from the first Han emperor and bring order out of chaos to restore stability.”

Rather carried away, Mu stood up and poured himself some water. Sipping it he added,

“When I came back to work here I told the Party Committee several times: To overhaul this college we must reform enrolment and job assignment. That’s our only hope. If we don’t recruit students on the basis of merit, how can we guarantee the quality of our higher education? If graduates won’t take the jobs assigned by the state, what’s the use of training them?”

“You’re right, quite right.” Dai nodded. Mu sighed then said,

“Unfortunately it isn’t just up to us. We come under very heavy social pressure.” Dai apologized.

“By taking the liberty to call today I’ve put more pressure on you. But never mind, Old Mu. I was asked to beg this favour. Whether you agree or not is up to you. I don’t want to embarrass you.” Out of curiosity Mu asked,

“Are you connected with Ding Dazhi’s family?” Dai shook his head.

“We’re not related, not friends—there’s no connection. 1 haven’t a clue as to Ding Dazhi’s height, his appearance or character. As for his father, I know even less about him.”

“Then who asked you to put in a word for them?”

“It was all the doing of my Minister of the Interior. Actually she doesn’t know the Ding family either. But she has a cousin on the paternal side who does. It seems the father works in some commercial department. You know, Old Mu, my only self-indulgence is drinking two ounces of good liquor every day. Somehow Ding’s father got to hear of that, and through her cousin my wife got him to keep me supplied. So for the last two years I’ve never lacked for good liquor. Pah! I’ve my self-indulgence to blame. Now I’m having to pay for it. Her cousin turned up the other day to persuade me, saying I’m on good terms with you, and you’re in charge of job assignment. She insisted I must help. Old Mu, I hate to raise this request, but what else can I do? It’s really most provoking!” He pounded his right fist on his left hand.

“Don’t get worked up. Old Dai.” Mu forced a smile. “Do you know how many requests like this I’ve had? In the right drawer in my office I’ve a list of thirty-eight graduating students, all of whom have had people interceding for them or sending official letters asking us to make special allowances for them. You’ve simply added another name to the list.”

“Then what do you mean to do?” asked Dai.

“I’ve two alternatives.” Mu laughed. “One is to stick to principles and not make any exceptions except in line with official policy, no matter whom I offend or whether I lose my post. The other is to turn a blind eye and give the green light, to do them a good turn which will pay me too. We’re having a meeting this afternoon to consider the cases of those thirty-eight students, no, thirty-nine students now.”

“I do apologize for troubling you.” Dai realized that he was in the wrong.

“Never mind, we’ll decide after we’ve talked it over.”

“Then I’ll go now, Old Mu.” Dai turned back at the door to add,

“I apologize too, Old Mu, for stopping you taking your grandson out to play.”

*

After seeing him off Mu returned to the sitting-room. The sunshine was still enchanting, the birds still as merry as ever. But this spring scene no longer appealed to him. Those thirty-eight, no, thirty-nine names were preying on his mind. Each had a host of connections. Those connections enmeshed him like a spider’s web so that he was unable to move.

He recalled the exposure of Ding Dazhi’s entry into college through the back door. His classmate said that his brigade had originally recommended a girl in every way better than Ding. But his father had squeezed her out, using a first-class bicycle as a bribe.

“How abominable.” Mu paced his sitting-room. He had never met Ding’s father Ding Qiliang but he pictured him as a smarmy hypocrite. Ding had no doubt had his eyes on him ever since his reinstatement. In order to have his son kept in Beijing, he had ferreted out all the Party Secretary’s social connections. Then had chosen Dai Jiyao to breach his defences and made up to Dai by supplying him with good liquor. Spent two years preparing to get through this back door.

“We certainly can’t pander to a man like that.”

Mu stood up. This decision taken, his heart felt lighter. Just then Ganggang clumped in again, calling:

“Aren’t we going, grandad? Let’s go!”

“We’ll go, right away.”

Without waiting to be told, Ganggang brought the shoes he had put by the door and watched his grandfather put them on. As Mu stooped to do this, they heard a woman call cheerfully in the hail:

“Are you in, Sister Wang?” Wang Lei went to meet her, laughing.

“Come on in, Sister Li.”

This Sister Li was one of the oldest residents in the street. The Li family was said to have lived there for several generations while some Manchu princes had their mansion there. Brought up in a compound occupied by several households, she was dynamic, capable and outspoken. When Mu came under fire and his whole family was outlawed, under a cloud, she had still called to see them. As she said,

"I can size up people for myself. Why should I join in the general hullabaloo?"

When Mu was sent down to the countryside and his son was working in the provinces, it was kind-hearted Sister Li who had looked after the rest of the family. So they thought the world of her. Mu and his wife called her Sister: their children, Mama Li: and Ganggang, Granny. Hearing her voice in the hall Ganggang's face puckered. Mu patted his head and said:

"Granny Li wants to talk to your gran, it's nothing to do with us."

Ganggang brightened up. Mu, straightening up, took his hand. But before they could set off Wang Lei brought in Sister Li.

"Old Mu, Sister Li wants to have a word with you."

"Oh?" Mu wondered why.

Ganggang stamped his feet, howling. His grandmother carried him off.

"Sit down, Sister Li, sit down. Tell me why you've come. Mu offered her a glass of tea.

"Comrade Old Mu, there's a family at the east end of our alley called Song. The wife's name is Jin. D'you know them?"

Mu shook his head. Though he'd lived here for scores of years he didn't know the names of all his neighbours.

"Well, it was Sister Jin who told me this. Made my heart bleed. I don't know whether I'm right to butt in or not, but I just had to do something."

What was on her mind? Could she be looking for a back door too? No, honest Sister Li had never tried to pull strings.

"Sister Jin has a nephew …" Mu wished she would come to the point. And with a sigh she did.

"His name is Ding."

Another Ding! Mu gave a start. Sister Li went on placidly:

"He's called Ding Dazhi, and he's studying in your college. Do you know the boy, Comrade Old Mu?" Mu simply nodded.

"What a memory you have!" She chuckled. "All these thousands of students and you can remember their names."

"Not all their names. I remember Ding Dazhi."

Mu wrinkled his brows with a wry smile. Failing to notice this she went straight on:

"The trouble the Dings had getting that boy into college! Nearly ruined them, it did." This bewildered Mu.

"Old Mu, wait till you hear the whole story," she continued. "This Ding Qiliang is a small, low-paid cadre under the Bureau of Commerce. His wife has no job and is poorly, so they've always been hard up. Their elder child, a girl, was born with a weak heart. She's stayed in Beijing with a factory job, but keeps having to take time off. Their second child, this Ding Dazhi, went to the countryside in '69. At first he had dozens of classmates in that village, but in less than two years those of them with pull joined the army, found work in factories, went back to town or managed to get into college, leaving just the few youngsters who'd no back door to stew in that mountain gully. Just think, with the others all gone and so far from home, how could the boy settle down there? The old couple were so worried, they asked right and left for help to get him back. In '76, when the colleges took in students, his brigade was given one place. But what use was that to him? You had to be recommended, and who would put his name forward?" Sister Li paused for breath and sipped her tea, then went on:

"The old couple talked it over and got busy so as not to miss this chance. They sold the old man's watch to raise the fare, and he asked for leave to visit his son's brigade. He went to beg for this favour. There used to be an old saying: 'A favour's bigger than the sky, it's something only money and pull can buy.' Times may have changed, but money still talks and some people won't listen to reason. Who'd help a nobody like Ding Qiliang? He sold his watch, spent all his money and wore himself to a frazzle, doing everything short of kneeling and kowtowing, but he got nowhere. Too bad! As he was leaving, though, the secretary in charge of that village hinted that if he brought them a good bike they'd let his son go. There was nothing for it but to hurry home, sell up everything they had worth any money, then borrow right and left till he'd scraped together the price of a good bike. He delivered it himself. That's how he pushed his son through the college gate."

Mu sat there motionless, stunned. It had never occurred to him that this despicable back-door farce could give rise to tragedies too. Her hands to her heart Sister Li sighed again and said:

"They got their son home, but the family was head over heels in debt. His mother was so frantic she couldn't get up from her kang. Her husband had to go to work and nurse her too, trying to cut down their food budget to save money to pay his debts. Do you know how they managed? For the last two winters they've never dared light the stove, never bought fresh vegetables, only picking rotten cabbages out of the garbage, without even pickles to eat. They really had a hard time. Sister An says her brother-in-law has just turned fifty, but he's bald, his teeth have dropped out, his back is bent, and he staggers along looking like a man of seventy. What for? All to find a back door for his son. Think what he's had to put up with!"

Mu's heart had sunk as he listened. He had a mental picture of an old man shuffling towards him, bent under the burden of finding a back door. He seemed to hear this toothless old fellow asking:

"Am I to blame? Did I do wrong?"

"Now they're up against it again." Sister Li's voice seemed to be coming from far away. "Now jobs are to be assigned. And it's said the boy will be sent back to where he came from. Won't that be the death of them? They're so frantic they're begging right and left for help. And now, by a stroke of luck, a factory in Beijing is willing to take him, and his brigade has agreed to let him go. It's just up to your college. Somehow they discovered that we're on good terms, so they sent Sister Jin to me. I told them, if the decision is up to Old Mu, there won't be any problem. Old Mu's a high official but doesn't give himself official airs, he's kind to everyone, always reasonable. If I tell him the whole story he's sure to help. Wasn't I right, Comrade Old Mu?"

Mu found it quite impossible to answer. Sister Li put her glass on the table and aired her views:

"My old man tried to stop me, saying this is going through the back door and I shouldn't have anything to do with it. I asked him: 'Is there no justice in the world? Ha, the children of big cadres can whisk through any back door. One telephone call or one note and everything's fixed. Why should it be so hard for the children of the likes of us to get anywhere? Should the door be closed against them? Old Ding's whole family has come to grief trying to get his son through a back door, shouldn't we help them out?' I told him: 'I'm going to see to this, so don't give me that daft talk.'"

Mu had no idea what to say. Her reasoning was wrong, but the situation was such. Many of the thirty-eight students on his list had their names there as the result of a telephone call from some high official or a note from some organization. Of course, the fate of those thirty-eight was still undecided; their cases would be discussed at this afternoon's meeting. But, undoubtedly, it was easy for big cadres to make such requests, while people like Ding Qiliang had to sweat blood to do it. In this sense it was certainly unfair.

Sister Li said no more but waited for his answer. Mu felt as if a great weight had sealed his lips. Finally he answered listlessly, almost rudely:

"You'd better be going now, Sister Li."

She glanced up at him, feeling that Old Mu was not as obliging as usual. As she stood up slowly he added:

"We shall be discussing this problem at a meeting this afternoon."

*

While Sister Li took her leave of Wang Lei, Mu remained sitting on the sofa. He heard them talking in low voices in the hall. In the silence that followed he visualized Ding Dazhi and Ding Qiliang one after the other. It now seemed to him that Ding Dazhi was not pushing as he had once thought. Apparently push was another form of weakness. To survive when injured the weak had to start pushing.

But what could he do for the Dings? Do as they asked? That would be unprincipled, counter to his pledge at the time of his reinstatement. Refuse them? That would certainly be a big blow to them. And if he refused them he should also refuse all the others who wanted to be assigned to big cities. It would be unfair to discriminate.

"Grandad, let's go." Ganggang was standing before him.

"Right." Mu spoke wearily, as if too tired to get up. From the hall they heard another knock on the door, and a very familiar voice:

"Young Mu at home?"

It was Vice-minister Gao, Gao Chengzong, who had been Mu's first superior, his first mentor when he joined the revolution. Mu owed much of his knowledge and experience directly to him. Indeed Gao had influenced his whole way of thinking, his working style and even his behaviour. Mu stood up to open the door, but Wang Lei forestalled him.

"Minister Gao, why hasn't Nini come?" she asked as she ushered him in.

Nini, Gao's only daughter, had always accompanied him to their home in the past. For Gao hoped, without saying so in so many words, that Wang Lei would introduce a young man to her.

"Aha! Nini has a boyfriend now, that's why she hasn't come with her old man." Gao laughed heartily as he shook Mu's hand.

"Oh?" For a second Mu looked sceptical. Then he smiled. "Fine. Congratulations." As Wang Lei made tea, Ganggang rushed up to Gao to complain:

"Grandad Gao, grandad said he'd take me to the park, but he hasn't."

"Well, that's not right. Let's criticize him." Gao patted the child's head and said to Mu,

"Young Mu, this happened so suddenly, don't you think it's rather strange? Haha! It surprised even me. You know, my daughter's twenty-seven this year, and not good-looking. She said she meant to stay single all her life. But it so happened last Sunday that I took her to Yunshuijian, and there she met a former middle-school classmate. The two of them got talking and hit it off so well that we all came back together in my car. Since then they've got on like a house on fire. We really ought to thank the old man in the moon."\fn{In Chinese mythology, the match-maker} He chuckled.

"Splendid." agreed Mu, though still rather sceptical. Nini wasn't just "not good-looking", she was downright ugly besides being blind in one eye. But her demands were so high that although she had asked many people to introduce her a young man, no one had ever found a suitable suitor for her. How had she suddenly formed this attachment?

"Wang Lei! At last that weight has been lifted from my mind," continued Gao jubilantly. "When a girl's grown she should marry. When I couldn't get her off my hands I was worried stiff."

"When shall we drink at their wedding?" asked Wang Lei with a smile.

"Soon." Gao roared with laughter. "I saw through that talk of hers about staying single. She capitulated at the first encounter." Mu joined in his laughter.

"By the way, Young Mu, there's something I want you to do for me." Gao turned to him. "This future son-in-law of mine is one of your college's graduating students."

"Yes?" Mu felt a premonition. "What, what's his name?" he stammered.

"Ding. Ding Dazhi."

Ding Dazhi again! This was a stunning blow. Mu leaned back in his chair, speechless.

"Apparently he'll be assigned to the provinces. Under the circumstances, Young Mu, can't you make allowances and keep him in Beijing?"

Mu didn't hear the rest of Gao's request. He couldn't believe that anyone would rush into marriage like that. Was this a plot, or love? Was it finding a back door or marrying? His mental pictures of the Dings had blurred again. What sort of people were they? Experts at infiltrating through back doors, or pathetic creatures crushed by this burden on them? How could they be considered pathetic creatures?

"What's up? Have you anything against Ding Dazhi?" Gao noticed Mu's silence and his strange expression.

"No, no." Mu shook his head.

"Well then, you fix it!" Gao turned away to tease Ganggang, assuming that there was no more to be said.

Mu pulled himself together. He was tempted to tell Old Gao of his visits from Dai Jiyao and Sister Li. That seemed to him his duty. Yet how could one gain an accurate impression from their mutually contradictory accounts? And if he spoke up what would the consequence be? If Ding Dazhi were blameless, Mu might destroy a young couple's genuine love, which meant so much to Nini, a love she could never hope to find again. But if this were a swindle and he didn't warn them in time, wouldn't she and Old Gao be in for a terrible shock?

"Old Gao, do you think"—Mu beat about the bush—"Do you think Ding Dazhi is really in love with Nini?"

"I don't know what you mean by in love. My marriage was arranged for me by my parents." Gao had suddenly sobered up.

"Why ask such a question, Old Mu?" protested his wife. Mu ignored her to probe again:

"Old Gao, do you believe Nini will be happy?" After a short silence Gao answered:

"Until I go to see Karl Marx I think she may be happy."

"What's got into you today, Old Mu?" Wang Lei demanded.

"Young Mu's right," Gao told her, raising one hand. "That had occurred to me too. But he hasn't thought it through the way I have. All right, let's leave it at that. I leave Ding Dazhi's business to you. I must go and report back. The young couple are waiting at home for news."

His forehead had cleared and he was laughing again. Gao left.

*

Leaning back in his easy chair Mu felt completely disorientated. The conflicting images of the Dings, father and son, now contemptible, now pathetic, were too confusing to grasp. Then he recalled Dai Jiyao's indignation, heard Sister Li’s appeal to right a wrong, and Old Gao’s hearty laughter. Back-doorism really seemed to have become an irresistible tide, drawing into it so many people, some of them very good comrades. This tide was sweeping down on him, he found it hard to withstand it.

“Grandad, let’s go!” cried Ganggang, rushing in.

This cry sounded only faintly in Mu’s ears, and was almost at once drowned out by the clamorous babel of the search for back doors. No, he must hold out, not capitulate, Mu resolved. Sure, it was hard, and precisely because it was hard he must summon up all his reserves of strength. He felt as if the eyes of all the staff and students were fixed on him, to see if he would keep the promise he had made after his reinstatement. He felt the eyes of the public on him too, to see if he would live up to what was expected of a Communist and high-ranking Party cadre.

“Grandad, let’s go!” pleaded Ganggang. Mu sprang to his feet and patted the little boy’s head.

“Come on!” he said cheerfully. “We’ll have a ride on the aeroplane.”

“There’s no time. Don’t you have a meeting this afternoon?” Wang Lei objected. As he led his grandson out Mu replied:

“There’s time. A turn in the park in the fresh air will buck me up for the meeting.”

2

The bottles of wine and soda-water are opened. Deep red wine, orange soda-water. The children cheer. Ribbons dance, dimples appear between wrinkled faces, and little black heads next to dignified white hair. The whole family sits round two tables put together. This is their first reunion after a long separation. Has the God of Happiness really come back to the earth? Please join in this Saturday evening’s family feast.

“Rose, rose, red rose, the rose in my heart …”

A newly bought tape-recorder stands on the brand-new wine cabinet. The soprano seems to be smiling as she sings for this family, her song adding to the festive atmosphere. Ah, no one can do without music, whether in ancient or modern times, whether in grief or joy.

It looks as if he was right to come. Su Hong sits straight by the table, his five-year-old daughter to his left, his wife to his right. The little girl kneeling on her chair is calling,

“Granny, I’m going to drink a whole bottle of pop!”

Being a child, she feels at home straight away. Who could believe that she’s only known her grandmother for one hour. Mum laughs. Kindly, happy old lady, she seems to have dreamed of her grand-daughter calling her. His wife exclaims,

“What a fine cook you are, mum! How did you prepare this liver?”

Her voice is nauseatingly sweet. Her smile is repulsive. How can she bring herself to say such things? All these years she’s never mentioned his family, as if she had no in-laws.

The nightmare's over, a new day has dawned. At last you’ve come back from a rugged mountain to a prosperous city, from medieval barbarity to modern civilization. Everybody longs for Beijing: the Summer Palace, foreign Films, boating on the Kunming Lake, the marvellous Echo Wall in the Temple of Heaven, the spirit of the Central Committee, Beijing roast duck, hot pickled mustard tubers from Sichuan, endless specialized conferences, a host of traditional performances …

Thousands of people pull strings yet fail to get transferred here, to squeeze their way in. And now you have come back, never mind how. In this revitalized capital the high-rise buildings are growing higher and higher. What does it matter living on the thirteenth floor? There’s a lift. How fascinating it is, looking down from the balcony so high in the air at the toy-like pedestrians and traffic below. Life, like a flowing stream, can never bring back what it has borne away. It’s wisest to look to the future. Prepare for old age! Your children are grown up, you don’t have to support them. You can buy a nineteen-inch color TV in place of your twelve-inch black and white set. Refrigerators and washing machines are on sale everywhere, you needn’t go through back doors. That’s a good stereo tape-recorder you’ve bought, with four loudspeakers. You can sit with closed eyes all evening listening to Mozart and Strauss. The lovely music will carry away your cares, even your past nightmares.

“Come on, let’s all drink a toast!”

Mum’s husky voice sounds rather nasal. Is she smiling or tearful? Her hair is gray, how she has aged. He remembers her with abundant jet-black hair and a sweet, mellow voice.

All glasses are held out towards her, each smiling face turns to her. Deep red liquid flows into their crystal glasses. Is this intoxicating wine or healing medicine?

"Rose, rose, red rose …"

Father has the top seat. He has aged, his snow-white head is drooping as if the light music has lulled him to sleep. No. he's awake. His expression is cold. His snill eyes under thick eyebrows aren't looking at anyone.

Mum shoots him a sidelong glance, deploring his coldness. She has gone to great pains to prepare this meal for them all, and invited her sons, daughter and grandchildren to this family reunion. This isn't any festival, but the occasion is more worth celebrating. The last twenty Spring Festivals and Mid-Autumn Festivals had been lonely times for them.

His younger sister and her husband have brought their Imp, a beady-eyed child who is fidgeting on his chair like a monkey. Younger Brother's face is shining. Wearing a spruce uniform and snow-white shirt, with, his head held high, he is murmuring to his fiancée. A lovely girl. her limpid, unfathomable eyes are lit up like two little flames. Those bright eyes remind him … yes, remind him of the girl forever hidden in his heart. Her last glance at him was so pathetic.

"Rose, rose, red rose in my heart …"

"Turn it off!"

Father has at last spoken, gruffly, not raising his eyes. He is not behaving like the master of this new flat, not as if this sumptuous meal is to celebrate his rehabilitation after twenty years in disgrace. He seems unaware that he has returned to the field of art, that his paintings are to be exhibited again and Su Banshe's Art Album republished. He looks like an old horse exhausted after a long gallop, like an old man so accustomed to isolation that this rowdy party revolts him. No, I'm the only one who revolts him. Mum's laughing, laughing huskily. Turning a deaf ear to his request she's leaving the tape-recorder on to make everybody happy. She wants to create a harmonious atmosphere. Ah, Mum, Mum, how can you recover spilt water, repair a broken mirror, or heal a broken heart?

He's disgusted with me. Curses me. Detests me. I'm this family's renegade. Persona non grata here. Why did I come? I shouldn't have come. When my daughter heard we were going to see her grandparents, she stared in surprise.

"Have I a granny? A grandad?"

She had never heard of them. When my wife knew that Mum had phoned, she was quite carried away. What should she wear, what presents should she bring? She bustled about like a typical petty bourgeois. Look how she's messed up her hair, having it waved in tight curls. Look at her broad grin. As if she's been longing to greet her mother-in-law, as if she's entering a new world by coming into this family which is prospering again. It's her fault, all her fault, why did she insist on coming? If she hadn't, I wouldn't be feeling so awkward and irritated.

Is it really all her fault? No, that's not fair. I wanted to come too. After all he's my dad, in his sixties, without much longer to live. Besides, I'm his elder son, once his favourite son. Childhood, carefree childhood, dream-like, golden childhood. The current races down the gorge, small boats struggle upstream, tow-men strain forward, bent double, the setting sun dyes red the glinting river and the boatmen's perspiring faces. Dad, stooping over his big desk, with a few strokes of his brush paints this enchanting picture.

"Honghong, your glass!"

Mum is looking after us all. Honghong! He feels like crying. Something has lacerated his bleeding heart.

"Get on with your meal."

The gruff voice sounding coldly from the head of the table seems to rap his wrist. Su Hong puts down the glass he has raised. At once he raises his other hand.

"Here, mum, let me help myself." He stands up, reaching out and forcing a smile. Good, only his voice is trembling.

Frantic, I glance at my brother on the left and sense the coldness of his look at me. Yes, he should be the favourite son. When they went through hard times, had nothing to eat and were under fire, he was the only one who stayed at their side. Still small, treated as a little cur, he went with them to the mountains. Saved their lives by lugging them a sack of pumpkins from hundreds of il away.

All glasses are raised, clinked together.

"Here's to your health, dad and mum!" Brother has a pleasing voice, and his fiancée chimes in like a silver bell,

"Dad, mum, good health."

Sister's voice is shrill, her husband grins. The Imp stands on his chair.

"Here's to your health, grandad, grandma."

His father has told him what to say. All the other children join in. My daughter smiles too and calls out, showing the gap in her pearly front teeth.

"Rose, rose, red rose …"

Su Hong raises his glass too, this heavy glass of wine. Its rim feels cold to his lips. A familiar feeling. What does it remind him of?

Stacks of rice paper, square inkstones, brushes, cinnabar, malachite green, bright red, big ink-slabs. What an enormous inkstone. Two small hands clutching an ink-slab are grinding it hard, Dad's going to paint!

"That's my good sonny!"

Paintings cover the wall and everyone listens to Dad as he explains different techniques. What fun it is seeing a dove fly suddenly on to a sheet of white paper. A prawn swims over. Plum-blossom blooms. Chrysanthemums scent the air. Dad has a magic brush. He's a real magician.

"Honghong, pour Dad a glass of wine."

Quick, pour the wine, Dad paints best when he's drinking. Honghong holds the glass carefully, afraid to spill it. Dad always bends down to put the glass to his lips.

"Here sonny, have a sip, it's sweet."

Yes, it's sweet, honey-sweet childhood. What's sweet is Dad's love, not the wine. Wine is sharp, bitter, choking. When he frowns, shuts his mouth and makes a lace, Dad always bursts out laughing and brushes his prickly moustache against his cheeks, then swings him up high in the air. So high that he can touch the ceiling …

Well, those days can never come back. Ever since that fearful time everything has passed away like a flowing stream or like a floating cloud. Father's tenderness has gone never to return. Everything has turned icy cold, father and son seem strangers. He coughs, raises his glass with the noisy laughing people around the table, and takes a sip. The bitter wine fills his heart with bitterness.

He sees shafts of golden light in which thousands of flowers are swirling. In those days his life was full of light and fresh flowers. The secluded college campus, cradle of engineers, future specialists, scholars scaling the heights of science, probationary Party members, both red and expert. Entrancing, dream-like love, limpid eyes, an innocent heart, rose-red cheeks, strolling in the wood by the brook. Abruptly the earth spins round, his hopes are toppled, the light of life is extinguished.

"Your father's a Rightist."

"You must stand firm and make a clean break with him."

"Make your choice: side with the Party or with a Rightist."

Heavens, how could this have happened? What should he do?

"Why are you a Rightist?"

Amid the talk and laughter this question rings in his ears. What a ridiculous thing to ask his father. His father doesn't answer, cannot answer. He dares not raise his eyes to that icy face, but sees his hands trembling on his knees. Mum's husky laugh rings out, but her laugh is close to tears.

"Don't ask your father that, Honghong, how can he bear it." Sobbing, she stands in front of the seated figure.

He feels a lump in his throat, tears spring to his eyes, but he must on no account shed them. He stealthily picks up the bottle to refill his glass. Forcing a smile he screws up his face and drinks.

"Rose, rose, red rose …"

His rose is a beautiful red, not a gaudy scarlet, not a vulgar pink, but a refined tender crimson suffused with faint melancholy. The same colour as this room. A brand-new room. White walls, glittering glass. a newly painted door, bright electroplated furniture. The red rays of the setting sun have dyed everything in their gay rosy light. Everything is new and spotless in this new home they have set up. The old seems to have been swept away by a flood.

Why can't the flood scour our souls? To let the past die and embark on a new life. If we could start again from scratch what a fine world this would be.

It can't be done. Printed in black on white paper, he found the answer in the newspaper.

"The Rightist artist Su Banshe with his reactionary outlook has an inveterate hatred for the Party and socialism. In his paintings our motherland's sky is overcast, the earth is gray, socialism is like a sinking ship with people at their last gasp struggling in the water or lying panic-stricken on the deck. What vicious insinuations!"

That was the conclusion reached. The final verdict.

Of course he had to make a clean break, could never go home again. There was no need to go. It's the people who raised me, the Party that trained me. The Party is my home. Scrap those petty-bourgeois sentiments and be an iron-willed revolutionary.

White chicken, dark brown preserved eggs, deep red liver, pink sausage, green pickles. Mum made these hometown pickles on her return here. So many pairs of chopsticks, so many smiling faces. Toast after toast, senseless laughter, disgusting flattery. What is she laughing at? How can I live with such a petty-bourgeois hypocrite? Have I really slept with her for twenty years? Is this fate or a trick played on me by history? How could I ever have taken up with her?

"Rose, rose, red rose, the rose in my heart …"

Where is the rose in my heart? Where has she gone? With her sweet face and graceful figure she was like the goddess scattering flowers in one of Dad's paintings. That painting was burnt when our house was raided.

She ought to be happy forever. It would be a crime to let the dust defile her or worldly conventions upset her. How could he, a criminal, harm such an innocent girl? Her eyes are misted over, her step is no longer so light. Stop maundering like this and make up your mind to release her. She should be like a dove, free to fly wherever she pleases. Because I love her I want her to be happy.

Love, love, what is love? He had given his "love" to the librarian. In the old library among all those books, she had seemed a little duck quacking away and preening herself, distracting serious students. He had swooped on her like an eagle, sweeping her off her feet. Had taken her everywhere to flaunt his love, even to the one he loved. Give me up, my heart already numbed.

Amazed, fearful, wounded, she wrote him long passionate letters. Her eyes downcast, her lashes covered her eyes brimming over like autumn pools. What a fool he'd been, thinking he'd acted a part successfully when his performance had in fact been so crude. After the graduation ceremony, when the applause had died away, it was time to take leave of his college. No, take leave of his dreamlike youth. She should be standing by the brook under the weeping willows. How many times she had stood there in the moonlight. Yes, she had come. Go quickly to avoid her. But he couldn't. This was their last meeting, the last, last one, to end everything between them. How could they part like this? He went over to her. Gazing into each other's eyes they drew closer and closer together as they walked. Like characters in a Shakespearian tragedy. A tragedy? Yes, it was a tragedy. He longed with one ardent kiss to wipe away all the hurt, the grief in her eyes.

"You shouldn't do this. You're deceiving yourself, deceiving me and her too …"

This staggered him. Why not pour out to her all the bitterness in his heart? Only she could understand.

No, his own wretchedness was enough. Making a clean break hadn't saved him. He had been switched from studying a most advanced, top-secret course. His admission to the Party had been postponed because he "still sympathized with his Rightist father". He wasn't even eligible to teach in the college as an assistant. Where in the wide world was there a place for him? With my fine academic record I must strike out for myself in the sea of life and battle with angry billows. Not knowing where to row my little craft, how can I involve this angel in such danger?

"She and I have already—"

She turned and quickly made off. Then slowed down and stopped to stare at him with her big dreamy eyes, her sad, expectant eyes.

What a ghastly, irretrievable mistake.

Brother is laughing again, his pretty fiancée too. Carefree laughter, piercing laughter. Peacocks like to flaunt their plumage. Girls like to dress up, lovers to laugh. Ah, they're quietly clinking glasses and drinking to their future happiness. Happiness. From ox-carts to locomotives, kites to rockets, homespun to dacron, kindling fire by rubbing wood to space ships, for how many generations has mankind sought for happiness? Ever since Pan Gu created the world and the search will continue till the end of time.

Love, the greatest happiness of all. Selfish love unwilling to be seen by others.

He meets their eyes at an inopportune time for them. At once Brother's smile vanishes, his expression freezes. Why is there such contempt on her beautiful face? Why should she despise me? Are you the only ones fit to be in love? My brother must have told her everything.

Laugh, preen yourselves, enjoy the sweet wine of life. You've no right to despise me, what do you know about love? Do you know what sacrifice means? Love and sacrifice go together, that is the only true love. But why think of such things, don't envy them, swallow the bitter wine of your own love.

Where is she now? By the Songhua River in the northeast? On the loess steppe of the northwest? For ten years we hovered between life and death, no, surely she's still alive on this smiling earth. He reaches again for the bottle.

"Don't drink so much!"

A broad white face. All too familiar, yet like the face of a stranger. Looking at him with reproachful, anxious eyes. He pretends to be drunk. Drunkards with their bleary eyes can't see distinctly. Are you my wife? I don't seem to know you.

Yes, they were strange bedfellows. No wonder she was always complaining, nagging. Habit is a fearful thing. Habit made him come home from work every day and park his bicycle under the eaves as his daughter ran out calling daddy. His meals were cooked for him, his clothes washed, his trousers pressed.

His wife was not to blame. Why make a scapegoat of her? As time passed he steeled himself, underwent a slight change, and she had known a little happiness. But his heart was like ice, there was a limit to his self-reproach. He was miserly too with his kindness. They lived together, that was all. Everyone must marry and have children, that was only right and proper. Such was life.

"Rose, rose …"

Why does this tune go on and on? Probably this tape-recorder has an automatic replaying circuit. To please his fiancée Brother keeps it repeating itself. She is a rose. Of course, the rose in his heart. His road is strewn with the fresh flowers of love, father's love, mother's love, his fiancée's love … This song is maddening!

"Turn it off," Father calls, finally losing patience. He gets up to drive the soprano out of the room.

*

With the music turned off the room is suddenly quiet. With so many people there why should it seem so empty? Ah, Mum has gone to the kitchen to fetch another dish. She must have queued up for two days to prepare so many.

"Duck, duck, a big duck!"

The children clap their hands. It's long since he's seen an Eight-treasure Duck, so yellow, succulent, savoury and translucent.

"Come on everybody, eat. I forgot how to cook this after all those years." Mum rolls up her sleeves to attack the poor duck with a knife and chopsticks.

"Honghong, have this, it's one of your favourites."

She offers him a leg, using a spoon to catch the fat dripping from it. Quickly hold out your plate. Why has Mum become so ceremonious? He remembers her rapping him on the head with her chopsticks. Which year was that? One Spring Festival, when he was wolfing down duck and she didn't want him to over-eat.

He loved duck, loved the way Mum cooked it. He always squeezed into the kitchen, beside the table, to watch as she deftly turned and boned the duck, then stuffed it with ham, mushrooms, sticky rice and lilies. Yes, and Job's-tears. With his little hands he stuffed in a handful too. When Mum tried to elbow him aside he refused to go, waiting right there for the duck to be cooked. She scolded,

"Greedy guts!"

The duck on his plate is just as well cooked, with all the old ingredients. Where did she manage to find Job's-tears? No doubt in a pharmacy. He looks, but doesn't pick up his chopsticks— how can he eat this?

"Life in the family of a bourgeois Rightist imperceptibly corrupted me. I'm going to make a clean break with my guilty family." As a sign of determination he had denounced this duck, yes, seriously.

"That wasn't Eight-treasure Duck but Eight-poison Duck."

How utterly ludicrous. Because of this Eight-poison Duck he had been four years on probation before being admitted into the Party. How could he stomach this duck served up today?

Dad isn't eating either. His lace is dark, his lips quivering. How many sound teeth has he left? He used to have strong white teeth as handsome as Brother's now.

"Eating is an art in China. If an artist doesn't know how to eat, he can't be a good artist."

He had been criticized for saying this. His paintings fetched high prices, but by the end of each month Mum complained that she had no money to buy rice. Dad was a spendthrift. Mum was a good cook. When he received money he invited his artist friends and drinking friends to one of the well-known restaurants frequented by men of letters, with inscriptions inside written by Guo Moruo. And every few days they entertained guests at home till all the money was spent. His maxim was:

"Money is something we're born without, and it can't be taken with us when we die."

Dad was very open-handed. Many. many of his former guests had denounced him.

Now he's old, has given up drinking and hasn't much appetite. He's sitting at this feast as if at a meeting where he has to come clean. He's lost his joie de vivre, is worn out, looking listlessly at the duck and at the grown-ups and children seated around him. His cold, blank glance sweeps over Su Hong's face with no love in it, no hate either, nothing but a fearsome coldness which seeps into people's bones.

Su Hong hangs his head, staring stupidly at his empty glass, as empty as his heart. Why look at me like that? Am I feeling good? If I hurt you, acting in a way no son should, it certainly wasn't because I wanted to. If you'd bawl me out it would be better than this. But you can't. Your "good sonny" disappeared long ago, pretend he was never born.

No, no, not that … I love you with all my heart. Of course I can't say so, I don't want to tell you anything. Things are too snarled up to be sorted out or explained. Who knows how wretched I am? Instead of dwelling on these things I should be smiling. This is a celebration, a special occasion.

*

"Rose, rose, red rose …"

Why do I still hear that song, like a mosquito buzzing by my ears, when the tape-recorder's turned off? I can't drive it away. I know you blame me, know you can never forgive me. When you were sent away for labour reform, Mum notified me that the train left at 9.45. I remember that distinctly. I sat in my office then, watching the second hand creep to "9". I didn't ask for leave to see you off. Didn't I want to go? I didn't dare to. If I'd asked for leave I'd have had to make long explanations.

I hope you've burnt those three letters. I long ago burnt that one you wrote me, burnt it as soon as I got it. But I remember every word in it.

"Su Hong, is work keeping you busy? I've been cleared. Your mum and I are both well. Father."

You'd written with a fountain-pen, not a brush, though all your previous letters to me had been written with a brush. I wrote back copying phrases from the paper, so that it wouldn't matter who read my letter. I had to be careful. So many people had got into trouble over letters. A year later I wrote to you again. The year after that, when the "cultural revolution" started, I didn't even dare write. I knew you would hold it against me. No, you can't have. Nothing matters to you anymore.

Why does fate play such tricks on us? I shouldn't have gone to Sichuan that year on business. There was nothing to eat on sale, it was terrible. You'd said our native province was "the land of plenty". That its green hills and limpid streams produced men of good taste.

For boasting of your good taste you were criticized. You were too ingenuous, too foolish, no wonder they called you a pedant. I hadn't intended to go to that exhibition, but as my boss went I had to. I hadn't expected you to be helping out there. In the corridor I spotted an old stooped workman, a ladder over one shoulder, approaching with a bucket of yellow paint. He was barefoot, his clothes stained with paint of different colours. Stepping out of the way of the ladder I saw that it was you.

I wanted to speak but my boss told me to hurry. I went on, meaning to come back later to see you, but I never did. I know you resented that. No, no no, you may have forgotten. So much the better. I wish I could forget.

"Why aren't you eating, Honghong?" Mum's husky laughter.

She's extremely observant. Why single me out? I'm someone special here, needing special consideration.

"He's drunk!" My wife chuckles; showing her teeth.

What's funny? I only wish I were drunk, too drunk to think or be conscious of anything.

All right, get drunk. The bottle in front of him is empty. He reaches for the one by his sister and fills his glass. Drink up, eat, don't brood or talk. He picks up his chopsticks to help himself to some food. Is it fish? Prawn? Chicken? Duck? This must be what is meant by "eating without tasting". It's fish, set out on a new blue and white oblong porcelain dish. The tasty fish is decorated with three flowers cut out of carrots and Chinese cabbage to add a festive note.

Dad liked "beautiful food, beautifully served". Called that art.

"The superior man won't eat a fish that has been turned over." He said this at each Spring Festival when Mum brought in a fish and we were all too full to finish it.

So we were all "superior men". Superior men? Then why had it taken intellectuals so long to join the ranks of the working class? Live fish frisk on rice paper. Why are there no paintings in this room? We used to have so many. Live fish, live prawns, all gone now. These speculations must come from drinking too much.

"My head aches, I'll leave you to it."

His patience exhausted, Dad stands up, pretending to be tipsy. He's not, in fact, as he has drunk very little. A snail retreats into its shell, an old stag struck by an arrow hides deep in the forest. He walks away, stooping, then glances back. His face is dark, his glance cold, he hates me, hates me. I shouldn't have come.

"So your family's reunited."

When colleagues say this I have to smile and nod. But they will never know the nature of this reunion. If kinsmen are unkind it's best to have none. You can choose your friends, can ignore the people you meet, but not your family. Life is not a sheet of paper; if you make a mistake you can tear it up and start again. Life is ruthless, a history written in flesh and blood. Nothing written there can be altered or torn up, how fearful.

What are they laughing at? What are they saying? Dance? The dances of the fifties were too slow, to tunes like Auld Lang Syne. It's disco in the eighties, can you dance this? I'll show you how. It's the two of them again, my brother and her. Why not dance disco? It's most civilized, you don't even hold hands. Just twist any way you please. After sitting in an office for a week it's good to dance for a while. But I can't do it. Our college parties used to last all night, she was the queen of those dances. Now she probably can't dance either.

With flushed cheeks, puffing, they sit down again. Sister hands them towels to wipe their perspiring faces. Where did she learn her stock of compliments? She must envy them. Is her marriage happy or not? Her husband's much older than she is, inscrutable behind his spectacles. So thin, so greedy. This may be the best meal he's ever eaten. He's eating the fish too. I'm sure he can't dance. Like a good father he's urging the Imp to eat. He seems very fond of Sister. She and Brother are chattering away. They ignore me, pretend to be discussing dancing. What's there to discuss? Let anyone dance who wants to. It won't make the sky fall down. They hate me too. I'm odd man out here.

Sister knows the whole story, she went with them too, being too small to leave them. But a long time ago she married and left them. She seems to have kept in close touch, buying cloth for Mum, sending Brother shoes. Posing as tolerant she greeted me as Elder Brother.

I don't need your tolerance. What crime have I committed? Maybe I was afraid, weak. Yes, I admit I'm a weakling. But to start with I really believed I was right. How could I oppose the Party?

I'm not drunk, no one could get drunk on this wine. I inherited a capacity for liquor, I'm quite sober.

Mum's sitting down looking limp, on the verge of collapse since Father left the table. She's still smiling, urging everyone to eat, and to put on the tape-recorder.

"Rose, rose …"

Is there no other cassette? The room's lively again, she doesn't like awkward silences.

"Honghong, eat!"

With her husky voice Mum's putting on a show; she obviously hates me. Her smile is a sham. That evening she told me,

"Su Hong, forget us, and we won't involve you."

That's what she said, she can't have forgotten. She hates me. I shouldn't have come today.

"Rose, rose, red rose, the rose in my heart …"

The song of the rose circles round the room. The rosy sunset comes to rest on the table. Everything is veiled in its refined, deep colour tinged with grief. Where are you, rose in my heart?

73.28 Chant Of Great Grief\fn{by Wang Shang-I (1936-1962)} Honan Province, China (M) 3

"Actually, when all is said and done, we have no faith," said good Old Ma.

The waning moon dispersed a layer of gray-white fog. Throughout the gray fields, the muffled sound of barking dogs was everywhere audible. The shadow of a distant castle stuck up like an island on the horizon, silently gazing down on everything created or destroyed, all things not yet born or destined to die.

My friends, Chang and Old Ma, and I were just coming out of the front door of the hospital. Our steps were soft and slow, just as they had been while we walked through the long, narrow hospital corridors up to Room 204. Ignoring the "No Visitors Please" sign attached to the door, Chang pushed it open anyway and stepped in. He soon came out again and told us the patient was already comatose and taking oxygen. As we returned back through the long, narrow corridors, we heard the moans coming from various rooms and Death's familiar, friendly summons. The pretty nurses in the night shift room were laughing loudly and light-heartedly. We passed down to the end of the corridor and paused for a second before a mirror. After taking a casual look, we walked down the stairs, went out the front door, stepped onto the pebble road, and looked up at the castle.

Old Ma's earlier remark still gnawed away at the silence. Under the moonlight, his face was pale, sad and touching; he was such a good-hearted and sympathetic type.

Chang wore a kind of philosophic air. He was emotional and frail but had a cutting and mocking attitude; he could not escape sorrow so he ridiculed it. Ruminating on Old Ma's remark, I felt disillusioned and disquieted. Gradually, I realized his words were a tremendous criticism of our past lives, even a judgment which, like a sharp knife, had laid bare the core of our irresolution. Because of this irresolution, we had for years been unable to grasp the present; we were flitting about, wandering, chasing, abandoning, denied by existence, stirred by the nihilistic direction of the wind, torn to pieces by pain, buried …

"No faith, therefore, no roots, and so we melt into nothing, just like a piece of duckweed."\fn{A note reads: Duckweed in Chinese has a connotation of uncertain wandering because it is a plant with no roots, which floats on the water.} As he expatiated on his conclusion, Old Ma accelerated his steps.

"And if you have faith, so what?" said Chang shiftily. "Suppose we had faith. Do you mean to say we could avoid the evils of birth, old age, sickness, and death? Even Christ wept for the world's ills and Sakyamuni\fn{Buddha, the founder of Buddhism.} only escaped them when he achieved nirvana. Make the leap, transcend everything! Contemplate the spectacle that lies beyond appearances."

"Chang, we have been completely lacking in faith so far."

I walked along closer to him as if wishing to admit a fault and explain myself more sincerely. I don't know why, but as soon as I think of death I feel sympathetic toward faith. But I would not have accepted Old Ma's opinion in any way, unless I had been coming out of the hospital this instant and seen so many cases of death and near-death with my own eyes. It would have been quite another story if I were in a pool room, dance hall, or bar.

"When there is faith, then and only then can there be worth-while work and real living," Old Ma said, raising his voice to a high pitch. His words rose like swelling waves but stopped short just as they reached their peak. Mentally exhausted, he could push on no further but nervously rummaged about in his mind, seeking more energy. All this while his eyes remained fixed on the castle. Change mocked:

"Faith is like wine. Nietzche says, 'Wine is a weapon to conquer pessimism.'"

"Wine," I reflected, "what does wine have to do with it? If life consists of these circumstances and if men's hearts have these needs, the purpose of life is to live all modes of life. Life is not just work, not just thinking. Another thing; if faith were only an external form, it would not be faith at all." Originally, I wanted to resolve all contradictions, but the subject of life confused me and enmeshed me in contradictions. Chang went on:

"You two just saw that my uncle was about to die and you visited him with me. But his own son is off somewhere or other living his own life. He has studied philosophy, attempted suicide, been ordained a monk, and returned to being a layman. Now his father is about to die, and the son goes on without caring. Think of him!"

Chang stopped here but made no conclusion. It was cruel of him to do so. He revealed the problem without hinting at an answer. With his words pointedly directed at our discussion on faith, he had dug a trap and was waiting for me and Old Ma to jump in.

*

Two years before, I had heard the dying man's son lecture at a temple where he had set up a weekly seminar on Buddhism. His wide square face with its small nose and sharp eyes, sat on his short, stout body. He wore a thin, black Buddhist robe. Drawing two circles on the the blackboard, he had put Plato, Hegel, and Kant in one and Lao-tzu, Chuang-tzu, Sakyamuni, and Nietuche in the other. He used a broken line to join the two circles; afterwards, erased the first and then, with great self -confidence, said:

"Quite obviously, we must affirm Eastern culture."

As I recall, Chang and I were sitting in the last row. I was listening and laughing at intervals as Chang was recounting the speaker's past to me:

"He is a queer duck—well-read, the top of his class in the Philosophy Department, but was never satisfied with things as they are nor with his tedious home life. He really was fed up. Imagine, over thirty years old and not married! Anyway, he took money from home and went on a journey by himself. He hid himself in the countryside, wandering all day long in the mountain forest. He attempted suicide twice and, finally, quietly took off to become a monk. My uncle got upset and took to drinking every day. My aunt was half-paralyzed. Ah! And this was the only son …

"He shut himself up for more than a year in a temple deep in the mountain, concentrating on his studies and cultivating self-stability. Only very recently has he come North, invited by someone to propagate Buddhism. If he had continued devoting himself to this cause, then he would have had a hopeful future, but …"

I was half listening to Chang's words and half listening to the lecturer on the platform. Gradually, I came to realize that although the speaker tried his best to appear self-confident and optimistic, it was very difficult for him to suppress the nihilistic nature of his character. Nevertheless, he side-stepped many questions by either beating around the bush about textual details or by playing with ideas as if they were a pack of cards-dealing out Distress, Orient, Spirit, Liberation in colorful combinations.

In spite of all this, I loved and respected him highly. After all, he had been able to leave the world—that takes courage. He renounced his home, love, and reputation because he saw through it all. The distressing sense of an abiding boredom which weighed down on him is, to a greater or lesser extent, the characteristic of this generation. I could not but envy his words and his having found a lasting and permanent place, which he had been seeking after so long in his quest through life's experiences.

But not long after, he returned to the world. When Chang had heard this news he had spit out the following words with great vehemence:

"Originally, he didn't believe in anything."

Then he went into business, made and lost money, looked for some excitement, then he would have had a hopeful future, but …

*

The patient in number 204 was turned over to the hands of a Higher Being. He left off the sufferings of this life. Chang was busy, occupying himself with the funeral arrangements.

On the day of the funeral, Ma and I were dragged along to be spectators at the burial ceremony. Chang wanted us to join him and see the Transmigration Rite\fn{A note reads: According to Buddhist belief, man has a number of successive lives which are better or worse according to how successfully he has worked out the karma of his preceding life. The final goal is release from all states of existence to nirvana. Part of the ritual is concerned with helping to deliver man from life's sea of misery into a better state.} and listen to the deceased man's son sing the Chant of Great Grief.

The Soul Hall was crowded with people, the great, and the insignificant, the strong and the feeble. The noises of the crowd drowned out every other sound. Long, white scrolls of condolence were fluttering and dancing in the wind; their hand-written black characters were so vibrant they seemed to pierce the eyes, as if they were trying to jump off the scrolls, rushing to leave worldly noise far behind. Pointing to the crowd, Chang said:

"All these are famous, outstanding people, but my uncle was also quite exceptional, he lorded it over the world like a dictator—county governor at twenty and head of an important government department at thirty."

The funeral ceremony had started; the incense was burning and the sacrificial money\fn{A note reads: Sacrificial money is made out of very cheap paper with a tinfoil emblem in the middle stamped with a design. It is burned as an offering to the dead who are supposed to receive an equivalent purchasing power in the other world.} was flying about helter-skelter. Chang nudged Ma and me and said:

"Look, he's coming, wearing his Buddhist robes. The leader of the procession is his Buddhist mentor."

Twenty more persons filed in to perform the Transmigration Rite. Each person wore Buddhist robes and carried bronze bells in their hands. The leader held the "Wooden Fish"\fn{A note reads: A wooden drum-like instrument used for beating rhythm during Buddhist incantations.} in both palms. After entering, he stood before the altar, stationary. He burned incense, chanted an incantation and knelt in reverence. Next, the sound of the prayers began to be heard. I could barely see his lips quivering slightly. The sound was monotonous and shrill, like a tearless sob. One could not make out any meaning. I was immersed in the prayerful sound; it gradually suffocated me. I quietly withdrew to a not too remote corner, and glanced over each person's face. There was neither disconsolate sorrow nor pious respect. Each face was like a heap of broken, fallen bricks—sharp-edged, desolate, without feeling.

I thought of a strange question:

"Where do they want to send him?"

Even if there is a "Transmigration," there certainly cannot be any lasting and permanent place of rest. Either they are professional mourners hired for the.occasion or they simply have no genuine feeling of sympathy. They don't even know what they are doing. Just like the son who wore his thin Buddhist robes while lecturing and self-confidently affirming Eastern culture. Has there ever been a period in his life when he really liberated himself from worldly affairs? He is continually chasing rainbows, trying to satisfy his greedy desires, indulging in wild hopes and fancies, and running head-over-heels into wrong-doing. He is so intent on the things of this life, that he can not see through them. There is no lack of intelligent people in this world and inevitably they will think: If he can read the Chant of Great Grief, he can also read Kant, Hegel, and even Sartre. But just because people read in this way, doesn't mean they will be released from worldly affairs.

Is this faith? It's like a circus thrown together—even the performance is not really true. I thought of laughing, but I was suddenly disgusted with laughter …

Meanwhile Chang had also withdrawn and walked over to my side.

"Really unexpected. A few days ago he could not be found. Nobody thought he would come. Who would have expected him to join the chanting? What is this? A dream?"

"Let's go," said Old Ma. This time he was content to make much lower waves in the thoughts of others. He didn't say anything else, but slowly walked away. I was the second to stroll off, with Chang following me.

The sound of the mourners' prayers became distant as well as the absurd shadows. When we arrived at the mortuary, no one said a thing. All of a sudden, I felt very isolated and lonely. Why didn't Chang or Old Ma say something? I looked at Chang with expectation. His mocking appearance almost approached anger. Old Ma's good, kind face had become more melancholy.

Suddenly, I thought of doing something crazy to create a disturbance. I really hoped that the funeral cortege would catch up with us and would pass our eyes before we had walked too far—the black hearse, the white funeral streamers,\fn{A note reads: A sign of mourning held by the sons of the deceased.} the yellow Buddhist robes, the crest-fallen faces, the mumbling of the Chant of Great Grief—Distress, Liberation, Death—Faith's real funeral escort.

188.144 Was I Really Guilty?\fn{by an unnamed female doctor at a children's hospital (1936-after 1986)} Peking?, China (F) 6

I killed my father with my own hands. You already know this.

I was planning to talk with you a couple of days ago. I had to get it out. But last night I didn't have a wink of sleep, so I decided not to say anything today. Just the thought of recalling what happened and the way my parents looked on that day brings everything back too clearly. It's too painful. I'm hypertensive and was afraid that I wouldn't be able to handle this interview. But as soon as I met you, I knew I just had to talk. I've got to say something. Perhaps it's better this way.

My wounds can never be healed. Even after twenty years I still can't figure out whether I was right to kill my father. My initial sentence was life imprisonment. However, when the Gang of Four fell, I was declared innocent and released. But was I really guilty or not? My family, my brothers and sisters-in-law, all told me they understood. But after all, I was the one who ended my father's life. If not for me, he certainly would have lived until now. He had been very healthy.

Did I rescue him or destroy him? One moment I feel as though I did the right thing, but the next I'm bitterly remorseful. Why is it like that? At the time it all happened, I was not in my right mind. I had a complete nervous breakdown. Everything seemed unreal, chaotic, totally confused.

Back then, my two older brothers lived on the ground floor and my parents had the upstairs floor. I was working as a doctor in the Children's Hospital. I was also an active member of the Communist Youth League. I was diligent in my profession and had even received awards as a model worker. When all this happened I was staying with my parents on sick leave after contracting hepatitis while working in the countryside with my medical team.

It was on the morning of the twenty-sixth of August, 1966. Oh no, it was the twenty-eighth. The twenty-sixth was the beginning of the ransacking of my home. It was also the climax of the ransacking in the city. Our door was suddenly forced open by a group of middle-school Red Guards armed with clubs. They declared that my father was a capitalist. In fact, it was a misnomer. My father had inherited a house from his parents and rented out a vacant room on the ground floor. At most he could be called a householder. But in those days renting was synonymous with exploitation, that is, profiting without labor. Within minutes the Red Guards had smashed everything in my home to bits. My whole family was forced to kneel down in the hallway.

We were all very naïve and had no experience of such violent abuse. We were scared out of our wits. My father was a painter and had had one of his paintings displayed in America before 1949. The Red Guards examined the certificate from the American exhibition and said,

"Aha! So you've got imperialist connections! You must be a dirty spy!"

We were frightened to death. Only schoolchildren, you might think. Why were we so frightened? Well, during the Cultural Revolution almost all the families in our neighborhood were molested and had their houses ransacked. If those Red Guards felt like it, they could execute you on the spot. Everyone was terrified. One bunch after another would raid the houses. They'd smash everything. Books, paintings, anything that struck them as bourgeois would be taken out and burned. Then they would seal up your house. So many, many of them. Their bonfires were everywhere.

From the twenty-sixth to the twenty-eighth, from dawn to dusk, my parents and I were locked up and beaten with belts. Our hair was shorn to the roots. We were dragged out to the street again and again to be denounced and humiliated before the neighborhood. We never had a moment's peace. They tormented us ceaselessly until we no longer even felt a semblance of humanity. Suddenly we had somehow become enemies of our country. Just cringing there. No idea of what our monstrous crimes must be. Oh, how we longed to find a refuge, but where? The whole city was like this. Red Guards everywhere parading people in the streets to the sounds of gongs and drums. Tension was mounting rapidly and we had reached our breaking point. Even death seemed preferable to this.

Until the twenty-eighth, for three entire days, my parents and I had nothing to eat. Even our bowls had been smashed. It was only when the Red Guards left to eat that we were able to hurriedly make some noodle soup to feed my brother's children—straight out of the wok.

That night my parents and I were filled with terror and despair. At daybreak the Red Guards would show up again. More denunciations, more humiliating parades, more physical torture. Too much to face. There was no way out. So the three of us made up our minds to die together.

It was pitch black. The power had been cut off—perhaps to prevent us from electrocuting ourselves. We were sitting on the foyer floor, racking our brains for a way to kill ourselves. It was raining outside. Already past midnight. Day would soon break; no time to waste. I felt a pocket knife on the floor attached to a key chain. The Red Guards must have missed it in their search. The knife seemed to be a godsend. I'm a doctor. I know that if you puncture the carotid artery in the neck, the embolism produced will result in immediate death. This was the fastest and most effective way. My father asked whether it would really work and I assured him it would. My mother said how lucky they were to have a doctor daughter to help them die. Since I was the doctor, we decided that I'd kill them first and then do it to myself. But things didn't turn out as we expected.

Before going through with it, we sat there hand in hand for God knows how long. The thought of parting forever was almost too much. I'd always been so close to my parents. They wanted me to help them die but to stay alive myself. That wouldn't do, I said. I'd be accused of murder and put to death anyway. The pass we had come to is unbearable to recall. As soon as I close my eyes, even the tiniest details come back to me. It was getting too late, already dawn. My parents both insisted that I go ahead with it. I had never thought myself capable of killing anyone, let alone my parents. But under these circumstances I was capable of it, and I had no other choice. My father encouraged me. He told me,

"What you must do is something good. You will relieve our sufferings. Mother and I can't stand any more torturing when the Red Guards come again."

My mind was too shattered. I felt compelled to do it. I scrabbled about and found a crayon and two pieces of paper. In the lifting darkness I somehow managed to write out two suicide notes for the sake of my remaining family:

> We are the common enemy of the people. In order not to poison others surrounding us, we are determined to be liquidated from society. Long live the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution!
>
> To XXX (my husband who was working in another city) and the Mu families (the families of my brothers who I didn't dare to identify as brothers for their own protection): You are resolutely following the revolutionary road. We are the sole cause of your trouble.

My father asked my mother to be first and she asked him the same, for whoever was first to die would be spared at least one grief. Finally father agreed to listen to mother one last time. He'd be the first to die..

I felt for my father's strong artery and pierced it. Immediately the hot blood spurted out. He even asked me to see if his pulse had stopped. I said that as far as I knew, it would be over in a minute. He said he wished it could be faster. Then my mother asked me if I was sure I could do it to myself. She knew I had to die with them; I couldn't be left behind. I reassured her that when they were finished, I'd die too. She waited there patiently as though I was about to give her medical treatment. We'd tried to be very quiet, not to alarm others.

But suddenly one of my brothers ran upstairs yelling like a madman. It sounded as if the Red Guards were coming. He came and held me tight.

All of a sudden I realized that I couldn't go on with this. I nearly fainted, but managed to struggle free. I ran to the third floor balcony and jumped. If I had hit headfirst, I'd have died. But there was no time even to think about how to jump or what would happen to my mother. I only remember hearing all the sounds of hell and then nothing.

It's like I told you. We were really being driven out of our minds. Mother and I hadn't planned to jump out the window. It just happened. When you reach the end, you close your eyes and do the obvious thing like we did. We jumped.

When I finally came to, I was still only half conscious. I thought I heard some voices. Maybe Red Guards. I don't know. When I opened my eyes for a second time, I was already in a hospital. I saw my mother and father lying beside me. But no, I was hallucinating. I shut my eyes, very scared, trying to think. This can't be. What happens if my father was saved? Faintly I could make out the babble of denunciation meetings and parades outside. In desperation I tried to concentrate. This was a women's ward. My father couldn't be here. My eyes were playing tricks on me. I didn't want to look again. My head was full of a cacophony of sounds. I think that it must have been a symptom of my mental disorder. I even tried to cry out, but somehow no sound came out of me. Afterward, the next time I came to, someone was questioning me about my case. I forget what he said.

When I fully regained consciousness, I was told that my mother had jumped off the balcony right after me. Later when I was being interrogated, I was told Father had died on the spot but Mother had been saved. How I cried for my dead father and also for my mother. I was badly injured and she was so old. She would be paralyzed or worse if she really had survived.

It was only after the Cultural Revolution had ended and I was finally released that my sister-in-law told me the truth. My mother hadn't died right away. Instead they took her to the hospital, but she was refused treatment. You probably know that at that time people without a socially acceptable family background weren't admitted. Sometimes the hospitals even organized the "respectable" patients to denounce and criticize those "bad elements" who had earlier gained admission. I was admitted only because I had to face legal proceedings. My mother died a few days later at home. My father had died as they said and was cremated a week later.

The hospital didn't want to treat a patient like me. Very soon I was transferred to a prison hospital called New Life Hospital. Both of my legs were broken—the left tibia and the right femur. The right leg was more seriously injured, with a compression fracture. The bone had splintered and compressed so that the fragments overlapped, shortening the leg. The first hospital had applied skeletal traction, using a ten kilo sandbag to pull the bone back into position. But when I was moved to the prison, the hospital insisted I leave the bag behind. So the doctor put the bone fragments back into the wrong position. Just like breaking it again. It was only a sandbag. They could at least have let me use it, but no, they refused. That hospital didn't give a damn about me. Neither did the doctor who treated me. I don't know where he is now, but I hope he's no longer practicing medicine. What treatment I did get I was given only so that I could face my legal responsibility. It's strange to think about it now. My broken bones were pulled this way and that. But I felt no pain, not even a little. Didn't cry either. It was as if I was dead.

It was eleven o'clock when we arrived at the prison. The prison hospital staff didn't start working until two in the afternoon. When they finally came on, they separated my bone again and put in a steel pin. Then they manipulated the leg back and forth in the splint they made. My leg is still deformed. Only about a fifth of the bone has knitted. It aches a lot. I don't want to dwell on it. You can see I'm crippled for life.

I was formally arrested ten days later and handcuffed. That was September 7, 1966. In 1968 when the Military Control Commission took over,\fn{The Military Control Commission of the People's Liberation Army replaced the police, the legal apparatus, and the People's Courts during the Cultural Revolution. It was given power to create laws and to put itself above laws} I was charged with "committing the crime of murder in opposition to the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution." Murder was a criminal offense and opposition to the Cultural Revolution was a political crime. A very serious combination. I was sentenced to life imprisonment. I thought then that I'd rather get the death penalty. Life imprisonment meant continuing to suffer. Here, you have a look at my sentence:

> It is verified that the accused Y, of a bourgeois family background, has failed to be reformed after Liberation. During the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution, she has masterminded a scheme to resist the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution through collective suicide and the murder of YY and furthermore has attempted personal suicide as a means of escaping punishment. The accused has both alienated herself from society and become an enemy of the people, thus committing the crime of murder in opposition to the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. In view of the seriousness of this offense, the vile manner in which it was committed, and the irrefutable evidence presented, this court, in solidarity with the proletarian dictatorship and the resolute defense of the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution's continuing progress, hereby finds the accused guilty of murder in opposition to the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution. The accused is sentenced to life imprisonment.

Someone from the commission said to me that if I had been just an ordinary housewife, my sentence wouldn't have been so severe. Obviously, however, I knew what I was doing. My father's case was considered very serious. He said I killed my father to save him from just punishment. That's the real reason I was sentenced to the crime of opposition to the Cultural Revolution.

Well, they said I killed my father to protect him. It's true. I did. This has been a great weight on my mind. What they meant is not the way I look at it. I saved my father from more torture, but they said I was guilty because I prevented them from torturing him anymore. Am I making myself clear? It's all very muddled. I've never been able to make any sense of it.

I was in prison for twelve and a half years. The only reason I didn't kill myself was that I always believed my mother was still alive. I tried to imagine how she was living. The three of us had planned to die together. My father, dead. Me, imprisoned for life. My mother—well, I'd never see her again. Every time my nephews came to visit me they'd tell me that Grandma was at home. Grandma wanted me to reform myself, they said, so that my sentence might be reduced. Sometimes even the prison guards would ask me to tell them about my mother. Of course, they knew my mother was dead, but they too tried to hide it from me. In fact I really had wished that my mother would have died. To live on was only more misery and suffering. If only I had been told the truth, I would have been at peace.

Once you've been in prison, you get a different perspective on things. I wouldn't have believed that so many good people could be so unjustly imprisoned until I saw them myself. My case, though, was different. I did kill my father with my own hands. I really wanted to atone for my sin, but I also hoped to get an early release so I could see my mother. I felt extremely guilty too toward my brothers. We have the same father but different mothers. However, we were so close that no one ever suspected. They never showed any hatred to me after Father died. They would often come to see me and send me food.

Ah, each time I saw them I cried until I ran out of tears. I didn't know what to say. I felt I had betrayed them. But my brothers reassured me that they understood and that as long as they and my sisters-in-law lived, they'd never stop caring about me. For my brothers' sake also I really had to redeem myself. I worked as hard as I could to reform.

At first I was given sewing to do. I didn't even know how to use a sewing machine, so I started from square one. Pretty soon I got skilled at it. To sew collars was the hardest. Since I had become the best worker, I was given the difficult and important tasks. I even managed to exceed the quotas. We also did things like produce slogan posters, propaganda articles, and political drawings. I tried to lend a hand at everything. For production I was sometimes awarded a Red Flag or Chairman Mao's "Little Red Book." Hey, have a look at my glasses. Can you guess how strong they are? I got nearsighted from looking at my sewing in those days.

I was also called upon to use my medical skills. It wasn't only to treat fellow prisoners, but also the chief warden and his children. If the ordinary prison workers, along with their relatives and cadre friends, called upon me, I'd go at a moment's notice too. To feel trusted by others, not regarded as an enemy—that was a great consolation. In the middle of the night I'd often be awakened to treat someone's fever, stomachache, or convulsions. It always took at least a few hours, but the next day I'd be off to work as usual. I was working like mad both day and night. The prison workers showed their appreciation. Even today they still sometimes come to see me at the hospital to have me treat their children. Back then, not being treated too harshly was the best I could ask for. Please don't laugh at me. At the slightest praise I'd be overjoyed for days.

There's one thing I want to mention. When I was officially arrested on the seventh of September, 1966, in the prison hospital, I was still married. My husband was working in Peking. The weather was getting cold, I thought, and his clothes and belongings had already been taken away when our apartment was ransacked. He shouldn't suffer anymore because of me. So I wrote a letter asking him to arrange a divorce. By the end of September, it came through. Not long after that his sister suddenly came to the prison. She left me some tonic and 20 yuan, a lot of money in those days. I asked the guards to pass on my request that she not bring any more money again or anything else. But I was penniless in prison, so I kept 5 yuan and begged one of my wardens to send the rest to my mother. Of course I didn't know she was dead.

This warden was a retired army officer. At first he refused, but I pleaded with him and he finally agreed. Later that sister-in-law sent another 30 yuan. She came five or six times altogether gave me about 120 yuan. Each time I asked the warden to send it on to my mother. Strangely, though, my family never wrote me even once about this. I thought maybe they just hated me too much. A year later, when I was sentenced, I was finally allowed to see them. Whenever they visited, wishing Chairman Mao longevity and studying his quotations would take up half of the time while the rest was filled with my sobbing. Not much chance to talk. My family didn't say anything about the money and it was too awkward for me to ask. It wasn't until 1979 when I was released that I discovered the money hadn't reached them. All those years I had regarded that warden as my benefactor. I still don't understand what was going on. Maybe the post office had refused to deliver the money since the postal service often refused to handle mail for families in disgrace. But even if that was the case, the money should have been returned to me.

Believe it or not, there were some decent prison workers. I had been quite healthy before, but now my weight had dropped to about forty kilos. A warden, seeing how thin I'd become, stealthily slipped my sister-in-law a health certificate.\fn{A document showing that the carrier was in poor health and in need of extra nutrition} The next time she came to visit, she was allowed to bring in a kilo of cakes. I was upset. I thought that it would be much better if the cakes had been given to my mother and nephews. Life outside was hard too. In prison I was given 1.50 yuan pocket money each month. I didn't buy anything except soap, toilet paper, and toothpaste, which would last me for months. I tried hard to save as much as possible. When I had saved 5 or 10 yuan, I'd send it home. For without my family's warmth, what did I have to live for? I tried my best under the circumstances to do something good for them. It was a kind of atonement.

In prison we also had to do political study and practice criticism. Very often I was called upon to denounce my crime of resisting the Cultural Revolution. Those in charge asked me to set an example of self-criticism at many meetings, both large and small.

Self-criticism was really not so bad. Sometimes I'd be feeling very down. When it was my turn to self-criticize, I'd talk about the many years of education I'd received from the Party and how I should have believed in the Party and its policy. If I had followed the Party's policy, everything would have been all right. After each self-criticism session, my confidence in the Party would be reinforced and I'd feel better about going on living. I'd think about how to perform even better to get an early release and be able to pay back the Party.

Believe it or not, good behavior did work. In 1972 my sentence was reduced from life to an additional ten years—the most lenient treatment I could have expected. I could get out in 1982. So I had something to hope for.

Not long after the Gang of Four was ousted in 1976, the courts reexamined my case. They decided that I had been persecuted during the Cultural Revolution. I was not a murderer, but rather a participant in a group suicide. Thus I was declared innocent and released. I got out in 1979, two and a half years earlier than I had expected. The new verdict went like this:

> The original sentence that Y committed the crime of murder in resistance to the Cultural Revolution is hereby declared invalid. Therefore the conviction is withdrawn and Y is declared innocent and is to be released.

I was released on the second of March, 1979. When I entered prison I only had on the hospital pajamas—the kind with blue and white stripes. Later, my brothers sent me a small suitcase of old clothes that I'd left with the rural medical team before the Cultural Revolution. I'd been wearing them for ten years. I was in rags when I came out. It was a heavy blow to learn that my mother had passed away a long time ago. It was my thoughts of her that had kept me going all those years. Now, with not only my father dead, but mother too, everything was finished. I was close to a nervous breakdown.

I came back home in March and started working in the Children's Hospital in May. I had had only two months rest. Lots of relatives and friends came to visit me. I couldn't sleep peacefully for all sorts of reasons. My mind kept going nonstop. I just couldn't relax. Three of us had planned to die together, but only I was alive. I felt terrible. People tried to comfort me, telling me how lucky I was even to be alive. So many higher-ups had followed Chairman Mao through hellish conditions on the Long March, braving snow-covered mountains and impassable swamps. They too had been persecuted. Many had died; their families had been ruined. Their lot was worse than mine. But those who have survived are trying to make the best of things, aren't they?

My work unit was very considerate. When I was released, my family's houses were still occupied by others and hadn't been returned to us. So I just lived in the hospital dormitory. I'm a Muslim and my meals presented a bit of a problem. My nephew sent me suitable food every day by bicycle. He did this without fail for several years. As for my work, the hospital required me to work as a resident first. According to hospital regulations, you have to do a residency before getting an appointment as a staff doctor. I didn't have a home of my own to worry about, so I made full use of my time studying. In prison we weren't allowed to read professional books and journals so I had to double my efforts to make up for lost time. Before long, I got up to date.

I was put in charge of eight wards scattered between the first and fifth floors. Every day I ran up and down, fourteen hours a day. One night when I was on duty, I suddenly felt as though I was walking on clouds. I got someone to take my blood pressure. It was 180 over 100. Too high. I immediately asked for an injection. The one I got was supposed to be effective, but half an hour later it still hadn't worked. The systolic was up to 200. The nurses decided among themselves to stop calling me for emergencies and let me rest. They were afraid I was exhausted. But I just continued my rounds. They were very sympathetic and showed their respect. What can I say?

Well, I just doubled my efforts. Normally residency takes a full year, but in only six months I was promoted to staff.

Around this time I made a new acquaintance. He was a graduate from the East China Textile Institute. When he was young, he had shown great promise and had been highly recommended by one of his colleagues, a chief engineer. During the "Antirightist" movement, his mentor was denounced as a Rightist. My friend was asked to expose him. He refused. Instead he tipped off the engineer. To act against his conscience was not part of his character. He was treated as a Rightist and he himself believed that he was one. When the Rightists were de-labeled, he was told that it had never been recorded in his files that he was one. The mistake was his own. But for twenty years he had believed this. He'd never gotten a promotion or raise. He hadn't even married for fear of the label. How could such an absurd thing have happened? When I met him he was over fifty and still single.

Well, we got married. We have a lot in common and can communicate well. He's very considerate to me. We're a comfort to each other.

I adopted one of my brother's sons. He's studying a foreign language now in Peking University. My husband was recently promoted to director of his factory. At last I have a real home and family.

Even today, though, I still can't rid myself of thoughts of the past. I don't think about it every day, but there's no escaping from my memories. In my mind my father's image appears again and again. My colleagues have asked me,

"You couldn't even step on an ant, how could you have done it?"

In the Cultural Revolution people were deprived of their basic humanity. Who in their right mind could stab their own father to death? Under normal circumstances no one would even consider it. And what about my mother? How can I make up for that?

If I hadn't done what I did, my parents would perhaps be enjoying life today. If I'm not to blame, then who is? No matter how hard I try to justify my actions, I still fail. I can't decide whether I saved my father or destroyed him.

In the beginning I felt that I had saved him but I feel more and more now that I destroyed him. Other things I can make sense of, but not this. My mind just goes round and round. All those bad things were caused by the Gang of Four. Why then did all those others survive until now and not my parents? It must be my fault alone. Whenever I think this way, I feel that I must have been guilty. It's too depressing. And yet my friends tell me that only when I enjoy life will my parents be able to rest in peace. They're right perhaps, aren't they?

I can't say any more. Please don't ask me to go on.

1937

76.34 A Summer Experience\fn{by Ge Wujue (1937-)} Wenzhou, Zhejiang Province, China (M) 8

I was thirty-two on my last birthday. This all happened during summer. Since then I have often felt as though I have been in a sort of trance, a strange sensation lingering in my mind—sweetness, bitterness, sourness? …

*

There are two people in my family—Sha Sha, my four-year-old daughter and myself. Last spring I was able to get a three-room suite with a balcony front and rear. Then I began to understand that being a member of the Provincial Overseas Chinese Association was not merely an empty title.

But the spacious rooms brought inconvenience too. I have to spend a lot of time and energy looking after them. In the past I had only one room twelve square meters in size and could clean it easily just by standing in the middle and turning around. Also the new place is a long way from the kindergarten Sha Sha attends every day. When I go to fetch her, I have to change buses twice. But it's the best kindergarten in the city and thanks to my status as an overseas Chinese I can send Sha Sha there. The third inconvenience is having a female visitor by the name of Yang Na, whom I first met by chance at a friend's house. After I moved she came around to have a look and since then has been a frequent visitor.

Perhaps this shouldn't be considered an inconvenience. Yang Na is very beautiful. My ex-wife was also very beautiful. I remember being in a park once and seeing a young couple hand in hand, shoulder to shoulder, posing for a picture. The young girl was rather ugly and the young man thin and short. But I was touched by the scene, and even thought that real love perhaps only existed between ugly couples. She Sha's mother always used to hum her favorite song, "Love is like a wanderer, or a bird flying free in the sky." She used to think that this song from an Indian film was from Carmen. A year ago, when we left the Civil Affairs Bureau after finalizing our divorce, she turned and asked me with a smile:

"Will you buy me a pair of brown boots as a memento? They've just come in. We'll never go shopping together again."

As the department store was opposite the bureau, I complied with her request. I was only thirty-two, but in matters of love I had already proved myself something of a pessimist. Sports competitions are real games which can be judged by marks, and in seconds or millimeters. But love is the product of ignorance and impetuous emotion. Now you can add money, overseas connections and housing to that. I decided to remain unmarried, rejecting anyone who was recommended by others or who introduced herself. Of course I had dropped large hints about this to Yang Na.

Yang Na was an elegant young woman, who would tilt her head slightly backwards when she looked at me. Then she would smile and appealing lines would appear at the corners of her mouth.

"You've been unlucky," she said.

No, I'd prefer to say that I managed to escape my bad luck. Yang Na's eyebrows had been carefully plucked into fine and delicate lines. I hoped she hadn't come to bring me more bad luck.

Since I was a basketball coach for the provincial team and my timetable was determined by the training schedule, I was often the last parent to fetch my daughter at the kindergarten. One windy day, the sort that is quite common in North China in May, our training session ended early. When I got to the kindergarten, the children had just finished their dinner and were playing in the courtyard, their eyes glued to the front door. Once the parents arrived, the place exploded with joyful noises.

Sha Sha wasn't in the playground so I went to the third grade classroom where the children were gathered around in a circle singing and dancing.

Little friends, clap your hands
And follow one by one.
Don't talk, don't turn
Just circle round and round, like a rubber ball.

"Sha Sha, here comes your father." The young teacher playing with the children called out in a low voice. I hadn't seen her before. Perhaps she was new.

Turning her head Sha Sha walked straight through the circle and threw the dancing group into disorder. Without saying a word, she gave me her hand and I led her out of the classroom.

"Mr. Wang! Mr. Wang! Please hold on a minute," the young teacher called out. "Sha Sha's dress should be mended. Would you ask her mother to do it?"

"All right, all right," I muttered.

"I don't have a mother. Daddy and Mummy are divorced," offered Sha Sha.

My daughter was only telling the truth. But she had put me in an awkward position.

"Oh, I'm sorry! I didn't know. I've only been with this class for a little while." The teacher blushed and looked even more uncomfortable than I did.

"That's all right. I'll mend it. I'm afraid I'm too careless,"I tried to comfort her.

On the bus home I asked Sha Sha, "What's your new teacher's name?"

She shrugged her shoulders. Sha Sha's teacher couldn't be called beautiful. Her eyes weren't large, her forehead was narrow, and she was a little heavy by current standards. Her mouth was somewhat large too, but she had a small exquisite nose and moved very gracefully when she ran. She would race in and out of the classroom and I couldn't help thinking that with her long legs she could, with some coaching, hit the 12.5-second record for the 100-meter dash.

Back home, after putting the rice on the stove, I started mending the clothes. Sha Sha sat on a small stool preparing shallots which made her eyes water. I heard footsteps on the stairs. I knew that it was Yang Na and immediately put the clothes away. I was afraid she would take a look at them and repeat in that affected manner (who knows whether she meant it or not):

"Hey, you really are unlucky!"

Yang Na was standing at the door smiling. She wore a pair of white high-heeled shoes and a white sweater with a blue brooch. Her skirt was made of black velvet with a gold-colored trim. Her dark, long hair hung loose, fastened together with a large white clip. She had bright eyes and ivory white skin. She was really a beauty and she knew it. Perhaps my expression told her. At any rate her face was glowing with health and she was brimming with confidence. Waving her artificial crocodile handbag, Yang Na made a mock bow and said with a smile,

"Here I am again."

"Come in." She went into the front room ahead of me and took some attractively packaged chocolates from her handbag.

"This is a birthday present for Sha Sha. They're made in Switzerland."

"But Sha Sha's birthday's on the sixteenth of next month. It's still a whole month away," I said.

"Really?" she laughed. Her frequent laughter seemed slightly unnatural, designed only to create an effect. She could start and stop at will. "Then I'll have to come over again next month. Every time I come here I have to rack my brains to find an excuse. You really are impossible!"

She sat down gracefully. "You really ought to buy a suite of furniture with your overseas remittance certificates. I'd like to advise you on what to get."

I headed her off with a vague reply, "Some other time."

"When? When you invite me to your wedding?" She started laughing again.

The joke annoyed me. Just then I heard the water boiling.

"I'll go and cook. Do you mind if I leave you by yourself for a while?"

"Go ahead." She stood up and walked over to the balcony. I didn't like her standing there where she could be seen from outside.

"Would you like to listen to some new tape? One is by that famous Japanese singer, Yamaguchi Momoe."

She turned on the tape-recorder, but then suddenly said, "I'll do the cooking. I'll make something really nice. Have you got some slippers? I like to change out of these shoes."

Wearing my slippers, walking about the place as though she owned it, what did it all mean?

"I was just going to make some noodles and eggs. It's easy enough."

"Oh, you really are unlucky!" Heaving a sigh, she picked up a rattan chair, and walked over to the ba1cony.

*

Sha Sha was a slightly eccentric child who had been brought up in the shadow of family quarrels. When she was a year old, it was I who had looked after her, coaxing her to go to sleep.

"That's a good girl. Don't cry, don't cry. Your mummy has gone out dancing."

When she grew up, she often heard her mother say, "Go away! Go and see your 'darling daddy!'" or from me, "Go and get your mother!" Sha Sha had a fierce temper. Whenever she was in a bad mood she would shriek whether we had guests or not. When she was only two she already knew how to register her complaints by breaking things. Her mother and I were surprised when we saw her do it the first time, but what could we say—she was only imitating us.

We had been divorced a year. It frightened me that Sha Sha never once asked for her mother. Somewhere, there was a murky area in her mind, a very profound recess indeed. Sometimes when I woke up during the middle of the night, I would look at the plump child asleep beside me and feel guilty. It wasn't her fault—it was the two of us who were to blame.

Then one day, probably about half a month after I first talked with the new teacher, I once again arrived late to fetch Sha Sha. I'd bought a red balloon on the way.

"Sha Sha, look at the balloon. Isn't it wonderful?" I tried to interest her.

Sha Sha, pulling a long face, didn't pay much attention, but the teacher took the balloon and asked, "Can it fly all the way up to the sky?"

I thought the teacher seemed more childlike than the child.

"Yes," I said.

"Sha Sha here, hold it." The teacher wound the string around Sha Sha's finger. "Don't you like it?"

"Thank you, Daddy."

Sha Sha looked up at me. She seemed more concerned about saying this than in watching the balloon.

I felt a slight tugging at my heart, moved by these very ordinary words. My daughter had now started to learn manners. In the past she had been unconcerned about courtesy. She had seemed to be indifferent to any toys I bought her too, and sometimes even threw them away.

I wanted to kiss her, but the teacher was one step ahead of me. She hugged Sha Sha, kissed her, and said:

"Sha Sha, that's a good girl. You really are a clever girl."

From that moment on I began to like Sha Sha's teacher.

I am a rather careless father. Once I found a button on Sha Sha's clothing that had been replaced by someone else and another time I found that the elastic band in her sleeve had been renewed. And so I knew that Sha Sha had a good, dedicated teacher. However, a special reflex activated by Yang Na's visits warned me to be on the alert.

That day the training was longer than usual and the water had stopped while I was taking a bath, so I was an hour late when I went to the kindergarten to fetch Sha Sha. Only Sha Sha and her teacher were in the classroom. They sat facing each other on stools, singing children's songs and clapping hands:

Row, row, row the boat,
Row to Granny's bridge.

I don't cry, I'm not naughty,
Granny calls me her little darling.

Intrigued I stood by the window watching them. Sha Sha sat upright, saying:

"Teacher, do you know my granny?"

The young teacher answered:

"No, I don't. Does she love you?"

Sha Sha said, "Yes, she does. She lives in America. See my shoes. Granny bought them for me." Sha Sha raised one foot and then the other. As I entered the classroom, she jumped up immediately, and the teacher helped her to straighten out her clothes. I apologized:

"I am very sorry to have kept you waiting for so long."

The teacher just smiled and asked, "Where do you live?"

"South Zhongshan Street."

"That's convenient. My family live there too. You have to go out of your way to get here from the sports association. I''d be better for me to bring Sha Sha home."

I politely refused, not so much from worrying about inconveniencing her, as from worrying about bringing myself more trouble—that special reflex had put me on guard.

"The buses are too crowded to take a child on. I'll come earlier next time. But thank you very much."

Sha Sha clapped her hands, shouting, "Daddy can say 'thank you' too." We all laughed and the tense atmosphere relaxed.

Although I had rejected her offer she still called on me a little while later.

Sha Sha had tonsillitis and couldn't go to kindergarten. The next day there was an unexpected knock at the door. It was the teacher.

My place was in a mess. The bed wasn't made, dishes were unwashed, there was a mop in the center of the room and clothes thrown on chairs. I had never been much good at doing housework.

Sha Sha's teacher seemed not to notice that I had such a fine flat with modern facilities. She asked quickly, "How is Sha Sha?"

"She's still sick. She has a temperature of thirty-nine degrees."

"Teacher! Teacher!" hearing her voice Sha Sha shouted out. She quickly made for Sha Sha's room. Sha Sha welcomed her warmly. She kissed the child's forehead and said, "You're quite hot, just like a little fireball."

Sha Sha asked, "What did you bring me?"

What a child—asking for things!

The teacher fished out a sopping wet plastic bag from her multi-colored satchel. Sha Sha asked, "What's that?"

"My swimsuit.S She put it aside and took out a batch of white papers, saying:

"These are for you. Do you know what they are?"

"White papers." Sha Sha took the papers, staring at them disappointedly.

"You're wrong. There's a little dog, that's a little boat. This is a frog and that's a camel. This one is an old hunchback You just hold them for me." She was skilled at folding the paper into different shapes and gradually she spread them out over the bed.

Having set my mind at rest I went to turn on the television. Tonight was a video relay of the basketball final between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S. from the World Student Games. Since basketball was my job I needed to watch it.

After a while the teacher came in and asked,

"Mr. Wang, do you have any mung beans?"

I had more than ten tins of green soya beans but no mung beans.

"No, I haven't," I answered.

"Well, do you have a saucepan?"

"Yes, in the kitchen. What a great shot!"

I didn't want to move from the TV. The American No. 1 had just made a beautiful backhand shot. It took a strong player with several years' hard training to do that! Now he made another block and then, dribbling behind his back, he moved to shoot again.

"Teacher!" Sha Sha shouted from her room.

"I'm coming," she answered cheerfully. She was standing right behind me, fascinated by the game. Hearing Sha Sha call she smiled.

"I've brought some mung beans. Sha Sha likes mung bean puree. Where's your saucepan?"
I ran to the kitchen and handed her the pan and hurried back to the TV.
"It's not the best time for Sha Sha to get sick," she chortled."
While the puree was boiling, the teacher wandered about, comforting Sha Sha and occasionally watching the television. My flat was full of the sound of her busy footsteps and warm laughter.
The American team won. Sha Sha had finished the mung bean puree and had fallen asleep. I discovered that the teacher had also tidied up my rooms. Now she was about to leave. Suddenly I realized I didn't even know her name.
"What's your name?"
"Call me Meiqing," she answered with a smile.
Sometimes you feel perfectly relaxed, perhaps from drinking good wine, from listening to good music, or watching a good film. Tonight, I'd enjoyed the best-played basketball game I'd ever seen. I asked the teacher, "What do you think of this television?" By this question I was just showing off because I was in such a good mood.
"It's very nice. After watching a color TV no one likes black-and-white. Was it expensive?"
I told her the price. She was astonished.
"That's a lot! Unless I got a raise, it would take me five years of saving my whole salary to buy one." She laughed again and I thought how pleasant she was. "I'm on my way now. I'll come over tomorrow night."
"I'm sorry to have troubled you." Having said this I immediately regretted it. From then on I didn't really give it much more thought.
The next day I tidied up, then bought five ice-lollies to make ice cream the way Yang Na had taught me.
The red and green traffic lights were glittering one after another and the evening streets were bustling with noise and excitement. In the distance I saw Meiqing turning a comer at a good pace, her vigorous, lithe strides bathed in the bright lights!

*

In the end I decided that whenever my training finished late, I would ask her to bring Sha Sha home. I used to stand on the balcony waiting for them, waiting to see Meiqing holding Sha Sha's hand as they turned the corner. A little later on I changed my routine. In the past, I used to ring up the kindergarten if I had time to go and fetch Sha Sha. Now I hardly ever rang, and instead waited for them on the balcony every evening.
And now a new problem vexed me; that of whether I should give a key to Meiqing or not. It was a serious decision.
Yang Na still came to my place once or twice a week. She hadn't met Meiqing yet because Meiqing only saw Sha Sha to the stairs and didn't come in. She was reserved and seemed only to be interested in her work.
One rainy day my department held a long meeting to discuss our training programme before going abroad. Afterwards I raced home to find Meiqing teaching Sha Sha to sing.
"Come on, let's sing it again:"

Little alarm clock, ding-a-ling-a-ling,
Our little room, silent, silent and silent.

The two, their clothes drenched, sat by the front door.
Meiqing cuddled Sha Sha and held her small hand to beat time. They only noticed me when I stood directly in front of them.
Meiqing rose to her feet quickly, smoothing out her wet dress. She had a nice figure, full and athletic, like a professional swimmer.
"Sha Sha, your daddy's here."
Sha Sha's eyes narrowed in annoyance.
"We've been waiting ages for you. We're both nearly frozen to death." The tense atmosphere was dispersed by the frank, light tone of Meiqing's complaint. She was someone who treated even hardships and difficulties as jokes. I saw that her lips had turned purple from the cold.
As I took Sha Sha in my arms, her small hands were like ice. I then let slip what I had previously been reluctant to say:
"Meiqing, I think I'd better give you a key."
She laughed.

"How can you do that? I can't pay for any losses. If something in your place got stolen, I couldn't possibly pay for it. My wages wouldn't cover anything like that.

She meant what she said. There was something both naïve and charming in the way she spoke. She said goodbye and quickly ran downstairs, seeming almost afraid that she might have to make a decision which would affect the rest of her life. There was obviously something on her mind.

From the corridor came the sound of footsteps. It was Yang Na. Her waterproof black silk mackintosh was dripping wet. She looked very elegant, her face white, eyes wide.

"Here I am again. Am I welcome?" she said with a smile.

I opened the door.

"Come in. I've just come back myself."

"Was that girl on the stairs a nurse at the kindergarten?" Yang Na took off her hat, and her hair tumbled down loosely like a waterfall.

"She's a teacher there."

"Well, what's the difference between a nurse or a teacher in the kindergarten. They're the same thing," she said contemptuously. I wondered what she thought of her own job as a worker at the water-supply company. I was angry, but decided not to say anything.

I silently did my routine housework, helped Sha Sha change her dress, dried her hair with a towel and then put the water on to cook noodles and eggs. Sha Sha was watching TV and I imagined Yang Na would be watching too, although she was not usually that interested. She often liked to bring tapes of popular music to listen to, though she had never made much comment on my cassette recorder. "Not bad" was her pet phrase about all of these things, and I wondered what might actually elicit the word "fine" from her.

While I'd been lost in thought, the water had come to a boil. Removing it from the stove, I turned round to see Yang Na leaning against the kitchen door. She held her head high and her large eyes were full of tears.

"You don't like me, do you?"

I couldn't really answer her question then. She was like a calendar photograph of a movie star. I could hang it on the wall to appreciate it, but there was no real connection between us. Whether she was happy or not, Yang Na always looked good. She had a kind of graceful bearing, but she was not a very substantial person.

Sha Sha's mother was also pretty, but she was always worried about this heaven-sent endowment being spoiled. To her it had actually been a burden. Her beauty was only in her appearance, in the large sentimental eyes, the refined nose and the soft lips … but her innermost heart was empty, poor and barren, like an abandoned well. If you live with a woman like that you often feel deceived. Only the inner beauty, the beauty of personality, like a clean, murmuring spring, flows for ever and makes you aware of the sweetness and warmth of life.

"You're very pretty. You will be happy," I said comfortingly after thinking a bit.

"No. I'm not. You're the lucky one." She continued leaning against the door, staring at me without moving.

*

Every day I would see Meiqing twice—in the morning when she came to fetch Sha Sha and in the evening when she brought her home.

I consciously tried to test her several times, for I didn't completely trust her. In any case I was ten years older than she was. Of course these tests were usually related to Sha Sha. Meiqing would wash Sha Sha's dirty clothes, although I had a washing machine; she mended Sha Sha's worn out socks, although I could do I that myself or even buy a new pair. She would also wash Sha Sha's hair, comb out her plaits and cut her fingernails, and once even made an apron for her. In the kindergarten, a movement to give children as much affection as their own mothers had been launched and Meiqing had already given Sha Sha the kind of affection she would have given her own children. She was like a good mother in every respect.

One day while we were chatting, she told me, "In my family there are only three of us, my mother, my brother and myself."

What had she meant by this remark? Another time when we were talking about the children in the kindergarten she said, "Sha Sha has no mother. That really is a shame."

Was this a hint?

One Sunday I met her on the street by chance. It was then that I found out that she didn't live near my place but in fact quite a distance away, more than one bus stop's walk. But she had never once mentioned it to me, pretending instead that she lived close by. Suddenly I felt that I could read her mind.

Once I asked, "Do you get tired of children?"

She answered, "Of course. Sometimes I get so annoyed that I want to pinch them to shut them up. Every day when I get home, I like to sit quietly just to get rid of all the crying and shouting still ringing in my ears. But I'll get used to it."

So why was she so kind and concerned with Sha Sha?

Now her motives seemed crystal clear. No fiancée could be absolutely perfect so I started looking for her faults. I decided not to indulge in any kind of lovesickness, since I had already tasted the sourness of love once. Certainly her job wasn't ideal. People say that doctors and nurses don't pay much attention to their spouses because they see too much suffering. But what about Meiqing? As a kindergarten teacher she saw too many children, so would she still be able to love Sha Sha? She was attractive and lively, but she lacked a certain elegance and dignity and these things were very important when one grew older. Would my mother like her when we went abroad? And her eyes were a little too small. People say that double-fold eyelids and wide eyes are accepted norms of beauty. It would be ideal if Meiqing had eyes like Yang Na.

Perhaps my attitude to falling in love was too sober. In September our basketball team was to go abroad to play for two weeks. I was pleased at this opportunity to force myself to make a decision.

It was then the second of August. I waited on the balcony as usual. Meiqing was wearing a white round-necked blouse, green skirt and a pair of high-heeled shoes in pastel yellow. Holding Sha Sha's hand, she waited for the buses to pass and then they crossed the street. She liked to laugh and run, both of which made her even more attractive. I calculated that in three minutes she would be knocking on the door. I stood behind it and immediately opened it when she did.

Surprised, she said with a smile, "You gave me a scare. You saw us coming?"

"Intuition. Please come in."

She hesitated. Ordinarily she wouldn't have entered. After saying goodbye to Sha Sha, she always left in a hurry. But that day she came in, asking, "Was there something else?"

I asked casually, "Did you go swimming today?"

"Yes. I go every lunch time. You see how tanned I am."

"What about in winter?"

"I go skating."

She was probably a good skater too I thought.

"Which do you like best? Figure skating or racing?"

"I like racing. It's much more exciting. I like to compete with people who can skate fast." She had an amiable disposition, and talked about all sorts of things with genuine enthusiasm. I decided to come to the point.

"Three days from now I am going abroad with the basketball team. May I ask a favor of you? Can Sha Sha stay with you for a couple of weeks?" I watched her reaction.

"Sha Sha, would you like to stay with me?" She took Sha Sha in her arms. She didn't seem to take the whole business that seriously and I felt a little disappointed. Sha Sha said:

"Daddy has already told me and I said all right. Daddy, didn't you mention it yet?"

It had been three nights ago. Since then I had repeatedly told her, "Daddy is going abroad. You will stay with Meiqing for a couple of weeks. I hope the two of you will get along."

"All right, Sha Sha. I'm sure we'll get along very well."

Meiqing was still pretending to talk to Sha Sha. She really was—clever.

I then took out a key from the drawer and handed it to her.

"Please take this."

Slightly irritated she said, "Do you want me to stay here?"

"I'd like you to take care of my home too." I stared at her, smiling.

"May I watch the television then?" It seemed an odd question, asked in innocence.

"Of course." I wanted to say something more meaningful but I stopped myself.

*

I returned home from the trip at four in the afternoon. I could sense the presence of Meiqing everywhere. The rooms were tidy and there was even a white gauze cover on the pillow. A bottle of orange juice and three freshly cleaned radishes were in the refrigerator. On the balcony two small chairs leaned against the wall side by side.

Yang Na must have been here too. She would have been rather surprised to meet Meiqing since she knew that I was still abroad. She would think herself unluckier still. The opportunity to go abroad carries considerable weight on the scales of love. But I didn't feel any responsibility for Yang Na. In any case she would have had to experience sadness sooner or later.

I didn't know whether or not to go to the kindergarten or just wait at home. To stay home would be more convenient, but I would have to put up with waiting about for more than three hours.

I decided to wait. The truly wonderful moments in one's life are few. When next we met and I said those most important words to her, then a new life would begin.

I just sat on the balcony for those three hours. I knew that she wouldn't be appearing around the corner, but I was content all the same just to stare at the street she walked along every day. It was a street I had often thought about while abroad.

At half past seven she and Sha Sha appeared beneath the traffic light. They were coming. She would be able to see the light from my flat. I turned on the lights in all three rooms, the hanging lamp, the table lamps and the wall and floor lamps. I saw Meiqing with Sha Sha waiting for the cars to pass by one after another. Perhaps she was too impatient to wait any longer, for she took Sha Sha in her arms and carried her across the street.

I felt my heart beating and the wrist watch in my pocket ticking. The watch was an expensive foreign kind which Meiqing had once admired in a television advertisement. I had bought one abroad to give to her.

I went downstairs but then I thought it better to wait for them in the flat and returned. I heard them walking up the stairs. When they came in, Sha Sha was hugging Meiqing, shouting at the top of her lungs, "Daddy! Daddy!"

Meiqing was also very excited.

"I am glad to see you back. We saw the light on in the distance. I even made a bet with Sha Sha about it last night."

She was genuinely overjoyed. I was sure then that I liked her more than I ever had before. Her large mouth seemed quite in keeping with her open-minded character. Her eyes needn't have been any bigger, since they made her seem gentle, friendly and innocent. Her figure was well-developed, not overly lean. She seemed so graceful and unrestrained.

We finished exchanging greetings and she asked about my trip, the team and the condition of my health. She was interested in knowing everything. The watch kept ticking in my pocket. I decided not to bring up what was on my mind just then, but to wait for exactly the right moment.

Meiqing looked at the clock.

"Oh, it's quite late. Are you working tomorrow?"

"No. I've got a couple of days off."

"That's good." She went into Sha Sha's room and sorted out some of the laundry before emerging. "Sha Sha, don't forget to wash your feet before you go to bed."

Now I felt ready to bring up the most important matter. I couldn't even guess at what her reaction would be. Perhaps she would throw herself into my arms with joyful tears in her eyes. Perhaps she would pretend to decline, or stall for the time being, saying, "Let me think it over. I'll tell you tomorrow."

"Are you going home?" I asked calmly.

She smiled, "Oh, I nearly forgot!"

Fishing a key out of her pocket, she handed it to me, saying:

"Sha Sha won't be going to kindergarten tomorrow, and it so happens that I'm taking time off too. I'm getting married the day after tomorrow."

I was stunned. I couldn't even pretend to be calm and just stared at her dumbfounded.

"You must have seen him." She obviously realized there was something odd about my expression.

"Who … who is he?" I asked abruptly."

"You've met him twice. Let me see … no, three times. Once when we were going to a film, we met you on the street. He even gave Sha Sha a sweet."

I couldn't remember that at all. I hadn't ever noticed her with any young men. Perhaps it was because I felt that there wouldn't be anyone who could match me … my first-class living conditions, my job and all of the material possessions which ought to have impressed her. I couldn't help looking around the room.

"Where does he work?" I stammered out the question almost as though I hoped it would change things.

She chortled.

"Where does he work? He can't even get a job in a factory. He works at a stall he set up with other young people. They've just got their licence for it. I've got to go now. Goodbye, Sha Sha!"

Sha Sha ran to the door.

"Bye-bye, teacher!"

She was gone.

The key was on the table and I suddenly found that I had the watch in my hand. I couldn't even remember taking it out of my pocket.

On the balcony I stood staring as she crossed the street and then was swallowed up by the crowd. I hadn't even said thank-you to her and had just taken everything for granted. Now I understood and was deeply ashamed. I felt my cheeks burning.

The sky was studded with a myriad twinkling lights and the fragrance of summer flowers filled the colorful, noisy streets.

Summer has ended now, and after autumn winter will come and then spring …

*

Meiqing still comes over twice a day. In the morning she knocks on the door, calling, "Sha Sha, hurry up! It's late!" In the afternoon she always says, "I'm leaving, Sha Sha. Goodbye!" after she brings Sha Sha home.

I've never really dared express the gratitude I feel, afraid as I am of profaning what is to me the most precious thing in the world …

150.245 Li T'ung: A Chinese Girl In New York\fn{by Pai Hsien-yung (1937-)} Kweilin, Kwangsi Chuang Autonomous Region, China (M) 8

Hui-fen was a Wellesley\fn{Apparently Wellesley College (founded 1870, Wellesley, Massachusetts), an exclusive college for girls, is meant.} girl. Even years after our marriage she had not grown out of the habit of reminding me that, when she was a sophomore, each evening she would walk into the dining hall wearing her best Chinese silks. She said her wardrobe at that time, though a trifle smaller than Li T'ung's, was unquestionably superior to those of Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling. The four of them had graduated in the same class at McTyiere's, an aristocratic girls' school in Shanghai. They all came from prominent families, but Li T'ung's was the richest since her father was a high-ranking minister in the government. When they had dancing parties, they had invariably gathered at Li's spacious, German-style villa on the fashionable Rainbow Bridge Road. There were two marble fountains in its garden, and when they danced outdoors the fountains illuminated by multicolored lights provided a rich and picturesque background. And since Li T'ung was an only daughter much pampered by her parents since her early childhood, her mother took great care in providing everything for her parties, including fancy foods laid out buffet-style in the garden.

Hui-fen said that in 1946, on the day when they let Shanghai for the States to study, the four of them had by coincidence all worn red Chinese gowns. Standing together in their flaming silks, they literally lit up the Lung-hua Airport, and as they looked at one another they bent double with laughter. Li T'ung claimed they were the big Four of the postwar world—China, America, Great Britain, and Russia. She styled herself China, on the ground that her gown was the brightest. No one wanted to be Russia, however, because Russian women were of coarse skin and large build and a sizable number of them in Shanghai then were prostitutes. But Li T'ung quite arbitrarily appointed Chang Chia-hsing Russia, since she was the chubbiest of the four. Much peeved, Chang Chia-hsing was still bickering with Li T'ung after they had boarded the plane.

About a hundred relatives and friends came to see the four off. As they waved to the boarding girls, the whole airport was aflutter with handkerchiefs like a swarm of butterflies. The four were then only seventeen or eighteen, too excited to be properly solemn or sentimental at the moment of leavetaking. Her mother hugged Li T'ung and cried bitterly at the last minute and even her father was rubbing his eyes, but Li T'ung in her rakish sunglasses with upsweeping frames still had her mouth open in the form of a smile. Once on the plane, the four chatted interminably. Many foreign passengers looked at these four Chinese girls in red and nodded and smiled with approval or amusement. Hui-fen said that they were then truly elated, as if they were really the plenipotentiaries of the Big Four flying to New York to attend an international conference.

Right from the beginning they had become most popular at Wellesley. Hui-fen always loved to enumerate the large number of boys she had dated on weekends. Especially when I was not too attentive, she would rehearse how X had courted her and how Y had doted on her, thus reminding me of the power she had over boys in her prime. I didn't particularly care of these stories and was at times slightly jealous, but when I saw her soaking her white and delicate hands I the dishpan until they peeled I couldn't help loving and pitying her all the more. she is after all the daughter of an aristocratic family used to having her way, but ever since we were married, she had been doing all the household chores with a willing diligence which I can't help respecting.

Hui-fen said that, although all four had done well socially, Li T'ung far outshone the other three. She eclipsed even American girls from wealthy families. Wellesley was very style-conscious. She had brought over with her a fantastic wardrobe, and she certainly knew how to dress. Every day she walked around in something different, but equally eye-catching. Some American boys, seeing her in her shimmering silks, would teasingly ask her if she were a Chinese princess or something. Soon she had become a campus personality and she was elected May Queen.

The boys who dated her were too many to be enumerated. Counting on her beauty, Li T'ung was most haughty to them. Wang Chüeh, a Harvard Law School student highly regarded for his scholarship and character, was infatuate with her, but because Li T'ung appeared indifferent, he eventually became disappointed and stopped seeing her. Hui-fen told me that she knew Li T'ung liked him very much, but since she was used to putting on airs, she could change her ways in time and thus lost her chance to be real friends with him. Hui-fen said that she could have bet that Li T'ung suffered a long time after that, but since she was very proud she would never admit it.

During their third year in the States, the civil war was getting worse in China. When Li T'ung's family tried to flee from Shanghai to Taiwan on the S. S. Peace, it was sunk on the way. Her whole family were killed in the accident and gone, too, were the valuables they had brought with them. When Li T'ung first learned the news, she was taken to the hospital and confined there for more than a month. She refused to eat anything and the doctors had to tie her up in bed and give her glucose and saline injections every day. After being released from the hospital she was very quiet and subdued. Her three friends, too, were no longer in he mood to compete for popularity since their families had also suffered reverses on account of the war, and all four of them now worked hard at their studies. When Hui-fen referred to her Wellesley period, she always began her recital with "When I was a sophomore." The junior and senior years she mentioned very seldom.

It was not until after her graduation that Li T'ung recovered her former gaiety. She went to New York and became a fashion designer at Originala, making a big salary, but her three friends all agreed, however, that there had been something disconcerting about Li T'ung ever since.

I met Li T'ung for the first time at my wedding. I had dated Hui-fen earlier in Boston; at that time I was a graduate student at M. I. T.\fn{Massachusetts Institute of Technology (co-ed, founded in Cambridge in 1859).} and she came to Boston quite often to visit her relatives even though she was then working in New York. But Hui-fen insisted that we have our wedding in New York and make our permanent home there. She said that all her old friends were now working there and only in New York could she forget she was in a foreign country. Our reception was held in our new home on Long Island. Only our best friends were invited. After changing from her wedding gown, Hui-fen formally introduced me to Li T'ung, Chang Chia-hsing, and Lei Chih-ling. Actually I could spot them right away without these introductions since Hui-fen had described them from head to toe Heaven knows how many times. Chang was big, and Lei petite, rather true to Hi-fen's descriptions, both very self-assured and smart. But as for Li T'ung's looks, I must say Hui-fen's estimate was obviously too conservative. No, Li T'ung had not thought too highly of herself. Her beauty was devastating. She literally shone in the gathering and it hurt the eye to look straight at her, as at the blinding sun that has jumped out of the sea. She had finely chiseled features and a tall-graceful figure. Her eyes, dark and flashing, were spellbinding. A riot of shining black hair, two thirds of it combed across her forehead, tumbled down on her left shoulder. On the left temple just above her ear was a hairpin, a big glistening spider made of small diamonds, its claws digging into her hair, its fat, roundish body tilted upward. She wore that day a Chinese white satin gown of silvery sheen, with a red maple leaf design. The maple leaves were each the size of a palm and flamed like balls of fire. No woman is a reliable judge of another's beauty, and I couldn't help suspecting that Hui-fen's reluctance to praise Li T'ung's looks was a form of protest. After all, standing next to Li T'ung, my bride's extreme prettiness was unmercifully overshadowed by her dazzling beauty. That day I was especially happy not only over my own wedding but at meeting Hui-fen's attractive friends.

"So you're the one who broke up our mahjong team. Wait until I get even with you." Upon being introduced, Li T'ung looked me all over with a critical eye and said this with a laugh. She laughed in a strange fashion, with her chin tilted, the left corner of her mouth raised high, and her eyelids closing brusquely as if to obliterate everyone from her vision. Hui-fen had told me they used to live in a four-room apartment on West End Avenue. After office hours the four of them often got together to play mahjong and they called their apartment the Big Four Club. When Hui-fen moved out, they others also split up.

"Then how about letting me join the Big Four Club and pay my membership fee?" I said appeasingly, bowing slightly to Li T'ung and her friends. I had learned to play mahjong and poker in America and had become rather proficient since whenever Chinese friends met it was customary for them to play a game.

"Welcome, welcome," the three girls all laughed at my reply. "You should thank your luck star that you know the game; otherwise we might not let you marry Huang Hui-fen. We originally agreed that no member of our club was permitted to marry a non-gambler."

"I have known about that for some time," I said. "I even know which of you represents which power. Li T'ung is China, right?"

"Don't you dare mention it," Li T'ung cried. "This China of yours has been beaten at every game a catastrophic loser. You think I could win playing against those content to win small games? You go and ask Chang Chia-hsing: half of my paycheck each month goes into her purse."

"You're a lousy player, don't just blame others," Chang Chia-hsing put in.

"Come on, Li T'ung, be a good sport," Lei Chih-ling joined Chang.

"Ch'en Yin," Li T'ung drew close to me and said with her finger pointing at the other girls, "you'd better heed my words: never try to win big when playing with these people, including your beautiful bride. They are the queens of the small game and the quick kill. I build toward the best combination of tiles, if I can't make it, I would rather lose."

The other girls all protested, attacking Li T'ung in unison. But she held fast and wouldn't back down, her head raised high, smiling defiantly, the diamond spider glittering on her profuse black hair. I was greatly intrigued by these smart-looking girls arguing among themselves.

"I too always aim big." I supported Li T'ung, sensing her isolation under the combined attack.

"Really? Really?" Li T'ung cried out in excitement and shook hands with me with evident warmth. "Then I have found my match. Let's have a contest real soon."

At our reception that day, Li T'ung darted here and there conspicuously, her body aflame with the brilliant red leaves on her gown. My bachelor friends were all visibly restless as if they had been scorched by these leaves. My former college roommate Chou Ta-ch'ing repeatedly asked me about Li T'ung that day.

*

After we returned to New York from our honeymoon, Chou Ta-ch'ing rang me up and asked us to have dinner at the tavern-on-the-Green in Central Park. He wanted me to bring Li T'ung along. Chou had taken to several girls in college nothing had worked out, however. He was a nice guy and rather good-looking, too, but somehow he didn't have luck with girls. Each time he fell in love, he was dead serious. I knew he had again lost his head, this time over Li T'ung. When I broke the news to Hui-fen, she said I'd better leave the girl alone since she was so very hard to please, but as I knew Chou Ta-ch'ing to be very honest and reliable, I eventually talked Hui-fen into arranging the meeting.

We picked up Li T'ung and headed for Central Park. She wore a pink organdy gown, very chic. But this time her diamond spider had slid down almost to the end of the flowing mane around her left shoulder, swaying there as if it were suspended from some invisible filament. It was altogether striking. Chou Ta-ch'ing had been waiting for us for some time at the Tavern-on-the-Green. He had just had his hair cut, and looked overly trim. He got up as soon as he saw us, with a stiff smile on his face, seemingly still as nervous as when, back in his college days, he had waited outside the girls' dormitory to take his date to a dance. After we were seated, Chou Ta-ch'ing removed the gold wrapping paper from a box with a transparent plastic lid and took therefrom a large purple orchid as a present for Li T'ung. She smiled, her eyelids drooping, and pinned the orchid to the sash around her waist. Chou Ta-ch'ing ordered champagne for all of us, but Li T'ung asked the waiter to bring her a Manhattan.

"I detest champagne," Li T'ung said. "It tastes like water."

"A Manhattan is quite strong, isn't it?" Chou asked with evident concern as he saw Li T'ung emptying half of her glass in one gulp.

"It suits me beautifully." So saying, Li T'ung proceeded to drain her glass I no time, and picking up the cherry, she stuck it into her mouth. As a waiter passed by, she pointed to the empty glass with the cigarette between her fingers:

"Another Manhattan, please."

Thus drinking, Li T'ung began to talk with great gusto about her adventures at Yonkers. She said she had had no luck in horse racing either, she would win at the start but then lose. She asked me if I knew how to play poker; I said I was rather good at it. She stretched her arm across the table and gave me a firm handshake.

"Huang Hui-fen, our husband is so sweet!" Li T'ung turned to Hui-fen. "Better let me have him. He and I could run a prosperous casino in Chinatown."

We all broke out laughing. Chou Ta-ch'ing laughed uneasily: he knew nothing about gambling and Li t'ung had paid him scarcely any attention. A couple of times he had tried to change the topic of our conversation, but was brushed aside by Li T'ung.

"You may have him," Hui-fen answered Li T'ung laughingly and gave me a push. Li T'ung got up and slipped her arm into mine. We made for the dance floor in the open surrounded by lamps casting amber light. Li T'ung rested her head on my shoulder while dancing. The amber light shone radiantly on her hair and gown.

"Chou Ta-ch'ing is crazy about you," I whispered to her. Chou and Hui-fen had stepped down to the dance floor.

"Oh?" Li T'ung tossed her head, smiling. "You should have told him to take lessons in gambling then."

"He's a very nice fellow."

"I'm not supposed to marry a non-gambler, you know that," she grinned, and rested her head on my shoulder again.

Li T'ung had five or six Manhattans before we finished our dinner. Each time she ordered a drink, Chou Ta-ch'ing looked at her with sheepish disapproval.

"Why look at me like that? Too stingy to buy me a drink or something?" Li T'ung suddenly turned her head toward Chou Ta-ch'ing. She was laughing, her cheeks flushed crimson and the left corner of her mouth curved upward. Embarrassed, Chou Ta-ch'ing hastened to explain, "I was only afraid you have had too many."

"Tell you what, I'm not going to dance with you until I have another." Li T'ung flipped her fingers toward the waiter for another Manhattan. After finishing that, she got up to dance with Chou. The Latin American band was playing the La Tino Cha Cha with much spirit.

"I don't cha cha too well." Chou Ta-ch'ing got up after some hesitation.

"I'll coach you." Li T'ung stepped straight to the dance floor, Chou Ta-ch'ing following behind.

Instantly, Li T'ung attuned herself perfectly to the frenzied tempo of the cha cha. She danced very well, with ease and abandon. Chou Ta-ch'ing could hardly follow her. At first Li T'ung accommodated herself to Chou's clumsy steps, but soon she surrendered herself completely to the ever-quickening pace. Her body surged up and down, whirling in wider and wider circles, her steps getting almost frantic. The cha cha rhythm became, as it were, a whirlwind of noise, blowing out her long rippling hair and the sash around her waist. The diamond spider was flung into the air, clinging tenaciously to her mane, but the purple orchid flew off the sash, swirled down to the floor, and was trodden to a pulp by her feet. She held up her head, her eyelids lowered, her brows closely knit, her long supple waist swaying urgently. She was like a cobra mesmerized by a magic flute, whirling agonizingly even to the point of allowing its body to disintegrate. The Latin musicians played in frenzy until at the climax of the tune they broke out in singing and yelling. The other dancers had stopped to watch Li T'ung even though Chou Ta-ch'ing still struggled to say near her, and they applauded with the musicians when the tune stopped. Li T'ung waved to the musicians and came back to her seat. Sweat stood in beads all over her face and a big tuft of hair clung to her cheek. Chou Ta-chj'ing kept wiping his forehead with a handkerchief, his face flushed purple. The minute she sat down, Li T'ung waved to the waiter for another Manhattan.

"Li T;'ung, you're going to get stoned," Hui-fen patted Li T'ung's hand, trying to stop her.

Li T'ung flung her arms around Hui-fen's neck and said laughing, "Huang Hui-fen, my dear Huang Hui-fen, don't stop me, not tonight. I'm so happy. I've never been so happy as this."

She pointed to her chest, her eyes burning darkly. Before she would let us lead her away, she had two more Manhattans. She staggered a little on her way out. As the Negro porter opened the door for us, Li T'ung suddenly pulled out a ten-dollar bill and unsteadily stuck it into his hand.

"Your Manhattans are the best in the world!" Li T'ung said, bending forward.

On reaching home, Hui-fen blamed me. "I told you to leave Li T'ung alone. she is so willful I really feel sorry for Chou Ta-ch'ing."

*

Our first two years in New York were as busy as the Lexington Avenue Express. Both of us worked on weekdays, but as soon as we got home, we would be asked by Hui-fen's friends to go out again. On weekends there were the inevitable dinner parties, very often planned weeks ahead. Both Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling were then going steady, Chang with Dr. Wang, a physician, and Lei with an engineer named Chaing T'eng. Both Wang and Chiang loved to play mahjong and poker, and when we saw the two couples, we passed the time playing either one or the other game: you might say their courtship was carried out among cards and tiles. Li T'ung did not have a steady boy friend and changed her escorts often. Moreover, she had lost interest in mahjong, calling it a tepid game, and one Saturday she suggested horse racing. So off we went that afternoon, the eight of us, to the Yonkers racecourse. Li T'ung's escort was Teng Mao-ch'ang, a business man from Hong Kong in his late thirties who ran a Chinese curio shop on fifth Avenue. Li T'ung said that Teng was an expert on horse racing, winning nine out of ten times. It was a sunny and hot day and all four girls wore broad-rimmed straw hats. Li T'ung also wore magenta shorts and a white shirt. Its collar was turned back, exposing a rakish wisp of her lavender neckerchief.

The racecourse was already packed when we got there. Except for Teng Mao-ch'ang, we all knew little about horse racing, and he enthusiastically acted as our broker, running up and down in the crowd to gather information and then ordering us with authority to place bets. The first two rounds we each won thirty or fifty dollars and on the third race Teng urged us to throw in a big bet on Lucky.

"I don't want him," Li T'ung said. "I want to pick my own horse."

"Just listen to me once, will you?" Teng advised anxiously, his hand holding a bundle of bills we had given him. "I swear Lucky will hit the jack pot."

Checking over the program, Li T'ung pointed to a name and told Teng, "I want to bet on Bold Lad."

"Lucky's got to win," answered Teng.

"But Bold Lad, what a pretty name! I want to bet fifty bucks on that."

"But that's a lousy horse."

"Throw in a hundred for me then." Li T'ung fished out five twenty-dollar bills and stuck them into Teng's hands. While he was still trying to talk her out of it, Chang Chia-hsing cut in, "Why should you care if she loses? She makes over a thousand a month."

"Why are you so sure I'm going to lose?" Li T'ung turned to Chang with a sneer. "You people like to run after a sure thing. I don't."

Lucky dashed to the forefront as the race began and after two or three rounds of the track he had left the other horses far behind. Chang Chia-hsing, Lei Chih-ling, and Hui-fen, hugging each other, jumped with excitement. Bold Lad, however, had lagged behind from the very beginning. Li T'ung took off her hat and swung it in the air, shouting at the top of her voice:

"Come on, my boy! Come on!"

Her face went red and her voice got hoarse but her Bold Lad failed her pitiably. In the end we all won big on Lucky except Li T'ung. In the next few rounds she got more and more erratic and made random bets on whichever horses took her fancy. The day over, Hui-fen and I turned out to have made the biggest pot over five hundred dollars. Li T'ung, the sole loser, had thrown away over four hundred. In a happy mood Hui-fen took all our friends to a Chinese restaurant on Upper Broadway and ordered a sumptuous dinner. At the table Teng Mao-ch'ang began to recount his experiences at the Hong Kong races; much fascinated, Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling showered him with questions.

"You made me slip today," Li T'ung suddenly broke in on teng. "You are responsible for all my losses."

"You wouldn't have lost if you had listened to me," Teng said.

"Why should I have listened to you? Who gave you the right to boss us around anyway?" Li T'ung flipped her chopsticks down on the table and retorted, her eyes flashing.

"All right, all right, I'll try to keep quiet the next time we go to Yonkers," Teng smiled appeasingly.

"What next time? Can't I go horse racing without you?"

Teng couldn't find anything to say to these cutting words; he looked at Li T'ung with that helpless smile fixed on his face. We all felt a little uneasy. It was an uncomfortable dinner.

*

During the third year of our stay in New York, Hui-fen came down with a serious case of insomnia. The doctor blamed it on her taut nerves, but I knew it must be those frantic parties that had impaired her health. Without waiting for Hui-fen's consent, I asked for a transfer to the Buffalo branch of our company. Although Hui-fen didn't make too much of a fuss about the move, I knew she must resent it. When Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling heard the news, they all became indignant and accused me of kidnapping their Huang Hui-fen.

During the six years we lived in Buffalo, we came back to New York only once, once for Lei's wedding and the other time for Chang's. We met Li T'ung on both occasions. In fact, she was Chang's bridesmaid. She looked thinner, but her striking beauty still arrested attention. The reception was held I Dr. Wang's luxurious apartment on Central Park West; with his wide connections, little wonder that he had so many well-wishers gathered in the living room and dining room. Pushing through the crowd, Li T'ung came near me and asked me to take her out for a walk. She dragged me to Hui-fen's side, asking with a smile, "Won't you lend me our husband for a moment?"

"Take him along. I don't want him any more," Hui-fen smiled.

"You'd better keep an eye on that girl," Lei Chih-ling teased. "She's going to kidnap your husband.

"All the better," Hui-fen said, still smiling. "I won't have to go back to Buffalo then."

"There were too many people in there and I was suffocating," Li T'ung said to me when we were in Central Park. "To tell you the truth, Ch'en Yin, I want to you to buy me a drink, too. It was all Chang Chia-hsing's brilliant idea: a champagne party. You know I loathe that stuff."

I walked Li T'ung to the Tavern-on-the-Green and ordered a Manhattan for her and a Scotch on the rocks for myself. She chatted gaily while drinking. She said she had changed her job. Originala had raised her pay to fifteen hundred a month, but she had quit because she had a fight with her boss. Now she worked at Vogue where she got even higher pay as the second in command in the Design Department. Not happy with her new job, either, she shrugged her shoulders, since her new boss was an unbearable crank who had rheumatism all year round. I asked her if she still lived on Lexington Avenue. She laughed and said she had moved three times since I had last seen her. She had already gulped down three drinks during our talk and her face was beginning to turn red.

"Take it easy, Li T'ung," I said to her, "you don't want to get high as you did the last time here."

"So you still remember it," Li Tu'ung tossed her head and laughed. "I must have been terribly drunk that night. Did I scare your friend Chou Ta-ch'ing?"

"No, he wasn't scared, but he had been saying since that you're the best-looking girl he's ever met."

"No kidding," Li t'ung laughed, "No I remember seeing him at Macy's four or five months ago. He was shopping with his wife. He gave me his address and asked me to visit him."

"He's a very nice guy."

"He must be," Li T'ung laughed again, "He keeps sending me a Christmas card each year with best wishes for my happiness. A very interesting fellow, but he doesn't gamble."

I asked Li T'ung if she still went to the races. She suddenly beamed, gulped down her drink, and gave me a slap on the hand.

"Tell you what, last Saturday I went to Yonkers, all by myself. I picked Gallant Knight—isn't that a cute name? Guess what, I won four hundred and fifty on that. Four hundred and fifty on a single bet! That was my greatest accomplishment in my whole damn life, Ch'en Yin. You remember Teng Mao-ch'ang, don't you, the self-appointed expert on horse racing. He went back to Hong Kong and married someone of Chinese and Portuguese blood. Well, anyway, I've suddenly become lucky on horses since he left. I've won every single bet for the last three months."

Li T'ung talked rapidly, shaking with laughter, and kept asking the bartender to fill it up for her. It was getting dark outside and Li T'ung got up abruptly, saying, "We'd better go; otherwise Huang Hui-fen might think I've really kidnapped her husband."

*

We had Lili during our second year in Buffalo. When the time came for her to go to kindergarten, Hui-fen gave me her ultimatum: if I persisted in staying in buffalo, she would take Lili with her to New York and resume her work there. She said she wouldn't mind having insomnia again. I agreed that the methodical, dull life in buffalo was not very healthful and so we moved back to New York and bought a new house on Long Island. Hui-fen decided that we should give a big party the first Saturday after we moved into the new house. On that day Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling came with their husbands. Li T'ung, however, came unescorted. Some other friends came in Dr. Wang's car.

Hui-fen had spent three solid days preparing for the party, and came up with over a dozen Chinese dishes. After dinner we began to play poker and mahjong. Huifen asked Chang, Lei, and Li T'ung to join her at the same table to play mahjong so that they might talk about the good old days at the Big Four Club. After one round, however, Li T'ung got up to exchange places with someone at the men's poker table. She said she had not touched mahjong for ages and had forgotten practically all the rules. I wasn't playing that night, busy serving drinks to spare Hui-fen further work. After both tables had warmed to the games, I came to the poker table in the dining room but couldn't find Li T'ung thee. The men said she had left the table a while ago for a short recess. After searching everywhere, I finally opened the door separating the living room from the porch and found her asleep in a rattan rocking chair.

The porch was dimly lit by a small yellow lamp hanging down from the ceiling. Li T'ung's head inclined to her right shoulder, her hands were on the armrests, her long slender fingers dangling limply. Her long dark red skirt almost touched the floor; in the dim light it appeared dingy, as if it were an old blanket of faded color. Her hair seemed to have grown much longer, covering the whole of her left cheek, flowing down to he chest. The diamond spider was still there, squatting on her left cheek, fierce, shimmering. I had never seen Li T'ung so haggard, so fatigued. No matter where I had seen her before, she had always looked defiantly gay and untamed, as if she would never agree to lie down for a rest. My footsteps woke her. With a start, she sat up, pushed back her hair, and said with a yawn, “Is that you, Ch’en Yin?”

“You were asleep, Li T’ung,” I said.

“Oh? I felt a little tired at the table and so I quit. I thought I would just take a little rest here, but I passed out. Isn’t that funny? Thank God, you’re here. Get me a drink, will you?

I fixed a bourbon on the rocks and took it to the porch. Li T’ung took a big gulp and heaved a sigh. “Jesus, that was good. I had bad luck tonight. Haven’t had a darn hand the whole evening. It bored me to tears watching them playing. I’m getting more and more impatient, I guess. I can’t even stand poker any longer.”

In the living room Hui-fen, Chang Chia-hsing, and Lei Chih-ling were interminably talking and laughing. Chang had a loud voice, and every once in a while she would burst out laughing, drowning out other sounds. The poker players were also quite spirited: the chips kept knocking against the table.

“Probably Chang Chia-hsing has made another smashing combination of tiles,” Li T’ung remarked, shaking her head in amusement. She looked even thinner than the last time I had seen her, her cheeks sunken a little, but her dark eyes flashed as brightly as before.

“Get me another one, will you?” She handed me the empty glass. I got her another bourbon. As we were chatting on the porch, my five-year-old daughter, Lili, popped in, bundled up in a white nightgown, a knot of hair tied with a blue ribbon sticking up on her head. She had a round chubby face, clear dark eyes. A real darling. She would never go to bed until I had kissed her good night. I bent down and she, standing on tiptoe, gave me a gentle kiss.

“Don’t you want to give auntie a kiss, too?” Li T’ung said to Lili. Lili toddled to Li T’ung, bent down her neck with her encircling arms, and smacked her on the forehead. Li T’ung hugged her and put her on her lap.

“A perfect copy of Huang Hui-fen,” Li T’ung said to me, “she’ll turn out to be a real beauty, too.”

“What’s this, auntie?” asked Lili, toying with a big diamond ring on Li T’ung’s finger.

“It’s a stone.”

“Let me have it,” Lili said with her coaxing voice.

“Then it’s yours.” Li T’ung took the ring from her finger and slipped it on Lili’s thumb. Lili raised her hand and swung it so that it glittered against the dim porch light.

“Don’t let her play with such a valuable thing. It may get lost,” I tried to intervene.

“It’s Lili’s now, I mean it.” Li T’ung looked up to me, her face wearing a serious expression that came to her rarely. She bowed down and kissed Lili on her chubby face, saying, “Be a good girl. The ring is for your dowry. Get yourself a good husband in the future. Go along now and let Daddy keep it for you.”

Lili handed the ring to me, laughing happily, and then left for bed.

“Mama gave it to me when I left Shanghai,” Li T’ung pointed to the ring in my hand and said, “It was supposed to be part of my dowry.”

“Since you like Lili so much, why can’t you be her godmother?” I said.

“Oh, come on,” Li T’ung got up abruptly, her strange smile again drawing up the left corner of her moth. “Huang Hui-fen is a wonderful mother and what does Lili need me for? Look at me, am I the motherly type? Let’s go in now. I’ve already lost a great deal. I’m going to win it back.”

*

We didn’t see much of Li T’ung after that evening, since she rarely attended our parties. One story had it that she was kept by an American millionaire from California on his Westchester estate, while another maintained that she was messily involved with a businessman from south America. On our way to downtown Manhattan one day, we were just entering the East River Freewway when a huge golden Continental convertible dashed past us and someone in it shouted at us in a shrill voice:

“Huang … Hui- … fen. …”

Hui-fen stuck out her head from the window and heaved a disapproving sigh. “She’s given me a real scare!”

It was Li T’ung yelling from that open convertible. She was seated next to the driver but she had turned around to face us, her arms flung wide apart and waving desperately, a huge bright red scarf on her head flapping in the air. The convertible shot forward like a golden dart and carried Li T’ung with it. The man driving the car was a big fellow; he looked Caucasian. That was the last time we saw Li T’ung.

*

Lei Chih-ling gave birth to a boy during the fourth year of her marriage. When the boy was one month old, the happy parents gave a party in their Riverdale apartment to celebrate. Chang Chia-hsing and her husband didn’t show up for dinner that evening, which was rather unusual with them. We had already played a few rounds of poker when they finally arrived. A telegram in her right hand, Chang Chia-hsing waved to us and cried:

"Li t'ung is dead! Li T'ung is dead!"

"Which Li T'ung?" Lei Chih-ling walked quickly to meet her.

"What do you mean 'Which Li T'ung'?" Chang said impatiently.

"Nonsense," Lei cut her short. "Li t'ung left for Europe only two weeks ago."

"Look at this." Chang forced the telegram into Lei's hand. "I just got it from the Chinese Consulate in Italy. Li T'ung drowned herself in Venice. She didn't even leave a note and didn't have a single relative here. The police must have found my address in her purse and then asked the Consulate to wire me. So I went with the police to open up her apartment on Fifth Avenue. Closets and bureaus full of clothes and shoes—I don't know what to do with them."

Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling started arguing over why Li T'ung had killed herself. Why? Why? Suddenly both of them became indignant, as though Li T'ung had deceived them by committing suicide. Hui-fen took the telegram and read it in silence; she didn't say anything.

"How can one account for it? Why should she kill herself?" cried Chang Chia-hsing. "She earned more money than any of us here—how could she be so fed up with everything?"

"I told her many times to get married and settle down. But she was always mockingly evasive, never taking my words seriously," said Lei Chih-ling.

"So many men after her and she spurned them all. Whom to blame?" added Chang Chia-hsing.

Lei Chih-ling went to her bedroom and took out a picture to show us, saying, "I've forgotten to show you this. I received it only last week—who could have expected her suicide?"

It was a color picture. Li T'ung was standing there by herself in an unbuttoned black topcoat, her left arm akimbo, her right hand raised high as if she were waving to some people. Her chin tilted, her eyelids lowered, she had that strange arrogant smile on her face. In the background stood a leaning tower, seemingly about to topple on her. Hui-fen held the picture in her hand and looked at it intently. I went over to her side and found here reading the lines written at the back of the picture:

Dear members of the Big Four:
This is the Pisa tower,
China, December, 1960

Chang Chia-hsing and Lei Chih-ling continued to argue over the cause of Li T'ung's suicide, Chang saying that it was probably because that American had deserted her and Lei maintaining that she had been suffering from a bad case of nerves. But both agreed that Li T'ung shouldn't have died.

"I know," Chang Chia-hsing suddenly broke out, shaking her head as if something had dawned upon her. "Li T'ung should have gone to Europe by herself. A Chinese should never do that, running around in Europe by herself like the Americans. Her ghost will now be wandering there all alone. She ought to have stayed in new York; at least we could have kept her busy with cards or something. Then she wouldn't have had the time to die."

Lei Chih-ling seemed to agree with Chang Chia-hsing's conclusion and stopped arguing. A moment of silence fell. The two of them seat facing each other, lost in their thoughts. Hui-fen, her head lowered, kept turning the picture in her hand. The men at the card table were either fiddling with the chips or smoking quietly. When the silence was getting oppressive, a lusty cry from Lei's baby broke out in the bedroom. Lei jumped up with a start and said, "Come on, people, let's get back to our game. No use talking further."

She herded us back to the card table and poker was resumed. Somehow the game got wild and our bets grew bigger and bigger. Chang Chia-hsing was heard repeatedly shouting, "Show your hand! Show your hand!" She had her sleeves rolled back and bet a pile of chips for each hand. Lei Chih-ling followed suit, and even Hui-fen, usually a cautious poker player, seemed to have been infected with their frenzy and pushed heaps of her chips into the pool recklessly. Even with their better self-control, the men also played with abandon since the game had already got out of hand. Chips of all colors kept rolling back and forth from one player to another. Each time Chang Chia-hsing won, she threw her arms across the table and swept the chips to her side, shouting and laughing until she came to tears. Lei Chin-ling had a small voice, but she tried to vie with Chang by raising it to a pitiable screech. Round after round went on. We didn't realize it was already morning until Lei Chih-ling's husband went to draw asked the curtains and a flood of dazzling sunlight poured through the windows. We all averted our faces and narrowed our eyes. Chang Chia-hsing threw her cards on the table and covered her face with her hands. We stopped the game and Lei Chih-ling left for the kitchen to make coffee for us. It turned out that both Hui-fen and I were big losers.

When Hui-fen and I walked out of the apartment building, we found it had snowed during the night. There on the street patches of frozen mud partially covered with a thin layer of fluffy snow looked as if they had gotten moldy overnight. The apartment houses on this Riverdale street all looked the same: tall, old buildings a stale brown color. It was Sunday and there was nobody on the street. People were apparently still in bed since yellow curtains were drawn across their windows. From opposing sides of the street these windows stared at one another like huge vacant eyes with their pupils removed. The sun had risen above the buildings and lit up the whole street, but the air was still freezing.

Hui-fen walked in front of me, her overcoat huddled around her shoulders. Her head was bent in order better to watch her steps and avoid the muddy patches of snow. The hair that had been tied into a bun now fell over the collar of her coat in an unkempt fashion. I had forgotten to wear my gloves to the party; now my hands were thrust inside my overcoat pockets, still feeling stiff and cold. The chill morning air made my eyes smart, and since I had drunk too much coffee last night, my throat also felt very dry. Our car was frozen, too, and it was some time before I got it started. When we got to Broadway, Hui-fen opened the window on her side. The cold air blew in, making me very uncomfortable.

"Close the window, Hui-fen," I said.

"I want to get some fresh air," she said.

"Close the window, will you?" I said. My hands on the wheel were getting numb with cold. Hui-fen turned to the other side, her chin resting on the window ledge, without saying a word.

Close the window, did you hear me?" I suddenly found myself shouting at her in a fit of annoyance. It was as if the cold wind had pumped up some suppressed irritation inside me, like stomach acid. Hui-fen turned around and closed the window quietly. When our car got near times Square, I suddenly found that Hui-fen was weeping. She was sitting stiffly beside me, looking blankly in front of her. Tears kept rolling down her cheeks; she didn't even try to wipe them away and let them fall on her chest. I had never before seen Hui-fen so pale, so haggard. As a proud person, she rarely showed emotion before people. Even when she was alone with me, she would not show on her face that she was troubled or unhappy. But now I could feel a kind of profound and yet strangely hollow grief that came to me through her weeping. Sob followed convulsive sob, each as flat and as monotonous as the other. All of a sudden I felt I could fully understand her profound and yet hollow grief. I knew that no words could allay it and all she needed was privacy. I turned my head away and didn't look at her any more. When we got to Forty-second Street I speeded up. The neon lights of both sides of the street were still on but they looked dim and weak in the sunlight. There weren't many cars on the street and very few pedestrians. I had never suspected that one of the busiest streets in New York could be so empty and deserted on a Sunday morning.

150.253 & 151.13 1. An Unfinished Record 2. Remorse: Two Short Stories\fn{by Zhang Jie (1937-   )} Peking, China (F) 9

1

I know that I will never come back to this place again. As I close the window, forcing my old cat, the Grand Historian, outside for the last time. He grows cross with me for the insult of this rough treatment. Yet he's far too tolerant and dignified to scratch or yowl at me. He merely springs back on to the windowsill, crouched, staring at me through the pane, with those apparently all-seeing eyes.

The sighing of the poplars, the clamor of the traffic, the neighbor boy playing his mouth-organ are all muffled now, more distant, removed. I wonder if the lad is growing tired, attempting the same tune over and over again since this morning. But I am finished with these sounds by now and with the pain they make deep inside my ears.

I decide to be thorough and lock the windows, but its been broken for so long that the frame is coming apart and is too misshapen to shut properly. No matter how hard I try, it cannot be bolted. It is not the fault of the maintenance staff for not doing their job properly; rater, I'd call it one more symptom of my hopeless indifference to making my life more comfortable. Usually I managed by tying up the frame with string, making raising the window a terrible nuisance, but luckily I've rarely opened it. I've long been as delicate as a premature baby and the night breezes or the slightest change in temperature cause me the most mysterious complaints. I'm always wishing our hospitals had insulated cubicles for decrepit old wrecks like me to find rest in.

From being shut off so long my room has always had a musty atmosphere, like that of a cellar, the desiccated odor of a room where an invalid has been enduring for a long time. But for the last few nights I've kept the window open, wanting the flower-scented spring breeze to drift into every corner and whisk away all traces of my life which had impregnated the room for all these years. It was a warm, lovely breeze but it started me off coughing, my throat thick with phlegm, like a chimney clogged with soot. If only, like a chimney, it could be swept clean.

This is probably the last thing I will be able to do for anyone else. Or is it the first? The best thing, of course, would have been to give these walls a good new coat of whitewash, but now it's too late. Sooner or later some new tenants will move in, and I don't wish them to resent any lingering part of me. But even if they do resent any hold I may have on the place, I will be beyond hearing them.

The hospital called me the day before yesterday with the message that I should come there today. The boy who spoke to me had a voice like a singer in a musical, melodious, as though he were singing a solo. He might have been urging me to go to a rendezvous with someone who'd be waiting for me, under a silk tree or by a little bridge. But instead I'll be going through the door that leads to … who can say what?

After that phone call I began looking back over my life, the way people who are about to die find themselves doing. It surprised me—why hadn't I done this before? Do we really have to wait until it's too late to do anything, before we remember all those countless old debts, great and small, that we've no way of settling now? Each of us can only experience the mystery of death once and it seems cruel to enter this mystery feeling unsettled, with a sense of guilt. But, in fact, my life has been pointless and dull, the most ordinary life possible, containing absolutely nothing of interest for a novelist—no dramatic tragedy, no peaks of joy. Poor soul who must write my eulogy, perhaps the shortest eulogy ever, read in two brief minutes.

My very name seems to have been designed to make things awkward for everyone. It's graceless, hard to pronounce, a stiff and commonplace-sounding name. Even though it appears on the spite of books on Ming history every couple of years or so, those thick tomes of four or five hundred pages costing well over a yuan are usually found on the bottom shelves of the bookshop. I always know perfectly well that when my next book comes out the previous one won't have sold out, but I can't help going to the bookshop. I always know perfectly well that when my next book comes out the previous one won't have sold out, but I can't help fewer of those unsold volumes. Even one less would be a welcome sight. Then I slip away like a thief, afraid someone will discover that I'm the author of those unsold books. I've wasted all that paper, I feel, and tricked all my readers into giving me their time. It makes me heavy-hearted. I know I have little talent, but it's as if I had been bewitched into devotion all my thoughts, my soul and even my body to the study of our ancestors' history I could not stop myself from writing. What else was there for me to live for, all alone as I am?

A moment ago Li, my neighbor, asked with some concern whether there was anything he could do for me while I was in hospital. Should he take letters and cables straight to the hospital, or wait till he could bring them along when he came to visit me? They could wait, I told him. He could get someone to take them along when it was convenient.

Apart from letters to and from publishers, magazines and a university journal which takes my articles, and very occasionally a hand-written note from another simple-minded bookworm like me wanting to argue about just where a battle was fought during some dynasty, I have virtually no private correspondence. And since I have done no work for a long time because of my illness, even letters such as these have become few and far between.

Now that I think of it, there is something to be said for having no private life: you have few attachments, and nobody has to feel distressed when you begin to fail. Still, if I do get to heaven I shall feel sad that no one on earth will be grieving for me. It's not that I don't get along with people, but that I simply haven't had the good fortune to make any friends. My colleagues in the research institute regard me with great respect and kindness. People usually treat me well, but I tend to frighten them off, or to mistake their ordinary courtesy for an expression of interest. I'm afraid I have gone on for hours and hours citing evidence to show that the Qing historian Xia Xie's Universal Mirror of Ming history is full of wrong judgements, not caring whether my listeners are interested, how busy they are, or if I'm trying their patience. Whenever I have to return a visit, my mind stays back with those manuscripts piled on my desk and I hope that the person I am going to see will be out. then, by leaving a brief note, I can meet the requirements of courtesy with the minimum waste of time. If I find them in I always make meaningless remarks, such as "It's gradually been getting a bit warmer recently," then repeat myself three times over. These social performances generally exhaust me, and my boorishness and lack of manners leave others at a complete loss as to how to deal with me. When I get up to leave, my host's face shows relief and gratitude that he will not have to prolong this mutual torture.

My everyday life is totally organized around work, and on public holidays when I can’t go to the institute cafeteria, I’m never sure about when to eat breakfast, lunch or supper. No one has more enthusiasm than I have for the development of China’s food and clothing industries: I’m eager for the time when the whole business of eating can be reduced to the simplicity of the astronaut’s toothpaste-tube meals. I await anxiously the new clothing to be made out of paper, as well as the quilt-covers and pillowcases, so mine won’t always be like soiled rags. Of course, I like clean clothes and quilt-covers the same as everyone else, but I’ve had neither the time nor the inclination to bother with them.

But now these minor irritations are history and I ask myself has there been nothing else interesting to review from my life? Is there no more than the few yuan I owe here and there, or the call I’ve forgotten to return? In a fairy tale of Hans Christian Andersen, one cold, winter’s night a lonely old man on the point of death sees the whole of the past through one of his cloudy tears. And it reminds me that there has been just one tear in my long, monotonous life. Not an old man’s cloudy tear, but a unique tear from my youth that had the luster and the color of a pearl.; It is only now, when it is about to be buried with me, that I can bear to bring it up from the deep well of memory.

*

It was a warm summer morning. She was laughing as she came into our office, which was dark and somber from the shadowy green vines on the wall outside the small windows. From the moment she arrived it was as if there had been another window in the room. How could she laugh so much? Whenever she laughed I laughed too, and I discovered to my delight that this made her laugh even more. I never knew what I looked like when I laughed, but from then on I was full of confidence that my face looked fine when I laughed, and that confidence made my writing suddenly speed up from one to two thousand characters a day.

I’m always losing umbrellas, one after another. It only has to rain for me to lose an umbrella—on buses, in little restaurants or bookstores I chance upon, or by newsstands. The day I left my umbrella at some academic conference, she came running after me, calling and laughing, and handed me my umbrella back. I drank in her laughter with such pleasure that I forgot to thank her.

*

Listening to her voice, to her laughter, and feeling that the office had an extra window in it had become the most important thing in my life. Any day on which she did not come to work might just as well have not happened. Her lightness, her conversation, her losing a button, her touch of irritation because she had been unable to buy a pretty pair of shoes all slowly infused the historical data I read and the words I wrote. I longed to share everything I had and everything I did with her.

My life seemed a lot more complicated than it had been before I knew her. I was always showing her books that I found interesting and useful, and whenever I talked to her about our admirable forebears and the history that had ebbed like a tide I felt an emotion I had never known before: happiness.

I even started going to the picture. I recall one film. At the time everyone said that it was a thoroughly boring film, the sort you forget all about before you’re even outside the cinema. But that film, with an actress who reminded me of her, turned my heart upside down. I found a new boldness I didn’t know I had. I took out paper and pen and I wrote to her, asking her to meet at nine o’clock by a little bridge, just as in the film. Even the words I used were borrowed from the film. I was drunk with the image of her running to meet me under the silk tree.

I arrived an hour early, to be there ready to see her as she arrived. Nine o’clock passed. By ten o’clock she had still not come and I thought that I must have written the wrong date or time. That was very possible, even though I had taken the letter out of the envelope many times, read it through and put it back again before I posted it. I could not be sure that my mind had been clear enough at the time, or whether my nerves had been dependable. That sort of thing had happened to me before. Back in middle-school maths, for example, an exam question asked what 50/2 was equal to. I wrote it correctly: 50/2. I don’t know how many times I checked through my answers, but for its own reasons my mind stubbornly held on to 50/3, a fraction that could not be reduced any further. Could I in the same way have written midday or eight p.m. instead of nine a.m.?

I became hungry, but I dared not leave the little bridge to have some lunch. I kept taking my glasses off to wipe clean the lenses, so I wouldn’t miss seeing her, but they stayed as hazy as ever. I wished I had not always thrust them into my pockets with keys, nail clippers and everything else, or carelessly thrown them lens-down on my desk, until they were like frosted glass. Why did they seem now even worse than ever?

I began to wonder whether she had suddenly fallen ill. I felt so anxious that my heart was hurting. Perhaps she had had an accident on the way there. If something like that really had happened, I’d never have been able to forgive myself, not even if I could have gone to hell and been punished ten times over.

The bustle of traffic and people gradually died away with the day. the street lights came on in the distance and generously cast their gentle orange glow over me, as if to soothe away my disappointment. I walked home alone, among the shadows, as if the happiness of the morning had never been.

Even before I got into the office next morning I heard her laughter as I walked on the path among the green trees. Thank heavens! She was still alive, healthy and happy. For a long time I stood under the eaves of the building, not wanting to go inside in case some other impression might weaken the happiness I had lost and now recovered. My eyes were filled with tears of gratitude, even though I did not know who I should be thanking or for what.

Laughing as sweetly as ever she spoke to me. “Please meet my fiancé. We would like you to come to our wedding on Saturday evening.” He was strong, tall and good-looking and shook my hand heartily.

As she spoke she handed me a heavy parcel, wrapped in strong brown paper and tied with string. It was the book I had lent her. As I watched them I thought happily about their wedding, and of how well matched they were. It was just as if my agonies of self-reproach by the bridge the day before had never happened and the letter I had tortured myself for so long over sending had never existed.

The wedding ceremony was informal, with a very free and jovial atmosphere, like a group of friends meeting spontaneously. That was very much her way of doing things. It was the first time I had been in a crowd without feeling awkward and uncomfortable.

The bridegroom sat down right next to me and told me he was a geologist. He explained to me with great gusto how the stress that caused earthquakes is built up, and how infrared remote sensing was going to replace the geologist’s compass, hammer and magnifying-glass in prospecting for the earth’s natural resources. He talked to me not as if he were the groom, but as if he were a guest who had come along to offer his congratulations.

I smiled. His way of making conversation without bothering whether he was killing the person he was talking to was a bit like mine. He was very fond of his work and believed that geology was definitely very useful to the world and a truly wonderful science. I admired him and even started wondering whether I had made a mistake in studying history instead of geology all those years ago. He casually handed me a cigarette. He was evidently too happy and enthusiastic to care about such details as whether I was a smoker or wanted to smoke.

Of course I accepted the cigarette—I couldn’t turn his kind offer down. He was the man she loved, and on top of that I liked him myself. I didn’t know whether I was meant to swallow the evil-smelling fumes or to inhale them. From the health posters I had seen in hospitals about smoking causing lung cancer I guessed that you had to draw them into your lungs. I could not have remembered wrongly; the hospital was a place I knew very well, the lace I went to most often apart from my office and my room. I choked on the first puff, but tried as hard as I could not to cough although the effort made my eyes water. It did not go at all well and I was afraid al this would alarm him and make him blame himself for causing one such misery.

She came over to us smiling, her eyes dazzling. She handed me an exquisite crystal glass and wanted me to drink a toast to them. I accepted the glass of wine and at once a humming started in my head. The drink was so strong, yet my heart remained light. It was very odd that I should have felt that way, but I was as happy as if I were getting married myself.

It was late at night when I left the place where those two people had surrounded me with happiness. It was mid-October, still quite warm, and I was in a cheerful frame of mind. I flung my jacket over my shoulders and strolled back through the moonlight. I didn’t know whether it came from the cigarette or the drink, but I felt as if I were floating through the air. In a gust of light breeze I seemed to hear people whispering or laughing quietly from the locust and poplar trees by the roadside.

I remembered the Schubert\fn{Franz Peter Schubert (1797-1828), Austrian composer.} Serenade stanzas the bridegroom had just been singing:

Softly my songs
Cry to you through the night and I remembered her expression as he sang.

A pale longing welled up in my heart. I longed to have a soft shoulder beside, me, longed to have someone leaning her adorable curly head against my shoulder. I would have put my jacket around her like a gallant Spanish knight wrapping his woman in his cloak

I tripped over a stone, and looked down to see my shadow on the ground, the shoulders as narrow as a child's. I looked as if I had three less ribs than anyone else, and seemed to be painfully bent forward. It suddenly occurred to me that I was an old fool—no woman would ever want to rest her head on a shoulder like mine.

Oh my dearest, a cry to the beloved is carried on The wind, on such a night as this …

As soon as I was back in my room I flung myself across my little bed, stretched out on the side of the bedside table and on it wrote the first letter of her name: S. I felt no particular misery or grief. Gradually my eyes misted up, and the letter seemed to turn into a winged angel flying lightly above my head. I closed my tired eyelids. I must have had a happy dream that night, but it was such a long time ago that I can no longer remember it clearly.

She soon left our institute and started traveling all over the country with her geologist. And the years passed. I realized that by now she must be as decrepit as I am, but as long as I don't see her again I'll remember her as she was when we parted, always laughing for no good reason, radiant and cheerful like someone who has slept and dreamt well the night before.

People say that love is endless longing, heartache and madness, wild exhilaration pain like hell frozen over, cruel sleepless nights. I've never in all my life experienced such complicated and bitter-sweet emotions. But I am very grateful to her. Even though I never stood in front of her window night after night, waiting for her shadow to appear, she still brought me good fortune. Because of her I knew the delight and felt the brightness that emanate from an extra window, and was happy even with just her single initial by my side.

*

I suppose I should be going, but there is still so much unfinished business to be done. Why am I trying to sort it out now in this last minute? I had intended to catalogue all the books now shoved into the shelves at random, and to arrange them by period so that they will be easier for their next owner to refer to. And I haven't yet corrected the proofs of the article on Zhu Yuanzhang, the founder of the Ming dynasty,\fn{1368-1644.} and the Red Turban Army of peasant rebels.

All I managed to complete last night were two small tasks that were within my powers. I rubbed out the initial written on the side on the side of my table, and burned that sheet of brown wrapping paper—so brittle it went to pieces at the touch—and the piece of string. I didn't want those things I've treasured for so many years to be casually thrown away as rubbish when my effects are sorted out after I'm dead, and I wasn't prepared to let a stranger's hand rub that initial out.

As I watched the last spark fly away I thought of all these years, of how I kept them as treasures because she had breathed on them and touched them. It was as if I had been a thief all these years, a thief who had stolen what she had never given me, what had never belonged to me—a tiny fragment of her life. It was probably the most shameful thing I have ever done. If I could I'd kneel before here and beg her to forgive me. She is so good and sweet and generous that I'm sure she'd have forgiven me and said, "In a long life everyone does something wrong."

*

As I lift the net bag with my washing things in it my toothbrush slips out through a hole and when I lean over to pick it up I take another look around the room that has shared half a lifetime with me. My old table stands isolated in the middle of the room, there irrelevant and unconnected, like some obscure island I the Pacific that not even the most third-rate explorer would bother with. The springs of my folding bed gave out a long time ago, and it sags very low to the floor. The yellowing and blackened walls have an air of decrepitude, just like my dried-up face, as they lean feebly together around my jumble of furniture. Even the books on the shelves look sick and crippled, without even one fine leather volume with gold lettering to give the bookshelves a touch of distinction. All the large soft-cover books like on their sides, drooping out over the shelves like wilting foliate taken too long ago from a tree. Dusty cobwebs sway from the ceiling and the corners of the room.

The sight of this dispirited room fills me with regret, as if I have wasted its youth for nothing. It could have been as clean, bright and tidy as other rooms. And as I see this, a new nameless feeling begins to overwhelm me. I cannot give it a name, but from it I sense that my whole life from beginning to end has been lacking in something.

Lacking what? My eyes sweep the cluttered bookcases, across the books I've scrimped and saved for a lifetime to buy, or written with my own sweat and blood. I realize that I have all of these things to leave to a lot of people, but no one unique thing to leave to one special person. And this is the lack, this is what is missing.

I know that dong, from the personnel department of the institute, will finally sign in the space on the operation form where the next of kin's signature is needed. but if only there could be one beloved face, wrinkled like mine, sitting on the bench outside the operating theater, anxious for me, quietly sobbing for me. If only on my bedside table there could be good things to eat prepared by her own hand. My head, which has worked through mountains of waste paper like a mechanical recording machine, has at last shown its boundless creative genius in imagining the food. These delectable treats look, smell and taste delicious as I eat them from the aluminum canteen that's been scrubbed till it shines.

But, in fact, the time for these imaginings is finished. Soon my ashes will lie in their urn, which will be placed on an obscure shelf to gather dust for three years, until at last they are flung away. Nobody will want to keep them. And even less will anyone want to mingle her ashes with mine.

There is a soft noise at the window. The Grand Historian's ugly face is pressed against the glass, his expression one of concentration and bewilderment. His usual coldness and superiority have vanished. I look away at once, not wanting him to see the loneliness in my heart. We have seen many things together and he should not feel bereft as I leave him. He scratches at the pane with his front paws like someone knocking at a door.

Years ago I picked him up in the street and brought him home. There wasn't an uglier, lazier cat in the world. His short tail was like a piece of rag. His grayish, dull fur was so dirty that you couldn't tell his true color. He had been sitting in the middle of the road, not moving or making a sound, while the torrent of bicycle, lorry and car wheels flowed past him. He just sat there like a pile of rubbish that had been dumped on the road, as if he had stopped caring whether he lived or died. It would only have taken a small turn by a single wheel to squash him flat.

I gave him a bath in my foot-bowl and I'm inclined to think he failed to understand my good intentions and reckoned that I was trying to skin him alive. He drew blood where he clawed the back of my hand as he jumped on to my radio, which was playing at the time and felt warm to his paws. He stared at me with caution and silence. After several days of very close observation he acknowledged me as a friend, but even then, with a touch of condescension. Whenever I sat at my desk writing furiously he always looked at me with a certain superciliousness. His manner said: "What you're scribbling is all useless nonsense, old friend." When I read my articles aloud to myself, wagging my head, he lazily shut his eyes and purred rhythmically. And when I gazed with adoration at the letter written on the side of the table every night before going to sleep he sat by my pillow with his head on his front paws and stared at my face with a pitying, mocking stare. I am still covered from head to foot with little red flea bites, just as I was when he first came to me.

Every morning he used to stroke my thinning white hair with his paw, telling me to stop lying in bed gazing vacantly at the ceiling. Whenever I sat down to take a rest and shut my dim old eyes he'd spring on to my lap, or lick my hands with their protruding blue veins and slack, wrinkled skin, or grasp my wrists and nip my fingers, but very carefully so that he never hurt me.

It was because of him that I finally started paying some attention to feeding us properly and sometimes treated us with cold meat. I would spread it out on the greasy wrapping paper, and as he crouched on the other side of it facing me, we would take our time savoring the meat together. Sometimes my imagination would run free and I'd think that if we could both have had a drink, we would have clinked glasses and drunk to each other. Thank God for sending me an animal soul, so patient and understanding, never using its tongue to harass or harm me. I am praying that the next tenant will adopt the Grand Historian and that maybe even he will liven up a bit. I'm sure he can, and that someone will take him in, but I can't be certain.

I have been silently hoping that the next tenant will be someone full of life who will decorate this room like other rooms with sheer white curtains, a gleaming crystal fixture hanging from the ceiling, a woven table-cloth, a beautiful landscape painting on the wall and a vase of pale-yellow roses … a girl would be best. She'd be bound to have her boyfriend mend the window bolt so she could open it wide and allow the moonlight to come flooding in, the breeze to waft in the scent of locust blossom in May, and perhaps even strains of Schubert's Serenade. Then the room will have the joy and pleasure I was never able to bring to it.

What else is thee left? Oh, yes, so many longings I still feel, vividly, acutely, now that the time is used up. They have not faded but hang suspended in my heart.

I used to think that all my emotions belonged in the past, to history, but I know that I yearn for the future just like everyone else. Even as life draws to a close, I realize that I have never understood myself completely … If only …

But now it certainly is too late to do more, to be more, in this lifetime.

2

Finished.

The last bit of flame flickered and went out.

This was all that remained of his son. Sixty-five kilograms, one and four-fifths meters. A son of flesh and blood had become a thin thread of smoke, a handful of white ashes. Life won through thousands of years of evolution had been destroyed so easily it was scarcely believable.

After returning home from the crematorium, he instinctively wanted to recall his son's life—though it was an exaggeration to call twenty-seven years a lifetime. So short, so young! Yet it seemed as if he couldn't remember a thing. He had known too little about him. People say that it is harder for men to reveal themselves to each other than it is for women. Was this the only reason they had lived together like passersby in the street? But what kind of man had his son been? He had not even been in love; he had not enjoyed enough sunshine.

He looked at the things his son had left: a copy of Andersen's Fairy Tales, published before the Cultural Revolution; an old, broken iron pencil box; a one-inch portrait, "half-body, front-view, hatless"; an old book of abacus tables, its edges curling up.

The beautiful Andersen's Fairy Tales had been taboo in the family.\fn{Hans Christian Andersen (1805-1875), Danish author.} The son had known this very clearly. Why, then, had he stubbornly held onto the book?

When he was thrown off life's normal tracks, the son was just at the age when he was playing with toy guns, and certain that his father was a great hero. This "hero" hardly understood how he had come to be such a low, vile thing!

But such a father, who knew very well that he himself was the hammer that had shattered his own son's dream, and who understood that there was no escape from this arrangement of fate, he would surely feel a sensation so painful it would feel as if he were choking, or being burned in a fire. At the time, his son could still look at him angrily with a pair of round eyes filled with tears, and ask:

"Father, why won't my little friends play with me anymore?"

He could not answer. How could he explain? For some time, the anthill under the tree in the yard had been the lonely son's only entertainment. He would squat there for a long time, totally absorbed by the busy ants scurrying back and forth. Their animated, simple, fraternal life must have aroused envy and yearning in him. He had asked,

"Father, why is it that ants always play with one another, and never desert each other?"

"I don't know!"

"You are a grown-up, why don't you know?"

But how could the son know that there are many questions that not even adults can answer?

One day, another child came over, and with a few stomps flattened the kingdom of ants that had not been doing anyone any harm. He knew he could not blame the child. He also knew how lonely his little son was. But he did not dare give him another little brother or sister for company, because he knew he no longer had the power to protect another innocent little soul.

When the son grew a bit older, as if he understood his position somewhat, he avoided his father as if the man were a plague, as if he would spread a disease. Whoever caught this disease would be forgotten by life, would become a solitary being.

Innocent son, he did not realize he was already contaminated. The father could never forget the expression of yearning on his son's face when he looked at the red scarves\fn{A sign that they were Red Guards.} waving on other children's chests. It seemed like that of a person who had fallen into hell, and who, cherishing a devout wish to be reincarnated in a better life, looked hopefully toward heaven. Once he heard his son ask his wife:

"What crime has he committed?"

"Who?"

"Him!"

"Who is 'him?''"

"Him—father!" He felt his wife groping for the right words:

"Because he told an Andersen's fairy tale to a leader!"

If the emotions contained in speech could be weighed, there would be no scale that could measure the dignity she put in her voice, stung by the son's judgment of his father.

"Which one?"

"The Emperor's New Clothes."\fn{Implying criticism of the Party leadership, and probably of May himself.}

"That's ridiculous! Why doesn't anyone call Andersen a rightist? He told so many of those tales!"

If Andersen—who had used beautiful, sincere feelings all his life to exert a good influence on people—heard this sentence in heaven, no doubt he broke into a warm, moving smile. There is such a difference between real life and children's tales!

From the "half-body, front view, hatless" portrait, the son looked at him with a pitiful expression. If it hadn't been necessary for a work permit, the boy would never have had his picture taken. He could imagine his son's thinking. He must have felt that there was no moment in his life worth recording. He wished so much that his child could have been like other children—mischievous, noisy, throwing temper tantrums, fighting … But no, he always wore such a pitiful expression. What wrung his heart most was his son's face when it didn't wear this pitiful expression. When interacting with others, no matter whom, his son wore an anxious-to-please expression, like a dog wagging its tail, asking for pity. For the father, it was worse than if he had spit in his face. That sort of expression should have been buried with the old life!

In 1972, the son was assigned to a produce station to sell meat. Originally, his father had been a very open-minded person, and had never considered measuring a person's worth by his occupational position, high or low. Nor had he minded the differences among people in the social division of labor. But his common sense told him that he was the reason that his son was seIling meat. How could he not look upon the relationship between moral character and occupation as a natural pattern of cause and effect? Was he not a materialist?

From then on, the curled-edged, frayed old abacus tables and an old abacus became the sole substance of the son's life after work. He either sat at the little table that was both a dining table and a desk, moving his lips, silently reciting the abacus tables, or he noisily practiced on the old abacus. When, from the window upstairs, there floated the sound of a Schumann etude being played on a neighbor's violin, the son would sigh lightly, inaudibly, and rise to shut the windows of the house, not caring that it might be the hottest part of July.\fn{As the son of a rightist, he was forbidden such privileges as going to a music school.} His son's manipulation of the abacus had long been outstanding; for addition and subtraction, he was as fast and as accurate as a calculator. Yet as soon as he got off work, he continued to recite and to practice, as if the abacus had become a biological need like eating or sleeping, or a necessary outlet for his emotions.

The father also knew that the customers who did not know his son's background all liked him, and complimented him by calling him "Just One Chop."\fn{I.e., his precision was such that he could cut the exact weight of a meat order with just one chop.} Once, he had stealthily stood around the produce station, watching his son sell meat. He could see that the boy got satisfaction and enjoyment from the endless repetition of weighing the meat and calculating. A slight flush suffused his pale face, indicating excitement. At those times, he must have felt that there were many people who still wanted him, who had not deserted him.

But as soon as he left the meat counter, he would become a different person. At home or in the work unit, he avoided people. Except for reciting the tables and practicing on the abacus, squeezing into a corner was his only hobby. As long as nobody noticed him, he would sit in that corner for hours, staring blankly at the tips of his own shoes as if they were not his shoes, but the text of a volume of profound Hebrew scriptures that could solve the riddle of fate. He always tried his best to hunch himself up, as if his innocently fearless, excessively broad shoulders occupied a bit too much of boundless space, and thus might offend someone.

This son-who-was-like-a-stranger understood the difficulties of the family. The father could still remember his little son watching other children eating chocolate, only to turn away proudly. He had also seen this son who dreamed of being a hero press his nose tightly against the glass panes of shops filled with toy guns and cannons … yet he had not asked for anything. Even the old iron pencil box that was broken and worn at the edges had been bought only when the boy had started primary school. How could this son, who had once been so greedy, so eager to throw temper tantrums on the floor, and who would never get up until he got what he wanted, all of a sudden give up all demands? No one had given him a special warning. It was so strange!

In the last part of the Cultural Revolution, the father discovered the nobody-can-enter expression of his son's eyes gradually opening up toward him. Yet he had quickly pushed away this long-hoped-for understanding.
The night before the Tiananmen Incident,\fn{When there had occurred (1976) a spontaneous mass memorial for Zhou Enlai that was really a protest against the ultra-radicalism of the Gang of Four.} the son had said to him,

"Father, I want to go to Tian An Men!"

For the first time he detected in his son's eyes what could be called a passionate yearning. He knew that he should—why not?—have given his pitiful, cautious, timid son a bit of sympathy or a hint of support. It would have given the boy tremendous encouragement and strength; maybe it would even have gotten rid of his pitiful expression. But he did not. He was so nervous, he felt breathless.

"What for?" The son hesitated, wavering, and said,

"I wrote a poem …"\fn{Thousands of 0people wrote poems of protest and laid themat the foot of the Revolutionary Martyr's Memorial in Tiananmen Square.} It was as if he had been stung by a scorpion. Instantly, nervously he had yelled,

"No, you cannot go!" His expression of extreme apprehension immediately made his son lose courage:

"Will people die?"

"No, the terrible thing is not death …"

The light that had lit up his son's eyes a moment ago went out. He returned to his usual corner. No, it was he who had pushed the son back to that corner.

The son became ill. He was not sure whether it was because of his son's habit of not wanting to bother people or whether the boy had long hoped for something like this. Anyway, a common virus developed into a fatal urinary infection.

When, in a state of great agitation, he had brought the news of his total reinstatement to his son, the boy's gaze was unfocused. He could not have understood any sentence uttered to him. He was beyond happiness and sorrow.

He suddenly realized that even if his son had understood the news he had brought, the pitiful expression would not have disappeared from his face because it had already permeated his soul.

With remorse, he felt that his son would carry in him an unliberated soul when he died. Yet the day his soul flew to another world, a peaceful, relaxed expression returned to the boy's face—the same expression he had worn on the day he had been born. Apart from that, the face had an excited look, as if it were happily contemplating something.

The son had left him, carrying with him the emotions of a stranger. For more than twenty years there had been no love, no friendship or understanding, no heart-to-heart talks between father and son. It was as if the father had brought him life and had reared him without getting anything back—as if he had suddenly caught a handful of flowing water and then, right before his eyes, the water had leaked out through the cracks between his fingers.

He really could not even tell whether the boy had loved him. If he hadn't, it served him right. What right had he to demand his son's love! Even the name he had given his son had not been deliberated over, just casually picked! Jianshe\fn{Construction.} had been the most common name given to children born during the fiery era of the early years of national construction. At the time, as the chief editor of a journal, he had been too busy thinking of a name for his son would have taken him away from his work.

But perhaps the son had loved him after all. He remembered when the boy was four years old. One night, because of a meeting, he had returned home very late. He saw that on the chest of drawers beside the bed, there was a tray of peeled water chestnuts. Each water chestnut had a little bite taken out of it, as if a naughty, but not greedy, little mouse had taken a bite of each. His wife had said to him,

"Your son left these for you." Intrigued, he pointed to the little bite marks on the water chestnuts and laughingly asked,

"What are these supposed to be?"

"He took a bite out of every water chestnut to find the young ones to be left for you; the tough ones he ate himself."

He looked at the water chestnuts that looked as if they had been bitten by a little mouse and his heart was filled with the blessings and satisfaction of being a father. He had hardly slept that night. Several times he had sat up in bed, holding that tray of water chestnuts, smiling, imagining what his son, who at such a young age had demonstrated such delicate emotions, would become when he grew up. An honest worker? A great hero? A romantic poet? No matter what he imagined, there was always a rose-colored mist before his eyes. Maybe this was how every father felt about his son. He had imagined everything, but somehow he had never imagined this—his son nakedly leaving the world!

It had been a few days since he had received the notice of complete reinstatement. After the initial excitement, he had calmed down, and gradually he began to feel an inexplicable thing charging toward him, tightly enveloping him, entangling him, pressing him, gnawing at his heart to the point where he couldn't totally immerse himself in longing for his son. Yet he wanted so much to obtain a little bit of tenderness and solace from the heartbreak of remembering. What he felt was not the sorrow triggered by the death of his son diluting the liberation he had longed for, because this feeling was not the same as sorrow. It was more solemn than sorrow, more profound, heavier …

When had it begun? Maybe it had begun on the day he had stopped his son from going to Tian An Men. Maybe it had been even earlier; maybe it had long been hiding somewhere in the past and had now come to settle an old account with him.

Why was it that when he had heard about recovering his party membership, his spectrograph-like mind had shot out a range of emotions, including an empty, lost feeling? Strange, for twenty-two years\fn{Since the 1957 anti-Rightist Campaign.} he had never formally accepted in his heart the decision that had expelled him from the party. But ironically, during the process of his reinstatement, he had begun seriously to question his own worth. An empty, lost feeling …

He had lost something more precious than life! Twenty-two years of party standing could be compensated for, but what could compensate for having relinquished the sacred responsibility of being a Communist Party member? Certainly he could still remember the oath he had recited under the hammer and sickle flag. Yet for more than twenty years, because of his family, because he had not wanted to add yet more sorrowful colors to his son's apparently joyless childhood and youth, he had lived timidly, just staying alive. He had stood to one side of life, watching the slow flow of dirty water, not wanting to move a finger. He had not even done the most basic thing: communicate to his dearest beloved son belief in truth, confidence in life, and the spirit to sacrifice for one's life's work. What else could one say?

When someone dies, people often think with remorse about the wrongs they have done that person in the past. Yet where was the wrong he had done his son for which he should really feel remorseful?

He was full of remorse! He would always be full of remorse! Not because he had done something, but because he had done nothing.

Was he not responsible for the pitiful expression that had penetrated his son's soul?

No other sentence or punishment could make him suffer as much pain or reproach as this remorse!

180.60 Excerpt from Falling Leaves: "The True Story Of An Unwanted Chinese Daughter"\fn{by Adeline Yen Mah (1937-)} Tianjin, China (F) 13

At the age of three my grand aunt proclaimed her independence by categorically refusing to have her feet bound, resolutely tearing off the bandages as fast as they were applied. She was born in Shanghai (city by the sea) in 1886 during the Qing dynasty when China was ruled by the child emperor Kuang Hsu, who lived far away up north in the Forbidden City.\fn{In Peking} The pampered baby of the family, eight years younger than my grandfather, Ye Ye, Grand Aunt finally triumphed by rejecting all food and drink until her feet were, in her words, "rescued and set free."

Shanghai in the late nineteenth century was unlike any other city in China. It was one of five treaty ports opened up to Britain after the First Opium War in 1842. Gradually it burgeoned into a giant intermediary between China and the rest of the world. Strategically situated on the Huangpu River seventeen miles upstream from the mighty Yangtse, the city was linked by boat to the inner western provinces. At the other end to the east, the Pacific Ocean was only fifty miles away.

Britain, France and the United States of America staked out foreign settlements within the city. To this day, amidst the new high-rise buildings, Shanghai's architecture reflects the influence of the foreign traders. Some of the great mansions, formerly homes of diplomats and business magnates, possess the stately Edwardian grandeur of any fine house by the River Thames at Henley in England or the Gallic splendour of a villa in the Loire valley in France.

Extraterritoriality meant that within the foreign concessions, all subjects, be they foreign or Chinese, were governed by the laws of the foreigner and were exempt from the laws of China. Foreigners had their own municipal government, police force and troops. Each concession became an independent city within a city: little enclaves of foreign soil in treaty ports along China's coast line. China was governed not by written laws but by the rulings of magistrates appointed by the emperor and her citizens traditionally viewed these mandarins as demi-gods. For roughly one hundred years (between 1842 and 1941) Westerners were perceived throughout China as superior beings whose wishes transcended even those of their own mandarins. The white conquerors were treated with reverence, fear and awe by the average Chinese.

Legal cases were tried before a Chinese magistrate but presided over by a foreign consular assessor whose power was absolute and whose word was final. The local populace was further humiliated by being barred from ownership of, or even free access to, many of the most desirable sections within their own city. Discrimination, segregation and abuse coloured most inter-racial dealings, with Westerners viewing the Chinese as their vanquished inferiors.

All this was bitterly resented.

Immediately south of the French Concession in Shanghai, my great-grandfather owned a tea-house in the old walled Chinese city of Nantao. These Chinese quarters, or the Old Town, were packed with low, dense buildings, small bustling markets and wandering alleyways overhung by colourful shop signs. Business was successful in spite of fierce competition from mobile stoves on bamboo poles, road-side stands and modest one-room cafés. When Grand Aunt was seven years old, her father relocated his tea-house to a more fashionable site in the International Settlement, formed by the merging of the former British and American Concessions. He then moved his entire family into a house a few streets away, in a quiet residential neighbourhood within the French Concession.

The French laid out gardens, apartment blocks, office buildings and tree-lined avenues which were given the names of French dignitaries. These boulevards became thick with café strollers and imported motor cars intermingling with wheelbarrows, rickshaws and pedicabs. Shanghai began to be known as the Paris of the Orient, though Grand Aunt always claimed that Paris should be called the Shanghai of Europe.

Grand Aunt's older siblings received little formal education, but they did learn to read and write at a private teacher's home. The youngest of five children, Grand Aunt was an afterthought. When she came of school age my great-grandfather had prospered. He enrolled her at the fashionable and expensive McTyeire Christian Girls' School, run by American Methodist missionaries. She was the first child in the Yen family to be given a foreign education.

By that time, Shanghai had become the centre of China's trade and industry. Opportunities were limitless. Grand Aunt's eldest brother had established a successful business manufacturing spare metal parts for rickshaws, pedicabs, bicycles and some of the more modern household appliances. He was. to die young, probably from syphilis, for he succumbed to the three vices common to Chinese men at that time: opium, gambling and the brothels. Leisured women also gambled and took opium, but discreetly at home. Grand Aunt's second brother set up a thriving import-export tea business but he, too, became infected with venereal disease and was unable to sire children. Her sister had an arranged marriage and died from tuberculosis.

Her third brother, my grandfather Ye Ye, was softspoken and gentle. A devout Buddhist, he was tall and slender, with poetic leanings and gentle ways. He disliked the required Manchu male hairstyle of shaving the brow and braiding long hair into a single queue. Even as a young man, he kept his head clean shaven (the only permitted alternative, wore a round skull cap, and sprouted a neatly trimmed moustache. Determined not to follow his brothers down the slippery path, he proved to be far more able than either of them.

While at McTyeire, Grand Aunt developed a lifelong passion for riding. She became fluent in English, was baptized as a Christian and made many western friends through her church. One of these, a fellow member of the Anti-foot-binding League, gave her a job as a clerk in the savings department of the Bank of Shanghai. During the twenty years that she worked there she learned every aspect of the banking business and was made manager of her division.

*

Grand Aunt never married. In those days, daughters could still be legally sold or bartered. A wife was often treated as an indentured servant in her husband's household, especially to her mother-in-law. If she failed to bear a son, one or more concubines would be brought in. Remarriage for widowers was routine but considered unchaste for widows. Most men of means routinely visited brothels but a woman who was unfaithful to her husband could be punished by death.

I remember Grand Aunt as a tall, imposing figure, treated with great esteem by every member of our family. Even Ye Ye and Father deferred to her every wish, which was remarkable in a society where women were disdained. Out of respect, we children were instructed to call her Gong Gong, which meant Grand Uncle. It was common practice for high-achieving women within the clan to assume the male equivalent of their female titles.

At five feet seven inches she was only slightly shorter than Ye Ye. Erect, dignified, her feet unbound, she had a striking presence, in contrast to the obsequious demeanour befitting women of her time. Her black hair was cut short above her ears and combed backwards to reveal a smooth forehead above an oval face. Behind round, wire-rimmed, tinted glasses, her large eyes were penetrating. Always elegant, she favoured dark, monochrome, silk qipaos (Chinese dresses) with mandarin collars and butterfly buttons.

Her complexion was fair with a tiny sprinkle of freckles across her nose. Habitually she wore face cream, a dab of rouge and a touch of lipstick, while her ears were adorned with exquisite stud earrings of pearls and jade. She moved with ease and athletic grace, riding and playing tennis into her sixties. I have a photograph of her smiling and confident astride a large black stallion, dressed in a white blouse, dark tie and well cut jodhpurs.

In 1924 Grand Aunt founded her own bank, the Shanghai Women's Bank. It is impossible to overestimate the scale of her achievement. In a feudal society where the very idea of a woman being capable of simple everyday decisions, let alone important business negotiations, was scoffed at, Grand Aunt's courage was extraordinary.

The reputation she had gained was such that Grand Aunt was able to raise the financing for her bank without difficulty. Shares were issued and fully subscribed to. Her bank was staffed entirely by women and designed to meet their specific needs. In they came: spinster daughters, with their inheritance and nest eggs; first wives (called big wives), with their dowries and winnings from mah-jong; concubines (called little wives), with cash presents from their men; and professional and educated women, who were tired of being patronized at male-dominated establishments. Shanghai Women's Bank was profitable from the very beginning and remained so until Grand Aunt's resignation in 1953.

With her profits she built a six-storey bank building at 480 Nanking Road which, in the 1920s and 30s, was considered the most prestigious business address in China. Her bank was situated at the nerve centre of the International Concession, adjacent to major office blocks and department stores, less than a mile from the Bund (nicknamed Wall Street of Shanghai), the famous park-like riverfront promenade which, in those days, excluded Chinese ownership. Her staff lived in comfortable dormitories on the upper floors.

The best building materials were used. Lifts were installed and modern plumbing put in with flush toilets, central heating, and hot and cold running water. Grand Aunt lived in a spacious penthouse on the sixth floor with her friend Miss Guang whom she had met through church. There were rumours about their relationship. They shared a room and slept in the same bed. In China, intimate friendship between single women was sneered at but tolerated.

Miss Guang, born in 1903, had money of her own and was one of Grand Aunt's first investors. She became the bank's vice president. Later on, Grand Aunt adopted a daughter. (This was a common practice among childless women of means and required little formality.) They employed three maids, a chef and a chauffeur and entertained lavishly at home. Many a transaction was negotiated over a bowl of shark's fin soup during lunch at Grand Aunt's penthouse apartment.

*

At the age of twenty-six, Grand Aunt's third elder brother, my Ye Ye, entered into an arranged marriage through a mei-po (professional female marriage broker). My fifteen-year-old grandmother came from an eminently suitable Shanghai family. Theirs was a men dang hu dui (as the appropriate door fits the frame of the correct house) marriage.

Across the street from my great-grandfather's tea house, her father owned a small herbal store filled with desiccated leaves, roots, powdered rhinoceros horns, deer antlers, dried snakes' gall bladders and other exotic potions. The bride and the groom saw each other for the first time on their wedding day in 1903. On the eve of her wedding, Grandmother was summoned into her father's presence.

"Tomorrow you will belong to the Yen family," she was told. "From now on, this is no longer your home and you are. not to contact us without permission from your husband. Your duty will be to please him and your inlaws. Bear them many sons. Sublimate your own desires. Become the willing pisspot and spittoon of the Yens and we will be proud of you."

Next day, the trembling bride, bedecked in a red silk gown and her face covered with a red silk cloth, was borne into the home of her parents-in-law in a red and gold sedan chair painted with a phoenix and dragon, rented from a store specializing in weddings and funerals. The wedding procession was a colourful, noisy affair accompanied by red lanterns, banners, trumpet blowing and the clanging of gongs.. It was a point of honour for families to impoverish themselves for such occasions. However, in the case of my grandparents, friends and relatives gave many wedding presents including large cash gifts to defray the costs.

The young bride's fears were misplaced because Ye Ye proved to be loving and considerate. At her insistence, the young couple broke with tradition and moved out of the Yen family home into their own rented quarters in the French Concession.. Grandmother taught herself mathematics and used it to great advantage in her daily mah-jong games. I remember her as a quick-witted and strong-willed chain-smoker with bound feet, short hair and a razor-sharp tongue.

At the age of three, Grandmother's feet had been wrapped tightly with a long, narrow cloth bandage, forcing the four lateral toes under the soles so that only the big toe protruded. This bandage was tightened daily for a number of years, squeezing the toes painfully inwards and permanently arresting the foot's growth in order to achieve the tiny feet so prized by Chinese men. Women were in effect crippled and their inability to walk with ease was a symbol both of their subservience and of their family's wealth. Grandmother's feet caused her pain throughout her life. Later, she braved social ridicule rather than inflict this suffering on her own daughter..

My grandparents grew to love each other and had seven children in quick succession. Of those, only the first two survived. Aunt Baba was born in 1905 and my father two years later.

*

On 10 October 1911, when Aunt Baba was six years old, the Manchu Dynasty came to an end.. Dr Sun Yat Sen, the leader of the Chinese revolutionaries, returned from exile to Shanghai in triumph on Christmas Day the same year.. He was named President of the Republic of China. One of his first acts was to abolish the custom of foot-binding.

Ye Ye supported his family by buying and leasing out a small fleet of sampans (bum-boats) which plied the waters of Shanghai's busy Huangpu River. Goods were ferried in and out of China's interior and loaded on to giant ocean cargo steamers moored at the Bund. Ye Ye never gambled or wasted his money in brothels and opium dens. By the time he was forty, he had accumulated considerable wealth. He was approached by young K. C. Li, the dynamic proprietor of Hwa Chong Hong, a thriving import-export company, to manage their branch office in Tianjin, a port city one thousand miles north of Shanghai.

Ye Ye had a secret. He was prone to seasickness and hated to set foot on board one of his own sampans. So, though his business was profitable, he decided to sell and move up north, leaving his family behind as Aunt Baba and Father both attended local Catholic missionary schools which were considered the best in China and he did not wish to disrupt their education.

*

In 1918, when Ye Ye moved to Tianjin (Ford of Heaven), the last Qing emperor had been deposed and China had fragmented into fiefdoms governed by warlords. To the north, Japan already controlled Korea and now set her sights on China. At the Versailles Peace Conference held after the conclusion of the First World War, Japan was allowed by Britain and her allies to seize and keep Germany's colonial possessions in Shandong Province as a reward for having remained neutral. Emboldened, Japan began moving into Manchuria. Japanese soldiers then infiltrated south into Tianjin.

Situated in the level and fertile great plains to the north-east, Tianjin was the second largest of the treaty ports. It was opened up to trade after China's second defeat by Britain (and France) during the Second Opium War in 1858. The treaty of Tianjin added ten more ports between Manchuria and Taiwan. The city suffered from hot, dry summers and bitterly cold winters. It was prone to flooding because of its flat terrain criss-crossed by many branches of the Huai River. Between November and March, the rivers were icy and there were occasional dust storms. Whereas the architecture in Shanghai reflected mainly British and French influence, Tianjin adopted a bewildering kaleidoscope of building styles representing all the allied countries which had defeated Empress Tsu Hsi during the Boxer Rebellion in 1903. Besides Victorian office buildings and French churches, there were Russian dachas, a Prussian castle, Italian villas, Japanese tea-houses and German as well as Austro-Hungarian chalets, all situated in separate concessions adjoining each other along the river bank.

Ye Ye again chose to live in a rented house in the French Concession, a tongue-shaped enclave sandwiched between the Japanese to the north, the British to the south and the Russians across the river. The area was neatly laid out with tree-lined avenues, tidy tramways, an imposing Catholic church, missionary schools and cheerful green parks.

Meanwhile, business had never been so good. Both Tianjin and Shanghai were booming. British, American, European and Japanese money poured back into China at the conclusion of the First World War. Concrete and steel buildings replaced the Victorian structures along the river. Factories sprang up at industrial sites manufacturing wool and cotton textiles, carpets, glass, concrete, tiles, paper, soap, matches, toothpaste, flour and other foodstuffs. Under Ye Ye's management, Hwa Chong Hong prospered. To his delight, the traditional bonus paid to him at Chinese New Year greatly exceeded his annual salary.

To celebrate his prosperity, fellow employees and friends urged him to take a young concubine to "serve him." Even Ye Ye's boss, the London-educated K. C. Li, jokingly volunteered to "give" him a couple of girls with his bonus. Ye Ye reported all this in a matter-of-fact way in a letter to his wife, adding touchingly that he was a "one-woman man."

Soon after receiving this letter, Grandmother and fifteen-year-old Aunt Baba hurried to join Ye Ye in Tianjin, leaving my thirteen-year-old father in the care of Grand Aunt. Aunt Baba was told to drop out of school because advanced education was considered detrimental to the marriage prospects of young girls. Confucius had professed that "only ignorant women were virtuous."

*

Father remained in Shanghai and continued attending Chen Tien Catholic Boys' School. He excelled in English and Ye Ye advised him not to leave his excellent teacher, an Irish missionary. Father lived with Grand Aunt until graduation five years later. During this time, he converted to the Catholic faith and was given the name Joseph. He also developed a close relationship with my Grand Aunt, who became his mentor.

After completing middle school in 1924, Father chose not to go to university. He joined his family in Tianjin and was employed as an office boy under Ye Ye at Hwa Chong Hong. Although this was a menial post and the salary was minuscule, Father claimed in later life that it was the best possible education for a bright, inexperienced teenager. He learned all facets of the import-export business at first hand. Because of Father's fluency in English, K. C. Li soon relied on him to write and translate most of his firm's correspondence.

Father bought a second-hand typewriter and often typed important business letters after eating dinner at home, with his whole family clustered around the dining table in awed admiration. Once Ye Ye wondered aloud how the heads of these international companies would react if they found out that valuable documents worth hundreds of thousands of taels of silver were being banged out with one finger by an eighteen- year-old boy barely out of high school.

Hwa Chong Hong developed profitable relationships with various large pharmaceutical companies, including the German firm Bayer. Enormous quantities of the Chinese plant ma huang were purchased by Hwa Chong Hong and exported abroad. For many centuries, ma huang was used by Chinese herbal doctors to treat asthma and general malaise. Eventually, scientists working in the West identified and extracted the key component of the plant, ephedrine. This was then imported back into China in its purified form and sold to pharmacies prescribing Western medicine.

*

Meanwhile, outside the foreign concessions, the Japanese military presence in Tianjin deepened. Well-armed and ruthless, they were a law unto themselves and treated the Chinese with contempt. Hwa Chong Hong's prosperity did not escape the notice of the Japanese. Company headquarters were situated outside the French Concession and unprotected by French law. K. C. Li was being increasingly harassed to "collaborate." There were no formal demands, just vague threats hinting at the need for "protection against criminal elements." During a routine "visit" by Japanese inspectors, K. C.'s employees were randomly beaten for not showing sufficient respect to photos of the Japanese emperor in old newspapers, which were frugally being cut up and used as toilet paper.

K. C. realized that at any time the situation might explode. Rather than give in to Japanese coercion, K. C. decided to move out of Tianjin altogether. Father did not follow Hwa Chong Hong on its departure. Instead, at the age of nineteen, in 1926, he started his own firm, Joseph Yen & Company, within the French Concession in Tianjin. Ye Ye had such faith in Father's business acumen that he invested his total life savings, about 200,000 taels of silver (equivalent to over one million US dollars in today's currency), in his son's company. Ye Ye resigned from Hwa Chong Hong and became the new firm's chief financial officer.

No formal contracts were drawn up between father and son. It remained unclear whether the money was a gift or a loan. However, Ye Ye had authority to sign all company cheques and extracted an oral promise from Father that he would look after everyone in the family and pay all expenses, including Aunt Baba's dowry should she marry. At this time, my aunt had left Tianjin and was living in Shanghai. Grand Aunt's recently opened Women's Bank was flourishing. Reliable assistants were urgently needed and Aunt Baba had been dispatched to work at the bank.

Father's company prospered from the start, picking up much of the business left behind by the departure of Hwa Chong Hong. Ma huang continued to be exported, as did walnut kernels, straw hats, candle wax, pig bristles and dried fruits; imports included bicycles and pharmaceutical products. In the state of political unrest and increasingly ominous Japanese presence, many businesses came on the market very cheaply and Father expanded rapidly by buying up their assets. He soon acquired a lumber mill, a carpet-weaving concern and a bicycle spare parts assembly plant. Father retained the loyalty of key personnel by giving them incentive stock in his newly acquired companies.

Grand Aunt and her bank played a crucial role in Father's early success and rapid growth. She had connections in Tianjin, including the manager of the local branch of the Bank of Shanghai. With her help Joseph Yen & Company was able to issue letters of credit for up to half a million U.S. dollars guaranteed by Grand Aunt's Women's Bank. Their arrangement was for net profits after expenses to be split 70/30 in Father's favour. Hundreds of thousands of taels of silver changed hands with each transaction. Every deal was profitable. In three years, they never had a loss. Father began to be known in business circles as the "miracle boy" who had the power of dian tie cheng jin (converting iron into gold).

Marriage brokers swarmed around the young business tycoon. But, with that same bit of swagger that gave him an edge in business, he declared that all Tianjin girls were dreary and provincial. He preferred the sparkle and sophistication of the young women in Shanghai.

*

Shanghai in the late 1920s was an exhilarating city for a young girl such as Aunt Baba. While the rest of China still travelled by push carts, sedan chairs and horse-drawn carriages, in Shanghai shining imported motor cars were speeding down well paved roads alongside trams and buses. Giant, colourful billboards advertising British cigarettes, Hollywood movies and French cosmetics gazed down at crowded pavements teeming with young men in suits and ties and girls clacking around in high-heeled shoes and stylish qipaos. The Bund, close to the Women's Bank on Nanking Road, had been transformed into a panorama of majestic buildings sweeping along the Huangpu River. Gunboats, steamers, sampans and tugboats festooned the muddy waters. Multi-storeyed department stores, such as Sincere, Wing-On, Dai-Sun and Sun-Sun, were crammed full of furs, jewelry, toys, household goods, ornaments and the latest Parisian fashions. Large enough to rival Selfridges of London or Macy's of New York, these emporiums promoted seasonal sales, gave away coupons and prizes, and even held concerts and theatrical performances on their roof gardens.

Aunt Baba had become friendly with a girl a year younger than herself, who worked in the new accounts department. Miss Ren Yong-ping could render complicated currency conversions in her head with astonishing speed and accuracy. Even when Grand Aunt checked her calculations with the abacus they were never wrong. Glowing with high spirits and vitality she had a ready smile and warm liveliness which made her attractive.

Miss Ren came from a middle-class Shanghai family which struggled somewhat after her father, a post office official, became addicted to opium and spent the last twenty years of his life in a drug-induced haze. An only daughter, she had three younger brothers, two of whom also worked in the post office, both rising later to become inspectors. She herself was soon promoted by Grand Aunt to head the new accounts department.

Working downstairs in the bank and spending their leisure hours upstairs in the dormitory, the two girls soon became best friends. Aunt Baba remembered one occasion when she and Miss Ren lunched by themselves in the restaurant at Sincere's, nicknamed "Shanghai's Harrods" because of its physical resemblance to the famous London store. The two girls hired rickshaws which pulled them along the busy Nanking Road, where traffic lights were controlled manually by red-turbaned Sikh policemen stationed in cage-like boxes perched on poles twelve feet above ground. The restaurant was elegant, with white tablecloths, fresh flowers and crystal glasses. The menus listed only Western food items with which they were unfamiliar. Chinese food was unavailable.

A little intimidated by the tuxedoed waiter, they hesitantly asked whether there was a "daily lunch special." Informed that it was re gou (dog meat, served hot), Aunt Baba was only slightly nonplussed. She had heard that in some provinces dog was considered a delicacy; but Miss Ren was much more dubious, remembering her family's pet Pekinese at home. She promptly remarked that "today's special" usually meant "yesterday's leftovers."

The waiter became impatient. He was one of those Chinese who had adopted the haughtiness of the foreigners and preferred to serve the wealthy whites from the concessions. On this occasion the two girls were the only Chinese in the restaurant. They began to feel like gauche simpletons and, as much to be free of the arrogant waiter as anything else, they both ordered the dog dish. Aunt Baba was pleasantly surprised by the sausage that arrived wrapped in a bun and ate it with relish. Miss Ren, however, could not stop thinking about the little family pet and gave up after one bite. They laughed heartily when they eventually learned from Grand Aunt that re gou "hot dog meat" was, in fact, the classic American hot dog.

*

On one of Father's frequent visits to Shanghai to discuss business at the Women's Bank, he was introduced to Miss Ren. Xiao qiao ling long (petite, vivacious and interesting) was Father's verdict. They began to correspond. Five months later, they were married. An enormous banquet was held at the Xin Ya (New Asia) restaurant in the International Concession just off Nanking Road. Besides immediate relatives, most of the guests were business associates of Grand Aunt's and Father's. It was 1930.

Father took his bride to Tianjin and bought a large house at 40 Shandong Road, conveniently located in the town centre of the French Concession and very near a public park. Across the street was St. Louis Catholic Boys' School.

Their marriage was happy and they had four children in as many years. The young couple were ru ring sui xing (inseparable as each other's shadows).

First came a daughter. The baby was large and Dr. Mary Mei-ing Ting, an obstetrician, applied forceps during the difficult delivery. Force had to be exerted and the baby (my eldest sister Jun-pei) was born with a partially paralysed left arm. Then came three sons (Zi-jie, Zi-lin and Zi-jun). There was a gap of three years before I (Jun-ling) came along.

The family house was spacious, with two storeys and a large attic where the servants slept. With its rounded bow windows, balconies, charming porch and pretty garden, the house was considered ultra-modern because of its flush toilets, running water and central heating. The latter constituted the height of luxury: most Chinese homes were still being heated by raised brick sleeping benches called kangs.

Father converted the ground floor of his house into offices for some of his staff. The rest of the family lived with Ye Ye and Grandmother on the second floor. There were seven servants to take care of the household. Father bought a large black Buick for himself and a black rickshaw for Grandmother to visit friends and play mah-jong.

Aunt Baba often took the train from Shanghai to Tianjin, a two-day journey in those days, and stayed for long visits. Father and Mother would meet her at the station in the Buick and the three would spend hours catching up on Shanghai gossip and Grand Aunt's latest business triumphs. There were outings to restaurants, films and the Chinese opera. According to Aunt Baba, it was an idyllic time for them all.

Mother's obstetrician, Dr. Ting, was almost a member of the family by the time my three brothers were born. Like Grand Aunt, who was her classmate and childhood friend, she too had been educated at Shanghai's McTyeire School for Girls. She converted to Christianity and at the age of fifteen had spurned an arranged marriage. The intended bridegroom came from a wealthy family but was sickly, in pain and already addicted to opium. On her wedding day, the bride simply vanished. Her parents were sued and forced to pay the bridegroom's family a great many taels of silver in compensation for breach of promise, besides enduring considerable loss of face. With the help of her uncle, Mary escaped to Hong Kong where she continued her studies at another missionary school.

Mary's uncle followed her to Hong Kong, cut off his queue (pigtail) and sent it to their family in Shanghai in a gesture of defiance. This was a serious crime and amounted to a public declaration of rebellion against the Qing emperor. (After the Manchus conquered China in 1644, they had imposed the partly shaven head and queue on every Chinese man to state their dominance.) Mary and her uncle were both disowned. He went to work in Hong Kong to pay for Mary's education. Later Mary won a scholarship to the University of Michigan Medical School and specialized in obstetrics and gynaecology. Returning to China, she settled in Tianjin rather than Shanghai where painful memories haunted her. She founded her Women's Hospital and became the best obstetrician in town. My sister and three older brothers were all delivered at Dr. Ting's hospital.

*

When my mother became pregnant with me, the political situation in China had deteriorated drastically. In 1928 the Manchurian warlord, Chang Tso-lin, had been murdered by the Japanese while riding in his private railway coach. Over the next few years, Japanese soldiers invaded Manchuria. A puppet regime (Manchukuo or Nation of Manchu) was established under the former boy emperor Puyi in 1932.

The United States refused to become directly involved. Britain looked the other way and recommended compromise. The League of Nations promised to investigate. Chiang Kai-shek, commander in chief of the army and head of the Nationalist party (Kuomintang), was fully occupied fighting the Communists, who had formed their own army and government in the rural strongholds of Yanan in the northwest.

Emboldened, Japan proceeded to launch a full scale attack on Tianjin and Peking in July 1937. This was the beginning of the Sino-Japanese war which was to rage on for eight long years. Japanese soldiers were everywhere, wearing surgical masks and carrying bayonets, demanding bows and obeisances, taking bribes and threatening violence. The foreign concessions remained neutral, small havens of uneasy independence amidst a vast sea of Japanese terror. The rest of Tianjin was now occupied territory under Japanese rule. In the evenings there were black-outs and curfews. Special permits were needed to cross key points at night, especially those conduit streets and bridges leading from the concessions into Japanese-patrolled areas.

My mother's labour pains started at four in the morning on 30 November 1937. Father did not possess the papers required to drive her past Japanese sentries on the way to the Women's Hospital. However, Dr. Ting had been issued with a pass allowing her to travel freely at night. Her chauffeur-driven black Ford, flying a small US flag given to her by the American consulate, arrived at my parents' home an hour later. My birth was uneventful.

Dr. Ting advised Father to transfer mother and baby to her hospital for a check-up and a few days' rest.

Father demurred. The birth had been so smooth and rapid. He considered it unnecessary. He also rejected Dr. Ting's advice to employ a nurse to care for my mother. He thought he could look after her himself, with the able assistance of Aunt Baba, who happened to be visiting at the time. Besides, trained nurses were expensive. A special bell was placed by mother's bedside so that she could call for Father as needed. Mother was weak, so instead of using the bathroom down the hall, it was easier to slip a bedpan under her. Afterwards Father would wipe her with a towel held in his bare, unwashed hands. Mother thought Father knew best. Father was convinced he knew best.

The headaches and fever started three days after I was born. Mother's temperature soared to 103 degrees and stayed there. Her lips were cracked and blistered. Her mind became cloudy and she was incoherent. Dr. Ting diagnosed puerperal fever. In those days before penicillin this was virtually a death sentence.

Dr. Ting immediately admitted my mother to the Women's Hospital. She was given fluids intravenously and various medications were administered in a desperate attempt to save her life. Her temperature rose to 106 degrees. She became delirious, refused all food and drink, and tried to pull out all her tubes, making wild accusations that Dr. Ting was trying to imprison and poison her. Dr. Ting realized that the prognosis was hopeless and finally gave permission for her to go home to die.

Her condition worsened. Doctor after doctor was consulted but to no avail. A dark cloud hung over the entire family.

Towards the end there was a short period of lucidity. With Father weeping at her side, she spoke to her parents-in-law and saw her children one by one, calling out each name with yearning. When Aunt Baba came in to say goodbye, Mother was weak but clear-headed. She smiled at my aunt and asked for a hot dog. Then she added sadly,

"I've run out of time. After I'm gone, please help look after our little friend here who will never know her mother."

My mother died two weeks after my birth, with five doctors at her bedside. She was only thirty years old and I have no idea what she looked like. I have never seen her photograph.

*

After my mother's death, Grandmother and Father persuaded Aunt Baba to resign her job at the Women's Bank and stay on in Tianjin to take charge of the household. She was put on the payroll of Joseph Yen & Company at the same salary that she had been paid by Grand Aunt. She nagged and harried the servants and ensured that the house ran along similar lines as before. She became our surrogate mother, worrying about our meals, clothing, schooling and health. An invisible silken handcuff was thus slipped around her willing wrists, evaporating her chances of marriage and a family of her own. In those days, women in China were expected to sublimate their own desires to the common good of the family. In return, the men felt honour-bound to protect and support them for the rest of their lives.

Marriage brokers again clustered around, not for Aunt Baba, but for her newly widowed brother. The double standard accorded men and women determined that single girls not married off by the age of thirty often remained single for life, whereas a man was expected to take at least one wife, regardless of his age. Father had just turned thirty and headed his own company, with properties, investments and many thriving businesses. He had worked hard to achieve all this, putting business affairs and family welfare before personal gratification.

Now he decided to please himself. Cruising with his sons around the neighbourhood in his impressive Buick on a Sunday afternoon, he spotted his secretary, Miss Wong, standing by the door of a modest apartment complex conversing with a girlfriend. He immediately noticed that the friend was very young and possessed a xiu se ke can (surpassing loveliness good enough to feast upon).

Jeanne Virginie Prosperi was the seventeen-year-old daughter of a French father and a Chinese mother. Her features were an exquisite combination of Chinese delicacy and French sensuality. Her face was oval, with a white, porcelain-like complexion. She had lustrous, large, round, dark eyes, fringed by long lashes. Her head was crowned with thick, silky, jet-black hair. That day, her slender frame was dressed in a simple white blouse with a scooped-out square neckline and a royal-blue cotton skirt tied with a bow at the waist. Later on Father was to discover that Jeanne was a skilled seamstress and made all her own clothes.

Next day at work, Father made discreet enquiries and found out from Miss Wong that Jeanne was her classmate and had just started work as a typist at the French consulate. At lunchtime he drove over to the consulate on the pretext of applying for additional import-export licences from France, found her there and made her acquaintance.

Jeanne's father had been a soldier in the French army and was involved in the building of railways in China. He married a woman from Shandong Province. They had five children and times were hard. He left the army and found a job working as a security guard for a firm in the French Concession in Tianjin. He died suddenly in 1936, reputedly trying to break up a bar-room brawl.

His widow coped as best she could. She had a small widow's pension. She and her spinster sister, Lao Lao, took in sewing to make ends meet. Being French citizens, all five children were given special scholarships by missionary schools within the French Concession. Both Jeanne and her older sister, Reine, graduated from St. Joseph's Catholic School for Girls, run by the Franciscan sisters.

Although Jeanne was not someone with an impressive social pedigree, she did graduate from the most exclusive convent school in Tianjin and, along the way, had acquired many of the social graces. Besides Mandarin, she spoke fluent French and English. Father was enchanted by her beauty and style. The fact that she was half European made her something of a trophy, to be prized, cherished and put on display.

During the 1930s, in the treaty ports such as Tianjin and Shanghai, everything Western was considered superior to anything Chinese. A young, beautiful and educated European wife was the ultimate status symbol. Jeanne Prosperi, therefore, possessed considerable allure. She was always perfectly groomed and remained so all her life. Still in her teens, she displayed all the beguiling modesty instilled at the convent. In addition, there was a gleam in her eyes that suggested that she was a little more exciting than an ordinary girl barely out of school.

Father began to desire Jeanne with a desperation in which sexual longing mingled with social aspirations. A decorous courtship began. Father would pick her up from the French consulate every day and drive her home, sparing her the unpleasant crush of Tianjin public transport. They went for meals at exclusive hotel restaurants, danced at the country club and went to the movies. Tianjin boasted three cinemas, the Gaiety, Empire and Capitol, which showed romantic Hollywood films. He gave her at first flowers and chocolates; then pearls, jade and diamonds.

The trinkets became increasingly expensive. Jeanne must have had a fairly clear idea as to where things were leading when she expressed a desire for a Russian sable coat costing four thousand taels of silver. Though Ye Ye voiced his objection in front of Jeanne and called it "senseless extravagance," Father went ahead with the purchase and had the coat delivered three days later. That Father should have behaved in such an unfilial way was a clear indication of his passion for Jeanne. Things started out as they were destined to continue, with Jeanne stating her terms and Father agreeing to meet them. As the Chinese saying goes: to Father, even Jeanne's farts were fragrant.

Father also made himself agreeable to her family. Jeanne's home was only a mile from Shandong Road. Mindful that her exquisite daughter was poised to enter a world far more luxurious than any she could ever provide, Mrs. Prosperi encouraged the courtship. Father suspected that Mrs. Prosperi came from peasant stock. In her rented, cramped apartment, conversation was limited to the basic to and fro of daily life. Her Mandarin was coloured by a heavy Shandong accent and her spoken French was very elementary. She could read or write neither language. Her eldest son had been in trouble with the police and had been sent away to labour camp in Hanoi.\fn{Then under French control and in a large territory known as French Indochina} Her older daughter, Reine, had just married a sensible and educated Frenchman who worked for the United Nations. There were also two younger sons. Eventually, Father was to give the older boy, Pierre, a job in his company and send the youngest son, Jacques, to school in France.

*

When they became engaged there were diamond earrings, a diamond bracelet and necklace as well as a spectacular ring. In the face of tradition, Jeanne brought no dowry. The wedding ceremony took place at Notre-Dame des Victoires Catholic church. Father appeared nervous in his well cut tuxedo. Jeanne looked spectacular in a figure-hugging white satin dress trimmed with lace, resplendent in all her jewelery.

None of us children attended. The Prosperi clan brought many guests, including a good many children. Aunt Baba said that she, Ye Ye and Grandmother felt somewhat uncomfortable at the lavish reception paid for by Father at the grand Astor House Hotel. Ye Ye found himself one of the very few male guests dressed in a long Chinese gown, matching satin ma-gua (short jacket), skull cap and cloth shoes. All the other men were in Western suits and ties. The French guests called for endless toasts but the Chinese party were simply not used to drinking so much. My aunt believed that she may have embarrassed Jeanne and her family because she had to retire to vomit more than once.

Afterwards Jeanne complained to Father that some of his Chinese kinsmen at the wedding banquet offended her delicate French relatives by being too loud and strident. However, her expression was sweet and demure when she said this. Father was utterly in her thrall, so much so that he began to adopt ambiguous notions about his own race. Growing up in the treaty ports, observing daily the symbols of Western might, living within a foreign concession in his native country, ruled by extraterritoriality, he, like many Chinese, had come to see Westerners as taller, cleverer, stronger and better. Although Jeanne was fluent in three languages, she could not read or write Chinese and was proud of this because it proclaimed, yet again, her Western heritage.

Jeanne's taste reflected her mixed origins. She invariably wore Western clothes and she wore them well. She liked to be surrounded by French furniture, red velvet curtains and richly textured wallpaper. At the same time, she collected antique Chinese porcelain, paintings and chairs. She liked plants and flowers to scent the hallway, living room and her own bedroom. Like Grandmother, she smoked incessantly.

*

I think Jeanne was happy at first. Ye Ye and Grandmother welcomed the idea of Father's remarriage as it was not right for a young man to be without a wife. Aunt Baba, moreover, was partially released from her housekeeping obligations and might, in theory, have picked up the threads of her own life. Quite how my sister and brothers reacted to the marriage I cannot really say as I was only an infant when it took place. But a Chinese saying goes, if you are to have but one parent, choose your beggar-woman mother rather than your emperor father.

Father bought the house next door on Shandong Road as a present for his bride and the newlyweds moved in by themselves. The rest of the family and the servants remained in the old house, where Father still kept his offices. The family ate dinner together every evening. Father and Ye Ye continued to work downstairs side by side and business thrived. Since my elder sister and brothers still spoke frequently of our own dead mother, whom they called Mama, Grandmother told us children to call Jeanne Niang, another term for mother.

We, in turn, were given new European names by Niang. Overnight, my sister Jun-pei became Lydia, my three brothers Zi-jie, Zi-lin and Zi-jun were named Gregory, Edgar and James, and I, Jun-ling, was called Adeline.

*

Japanese troops, which already occupied Tianjin and Peking, were now moving steadily southwards. They met surprisingly strong resistance in Nanking and, in retaliation, went on a terrifying spree of rape, looting and murder. Over 300,000 civilians and prisoners of war were tortured and killed during the Rape of Nanking in 1937 and early 1938 after the city was captured by the Japanese. Shanghai fell and Chiang Kai-shek fled westwards across China, up the Yangtse River, deep into the mountainous province of Sichuan. There he set up his wartime government in the town of Chungking. It's not hard to imagine the tension and turmoil that these momentous political upheavals must have imposed on Chinese family life.

In 1939, suddenly and without warning, Tianjin was drowned in a great flood. The disaster was of staggering proportions. Ye Ye called it "China's sorrow" and went to the Buddhist temple to burn incense and offer prayers for relief. Pro-Japanese newspapers printed in Tianjin blamed the catastrophe on Chiang Kai-shek while the Nationalist party (Kuomintang) press in Chungking accused the Japanese. Dykes on the Yellow River had been deliberately dynamited and river water released to slow the advance of troops. The flood encompassed three provinces. All crops in its path were destroyed. Two million people became homeless. Hundreds of thousands died from starvation and disease. Schools were closed. Businesses came to a standstill.

However, Father's lumber company kicked into high gear. The price of rowing boats soared from one hundred to eight hundred yuan. Oars were extra.

The flood caused Father to construct a high wooden platform connecting his two houses. Crossings were slippery and hazardous, particularly for Grandmother tottering on her small bound feet. Niang had just given birth to our half-brother, Franklin, and was still recuperating. Father virtually had to carry her across to the "old house" every evening so that the family could eat dinner together.

Niang had little sympathy for all the difficulties the servants faced. Cook was expected to reach the market every morning, and return home laden with groceries, on a flimsy raft nailed together with planks. When Ye Ye pointed out the dangers inherent in these shopping expeditions, Niang simply replied that Cook was a good swimmer and she did not see fit to arrange for a rowing boat to be put at his disposal. When the waters finally subsided after forty days, Grandmother ordered that a solid and covered room be constructed linking the two houses. Lydia nicknamed it "the bridge" and we used to play hide-and-seek there.

*

The youngest child of our generation, our half-sister Susan, was born in November 1941. Two weeks later, on 7 December, across the Pacific in Pearl Harbor, Japanese bombers attacked the American fleet. Japan was suddenly ip league with Germany and at war with America and her European allies. At that precise moment (8 December in China), Japanese soldiers in armoured vehicles were ordered to roll over flimsy barbed wire barricades and take over the foreign concessions of Chinese treaty ports. Simultaneously, Japanese marines invaded Malaya and bombed Singapore.

In one day, the Sino-Japanese conflict had merged with the war in Europe, expanded into Malaya, involved America and turned into the Second World War.

In Shanghai and Tianjin, British and American settlers, formerly almighty and invincible, were herded into Japanese concentration camps. The French Concessions were transformed overnight into malleable puppets at the mercy of the Japanese. All trading, especially that between China and the West, was being closely monitored by the new masters. The Vichy French law court presiding over Father's business affairs now found itself headed by a freshly appointed judge from the New Order in East Asia, a puppet government led by the traitor Wang Jhing-wei during the Japanese occupation.

The few American businessmen in Tianjin hurried to escape with their families and what they could salvage of their possessions. A robust eighteen-year-old peasant girl now came to us, introduced by one of Father's interned American colleagues. She applied to be a wet nurse for Susan and demanded three times the going wage, stressing that she had come from the employ of an American couple and was accustomed to the "highest standards." Her goal was to save up 500 yuan by the time Susan was weaned, buy an ox, return to her village and raise her own baby at the side of her husband.

It caused the most dreadful commotion. Niang was determined to hire this girl. No one else would do. She seemed to think that only a woman who had suckled a white American baby was good enough for her own daughter. Father acceded to her wishes, even though the new maid's thirty-yuan monthly salary infuriated all the other servants. Her wages were supposed to be secret but the entire household staff soon discovered the discrepancy. Franklin's maid demanded parity for herself and everyone else. Accusing Niang to her face of unfair discrimination, the spirited maid simply packed her belongings and left.

Aunt Baba was now entrusted with the additional care of two-year-old Franklin. She took on the task with reluctance but Grandmother pointed out that Franklin was as much a nephew to her as all the rest of us. So Franklin joined me and Aunt Baba in our bedroom. She used to buy us dragons' eyes to snack on. This was a summer fruit rather like lychees, said to make children's eyes grow large and bright.

Aunt Baba was unsparingly kind to both of us and started teaching us elementary Chinese characters. Lydia was attending St. Joseph's, from which school Niang had graduated in 1937. I was also enrolled there in kindergarten in the summer of 1941.

*

My own memories of Tianjin are nebulous. Early photographs show a solemn little girl with clenched fists, pressed lips and serious eyes, dressed in pretty western frocks decorated with ribbons and bows. I enjoyed school and looked forward to going there. Lydia and I were pulled there and back daily in Grandmother's black, shiny rickshaw. It had a brass lamp on each side and a bell operable by foot. When I revisited Tianjin in I987, I was surprised to find that it took only seven minutes to walk from our house to St. Joseph's.

I remember Lydia as an imposing, rather intimidating figure. Between us there were three brothers and a gap of six and a half years. We were a world apart.

Lydia liked to exercise her authority and flex her muscles by quizzing me on my homework, especially catechism. Her favourite question was,

"Who made you?" To this, I always knew the answer. Like a parrot I would trot out the well worn phrase,

"God made me." Then came the twister. A gleam came into her eyes.

"Why did God make you?"

I never could answer because teacher never taught us beyond the first question. Lydia would then give me a resounding slap with her powerful right hand, and call me stupid. During our daily rickshaw rides, she liked to keep me waiting and was invariably late. On the rare occasions when I was delayed in class she simply rode the rickshaw home alone but would send the puller back to get me.

She tended to be stocky, even as a child. Her physical deformity gave her a characteristic posture, with her semi-paralysed left arm hanging limply by her side and her face perpetually tilted slightly forwards and to the left. From my four-year-old perspective, she was a fearsome figure of authority.

My eldest brother Gregory had a sunny personality and the infectious ability to turn ordinary occasions into merry parties. His joie de vivre\fn{Love of life} endeared him to many people. Being the eldest son in China meant that he was the favourite of Father as well as of our grandparents. I remember him, full of mischief, gazing with rapt fascination at a long, black hair blowing in and out of the right nostril of snoring Ye Ye one hot afternoon. Finally Gregory could no longer resist the temptation. Skilfully, he pinched the hair ever so tightly between his thumb and index finger during the next exhalation.

There was a tantalizing pause. Ye Ye finally inhaled while Gregory doggedly hung on. The hair was wrenched from its root and Ye Ye awoke with a yell. Gregory was chased by Ye Ye brandishing a feather duster but managed, as usual, to escape.

On the whole, Gregory ignored James and me because we were too young to be interesting playmates. He was always surrounded by friends his own age. He did not enjoy studying but, like Grandmother, excelled in games of chance such as bridge. Good with numbers, he occasionally taught us younger ones neat mathematical tricks, roaring with laughter at his own cleverness.

Of all my siblings, it was Edgar I feared the most. He bullied James and me and used us as punchbags to vent his frustration. He ordered us around to perform his errands and grabbed our share of toys, candies, nuts, watermelon seeds and salted plums. He did not distinguish himself at school and was deeply insecure, though he possessed enough fortitude to maintain a passing grade.

My san ge (third elder brother) James was my hero and only friend. We used to play together for hours and developed a telepathic closeness, confiding to one another all our dreams and fears. With him, I could discard my vigilance and I needed that haven desperately. Throughout our childhood, it was immensely comforting to know that I could always turn to him for solace and understanding.

We were both Edgar's victims, though perhaps James suffered more because for many years he shared a room with our two eldest brothers. He hated to make waves. When pushed around, he endured the blows passively or hid from his tormentor. Seeing me being beaten by Edgar he would skulk quickly away in blinkered silence. Afterwards, when Edgar was gone, he would creep back and try to console me, often muttering his favorite phrase

"Suan le!" (Let it be!)

Of Niang's two children, she openly favoured Franklin. In physical appearance he was the spitting image of Niang: a handsome boy with round eyes and a pert upturned nose. Susan at this stage was still a baby. But they were already special. I don't recall either Edgar or Lydia ever laying a finger on them. James and I were the ones singled out to do everyone's bidding. If we were not fast enough there was often a slap or a shove, especially from Edgar.

I always felt more comfortable with my friends at school than at home, where I was considered inferior and insignificant, partly because of the bad luck I had brought about by causing the death of my mother. I remember watching my older sister and brothers playing tag or skipping rope and longing to be included in their games. Although James and I were very close, he went along with the others and became "one of the boys" when they wished to preclude me.

At St. Joseph's, marks were added together every Friday and the girl with the highest total received a silver medal which she could wear pinned on her breast pocket for the entire week. Father immediately noticed when I wore the medal. Those were the only times when he showed pride in me. Father would say teasingly,

"Something is so shiny on your dress. It's blinding me! Now what could it be?" or

"Isn't the left side of your chest heavier? Are you tilting?"

I lapped up his words. Soon I was wearing the medal almost continuously. At prizegiving at the end of 1941 my name was mentioned for winning the scholarship medal for more weeks than any other student in the school. I remember my pride and triumph as I climbed up the steps, which were so high and steep that I had to go up on my hands and knees, to receive my award from the French monseigneur. There was warm applause and delighted laughter from the audience, but no one attended from my family, not even Father.

*

At the beginning of 1942 the Japanese were taking uncomfortably closer looks at Father's books, insisting on an exhaustive audit and finally demanding that his businesses be merged with a Japanese company. Father could remain nominally in charge but profits would be split 50/50 This "offer" was, in fact, an order. Refusal would have resulted in confiscation of assets, probable jail for Father and unthinkable retaliation against the rest of the family. Acceptance meant open collaboration with the enemy, immediate loss of independence and possible reprisal from the underground resistance fighters.

After many sleepless nights, made worse by elaborate luncheons during the day when the Japanese alternately cajoled and threatened, Father took a radical step. One cold day, he took a letter to the post office and never returned home.

Ye Ye carried on with this life-and-death charade for a few months. Those were chaotic days. Kidnappings, murders and disappearances were everyday events. He immediately went to the local police and reported his son missing. He placed advertisements in the newspapers offering a reward for knowledge of Father's whereabouts, alive or dead. It was a dramatic ruse and the price was high but ultimately it had the desired effect.

Without Father at the helm, Joseph Yen & Company floundered. Many of the staff were laid off. Business dwindled. Profits plummeted. The Japanese soon lost interest.

Father, meanwhile, having managed to transfer part of his assets before his staged disappearance, made his way south to Japanese-occupied Shanghai under an assumed name, Yen Hong. He bought what was to become our family home on the Avenue Joffre. Soon afterwards he sent for Niang and Franklin, who travelled with a couple of trusted employees and joined him there.

For the rest of the family, stranded in Tianjin, life became oddly serene. Aunt Baba ran the household and encouraged us children to invite friends home to play and snack on various dim sums [?] in a way Niang would never have tolerated. Mealtimes were informal and the adults talked and played mah-jong late into the evening. Ye Ye kept a skeleton staff in the office.

By and large the Japanese left us alone. A chauffeur was hired and on Sundays we were driven to various restaurants to try out different cuisines, including Russian, French, and German. I remember drinking hot chocolate and eating pastries at the sparkling Kiessling Restaurant while a music trio played Strauss waltzes and Beethoven romances. Sometimes we were even taken to see suitable movies.

Father was keen that the rest of his family should join him in Shanghai. In the summer of 1942, Grandmother was persuaded to visit for two months but returned saying that Tianjin was now her home. She stubbornly refused to move and told Aunt Baba that the essence of life was not which city one lived in, but with whom one lived.

*

After dinner one stiflingly hot day, 2 July 1943, we were planning next day's menu with Cook. Aunt Baba suggested that we have Tianjin dumplings instead of rice. Freshly made with chives, ground pork and spring onions, these dumplings were a great favourite among us children. We were all shouting out ridiculously high numbers as to how many dumplings we could eat.

Grandmother developed a headache from all the commotion. She went to her own room, lit a cigarette and lay down. Aunt Baba sat by her and narrated a story from The Legend of the Monkey King. Even though Grandmother knew many tales from the well-known Chinese classic, she found it relaxing to hear them told again and again by her daughter. She removed the shoes, stockings and bindings from her tiny damaged feet before soaking them in warm water to relieve the constant ache, giving a sigh of contentment.

Aunt Baba left her and was taking her own bath when Ye Ye hammered on the door. Grandmother was twitching, frothing at the mouth. Doctors were called but it was too late. Grandmother never regained consciousness. She died of a massive stroke.

I remember waking up in the sweltering heat of a Tianjin summer morning. Aunt Baba was sitting at her dressing table and crying. She told me that Grandmother had left this world and would never come back; her life had evaporated like yi chang chun meng (an episode of a spring dream). I recall the sound of cicadas humming in the background, while street-hawkers clicked wooden clappers to an- nounce their presence, chanting their wares melodiously on the pavement below:

"Hot beef noodles. Stinky bean curd. Fresh pot stickers."

I wondered how it was possible that life could go on being so much the same when Grandmother was no longer with us.

Grandmother's body was placed in a coffin in the living room. Her photograph sat on top and the coffin was elaborately decorated with white flowers, candles, fruits and banners of white silk covered with elegant, brush-stroked couplets memorializing her virtues. Six Buddbist monks came to keep watch, dressed in long robes. We children were told to sleep on the floor in the same room to keep her company. We were all terrified, mesmerized by the shaven, shining heads of the monks chanting their sutras in the flickering candlelight. All night I half feared and half hoped that Grandmother would push open the lid and resume her place among us.

Next day, there was a grand funeral. We mourners were all dressed in white, with white headbands or pretty white ribbons. We followed the coffin on foot to the Buddhist temple, accompanied by music and chants provided by Buddhist priests. Along the way, attendants threw artificial paper money into the air to appease the spirits. My brother Gregory took the place of chief mourner in the absence of Father, who was still hiding. He walked directly behind the coffin, which was placed on a cart and pulled by four men. Every few steps he would fall on his knees and start bewailing the loss of Grandmother at the top of his voice, banging his head repeatedly on the ground to make obeisance. We followed Gregory silently, marvelling at his performance.

Finally we arrived. The coffin was placed at the centre of an altar, surrounded by white floral arrangements, more silk banners and Grandmother's favourite dinner. There were about sixteen dishes of vegetables, fruits and sweets. Incense heavily scented the air. Prayers were chanted by monks. We were instructed to kowtow, kneeling and repeatedly touching our foreheads to the ground. The monks brought paper effigies of various articles which they thought she might need in the next world. There were masses of "gold" and "silver" ingots, a very intricate cardboard automobile resembling Father's Buick, an assortment of furniture and appliances, even a mah-jong set. These effigies were all burnt in a large urn. This delighted us children, and we eagerly helped stoke the urn by dropping in the effigies, forgetting in the excitement the purpose of the occasion and fighting over the paper car, which was very ingeniously made and covered with bright tin foil. Years later, Aunt Baba informed me that all of it, including the eulogizing banners, monks, flowers, musicians and effigies, were chartered from a speciality shop which arranged for such “happenings” and supplied the appropriate props.

I remember watching the various paper images burning furiously and the smoke curling up and believing it would all regroup somewhere in the sky in the form of articles for the exclusive use and pleasure of Grandmother.

Our relatives and friends then followed us home and a lengthy and elaborate meal was served. Afterwards, we children were sent out to the garden to play. Lydia set up a make-shift urn. We manufactured paper stoves, beds and tables and began our own funeral for Grandmother. Soon the urn, which was a wooden flowerpot, stated to burn. Ye Ye came out ina fury, turned on the faucet and drenched us and our funeral pyre. We were sent to bed, but the incident helped to dissipate the dread and gloom of the last two days, and we felt that Grandmother was going to be happy in the other world.

Far away in Shanghai, Father grieved deeply. Hew could not accept that his beloved mother had died when she was just fifty-five. From then on, he wore only black neckties in honor of her memory.

The funeral marked the end of an era. We did not know it, but the care-free years of childhood were over. …

1938

75.64 Red Gate\fn{by Sung Ching aka Ma Sen-ching (c.1938?-)} Hangchow, Chekiang Province, China (M) 5

He had just telephoned and Hsiao-ling had told him. She would be waiting for him at home. He had not seen her for five months; if he had not met her the other day on the street near the Hsin Sheng Theater and if she had not called a greeting to him and if Chang had not given him a few new ideas so that he was resolved to take things lightly, he would not have had the courage to come and pay this visit. He stood before the tin-plated gate that was painted a bright red, looking doubtfully at the cream-colored sedan parked on the left. The autumn afternoon sun shone on his shinily-pressed khaki military uniform; he felt a little hot. He looked at his reflection on the door, straightened his military cap, then pressed the bell.

In a little while the gate opened. First a large police dog darted out and started to growl at him, glaring at him so fiercely that he prudently backed away. Then the round-faced servant appeared, dressed in a clean white shirt. Looking him over coolly, the servant asked him whom he was looking for and if he were the man who had just telephoned. The servant considered his answers carefully and then decided to let him in.

He approached the house, his hobnailed shoes clicking while the slanting sun threw his shortened shadow through the screen door onto the several pairs of brightly polished shoes strewn over the cement floor. He stood there for a moment, undecided; but his friend Chang’s words had already printed themselves in his head, and not caring that there was no one to welcome him, he sauntered in through the screen door. He stood before the steps where the shoes are removed\fn{A note reads: Many houses in Taiwan are of Japanese style, left over from the Japanese period, and the custom of taking off shoes when entering is still observed.} and pulled his cap off, holding it in his hands.

Through the tightly-closed paper sliding doors he heard the whisper and click of mahjong tiles. It was almost exactly like the last time he had come here; even the weather was the same. But then it was spring and now it was autumn. That first day he had stood by these steps for at least ten minutes. It was good that he was prepared this time. Don’t think too much, he said to himself. You have come to see a friend of half a year ago; you like her—what does it matter whether you like her environment?

He stood there remembering how five months ago he had left this house in anger because Hsiao-ling had made him wait ten minutes before she came out. This had made him conclude that she did not really welcome his visit so that he had only said a few words and taken his leave. That had surprised her, humiliated her. That time, sensitive to the point of nervousness, he had depended entirely on his intuition.

Now he saw the door on the left open and from it came that freckled long-faced maid who surveyed him from head to foot, then looked away as if he were not worth looking at.

“You’ve come before, haven’t you? Please sit down in the guest room. Hsiao-chieh\fn{A note reads: “Little Mistress:” a term of address for the young daughters of a household.} will be out in a few minutes.” She talked in a flat, lazy Kiangsu dialect, not even bothering to look at him.

He bent over to untie his shoelaces, stepped up onto the tatami\fn{A note reades: The straw mats on the floor of Japanese-style homes.} in his mended green socks and put on some slippers. The maid had already gone in, and he went into the sitting room at the right. A burst of laughter greeted him from behind the closed sliding paper doors on, one side of the room, and a low male voice laughed:

“Ha! You really have a one-track mind! You could very well have won by picking up your own card, a six-character card, but you had to wait for a nine character just hoping to get yourself a whole dragon. It really serves you right that the banker has won.” The voice laughed again gloatingly.

He looked around the sitting room—the same as five months ago except that the roses in the vase on the table had been changed for chrysanthemums. He could smell their fragrance. He placed his cap on the table and, with his hands behind his back, started to pace back and forth over the soft yellow and green flowered carpet. The painted landscapes and other scrolls hanging on the wall caught his eye; he went up closer to look at them. Five months ago he would not have been interested. He had been so worked up and tense that he could neither sit nor stand because then he had felt on the verge of either winning or losing her. But today was different. He had decided that all he felt for her was liking; he did not love anyone, so he could be calm.

He remembered two evenings ago when he had gone boating on Green lake with several girls who had just graduated from middle school, how he had the wonderful sense that he could play with them as if they were only dolls. And all due to the ideas that his friend Chang had given him. After all it’s all in fun; nobody gets hurt, so there is no need to treat the girl as if she’s something sacred. He really had acted differently that night. Even Chang had praised him afterwards. But today he still could not be. sure how he would feel when he saw Hsiao-ling.

The paper door slid open and Hsiao-ling came in, nodding at him with a smile. She had a glass of tea in one hand while she reached behind her with the other hand to close the door. Her hair was neatly combed, falling softly over the collar of her pink blouse. Her cheeks were slightly flushed while her dark eyes were luminous; it was obvious that she had just wakened from a nap.

“I’m sorry to keep you waiting so long,” she said in the clear high voice that was so familiar to him. He began to have that dizzy feeling again; every time he saw her his heart would beat faster and he felt somewhat bewildered. He went forward to meet her so that they stood very close to each other; then, bending his head, he used both hands to take over the tea. His hand brushed hers and his heart pounded painfully. She gazed at him, her face tilted upwards and her cheeks flushed a brighter pink, before she suddenly remembered to ask him to sit down.

He sat down across from her with the low table in between, and prolonged his sip of tea before he put the glass down on the table.

“Summer vacation is almost over,” he said. “You’ll be registering for classes next. week. Is it Tuesday?”

“Oh, I haven’t even looked the schedule up yet. Yes, it must be Tuesday.” She laughed. “See how muddle-headed I am!”

He shook his head. He did not know how to make polite small talk so he did not know what to answer. They sat in silence.

“You still have to serve another five months, don’t you?” She looked at his uniform as she said this.

“Yes, that’s right. Well, you certainly have a good memory!” He burst into a laugh, so abrupt and sharp that it took him aback. He was trying hard to curb the beating of his heart, to act naturally while fighting his feeling of constraint in her presence.

She looked at him in astonishment, her hands folded in the lap of her skirt. She pressed her lips tightly together. She remembered how he had left the last time without waiting for her and then three days afterwards his letter had come. Such a thick letter. She had taken it into the privacy of her room and had read it over three times, all five pages of it. She had even forgotten her supper that night. He had always been very distant to her, and she had never imagined that he might ever feel about her the way his letter indicated. From that day on, every time she received a phone call, her heart leapt wildly. But several days passed without even his shadow appearing, and she had begun to forget him. She could not understand. He had changed; last week he was so cold. When she met him on the street, and today he laughed so strangely.

“What have you been doing during the holidays?” he asked as he looked straight at her. He had at long last overcome some of his excitement.

“What did you say?” She was a little flustered.

“I said, what have you been doing with yourself during the holidays?” he repeated, realizing that it probably sounded as if he were cross-examining her. He had heard that she had been playing around a lot this summer, attending every dance with a new partner each time.

“Oh, I’ve been doing some reading at home. I don’t like to go out very much.” She leaned forward a little, smiling directly at him. “You know, I’ve read some of your stories. Really very good.”

“Where did you find them? They aren’t much—you must have laughed yourself silly over them!”

“I found them in … in … I can’t remember.” She tried to think, then, smiling naively, she asked, “Was that one about the man and two girls a true story?”

"What do you mean? It's a story, and it doesn't have to be true."

She nodded with a shy smile, saying softly:

"My sister understands things like stories and poetry better than I do. But, you know, I've begun to learn painting during the summer—"

He realized that talking about cultural things would bore her. In fact he did not like a studious girl who always had to talk about literary subjects, nor did he want a sloppy woman artist. He was attracted to this girl because she was lively, pretty, with a high clear voice and a light step that was as graceful as a swallow's flight.

"Been to Green Lake this summer?" He changed the subject.

"No, I haven't." She could not understand why she was lying. Just the day before yesterday, she had gone boating with three boys who were her classmates. Could he have seen her? She was really getting into the habit of lying, she thought. "What about you? How many stories have you written recently?"

"I haven't written anything." He was also lying. "I sit at the desk in the supply office of my battalion during the day and in the evenings and Sundays I go out. Sometimes the movies, or boating, fishing, hiking, walking around in the theater district or just sitting in the coffee shops. Green Lake is really beautiful at night, you know. Different every time, especially these past few nights with the moon so bright. Night before last I went out there with my friends and we took out two of those boats. Really a wonderful evening."

He was afraid that she thought of him as always reading or writing. He should be like other young people, lively, with no set time for study but always ready to throw down their books to rush out for a good time. However, although he had already left school, he still wasted too much time with books and pen and paper. To pass one day without reading a book was worse for him than a day without sleep. This habit of reading made him angry with himself for what he was afraid he was missing outside. He heard the slither of the door being opened and the long-faced maid stuck her head in.

"Hsiao-chieh, a telephone call for you."

Hsiao-ling left the room. He sprawled out lazily in the armchair with his head resting on the back, listening to the mahjong sounds from the next room. He remembered how he had first met her two years ago on the campus; she had on a white blouse and a flowered skirt with her hair pulled back in a pony tail. With the blue school bag heavy with books in her hand she had looked so fragile and young, just like a school girl. Their eyes had met and involuntarily he had braked his bicycle to a stop. She had also stopped in her tracks as if there was a current pulling them together. He had always liked this kind of girl—pretty, graceful, and with a childish clarity in her eyes that revealed the absence of any contact yet with the realities of life. He had gazed at her stupidly until, blushing furiously, she had turned her head and started walking again.

That same noon, as he was having lunch in the small Cantonese restaurant just across from the university, he had seen her again. With a group of other girls, she had come out the campus gate, talking and laughing, her pony tail switching back and forth with every step as if keeping time. They had entered the restaurant, pouncing on the large round table in the center of the room—like excited sparrows around a cup of grain. The waiter handed her the menu and immediately seven or eight heads had clustered around her, trying to decide what dishes to order. From the way she had acted, it was apparent that she was to be the hostess. She seemed very happy to have others see that she could afford it.

She had looked up suddenly and their eyes had met. The quick, memory of their earlier meeting made him lower his head in embarrassment and hurry through his meal with shortened breath.

Now the door slid open again. She came in smiling, smoothing with both hands the hair that lay against her neck, and sat down at her original place.

"You said that you're permitted to read during office hours so you must have finished a whole lot of books."

"That was at the beginning, not now. They'd rather you talk, drink tea or smoke to pass the time when you're not busy."

He remembered that in his letter to her he had said that he could go down to the small stream behind the office building to fish or read. So she actually had received his letter. He was filled with a feeling of warmth.

"What will you do after you finish your military service?" she asked with concern.

He hesitated. He was going to tell her that as soon as he had finished his service he would try to find a job teaching in a middle school. But then maybe she would think that was a poor job with no future to it.

"I may go to work for one of the English newspapers. My uncle is the manager."

In fact, he had never thought of working at that newspaper. He did not like the idea of being kept so busy. Although the pay there was three times as high as that of a teacher, he had never wanted to ask for his uncle's help; He wanted to have the winter and summer vacations to himself. He did not know why he should be saying all this to her; it was all so much against what he really wanted. She only smiled slightly.

"Then you'll still be in Taipei?"

"Of course."

They were silent again. She crossed her feet, hugged her knees and gazed at him with a smile. He noticed her eyes, black with a tint of blue in the whites, like the clear water of a mountain pool; they were filled with a soft but mischievous smile.

"Have you seen that movie Bridge Over The River Kwai?" he asked.

"Yes, have you?"

"I have. How did you like it?" She thought it over for a while.

"Quite good. But why wouldn't the British officer blow up that bridge at the end?" She frowned as she pursed up her small mouth with a puzzled look.

"Because he was blinded by his ego. He was a stubborn old-style army man with a one-track mind, not at all in keeping with the present age."\fn{Actually, he just didn't want to see the work itself—a remarkable feat, considering the privations his men were forced to work under—destroyed, even to further the war effort of the Allies. He had become enamoured of it, considered it a tribute to his own qualities of leadership, that is true: but more deeply, he understood it as a means by which the men under his command had been able to retain their self-respect, and so be better able to save their lives when confronted with the daily brutality of the Japanese guards. His men did not at first understand this—that doing ones best in adverse circumstances becomes mentally triumphant over the mentality of those enforcing physically adverse circumstances. On the other hand, they were not expected to by their own officers: which is to say that they were not expected to be able to save themselves from the natural disorderliness, petty thinking and unclean habits to which soldiers—in the armies of those days, just another form of lout—were prey to—through the exercise of self-discipline and cooperation in a common project. It was the officer that was expected to produce the concept that enabled them, in their turn; it was the officer who was, in short, expected to be a civilized man, and so constrained to maintain civilized standards in the midst of organized barbarity—war. It is still quite a film.}

He wanted to go further into this subject, really praising the theme of this movie but he stopped himself, afraid of boring her. He must talk about something that would interest her. He tried hard to think of some movie that was more entertaining, but since he hardly ever went to them, he could not remember a single one.

They sat silent listening to the noises of mahjong in the next room. Then they heard a door sliding open. He lifted his head to see Hsiao-ling's father going past in the corridor. He had a cigarette in one hand, and as he shuffled by in his slippers his corpulent body waddled a little.

The silence hung between them; he could not think.of what to say. He started remembering again: last year on Chinese New Year's night he had gone to a dance at a friend's home, his first dance. It was already past eight but only three or four girls had appeared. He was sorry for the host, who had boasted that their would be plenty of girls, so, encouraged by his friends, he had bravely gone out to ask Hsiao-ling to come to the party.

In the dark, chilly night he had found her house, but one look at the huge gate was enough to scare him off. He had stood on his toes to peek through a crack but there was no light inside so he had decided to leave. Just then a car had turned into the lane, the headlights blinding him. When the car had come to a stop beside him, Hsiao-ling had gotten out and surprised him into speechlessness. Her hands had been up under her chin, holding the collar of her red coat wrapped tightly around her neck. When she saw him, her eyes had widened with surprise.

"Ai, it's you! How is it you've come so late to say Happy New Year?" Then she had bitten her tongue in embarrassment and had added, "I am only joking. It's so cold!"

Two other people had gotten out of the car, their coats wrapped tightly around them. They were Hsiao-ling's parents, and she had introduced him to them. He had bowed awkwardly. The distant street light had illuminated their faces enough so that he could see they were not quite over forty. Her father was stout; but her mother had a good figure and the soft collar of her fur coat showed off her delicate beauty, very much like Hsiao-ling's. He had managed to stutter a few words; then the gate had opened. Hsiao-ling had insisted that he should go in and sit for a while but he had refused.

"Is there anything special?" she had asked softly, throwing a look at her parents who had urged him to go in.

"No, nothing at all." It might have been the cold or it might have been nerves, but his voice had been trembling a little. Then, under the gaze of all three pairs of eyes he had straightened his borrowed black suit, bowed politely and taken his leave.

Thinking of it now made him laugh suddenly.

"What are you laughing at?"

"About that Chinese New Year's night. You asked me to come in and I kept refusing."

"I remember. I didn't know whether you had something to say or not. It was so cold that night, wasn't it?"

"Was it? Maybe I was too nervous; I didn't feel the cold." He stretched out his legs and leaning against the end table next to her, he put his hand under his chin and smiled teasingly at her. “When. saw you, my heart started to beat so fast it warmed me up in a hurry.”

She did not say anything but looked at him with surprise. Why did he say such things? This proved what she had felt a little while earlier, he had indeed changed.

He looked at her bowed head and discovered a tranquil beauty in her lowered eyes that he had never noticed before. He felt his heart stirring.

“Have you been dancing much these days?” he asked in a low voice.

“No, I haven’t been dancing for the last three or four months.”

“Really?” He laughed. “Next Friday there’s a dance given by some of our old classmates. I hope you can come.”

She looked at him hesitatingly. This was the first time he had ever asked her for a date. She had waited for a whole year, during which she had instinctively felt several times that he had been on the verge of asking her but each time, after much stuttering and talking in circles, he had never come out with it. Today he had finally asked her and she felt different. She had never felt this way when other boys had asked her. She could not smile naturally any more, but felt the muscles tightening on her face as it began to burn. Then a new thought occurred to her: he always talked to her about dancing and movies as if this were all she knew about. When he talked to her, she told herself, the look in his eyes was the same as if he were talking to a child. Why had he invited her in such a careless way? And why had he asked “Really?” when she told him she hadn’t been out dancing. She had said it because she wanted him to know that she had changed, that she no longer was only interested in social life. She quickly changed her mind.

“No, I’m afraid I won’t have time that day. School will have started then, of course, and I will be very busy this semester—I have to collect a lot of material for my thesis.”

She knew that what she was saying wasn’t true. Her studies were always easy for her and neither of her parents expected her to become a scholar. Why had she refused? He might never ask her again!

Vividly, she remembered again the day at Green Lake when it had begun to rain and they had rowed their boat up close under the overhanging cliff with the huge characters Little Red Hut written on it. Hidden in the hollow there, it had been another world shut off from outside view. There had been four girls and five boys and they had sat in a circle playing cards. He had sat opposite her and had kept looking at her in a dazed sort of way with his long-lashed dark eyes. He did not talk much and every time he had said anything, he would blush. Her friend Lin Hsiu-tsu had whispered to her and giggled about how shy he was, but she had liked him for it. That was the first time they had been together in a group and she had found him different; not rugged like Fang Chung nor gallant like Little Lee, who always knew what to say to a girl. She had been attracted to him by his very difference, by his air of stubborn self-respect—or was it shyness? They had not seen each other often during the past two years but she had always thought of him.

Now she had hurt him. Why had she done it? She realized how stupid she had been—she knew him for what he was, but she had treated him the way she treated Little Lee. If it had been Little Lee, he would use his persuasive tongue to overcome her refusal. But he was not Little Lee. He did not know how to play that kind of a game.

He had not expected her to refuse and for a moment could not think of anything to say. A feeling of indescribable disappointment crept over him. He knew that she had gone out happily with others and now the first time he had asked her, she had refused. In fact, he was not a good dancer, nor did he care much for dancing. He had asked her today only because he had thought it would please her. But she had refused. What would she think now? She must look down on him all the more.

He thought of what Chang had said. Could he feel lightly about all this? Could he regard her as something less than sacred? No, he couldn’t. He felt that she was so perfect, so unattainable, and he was so out of tune with the times, a mere bookworm. But could Chang have been wrong? She had seemed to like him before. Maybe if he had acted like himself … she had looked at him very strangely each time he had tried to act the way Chang said he should. He was in a turmoil of self-doubt. He gazed at her woodenly and smiled a bitter smile of self-deprecation, of heartsick disappointment.

They were each lost in their separate thoughts. He saw her glance at her watch.

“Do you have anything to do?”

“No, nothing.” She smiled apologetically.

“I really have to go.” He picked up his cap and stood up politely.

She watched him as he bent over to tie his shoelaces and saw that his hands were trembling. She saw him to the gate, the huge police dog standing quietly beside her but watching his movements with alert eyes.

"Come again when you have time," she murmured softly as he turned to go. He did not answer but twisted his head to look at her again. He saw her looking at him with a strange expression in her eyes. Was it regret? Her smile was also strangely tremulous, a little sad. He hesitated. Then he cursed himself for an imaginative, love-sick fool and, waving his hand to her strode through the gate. He felt her gaze on his back but forced himself to go on without looking back again. Only when he was almost at the end of the lane did he hear the red gate bang shut.

186.199 The Story Of A Brigade Leader Prospecting In The Great North-West \fn{by Mrs. Yu (c.1938-)}
Jingxiang Village, Cang'an County, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 9

"I was born and grew up in Jigxiang Village in Cang'an County, Zhejiang Province. It has over six hundred years of history. It was built when the Ming Dynasty general Qi Jiguang fought Japanese pirates there. It has a city wall with four gates and a moat, and there's a group of hills inside the town that looks like a lion, called Lion Mountaqin. The scenery is very beautiful, and there are a lot of cultured people in the town. But it's a pity, they pulled down the walls and got rid of the ancient buildings during the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution.

"The Eastern Sea\fn{The East China Sea, an extension of the Pacific Ocean} is close by, it's a land of fish and rice, you could eat freshly caught fish every day there. Girls from the seaside all have big, bright eyes, perhaps because they eat a lot of seafood, fish and prawn skins. We didn't understand in those days, but later on I discovered that seafood contains a lot of calcium, which is good for the eyes.

"The girls are pretty there, and it has a good climate, there are no bitterly cold winters, and no sandstorms either. There was this one winter when we were young, there was a sudden, light fall of snow, snowflakes were drifting about in small flurries, not many of them. My brothers and sisters and I were so happy, we got a cotton sheet, and each took hold of a corner to catch the snow so that none would fall on the ground, it was very beautiful. And then there was another particularly cold year, it snowed again, and that time we made a snowman. We never saw snow in winter again after that. We never wore thick cotton-padded clothes, thick overcoats, or even woollen undertrousers, we'd just use an extra pair of unlined trousers.

"My father's family had been scholars for generations, although by his generation they had lost most of their wealth. They always approved of education and supported setting up schools. My grandparents gave several mu of family land for a school, it was called the "Awakening Teacher School". My oldest uncle went to Hangzhou Commercial College, but my second uncle and my father didn't get so much schooling. My father started out as an apprentice in a tailor's shop straight out of primary school. He didn't marry until he was thirty, and he was very happy when I came along.

"It was a feudal society in those days, people only celebrated the first male child, but my father wasn't like other men—he treated me like a boy. My grandmother was widowed when she was still in her thirties, she was very fond of me. Now I don't have very clear memories from when I was very small, but sometimes they still appear vaguely in my brain.

"I remember when I was four I often put charcoal bricks in my grandmother's brass stove—my mother used to get everything ready, and then I'd pop in the charcoal. It was a cold winter day, I hadn't slept all night. I heard the grown-ups crying, and I thought that it was Granny, crying because there was nobody to tend her stove, so I called out to Mummy, "Take the stove over to Granny so she can get warm," but Mummy said that Granny had passed away. Later, I saw the adults crying and I cried along with them. That was the first time I saw grownups cry, and it made me wonder why.

Then there was a time when I was five or six, a very cold day in winter. We had a pond in the courtyard of our house, the children all liked playing by that pond and looking at the fish. I went to play by the pond, but somehow I fell in! The pool was quite deep in the middle, though the sides were shallow, and I was wearing a black quilted jacket. That heavy soaked padded jacket was a dead weight, dragging me down, I couldn't move, and I didn't know to call out. Luckily, one of my uncles was over on a visit, he heard the splash from the parlour, and saw a black padded jacket bobbing about in the pool.

"Aiya," he said, "I've just seen a child fall in!" and he came rushing over to pull me out. I was chilled to the bone. Now whenever I speak of cold, I think of the freezing cold of that black padded jacket.

"By the time I was seven or eight, I was already in the second year of primary school. Our family had a big house then, with a central courtyard paved with flagstones. In those days there were no toys, nothing to play with, so in summer we little girls drew houses on the flagstones with chalk and played hopscotch.

"Just as I was playing happily with a few other girls, all of a sudden there was a roar, the earth and sky seemed to shake, the sky grew dark, and we heard a loud noise. We were frightened out of our wits, we didn't know what was happening, so we hurried out onto the street. We saw people strolling about, enjoying the cool evening air; they were all fine, they'd heard a loud noise, but it was all over quickly, and nobody knew what it was.

"It was only later that we found out from the grownups that this noise was made by something called a bomb. The Japanese had been dropping bombs on China, but we had never experienced it in our part of the world. So we girls slowly made our way back home, where we found that a beam of the house had been broken by the shock, and the two beds underneath the beam were covered in tiles from the roof. They had just fetched my baby brother from the bed.

"In the first year we learned a lot of poems and children's folk rhymes. There's a song I still know by heart:

Kitten small,
kitten jump,
kitten catch a rat,
rat run away.

"In the second year the teacher taught us how to use an abacus to add and subtract—there were rhymes to teach us the rules of the abacus. For activities, we ran races and played with rubber balls, and we played hide-and-seek, and running to a tree for forfeits, the last one to touch the tree had to sing a song.

"Our village was relatively enlightened for the time. A lot of the girls went to school, sometimes a third of a class was girls. All the girls in my extended family went to school. My uncle, who had attended commercial college, became the headmaster of the school my grandparents set up. He only had three daughters, no sons, but he had progressive ideas, and encouraged the villagers to oppose Yuan Shikai and support Sun Yat-sen. All his daughters went on to marry scholars and educated men, and they certainly influenced me.

"In those days there was only a primary school in the village, so when I started middle school at the age of thirteen, I had to leave home to go to teacher training school. At that time my ambition was to be a doctor. A lot of people died of tuberculosis in those days—my cousin and my oldest uncle had both died of TB, and other relatives too. To become a doctor I would have had to attend the standard middle school, followed by senior middle school and university, but my family's finances couldn't stretch that far, so I had to sit the exam for the teacher training school. At the start of the course the teacher announced that the first essay was on "My Ambition". I said that my ambition had originally been to be a doctor, but now I was at the teacher training school, I had told myself: you should be a teacher, and serve the people. The teacher liked my essay, and I got 99 per cent.

"Our home was a few li away from the teacher training school, and in those days there were no cars, and it would take two hours to get from home to school on foot. When I was in my second year, I wanted to go back home to pick up some clothes. I had a classmate, not as tall as me, but a year older, who also wanted to go home for her summer clothes, so the two of us set off early one Sunday morning. The school food wasn't that tasty or plentiful, four small dishes between eight of us, and if you were a slow eater you wouldn't get enough. We'd all stand to attention and then they'd say kaitong,\fn{Dinner is served} and everybody would pick up their chopsticks at once, quick eaters would eat their fill, slow eaters got very little, so when I came back home I wanted something to eat.

"In those years we didn't have any biscuits or bread, just rice; the family had a grinder, my mother ground flour and made a few flat cakes, with spring onions and shrimp flakes added—that was a delicious treat. Because we waited for those tasty shrimp cakes, we didn't set off back to school until four o'clock.

"In summer, thunderstorms could come at any time, but we were young and thoughtless, and nobody thought to warn us. There were four gates in the town wall, north, south, east and west, we left by the north gate, heading for school, but when we reached a village called Qianche the sky darkened, there was a roll of thunder, and all at once the rain came pouring down in torrents. The flagstone path we were walking on was only a handspan wide, just a row of stone slabs, with paddy fields full of uncut rice plants on one side and a big river on the other. We were walking in single file, and I was holding an umbrella, with a bag of summer clothes on my arm. I was scared I wouldn't make it back to school in time and they'd fine us, so I was getting panicky and flustered. We just kept walking, with her in front and me behind. We couldn't see any peasants working in the fields in their south Chinese straw rain capes, there wasn't even anybody else on the path, no one but ourselves between the vast, empty paddy fields and the river, where many wild water lilies were growing. The other girl was going very fast, she was over a dozen metres ahead of me, and somehow I slipped and fell into the river. Luckily the wild water lilies were very thick there, I dropped right on top of them, with the river water rushing past in. torrents next to me.

"At the time I wasn't scared, and somehow I managed to clamber back up. As soon as I was on the bank I shouted, 'Heavens above!' (Southerners shout 'Heavens above' whenever anything happens.) But that evening I lay on my bed, tossing and turning, unable to sleep. The more I thought about it the more scared I became; if the water lilies had covered me, I wouldn't have been able to climb back up by myself; and nobody would have come to rescue me, they wouldn't even have been able to find my body. Having nearly drowned twice when I was young, I was always afraid of water and so never learned to swim.

"I can't remember so much about Daddy, he was always busy with his work; besides, I was a girl—he liked me, but he didn't care about my studies as much as my younger brothers'. My mother was a very hard-working, very honest woman, she wasn't afraid of hardship. She was very fond of me when I was a little girl, she taught me to turn up a hem, to cut out cloth and make clothes, to sew and mend. In the past, we even made our own belts for trousers; raising silkworms, weaving cloth, we did it all ourselves. She could do everything: reeling the silk off the individual silkworm cocoons to weave into silk, weaving cotton cloth and embroidery. In the summer and winter holidays I liked to follow her about and give her a hand here and there. I wove on the loom as well, and when I was a bit older I helped my mother make shoes. There were four boys after me, so I helped my mother to sew many shoe soles. Our summer holidays weren't like the ones children have nowadays, with drawing lessons, piano lessons or cramming classes. We had to spend every holiday making shoes, we couldn't afford to buy them.

"I really don't know how we would have managed without my mother's skill and hard work. I never thought about these things until I became a mother myself, but by that time I wasn't my own master, the times were different, and there were different demands on women.

*

"We weren't very sophisticated then, we only thought about building up our motherland, about not letting the American imperialists bully us, not giving the Westerners a reason to look down on us! In 1953 a call went out to train a batch of fasttrack teachers to serve the nation. Three years of study were condensed into a single year. When I finished teacher training school I was sent straight on to Wenzhou City Normal School. My idea at the time was that once I graduated as a teacher I'd start making a living as a teacher.

"But when we were about to graduate and be assigned jobs, the North-West Geology Management College sent a representative from Xi'an to our school in Wenzhou to select two hundred students to help the great north-western oil-prospecting mission. He said the nation needed this survey more than they needed teachers, so the school encouraged activists to devote themselves to the construction of the motherland. I was very progressive in those days, I was class monitor, and I'd been on propaganda teams.

"I liked the thought of seeing the outside world, that had always been an ambition of mine. I had read many books as a little girl, and the story of Mulan in the army was the one that stirred me most deeply. I had learned about the Great North-West in geography and history classes, I knew about the northern Chinese scenery, I knew that it snowed in the north-west, and I knew about things like the Qilian Mountains and Jiayuguan, where the Great Wall ends in the desert. All of these were things I'd heard about in poems, and I wanted to go out and explore it for myself. At that time none of us knew what a geological survey actually was, and we never thought to mention it—the motherland needed us!

"I was in Wenzhou, which was a long way away from my home town, and at that time transport was poor, there was no road, and no bridge to cross the river, so I hadn't been back at all since I left for the Normal School. I thought the family wouldn't be that worried, after all I wasn't a boy, so I went straight from the school to Xi'an—my family didn't even know.

"First we took the bus to Hangzhou, and then a train from Hangzhou to Xi'an. When we arrived in Xi'an we were all very excited, it was quite backward but we didn't care, and we went to visit the Great Goose Pagoda. The course in Xi'an was an accelerated course, we went very fast. We were put into two classes where we studied everything from the theory of surveying to on-the-spot surveying. I was head of the first class. We studied theory as though our lives depended on it, but we didn't really get to grips with what it was actually like and we had no idea of the hard work that was to come. As part of our training, the school sent our group away for field study and testing, so after several months of theory we went to Yan'an for winter training, on the Yellow Earth Plateau.

"It was so cold in Yan'an in winter, there was over a metre of snow. Still, nobody complained, none of us showed the slightest anxiety or worried about the hardship, we felt almost holy, living in a cave house in Yangjialing, a place where Chairman Mao had once lived. I was in charge of three small groups in one sub-unit, all girls, six to a cave house, with six army canvas travelling cots and a basin of burning charcoal to keep out the winter cold. The quilts were very thin, just light summer quilts, and everyone had a heavy cotton-padded jacket and a pair of padded trousers. They only had millet in Yan'an, they'd never even seen rice, and mantou\fn{Steamed bread buns} were for field training only.

"Field training was very tough; we got up before daybreak, and set off carrying a water bottle and a dozen mantou in our backpacks. By noon our mantou were lumps of ice, sometimes we couldn't get our teeth into them at all, there was no fire to heat them on, and we'd finished all the water, we were so thirsty we had to eat snow. We always had good appetites in those days. Walking around in the ice and snow, tens of degrees below zero, the girls' hair stuck together in icy clumps, and when the boys went out their moustaches went all white. The Yan River had frozen solid, and we had to cross it every day to climb the snow-covered mountain; if you fell into a hollow where the snow had piled up you couldn't climb out by yourself, somebody had to pull you out.

"At that time we lacked even the most basic necessities for our tasks—we didn't even have warm shoes, just light military summer shoes with rubber soles, and those are very slippery. It was impossible to climb mountains in thick cotton-padded trousers, so we didn't wear them, just two pairs of unlined trousers, and nobody complained of the cold either.

"We were young, we were healthy and full of energy, but even so, going out early and coming back late, some of our classmates' hands froze up like the mantou, sometimes we couldn't get our socks off because they were stuck to our skin. In the evening, when the cold became unbearable, we had to sleep in pairs, huddled together for warmth.

"I feel a real nostalgia for our enthusiasm and cheerfulness under those conditions: we used to sing songs while we were resting. Sometimes we'd start to sing on one mountain, and they'd pick up the tune on the next mountain; we sang back and forth to each other. There was the Song of the Pioneers, and songs from the Soviet Union, Katyusha, One Road; I've sung them all. And that was our three months of practical study. Back in Xi'an we spent two or three more months reinforcing what we'd learned, and then we were posted to jobs in the Jiuquan Big Brigade.

"There were three survey brigades then, two with male leaders, and I was the leader of the third brigade. We were the vanguard of the survey, the advance guard of the oil pioneers; our duty was to draw topographical maps of the areas they were exploring, so we were always first on the scene. At that time trains from Xi'an only went as far as Lanzhou, there was no railway from Lanzhou to Jiuquan, so we set off from Lanzhou in big trucks.

"With the vast yellow sands of the Gobi all along the route, we could go for a day with nothing but endless yellow sands, no sign of human life, and then another day would come and go without a soul to be seen. All the roads were dirt tracks, all bumps and hollows; we were tumbled about in the trucks until even our insides hurt from all the shaking. Our track was a strip of yellow road under us; behind us was dust like a tail of thick, choking smoke.

"Our throats were burning and dry. We could do nothing about our hair—we all had matted hair and grimy faces. Every time we reached a stop in the evening, there'd be over a dozen of us to one big kang, all in a row, one next. to the other, with grass mats to lie on. We were stung and bitten all through the night, and we couldn't do a thing about it.

"What did we burn? Cow and horse dung! It was still very cold indeed in the Great North-West when we first went out in April and May, and we only had dung for fuel, which filled the room with its stink as soon as you lit it, but nobody said a word about the dirt or the harshness of the life. It's very interesting to look back on that time. Our generation takes pride in having experienced this memorable part of history.

"And that was how our band of girls arrived at the Jiuquan Big Brigade base. It was a single-storey building, we slept on iron beds, and we couldn't have been happier if we had gone to heaven. It was almost International Labour Day when we arrived, and I still remember 1 May very clearly: snow was still falling from the sky—we all sat on the ground in the open air, wearing big thick padded jackets, but no hats, holding an activists' meeting.\fn{In post-I949 China, 1 May was a very important festival. First, it was a holiday that belonged to the working people themselves; second, it was an opportunity for propaganda, crusading against the oppression and exploitation of the labourers under capitalism; third, work units or the government would use this day to hold activists' meetings, introducing new schemes or work plans for the summer}

"In the activists' meeting the leaders told our group that we were going to leave for the worksite. The following day a long file of more than ten trucks set off in the direction of Jiayuguan, carrying my womens survey team and a few tents. Our worksite was on the far side of the Jiayuguan pass.

"In the past, many majestic, beautiful epic poems had been written by scholars and poets about this Jiayuguan, but when we got there all we could see was the vast Gobi Desert stretching out boundlessly in all directions, a great, barren desert with no sign of life and no vegetation! There wasn't a living soul to be seen.

"But do you know something? When we saw it we were full of pride. I told our group: we too can bring our work to places where the great poets of ancient times have been, this is an honour. Really, at that time that was what I thought.

"We put up our tents in a village in Jiayuguan and moved in. The only technicians in the team were me and my classmates, all women. One of the apprentice workers from Nanjing was just sixteen, and I was only eighteen. On outside fieldwork we were split into many small groups: Terrain Reconnaissance, Site Selection, Observation, Mapping. My team were the vanguard of the survey, the people in Mapping would survey and map the terrain based on the control points we had measured.

*

"He\fn{Her husband} was in the Jiuquan Big Brigade too. He came to work in our brigade in 1952, to help us with the technology. He was also responsible for the organisational work of the Communist Party Youth League, and he often came to inspect our work. At that time I was still young, I hadn't started thinking about courtship, marriage or anything of that sort. Then a writer called Yu Ruobin (his pen name was Sha Duoling) came to the site; he'd come to experience life with us in the Jiuquan Big Brigade, and he wrote a lot of poems about our women's survey team and the Gobi Desert. Many journalists from the Xinhua News Agency used to come to report on our team, and they took lots of photographs.

"This writer Sha Duoling told me about You's background: he was a graduate from the Lanzhou University physics department, a Hero of Labour, and his work was first-rate. He said he'd done a special report on You, a man who struggled fiercely for the sake of the construction of the motherland. He suffered from stomach trouble, and once he'd fainted dead away on the worksite, but when he came round he just carried on as normal … he was a man with a very strong work ethic. I began to notice this man, and later on You himself suggested that he would like to make friends with me. He didn't say the romantic words you would see in books today, he just asked me if I wanted him to make friends with me, and was that all right?\fn{In China before 1990, "lover" was an embarrassing word, even a louche, dissolute word. When a man and a woman were said to be "making friends", this referred to courtship. In the period between 1930 and 1980, a couple who were Party members had to gain authorisation from the Party organisation before "making friends"; from the 1950s to the 1980s this rule was an unwritten law in Chinese society}

"At first I really didn't know what to reply. When I kept silent he said:

"'It's perfectly simple, just tell me, do we or don't we? Be frank.'

"At that time there were quite a few people who were keen on me, but I agreed anyway. Why did I choose him? This has a lot to do with my family, and the influence of my older girl cousins: they had all married university students in the 1920s and '30s, and they were all very talented men: one was a professor in the Shanghai Finance and Economics Institute, and one had been a student of literature at the Sun Yat-sen University in Guangdong, and after the Liberation he became a teacher. Everyone thought he was amazing—at that time people who had been to university were rarer than a unicorn horn or phoenix feathers.

"So I thought I couldn't do less than them, and I had always admired educated people. At that time I'd never heard of MAs, PhDs or anything like that, and though my ambition had been to be a university student myself, it was impossible then, so I would naturally tend to look favourably on a university graduate as a marriage partner! The best candidates among my classmates were only vocational school graduates, none of us had been to university. So You's educational background and his personal circumstances both met my standards, but actually the most important thing was the man himself. Besides, that writer Sha Duoling, our deputy group leader and the organisational secretary of the Youth League had all told me:

"A Hero of Labour is bound to be a hard worker, and a hard-working man is always good news."

"At that time an introduction from the Party organisation was as good as a guarantee, many people said yes as soon as the organisation introduced them! In those days we'd only just freed ourselves from arranged marriages—anything that wasn't decided by our parents was a kind of freedom! Besides, I had this notion of marrying a university student, so when other classmates suggested getting together, I turned them down. He was the first one I considered, but I didn't know how to answer him.

"He was a leader—even when proposing marriage he knew a thing or two about leadership. He saw I was unable to speak so he said:

"Can we or can't we? If not, we don't have to."

Just like that. I still didn't reply, but I didn't refuse him either. He won a Hero of Labour prize (back then prizes were always The Complete Works of Mao Tse-tung) but when the time came for him to collect it he didn't go himself, but sent me to collect it for him, so I went blundering off to collect his prize. All this had a purpose, it was to test whether I was really serious, and to show me that he was a famous Hero of Labour.

"Afterwards when we returned from Jiuquan to Xi'an, he took my suitcase for me, and put it in the truck for me. He didn't lift a finger to help any of my other classmates, I remember it very clearly. When we were back in Xi'an for theoretical study, we went to the Xi'an restaurant on our rest day to eat snacks, especially their local speciality.\fn{Yang-rou-pao-mo—lamb stew with coriander and crumbled flat-bread} Xi'an was very backward in those days. There were no cars or buses—we took a horse and cart from outside the city wall to the city centre.

"The marriage ceremony I do remember. Before we were married, the Petroleum Bureau wanted to train a group of people in aerial surveying at the Peking Central Mapping Bureau, in order to improve the speed and quality of surveying. My name was on the list. But then the leaders said:

"'You're getting married soon, you don't have to go.' At that time I always felt I had never learned enough. I'd always dreamed of a university diploma; given a chance like this, I couldn't not go. So I said:

"'It doesn't matter if I'm getting married, I can still go once I'm married. I'll come back when the course is over.' I was already China's first head of a women's surveying team; I wanted to be a member of China's first aerial surveying team as well.

"In those days new training programmes were kept secret: there was no announcement. I'd heard the phrase "aerial surveying" but didn't knew whether it meant flying in the air or walking on the ground. I had no idea. I supposed that if it was aerial, it must be flying in the air, surely? I was determined to fly up to the sky; I wanted to be the first female aerial surveyor of the New China.\fn{There is in this part of the Protocol for World Peace devoted to China a story written by the first Chinese female soldier:H} Since I was going away to study, my colleagues said:

"'Have your wedding right away, before you leave, a settled relationship is beneficial to study.'

"And so we got married. We were still wearing our fieldwork clothes, even in our wedding photograph, but I bought us two new scarves for the photo, both the same colour and style, and we wore rosettes, attached to our work clothes. Our colleagues had a whip-round and got us two sets of bedding and some sweets, it was a very simple wedding.

"At that time marriages were the biggest events in our social life. They forced us to sing a song. A few of his geophysicist classmates were a bit more unruly, they were slightly older, they'd seen more of the world. I could sing Shaoxing Opera, and so I sang a bit of that, not very well, just Liang Shanbo and Zhu Yingtai. When I was young I used to join in the community singing, and I was in the singing group. Later on I had my tonsils out, and my voice turned hoarse.

"As it turned out he was sent to Moscow for two years while I was studying—he went in 1956, he didn't come back till '58.\fn{"Did you go to visit him when he was abroad?"}

"Go to the Soviet Union? No, in those days it was impossible, they were very strict about letting you go abroad. Besides, we had had our first child by then. When You came back from his studies in 1958 he was assigned to the Bureau of Mines in Turfan, in Xinjiang province; at that time the slogan was "Spur on the galloping horse to full speed, march on Turfan". They dug a well for prospecting beneath the Flaming Mountain, the same Flaming Mountain as in Wu Chengen's Monkey, the part where the monks borrow the fan of the Iron Fan Princess.

"We set up camp at the foot of the mountain, where we had a one-room brick house for living quarters. There were no fans or electrical equipment then, and in summer the average temperature was over forty-two degrees,\fn{Centigrade} and that was in the shade—impossibly hot, you could cook an egg by burying it in the sand. It was over forty degrees inside too, all our things were scalding hot—you could burn your hand on an iron bedstead.

"Nowhere was it cool, you had to splash the beds and ground with water and at midday draw the curtain, which was just a piece of black cloth, like in a photographer's darkroom; we had to turn day into night to survive there. At midday when it was hottest, work was out of the question, we women just lay there on soaking wet beds, and even that wasn't enough, we had to cover ourselves with sopping towels. The men went to the irrigation ditches, where they skulked under the little bridges, hiding from the heat of the sun. There was nothing else we could do in the middle of the day.

"Luckily by then our fieldwork could be taken indoors, but the drawing board was so hot that our maps used to stick to it. During the worst heat of the day all we could do was doodle aimlessly, with sweat streaming down our bodies. And as for the nights … it was impossible to sleep indoors. We'd drag our beds out into the big courtyard and sleep in the open air.

"Every evening in Turfan, at eight or nine, a wind would start to blow, and it would continue until eight or nine in the morning; every day was like this, so if we moved outside because we couldn't sleep, we had to try to sleep in the middle of a sandstorm, surrounded by flying sand and walking stones, just like it says in Monkey:

The sand was flying, the stones were walking.

"When I heard this story as a child I thought the writer was exaggerating, how can there really be stones that walk or grains of sand that fly? But in Turfan we experienced it at first hand. The sand and stones scoured your skin, it hurt, and we couldn't do anything about it, you just had to cover your face with a thin bed sheet, but then it didn't let any air in; everybody was in and out all night.\fn{"What did you eat at that time?"}

"There were lots and lots of grapes and Hami melons. We couldn't eat more than a hundred grams of grain rations in a day, it was too hot to eat, so we lived on fruit. The Hami melons were so sweet that they left a sticky, sugary layer on the table. We didn't eat grapes one by one, but a big handful at a time, like playing the mouth organ.

"Aiya, we were there for years! We carne in '59 and left in '64. After that we went to Ningxia. Our living quarters were half in a cellar dug under the ground and half in a tent pitched above it. Ningxia suffers from sandstorms too—in a Ningxia sandstorm you could be sitting a metre and a half from me, and I wouldn't be able to see your face for all the sand blowing about! When you got out of bed in the morning there, you'd find a thick layer of sand on the plastic sheet, and we often used to find sand in our mantou, blown in during the cooking process. It creaked and squeaked in your teeth as you ate, really, you wouldn't believe it if you hadn't lived there. In the big storms, our tents used to get covered in sand, heaped up so thickly that we women couldn't get the door open. A man had to come and help us in the morning.

"In Ningxia it made no difference how high or low your rank was, the sexes were segregated, there was separate accommodation for men and women. Living arrangements were the same after marriage: men living with men and women living with women. Husbands and wives all lived apart. You need a room for a child, don't you, and when we first arrived there weren't any. Then a room was set up for married couples. You had to wait in a queue and book it. My three children were all made there - my older son was born in 1958, my second son in 1960, and my youngest, a daughter, in 1963. At that time we all knew that finding oil wasn't really the be all and end all, but you did have to go all out for the revolution. We didn't abandon them,\fn{Families and spouses} but they weren't as important as they are to people nowadays.

"Besides, anyone who talked a lot about their children and husband and so on would be looked down on. People would accuse you of not having a progressive attitude or of being too petit bourgeois. You couldn't be too fussy about living conditons. We were all tired out every day, nobody mentioned missing home or anything of that sort. When you got up you'd work with all your might; when you got back to the dormitory you went to sleep as soon as your head hit the pillow. It was very simple, and very happy too! Fortunately we didn't have the children with us at that time, my elder children grew up in You's home town, here in Hezheng. When I was pregnant with my younger daughter I decided to take home leave and go back to my own family. Taking care of the children was too much for You's mother, I needed help from my family.

"The first time I went home on a family visit was 1964, ten years after I left. On the map it looks like there's a direct line from Xinjiang in the north-west to my home in Dong'an in the east, but at that time there were no roads, not even railway stations, the only transport was in big trucks. When I went home for the first time, I squeezed onto a big truck with the local Xinjiang people. I still remember the strong goaty smell from the old sheepskins they wore. It was freezing on the truck, we all crawled inside our quilts, it was like there was a counterpane covering the truck.

"I took my daughter home by myself. We went from Hami to Lanzhou, spent a night in Lanzhou, and then set off again, changing trains many times en route from Xi'an to Shanghai. At that time trains from Shanghai to my home only went as far as Jinhua, we had to change to a bus at Jinhua, and then a ferry, but at last we finally made it home!

"It'd been ten years, and my mother and father looked at me like I'd fallen from the sky, but they were happy, so happy they cried! I didn't sleep at all the night I arrived home. It was summer, I sat with my mother and father in the central courtyard of the house, and we talked till dawn, just the three of us. I didn't have any gifts to bring them from Turfan, only a couple of bags containing several dozen pounds of raisins.

"Oh, yes, my father went shouting all the way down the street:

"'My daughter's back, my daughter's come back, and she's brought my granddaughterl' All our relatives and friends could hear him. They didn't complain.\fn{About her being away so long or leaving "without a proper farewell, and hadn't been heard of since."} My parents knew that I had wanted to leave to join the army in 1949 and 1950, but I didn't go then because my brothers were too small, I was needed at home. My home town was liberated in May 1949. The teacher in our local school was a member of the underground Communist Party, though I didn't know that at the time, I only found out once we'd been liberated. The Party organised a teachers' and school-leavers' propaganda team. I joined the team and we went to the country villages and the fishing villages by the sea, opposing imperialism, local despots and feudalism, and helping liberate women from arranged marriages.

"In 1954, in the Peoples Pictorial News, Peoples Daily, you could find reports about me in all the youth papers. All my family knew, all the teachers too. The news caused a nationwide sensation at the time, this was the early fifties, remember. The Xinhua News Agency took photographs for propaganda, women going to work in difficult places was big news, they were big pictures too. We got letters encouraging us from all over the country, all the young people wanted to be like us, and went as construction volunteers to the north-west. We were all yearning to sacrifice our youth to the motherland.

"I really didn't cry,\fn{Over the hardships she had to endure} not once. I think it's because I had good health, I never got even a touch of frostbite, or any injury—good health is one of my best traits. Plus I had both a burden and an ambition. When I was a student in Yan'an I read a book. In those days the Soviet Union was a model for China, and this story was set in a very, very cold place that was a long way away from Moscow. It was the story of a woman engineer who toiled, struggled and devoted herself to the motherland. I am a woman engineer too, I was a Bolshevik like her, and I was a long way from Peking, in the Gobi Desert, the Great North-West, struggling for the sake of my own motherland. I thought I was the Chinese version of her.

"Oh, I've had every kind of worry in my work! What did it mean to be a Big Brigade Leader, and how did I set about being one? I just didn't get it, but I was the first, there was nobody to teach me. At the very beginning we had to set up four starting points for prospecting sites in a day, when we went out in the morning the sky might be clear for a thousand miles, but a moment later we'd be in the middle of a thunderstorm, the light was all wrong for surveying, so the observation points weren't accurate, and inaccurate surveying would affect the quality of our work. The plan had been to finish our mission in eighteen days, but we couldn't make the deadline, we were working on it for a month. That was an anxious time, we all cried together, we all commiserated. At that time we took the nation's plans very seriously indeed; failure to complete your plan on time was like committing a crime, so if everyone was unable to complete their mission, they would be very, very guilty, profoundly guilty.\fn{"And you didn't cry for your children either?"}

"No, I didn't! The children were raised by their two grandmothers, so I didn't worry about them. We couldn't keep the children with us, and the old people were fond of them.

"They complain that their parents didn't bring them up when they were small, they grew up tagging along after the old people, they couldn't even go to school properly. This was the 1960s, the Cultural Revolution, my husband was "struggled against", and he was relieved of all his duties.

"I hadn't had as much pre-Liberation schooling as he had. He was worried that I wouldn't be able to bear to see him punished, so he fixed for me to go and stay in the south for a while. I wasn't with him when the public humiliation and criticism were worst. I felt very guilty that I hadn't taken good care of him—'68 was the cruellest time for him, and I didn't come back until '69. Afterwards we had very poor living quarters, our bed was a narrow slab of wood, we had to squeeze onto it to sleep.

"I had no regrets. At the time I thought: What's the worst that can happen? He'll go back home to the countryside, he can till the fields and I'll weave cloth, and we'll never go back to any leaders' jobs again, a peaceful, stable life is best.

"I can understand it. They struggled against him because he had been to study in the Soviet Union. Relations between the Soviet Union and China had been good, then later they deteriorated, and he became a running dog of the Soviet Union, and the knowledge he had studied in the Soviet Union for the sake of the nation became a crime.

"The young people today haven't let themselves get caught up in political movements. We were witnesses to the whole process, we were the ones who went through it all. First it was suppressing counterrevolutionaries, later it was the Three Antis and the Five Antis, then the Four Clean-Ups, then the Anti-Rightist campaign, one movement after another. They haven't experienced that spiritual pressure, or seen the pathetic figures their parents cut on the stage in those sessions.

"Young people nowadays … judging by our own sons and daughter, they don't have our faith or sense of responsibility. In our day, work came first.\fn{"Do they understand you?"}

"Yes, they do, but now I feel very ashamed and full of regrets. We didn't bring up our three children properly, because we were both so devoted to our own work. When they were the right age for school it was the Cultural Revolution, and because their father was a ‘bad man’, they weren’t considered suitable. It wasn’t till they were grown up that they went to the adult education school, and they found that really hard going. At that time we both had ambitions, we were both educated people and we had very high expectations for our children, but none of them measured up to our ambitions, not even in education. All this was because we had buried ourselves in our own careers, our careers for the sake of the future they have today, yet our children were rejected by the times.

“I … I think I have no regrets of any kind about my choice of career, in spite of the illnesses I picked up, the stomach problems and the rheumatism I have now. When I recall the hard work of those days, I feel very proud, I feel I have brought honour to my own life, because a person who has never experienced hard work and suffering will never know how sweet work and life can be afterwards.

“The idea of women’s liberation in those days was very masculinised. I wanted to be able to do anything boys could do. In the propaganda team I wanted to dress up to play the boys’ roles. My father told me that he wanted me to have the same success as a boy—whatever a boy could do, he required me to do, his demands on me were very severe. There are other stories of Chinese women too, Hua Mulan following the army, Qiu Jin in the 1911 revolution, and Communist women like Song Qingling and Deng Yingchao. Those women influenced me a lot—in those days we were all imitating heroes.

“I feel that I was right. China’s current greatness and strength didn’t just fall out of the sky, it’s only the hard, bitter struggles and sacrifices of the previous generations, one generation after another, that have given us the China we have today. If you don’t believe it, ask You\fn{Her husband} later—our generation just had more spirit than today’s young generation. Other things I can’t be certain about, but we’re of one mind about the price we paid in those years for our work, and for the motherland.

“It’s a miracle he’s still here. He’s had a lot of narrow escapes, he'’s been in car accidents, aiya, several times he’s come out safely from some pretty scary situations. Once he was in a truck that turned over—he was on his way to help some other people, and his vehicle turned over in the same place; that big Liberation truck went belly up, all four wheels pointing to the sky, and the people inside all came tumbling out from inside the cab. He’s been to that big desert they call the Sea of Death—for every ten people who went in nine never came out again. After the Cultural Revolution he became a big leader again. He must have received honours from every institute of learning in the world, rushing here and there, flying all over the place. He didn’t retire till he was over seventy, and he’s still climbing up and down the mountains, organising efforts to alleviate poverty.

“He’s very strong, he’s a very loyal friend, very practical, and in the time of the Cultural Revolution he didn’t make wild statements about other people in order to clear himself. He’s a good husband.\fn{“Is he a good father?”} You can only call him just about average, because none of the children have grown up into people of accomplishment. None of them have his deep scholarship, none could ever equal him.

“I’m really not very outstanding. I have ambition and I’ve struggled.\fn{“As a woman, as a wife, as a mother, as a grandmother?”} I don’t know what to say. I want to make it up to them by being a mother and grandmother to them. And I don’t know if they're grateful for what I’ve given up, coming to live in this out-of-the-way place. I want to go to the Old People’s University too; I want to play mah-jong, take part in singing contests, sing songs, go on trips to scenic spots. But because I didn’t do a good job of raising them before, now I’m retired I want to repay the debt I owe my children through my grandchildren. These aren’t very grand ideals, but they come from the heart.”

77.52 & 82.111 1. Such A Beautiful Sunday 2. Foolish Eighteen: Two Short Stories\fn{by Kang Yun-wei (1938-)}
Hopei Province, China (F) 16

1

I followed him outdoors, glad to escape from the grim, chilly interior. Outside, the sun was gloriously bright and the sky a deep sea-blue. At this time of year, however, the sunlight did not penetrate the interior and, in the absence of the sun’s rays the interior had grown dim and almost mildewed.

“It’s OK, I can wash my own clothes.” He shook his head and stopped beside the wash-tub under the eaves.

“Let me wash them. Didn’t I tell you I was going to?”

I shouted to him from behind. I thought of how, just now, in that grim, chilly house, I had flared into anger against that grim, chilling man. Still deeply disturbed, I shouted”

“I wash all your clothes now.”

“Twice at most,” he calmly replied, glancing at me. His tone of voice matched his glance and I felt as if I had received some insult against which I was helpless. I blurted out in anger”

"At least six times."

"OK. Let's say six times," he concluded as he began washing.

Let's say six times! Why did he have to put it so flatly? When I had bent over his clothes with the perspiration pouring down my forehead I had wanted to do everything for him. And he says, "Let's say six times," summing up my everything so flatly. I stood behind him, burning with anger and trying to think of something to say that might sting him. But I couldn't do it. I had no experience in making stinging remarks. You have to be cold-blooded to do that. I'm a very meek person by nature, so like the lion with an ant in his ear, I have to put, up with being made fun of.

He stood there washing his clothes with great concentration. The tub was now filled with soapsuds. Anger went on churning within me like those suds overflowing from the tub. How can there be people who completely disregard the feelings of others? How? A sudden feeling of pathos, of pity for myself and others, wiped out my anger, demolished my will and strength.

I stared at him in bewilderment. His wrists were covered with white soapsuds, The cement-covered ground, grooved by the constant flow of water over it through the years, was also covered with an overflow of suds. I suddenly felt a strong attraction to those bubbly suds. I wished that I, like him, could plunge my hands into them and wash clothes. For some inexplicable reason, I wanted to cry in my desire for that simple pleasure. He turned on the faucet and, with weary eyes, I watched him pour out those white suds.

I walked slowly to the yard and sat on the grass, gazing up at the sky and thinking of those appealing soapsuds spilt out on the ground. I remembered when I was a young girl I liked to sit on the river bank near the Catholic church, looking at the reflection of the blue sky in the water or, putting on the glasses which corrected my myopia, gaze out at the green hills and the red bricks in the buildings of the Catholic church. White clouds, blue sky, green hills in the distance and the red of the Catholic church buildings—all blent into a fairytale landscape. When I put on my glasses they all took on glory and splendor.

I lowered my gaze and noticed a plant I had long forgotten. I called it "bittersweet." Plucking one of them I held it to my nose and sniffed. I don't know the real name for this plant. It is a creeper with round leaves and a bitter odor. When I was a young girl without a care in the world I used to call it "bittersweet."

"We'd better watch out for the baby." It suddenly occurred to me to say as I chewed on the plant, "the Yang's baby has been catching one sickness after another and is in terrible shape."

"This is the ninth time."

He didn't turn his head but from his tone of voice I could see the teasing smile playing over his lips. I couldn't help smiling too. Perhaps I had already mentioned it eight times. It was because he couldn't stand any more of my chattering that he had just dashed out of the house to wash his clothes. Was I really such a chatterbox that people couldn't stand me? What had happened to the quiet little girl who used to like to sit on the river bank near the Catholic church and look at the sky reflected in the water?

I bit my lip and smiled as I watched him in silence.

He washed away at his clothes with such concentration he seemed to be enjoying it. Nothing could bother him. The agony I went through in childbirth didn't shake him a bit, either. He had once smugly written to a friend of his:

"We went off to the hospital at two AM, I brought along a lot of newspapers and magazines to read. When I heard her in the delivery room giving off one shrill scream after another, I knew it wouldn't be long now. The other men in the waiting room were acting as if something dreadful were about to happen, pacing anxiously up and down the hallway. I felt like inviting them to sit down and read a newspaper. Relax for a bit. 'When the gourd is ripe, it will fall by itself.' What's there to get so nervous about?"

Nothing causes him any anxiety. He has no idea that man is an emotional animal. Even if I live to be a hundred years old, I'll never forget that cold night, when I was lying there in the delivery room struggling with pain, afraid I was going to die. Suddenly there he was in front of the bed like a light from Heaven. I gazed at him longing for him to take my hand and give me strength. But instead he looked at me strangely in my suffering as if he didn't know me.

"I want a drink of water. This is more than I can bear," I blurted out amid my moans and then screamed in anguish, "I don't want to have a baby." My heart was drained of all the desires it had ever cherished. I clutched the railing at the head of the bed in my agony. My fingernails scratched against the ice-cold bars. It often comes back into my mind—that heart-chilling, rasping sound.

While I was going through all that suffering he never stretched out his hand toward me. He later explained that it hadn't occurred to him. Appalled by this remark, I replied:

"It's a perfectly natural action. Anyone would have done it under the circumstances."

He pointed out that even so he couldn't have taken my suffering on himself.

"But at least you could have given me a little consolation," I couldn't help saying. "You don't care what anyone suffers. You're a frightening, frigid man."

"Why did I come into the delivery room, then? It's not a place they let just anyone walk into."

Had he come into the delivery room because he was anxious about me? But he had looked at me so oddly, as if I were a complete stranger.

"Suppose I had had difficulties in labor?"

"But you didn't."

"I said suppose."

"I would have done everything possible to save you. I would have spared no expense."

"Do you really mean it?"

"Of course I really mean it," he said, "I don't want to discuss this with you any more. You]'re picking a quarrel about nothing. Every day so many women have children. If it were as hard as you make out, we wouldn't have to worry about overpopulation."

He always talks on and on like that at me until I haven't a word to say. I just look up at the sky in utter bewilderment. When I want to draw a little closer to him emotionally, is that picking a quarrel about nothing? Whenever the baby is sick I always tell myself there's no reason to be alarmed. We live in a modern age with a high standard of medicine and doctors can cure illness. There's no need to get emotional or make a big thing out of it. But his attitude of total unconcern about everything is beyond me.

The vast expanse of the sky and the sweet-sour "bittersweets" were no help to me any longer. He finished washing his clothes and went back into the house. A wave of anger at being slighted swept over me again, ruling me with confusion. I quickly rose and followed him in. I would have liked to stay in the, garden enjoying the sky and the "bittersweets" but this anger at being slighted overcame all other feelings. With an irrational masochism composed of self-pity and self-contempt, I went back into that grim, chilly house to try to regain my value in the eyes of that grim, chilling man.

He was stretched out very comfortably on the sofa with his feet on the coffee table. The phonograph was playing Hoffman's Boat Song. As he poured out a cup of hot tea he proclaimed:

"If the ground were all scattered with gold, the fool would still not know how to find any."

Slowly, he drank a mouthful of tea. Although the amount of tea involved was very little, he made so much noise about it one would infer that it must be very tasty.

"Now that you've got some spare time, you might listen to some records. They all seem to be records you bought," he said seriously. "You're a very strange person. Probably you don't even realize it." He looked at me and then added in a kinder tone: "You look pale. Why don't you go to a movie. Everyone needs a little variety in life."

Was I pale? I subconsciously raised my hand to rub my wan cheek. Everyone needs a little variety in life. But I had made myself into a strange and pathetic creature. Perhaps I should go down town and look for some excitement amid the throngs of people. I had been hibernating in the shade too long.

I washed my face and sat down in front of the dresser. The mirror reflected my pale face. I took out a comb and began listlessly to comb back my hair. After a while a malicious smile began to play over my lips. I put on lipstick and painted my eyebrows. The malicious smile began to deepen. I remember I had once seen a woman in a movie who looked like that. But she was playing the role of a schizophrenic. I quickly put the mirror aside.

The baby began laughing in her sleep and I stepped over to the side of her crib. The green blanket set off her pink skin wonderfully. I put out my hand as usua1 to touch her forehead. Her temperature was normal now but I wondered why she had had a sudden feverish spell last night. I gazed at her face and wanted to pick her up and hold her. Did she realize she was my precious baby?

I'd much rather talk to someone about my baby than go down town. I'd like to talk about her little, pink face and her sudden smiles. She was just four months old and fresh and tender as a lemon blossom.

"Well, are you going out or not?" he asked impatiently. "If you don't I will. It's such a beautiful Sunday."

The sunlight had not yet penetrated the interior of the house. I had been living in this dim, chilly atmosphere too long. I must escape. I must find action and excitement amid the crowded streets down town. I was a stupid fool who didn't know how to find the road to his heart.

I went into the bathroom and washed away my lipstick and eyebrow paint with soap. Then I took a face cloth and rubbed my face vigorously until it hurt.

“Here’s two hundred dollars.”\fn{A note reads: 200 NT dollars equivalent to 5 US dollars.} He stared in amazement at my smarting face. “Treat yourself to something good to eat, have a good time and see a movie.”

I took the money. I realized that he was being perfectly sincere. But why couldn’t I just stay home and talk to him about the baby? Or about something else? Before we were married we had had the most enjoyable talks on all kinds of subjects.

“When the baby wakes up,” I said, “give her her bottle.”

“Sure. I know. Once every four hours. Right?”

“Three spoonfuls of powdered milk and a hundred and eighty c.c.’s of water.”

“I know.”

“Be sure and wash the bottle.”

“Don’t worry about it. Have a good time. I’ll take care of the baby.”

Why wasn’t he that nice about other things? Why did I only want to talk to him about the baby?

“Change the baby’s diapers regularly. Don’t let her cry.”

“Right. I know.” He was clearly impatient. I felt that I wanted to say something more, but what? I was like a chattering woman who doesn’t know what she has already said and what she wants to say next. I just felt that there was something else I ought to mention.

I opened the screen door and walked listlessly out. Such a beautiful Sunday. Where would I go? I didn’t like to see a movie alone. As I stood hesitating in the yard, I heard the baby crying. I thought I had better give her her bottle myself, before leaving.

“What did you come back for?” He was standing at the crib, changing the baby’s diaper and turned his head to look at me.

“I’ll fix her bottle before I go.”

I saw him shake his head. I said nothing but got the bottle and poured out the milk. I was used to his cavalier treatment of me. I fixed the bottle and gave it to him. He gave me a bright-eyed stare and laughed.

“Do you know what happened when Lincoln freed the slaves? The slaves wanted to stay with their masters because they didn’t know what else to do.”

I couldn’t help breaking into loud laughter. I never know before that I had such a piquant husband.

The baby had her eyes fixed on the bottle so I didn’t pay any more attention to her. I put the movie section of the newspaper in my purse for possible reference.

I hadn’t been on a bus for a long time. Inside the crowded vehicle, I felt I was going to vomit. Actually, that could not be possible. My impression is that only country hicks who seldom travel ever get sick on a bus. Naturally, I was never bus-sick either. Actually even when I was pregnant I had never vomited. But I felt nauseated just as if I were sick.

When the bus finally managed to get downtown, the bellowing of the Beatles was audible from a record shop. I was not familiar with them. I didn’t even know Chinese singers like Ling Po. I only knew the old timers. I now had to be careful of the traffic as I was almost run over several times.

After I had already bought a movie ticket I discovered my glasses weren’t in my purse. I am so near-sighted that without my glasses I can’t see a movie. I looked at the posters behind their glass cases. A little girl came running over and tried to sell me some watermelon seeds. I have never had the patience to eat watermelon seeds but she was so insistent that I didn’t know how to get rid of her. I finally gave her the movie ticket I didn’t know what to do with. She just stood there, staring with wide-open eyes. Evidently this had never happened to her before.

I hurried away from the crowd in front of the theater, not knowing where I wanted to go. I didn’t dare cross the street alone, I was so terrified of the endless stream of cars. As I followed the crowd, I thought of the famous passage from Lamartine.

“Perhaps amid the crowd there is an unknown soul who understands the depths of my soul and will respond to me.”

Reciting this poem, I followed the crowd around a corner and up a street. I was wondering whether I wanted to pass the whole day like this. I didn’t feel like going into a department store. I hate to have the sales girls hounding me with the question:

“Is there something you’d like?”

But I couldn’t go home. I don’t want to be like the slaves that Lincoln couldn’t free. And besides, it was such a beautiful Sunday.

2

That Spring, I was eighteen. On registration day of the last semester of senior high I took the nine o'clock train to K Town. As 1 walked out of the train station, I saw Yu Hsiao-yuan at a vendor's stand eating fish balls.

"Yu Hsiao-yuan!" I yelled loudly.

"Hi, Fang Yi-an," she replied, lifting one hand to wave to me while holding a bowl in the other.

"You glutton."

"I came here to meet you!" She gave me an impish look as she swallowed the last fish-ball.

"How nice of you. Where's Chung Ling?"

Chung Ling, Yu Hsiao-yuan and I had been classmates since junior high, but we had grown much closer over the years.

"Chung Ling," said Yu Hsiao-yuan sourly, "is the only one you ever think of."

"Please don't get upset," I apologized, "some more to eat? My treat."

"No," she replied, wiping her mouth with the back of her hand, "but you can pay for the bowl of fish-balls I just ate."

I shook my head.

"You needn't shake your head. I'm not getting a free meal off of you. I made a copy of the algebra homework for you."

"Really!" I said as I looked at her questioningly. If she had made a copy for me, I wouldn't have to rush to get it done.

"Of course, for real," she said. "I went to Hsueh Fen's house to copy it yesterday. I knew you wouldn't be able to do it and you'd be rushed like hell to do it when you got here, so I made a copy for you."

"You're such an angel!" I said in appreciation. I didn't care if old Lady P'an did shake her head at me. What a despicable creature. She always looks at me as if I had done something unspeakable. Let her hate me. If only she could show a little sympathy for my poor brain, which wasn't at all suited for mathematics, I would have done anything to pass the exams even if it meant eating the text book.

"I'm not an angel. We're in the same boat, so we should help one another." Yu Hsiao-yuan glanced at me, "however, there's a string attached—you must buy me fried rice-thread noodles after registration."

"No problem," I said generously.

K Middle School was about a ten-minute walk from the train station. When we arrived at school, there was a long dragon-like line in front of the registration office. We didn't see Chung Ling in line. I scanned a crowd under the trees. Under the big tree closest to the classrooms, I saw Chung Ling and Feng Ch'in. I drew Yu Hsiao-yuan along in their direction. Chung Ling saw me and called out,

"Hi, Fang, you're so early!"

"Just a little later than you girls." I laughed, running over to them. I hadn't seen them for a long while. I felt a stream of happiness gushing from my heart, flooding the ground and flowing under the big tree.

When Yu Hsiao-yuan arrived, she waved her hands vigorously in front of Chung Ling and Feng Ch'in.

"What are you doing?" Feng Ch'in yelled.

"Would you please, please," said Chung Ling looking up at me, "take her away."

"I haven't done my physics homework yet!" I lowered my head trying to locate their physics notebooks. As long as Yu Hsiao-yuan didn't bother me, I didn't care what kind of mischief she got into.

"You haven't done your physics homework either?" Yu Hsiao-yuan stared at me wide-eyed, "you're really in trouble."

"You don't have to be so self-righteous," I said carelessly, giving her a punch, "you're not much better, you probably did yours in the last two days."

"We're alike," Yu Hsiao-yuan smiled happily, "we're of the same ilk." As she finished speaking, she deliberately waved both her hands in front of Chung Ling and Feng Ch'in.

"Yu Hsiao-yuan, do you have epilepsy?" said Feng Ch'in, pointing at Yu Hsiao-yuan's nose. "Not long ago, when she was sitting at her desk, she constantly moved her legs to and fro. We couldn't even write, so we want her to meet you, telling her that you would buy her something to eat. Now it's her hands that are moving uncontrollably—she must have epilepsy."

"Me, epilepsy?" said Yu Hsiao-yuan raising her voice, "you must be responsible for what you say."

"Responsible for what?" said Feng Ch'in harshly. "I won't be nice if you act crazy again."

Yu Hsiao-yuan closed her mouth tightly, scrutinizing Feng Ch'in from head to toe, only to realize that she was much taller.

"You're taller, I can't fight with you. Take your time copying while I go report to the military instructor."

"Do you dare?" asked Feng Ch'in.

Yu Hsiao-yuan was off in a flash. It became quiet under the tree. I leaned over Chung Ling and asked her what she was copying.

"Physics," she said sternly, lifting her head.

"You've got nothing to be cocky about. I didn't mean that you had to copy it for me." I took out my pen, opened my notebook and started copying. But before I could finish one line, Chung Ling spoke:

"Don't bother. I've almost finished copying it for you. Yu Hsiao-yuan copied the math homework for you, which reminded me to copy the physics homework for you; otherwise, we'd all have to wait for you to finish copying before we could go to registration."

I gave a silly laugh, not knowing how to express my appreciation.

"You'd better be careful, your homework is written with several different handwritings," Feng Ch'in said.

"Don't worry!" I answered. "They don't give a damn. At most they just write an OK in red on the notebooks. If they did otherwise, they wouldn't have students like us. Just look, everywhere someone is copying homework from the Winter break."

Feng Ch'in and Chung Ling didn't say anything; their heads were bent in concentration as they copied. I sat there and stared at them blankly. How did we get this way? When I first entered the seventh grade, I would be in a panic if I left one math problem unsolved. By the eighth grade my interest had turned to writing notes to my classmates and to my teachers. The biology teacher had a slip of the tongue and said heiyagao instead of hsueyagao; and the history teacher read liude fafa instead of liaode huahua; we laughed like crazy and to this day I still couldn't guess which province they came from.

The chemistry teacher was even funnier. He was a short young man who was once a brilliant graduate student in the chemistry department at National Taiwan University. Every time he showed up in class, he never wanted the Class President to announce "Attention!" because when we all stood up, he could not be seen any more. He always stood, murmuring chemistry formulas as he wrote them down on the blackboard. Yu Hsiao-yuan said he recited all those formulas because he was planning to go abroad for his PhD. The funniest time was when he gave us a quiz. I didn't know the answers, and neither did Chung Ling nor Yu Hsiao-yuan. The chemistry teacher sat there staring at us with a long face. The others had no chance to pass us the answers. Class was half over when he suddenly said:

"Take out your book and copy the answers; it's not fair that those in the back do so."

The English teacher was more interesting. He was over seventy-five; he had white hair and white beard like an immortal in fairy tales. He liked to hold his book up in front of his face and read as he walked around the class. When he discovered a student sleeping over her desk, he would ask her to answer a question or read a paragraph. If she were unable to do so, he would kindly say:

"Young sister, sit down. From now on don't sleep in my class."

It was said that he studied in England and that's why he had such nice gentlemanly manners. There were more them fifty students in our class; he called everyone "young sister."

I lifted my head, empty of thoughts and looked up at the sky through the leaves when I heard Yu Hsiao-yuan yell:

"Girls, Teacher Tung quit, he's gone!"

"You"re a liar!" I looked at her, "you're talking nonsense again."

"Why should I lie?" She walked over and leaned against the tree, her face full of sadness as she sang a song written by Hu Shih: Where Are You, Friend.

"He's silly," said Feng Ch'in, "how could he marry such a woman and make a fool of himself?"

"Such a woman?" Yu Hsiao-yuan said, staring at Feng Ch'in, "you girls are so shallow. You're just like the rest, all saying that's what he gets for marrying a teahouse waitress. You know Teacher Tung was the kindest teacher at school. He graded us according to our eagerness to learn and not solely on our scores like the other teachers. I'm sure that before he married her, he thought that an uneducated woman would be simpler and more well behaved—"

"Enough! There's no need for a long lecture," Feng Ch'in cut in. "I respect him, that's why I feel sorry that such a thing should happen to him. The newspapers are full of those notices about 'runaway spouses.' Teacher Tung always told us that everything is upside down these days."

When we were in the first year of high school, Teacher Tung married an ugly, uneducated woman. Within six months, she stole his money and ran away. When we were in our sophomore year, she came back and Teacher Tung accepted her. Last year she gave birth to a son, then ran away again. Why should this sort of thing happen to Teacher Tung? Though he is short, his eyes are bright, shining with intelligence. The first time he came into class, he called the roll, after that he never brought the roll book with him. He was such a nice teacher, why did he marry that kind of woman? I don't know how Teacher Tung will explain this to himself, either.

After registration, we took the eleven o'clock train back to Taipei. On the way, we met Liu Ssu-ming and Chen Wen-ying. Yu Hsiao-yuan saw their curled hair and shouted out in great surprise:

"Are you crazy? You've had permanents!"

"It's none of your business," said Liu Ssu-ming glaring at her. She and Chen Wen-ying had also had their hair cut and they looked very cute with short curls.

Yu Hsiao-yuan stuck out her tongue. We said good-bye to them and went on our way. We had walked but a few steps when Yu Hsiao-yuan turned to look back at them.

"Those two are really wild. They went dancing at Tao-yuan with some air force guys."

"You should talk! You've had a boy-friend since you were in the eighth grade."

"She was doing that out of charity, you know," laughed Chung Ling.

"Shut up, you two," said Yu Hsiao-yuan, laughing too. "It's strange. My sister didn't want him, so, feeling sorry for him, I wrote a letter to comfort him. After all, what does an eighth-grade student know about love? It just doesn't make sense, that's all. But, to tell you the truth, Big Head still treats me like his little sister."

Yu Hsiao-yuan was a funny girl. She always kept us in stitches. She made Chung Ling and me laugh until it hurt. When we were in junior high, Yu Hsiao-yuan showed us Big Head's letters, which were written in a very odd printed hand. I remembered one of them went something like this:

> My handwriting is not as good as yours, so I won't write a long letter. The sinking of the ship Eternal Peace gave me a feeling that all things named Eternal Peace such as Gate of Eternal Peace, Hall of Eternal Peace, are never at peace. Our ship is at sea now. I'm having a cigarette and a cup of coffee, if you were here it would be even better. Therefore, I'm trying to recall all the things that happened to me in the eighth grade.

Letters like that made us believe that there';s nothing wrong for such a young girl like Yu Hsiao-yuan to correspond with a man. On top of that, Big Head had a pen name which he put on translations of light reading that he did for the newspapers. We all envied her for having such a boyfriend.

It was eleven o'clock when we arrived in Taipei. Yu Hsiao-yuan said good-bye and walked off towards North Gate with some students from another class. Chung Ling and I walked down Chung Ch'ing South Road. Suddenly I got the idea of asking my father for some money to see a movie.

"I'd be embarrassed."

"There's nothing to be embarrassed about. Just follow me."

Entering The Oamei Store, I dragged Chung Ling upstairs. Old man Jia saw me and announced, "Young mistress is here." All the employees in the Store lifted their heads and greeted me, which made me quite uncomfortable. Going into my father's office I told him,

"Papa, you should move your office outside and let your employees move into your office. This way, every time I come here, I wouldn't have to say anything to them."

My father laughed and asked if we were finished with school for the day. Chung Ling told him we had no class on registration day. My father also asked if Chung Ling had seen any movies.

"That's what we came for, Papa," I said, "there's a 12:41 show at The Great World Theater—Roman Holiday. \fn{Released in 1953, a story about a young princess who escapes her entourage and spends a day wandering on her own around Rome, Italy; it starred Audrey Hepburn, whose performance won for her an Academy Award, a Golden Globe Award, and a New York Film Critics Circle Award—all from this, her first film presentation.}

Father took fifty NT\fn{New Taiwanese dollars.} from his wallet and, handing it to me, said, "I won't go with you, is fifty enough?" Then he gave me another fifty. I didn't need that much. After paying tuition, I still had more than one hundred left. Besides, I didn't want Chung Ling to know I had a rich father.

As we left my father's office, Chung Ling said: "Your father is nice."

I didn't respond but did give her a sympathetic look. Chung Ling lost her parents when she was small. After that, she had been kept by her grandmother and then stayed with her aunt. In the first year of high school, she gave me a photo of herself sitting on a sofa, reading a newspaper. On the back of the photo, she had written:

This is my aunt's house.

Usually people didn't like to watch noon movies so we could buy the tickets immediately. I felt that just going straight into the theater was rather dull and remembering that I had promised Yu Hsiao-yuan that I would buy her a bowl of rice noodles, I said to Chung Ling:

"How about if I go buy three tickets and you go fetch Yu Hsiao-yuan?"

"What if she doesn't want to come?"

"She will come," I said, sure of myself, "if she's at home."

"Okay, I'll go and see," said Chung Ling.

"I'll buy three tickets. No Yu Hsiao-yuan, no movie."

"Shut up your big mouth," she said getting on her bike.

She was off in no time.

After I purchased the three tickets, I crossed the street to buy some sandwiches and beef jerky from a snack shop. Then I stood by the Coming Attractions posters to wait for them. After just a short time, I became anxious and began eating the jerky, one piece after another.

Chung Ling finally arrived with Yu Hsiao-yuan on the back of her bike. Yu Hsiao-yuan jumped off the bike before Chung Ling stopped.

"I'm embarrassed to let you spend money," said Yu Hsiao-yuan smiling broadly.

"Are you? Then why are you here?"

Chung Ling parked her bicycle, then joined us, mopping her perspiring face as she said:

"I was scared to death carrying her. She must weigh more than a hundred pounds, and she's not that well behaved. She's just like some country girl who has come to Taipei for the first time. She's all excited and talks about every little thing."

"That's because I'm happy I get to see a movie for free," she said, taking a piece of jerky from me and popping it into her mouth as she shook her head, "you know, Chung Ling just likes to spoil the fun."

Roman Holiday was really good. We sat in the theater as if we were movie critics, giving our opinions on every scene, irritating the people around us.

After the movie, Yu Hsiao-yuan said:

"I wish Audrey Hepburn would marry Gregory Peck."

"She can't marry him," Chung Ling disagreed, "a princess cannot marry a newspaper reporter."

Recalling the scene at the end of the press interview, the empty palace and the slow music, all combined to give me a feeling of unspeakable sadness.

On the street, Chung Ling and I pushed our bicycles; Yu Hsiao-yuan walked between us. It was very crowded downtown. I lifted my head, looking up at the tall buildings, thinking of how lonely it would be if all the people suddenly disappeared.

While I was thus wrapped in thought, Yu Hsiao-yuan went into a grocery to buy some peanut candy. I thought she was going to treat us, so I said:

"I'm embarrassed."

"Don't be embarrassed," said Yu Hsiao-yuan, "I bought this candy for my father. If you like, please have one."

"I don't like peanut candy. Take it home and do your filial duty."

"Yu Hsiao-yuan is stingier than Scrooge," remarked Chung Ling.

"So what!" yelled Yu Hsiao-yuan. "At least I'm more generous than you people from Fukien."

"Never mind," laughed Chung Ling, "I don't think you are any better than I even if you are from Peking."

"To be fair, it must be said that Fang is the most generous," said Yu Hsiao-yuan smiling.

Was I generous? I was easily angered by trivial things. Did it make me generous because I spent money on them? I was just lonely and bored all the time. I needed company, that's all. As we walked down Chunghua Road, Yu Hsiao-yuan asked us to see her home.

"No problem as long as you carry her on your bicycle," said Chung Ling.

When we arrived at her home on Chenchou Road she asked us to go in and sit down. Both Chung Ling and I said "no" but she pulled at us and wouldn't let us go. Then she started yelling:

"Ma, Chung Ling and Fang Yi-an are here to see you." There was no way out so we went in. Then she shouted again:

"Pa, see what I brought for you."

Mr. and Mrs. Yu came out to greet us. Mr. Yu kept saying, “good girl, good girl.”

“Come, come, come,” said Mrs. Yu. “Chung Ling, Fang Yi-an, come and eat some.”

I was touched, I felt that the candies in that small paper bag really meant a lot!

When we left Yu Hsiao-yuan’s house, I decided to buy something for my father, but I didn’t want Chung Ling to know. We said good-bye in front of the Presidential Palace. I turned back onto Hengyang Street to buy ten pieces of peanut candy and two handkerchiefs.

I flew home on my bike. Hsin-yi Road, at four in the afternoon, was quiet. I lifted my face towards the sky and laughed a silly laugh. In my imagination, my mother hadn’t left father and me for another man, but had stayed behind in Mainland China or had preceded us to the other world. Father and I depended only upon each other to survive.

I rode my bike down Yungkang Street and passed a multistoried green house; I couldn’t help looking. It was said that it cost five hundred thousand dollars to build and that it was built by a man who owned a shoe store as a gift for his mistress. The large house stood out among all the low Japanese-style houses. It was said that the dinner table could be turned with a touch of a finger, so that the woman could have her desired dish right in front of her. What kind of table was that? I thought about these kind of things as I rode my bike. I had never once seen a beautiful woman come out of that house, its big green gate always seemed to be shut.

Arriving home, I rang the bell. Ah Hsiu didn’t come to answer the door right away. I heard my step-mother and her friends playing mahjong. I wondered if father was home or not. I rang the bell again; finally I heard Ah Hsiu yell from inside, “Coming, coming!” Ah Hsiu opened the door.

“Mistress is winning,” she said, displaying her gold front tooth.

“You’ll get your bonus later.” I felt an inexpressible disgust whenever I saw Ah Hsiu's gold front tooth when she smiled; and my step-mother, though she was a nice-looking woman with white skin, all I had to do was close my eyes and I could imagine the way she held a cigarette in her mouth, the unbuttoned collar of her ch’i-p’ao opened wide and her eyes narrowed to slits, just like a woman gambler. She once told me:

“All my mahjong friends say that I am too nice to you, allowing you not to call me ‘mother.’ I am nearly sixteen years older than you, is it too much to ask that you call me mother?”

I never knew how to deal with her.

I put my bicycle away and asked Ah Hsiu, “Where is my father?”

“In the study, reading the paper.”

Ah Hsiu went back to the kitchen. Normally I would follow her to see what she was fixing, but I wanted to make my father happy that day, so I hurried on in. Seeing me, my step-mother said:

“Have Ah Hsiu make a key for you so that you won’t have to ring the doorbell all the time. Sometimes she is busy and cannot open the door for you right away.”

I didn’t respond, but went straight to my father’s study. I didn’t know if my father loved me or not. When we were together, we had nothing to talk about, but I was his only daughter, and I knew that he never refused me a thing.

“Papa,” I called from behind. He was reading the evening paper.

“Hi, you’re back.”

I always felt that his attitude towards me was better at the office than at home. Perhaps that was because I seldom visited him at work.

“Papa,” I called again, reaching out to take his newspaper away.

“Don’t bother me.” He shifted in his seat with his nose still glued to the paper.

The noise of shuffling mahjong pieces was loud. I stood behind my father, looking at his fat neck. I felt strange and went to my room.

Tossing my school bag aside, I threw myself on my bed. Through the paper door, the noise from the mahjong game in the living room seemed to be right next to my ears. Gradually it seemed as if eight hands were kneading my brain, attempting to smooth out its wrinkled contours. My head felt as if it were expanding, then I faintly heard my father call my name, and after that I remember nothing.

It was already eight o’clock when I woke up the next morning, and the house was dead silent. My head throbbed with pain when I got out of bed. In the bathroom, I intentionally made lots of noise. Back in my bedroom, I found that the peanut candy which I had purchased the previous day and put in my school bag had attracted ants. I yelled for Ah Hsiu and then lost my temper with her. Even after Ah Hsiu took away my bag and cleaned it, my body still seemed to itch as if ants were crawling all over me.

Later, Ah Hsiu brought me the newspaper and in her Taiwanese Mandarin, she said to me, “Yesterday, Master called you for dinner, but you didn't answer. He thought you were sick."

"You're the one who is sick!" I stared at her, then I took the white handkerchief I bought for my father out of my school bag. "Give it to your Papa or your boyfriend."

She smiled, showing her yellow teeth.

"Don't mention it," I said to her in Taiwanese. She walked away happily.

Living in this kind of home, I longed for school to start, but on the first day of school, the people giving speeches gave the students a very bad impression. The Principal, the Dean, the Director of Discipline and the military instructors all wagged their tongues just like those snake-oil salesmen who talk too much.

Though March is not very hot, it was hot enough for all of us to sweat, standing under the sun for two hours. There was no sign of the ceremony ending soon, so the students formed small groups, chatting with each other, disregarding the rules.

As Yu Hsiao-yuan and I chatted, Chung Ling suddenly elbowed me to warn me. Automatically, I shut my mouth. A moment later, we heard a military instructor shout from the podium:

"Yu Hsiao-yuan!"

His shout immediately silenced all the small groups and all eyes focused on Yu Hsiao-yuan!

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself! You're a senior now." The military instructor stood stiffly on the platform.

"Go to hell!" mumbled Yu Hsiao-yuan, as she lowered her head.

It wasn't easy standing through the ceremony, and when we were dismissed, it was like a reprieve.

"Hey, Chung," said Yu Hsiao-yuan standing in front of Chung Ling, "what did you mean by just warning Fang Yi-an when you saw the military instructor watching me."

"I didn't have enough time," Chung Ling laughed, "besides, wasn't it better that way? You're a celebrity now, after the military instructor's shout."

"Okay, Chung, remember this: it's never too late to get even with you. You'll see, I'll give you a chance to be in the limelight."

Yu Hsiao-yuan finished speaking and walked away. Chung Ling and I also slowly set off for class. In the classroom, the students were still complaining about how boring the speakers were. Someone joked that they hadn't spoken to us during the entire winter vacation, so they had to make up for it today.

"Standing more than two hours, it felt like the passing of the four seasons, so I hummed all the popular songs I know," said Liu Ssu-min.

The third class was Chinese. Teacher Tong had left and the Dean wasn't in the office. Liu Ssu-min and Yu Hsiao-yuan got up on the platform and told jokes. We laughed and egged them on to sing songs. Yu Hsiao-yuan voluntarily sang the Song of Ormosia. Her voice was very beautiful and full of emotion. When she got to the words, "Endless the flowing green river," even the students from other classes who were standing outside the classroom clapped their hands.

At that moment, the geography teacher came in with a man who looked like he was in his thirties. The geography teacher complimented Yu Hsiao-yuan on her singing. She was quite pleased. Then she suddenly announced to us, "Next we would like to ask Chung Ling to give us a performance.Give her a round of applause, everybody."

All the students laughed, fixing their eyes on Chung Ling, who was now blushing furiously.

"I don't want to be embarrassed in public," she said nervously.

Yu Hsiao-yuan was very serious and kept saying, "We didn't applaud enough. More and louder applause."

Again there was another uproar of laughter. Chung Ling was annoyed and said in anger, "You're crazy."

Yu Hsiao-yuan stepped down off the platform to face Chung Ling, and with a wink, said, "Chung Ling, everybody is waiting for your performance."

"What did I do to offend you?" Chung Ling angrily asked her.

"I'm just giving you that chance to stand in the limelight." Yu Hsiao-yuan said smiling.

"You go stand in the limelight!" said Chung Ling impishly with a tone of disgust. "I don't know how to sing or dance, and even if you beat me to death, I still won't stand up in front of everyone!"

The students exploded with laughter. The geography teacher and the man in his thirties watched with interest.

"Since Chung Ling insists on not performing for us, we can only .ask her good friend Fang Yi-an to perform instead."

Yu Hsiao-yuan said returning to the platform, clapping her hands. All the students except Chung Ling and I enjoyed Yu Hsiao-yuan's bad joke. They clapped their hands as if they'd all gone crazy.

It was really a bad joke. I wish I could have slugged Yu Hsiao-yuan. Then an incident from our sophomore year flashed through my mind.

We were electing a class President, who was always a good student. I don’t know who slipped my name in among the ballots, but when my name was read aloud by the chairman, she stopped as if stunned and the entire class roared with laughter. I blushed down to my neck as if I had committed some sort of sin. I lowered my head to hide my embarrassment. I was sure that Yu Hsiao-yuan had been behind that bad joke too.

Angrily, I stood up. I wished I was able to sing a song amidst all that cheering and applause.

"If the phys-ed students will join me, then we’ll sing.”

After announcing that, I felt the tension growing. My heart was pounding and my fingers trembled. I hated the fact that I couldn’t sing and wondered why I couldn’t just let it go like Chung Ling had, saying: “I can’t sing, even if you want to beat me.”

“The phys-ed students are willing,” said Yu Hsiao-yuan. “Let’s all sing March of the Young People’s Army.”

My voice was unclear and trembling. I was extremely frustrated when I heard the students outside give a disappointed hiss. Inwardly, I cursed them: “I’m not obligated to entertain you. Why do you expect me to play the clown?”

Tactfully, Yu Hsiao-yuan agreed: “Okay.”

“Stand up.” I gave Chung Ling a push. She stood up shyly, and we started singing:

The beacon-fires fill the sky,
The smell of blood fills the land,
The Chinese suffer unheard of calamities
We grow up in an age of hardship
Tempered in the furnace of this great age.

Whenever I sang this song, my heart always filled with emotion. The phys-ed students inside were not the only ones who joined in the singing—the students standing outside also joined us. As we finished singing, the applause went on for a long time, and my eyes were filled with tears.

The geography teacher stood up and said, “Excellent. I've never heard Fang Yi-an sing before. I don’t know if her voice was any good or not, but I know she is very smart to lead us in this very touching presentation. See, your new Chinese teacher is so moved that he cannot teach class today.”

So the man with him was our new Chinese teacher. Wide-eyed, we stared at him. He was smiling and Yu Hsiao-yuan said, in all modesty, “It was nothing.”

“Not at all,” said the new teacher with a beautiful Peking accent. “This is the most meaningful thing I’ve ever seen. Please continue.”

“We’re happy to perform if the teacher thinks there is meaning in our mischief.” Yu Hsiao-yuan spoke respectfully, but her eyes were filled with daring as she looked at the new teacher.

The new teacher looked at Yu Hsiao-yuan and smilingly said: “You also have a genius for drama, I see.”

“Yes,” Yu Hsiao-yuan said politely.

Then the new teacher asked where she was from.

“Peking.”

“No wonder!” said the new teacher, “people from Peking are born eloquent speakers. Any two people from Peking can perform, if they want to, a comic dialogue at any time.”

We all laughed. Then he asked: “There’s a game called Eighteen Questions, do you know how to play it?”

“No,” we answered.

He began to explain it to us: “Right now, I'm thinking of a person. You all know who it is, regardless of whether he or she is from the past or the present, Chinese or foreign, male or female, old or young. First you ask the gender, then the age, occupation, nationality, and so on. I will answer either “yes” or “no.” After eighteen questions, you should know the person’s identity. If not, you lose the game.”

We didn’t quite follow his explanation at first.

“Let’s give it a try,” he said.

Yu Hsiao-yuan went first: “Is the person Chinese?”

“Yes.”

“From Taiwan?”

“No.”

Yu Hsiao-yuan shrugged her shoulders. Liu Ssu-min followed right away, “A Hong Kong movie star?”

“No.”

Everybody laughed because Liu Ssu-min was a fan of movie stars. She practically worshipped the actress Li

Li-hua. She would defend Li Li-hua if anyone said she overacted or said other actresses like Lin Tai or You Min were prettier. With a look of surprise and disdain, she would say: “What do you mean, Lin Oai is pretty? Li Li-hua is still around!”

I admired Liu Ssu-min’s single-hearted devotion to a movie star, for I had experienced the same emotion in junior high. That’s why I always took her side in an argument. For this reason, she told me in secret that when she was younger, she had liked Li Li-hua, but not any more, and explained, “The problem with Li Li-hua is that she has never realized that she was too old to play the part of an angry eighteen year old girl. It’s enough to give one goose flesh.”

“Is the person a writer?” asked Feng Ch’in.

“Yes.”

“You said the person is not from Taiwan. Is he from mainland China?” asked Yu Hsiao-yuan.

“No.”

“From America?”

“No.”

“In Hong Kong?”

“No.”

Yu Hsiao-yuan lost interest in the game. She pushed me and said: “Hey, Fang, the person isn’t from mainland China, America, or Hong Kong, where else could they be from?”

I thought it’d be funny if the person was in heaven, so I asked:

“Is the person living?”

“No,” he said, “good question, now you know the person is a dead Chinese writer.”

Everybody laughed. Our interest was rekindled. Someone suggested Tsao Hsueh-ch’in, someone guessed Lu Hsun, Li Po, Ou Yang-hsiu …

“All wrong,” the Teacher said, “you didn’t use your brains to ask the questions; I’m afraid you've asked eighty questions.”

His words inspired me, I asked: “Was the person born before the Republic?”

“Yes,” he said, “also a good question, this way the range has been narrowed down.”

All the students looked at me, hoping I could solve the riddle. I suddenly felt smarter, I asked: “Is it a woman?”

“Yes.” He said. “You see, you just found out that the person is a woman after all those questions.”

“Okay,” Yu Hsiao-yuan said, “now we know who it is; it has to be Li Ch’ing-chai.”

“That’s right.” The teacher then asked me if I had ever played this game before. I said “no,” and Yu Hsiao-yuan said in surprise, “It’s hard to believe that Fang Yi-an is so smart.”

It was a very pleasant Chinese class. At lunch time we practiced the new game—some said it was very interesting; some said it was boring.

“The new Chinese teacher is not bad, but he’s not very good looking. His lips are thick and if he weren’t so white, he’d look like an Indian,” said Yu Hsiao-yuan as she picked up a piece of barbecued pork from Chung Ling’s lunch box.

Imagining Chung Ling’s unpleasant expression, I lowered my head to eat my lunch. Yu Hsiao-yuan was really unkind. When we were freshmen, Chung Ling usually opened her lunch box only halfway, keeping all but her rice concealed. At first we thought she did this so that we couldn’t see how poorly she ate. Later, Yu Hsiao-yuan forced open her lunch box and we found delicious soy sauce cooked pork and fish inside. “You look very generous, but you can’t overcome that Fukien stinginess.”

“Do you know the new Chinese Teacher’s name?"

Yu Hsiao-yuan lifted her head and said, “His name is Li, Li Chia-chu. It means he’s a famous thoroughbred of the Li family.”

“How do you know all this.” I looked at her.

“I have well-informed sources.” Yu Hsiao-yuan was proud of this. “Not only can he sing well, but he is also a virtuoso on the violin as well.”

“Shame on you,” said Chung Ling, “you just like to find out things about the men teachers.”

“I have nothing to be ashamed of, I say what I think, my heart is snow-white, unlike a hypocrite like you.”

“You’ve got a lot of nerve. I’m not going to lend you my blouse.”

“What’s going on? What blouse aren’t you going to lend her?” I asked Chung Ling.

“Don’t you know?” Chung Ling looked at me. “Big Head is meeting her at the train station today.”

"Chung, don't be so stingy," Yu Hsiao-yuan said anxiously, "I'll buy you a bowl of noodles."

I looked at the new green blouse that Chung Ling was wearing and couldn't help but laugh. If her blouse were like mine, with a hole in the pocket and faded like withered leaves, Yu Hsiao-yuan wouldn't have been so set on borrowing it.

After lunch we put our lunch boxes away and then went out to the ball field. As we walked, Yu Hsiao-yuan kept pleading with Chung Ling to lend her the green blouse. We sat down under the tree at the end of the field. Before us lay the green field, and behind us, the house where teacher Tung used to live. The house was surrounded by a tall bamboo fence which lent the house a poetic atmosphere. I was wondering who might be living there, when I heard Yu Hsiao-yuan say:

"Li Chia-chu is living in this house now."

We girls talked about everything when we were together, except the subject of going to college. Every time the subject came up, Yu Hsiao-yuan would say: "My biggest hope is to graduate from high school without any problems. I don't care if I pass the college entrance exam. It's a virtue for a woman to have no talent." She continued on in high spirits. "Are you going to get married after we graduate? Eighteen is kind of early to get married. If anyone of you gets married before me, I'll be your children's godmother."

Every time I heard Yu Hsiao-yuan speak this way, I'd recall the time when my father's business wasn't doing so well and we had to share a house on An Tung street with another family. There were five children in the family, and every afternoon, after the man went to work, his wife would go out to play mahjong somewhere. Their oldest daughter, who was nine, would carry her six-month old baby sister over to sit on the stone stairway. With all the energy she could muster, she'd sing one of Pai Kwang's popular songs, Thinking Of My Lover.

The peach tree's pointed leaves
Willow by the river's edge
Little sister opened the window and looked outside:
Oh, lover! Have pity on me.

She sang the song again and again until her voice became hoarse, and even then she kept singing. I always wanted to laugh when I heard her young voice becoming hoarse singing the words, "Oh, lover, have pity on me," but just as quickly I would feel sad and depressed.

"After graduating, you'll be the first to get married," Chung Ling said, "because now you're already thinking about it."

I seldom joined them in talking about marriage. I didn't know what my feelings were toward marriage. I thought of the uniform I had that had the pocket eaten out by a mouse—I had left some goodies in the pocket. I overheard my step-mother tell her mahjong partners: "Our girl has already turned eighteen and she still wears that mouse-eaten dress to school. That is so unusual; it's said her mother dolled up to attract the men when she was only sixteen."

My mother was a sixteen year old seductress? I often used to think about this, but I couldn't remember my mother at all. I only knew of her from photographs; she was very pretty, and quite proper looking. I don't know why she and father were divorced. I got the impression that she fell in love with another man and so divorced my father. I didn't know if she loved me or not, but I knew she didn't want me to stay with her. I often heard that after their divorce, my father wanted me to stay with him and wander around the world and that he never wanted to remarry. However, my mother's father found another woman for my father and then cut all family ties with my mother. For this reason I have a very bad impression of my mother. I don't know if it's because of my mother that I never thought of marriage or not; but since I was a child I imagined that there was a prince charming waiting for me. Slowly my prince became a just and powerful man, someone to think of whenever I was wronged. Later I thought of him every night right after I got into bed and turned out the lights. I thought of him unconsciously, almost like a baby who must hear its mother sing a lullaby before it can sleep.

I don't know if Chung Ling and the others ever had such experiences, or not. I never heard them mention it, and I never told them.

That afternoon, the entire school was involved in a big clean-up project. The office of the dean of students announced that any class passing the clean-up inspection could go home, so for this reason, we worked very hard. Yu Hsiao-yuan, who was cleaning windows, sang Song of Ormosia again. Liu Ssu-min sang Seven Lonely Days in response. Some of the students joined in singing Song of Ormosia and some Seven Lonely Days. Our class thus divided into two teams to sing two songs. Normally one side would grow weaker until both teams ended up singing the same song.

"I have some good news to announce," said Hsueh-fen banging the broom handle on the desk. Old lady P'an will no longer be our teacher."

"Great!" cheered the class.

"Where did she go?" asked Yu Hsiao-yuan, tossing aside her rag.

Feng Ch'in, who was helping her with the windows, said, "Don't sneak off and get out of cleaning the windows, I'm not cleaning your share."

"Last year a student transferred to the Third Class. Teacher P'an discovered that her father was a big shot in the Bureau of Education. She got on good terms with the student's family and even started tutoring her in math. The girl's father got her a place in the Continuing Education for Teachers Program. Now teacher P'an is in the States eating bread and butter."

We all laughed at this.

Liu Ssu-min said, "Hsueh-fen, you're ungrateful; you're a model student. Teacher P'an has been very nice to you."

"The Way of the Teacher has long been out of practice," said Yu Hsiao-yuan shaking her head.

"Don't be ridiculous; come and clean the windows," said Feng Ch'in.

I felt sick after hearing this news. I remembered Teacher Tung telling us that constant war had made the Chinese clever and that they'd do anything for their own benefit.

It was now two weeks since the new semester started. The new math teacher was not as good as Old Lady P'an; Li Chia-chu couldn't compare with teacher Tung, but he liked to recommend essays and fiction by contemporary writers in addition to the standard texts. These writers wrote of their own experiences, what they thought and felt. They touched me very much. I slowly realized that the people of this age bear a heavy burden in their hearts. Everyone has his own problems, and has to struggle vigorously to improve life, not like Yu Hsiao-yuan, Chung Ling and myself, who have no thoughts or ambitions.

On Youth Day, the school held a Wall Newspaper competition. We had not been assigned a tutor, so we asked Li Chia-chu to select some of our compositions. He also gave some suggestions of his own. He designed the newspaper format and a cartoon. Belonging to the literary section of the class, we became very close to him. One time he talked to me about literature, human life and religion. It was the first time in my life that someone took me seriously as an adult. It made me happy and I felt intelligent.

Our Wall Newspaper won the competition among the four senior classes. As Li Chia-chu came into the classroom, Yu Hsiao-yuan was the first to clap her hands. Amidst the applause, Li Chia-chu looked at the black satin banner we had won. Yu Hsiao-yuan suddenly asked:

"Why not be our class-tutor?"

He just laughed and didn't say anything. Yu Hsiao-yuan spoke again:

"Your silence means YES. Hsueh-fen, you go to the Dean's Office and inform him that we have a new class tutor."

"I don't have the experience necessary to be a class-tutor, especially for the girls' class. I'm sure the Dean's Office will assign you a better class tutor," said Li Chia-chu.

"We like you," all the students yelled.

"Let me think about it. Now let's begin class."

He opened the textbook and lowered his head.

"We like you very much and you refuse to accept our appreciation. Our feelings are hurt," said Yu Hsiao-yuan.

Li Chia-chu laughed and lifted his head to look at us. Suddenly, he said loudly, "Okay, I'll do it. Now let's begin class."

"All right, all right!" we yelled.

"Keep quiet, keep quiet," Li Chia-chu lifted his arms, motioning for us to be silent: "Don't be so loud, the Dean will wonder what we're doing if you make so much noise."

Just then, the Principal appeared in the doorway of the classroom.

"What are you doing? What are you doing?" he shouted. "Why aren't you studying?"

"I'll maintain order as soon as class gets underway," said Li Chia-chu, beginning his lecture in a pleasant voice.

I lowered my head thinking how wonderful he was! Time was flying, the second exam was followed by the graduation exam. The school probably intended for all of us to graduate so the examination questions were very simple. None of us tried to cheat on this exam as we had done in the past. After I answered all the questions, I happily discussed the answers with my classmates. Li Chia-chu walked toward me and asked me if I could help him calculate the scores after all the exams were graded. I assented immediately.

The last exam ended before 3:30 the next day. Chung Ling, Yu Hsiao-yuan and I went to see Li Chia-chu. As she stepped through the door, Yu Hsiao-yuan asked him, without even pausing to say hello, "What was my score in Chinese?"

"A very high score," answered Li Chia-chu, laughing.

"The school wants us all to pass, anyway," said Yu Hsiao-yuan with a smiling grimace. "However, Chinese, unlike math, is much easier for me to pass." Suddenly she looked at Chung Ling and said, "Come with me to find out our math scores. My mind will be troubled until I know for sure that I got at least a sixty on the exam."

Yu Hsiao-yuan pulled Chung Ling along with her. Li Chia-chu and I started working. The bamboo outside the window whispered, and the sun shone through the window, illuminating my desk. The sound of rustling bamboo filled my ears. Li Chia-chu was silent the whole time. I seemed to watch the bamboo leaves falling to the ground. At that moment, the entire universe was so silent that it produced an intense feeling of loneliness. I bit my lip, struggling to add up the scores. In a short time, beads of sweat formed on my forehead. Li Chia-chu looked up at me and asked if I were hot.

"No," I murmured, keeping my head down, concentrating on adding up the scores. When I finished, my body was soaked with sweat. I checked and rechecked, but found no mistakes; still, I wasn't sure of my work. I kept asking myself why I was so stupid.

"I'm finished, but there might be some mistakes," I told him with a pang of conscience. "I'm not too good with numbers."

He laughed and said, "It's all right, I'll check them over."

In silence, I stared at the bamboo swaying outside the window. My heart was disturbed with conflicting emotions. Sitting silently in Li Chia-chu's house, I felt as if I had melted into a sad, musical world. My heart was moved with a feeling of loneliness.

Li Chia-chu asked me something, but I heard only the word "hope." I found myself saying to him: "I hope to hear you play your violin."

"How did you know I play the violin," he laughingly asked me.

"I knew that the day you arrived," I said. "We sit under the big tree in front of your house every day, but we never once heard you play the violin."

I didn't know what I said to make Li Chia-chu look at me with such panic in his eyes. Suddenly, he violently took me in his arms and placed his warm, wet lips on mine. Frightened, I tried to push him away. As I struggled, the many cases of rape reported in the papers every day flashed through my mind. When he finally released me, my heart was pounding and my mind was totally blank.

We sat there for a long time; Li Chia-chu didn't say anything. I felt angry and stupid, but I also felt it was laughable that a kiss could produce so much sadness and fear.

Li Chia-chu lit a cigarette. The wisps of gray smoke floated past me, one puff after another. He was obviously showing his impatience while thinking about what had just happened. I felt like vomiting.

"Hey, Fang, are you about through?" yelled Yu Hsiao-yuan from outside the bamboo fence. "I got a sixty, exactly sixty."

I hurriedly wiped my mouth with the back of my hand. Yu Hsiao-yuan and Chung Ling entered. "She ought to be ashamed. She got a fifty-six, but had to plead and beg forever to get a sixty," said Chung Ling.

"Shame on me? If I got a fifty-six in Chinese, you wouldn't let me beg you for such a long time, would you?" she asked Li Chia-chu, then she turned to me. "What's the matter with you? You seem upset. What's wrong? Your face is all flushed. Is the heat getting to you?"

"You're the one with heatstroke, not me!" I was afraid Yu Hsiao-yuan would go on with her nonsense, so I stood up and tugged at Chung Ling saying, "Let's go."

Outside, the sun shone so brightly that I could hardly open my eyes. Was the world really so bright? I raised my hand to shade my eyes from the sun and deliberately walked very slowly, thinking that many things are like the roads one leaves behind, things that would in all likelihood never occur again in one's lifetime.

After we got back to the classroom, Yu Hsiao-yuan chatted with other classmates and Chung Ling put her head down on her desk to take a nap. I took out my notebook and wrote:

> Before today, I respected you very much. Why did you do this to me? What kind of person do you think I am? Did you ever stop to think of how you have disturbed an eighteen-year-old girl's peaceful life? If you didn't mean to toy with me, then please tell me why.

I wrote down my address, tore out the page, folded it neatly, and then I went alone to his office and put the note in his desk drawer. I didn't tell Chung Ling or Yu Hsiao-yuan about this, because I didn't want them to have a bad impression of Li Chia-chu. I. walked back to the classroom with my head down. Suddenly I felt I was a pitiful creature.

After school, Chung Ling, Yu Hsiao-yuan, Feng Ch'in and I met together in the restroom on the train. Chung Ling and Feng Ch'in poked their heads out the window and Yu Hsiao- yuan sat on the wooden sink counter.

"This is the last time," she said, "from now on I cannot sit here whenever I take the train, or people would say I'm crazy if they saw me."

I laughed and she shrugged her shoulders and sadly sang: "After we say good-bye today, when will we meet again, and if we meet, where will it be?"

Feng Ch'in turned her head and said: "Yu Hsiao-yuan, you're disgusting."

It was after 5 pm when we arrived in Taipei. The sun was still high in the sky, but it was not as hot as at noon. The hot sun had softened the asphalt roads. I rode my bike, but it was slow going on the soft roads. I pedaled with all my might, feeling that the road ahead was very long and difficult.

I felt drained of strength by the time I arrived home. When Ah Hsiu told me that my father and my step-mother wouldn't be home for dinner and that she also would like to go out, I cried out, shouting:

"All of you get out of here, get out of here!"

Stunned, Ah Hsiu just stood there. I cried for a long time then I went to the bathroom. Taking off my clothes, I saw my naked body in the mirror. I thought of the virgin nude in the sketchbook and the incident with Li Chia-chu at his house. My face was burning and my heart was disturbed as if it were a lake into which someone had tossed a stone and now the ripples were spreading outward.

All summer long, Li Chia-chu never wrote to me and this made me feel uneasy. While Chung Ling and Yu Hsiao-yuan were attending the Ching-yi English College in Tai Chung, I would ride my bike to the temple on Mt. San-chang-li, where I would meditate. The clouds, the outdoors and the rhythmic clapping of the wooden fish and chirping birds combined to make me feel sober and calm. But leaving the mountain in the evening, I almost longed to see Li Chia-chu. I was ashamed, burning with the passions of an eighteen-year-old girl.

The meditation at the temple made me realize that though I was as pure as white jade, I was already eighteen and I couldn't resist the longing for a man's comfort.

Finally I saw Li Chia-chu on the street. At that time I already had a boy friend who was studying at Cheng-chi-li University. Later, I frequently saw Li Chia-chu with his wife and children walking on the street. We said hello to one another as if nothing had happened. Li Chia-chu told me that he had quit the job in K Town and had opened a supplementary school in Taipei.

Once, while shopping with Chung Ling, we met Li Chia-chu on the street. That was the first time I saw Chung Ling after she had her baby. I told her what had happened between Li Chia-chu and me.

"I never knew you had this secret!" she said, surprised, "why didn't you tell me when it happened?"

"It's no longer a secret," I said avoiding a direct answer. "I often see Li Chia-chu on the street, and I find that he doesn't attract me anymore. I don't have to keep it a secret, because it means nothing to me."

Chung Ling laughed and said as if suddenly remembering: "Cheng will finish graduate school this summer, right? You know, you are the only one of us three that hasn't got married. Yu Hsiao-yuan already has two kids."

I laughed and didn't say a thing. Chung Ling began to sound like an old woman: "Will you get married this year? You don't know, a woman can really settle down after she gets married and has a baby. She won't need anything else."

As usual, I laughed and said nothing as I listened to Chung Ling recount her husband's fine qualities, and then those of her beloved daughter's.

20.104 Between Life And Death\fn{by Su Shu-Yang (1938-)} Hebei [Hopeh] Province, China (M) 7

Ah, here you are. Sit, sit. How about some tea? It's brewed, just ready to pour. What a rare pleasure this is. No other writer has ever bothered to come and sample our life here. Our unit deals with things that make people's skin crawl, I'm afraid: everything in this building is destined for cremation. Anyway, nobody ever visits, since we are only associated with the business of dying. Thse of us who work here are generally deemed unworthy to enter the higher echelons of art and literature. There is a fear, I suppose, that we carry with us the stench of death wherever we go, so powerful as to overwhelm the delicate fragrance of flowers and chase away the Goddess of Creativity, as if even her lute will end up in the fire—cremated alongside the corpses.

Most people find our work crass and lowly, not fit to be embraced into the mainstream of life. We are limited to keeping company with the God of Death. All anybody wants to write about are hospitals and doctors—I have no objection to that, of course, but hospitals and us are close companions—what they can't cure end up on our doorstep. So why is it that they get praised sky-high, while we are somehow less than worthless, our work thought to be devoid of sound philosophy? Philosophy to the arts is like a soul is to the body, I grant you. But these people don't know what they are talking about! Life and death are both full of mystery and surely all religions deal with the relationship between this life and the next. Religion is by nature philosophical! How can there not be philosophy inside a crematorium? Only an outsider could have such cranky ideas! Frankly, people look down on us. They think that just because we spend all our time with corpses we are half-dead ourselves. The Old Society\fn{The pre-Liberation society of China, which the Communists had, until perhaps the last ten years or so, resolutely assumed they had swept away.} used to call us "pall-bearers," the lowest of the low. I regret to say this hasn't changed much, even though sooner or later every writer ends up being part of our 'business.' Just now, however, they'd much rather keep their distance. In fact, we have looked after more writers and artists here than you can count. I dare say the numbers are large enough to form a film studio on the other side, not to say an orchestra, a dance troupe, a theatre company and on top of that a huge writers' union, no less influential than what you might find in this world. Don't you believe me?

Anyway, you are here, that's good. So you almost chose our profession yourself! Don't look so surprised, we have our ears to the ground. Some time ago we were exchanging information with the crematorium you were going to join—to see if we can improve our work in this unit. There are young people here too, you know: men, women, educated people. Standards may not be very high, but we do have quite a few high-school graduates among our staff. In fact, you are looking at one right now.

Our colleague from the other unit pointed at your name one day and asked me: "Do you know so-and-so?" I said yes, of course. "He almost came to work with us, did you know? He is a proper writer now."

I knew your name, although you were down on your luck at the time. A crematorium can produce good writers too, as well as poets, artists, musicians, scientists. It is not impossible. Who can figure out why we are so despised?

Ai, I've talked such a lot of rubbish and still haven't got round to the main theme. I guess you are here to ask me about my family, my wife, things like that?

Where should I begin? Let's start with my father. He spent his entire life servicing the dead, yet he has never complained. He used to say: "Everyone has to die one day. To be good to other people is the same thing as being good to oneself. In life, we may be divided into aristocrats, professionals, beggars, whatever; but the minute we close our eyes, everybody is equal. Over on the other side, it is not fashionable to show off and behave like a bully. Anybody who wants to climb over other people's heads and stand on their shoulders is not going to have an easy ride, there are quite a few revolutionaries over there as it happens. All they have to do is to get on a platform, summon the crowds, and start a campaign. It would be much easier to build a socialist society in the other world I can assure you!"

Can you deny my father's words are full of philosophical wisdom, imagination and poetry?

He used to say: "Being kind to the dead is also to comfort the living, so that those who survive can concentrate on getting on with their own lives. In this way we too contribute to the welfare of the state."

Is this without perception? I don't deny he was also somewhat superstitious. Just before he died—and we looked after him here of course—he said to us: "Don't be sad, dying is just like a light going out. I have lots of friends on the other side. I may be going alone, but once I'm there my friends will band together and rekindle my light."

When my father went he went with a smile. What was there to worry about? His conscience was clear. Whenever he saw a dead body which was over-dressed, wearing a beautiful watch, or a nice pen, he would say to the family: "Keep the good clothes for yourselves, it isn't cold over there, and nobody cares how you dress. Keep the watch too, and the pen. Over there time-keeping is automatic, and everybody uses a typewriter. After all these are things to remember him by, and you may find some use for them later on. Burning everything would be a waste."

During the ten years of the Cultural Revolution we were inundated with people who had been persecuted, dying without justice, often with violence. My father was equally kind to all of them. He would give their faces a good scrub, erasing any trace of maltreatment. Don't think there was no interference though! He was occasionally admonished: “Don’t you have any kind of standpoint on our class struggle?”

My father would look up to the ceiling, and speak with a soft voice: “Don’t shout, his soul is still here. All this shouting might persuade him to follow you home and stick to you night and day.\fn{A belief in the ability of the departed to wander about the earth ghosts was very widespread in the “Old Society,” and these spirits were usually considered as malign and thought of with much apprehension.} Is that what you want? You must realize this is our work, and we have our own standards. If you don’t agree with what we are doing, you are more than welcome to do the job yourself. In any case, what exactly is the nature of your objection? When your time comes, would you want to go with a dirty face?”

I don’t know what you writers think of people like my dad. Was he a good man? Was his soul beautiful? Is he worth writing about?

Another time he was engaged in a debate with a notable pen-pusher at the time. This philosopher had come to supervise the cremation of a man unjustly branded as an “Old Opportunist.”

My father said: “The boundary between a living and a dead man is no more than that of a breath. There are inumerable cases of people who are alive but don’t breathe at all and people who are dead but full of spirit!”

This made the philosopher stop short. He ordered an immediate investigation into my father’s ancestry, to see if he had come from “bad stock.”

The foreman said: “He is descended from three generations of undertakers. All his family ever did was bum the dead. No need to investigate.”

This was what they called “revolution” at the time, can you imagine! And they couldn’t even refute my father’s simple ideas. What do you think? If you look carefully at this world and the next, you’re bound to see the truth in what he says—over there, there are many who have died who will always remain in our hearts, and yet a lot of the so-called living are stone-cold inside.

Me? There is nothing interesting about me. I was a high-school graduate. I didn’t manage to get into a university. My old man said to me one day:

“You might as well follow in my footsteps. Nobody is willing to do what we do nowadays. If it carries on like this, sooner or later there won’t be anyone left to take care of the dead. The socialist doctrine can’t only benefit the living, while the others are left to wait in long queues! It isn’t as if we are a body bank, looking for an overabundance of corpses. No, they must be sent on their way as soon as possible. Our task is to be a comfort to both the living and the dead. Believe me, young man, it isn’t such a bad profession—you are a member of the youth group, show the way …”

At that time my head was full of revolutionary fervor, so I wasn’t too happy about the prospect of following my father into the crematorium. I had a girlfriend too, a graduate of middle school, who collected old junk for a living. She was very pretty, and always smiling. Her name was Er Ya. If you will permit me to borrow a Western phrase—this seems to be the fashion nowadays, and no doubt using it will elevate my status—the smiling face of my girlfriend looked just like the Mona Lisa by Leonardo da Vinci. She had a kind of eternal mysterious smile. We used to sit side by side, and got on extremely well. Nothing obvious was ever said between us, but in the manner we spoke together, the way we looked at each other, things were perfectly understood. I loved her, and she liked me too.

You are still young, you must appreciate the sensation of a first love. Flames and sparks are meaningless adjectives. The way I felt could only be described as bitter sweet, I can think of no better way of describing it. There was always something tugging at my heart, all day long I ached to see her shape, to hear her footsteps. I could happily have spent all my time walking with her silently through the rain, just walking. There was an infinite number of things I wanted to say to her, yet whenever we were with each other, I would become tongue-tied, staring at her like an idiot. There is a Japanese song called The Sailor:

When I think of my baby,
I am filled with melancholy …

Ai, melancholy, that is indeed an apt description. Just imagine, here was a warm and pretty girl who was capable of inducing melancholy in my heart—how was I to rest? I trusted her. I trusted that she wouldn’t be petty or materialistic. I trusted that she knew everyone must die eventually, and move on to the next world, and that somebody has to be there to pave the way, improve their looks, give them some peace. Such a day will come to her too. Surely she would not despise those who will be of help to her in time? I made up my mind. Choosing between work and love, I put my work first, believing that romance and cremation need not be mutually exclusive.

I was wrong. When I told her I was going to work at the crematorium, she told me at the same time that she had had an offer from a film studio to become an actress. She could not accept my decision. She could not begin to imagine how a film star and an undertaker could walk side by side on the street, let alone go to the park and look at roses and peonies, or row a boat under the weeping willows. Clear breeze, drizzling rain, fresh flowers, green grass, poetry and music are all associated with life, the dead are only permitted darkness. Just because I keep company with the dead, people think that I, too, must be half dead, and not to be associated with beauty. Anyway, she didn't say much else. There were some tears, of course, but not enough to stop her from leaving. We said goodbye.

You see, a person's fortunes are often determined in the spur of a moment—the very moment she was invited to star in a movie she changed completely—from a poor girl who earned her keep collecting rubbish into a glittering movie star. As for me, it only took a moment as well, not much longer, to make the decision to become a man who burns dead bodies for a living. In that split second, I toppled from the fairly respectable position of an educated man to being the scum of the earth, undeserving of literature, art, or philosophy. And yet nothing had really changed. Not my education nor her beauty; nothing had altered in our appearance—our bodies, down to the length of our eyelashes, remained exactly the same. But our worth, and the whole way we were perceived by others had turned upside down. Before that crucial moment, we were ideally suited, after that moment, our destinies diverged and sped in opposite directions.

What can it all mean? Today her picture adorns the pages of calendars. People spend an entire month in the year looking at her image. Meanwhile, during the course of the same month, I would have said farewell to many of our contemporaries and waved them off to the next world. You writers love to talk about life. Tell me, how did our lives come to be fractured in this way?

No, I am not so small-minded as to be envious of other people's fame, nor do I want to drag them down to my own level. Neither am I suggesting changing the pictures on our calendars. It is perfectly understandable that people would rather look at a pretty film star than one of us in here! What fool would pay good money to ogle at idiots like us month after month? All I'm saying is that a person's destiny is often determined in a flash, down to the nobility of our minds, or the hour of our death. Sometimes we simply fmd ourselves standing at crossroads, like trains arriving at a junction. Some go east, some go west. Is it really necessary to call the one going east a rocket, or the one going west a pile of twisted old metal? Society needs different skills to function, without us, dead people will have nowhere to go. Anybody who wants to dispute this can try dying themselves, see if they still disagree.

Come, let's take you as an example. Say you really did join that crematorium as a member of staff, and let's say the foreman is a stubborn old fool, and that whatever fancy essays you might have written, he refuses to let you leave. Where would you be today? Would you still be welcomed everywhere with applause? Or would people treat you the way they treat me—holding their noses, rubbing their chests in fear of the smell of death? Whether you are a worker in a crematorium or a writer adored by the public, does your worth fluctuate in any significant way? Of course not! Your height remains the same, although it's true you might not be as fat. Life has its own rhythm-dynamics, its own way of proceeding. Since sociologists have no answers, why should we all spend so much time worrying about status and power? Those who are successful turn up their noses at the rest of us and those who fail—perhaps we shouldn't even call it failure—often try to put an end to their lives. They hang themselves, drink bleach, creating havoc for us here. The important thing surely is to know yourself, respect yourself. That must be enough.

See, I have been getting on my high horse again. Let's talk about her, my old girlfriend, the movie star. Sometimes we would run into each other. If there was nobody around she would stand three feet away and say two words; if she was not alone, that beautiful neck of hers would suddenly change direction showing me the back of her head. I never take any notice of her, whatever the circumstances.

I hear she has gone through three or four boyfriends. Like choosing a chicken in the market, she would pick one up, give its neck a thorough appraisal then decide whether or not to buy. Two years ago she finally got married; maybe he was the sixth in line. I don't know. I've got to give it to her, she sent me an invitation on the day. At first I didn't want to go, but my mother kept on at me:

"Shu Ren, go and have a look. At least Er Ya hasn't forgotten you. She still remembers her old friend at the crematorium. Go and congratulate her, don't let anybody think we are small-minded, or that we have suddenly shrunk in stature. Go on, put on your good wool suit, let everybody see that you are every bit as handsome as the man on the movie screen. Take a good present too, I don't want people to say we have to skimp."

This was the pride of old people talking. I couldn't contradict my mother, so I did as I was told, and went along to congratulate Er Ya.

The wedding wasn't big but it had style. Every guest seemed to have arrived from some foreign beauty contest. Let's just say if you were not at least a meter seven in height, with a sweet dimple on either cheek, eyes the shape of an almond, brows like a new moon, you'd better not be there. When I went in, the bride, Er Ya—I'll call her by her nickname as I'm sure she wouldn't want me to reveal her identity—introduced me to her Number Six with a smile. This man had a big bottom, sturdy waist, thick eyebrows and huge round eyes—the hairy heroic type. He took my hand and boomed at me:

"Ah, my friend, so which company are you with?"

I was perplexed for a moment and thought to myself, I am not a soldier, why would I belong to a company? Of course! He meant a theater company. In his eyes acting was probably the noblest profession on earth.

"He is a poet," Er Ya interjected quickly.

"Oh, a poet!" the groom said.

"No, I am not a poet," I said. "I work at the crematorium. I burn bodies for a living."

"Really!"

The groom was somewhat taken aback, withdrawing his hand.

"Yes, I rub shoulders with corpses every day." I was deliberately nonchalant. "Actually everybody is in regular contact with dead bodies. The fish, duck, chicken and beef about to be served up on these tables are all corpses of animals as you well know. Allow me to wish you both every happiness for your future. Goodbye."

I left, deliberately spoiling their appetite. Did I make too much mischief do you think?

Er Ya said I wrote poetry. This was not entirely without foundation. I write poems and songs in my spare time. Obviously I don't write about our profession, however worthwhile I might think it is. Dead flesh disintegrating in a furnace is not what most people want to read about. Perhaps I should write about the way the make-up is applied?

But that doesn't seem popular as a poetic theme either—in fact, it appears to be something of a taboo. We might work with the dead, but in our hearts we celebrate life. We celebrate the spring, the wondrous effervescence of our days, the warmth of the sun, even down to a blade of grass, or a wild flower—nothing is too insignificant to be the subject of my poetry. I see tears every day, black muslin and white flowers, the power of death, the weight of grief. But these are not the things I focus on. I write about happiness, smiles, how children learn to walk on the lawn, the embrace of lovers under a tree. I write about love, babies, mothers, vitality which goes on generation after generation, undefeated by death.

All the young men who work here learn to write, paint, sculpt, garden, compose songs, play music or chess; they also enjoy ball games and love to swim. We are the guardians of the last exit, but we prepare the dead as if they are about to make their first entrance. Ours is the final frontier between life and death. If you believe there is another world, then death on this side merely coincides with birth on the other. Perhaps this is mere idealism, and that neither heaven nor hell really exists. What we do know is that both life and death are mysterious, subjects which inspire constant fear and interest. Consider this: once, Tom, Dick or Harry didn't exist, somehow, for some reason, they become sentient, they begin a life, they manifest themselves in the world. They are happily going along, then just as suddenly and inexplicably, they don't feel anything any more, they become an inanimate object. How many philosophers and writers have explored this question, yet nobody has written about our work—how we turn tangible shapes into a phantom militia marching into the next life.

Our work is full of mysticism and yet it is thought to be commonplace.

Wouldn't you agree that's odd?

Did you ever consider some of these things before you came to see us? Where we are is like a garden. Despite our daily contact with death, we urge our youth leaders to value life, to go on living with renewed courage. Why must we be the butt of so much antagonism? Those departing are given their fmal solace here.

I say this not because I want you to take up our profession once again. I only want to point out that this job is just as valid as any other. We shouldn't be despised, that's all.

You ask about my wife? Ah, we met at the Cultural Centre. I belonged to the literary group and she was in the music department. I wrote some lyrics, she liked them and set them to music, and we performed the piece at the local concert. She played the strings, I sang. We won a prize. We went to celebrate afterwards. That was how we got to know each other.

She said my lyrics were good, full of a passion for life. I wrote about a small wild flower, how it sprouts in the spring, blossoms, is trodden underfoot, and yet continues to bloom, giving out its own unique fragrance for all to enjoy.

She asked me: “Your observation seems so acute, so full of feeling. How is that?”

I said: “Because I look into the face of death every day.”

She was shocked, she didn’t know I worked at the crematorium. But I knew what she did. She had just graduated from the university—she was a gynaecologist.

After that time, she didn’t talk to me for quite a few months. When we rehearsed at the Center she would just stare at me. I loved her, but I had to disguise my feelings. Those of us who work here are condemned to a single life. I couldn’t tell her I was in love, that would have been disrespectful to Wei Xue—that’s her name—and I didn’t want to upset her. I had to leave her to make up her own mind. If she didn’t love me, I wouldn’t have complained. The full pressure of society on the back of a single young girl would have been too much to bear, and it might well have crushed her under its weight. Besides I had a little self-respect too. Er Ya had bruised my heart, and I couldn’t let another girl break it completely. I felt I had to give myself to my country, to society, to hundreds and thousands of families, look after the dead, console the living. After all my heart was only the size of a fist. I thought that perhaps there wasn’t enough of it to go round.

Eventually one day Wei Xue invited me to accompany her on a walk in the park. Under the newly renovated pagoda, looking into the setting sun, she asked me gently:

“What exactly do you do?”

“I make up the corpses.”

“Aren’t you afraid?”

“I was frightened in the beginning. Not only frightened, but repulsed. Often I was not able to eat after work. But I don’t want to describe their faces and make it even more difficult for you. Anyhow, I got used to it by and by, and began to look upon the corpses as empty canvasses, or sculpting material, and then it was fine.”

“Is there extra bonus in this line of work?”

“No. The wages are the same as everyone else’s. I earn less than you do.”

“What is the value of the work you do? Don’t you fmd it irksome?”

“I don’t want to spout philosophy at you—it’s all so much hot air. All I can say is, when a family sees their relative lying there peacefully, as if they were merely asleep, it makes them think that there has been no suffering, and they get enormous comfort from that. Many people thank me with tears in their eyes.”

She didn’t say anything, her eyes fixed at the clouds in the evening sky.

“Since you have this skill, why don’t you do make-up for people who are alive?” she asked, not unreasonably.

“Because somebody has to do this job,” I said. “I happen to do it well. I also do re-sculpting work. Those with broken noses get new bridges, collapsed cheeks are refilled, wounds are carefully disguised. I also shut the eyes, mend lips which have been torn. In this way the dead can make their exit the same way they looked when they were alive.”

“But what is the point of it all? They are already dead!”

“You are right, my exhibits never last more than three days, then they all end up in the furnace. Nonetheless, in those three days I often experience the most incredible love and gratitude from the survivors, and sometimes it seems to me that even the bodies want to sit up and thank me! My heart would be full to bursting.”

“Don’t say any more, I can’t bear it,” she said softly.

“Aren’t you regularly in touch with death too?” I asked her.

“Yes.” She sighed. “Sometimes I think that the most ineffectual science in the world is medicine. Death always wins in the end.”

“This is a little too pessimistic,” I chided her. “You deliver babies! Babies are born all the time. No matter how many people die, nobody can stop others from being born. It may be true that medicine is in a race against time with death, but it also helps bring life into the world.”

She tilted her head to look at me, then laughed.

“If we became friends, what do you think people will say? Life comes through my fingers, death runs through yours!”

I laughed too.

“We often say that crematoriums and hospitals are intimately linked. Like boats on the same river. You paddle upstream, we paddle downstream. That’s all.”

Later I said: “You welcome life, I give death a proper send-off. You and I are guardians of the two gateways of a lifetime. When we are born we are all equal, when we die we are equal once again. What we do are similarly respectful of the true worth of people.”

Tears were streaming down her face. “I feel very confused, very confused indeed. Why did I have to meet you?” She was sobbing now. “Can’t you lie to me, and say you are a poet? Don’t you write poetry? Haven’t you published a lot of poems?”

'But I am someone who makes up dead bodies. That is what I do every day. I can’t lie to you. This work is not incompatible with writing poetry, a poet is not worth more than a mortician. Really they are not.”

I grabbed her shoulders, and said with feeling: “Think about it carefully before you make up your mind. I won’t blame you whatever you decide.”

I left. The evening sun threw my shadow on the ground, it was long and slender, and I thought to myself, the poet is my shadow, the mortician my true self, but my shadow is worth more than my self in the eyes of others. If you stand a corpse on the ground, it too would cast a shadow. The shadow might even be that of a hero, straight and strong. But there is no life in a corpse. To think that even the shadow of something without life might be admired, and yet I, so full of vitality, can only cause misery and confusion. Tell me, why is that? Attitude? Yes, you’re right. It is to do with attitude. Here is an attitude which clearly doesn’t do anybody any good, and yet people continue to defend it. You don’t believe me? Go and do a survey in the streets. Ask the question: “Can a beautiful woman doctor marry a man who bums the dead?” Answer: “No.” At least ninety per cent will say no. I am willing to lay a bet.

Spring had gone, summer arriving hot on its heels. Then all of a sudden it was time for folks to go and look at the turning leaves on Shiang Shan.

Wei Xue invited me to go with her. We stood on the top of the mountain, waves of red spreading underneath our feet. She was sad again. Letting out a sigh she said:

“Why can’t your profession be different? I am not someone who is interested in money. I don’t need only to make friends with university graduates—a scholar who is shallow is far inferior to an uneducated man who has soul. But you, a beautician for the dead …”

“That’s not so good, is it?”

“It’s not so easy to accept, I must admit.”

I didn’t speak, perhaps more accurately, I had nothing to say. There was a breeze blowing through the leaves. I listened to the sound for a while, and then spoke.

“Look at these mountains, those trees. When we are dead, they will still be here. But even in nature the new is constantly substituting the old. Nothing escapes the ever-changing cycles of living and dying.”

“You seem to be something of a philosopher.” She sighed again.

“Let us part then!” I said. “Let’s not see each other again.”

“No, no, no!” she screamed. “I couldn’t bear that. Can’t you give me some encouragement? How can I face society’s pointing finger on my own? Why don’t you say something? Why don’t you launch an offensive? Don’t you think you are being terribly selfish?”

My brain exploded all of a sudden. She loved me for sure. But she couldn’t face the prejudice of the entire world. She was right, how could I let her deal with this alone? If I didn’t shield her, then I was indeed being selfish. I was waiting to have everything brought to me on a plate. Love is something that occurs between two people, and in order to earn its rewards, one must be willing to fight, to wrench it from the hands of the opposition.

I took her in my arms and said with gratitude, “I love you. Nobody will ever take your place in the world. Even though I deal with death, I am not dead myself. I have just as much passion and energy as the next man. I won’t let you go. I shall make you happy. I may not earn very much, but happiness is not dependent on money. Look at me, Wei Xue, my chest is broad enough to give you shelter.”

She threw herself into my embrace, through tears she said, “I love you and I am going to marry you. One who enables birth can marry one who facilitates death. We shall have a family which lives between these two enormities.”

“Nonsense, in our family there will only be life, because every day we shall shoo death away.”

That Chinese New Year, we were married. All my workmates came—old, young, men, women. Our friends from the Cultural Center, the newspaper and the hospital came too, they all laughed, they laughed so much tears ran down their faces.

My wife is very good to me, there is only one rule: I have to have a bath before I go home. When I get there, she insists I rinse my hands twice more with clean water. I know why of course, she doesn’t want me to stink of corpses. But actually it is she who smells of Lysol. In any case I always tell her I like the smell.

It’s lucky you came today, she has just given birth to our baby yesterday. A little girl every bit as good-looking as her mother. Morticians' daughters are no less beautiful you know!

On the same day, by coincidence, Er Ya's husband died, his body was brought here. He was drunk when he decided to go for a spin in a cheap car. I don't need to tell you how his face looked. I'm sure you can imagine. On the table next to him was a young man, someone who had been sentenced to hard labor twice in his lifetime. He died rescuing a baby who had fallen into the river.

I did the make-up for both of them. Er Ya's husband was too high-born or too privileged perhaps, and lost his life in his empty pursuits. The youth who saved the baby had a tough life, but at the moment of death he was elevated to a state of grace. I am pondering a poem in his honor. Apparently, a famous artist has drawn his portrait, and now a sculptor also wants to make his image, to be erected at the place where he made his sacrifice.

The two corpses and I were all in the same little room. I looked at them both, and felt quite moved. Number Six had looked down on me once, but now waits for me to clean away the evidence of his recklessness. The young man I didn't know, but apparently he had been the target of a lot of prejudice, and had taken one or two wrong turns in his life, but then he was able to prove his worth in death. He will always remain in people's memory, just as Number Six will disappear without a trace—perhaps even while alive he wasn't all that different to a corpse. In my eyes the two men are equal now. As a matter of fact I was far more meticulous with Number Six, since his face looked a lot worse.

Er Ya came. She could see that I had repaired her husband's face, and turned to me with red, grateful eyes. I asked her to go closer and take a good look, say goodbye properly. But she ran off crying. She was frightened of him now. What about when he was alive? Did she ever really love him? Just you wait, Number Seven will be along shortly.

I had just finished working on those two when I got a call to say my daughter had arrived.

So you see, I had barely said farewell to death when life was already round the comer.

I walked through the streets looking at the lights, the cars, the people. I thought to myself, how many people have turned to ashes today? Probably only I knew the answer. But how many were born? I had no idea. Whether you think that death is ridiculous or solemn, it can never put a stop to the never-ending flow of life. People will always remember the achievers, and recount their history for future generations. But it is the insignificant deaths which demonstrate to us how, in the final equation, we are all the same. The way we die hardly matters, one instant and it's all change again. All we can do is to respect our own lives, or the new-born will surely come along and shove us into the furnace!

Ai, why haven't you drunk your tea? What I have been saying, you must promise never to publish. . .

83.7 Auntie Yao\fn{by Yang Ming-sien (1938-)} Peking, China (F) 10

There were two Auntie Yaos living in the same court. When someone stuck his head in the court and screamed "Is Auntie Yao home?" both Auntie Yaos would answer at the same time. "Yes, I'm home. What can I do for you?"

In order to make it easier to tell the difference and not to get them mixed up, people called one of them Fat Auntie Yao. Fat Auntie Yao definitely lived up to her reputation. She weighed no less than one hundred ninety-nine and a half catties, about two hundred and sixty-four pounds. Auntie Yao was not really short, but all that fat on her added to her width.

When neighbors got together and chatted, Auntie Yao often said,

"I was not always as fat as this. If I were, that would really be the limit. My waist measured only two feet and six inches in my younger days. That is indeed slender, wouldn't you say?" She usually gesticulated with her hand as she spoke, and she sounded regretful.

Grandpa Wang smiled his toothless smile and said, "Are you sure your memory does not fail you, Old Sister-in-law? Most likely it was your calf."

They all laughed. Auntie Yao retorted, smiling as she said, "Don't be spiteful, you rotten old man. Watch out that the corners of your mouth don't rot away from uttering such nonsense."

Auntie Yao seemed to be made up of many globular bodies. Her face was big, fat and round; her nose was smallish and shaped like a clove of garlic; her cheeks were round and plump, and she had thick lips. Beneath her eyebrows, which were wide but without much hair, were two small eyes with puffy lids. They looked all right when she was not smiling, but when she did, they narrowed into slits. At the back of her round head she wore her hair in a loosely-knotted bun. A big sphere made up the front of her body from her chest all the way down her tummy, round and well-stuffed. Her buttocks were shaped like two semi-circular spheres. Her bound feet had been released from their bondage but she always just slipped them into her shoes, never pulling up the back over her heels. No matter when you saw her, she would be slopping around as if in slippers. She sometimes wore her daughter's shoes, the kind that had a strip across at the front. Sometimes she wore her son-in-law's laced shoes with ten holes and sometimes even her grandson Hung-hung's shoes. She couldn't care less what she wore as she shuffled up and down the streets.

She wore a loosely fitted blue cotton top in summer and in winter she wore it over her cotton-batting padded jacket. The cotton top was held together by only six buttons, and Auntie Yao never had all of them buttoned. She never buttoned the one at the collar, and the others took turns being forgotten. Being fat, she did not like to tie the belt of her pants too tight, for she felt constrained. On the other hand if she wore it too loose her pants tended to slip, so one end of the long red coarse cotton strip which served as her belt was always hanging out in the back from under her cotton top. Niu-tze, Feng-erh, and some of the other girls liked to tease her, telling her,

"Grandma Yao, your tail is showing."

"You confounded girls, what do you think your Grandma Yao is? A fox in disguise?" Auntie Yao would stare at them with her beady eyes and pretend to be mad.

"We're only teasing."

"Teasing? You tease your Grandma Yao as you tease the crickets?"

"Grandma Yao, if you're a cricket, you've got to be the grand ancestor of all crickets. Who'd ever see such a fat cricket?"

The glib little girl Niu-tze made Auntie Yao throw her head back and laugh.

Auntie Yao's old man passed away long ago. Her oldest son and her second daughter both left home, and she lived with her oldest daughter. The daughter was a ticket-seller on a trolley that her husband drove so the old lady was head of the household. In addition to cooking, shopping for food and doing the laundry, she also had to keep an eye on her grandson Hung-hung. This grandson of hers was well-known for his mischief throughout the whole alley. Their neighbors made briquettes from coal dust, and left them out under the sun to dry. Hung-hung would smash them with his little feet, row by row. While children from their court were playing with a swallow's nest on a sandy slope, he would be turning somersaults on the slope, flattening the nest and kicking up sand into the eyes of the others, causing all the children in the court to scream at her at least three times a day,

"Grandma Yao, aren't you going to discipline Hung-hung?"

"Of course, of course. Who says I'm not going to discipline him? I'm going to give that little devil a good flogging." Auntie Yao went up the street to look for Hung-hung, while Hung-hung circled around playing the game of "eagle chasing after a chick" with his fat grandma. Auntie Yao stretched both her fat arms out to grab Hung-hung, but she never could catch him. Hung-hung made funny faces at his grandma; his head tilted to one side with a smile on his face which revealed his missing front tooth, and with his thumb on his nose, he flipped the other four fingers at his grandma. Thus he made all the kids who had told on him clap their hands and laugh. Sometimes Hung-hung was caught and Grandma would bring him home, dragging him along by the ear. She would give him a beating and forbid him to go out. Hung-hung was so bored he would press his face hard against the window pane, flattening his nose as he did so. Auntie Yao, standing by the door making steamed corn meal bread, would be so tickled by the sight of Hung-hung's crooked nose and mouth, she would laugh and say,

"Oh come out, you bothersome little monkey!"

Auntie Yao couldn't really bring herself to spank her precious grandson. A child would not be a child if he were not mischievous. It would be enough just to scare him a little bit. There was a very good proverb: a naughty girl would turn out to be good at sewing; a naughty boy would have a promising future. Naughty children are generally smart ones. Take a slow child, for instance, no amount of urging could make him mischievous.

This point of view of Auntie Yao's was not accepted by all, The other Auntie Yao, for one, could not tolerate it, and she often said privately,

"Always take the side of the little one and spoil him rotten."

Former old residents in the alley referred to this other Auntie Yao as Yao Erh Nai Nai, Number Two Mrs. Yao, not because she was Number Two Mr. Yao's wife, but because she was Number One Mr. Yao's second wife. Now, in the new society, all were equal and no distinction was made between No. I and No.2. Furthermore, the original Auntie Yao had died, and No.2 Mrs. Yao automatically became No. I Mrs. Yao. Her neighbors also began to just call her Auntie Yao.

This Yao Erh Nai Nai, No.2 Mrs. Yao, was only four years younger than fat Auntie Yao. She was fifty-six years old, tall and slender, with a face which was fair and in the shape of a melon seed, wide at the forehead and tapering off toward the chin. She had large eyes which, though not as bright as those of the young people, were still very alert, giving her a spirited and intelligent look. She wore her hair just the right length, right below her ear lobes, and kept it smooth and shiny. Should any fly accidentally land on it, it surely would slip off. Her blue serge pants were cut like a uniform, and the crease was always well pressed. She wore a light gray color dacron top which was ironed just right. Not to mention the comfort in wearing such an outfit, it was also most pleasing to the eyes.

Yao Erh Nai Nai never opened her mouth without a smile, and when she did it was always about some directives or teachings of Mao Tse-tung's. Those who listened to her couldn't help but admire her and consider her up to "standard," and truly "knowledgeable." Yao Erh Nai Nai liked to read the newspaper out loud, at the top of her voice, but sometimes, she read "a sound beating" as "a sun heating," and "calm and without a sense of shame," as "came and without a scent of shame."

Luckily, her audience was not really paying attention. Auntie Chang was thinking of the bread she had to steam that evening and wondered if the dough had risen properly yet. Sister-in-law Li was thinking that they were running out of food and that as soon as the meeting was over she had to fetch her bag and buy some corn meal. Otherwise what would they eat that night? Uncle Chao had always been hard of hearing. No.2 Uncle Yang seemed to be listening with his eyes closed while in fact he had long gone to meet with Mr. Sandman.

Only Grandma Yang was listening attentively, and spotted the mistakes, but she was one of those whose home had been ransacked during the cultural revolution, she would not dare to utter a word even on borrowed nerve. Yao Erh Nai Nai was therefore left alone to read on and on, passage after passage at the top of her voice and enjoying it to the fullest, swallowing hard and blowing her nose with her fingers from time to time.

Yao Erh Nai Nai was not the "Director of the Revolutionary Committee" for the block, nor was she a member of the Committee or the head of a unit, but she was an "active element" trusted and depended upon by those people. It was not a simple matter to be an "active element." There were not many of them in all the alleys. To be an "active element" one had to, first of all, have the right background. Secondly, one had to run to the director and committee members constantly to report such trivia as that the Changs had failed to make a report about the number of people in residence in their household when they had a visitor; or the Lis were late getting to a meeting; or that during the morning or evening session certain people did not open their mouths wide enough when singing [The] East Is Red; or report the gossip about the director or committee members behind their backs, or about the couples who had a fight the night before, or about the family who had applied for a subsidy from their working unit, but managed to buy two pancakes for their children for breakfast. Better not to even dream of being an "active element" if one is not capable of all of this.

In addition to the above mentioned traits Yao Erh Nai Nai had yet another "superior qualification:" she had numerous friends and relatives who brought her raisins from Sinkiang Province which she shared with Director Ho. She had a bottle of quality vinegar for Mr. Pai, a committee member. A bottle of spirits which she got from a "backdoor" source made a wonderful present when Director Ho invited Master Wang of the Workers Propaganda Unit over for dinner. This bottle was indeed the unifying force between them. Aside from all these, Yao Erh Nai Nai had at her disposal more money, more rice coupons, oil coupons, cloth coupons, and so on, than any of them. Some day Committee Member Li would borrow fifty cents from her, and on another day Unit Chief Chang would borrow three catties' worth of flour coupons.

Yao Erh Nai Nai never dreamed of asking them to pay her back. She was "generous." Furthermore, she was smart and clever with words, and most apt at turning with the tide. All of this made her a "red hot" personality of West Huai Li Alley.

Take, for instance, the "struggle" meeting which took place two days ago when quite a few representatives made speeches, but when it came to making exposes and accusations none of them were Yao Erh Nai Nai's equal. Hers was truly a quality speech with depth and concrete evidence. She tore Tsao Hsiu-chen, the concubine of a landlord, to pieces. Her expose included the facts that the old landlord died of exhaustion in bed and that the bookkeeper had been seduced. Finally, she cried at the top of her voice saying:

"Throw Tsao Hsiu-chen, concubine of the landlord, on the ground and kick her so that she will never be able to redeem herself!"

"Down with Third Sister Tsao, the concubine of a landlord!"

"Down with Third Sister Tsao, the concubine of a landlord!" the people echoed.

Auntie Liu whispered quietly to Auntie Sun who was sitting next to her, "Our Yao Erh Nai Nai used to be on such good terms with Tsao Hsiu-chen that, as the saying goes, they used to wear the same pair of pants."

"This is the meaning of the saying: An astute person is one who knows when to turn with the tide."

"Rats! This is like putting rouge on the face of a person who hanged herself, shameless even after death.

Astute, my eye! The two of them make a fine pair of 'dilapidated shoes.'"

Fat Auntie Yao turned around and joined them in bad-mouthing the ladies.

Quite a few people nearby laughed stealthily.

Auntie Liu smiled as she whispered softly, "Neither the mind nor the ears of this fat old lady are here at the assembly. At 'Down with Third Sister Tsao,' she yelled 'Down with Third Sister Liu.' What had Third Sister Liu ever done to her to deserve it? Who is this Third Sister Liu? Where did she come from? It was like watching a historic fight on stage between Tou Er-tun and Li Kwei; you can't even tell which is which. Now she comes up with 'astute' and 'dilapidated shoes.' Haven't you heard it said that chanting the wrong slogan makes one an anti-revolutionary!"

"Don't try to scare me. This fat old lady does not scare easily," she pouted and said half-jokingly.

No one in the alley dared to openly criticize Yao Erh Nai Nai, but even emperors had been cursed. Moreover, fat Auntie Yao despised her from the bottom of her heart. She could not stand her, and she made no bones of it. She was told,

"Don't try to grope for the bottom of a tiger."

The old lady turned her eyes upward until the whites of her eyes were .showing and said loudly,

"Who said I try to grope for it? I kick her fat bottom. She ain't no tiger! She's a weasel at best."

There was a reason why fat Auntie Yao did not like Yao Erh Nai Nai. She had witnessed things that bothered her. For instance, she had seen, through the window panes, Yao Erh Nai Nai talking to her visitors, the director and committee members, doing her job of "reporting." She would be pointing to a room to the east, gesticulating towards a room to the south, shaking her head or making a disdainful expression with her mouth. At such times fat Auntie Yao would curse in her heart,

"Born to be a concubine, specializes in waggling her old wife's tongue and telling on people."

Aside from her ability at "reporting," Yao Erh Nai Nai's company behavior was another thing that fat Auntie Yao could not stand. At a mass rally or at meetings to voice criticism, she would be weaving through the crowd back and forth, back and forth. At times she would hold a bullhorn to her mouth and announce in her shrill voice in a most pretentious manner,

"Those of you in the back, sit down! Sit down! Don't stand up!"

"Attention! Attention! Don't move about! Order! Order!"

Sometimes she would whisper something in Director Ho's ear, or she might hand Master Wang, who was in the back, a stool.

Had fat Auntie Yao been sitting in the back or somewhere in the middle where she could not see all this, it would have been another matter. But Auntie Yao liked to sit in the front in case Hung-hung wanted to go to the bathroom. Even if Hung-hung was all right, it would have been easier if she herself wanted to make a hasty retreat. She, therefore, was there to witness it all. Whenever Yao Erh Nai Nai whispered in Director Ho's ear, Auntie Yao would scream,

"Watch that she does not bite off your ear!"

Hung-hung would help his fat grandma along by clapping his hands and singing, "Suck up words, rot the mouth, little toads by the horde."

When Yao Erh Nai Nai walked back and forth in front of the group, fat Auntie Yao would be quite capable of pointing at the podium and saying impatiently,

"Hey, don't stroll along here. You are making me dizzy. Go! Go and sit on the podium which is both prestigious and cool, and also you can see far from there."

Sister-in-law Sun praised Yao Erh Nai Nai and said, "Look at her! Auntie Yao has more gusto than the young people."

Fat Auntie Yao nodded her agreement and said, "Gusto indeed! Every part of her physical body 'gus' to me the wrong way."

Erh Niu Ma failed to appear both at the morning instruction session and the evening reporting session for two or three meetings, so Director Ho denounced her at the mass rally without specifically mentioning names.

"Not to appear at morning instruction session or evening reporting session is indeed a serious problem. This is a question of the political attitude of loyalty to Chairman Mao. Some even give going to the bathroom as reason for not attending, saying that surely a person is not expected to hold it in! Now if we stop to analyze this statement, it sounds somewhat reactionary."

Erh Niu Ma's face turned ashen with fear.

Auntie Yao screamed at Director Ho in a loud voice,

“Say, Director Ho, don’t you throw around groundless accusations. You ought to dig into it and find out if that indeed was what was said. I heard with my own ears when Erh Niu Ma loudly screamed that she was in the toilet, and asked Yao Erh Nai Nai to make her excuse for her. Constipation is not as simple as diarrhea. When she came out of the toilet everybody else was returning from the session. You want her to go there all by herself? Or else, we can easily have a few more sessions. Make it four so that no one would ever be late. I’m telling it as it is. If you don’t believe me, you can ask around. Quite a few people in our court heard her. I for one, did not hear anything about holding it in.”

Committee Member Pai and Unit Chief Chang both stared round-eyed at Auntie Yao. Director Ho’s pale long face seemed to have grown longer. Yao Erh Nai Nai bit so hard on her lips she nearly drew blood.

As to the audience, no one dared to utter a sound. Back from the rally, Auntie Yao stood in the courtyard and said for all to hear,

“Truth must be out. Fabrication of false accusation won’t do.”

That evening Director Ho and Master Wang came to visit Auntie Yao.

Master Wang asked about this and that, trying to make conversation, then finally he came to the point and said very affably, “Auntie, do you have any opinion about the cadre of this area? You can tell them so that changes can be made if need be, or else a word of encouragement would be fine. If you have anything to say, bring it out openly. Don’t ever discuss it privately, it would be committing the offense of liberalism. The work of our streets can only be expanded when the mass and the cadre are united as one. Only then can the Cultural Revolution be a great success. Don’t you agree?”

“To be sure, Auntie Yao, you can submit any opinion you have, and we cadres will accept them all with humility.”

Director Ho butted in, but he sounded more like they might listen to her with humility, but they were not going to make any changes.

“Whatever possessed you to ask for my opinion? Could it be that someone has brought an accusation against me?”

“Come on, old lady! What’s this about bringing accusations? In this day and age there is no such thing as bringing up accusations,” said Director Ho with a smile that did not reach his eyes.

“I’ve no culture. I’m full of old-fashioned terminology, so don’t you pick on me,” Auntie Yao retorted angrily. She thought to herself: Who do you think you are? You took over the three big north rooms of the Wang’s confiscated estate. You may be very pleased with it, but you were no different from the ‘newly rich’ family in the Peking opera Chu Wan Ting, who, taking advantage of the disturbance during the Taiping Rebellion,\fn{A popular rebellion (1850-1864) in several provinces against the Manchu dynasty.} plundered and enriched themselves. Now you get to live in the big north rooms, and your second and third child wear Great Roman brand wristwatches and ride around on bicycles. Where did all that come from? Can a family who has to rely on subsidies from the unit to fill themselves with corn meal gruel afford these expensive items? Auntie Yao had no respect for people who pretended to be what they were not, like a pig pretending to be an elephant by wearing a scallion on his nose.

“Auntie, don’t get excited! We all know you have an impeccable background, and that you had your share of hardship in the old society, but you cannot just fall back on that alone. You have to continue to carry on the revolution. You must make unity work. You mustn’t have any prejudice. Our strength is in unity. The proletariat must be firmly united internally before we can proceed to struggle with the enemy. If you have any opinion, tell us to our face. Don’t ever grumble behind peoples’ backs. That would be creating a bad impression. If you are dissatisfied with any of the active elements in the neighborhood, seek them out and exchange opinions with them. You may also talk things over with the propaganda unit. The important thing is unity. Chairman Mao instructed us not to ever forget class struggle and not to allow the enemy of the classes to divide us.”

Before Auntie Yao had a chance to let off some steam, her daughter came into the room with her bicycle. Director Ho and Master Wang exchanged a few words with the daughter, then they got up and left. Auntie Yao felt she had been gravely wronged, and she was full of grievance and complaints. She poured them all out in front of her daughter. This daughter was not one to be trifled with. Her background was impeccable; she started life with a clean slate; she was a member of the communist youth party and a leader of the revolutionary group of this working unit. She pushed open the door and went looking for Yao Erh Nai Nai.

The family was sitting around a small square table eating supper.

“Aunt Yao, there is something that I want to talk to you about,” daughter Yao said.

Yao Erh Nai Nai smiled amiably and said, “Hello niece, did you just get back from work? Have you had dinner yet? Come! Come! Come sit down and have something to eat. The fish I cooked is very fresh; have some and see if you like it—"

"Aunt Yao, there is no need to stand on ceremony. I just have a few words to say, then I will leave you alone to eat your supper."

"Sit down, sit down and take your time telling your aunt what you want to say. Here is a cup of tea, freshly made and very strong. Have some."

"Do not trouble yourself, Aunt Yao. You often said that you and my mother grew up in the same alley, and you are like sisters and that you understand one another, so it shouldn't be too difficult for me to say what I come to say. My mother is a straightforward person, and she is like a gun barrel, shooting off whatever is in the barrel. She is not at all like you, who are educated, who have culture, and who understand the fine points. My mother is a rough and rustic person. She speaks plainly. If there is any 'contradiction' between you two old sisters, you should bring it out in the open, and not treat the other as an object of the revolution and yourself as the force behind the revolution. There is no call to get the organization or the leadership to resolve certain small matters, be it the Director or the Workers' Propaganda Unit. They should concentrate their efforts on guiding the street blocks toward the expansion of their political movement, and not the inconsequential personal conflicts. If they only deal with these matters day in and day out, then the true meaning of the function of the workers' propaganda unit would be unclear. Aunt Yao, hereafter if you have any opinion, feel free to discuss it with me. Whatever my mother's shortcomings, I will criticize her. There will be no need for the Director or the Propaganda Unit to educate her."

"Ai ya! My niece, what are you talking about! What right do I have to ask the Director or the Propaganda Unit to educate Sister Yao? There is certainly no 'contradictions' between us two old sisters. If there were, we would face one another and talk it over, and all would be resolved. We two old sisters are like a reversible lamb wool jacket. There is no wrong side or right side. My good niece, you mustn't let it come between us. How could I go behind her back."

"If that is the case, very well. Aunt Yao, you had better go back to your supper before it gets cold."

The next morning Yao Erh Nai Nai went to see Director Ho and voluntarily petitioned to be relieved of the role of an active element with tears rolling down her cheeks. Not only had the oldest daughter of the Yaos reprimanded her personally, not in so many words mind you, but she also hinted that the Director and the Propaganda Unit only interfered with inconsequential matters among the masses and neglected their great responsibility of guiding the political movement.

Director Ho was so fuming mad that he was breathing hard after hearing this. Master Wang always had a habit of fluttering his eyelashes, and now the fact that anyone would dare to criticize the Workers' Propaganda Unit got him so mad that his lashes nearly fell off from too much fluttering. The final conclusion they arrived at was: this old lady might have an impeccable background, but her thinking and her perceptions were questionable.

Since her daughter had straightened things out for her, Auntie Yao became more conceited.

More than half of the couples living in the different courts in their alley were both working. Schools were closed since the beginning of the Cultural Revolution. Parents were busily occupied with their work and with their learning programs and meetings, the teachers were preoccupied with different movements, thus the children, young and old, were left on their own, running around all over the streets. This kid Hsiao Tu-dze stepped on that kid Sze Ho-shang; Chou Tan beat up Er Leng-tze; any such incident could lead to a mass war. It was said that there could be no revolution without fights or quarrels. Everyone wanted to be a revolutionary. The "leadership" of this alley were the two grandsons of Yao Erh Nai Nai, the grandchildren of Director Ho, Committee Member Pai's half a dozen children, and the "red" successors of unit chiefs Chang, Wang, Li, and Chao. No one dared to touch them. Aside from the fact that their grandmothers and mothers were of the "leadership," every one of the children had either a brother or sister who wore the armband of the red guard or carried a belt capped with a copper buckle.

These children were guided by the motto: "If the father is a hero, the son is a man; if the father is a counterrevolutionary, the son is a scoundrel." They were merciless when they beat the children of families whose properties had been confiscated, kicking them around like footballs, while cursing them saying, "Fuck your grandmother; we beat you bastards born of indenture maids; your grandfather was a doggone land owner."

The children who had been beaten ran back home, bleeding from their noses and mouths, their faces swollen. Such was the fate of the grandchildren of landlords; they deserved to be beaten. Any child in the alley could be the object of "struggle" of this "petite leadership." The child of Mr. Chin the teacher, Ming-ming, was hit by the grandson of Director Ho with a slingshot when he went shopping for noodles one day. He ended up with a big purplish bump on his head. Mrs. Chin, also a teacher, thought it outrageous. To go around hitting people for no reason at all was not to be tolerated. If this pebble had hit him in the eye it surely would have blinded him. She was steaming mad and dragged the child along with her to see Director Ho.

Director Ho was squatting in front of a stove, poking at the briquettes, and he said very slowly and calmly without so much as turning his head, "Was it our Hsiao-ping? Are you sure, Ming-ming? If it was him, I'll criticize him by and by. If he says he did not do it, then you, Mrs. Chin, have no right to accuse an innocent person."

The next day before it could be determined who was right and who was wrong, Mr. and Mrs. Chin came back from work and saw that every pane of glass on the door was smashed, and pieces of paper that covered the windows were full of holes. On the wall were the words: "Down with the proletariat intelligentsia, smelly old students; watch out you smelly old students—be careful not to get your doggone head smashed."

Most people suffered the insults and injuries to their children in silence, because they dared not touch these leadership people, young and old, who might just choose to throw a few derogatory accusations around to cause no end of trouble. Not Auntie Yao though! Should anyone dare to injure her Hung-hung in any way, she would tear the party apart and give them a tongue-lashing.

One time Hung-hung came home crying. As he ran into their court, his hands covering his face, he screamed, "Grandma, Hsiao-ping boxed me!"

Auntie Yao ran out to the entrance of their alley, dragging Hung-hung behind her. There was a group of people at the entrance sitting around on the big rocks. Auntie Yao pointed a finger at the forehead of Hsiao-ping and cursed him, saying, "You little son of a turtle, are you suffering from being overstuffed with cornmeal rolls? Are your finger nails overgrown? And do you want them trimmed? Listen to me! If you ever dare to touch Hung-hung again with the tip of your finger, I'm going to scoop out your eyeballs and stamp on them like so many bubbles, and I'll twist your head off and use it as a urinal. You can count on it!"

"Chairman Mao told us not to beat or curse others. Aren't you ashamed of yourself, you old granny, for opening up your mouth and cursing," Hsiao-sze, Committee Member Pai's child said, his mouth twisted in a contemptuous manner.

"Get the hell out of here, you! If he hadn't gone around beating people, I wouldn't be here cursing. This is called returning the courtesy; it is equality! Why do you have to butt in? Is Hsiao-ping your grandpa? Why do you take sides? Even if you don't open your mouth, there is no chance that you'll be sold as a mute. On the contrary, a talkative mule could only command the price of a donkey and no more. You just shut your big mouth."

"All this is against Chairman Mao's teaching, this cursing and beating people. Remember the three disciplines and the eight points: one must fight against selfishness and be critical of revisionism and examine oneself. Old Mrs. Yao, you must first kneel before the portrait of Chairman Mao and ask him for forgiveness; you must fight against selfishness and be critical of revisionism!" shouted Smelly Egg, the second son of Unit Chief Chang, as he stood on one side, picking his nose. He was bent on provoking Auntie Yao.

Auntie Yao walked up to him and stood in front of him, looking him up and down, and said,

"Good! First go home and tell your ma to finish fighting selfishness and being critical of revisionism. Then I'll take my turn. Go home and ask your ma if taking over the house of the Sung's, by force, is selfishness or not? Devising different reasons and excuses for not returning the money borrowed from neighbors, isn't this practicing capitalism? Huh? Go home and find out about all that before you lecture me. Furthermore, before you start lecturing me you had better go home and ask your ma to trim off your fat tongue, because you are not making sense when you talk in a lisp with your fat tongue. Can't tell what kind of a fart you are making; it was even odorless."

She warned them further, "Listen to me, all you bunny rabbits. Don't be like a dog living in the reflected glory of its master and stepping on our Hung-hung. It won't do."

Auntie Yao's deliverance, uttered without mincing words, made all the kids who had been taken advantage of very happy. They wished they could applaud her. As always, while one group felt avenged, another group would be deeply resentful. All those who were objects of Auntie Yao's scorn were left speechless. They knew that Auntie Yao was not to be trifled with. She was likely to tell how so-and-so's mother used to steal turnips, or so-and-so's sister had had an illegitimate child, or about so-and-so's grandmother had been a prostitute. She would not hold anything back. It would never do to have her expose the "Five Red Hot Groups;" they could only swallow their pride and wait until they get home to tell on her to their mothers or grandmothers.

All the mothers and grandmothers hated this disastrous old lady beyond words, but none as much as Yao Erh Nai Nai. Before Yao Erh Nai Nai came up in this world, she lived in the same place as Auntie Yao, next to the smelly water of Dragon Whisker Creek. Auntie Yao could tell them all the stories about Yao Erh Nai Nai's ancestors, as far back as eighteen generations ago. There was a saying that people from your native village and who knew your roots were to be feared. So, in addition to resenting Auntie Yao, Erh Nai Nai feared her too. She told her two grandchildren,

"Don't pay her any mind. Treat her as a smelly commode and stay far, far away. Don't waste your breath on her."

But, Erh Nai Nai was always full of smiles whenever she ran into Auntie Yao, greeting her cordially with, "Sister, I just brewed some fine leaf fragrant tea, very delicious. Want some?" or "Hung-hung, Grandma has a date cake for you."

Lots of things puzzled Auntie Yao since the Cultural Revolution. Take confiscation of property for instance, it was not a new terminology. Auntie Yao grew up in the Tien Chiao section of Peking, and she had heard tales from many different storytellers. In the old days, the emperors used to impose this kind of punishment all the time. Weren't General Hu's family properties confiscated, and weren't members of the family chopped up into small pieces? Now, after the liberation and in our new society, new matters were dealt with in new fashions; if a person was guilty, he alone would be punished. What was this about confiscating property? The Red Guards smashed the signs of old restaurants such as Tao Hsiang Tsun, Yueh Sheng Tsai and Chuan Chu Teh, and they called it smashing the "Four Olds." Should confiscation of property be considered as one of "Four Olds?"

"Revolutionary rebellion:" the Red Guards kept the wristwatches and gold bracelets they confiscated, and put them in their own pockets; they stripped all the pears from the pear trees in other people's yards; they cooked the ducks that others cured and put them in their own stomachs. Was this "revolutionary rebellion?"

There were the Five Blacks. They were the people who had been beaten till they were covered with blood, the people who had been accused of alleged crimes, or people who had to wear a sandwich board proclaiming that they were "demons with ox heads, or spirits with the bodies of serpents." Auntie Yao was not totally convinced that these people were, one and all, "anti-revolutionaries." For instance, the old man of the Yang family had been a neighbor of Auntie Yao's for over thirty years. He had taught college all his life, could he be considered an "anti-revolutionary?"

Sometimes, late at night when all was quiet, Auntie Yao would ask her daughter, in confidence, about things that had been puzzling her. Her daughter would tell her in all seriousness, "Ma, haven't you learned that one has to carry out what one understands as well as what one does not understand? Leave what you don't understand; just remember: stay away from what is not your business and make no utterance about matters that do not concern you, should you make a single wrong statement, our whole family will suffer the consequence."

Her daughter and her son-in-law were workers, so Auntie's was truly a proletarian family, which was an asset in these days. Auntie Yao didn't know enough to make use of this asset. One time a rally was called for their blocks to reminisce about past sufferings and to express hope for a rosy future. The purpose was to tell the masses not to forget social injustice, to remember always the blood and tears they had shed, and to love the new society with all their hearts. It was a touching lesson in class struggle. Master Wang of the Workers' Propaganda Unit asked Auntie Yao.

"Auntie Yao, will you please talk about your suffering during the old society at the Rally?"

"Oh no, I don't know how. I have, of course, gone through a lot, but if you want me to tell about it, I'm afraid I don't have a glib tongue. I'll surely faint standing on the podium."

This rally to reminisce and to hope was held in the auditorium of an elementary school on Two Dragons Road. Three or four representatives made exemplary speeches. Yao Erh Nai Nai was, to be sure, among them. She told how she and her family were persecuted, about their suffering and their misery, weeping and moaning all the while as she piled accusation after accusation on the old society. She told about how her family had to share one torn quilt on bitter cold winter nights, how they had to go without even a bite of gruel of the coarsest of grain three days in a row, and that her father, a rickshaw man, was unable to support a family of seven or eight. She and her brothers and sisters had to beg for a living. Her oldest brother was dragged off the street into military service. One of her younger brothers was killed by an automobile on his way to the Chien Men gruel kitchen. Her second younger sister was sold into a rich man's household as [an] indentured maid. She was kidnapped but managed to escape and married Yao the drummer … at this point, mucous from her nose had reached her chin, and she pounded on the table and cried,

"As God is my witness, there was no way out in the old society for poor people like us." She rolled up her cuff and showed the audience an old scar, a remnant of her beggar days when she was bitten by a German shepherd belonging to a capitalist. This was the "brand that the evil old society left on the poor."

Many were moved to tears. Auntie Yao did not shed one tear. She had no way of knowing whether the others were telling the truth, but most of the time Yao Erh Nai Nai lied without blinking an eye.

Auntie Yao thought: you're really something, lying with a straight face.

After listening to reports reminiscing about past sufferings, the people had to have a meal of remembrance. Everyone would be given a large piece of cornmeal bread, made specially from spoiled bean refuse, sandy wild-grown vegetables, and cornmeal. This was to remind the people "to always remember the hardship they suffered in the old society and to love passionately the blessed new society." That is to say, "In liberation, don't forget the Communist Party. In new life, don't forget Mao Tse-tung." Only in eating a meal of remembrance would people realize how sweet life was today!

A moment ago Yao Erh Nai Nai was screaming and crying on the podium; now she stood before the Workers Propaganda Unit, all smiles, and taking big bites of the smelly and sour tasting vegetable-cornmeal bread. Each person was supposed to have one, but she ate two, one after the other, saying to Master Wang, "In the old society, if the poor had this to eat, they would have to thank Buddha for it."

Auntie Yao pulled the corners of her mouth back in a contemptuous expression and said to herself, a lot of people survived in the old society; if these people couldn't even have this sort of thing to eat, how did they sustain themselves? By feeding on the northwest wind?

Auntie Yao took one bite of the cornmeal bread and spit it out. It was hard to swallow; it was smelly, sour, and sandy. Even pigs in the old society probably did not have to eat this unless one wanted them to develop sandy bags in their stomachs. Auntie Yao put the bread in her pocket and threw it into the privy when she got home.

At night when they all sat around in the yard to cool off, Auntie Yao would be waving her huge rush-leaf fan to chase the mosquitoes away from Hung-hung. And the girls like Niu-tze, Feng-erh, and Shu-ying would take their places around her and engage her in conversation. Hsiao-ching pulled at her arm and asked her,

"Grandma Yao, what is a small drummer?"

Auntie Yao's voice box was thus opened. "Don't you even know what a small drummer is? What kind of high school kids are you?"

"Tse! Tse! Grandma Yao is being arrogant again! We grew up in the new society, how are we to know about the old society? Tell us about it, Grandma Yao. We just love to hear you talk about the old times."

Auntie Yao took a sip of her hot tea and cleared her throat.

The kids looked at one another and smirked.

"A small drummer was one who bought unwanted old items from people. They got their name because when they left home on business, they carried a small drum in their hands. This drum was the size of our five-cents copper coin. When they learned certain people had things to sell, they would go to their houses or to the entrances of their alleys and rattle their small drums. Someone from the house would come out and greet them. There were differences between small drummers too. Some were hard drummers; some were soft drummers. The hard drummers had more capital, and they had connections with antique dealers. Some of them even had their own second-hand stores. These hard drummers were very smart and very tricky. They could tell at a glance what kind of goods they were dealing with. They all had extravagant three-inch long glib tongues. They made the things they wanted to purchase sound absolutely worthless, and the things they wanted to sell seem hard to find both in heaven or on earth.

Fortunes were made by their ability to buy and sell. Some of these hard drummers specialized in jade, pearl, or agate, and chests made of redwood or sandalwood, or even books and scrolls of calligraphy and paintings in pretty dilapidated state. But it was a mistake to underestimate them. They knew their goods and they made fortunes. They wore long gowns, looking very clean and neat, and carried a small black cloth pouch under their arms; looking quite handsome. They would not enter the house of a very poor person, knowing that there would be nothing they would want to buy there. The soft drummers specialized in the poor people; they frequented small dirty alleys to buy old shoes, worn clothing, rusty tin cans. They'd buy anything. They balanced poles on their shoulders with baskets hanging from either end of the poles into which they put the things they bought. They rattled their little drums as they went through the alleys. Sometimes they cried, 'Rags, rags for matches![1]'"

"Humm! This time you really told a good and moving story. How do you know so much about it, Grandma Yao?"

"Why not? Your Grandpa Yao was a small drummer in his day."

"What kind of a drum did he use, Grandma Yao?"

"Soft drum, of course, need you ask?" Hsiao-ching blurted out.

"So, what kind of a drum did Yao Erh Nai Nai's husband use?" Feng-erh asked quietly.

"He? He was of course a hard drummer! How else would he have been able to manage two wives?" said Auntie Yao with a disdainful expression on her mouth.

"Hush! Lower your voice, my dear Grandma Yao. Don't talk so loud." said Feng-erh as she bent to lift Auntie Yao's cuff.

"Heh! What are you doing? Trying to flirt with an old lady?" the girl Chun-yen cried loudly. They made Auntie Yao laugh, and the girls also burst into laughter.

"Don't be ridiculous! I'm looking to see if there are any scars on her leg from dog bites," Feng-erh said smilingly.

"On my legs? I have scars all over my body, not just on my legs." Grandma Yao said in all seriousness.

"Are you really telling the truth?"

"I surely am, but they're not from dog bites. They're mosquito bites."

The girls around Auntie Yao burst into laughter. Grandpa Wang shuffled over with a tea cup in his hand and said, pointing at Auntie Yao's mouth,

"And you, my old sister-in-law, ought to post a sentry at your mouth."

Grandpa Wang was absolutely right. She did need a sentry at her mouth. She had a habit of broadcasting what she heard at the "People's Culture Palace" near the Hsitan Market:

" … There was this good-for-nothing who forced his mother to remarry, saying: 'How am I to deal with you? I cannot get myself a wife because of you.'

" … They don't want to be involved with anyone who has a mother, to tag along. The mother said: 'I won't live with you; I'll just get my own place.' The son then said: 'I can barely support a wife on my thirty dollars a month; how can I afford to set aside a few dollars every month for you? How am I to live? Why don't you get yourself an old man to support you?' His widowed mother of over sixty was so mad that she swallowed half a bottle of Ti-ti-wei. That settled it! The 'Security Police' arrested him. Now there's no need to find a wife.

" … The oldest daughter of Dr. Pai of Ta Mu Tsan Hospital was sent down to the countryside in Shanhsi Province. She became sick the moment she stepped into the house. She had no appetite for either food or drink and felt nauseous at the smell of a greasy pot. Her mother was a doctor, and she knew right away something was wrong. A physical examination revealed that she was pregnant. She finally admitted, after tremendous pressure, that it was the captain of the production unit, the unit in charge of the production of the poor farmers to which she was assigned. Isn't it immoral? A seventeen-year-old maiden ruined. Dr. Pai sued."

One day Auntie Liu and Hsiao-ching's mother were on watch duty. As Auntie Yao came back from shopping for food, Hsiao-ching's mother yelled at her saying, "Come over here, Fat Auntie! Let me have one of your juicy turnips to quench my thirst."

Auntie Yao waddled over and said to Hsiao-ching's mother, "This little mistress looks flushed today. What are the good tidings?"

"Are you a fortuneteller? Flushed indeed! I lost thirty cents when I went shopping for food this morning. My one day's food money just disappeared into thin air, good tidings my eye!"

"No wonder there are clouds between your eyebrows and the tip of your nose is red. A red nose indicates loss of money."

"This old lady surely knows how to change course as the wind blows. First she tells someone she looks flushed, which indicates good tidings, then she says she was to lose some money and to suffer a setback. Really, if this person is not a fairy goddess, she should not pretend to be ethereal."

Auntie Liu smiled and said, while biting into her juicy turnip, "Who says she does not know how to tell fortunes! Just look at your eyes! They are indeed flirtatious."

Ha, Ha! Both ladies spit out the turnip in their mouths. No one knew when Yao Erh Nai Nai and Committee Member Pai had joined them.

"What's so funny? Tell me so that I can have a good laugh too." It was from Yao Erh Nai Nai.

"You want to have a good laugh? You may want to have a good laugh, but I may not want to tell." Auntie Yao was partly serious and partly joking when she said that.

"Auntie Yao was telling Auntie Liu's fortune. She said Auntie Liu had flirtatious eyes which she used to beguile Old Wang."

"Is that so? Tell me, Auntie Yao, what kind of eyes do I have?"

Committee Member Pai joined the fun and commented, "As for you, what you have are triangular-crossed-eyes, a sassy shrew."

Ha! Ha!

"How about you? What kind of eyes do you have?" Committee Member Pai asked.

"Me? I have the look of a red-faced loyal courtier."

"Heh, they say it is good to make friends with a red-faced fellow, not a white-faced guy. Is there any truth to that?" asked Hsiao-ching's mother.

"Haven't you heard it said that a white-faced young dude is not to be trusted?" said Auntie Liu.

"Of course it's true. Don't you remember that in the Peking operas Kwan Kung always had a red face, while Tsao Tsao's face was white. Tsao Tsao was full of tricks and was always plotting against someone or another. He could not sleep at night, and during the day he had no appetite for food; no wonder his face was white. A big white face with short stubby eyebrows are characteristics of a scoundrel … short eyebrows also indicate a short life span, early death." Auntie Yao looked at Yao Erh Nai Nai when she said that.

Yao Erh Nai Nai's smile spread all over her face when she asked Auntie Yao, "Do you see good fortune in the features of our Chairman?"

"It goes without saying that our Chairman Mao is flushed with good fortune, and there's compassion in his brows and smiling eyes. He no doubt is going to enjoy longevity—"

"How about Lin Piao?" Yao Erh Nai Nai did not wait for Auntie Yao to finish.

"Lin Piao's face is not as benevolent as the Chairman's, and his brows—"

Hsiao-ching's ma grabbed hold of Auntie Yao's sleeve, as she pulled hard and yelled,

"Hung-hung is calling for you. Don't just sit here and make idle conversation."

That evening Auntie Yao was arrested by the "Security Police" as an anti-revolutionary element. She was accused of insulting Mao Tse-tung's designated successor, Vice-Chairman Lin.

80

Both Auntie Liu and Hsiao-ching's ma were brought before the "Security Police" several times for questioning. They were asked to expose Auntie Yao's "anti-revolutionary speeches" and to write reports to testify about the "true facts" about those speeches. The two of them were terrified and driven to tears.

It was impossible for anyone to defend Auntie Yao. Even her daughter, a leader of the revolutionary elements, could only hide in her room and cry.

181.6 Autobiographical Statement\fn{by Erin Zeng (1938-)} Kowloon, Hong Kong, China (F) 2

My father was a Hakka (subgroup of Han Chinese), growing up in the backward countryside of Mei Xian, in Guangdong Province. It was so mountainous that it was hard for people there to get to any nearby town. My father was very bright. When he was a teenager, he met a missionary who found out his talent and encouraged him to go to university. He later attended Fu Jiang University in Shanghai and got his degree in Chinese literature. In 1930, he went to the United States and worked on his PhD in education at Stanford University. He got his degree in two years.

Then he returned to China. He held positions in several leading Chinese universities. He was the dean of the College of Art at Qinghua University. Later, he started South China College in Hong Kong in 1936. During the Japanese occupation of Hong Kong, he moved his college to mainland China. Before the Communist Party took over in 1949, he moved his college to Hong Kong once again. He became a professor at Chung Chi College (the current Chinese University of Hong Kong). He wrote many books on elementary, high school, and university education. He wrote the university textbook Da Xue Zhong Wen (Chinese language for university students), which was used in many universities in Hong Kong and many other southeastern Asian countries.

My mother was born in Shanghai. She received her college degree in sociology from Denison University in Ohio in 1930. Then she returned to China and met my father on the ship. They got married in 1931 or 1932. She taught college English for all of her life.

My parents worked very hard. They were so busy that they did not have too much time to spend with us. My father was busy traveling to raise funds for his college and my mother was busy making a living and raising children. Those years were full of turmoil. We moved a lot.

My mother later became the dean of the Women's College at Chung Chi College after my father died. In 1960, my mother came to the United States to live with me. She worked in the library at the University of Chicago for four years when I was a graduate student there. She followed me to UC Davis,\fn{University of California at Davis} where I was a research associate and lecturer in chemistry for two years; however, she was too old to find a job there. My mother got her U.S. citizenship in 1965. She died in Oxford, Ohio, in 1986.

My brother was born in 1934. He is four years older than me. In 1950 he graduated from high school in Hong Kong, then he went to Zhongshan University in Guangzhou. During his university years, he went to Hong Kong to visit my family and my mother went to China to visit him. After graduation, he was sent to Changchun, Jilin Province. As soon as my mother got her citizenship, she began to work for my brother's visa. The visa was ready five or six years before my brother came to America, because he had trouble getting his passport from the Chinese government.

In 1978, my mother was very ill, which allowed my brother to get a passport. He came to the United States alone in 1981. His family (his wife, a son and a daughter) came later in 1983. He had a hard time at first, but he received his master's degree in geology at this university. Later he found jobs—first in Toledo, Ohio, then at Stanford University. Now he works for an optical company.

His wife learned English and driving after she came here. She is working in the same company as he does as a technician, making about $25,000 a year ($7 hourly pay), which would be equivalent to a bachelor degree holder's pay. If the company needs her, she works ten hours a day and some hours on the weekend.

My niece attended the university here for a year; she had a hard time adjusting. Then she went back to China to enroll at Fudan University in Shanghai and earned her BA there. Later she got a master's degree at a university in New York.

I was born in Kowloon, Hong Kong, on February 8,1938. Because of the turmoil during the World War II years, I didn't have a formal education until 1949 when I started high school at Pei Ching High School, a well-known Chinese high school in Hong Kong. Before my high school years, I had never learned English.

I came to the United States for my undergraduate work in 1955 when I was seventeen years old. My father paid my traveling expenses with the royalties from his books. My benefactress, Alice, who was the mother of my mother's close friend, gave $18,000 to Berea College in Kentucky, which was enough for four years schooling. Berea College has very good reputation and it is very hard to get into it, but the tuition is very cheap.

In the first year at Berea, I was very shy because I could not speak English and I looked different. Berea had an international reputation and there was a large racial element. But I was the only Oriental there. There was also an Indian fellow. When we ate in the dining hall, sitting at the round table, I was speechless, just smiling. But I could get along with my classmates and roommates and did not feel lonely, for I was so interested in what I saw and so busy studying that I did not have time to think I was lonely.

My childhood experience also helped me. We traveled from place to place when I was little. I can speak five Chinese dialects. To me, coming to America was the same as coming to a new town. I passed the entrance exams. I was behind in English, but I got high scores in math and other science courses. I had to take a 100 level English course. The difficulty in English kept me very busy.

I stayed in Berea from 1955 to 1957. Then I transferred to the University of Chicago, which was close to where my benefactress lived. Using the money from my benefactress and the money I earned over the summer, I was able to support myself. Entering the graduate program at the University of Chicago, I got a scholarship. I never felt that anyone discriminated against me. I was always the only female in my class. I was treated like a queen. I felt I was special.

I was well treated until I earned my PhD. I had a hard time finding a real job. I was a post-doctoral research associate and instructor in chemistry at Illinois Institute of Technology for two years from 1963 to 1964, and research associate and lecturer in chemistry..at the University of California at Davis from 1964 to 1966. After that, I was a research associate and visiting scientist at Argonne National Laboratory in Argonne, Illinois, from 1966 to 1969. I felt Argonne was an ideal place for my research, for the equipment there is advanced. Unfortunately, the government cut off the funds and I had to look for a job somewhere else.

I found my first real job at this university in 1969. I met a professor from the university when I was at Davis. He was interested in my research. Later he invited me to give several seminars at the university. The search committee then decided to hire me as an assistant professor. Four years later, I was promoted to associate professor.

I feel that in scientific fields, the scientists are very fair in value judgment and recommendation, whereas in the humanities and social sciences, there is a greater human factor there. If you are a woman, if you are a Chinese, you have to work harder. It seems that there is no prejudice there, but every little element can add to the difficulty. When I teach graduate level science, no students complain about my accent. But when I teach freshmen level, these freshmen would say: I don't understand her, she has an accent. They could have understood me with a little effort, but they don't want to make any effort!

If I am in a good mood, I would just laugh at these evaluations. But this could be a source of depression. Language is the major source of hardship for me. I have to work harder than my peers. I am upset that I am still criticized after I made a great effort, whereas some of my colleagues don't even prepare before their lectures. You are fighting a battle that you can't ever win. Like my niece and nephew, when they speak out in the class, everyone looks at them carefully, questioning in their mind if they can speak English. Even if you could speak perfect English, they still feel it different, for they look at you differently. You are socially handicapped.

I met my husband Mark in the chemistry department here. We are both physical chemists. At that time, I was thirty-one years old and thought I could never get married. When my mother found out about our relationship (she lived with me), she could not be happier. She did not mind the racial difference, as long as this man is nice. Mark is a very nice person. He came from a farmer's family. Unlike my mother, his parents didn't have any knowledge of foreign cultures, but they were all very nice. Mark introduced me to his family and relatives. We got married in 1971 when I was thirty-three, and he was thirty-one. We didn't have a ceremony. We thought we were old, so we didn't want to tell friends and relatives about our marriage.

I am very happy about my marriage. I became a U.S. citizen in 1973, two years after we got married. I never judge people based on racial background. If you work with somebody, then you might develop a relationship with him, which is what happened to us. My husband appreciates Oriental culture. He has a great knowledge of Chinese history and geography. He made the whole transition a smooth one. I have no problems adjusting to a white American man, for I am totally Americanized, but I feel that I understand him better than he understands me. I have been a foreigner among natives—he has never been in the same situation. The first five years of my marriage were very difficult. There were all kinds of adjustments with work and family. Then both of us felt we should not have children.

I like American men. They would make better husbands and fathers than Oriental men. They are capable and hard workers. My husband can almost do everything, physically and mentally. He can fix everything. He knows almost everything. Sometimes I feel sorry for my husband; he is working all the time, doing all kinds of thing for other people. He never refuses other people's requests.

I am very Americanized. When my brother came, I had to learn to adjust to him. But my judgment and sense of value are still Chinese. I have a Chinese attitude. I am proud of my Chinese culture. I would be upset if somebody thinks I am Japanese. I think I am very fortunate to be Chinese. I think Chinese culture is still at the top of world civilization, except for classical music and science, which are pretty Western-oriented. I like Chinese culture, but I also appreciate Western classical music and science.

I appreciate some American characteristics: generosity and encouragement to speak out. On the other hand, I consider superficial values to be a bad feature of American life. For example, in political campaigns, people's judgments are sometimes very superficial. I am very interested in American mainstream politics. I have voted every year. I sympathize with the two cultures.

Even though I am Americanized, I don't feel I fit into American society. I don't think I fit into the professional situation in a deep sense. Superficially, I fit.

I don't fit into China either. I can talk to my husband about my feelings, but he is not my entire world. I have to face students, my job, and other problems. When I faced age problems, I was also unhappy about my teaching. Students demanded that exams be easier and easier. The national education level is dropping. At this time, I sometimes feel as if I have no spiritual and moral support system.

181.159 Excerpt from The Middle Heart: A Novel\fn{by Bette Bao Lord (1938-)} Shanghai, China (F) 12

Stone Guardian's footsteps sounded beneath her window like the clapper of a blind fortuneteller. Was he still hoping that she would change her mind, lose heart, not go through with it?

Foolish man! Jade lingered in bed, toying with the bracelets that always circled her wrists, taking pleasure in the smoothness of her arms, as white and cool as the Yongle vase her husband caressed when he replaced the flowers each morning before the portrait of his first wife.

Why could he never see beyond the pockmarks on her face? Ten years under the same roof and still he failed to appreciate her many virtues. Only a dreamer with eyes fixed on top of his head would have expected beauty as well as a handsome dowry. Anyone else would have thanked the gods for a match so dispassionately arranged, so equitable. Had her skin been unblemished, she would never have become a room-filler for any widower, much less a bankrupt one with an insolent son. She would have been the mistress of a great clan, not this sorry House whose land had been pawned like articles of clothing until only a few tattered courts in provincial Wen Shui remained. She would have been the …

Ai ya! What was she doing, indulging in fantasies? That was his failing, not hers.

Impatiently she threw off the quilt and crossed the bare floor to perform the ritual that had begun each of her days since the illness left her forever scarred. Seated at the dressing table, she poured hot water from the thermos bottle into the shallow bowl, soaked the silk handkerchief and placed it steaming upon her face. Three times she did this and then, while her skin was still warm, she covered it with an expensive paste made of secret ingredients but smelling of honey.

Only when this had been accomplished did she look into the mirror. Carefully she applied the rice powder and rouge, then lacquered her hair into a bun, hiding her forehead with long bangs. Now strangers at a distance would see a face that, if not pretty, was unblemished.

Satisfied at last, she unlocked the sandalwood trunk at the foot of her bed and took from it the pillow stuffed with scarves. She grimaced. Even now, with only days remaining before she would be done with the deception, she resisted. Her figure was slender as a reed and moved as gracefully. What a shame to spoil it! But the disguise was critical and, holding the pillow to her waist, she reached into the chest again for the long sash and wound it around her body as tightly as her amah had wound the bindings that, when she was a child of seven, had shaped her feet into golden lilies. Once the ends were tucked away, no movement could work them loose.

There was no pleasure in choosing among the cotton gowns borrowed from her portly sister-in-law, so once the pillow was in place Jade dressed quickly, then proceeded to the altar in the far corner of the room. She lit a stick of incense and placed it in the censer before the porcelain image of the Goddess of Mercy. Head bowed, she sank to her knees and prayed.

"O merciful Kwan Yin, let the child be a boy. For without a son, how can I hope to fulfill my responsibilities to the House of Li? How can I be worthy?"

More importantly, how could she ever hope to hold her head high? When she first came to the House of Li, the studied slights of the women had been endurable. After all, every new bride was put on trial in her husband's home, especially one who, like herself, had had to kowtow at her wedding to a portrait of his first wife. Even now Jade could see the dead woman's wretched amah weeping as she prepared the bridal chamber, as if the newcomer had murdered her former mistress.

All this she had accepted with resolute pragmatism, a trait inherited from her father, the shrewdest of merchants. But after ten years, the arrogant Li women still set the tradesman's daughter apart, and no matter how long she continued to live among them or how much of her father's money they spent, without a son she could never expect more than polite disdain from her social superiors.

"O Kwan Yin," she cried, "give me a son and I vow to make him a leader of men, so that he may in turn honor you!"

She kowtowed nine times, then waited a decent interval before rising to her feet to unlatch the shutters and let in the revealing light.

*

A week later, Stone Guardian shared a rickshaw with his wife, as the coolie, cursing the noisy mobs that forced him to detour down one street, then another, trudged from their hotel toward the hospital. For once he regretted his economies. If only he had hired a second rickshaw he would at least be free of the cloying smell of honey that soured the air when Jade was about.

He fixed his gaze upon a tall girl with bobbed hair who stood on a makeshift platform, gesturing like a soldier as she shouted into a megaphone.

"China, awake!" she cried. And hundreds of boys and girls—the entire student body of every middle school in Shanghai, it seemed—roared in response:

"China, awake!"

Fools, he thought, you have as much chance of prevailing over the imperialists as I have of prevailing over this malevolent wife of mine. Nothing can save us. We are too poor. We are too weak. Foreigners shackle our country just as Jade shackles the Patriarch of the House of Li. There is no way out, not for China, not for me.

At the hospital, Jade hurried to the nursery, leaving him free to slip inside the girl's room. It was actually quite small, but the whitewashed walls and tiled floors, uncluttered except for the single iron bed, lent a spaciousness that belied its dimensions.

Amber Willows did not stir. How young she looks, he thought. Younger than her seventeen years. Her hair, the color of ink, was loose and trailed across the white sheets like the finishing stroke in the word "eternity." He leaned toward her, then resisted the temptation to caress her cheek.

Somewhere, in another room, a baby began to cry. The girl's eyes opened.

"Is that my … baby crying?" she whispered.

"Don't excite yourself. Rest, rest." For a brief moment he thought her trembling hands were reaching out for him, but before he could clasp them they dropped as from their own weight, and he heard her ask,

"Where is my baby? Where is—"

"The baby is with Jade."

The lights in Amber Willows' eyes faded. He bent to kiss the furrowss from her brow, but again drew back. Why didn't she shed tears1ike other women? Tears could be wiped away, but not that opaque look, without will, without want. He had noticed it the night they met at the House of Midnight Scholars, when he had paid generously to be her first; and later, in the west chamber, when he had been in no hurry to see her disrobe, content merely to feel the smoothness of her face; and again when he had paid the proprietress still more to reserve Amber Willows for him alone. In time the lights had returned to her eyes, as she learned that he, too, was caught in heaven's web, that he meant her no harm, that he needed someone as helpless as she to love.

Suddenly, like an overwound toy, Jade spun into the room, trilling,

"My son is beautiful, so beautiful! His eyes are bright as lanterns and his skin is smooth, unblemished as the tenderest bean curd." Turning his back to her, Stone Guardian mumbled under his breath,

"That's not what the nurses say." Jade made a dismissive gesture.

"Oh, if you mean the birthmark—it's beautiful too. A tiny kingfisher next to a well, which is his navel—a sign of good luck if ever there was one. Why, I've already sent word to my father to have kingfisher jewelry made for me. And all my new dresses will …"

Sickened by the thought of seeing kingfishers and smelling honey every day for the rest of his life, Stone Guardian wanted to spit, but knew nothing would come of it. His mouth was dirt dry.

Now Jade commanded him and Amber Willows to attention, to look her way. He counted to ten, but when at last he obeyed she proceeded merely to lick a finger, then used it to smooth her long bangs again and again, until every strand was arranged to her satisfaction. Finally, she cleared her throat and addressed them.

"Many months ago …"

Not again, he thought. He could anticipate every word, every gesture, and indeed, the wretched woman was now shutting her eyes and drawing a deep breath, as if to summon the courage to speak, even in passing, of the House where he had found solace in Amber Willows' arms. How could he have imagined then that the price for beauty would be so high?

"Had the child been a girl …"

Yes, yes, we know. Had the child been a girl, you, my dearest wife, would not have cared whether she was kept or killed, abandoned at the nearest baby tower or sold. His eyes were on Amber Willows, who stared at the ceiling as if momentarily it would give way. How could they live the future Jade had planned?

"But my prayers have been answered. The child is a boy, a healthy, beautiful boy, my son. And he will grow up to be an official. Yes, yes, an official as mighty as the Li ancestor you all claim forced the ouster of the chief eunuch in the Forbidden City. Then we'll see how those fine, upstanding relatives of yours will grovel. Meanwhile …"

Meanwhile, Stone Guardian thought, Amber Willows and I will be trapped in a nightmare beyond the powers of the young to imagine and the old to endure, a nightmare that is your dream. Pointing to Amber Willows, Jade declared,

"You will be wet nurse to my baby, and to show how generous I am to those who vow loyalty to their mistress, you may bring along that crippled brother of yours to live off me as well."

So Jade had decided to take the brother hostage too. Her father's daughter, she would leave nothing to chance. Pointing to him, she declared,

"And you, my husband, will be a loving father to our son."

"What do I want with him? I already have an heir," he retorted, then added, mimicking her, "A healthy, beautiful boy."

For a moment, Jade didn't look so smug, and he took satisfaction in having given her pause. It did not last. Changing the subject, she commanded their silence. Forever. She needn't worry, he thought. He would die before revealing his shameful, unconditional surrender.

"With Amber Willows registered under my name, our secret will go with us to the grave." She paused dramatically, then flashed a smile that cracked the makeup on her face.

"You see, I've thought of everything."

Everything except … what did the pockmarked bitch know of a man's hunger for beauty? The torment of having it near and not possessing it? Far better to lose Amber Willows as he had lost his proper wife than be forced to bury her anew, day after day, in his heart. He walked to the window. There was no view. A wall. With his back to them, he said,

“My wife, as you know all too well, I had no choice but to agree to this grotesque charade. My debts are many. My means are gone. But why must you keep her around? Wet nurses are plentiful, servants too. Take the baby, but let her go.”

“No … no, please.” Amber Willows struggled to push herself upright.

“Master—please, Master, I want to wait on her. I want to. I must be with my … the boy.”

Her voice was no stronger than the rustle of fallen leaves, but her words killed his spirit as surely as if they had been the sword of heaven and this the appointed hour.

*

On the day of the Grasping Ceremony, when a child’s fate was foretold, Amber Willows tied the tuft of hair that had been left on the baby’s shaven head with red silk, as tradition demanded, and stepped back to admire him. His vest of red brocade was embroidered with lambs in token of the Year of the Sheep, 1919, the year of his mother’s suffering. His pants were as green as the trees had been on the fourth of May, when he was born. It was a suit befitting the son of an emperor.

She felt a surge of pride so intense that tears leapt to her eyes. One fell, and with it the weariness that had weighed upon her during weeks of embroidering by the light of a smoky lamp also fell away. She had selected threads as fine as'a single strand from the silkworm’s cocoon and a needle no thicker than a hair, so that the stitches might be as true as the weave in the brocade. And so they were.

Now, carrying her treasure, she walked gingerly around the rotten slats in the floor of the gallery and down the steps to the stone garden. There, despite the lateness of the hour, she paused at the great rock in its center that had been hauled four hundred years before from the bottom of Wuxi Lake and presented to the House, at the Emperor’s command, in honor of the extensive system of dikes the Lis had built. The rock was prized for evoking an endless variety of sculptures. Surely it would be a lamb today. And so it was.

She turned to go. Stone Guardian blocked her path, in his eyes the same yearning and anger she saw there whenever they happened upon each other alone. Lowering her gaze to the hem of his blue gown, which was stained with the mud of last week’s rain, she said,

“I beg your pardon, Master, but you must hurry and dress. The guests are arriving.”

“Guests?”

“In honor of our boy’s birthday.” She held out the baby to him. Stone Guardian glared at the child as he would a usurper.

“Not ours! Her boy. And I have no intention of playing host for her or hers on this or any other day.” She squeezed the baby tight, wringing out the courage to ask what she must, and yet knew she ouglit not, ask:

“How can a father’s heart not have room for his own son?”

Before he could respond, she slipped past him and hurried toward the moon-gate, and not until she was safe in the next court did she look back. Though he was nowhere to be seen, his shadow continued to trail her, as it always did, like an abandoned dog. She could hear it sighing, feel the cold wetness of its nose nudging her hand, see it circling before it settled down at the foot of her bed for the night. Even when she slept, the master pursued her, howling,

“Not ours! Hers! That boy is no son of mine!”

Near the main hall her six-year-old brother, Mountain Pine, drew himself up as straight as his lame leg would allow and waved. The baby, as usual, wanted to be carried by the boy who rocked as he walked, and squirmed like a giant carp caught in a net until she relented and handed him over.

Waiting for permission to enter, she marveled at the scene in the hall. Except for the dark hues worn by the four Li widows, who sat on chairs set against the walls, flanked by their personal servants, the qipaos of the assembled ladies were as colorful as a field of wildflowers. At the center of each cluster, a clanswoman hosted guests of her generation. The crimson rug, gift of a village saved from extinction by the courageous judgments of a Li patriarch in the Ming Dynasty, had been cleared of furniture. The scrolls, painted by admirers of the House in the Qing Dynasty and, with the rug, among the very few family heirlooms that remained unsold, dressed up the tired walls with lotus ponds, dragonflies and cherry blossoms.

Beside the altar of the ancestors stood a table bearing the tray upon which were displayed the toy implements of the noble professions. All this was for the boy. Her boy. Jade’s son.

*

Suddenly a chorus of delight erupted. Mountain Pine, holding the baby, had stepped into the room. At once, Jade snatched her son away to parade him from guest to guest, pretending humility while gushing over their gifts.

“You spoil us so. Such extravagance for this worthless nobody of mine.”

Not yours, mine, Amber Willows thought, and again tears came to her eyes. She shook her head, willing them away, but must have made some sound, for Mountain Pine squeezed her hand. She looked at his upturned face. It was flushed with the joy of anticipation. Ashamed, she scolded herself for vain yearnings. After all, what stars in one's heavenly chart could be recast? What lifelines could be redrawn?

As she made her way through the room, hearing the ladies talk of the striking resemblance between Jade and her son, as she offered them candies and nuts, sesame and almond cakes, an assortment of dried and fresh fruits, Amber Willows, the true mother, nodded and smiled.

At long last, Jade, still carrying the baby, took his tiny hand in hers to light the incense on the altar. Then, having executed three deep bows before the ancestral tablets, she minced on her golden lilies to the center of the room and, in a voice shrill with pride, ordered everyone to form a circle, as large as could be, around them. Finally, nodding to her son's wet nurse and to his young servant, she announced the start of the Grasping Ceremony.

Amber Willows fetched the tray of toy implements.

"Remember what we practiced yesterday," she whispered to her brother as together they walked to the center of the circle and bowed, first to Jade, then to the guests, who were cheerfully accusing one another of neglecting decorum while inching surreptitiously nearer for a better look. With a finger upon her lips, Jade shushed them. The giggling subsided.

Mountain Pine took the toy sword from the tray, held it aloft for all to see, then placed it on the rug. In unison the ladies chanted,

"Grasp the sword, this hour, this date, and a soldier's life will be your fate." Next came the hoe.

"Grasp the hoe, this hour, this date, and a farmer's life will be your fate." Then the hammer, the inkstone, the brush, until all the toys but one formed a small circle within that made by the ladies.

Only the official's seal remained on the tray. To this object and this object alone Jade had attached a red ribbon and silver bells, and when Mountain Pine took it in his hand, he waved it enticingly just beyond the baby's reach before setting it on the floor to complete the circle of toys.

"Grasp the seal, this hour, this date …"

Their part in the ceremony over, Amber Willows and her brother retreated through a gap in the circle of ladies to stand a discreet half-step behind them.

" … and an official's life will be your fate."

A hush fell over the room, and Amber Willows, sensed that even those who scoffed at such rituals were suddenly uncertain, wondering if destinies could somehow be fixed by trifles. Jade set the baby down on the rug, then hastened to the place in the outer circle closest to the seal and knelt.

"Come over here, come to Mother," she called. "Take the seal, my son. Take the seal."

But the baby remained where he was, blinking solemnly.

Jade made a clucking sound. He looked her way, then surveyed the faces smiling down at him. Jade pounded the floor. He made a move toward her, then changed his mind and sat back, tugging on his shoes.

Suddenly, he was scuttling across the floor. For a moment Amber Willows could only stand staring at the ring of toys. Nothing had been disturbed.

"Why didn't you stop him?"

"Why didn't you?"

"I never saw a mouse move as fast."

Merciful Kwan Yin, Amber Willows thought, what made my boy go to Mountain Pine?

Jade clapped her hands once. Quickly Amber Willows freed her brother's ankle from the baby's grasp and sent the boy fleeing from the room. Then she placed Jade's son once more in the center of the rug.

At last the baby grasped the seal. At last all was well.

*

On an unseasonably warm day, when the sun bleached the skies, a playful wind off the Yangzi River lured Steel Hope to its banks. He sat with his servant on the top of a crumbling levee that was part of the elaborate network of dikes built by his ancestors centuries before—the reason their hometown had been named Wen Shui, Civilized Waters. Once the levee had held back floods; now it was merely his favorite lookout. He shut his eyes, trying to picture the grandeur of the dikes when new, but all he could see was the ebony coffin that last year's angry floodwaters had gouged from the earth somewhere upstream and flung into the top of a drowned mulberry tree. It had stayed there for weeks, while the survivors keened for the millions lost, their voices piercing the heavens. Their robes of coarse white hemp had transformed the landscape into an endless, ashen shroud.

He shook the memory away. Sad thoughts, always unwelcome, were especially so on this unexpected holiday, and once more he tried coaxing Mountain Pine into a game. It was useless. When reading, as now, the servant could sit longer than a chair. Ignored again, Steel Hope was about to snatch the book away when he was distracted by the music of the pigeons flying overhead.

They were his, a gift from Amber Willows, who, with her dexterous fingers, had tied the reed whistles to their tails. As the birds swooped toward the river the sound of the flutes grew deeper; as they rose into the heavens the pitch rose too. He filled his lungs and thought how good it was to be idling in the sun. Indeed, anything was better than being imprisoned in that dingy schoolroom and stuffed like a duck with ancient homilies.

He nudged Mountain Pine.

"Hey, how long to repair the school roof?"

Mountain Pine straightened his glasses, but otherwise seemed not to hear. On his lips was that smile of indomitable serenity he always wore when reading.

"A week? A month? A year?"

Still that Buddha smile. Always that Buddha smile. Ai ya! It had been the same for six years, ever since his mother made Mountain Pine his bookmate. Steel Hope would rather have endured the canings his father administered for poor grades and misdeeds than be tied to the scrawny scholar every minute of the day.

Not that he couldn't get free. Flying Feet, though five years younger, against Shriveled Leg, though a head taller, was no contest. But that was the trouble—no contest. Besides, the one time Steel Hope had yielded to temptation and escaped, Jade had had Mountain Pine caned.

Was the second son of the Patriarch of the House of Li the kind of warrior who would send a cripple to do battle in his stead? The answer was obvious. It was just his bad luck that his mother knew it too!

Sighing, he watched the smoke from a decrepit steamship paint the wind black. Its transit revealed another vessel, a patrol boat flying the Japanese flag. The very sight of the white and red banner infuriated him. It mocked the greatness of his country and his clan. It made him feel small. It reminded him of his father, who, as a young official at the time of China's humiliating defeat in the war of 1895, had had to preside over ceremony after ceremony at which the Imperial Flag was lowered to yield to the Rising Sun. If not for that unutterable degradation, he thought, Stone Guardian would still be the admirable man everyone said he had been up to that time, and not the failed Patriarch and heartless father Steel Hope knew. If not for that, Stone Guardian would care for his second son.

To stop the tears from flowing, Steel Hope flopped onto his stomach and took aim.

"Bang, bang, bang!" That was for seizing China's lands.

"Pow, pow!" That was for stealing China's wealth.

"Bang, bang!"

He leaped up and scrambled from one imaginary machine gun to another, firing round after round. Finally, the last Japanese vessel left afloat, a passenger ship tied up at the dock, took blasts until the hull was riddled with holes and it sank. The hero, gasping for breath, collapsed beside Mountain Pine.

"Hey, I could've used some help," he said when he could speak again. He expected no reply, but this time his bookmate surprised him.

*

"Look at that! Over there!" Mountain Pine pointed toward the quay. Steel Hope shot upright, but saw nothing unusual.

"Look at what?"

"That boy. There he goes again."

Now Steel Hope saw him, an urchin darting stealthily among the half-naked coolies hawking rickshaw rides, the peddlers of souvenirs, the beggars scrambling for coppers tossed by foreigners. He seemed to be moving in on a very fat man who was bowing like a piston to the puny Japanese captain standing at the head of the passenger ship's gangplank.

Steel Hope blinked. Yes! So much flesh could only belong to Watermelon Wu, their land-grabbing neighbor, who prospered by being as cozy as lips to teeth with the imperialists.

As Wu turned to face shore, the sly one darted forth again. Quick as an adder he stuck a paper with a big black X drawn on it to the fat man's back, then as quickly vanished.

Not until the bystanders began laughing and pointing at him did Wu realize he'd been marked. Even Mountain Pine laughed, as the traitor, twisting and thrusting like a pregnant sow, tried to snatch the sign from his back but succeeded only in losing his Panama hat.

“I’m going after that boy,” Steel Hope said, and raced toward the quay, keeping an eye on the pair of grimy feet he could just see behind the line of rickshaws. As he rounded the last sedan he executed a combination of Swooping Scissors and Throttle the Tiger and pounced.

“Friend!” he whispered, to avoid giving the wrong impression.

The boy wasn’t convinced. So violently did he kick and punch that Steel Hope was forced to tighten his grip.

“Keep still,” he hissed. The boy made a strangling sound.

“Stop that!”

It was Mountain Pine.

Steel Hope let go. The boy keeled over in a heap.

“You must forgive my young master,” Mountain Pine said courteously, helping him up. “I’m Mountain Pine. He is Steel Hope. What’s your name?”

“Firecrackers.”

Steel Hope had never heard of such a name and started to laugh, but thought better of it when confronted by a pair of fierce black eyes.

“Hate toadies, do you?” he said instead.

“Only a traitor wouldn’t!” Steel Hope nodded appreciatively.

“How’d you get the paper to stick?”

“Cockleburs.”

“Cockleburs?”

“Cockleburs,” repeated Firecrackers, grinning, and without further conversation the guttersnipe, the lame servant, and the young master of a noble house strolled off together toward the broken levee, where they sat dangling their feet above the water. Steel Hope removed his shoes. and socks and regretted the cleanness of his toes.

“I'm the second son of the Patriarch of the House of Li,” he announced. Firecrackers’ mouth fell open.

“The famous House of Li?”

“None other.” Scratching his armpits, Firecrackers assessed this information, then said,

“Got anything to eat?”

Steel Hope shook his head. Firecrackers pointed.

“What’s that in your pocket?”

“That’s not for eating,” said Steel Hope, showing him the old rice, which he had kneaded into a compact ball. “It’s what I feed the goldfish.”

“I’ve got goldfish too,” Firecrackers declared. “Big ones.”

Before the young master could let out an incredulous hoot, Mountain Pine had snatched the rice ball from his hand and given it to the braggart.

“Try feeding them some of this,” he said.

The boy pocketed the rice. Steel Hope shook his head. His book mate might know lots of things, but clearly he knew nothing about boys like this one.

“Show me your fish,” he demanded. “Where do you live?”

“On a boat, a yaolu.” He was impressed.

“Take us there.”

“I can’t. I mean, I would, but … it’s not here, it’s gone downriver.”

Steel Hope rolled his eyes heavenward, but noting that fierce look again, he decided against calling Firecrackers a liar and wracked his brains for a more congenial subject.

“Like games?” he asked finally.

“Who doesn’t?”

“He doesn’t!” Steel Hope, scratching a sudden itch, nodded toward his bookmate. Firecrackers asked,

“Like races?”

“Sure. I always win.”

“You do not.”

“Yes, I do.” Louder and louder they each insisted until Firecrackers poked the young master in the ribs and said,

“Prove it. Last one across the river is a turtle’s egg.”

Steel Hope gulped. It was not yet spring and, despite the sun, the river, which was lis and lis wide and only the gods knew how deep, would freeze his nuts off. More to the point, he couldn’t swim. But then … neither could Mountain Pine. Cupping Firecrackers' ear, the young master sadly imparted this most unfortunate fact and, without thinking, added that ever-handy excuse,

"He's got one long leg and one that's short, you see."

Halfway through the sentence, Steel Hope realized how feeble an excuse this was and how quickly he must come up with something else or be laughed at. By the time he finished the sentence, Merciful Kwan Yin had told him exactly what to do. Before Firecrackers could react, he was off, shouting,

"Come on or forfeit the contest!"

The others had no choice but to follow. At a deserted spot along the shore, where fish nets were drying, he drew a straight line in the dirt, then paced its length and, with mathematical precision, determined its midpoint. Straddling it, he bent down and traced his feet. Next, at each end of the line he drew two more pairs of feet. By now Firecrackers and Mountain Pine were looking at each other for a clue. Steel Hope marched to the center position, cleared his throat, and commanded his companions to take their places. Mountain Pine, sighing wearily, took the spot nearest him and asked,

"What next?"

Steel Hope wouldn't be rushed. He stretched, rolled his head, rippled his muscles, shook out his legs, and cleared. his throat again, but just as he was about to speak, Firecrackers, who had taken his assigned place but had been watching this performance suspiciously, shouted,

"You've got to make it fair." Steel Hope was insulted.

"I'm no cheat," he said. Then, to reinstate the proper mood, he repeated his entire warm-up before proclaiming,

"For this competition Mountain Pine's leg being short an inch or so doesn't matter. Neither does your being small and skinny or me being strong and fast. But before we can begin …" He paused.

"Get ready …" He untied his trousers.

"Get set …" He dropped them.

"For a pissing contest!"

Suddenly, there was laughter. Steel Hope turned. Mountain Pine was doubled over, pointing to the pair of feet traced in the dirt where, a moment before, Firecrackers had stood.

"Where did he go?" Steel Hope asked. The servant shook his head, still laughing.

"Who knows? Maybe I'm not the only one who's short an inch!"

*

On the day of Pure Brightness, when willows are in bud and clans gather to unite past and posterity, the members of the House of Li knelt among the family graves to perform the ancient rites. Solemnly the Patriarch, Stone Guardian, intoned the words that since the Ming Dynasty had been said in this place on the third day of the third month of the lunar calendar:

"O Spirits of our Noble Ancestors, we, your children, have traveled from near and far to attend your needs in the afterlife, to venerate your memory, to enshrine forever your legacy of honor and attainments in our hearts. We who still dwell in the earthly realm beseech you who abide in the netherworld to intercede on our behalf …"

Barely listening, Steel Hope examined his palms. The red welts were still there. Spirits, he cried silently, why don't you ever intercede for me? You must know that Father punishes me for no reason at all. The splotches of ink on the cuffs of his new silk jacket accused him, however, and he hastened to hide them from view. Well, maybe there had been a reason for the punishment this time. But the spirits might at least have alerted the Patriarch when the promised five strokes had been delivered.

O Spirits, he prayed, soften Father's heart and I will be as obedient as Mountain Pine. And should you have time left over, please, please stop Mother from devoting every moment to making an official of me. Jade had feigned illness to avoid seeing her husband make a spectacle of himself at his first wife's grave, but even in her absence her son could hear her voice,

"Now, now, don't disappoint me," she clucked, at least once a week. "You know that I live only for the day when the splendor of your achievements will lend a glow to my dark existence."

And I live only for the day when you stop nagging me.

Suddenly there was a silence. Had others heard her voice and his unfilial thoughts? Steel Hope's eyes swept the scene. All heads were solemnly bowed, even those of his four grandaunts, who always whispered among themselves. He could never imagine what these women, cloistered together since widowhood, had to say to each other that they hadn't said a thousand times before. Nearby were the shy maiden cousins, who lived in the innermost courts but whom he wouldn't recognize if one ever let go of the other's hand.

His gaze settled on his brother, Grand Hope, whose Western suit, spats and Panama hat marked the twenty-four-year-old as a sophisticate from the Foreign Concessions. Truly, Steel Hope didn't mind half as much as Jade that Grand Hope gambled, dropped foreign words that no other Li understood into every conversation and boasted of his success in the Shanghai Stock Market—or even that Stone Guardian never mentioned the countless times the clan had had to pay his elder son's debts but now recalled at least once a day the one time, about three weeks ago, when Grand Hope had paid the clan back. Since all fathers traditionally indulged their firstborn, such partiality was bearable. But the way Stone Guardian, who loathed the Japanese, pretended ignorance of Grand Hope's blatant admiration of Japanese power, efficiency and modernity—even of his visit to Tokyo without permission last year—did rile him.

And why should it be that Grand Hope, who never cared whether he pleased their father, could make him laugh? On Steel Hope, the Patriarch wouldn't spend a smile.

"… In victory, our ancestors were magnanimous. Never did they strip any man of face, least of all those who were vanquished. And so must we do the same. Remember our ancestor who not only spared the surviving son of his bitterest enemy, but provided funds throughout his life for his welfare. In defeat, our ancestors upheld honor. And so must we do the same. Remember our ancestor who, having lost favor in court, trekked ten thousand li into exile rather than disavow the words he had written …"

When he was younger Steel Hope had loved hearing about these heroic ancestors, but lately he'd found himself comparing the great deeds his ancestors had performed for the Empire with the empty words his clansmen mouthed every day. Once the Lis had been renowned for sacrificing themselves to save the lives of strangers; now they seldom bothered to be kind even to one another. Hardly an hour went by when his parents didn't quarrel.

"… Thus we who bear the honored name of Li shall never forget what the great sage taught us, that civilization began with filial piety …"

After Stone Guardian had led the nine kowtows before the monument, the collective ceremony was over, and the clansmen scattered to honor those who had ridden the stork. They ranged leisurely over the hillside, placing upon the graves of their most direct ancestors willow branches to ward off evil spirits and bowls of fruit, plates of cold food and cups of wine to feed both the living and the dead. Steel Hope trailed behind his brother.

Halfway down the hill, they stopped at the grave of the first wife of the Patriarch, where Stone Guardian was already on his knees, weeding the mound. Suddenly Steel Hope felt as if he were intruding, as if he had happened upon an intimacy, a tenderness, not meant for him to see. The weeds his father pulled were not weeds, but stray threads from the gown of a beloved.

*

As his brother knelt alongside Stone Guardian, Steel Hope backed away. He drifted, hesitantly at first. Then, like a boulder loosened by seasons of rain and snow, he hurtled down the hill, racing headlong until finally the land met a stream, and the thought of muddying the hem of his new gown stopped him. For a few minutes he looked for a crossing. Then, ashamed of thinking like an old woman, he jumped into the slime at the water's edge.

He shaded his eyes and looked about for a companion, but on the Day of Pure Brightness no one worked the fields. He listened, but heard only the wind. Masking his disappointment, he shrugged and proceeded to shadowbox down the path until the gravekeeper's hut came into view. Perhaps he was at home and wished for company, though from a distance the hut looked deserted. Close up, it was positively derelict, with large cracks patched with straw in walls that would have collapsed long ago but for crutches made of bamboo. Had it always been this way? Only the rags and bones drying on mats strewn about the yard and the row of scallions planted by the doorway, surprisingly beautiful amidst the squalor, affirmed that someone did live here.

The door was ajar, and he called into the darkness within.

"Wei? Wei?" No one answered.

He tried again. Again there was no response, and he was turning away when he thought he heard a faint coughing.

"Is … anybody home?"

He could see nothing. Was the house inhabited by ghosts?

"I'm from the House of Li …"

Yes, there was coughing. It sounded human enough, and seemed to come from a far corner of the room. Still, Steel Hope hesitated. The place had a sour smell. Mountain Pine, who had memorized all the maxims all the sages ever uttered, said that men were more fearsome than ghosts. What if the gravekeeper was drunk? What if, disturbed, he flew into a murderous rage?

Finally his eyes became accustomed to the gloom, and he saw two cots against the back wall of the room, one empty, the other heaped with straw and—there was an arm attached to—what? Was a corpse buried in that mound of hay? The arm twitched. He flinched and edged back. He was almost out the door when the coughing started again, a dry lacking that sent bits of straw floating to the ground.

He stopped in his tracks. What if the gravekeeper was deathly ill? Mountain Pine also said that within the four seas, all men are brothers. Surely the coughing man could use a brother now. Besides, it would be cowardly to leave him, and no Li was a coward.

Breathing through his mouth, Steel Hope stood tall and boldly approached the cot. There he discerned, almost buried in the straw, a face greasy with sweat, a man too weak to be dangerous.

"Are … are you all right?" he asked. The man gulped for air like a fish on shore.

"Wa …" Steel Hope leaned closer.

"Water …"

He nodded and searched the room, at last finding a cup in a niche bove the stove. But when he peered into it he found it filled with ockleburs. What would anyone want with those? he wondered.

Then, suddenly, he knew, and pursed his lips slightly to draw out a big, slow mile.

He'd been right. That liar Firecrackers didn't live on a yaolu. He lved in this very hut, and the gravekeeper must be his father. No, from the look of him, grandfather.

"Water …"

He snatched a jug and ran to the stream, scooped up some water and raced back. The gravekeeper swallowed with difficulty.

"More?"

When there was no reply, Steel Hope decided the man was hungry and began searching for food in the jars and baskets scattered about the room. Finding nothing except some dried beans and uncooked rice, he regretted not having stuffed his sleeves with his share of the feast before leaving the ceremony. By now, all that remained uneaten would belong to the ancestors. Still … the food would just be sitting there—and no Li, as far as he knew, had ever gone hungry.

"I'm going but I'm coming back," he said, and sprinted off, out the door and up the hill to the graveyard, where his clansmen, living and dead, having enjoyed their annual picnic together, were now gathered around the Patriarch, who had begun recounting the tale of the ancestor who designed the dikes.

From behind a tree, Steel Hope waited for the right moment. Finally, as Stone Guardian approached the climax of the story, he saw his chance and tiptoed to the grave of Great-Grandfather.

"Noble Ancestor," he prayed, "don't be angry. One offering among so many means nothing to you, but it will make all the difference to a starving man."

Then, glancing about to make sure he was still unobserved, he snatched a dumpling. Nothing untoward happened. Perhaps Great-Grandfather didn't disapprove—after all, hadn't he extended credit to his tenants for seedlings and then destroyed the notes when there was a drought? Keeping a wary eye on his kinsmen, Steel Hope slipped from one ancestral mound to another, snatching bits of food. Finally, sleeves full, he scrambled back down the hill and burst into the hut.

The gravekeeper was in a deep sleep. He cursed. A benefactor should be hailed with praise, not snores. There was nothing to do but leave the food and rejoin the clan.

*

He was setting the last of the cakes on the brick stove when suddenly the hairs on the back of his neck bristled. Someone else was in the room. He froze. For robbing the ancestral graves, his father would chop off his hand. He saw his inky fingers twitching in a pool of blood, the jagged stump …

"What … are you doing here?"

The voice sounded nothing like Stone Guardian's. It belonged to someone much younger. Bravely Steel Hope swung about.

Firecrackers stood in the doorway.

When the boy repeated the question, but with even less authority, Steel Hope's eyes narrowed.

"I could ask you the same question, but you'd just tell me more lies. Besides"—he paused, then announced triumphantly—"I know."

Firecrackers shot a fearful glance at the sleeping gravekeeper and turned as pale as a bone. Was whatever ailed the old man catching? Steel Hope took a half-step toward the door, then thought better of it and fixed his gaze on the tabletop, with its splinters and pits. If only Mountain Pine were here.

"Please don't tell," Firecrackers begged. "No one must know that the gravekeeper is sick and a girl is doing his job. We have nowhere to go. Swear, Steel Hope. Swear, no matter what, that you won't tell."

Who was Firecrackers talking about?

"What girl?"

"Me." He burst out laughing. When he'd caught his breath, he thumped his chest and shouted,

"I'm no dummy. I know the difference between a girl and a boy. Why do you tell such ridiculous lies?"

"But … but you said you knew. You mean father didn't—"

Fireracker stopped short.

Suddenly Steel Hope recalled the pissing contest. Suddenly he couldn't close his mouth or make a sound, or stop the blood that must have colored his face like a repulsive rash. He bolted toward the door. Firecrackers blocked the way. They wrestled fiercely, and for a long time, because Steel Hope, though far stronger, couldn't bring himself to punch a girl, even a girl who looked and fought and smelled like a boy. In the end, he pinned her down. When he saw her tears, he let go.

"I didn't mean to twist your neck so hard. Are you all right?"

"Yes, Young Master," she said, and he stood and once more started for the door. Firecrackers grabbed the hem of his gown.

"Please, Young Master," she begged. "You've got to stay and hear me out. No lies, I swear. The truth. Please, Young Master, please?"

Mulling it over, he found his curiosity was stronger than his embarassment. She seemed so desperate. What did she have to tell him?

"Make it quick," he said.

She began to brush the dirt from his clothes and he retreated from her touch. Since he'd turned twelve, the year before, not even Amber Willows had been allowed to fuss over him.

"Not here," he said. "Outside." Outside, she couldn't block the way when he decided to leave.

Sitting by the scallions as far from the door and the girl as he could fet and still be within earshot, without making a move or saying a word, or even looking at her, he listened.

*

"My father wasn't always a gravekeeper," she said. "Before the spells came on him, he was an agent boater with a yaolu of his own. He was strong then. He could push and pull the long oar all day, every day, going from town to town, from village to village. He could call every customer by name. He knew every order by heart, no matter how large or how small—what color, what size, what grade—everything. He could locate the right basket or jug or bag faster than the owners themselves.

"Customers trusted him. The shopkeepers who paid him to sell their specialties in the villages did too. Happy faces greeted us everywhere.

"Now, even beggars spit on him. Who wants a gravekeeper around? If only I'd never been born. If only I wasn't cursed—"

She stopped. How could she tell this boy of the happy times, of the day when her mischievous brother, proclaiming he was a spirit sent from the deep to capture wicked little girls, and wailing like a ghost, had crept up on her, coming closer, closer, until her mother, laughing affectionately, lifted the corner of the oilcloth she was mending to envelop her frightened daughter in the safety of its folds? How could she tell him of the disaster that had ruined their lives and was all her fault? How could she? But Steel Hope had drawn nearer to her.

"Please, go on," he said softly. "Don't be afraid to tell me."

She only glanced at him, but even so she saw so much caring in his eyes that she felt safe. And she did tell, choked with tears, speaking in fits and starts, like someone desperately trying to piece together a shattered mirror by seizing a shard here, a shard there.

Steel Hope, listening, was afraid for her. He didn't dare interrupt. Fixing his attention on every utterance, he managed to discern the essentials, but even then, he wondered if the events so real to her had happened at all.

*

Her mother had given birth to twins. First, a healthy boy child. Then, a stillborn girl child. There was nothing to be done, so the agent boater lowered the dead baby over the side. But as the body slipped into the water, suddenly there were cries, cries as loud as firecrackers. The girl lived.

Growing up, Firecrackers wanted to be just like her twin, to be as audacious and fearless and carefree as he, to do all the things he did, but of course, being a girl, she couldn't. While he climbed, swam and fished, she washed, cooked and mended. While he roamed as he pleased in towns and villages, she had to remain on the yaolu, waiting to hear about his adventures.

Someday he would be an agent boater like their father. Someday she would have to leave them to join her husband's family. How she envied him.

One afternoon, when her parents were busy settling accounts, she followed her brother into town. With so much to see, she kept bumping into people. Most of them just kept on walking. A few cursed. She was too happy to mind. There was much to buy, and she had only a few coins left from her New Year's red envelope. Keeping her brother in sight, she hurried along the street trying to choose, and finally decided on an orange.

A motorcar passed. It was green and shiny, and she turned to watch it, walking backwards. Again she bumped into someone. The man's Panama hat went flying and the half-eaten orange in her hand was mashed against his white suit. Though she immediately brushed off the seeds and tried to wipe away the stain, her efforts only made matters worse. He shoved her away. His friends shouted angrily, but she didn't understand a word. When she stooped to pick up the uneaten sections of her orange, he kicked her.

She let out a howl.

Her brother rushed to her aid. The man struck him. Another hit him with an umbrella. He stumbled backwards and fell. His head hit a rock.

The man and his friends disappeared. Bystanders crowded around, all talking at once.

"Japs."

"What can you do?"

"To Brown Dwarfs, a dead Chinese means less than a dung fly."

Firecrackers watched with horror as her parents mourned—her father as wooden as a plank, her mother at first wailing, then keeping silent and refusing to eat. That neither ever questioned her presence at the scene made her wish even more that she could trade places with her brother. With each passing day she became increasingly certain that the gods had never meant her to survive her birth. They would continue to enact retribution until the heavenly accounts were settled.

One morning her mother, now bedridden, awoke and thought her daughter was her son. When Firecrackers instinctively answered to her brother's name, the grieving woman smiled and, for the first time since the tragedy, ate some noodles.

That day Firecrackers cut her hair, put on boys' clothing, and became her twin brother. Thus she might please her mother and, more importantly, fool the gods.

Now and then her mother would sense that something was wrong and test her.

"Climb the mast, son," she would say. So Firecrackers climbed.

"Go for a swim, son," she would say. "Fish would be nice." So Firecrackers swam and fished. Then, on the night of the Mid-Autumn Festival, when they were about to eat the mooncakes, her mother suddenly asked,

"Where's Firecrackers? How can we celebrate the bond of all bonds when one of us is missing? I must go after her."

She left the table, calling her daughter's name. Her father waited for Firecrackers to do something, but she couldn't think what. No matter who she was, her twin or herself, they were only three. She didn't hear the splash, or see her mother again.

Thereafter the agent boater succumbed to spells that came and went without warning; he lost his route and, to pay his debts, the yaolu was sold. Before long they had no roof and little to eat. Then one day, not long before the New Year, while making the rounds from servant gate to servant gate begging for leftovers, they happened upon the House of Li. When the second cook recognized the agent boater who had serviced him so honestly and diligently, he took pity and, knowing that his relative was retiring as grave keeper, offered the mistress another to take his place. The mistress agreed …

*

There was a long silence. Now Firecrackers' eyes were dry, and it was Steel Hope who blinked away tears. He ached for her and the family she had lost. He ached for the family he had never had. While the difference between their lives was as great as the difference between a boy and a girl, somehow the hollow they shared was real. Finally he asked,

"But why do you go on with the masquerade?"

"Don't you understand?" she cried. "Father stands for hours just moving the broom back and forth over the same spot. So when he's asleep I pretend I'm as fearless as my brother and tend the graves. If the House of Li ever knew a dirty girl was looking after their ancestors, they'd throw us out. Then where would we go?

"I also work mornings at a teahouse. If Old Yang knew I was a dirty girl, he'd throw me out of there too. Then how would we live?"

Steel Hope didn't have an answer. Firecrackers was right: If his clansmen knew about her, they'd never let her and her father stay.

"You must have relatives," he said.

She nodded.

"Go to them! They'll give you a home." She shook her head.

"Only Father knew where they live, and he's forgotten that, too."

He must help her. He must find a way. But what did he know about girls? All he knew for sure was that they got married, and without stopping to think, he blurted,

"What if I made Mountain Pine marry you?"

Firecrackers broke down and sobbed.

Steel Hope was bewildered. What had he said that was so wrong?

"Mountain Pine would be a good husband," he argued. "He's kind and loyal and the smartest one in school."

Firecrackers shook her head violently.

"He is, I tell you!" Then, suddenly, he realized that his mother would never permit his book mate to marry before her son graduated, and he refrained from saying any more.

"Oh, please keep my secret anyway," she begged. "Say you'll help. Say you'll be my friend."

For a long moment, he didn't know what to do. Then he spotted a cocklebur on the ground, and in a flash it occurred to him that they shared a common enemy. Had it not been for those sneaky dwarfs, her brother wouldn't have died and his father wouldn't have lost his pride. And what true son of the House of Li would forsake an ally in need?

Of course, it was outrageous that a boy would befriend a girl. But with her hair even shorter than his, her feet as calloused as a rickshaw driver's, who would ever suspect? And if nobody else guessed, what did he care? Naturally Mountain Pine would have to know, but he'd never tell. Mountain Pine's failing wasn't telling secrets, it was avoiding games.

At the thought of games, Steel Hope grinned. What game could possibly be better than helping this wretched girl and, in the bargain, fooling the whole town?

"You swear never to grow your hair long?"

"I swear."

"You swear never to wear a gi-pao?"

"I swear."

"You swear never to wash your feet?"

"I swear." Racing away, he shouted over his shoulder,

"Wait for us at the dike tomorrow afternoon." …

194.1 Excerpt from The Battle Of Sangkumryung\fn{by Lu Chu-kuo (1938-   )} Yiyang, Honan Province, China (M) 5

The first gray light of dawn was already filtering through the tunnel entrance as Company Commander Chang Wen-kuei hastily scrambled into his clothes. Completing his morning ablutions with water from a metal ammunition case, he moved a few steps away and walked outside. He stretched his arms, threw out his chest, and inhaled deeply of the cool, moist but fresh air of the morning.

It was a fine autumn morning. The scenery to the rear of the position fanned away like a water-color. The endless, undulating mountain ranges were clothed in crimson-hued maple leaves, dotted here and there with a jade-green pine as well as some nameless trees whose leaves had the tint of a ripe orange—all these colors matched each other in perfect harmony. A thin morning mist, like some white kerchief of fine-spun silk, drifted above the beautiful mountain valley, and the long golden fingers of the rising sun caressed the mountain tops, transforming the whole Korean landscape into a kaleidoscope of dazzling color.

Every sunrise Chang would stand outside the tunnel, feasting his eyes on the beauty of the Korean countryside which spread itself out in front of him. Just as, when a child, he used to station himself at the door to watch the hustle and bustle of his market town. He was a tall, sturdily-built man, but even the few wrinkles which weather and war had engraved on his brow could not mask his ingenuous nature. With both hands buried deep in his trouser pockets, he rocked gently from side to side, curled back his tongue and softly imitated the chirping of a bird.

A gray lark winged its way over to alight on the twisted remains of a shell-torn tree. Flexing its small, reddish-colored neck, it twittered happily, throwing an occasional watchful glance in Chang's direction. Suddenly, four mortar shells whizzed through the air and thudded down near the communication trench which led to battalion headquarters. There was a great flash, and the earth trembled. With a tremulous shudder the lark rose from its perch and whirred off to the north. Chang regretfully watched the small gray dot until it was swallowed up by the maple trees in the distance. Then he casually brushed the dust from his shoulders, removed his cap, and flicked the dust from that too.

Since his posting to the .tunnel several months earlier, Company Commander Chang Wen-kuei had felt many changes within himself. Previously he had been like a carefree child, giving little thought to the world around him and caring only for the marching, fighting, and training of a soldier's life. Now for months on end he and his men had been confined to the tunnel in the daytime, with only a nocturnal excursion now and again to break the monotony. No Korean civilians were ever seen in that area—the very houses had long since been reduced to ashes—and even a glimpse of the sun became a rare thing. A few hundred metres to the south were the positions of the U.S. aggressors, whose planes and artillery beat a daily and deadly tattoo on .the peaks of Sangkumryung. Dead, grassless ground, pocked with craters of blackened earth, and broken only by the traces of the communication trenches. It was hardly surprising that Chang now regarded any of nature's offerings or tiny creatures as something novel, something to be treasured.

Several weeks before, during the "Guard Against Germ Warfare Movement", he had acquired a small kitten—a little black thing covered with white patches—from regimental headquarters for the purpose, as he had put it, of "reducing the risk of vermin". Three days prior to that particular morning, however, as the kitten was basking on the sun-drenched slope outside the tunnel, it had fallen victim to an enemy shell. Wang Chi-pao, the company messenger, had been cursing volubly for three days; Chang too, although it was to himself, not openly.

Chang spat angrily and gave vent to a few choice oaths. Even a visiting bird is frightened away by the American shells! He swung round in annoyance and walked back into the tunnel.

A group of the men had just returned from their night's work of reinforcing the defence positions. Some were shaking the dust from their clothes. Others were filling their mugs from a large dixie of water which purred gently over the charcoal brazier. A few had already settled down comfortably on the straw mats, and by the light of an oil lamp were intent on the card game in progress. Without having to strain his eyes for a clearer view, Chang knew for certain that Liu Tsai-hsueh and Lin Mao-tien, the company's Card Kings, would be two of the four clutching the cardboard fans.

"Pooh! Stinking luck! First one I get is a deuce. Second's a deuce too. All three of 'em only make seven," wailed the tubby Liu Tsai-hsueh. He flicked his middle finger hard against each card as he picked it up. A long thread of smoke from a hand-rolled cig?rette curled upwards into his narrowed eyes, causing him to frown, and making his sparse eyebrows appear as one distinct line below the creases. He leisurely picked up the cards, the cigarette dangling loosely from his lips.

Lin Mao-tien, a machine-gunner, was a swarthy-complexioned man whose dark eyes seemed too large for his face. His eyebrows shot happily ceiling-wards as his fingers tightened on a Joker, plus several Aces and Kings. After he had taken up his twelve cards, he carefully placed his hand over the six cards remaining in the kitty and spoke to Liu:

"Right—Call! How much d'you bid?"

Lin knew that Liu, if his hand was a poor one, would make a grab for the kitty and then bid only fifty or sixty. Liu was inclined to "cheat" in this way. Liu deliberated for a moment or two, arranging and rearranging his cards, before replying slyly:

"Pah! Can't bid a bloody thing. I don't have a single face card. Not even a pointer. Redeal 'em. Redeal 'em." He bent forward, laying his cards down face up.

"Now, take a look at that!"

"Hang on a minute!" grunted Lin, as he carefully stacked his own cards and began to ruffle through Liu's discarded hand. "I trust you about as far as 1 can throw you."

He soon discovered a Two of Hearts hidden under the King of Diamonds. Caught red-handed, Liu quickly picked up the cards in the kitty and shuffled them in with his own.

"Aw!" he said, rising to his feet, "let's pack up. Anyway, it's time we hit the hay."

"Hit the hay! You're a bloody cheat, that's what you are! This game's going to be played through to the end."

Lin's face was flushed with anger, and his dilated eyes blazed an open threat. As Liu shuffled sheepishly away Lin reached out and tripped him up. Liu went sprawling over the prostrate form of a platoon leader who was asleep nearby. Startled out of his slumber, 2nd Platoon Leader Sung Chan-fang raised himself on one arm. He was a meticulous sort of person, who himself neither played cards nor smoked. His eyes widened as they lit upon the playing cards and cigarette ash scattered over his quilt.

"Liu Tsai-hsueh—You!—" He was both angry and amused. "If you've so much extra energy, you'd better save it for the enemy, huh!"

Liu quickly stubbed out his cigarette and popped his tongue out and in again in a gesture of self-reproach. He well knew that the platoon leader's indignation would fade as speedily as it had been aroused.

"All right, I apologize. Let's start a new game. The platoon leader's given me a telling off, so that should take the edge off your anger, eh!"

Company Commander Chang Wen-kuei sat on a hand-grenade case, his head tilted in amusement as he watched the two men. Liu's "cheating" seemed to increase in proportion to Lin's growing sense of the injustice of the game. Although Chang had never formally encouraged any "skylarking" in his company, he liked to see the men lively. Indeed, what would life be like if they sat around like stone statues day after day?

The men in Tunnel "A" were like one big family. Liu with his incessant clowning; and the easily-piqued Lin with his sharp and ready tongue, were real live wires which this "family" couldn't do without. A born humorist, Liu never let the opportunity of a wisecrack escape him, regardless of time or place; and, as Lin was fond of pointing out, Liu was a bit of a trickster. Lin's peppery nature was such that losing his temper had become almost habitual. At the slightest provocation he would rant and rave, his eyes wide open, glaring a threat. In most cases, he would be at it with Liu. Both men were, however, the best of friends. Their bunks were always adjacent; when a card game was on, where one was you would find the other; and they were an inseparable team when it came to getting hold of a live prisoner—"catching a tongue" as the armymen called it—or for "live target practice."

Liu and Lin were heatedly engaged in some new dispute when the telephone clamoured for attention. The operator rose from his seat on the mat, lifted the receiver from its cradle, and clamped it to his ear.

“"Huh? … Yes, he's here … Right." He handed the telephone to Chang Wen-kuei, saying:

"For you, Company Commander. The battalion political director."

"Look," Lu An-kuo's voice sounded loud and clear as it vibrated through the ear-piece, "Number 109 Commander's coming over to your position. I want you to take all necessary precautions." His voice dropped to an almost inaudible whisper as he continued, "Do your best to … er … to 'limit' his movements, eh! Inform me by 'phone as soon as he arrives there." The suddenly changed tone seemed to indicate that the Number 109 Commander was within hearing distance.

"What!" asked Chang in surprise, as he bent over the telephone. "Number 109?"

"That's right. He'll be leaving here immediately."

In all truth, Chang was happy at the prospect of seeing the divisional commander again; but, on the other hand, he wished the intended visit would never come about. It would be a real morale booster for the troops, but coming to the tunnel was fraught with danger.

"All right," he replied. He stood up and reflectively rubbed palm on palm. He then drew the back of his hand across his chin. No, he didn't need a shave. And the other men had had one when he did. Still He couldn't feel at ease about it. He called to the messenger.

"Wang Chi-pao, instruct the 1st Platoon and the squad up forward to check up and see if any of the men need a shave. If they do, have it done right away. The divisional commander's due to arrive here at any moment."

Chins and cheeks fell under close scrutiny. The hirsute Lin Mao-tien, who was still wrangling with Liu Tsai-hsueh, was quickly labelled a "must" for the barber. As a hot towel and lather were in turn applied to his chin, Liu grumbled to the barber:

"See, this beard of mine grows faster than wild grass! I had a shave the same day as the others but now it's almost long enough to make braids!"

"My suggestion," Liu chimed in, addressing the barber, "is that you pluck out his stubble hair by hair. That'd save you a lot of trouble in the future, eh!"

The barber grinned as he took up his razor. Lin twisted round to glare at Liu.

"I'll settle accounts with you when I'm through here."

"Ah! It's nice to have no beard," Liu said banteringly in an undertone, still intent on his game of solitaire. "No scraping for me!"

"Maybe not," interjected Chang Wen-kuei as he shot a glance at Liu, "but for goodness' sake try to keep your witticisms to yourself when the divisional commander's here. Anyway, your head's so overtaxed that both you and your beard have stopped growing!"

A smirk of satisfaction spread itself across Lin's face, and his black eyes gleamed malevolently.

"An improper remark won't pass my lips. I promise," said Liu. His fingers laid down the cards in neat rows. "I'll just wrap myself up in a game of patience."

Chang carried out a circumspect tour of the tunnel, ensuring that all the weapons were in their proper racks and that all bedding was folded in the correct manner. He even remembered things like the charcoal brazier and the oil lamp. Everything was in order. As a final touch, he spent a few moments arranging two maple sprigs and several blue chrysanthemums in an empty "Tunghua" wine bottle placed in front of Chairman Mao's portrait. The wine had been sent over in honour of National Day, which the men had celebrated a few days previously, and the sprigs and flowers had been presented to them by the girls of an army ensemble which had recently visited the front lines.

Yes, everything was in order. Chang took a small mirror from his haversack, held it up and carefully examined his face. He walked confidently out of the tunnel to go and meet the divisional commander. When Tsui Hsin-wei, the divisional commander, was still a regimental commander, Chang had been his orderly. From long experience, Chang knew how much the divisional commander loathed any untidiness on the part of his subordinates. He still remembered the time when a battalion commander had come, unshaven, to attend a meeting at the regimental headquarters. Tsui looked at the battalion commander, and then, in a tone which oddly combined seriousness and jocularity, called to Chang:

"Orderly, please ask the barber to come over here immediately. This officer is in need of a shave."

The battalion commander was greatly embarrassed. Never again did he appear unshaven. Occasionally Tsui would catch Chang with a collar button undone, and he would observe:

"You seem to be reluctant to part with your 'guerrilla' habits, eh!"

Thus, this time, in expectation of the arrival of the divisional commander, Chang had made certain that both he and his company were spruce and tidy.

Chang hung around the tunnel entrance for some time but no one was seen approaching. He walked a little way along the communication trench and unexpectedly came face to face with the divisional commander as he rounded a bend in the trench. Beads of perspiration trickled down through the sparse gray hairs over the commander's forehead. In his hand he held a sturdy tree branch—a makeshift walking cane. His orderly was carrying the commander's jacket over his arm, and behind followed a medical attendant who had a red-cross satchel slung over one shoulder.

In response to Chang's salute the divisional commander reached out and grasped Chang's hand in a firm hand-shake.

"Well, what on earth are you doing out here?"

"I was waiting for you, Divisional Commander."

"Absolutely unnecessary. There's no call for you to be walking around outside. I'm quite familiar with the position here." He paused for breath, both hands resting on his "cane".

"Very good, Divisional Commander. Shall we go now? It isn't far."

"Right. Phew! It's quite a climb up here. And, curse my luck, this orderly of mine wouldn't even let me sit down for a breather!"

When they reached the tunnel the divisional commander stopped, his attention caught by the chiselled inscriptions on both sides of entrance.

"Well now, Chang Wen-kuei, look!" He read off the words. "'We Enter the Darkness of This Tunnel so That Our Motherland Might Live in the Sun.' Who in your company thought up this idea? It's only about a rrionth since I was here last. And now you even have an epigraph at your door, eh!"

"The idea originated with our political instructor. A soldier in the 5th Squad, Liu Tsai-hsueh, did the engraving."

"Wasn't your political instructor wounded recently? Where is he now? Has he written to you?"

"Yes, he has. Claims that being in hospital is like confinement to barracks. The assistant instructor, Wang Hung-yuan, has taken over his duties. He was formerly my 1st platoon leader, but he has been promoted now."

"Ah, I see. Now, those characters at the top there—This Stronghold Is Our Home"—I think they're a shade too small. A little more breadth and they'd be just right."

"Yes, I agree. They are a bit on the small side. A lack of experience, I daresay. Please, Commander, won't you come in?"

The men were lined up in single file along one side of the tunnel. Sung Chan-fang, the 2nd Platoon Leader, shouted "A-ten-shun!" and a sharp "click" followed as heels came together in unison.

"Ah!" said the divisional commander, smiling with satisfaction. "A real review, no less! At ease, men. At ease. Freshly shaved too, eh! Chang Wen-kuei, has all this been done on my account?"

Chang replied with a noncommittal smile.

"At ease, men," the divisional commander again instructed, and the 2nd Platoon Leader gave the order to fall out. Chang offered the commander a seat—an empty hand-grenade case—and then hastened away to report his arrival to battalion headquarters.

Tsui Hsin-wei didn't sit down right away. Taking the two sprigs of maple from the bottle, he looked at them studiously for a moment and then observed:

"H'm! They're withering. Next time I come over I'll bring some fresh ones. But even I myself can't tell exactly when the 'next time' will be! No, the best thing will be to have a few brought back when one of you goes to the rear. Compared with the rear, the forward positions here are as bare as a bald man's head!"

"Ho! Even on a bald man's head there's a chance of finding a hair or two; but in this place you won't see a single blade of grass!"

The droll remark fell instinctively from the lips of Liu Tsai-hsueh.

"Divisional Commander, won't you rest now?" bid Chang as he handed a mug of water to Tsui.

"Um? Ah, good!" said the divisional commander as he sat down. He drew a handkerchief from his pocket and began to mop the perspiration from his brow. "Now, tell me how you're getting on here."

Chang's face lit up and he spoke enthusiastically.

"Oh, fine. Everything's fine. Our cooks are really top-notch. They give us meat dumplings, meat pies, pancakes—something different every day. This morning, for instance, we had fried twists and noodle soup. Commander, why don't you stay and eat with us today? Wang Yung-fu is in charge of the kitchen, and you can sample his fare for yourself."

"True," interposed Liu Tsai-hsueh, "it's all right as far as grub's concerned." His tone was diffident as he continued to roll a cigarette. "But the tobacco ration's a bit scrimpy."

"Scrimpy!" Lin Mao-tien spat the word out with derision. "Why, with a whole tobacco factory behind you, you'd still not have enough! Commander, every non-smoker in the place gives him his ration, but he's always on the scrounge for more. He has a fag stuck in his mouth all day long. Look at his nicotine-stained fingers! Even on night patrol, right there under the noses of the enemy, he'll light one up!"

"Oh, go on. Go on"—Liu's attempted denial was drowned in a burst of laughter from the other men.

"Liu Tsai-hsueh, is this true?" the divisional commander asked smilingly. "If you go on like this, I'll have to order you to stop smoking altogether."

Liu flushed with embarrassment and he didn't even dare to light the cigarette which he had just finished rolling. The divisional commander twisted round and spoke to Chang Wen-kuei.

"I'd like to have a look round from the observation post." He then addressed his orderly.

"Here, let's have the binoculars. No necessity for your going up too."

A shaft from the tunnel led directly to the observation post, from where the whole position on Sangkumryung, every trench, foxhole, and weapon emplacement, was as distinctly visible as the lines on one's own palm. The divisional commander peered through the binoculars for about two minutes, and then lowered the glasses and sat down on a rock.

"Chang Wen-kuei, do you know the real purpose of my coming here today?" Chang remained silent for a moment and then answered frankly:

"No, I don't."

"I haven't come on any routine inspection. Nor have I come on a casual visit. Why, if I were to run round inspecting every company I'd be worn down to a frazzle before I got half way through! I wonder if you're aware that the enemy are preparing a major offensive against this position? Did you know this? It'll be no ordinary offensive, mark my words. They've been sending up division after division, and our observers' reports indicate that over 10,000 truckloads of ammunition have been brought in."

"That's right, their helicopters have been in and out four times already."

"Um-hm! That was Van Fleet—and Syngman Rhee.\fn{Lt. Gen. James Van Fleet had been sent to take command of the Eighth Army. Syngman Rhee had just been elected in August to a second term as President of South Korea at the time of the invasion of his territory by the armed forces of North Korea} They came up to look the situation over and to decide on specific strategy for the attack. The build-up's been going on for several months now, and their whole might will be thrown against you in an effort to capture this position."

"Don't worry, Commander. We'll never let them take it!"

"Of course. We can't let that happen. However, they've massed an enormous force for this drive; whereas we, on the other hand, cannot deploy a whole battalion or regiment in this confined area. So, a limited number of our men will have to stave off the enemy and annihilate their effective strength here. When the fighting starts, it's sure to be pretty fierce; and the battle's likely to be protracted. You should be mentally prepared for this ordeal. Fighting isn't like talking. Heaven knows how many thousands of tons of steel they'll pour down on these peaks."

"Commander, I've already discussed the matter with my men. We realize the strategic importance of this position, and we're determined to defend it to the last. As a key point on the central front, Sangkumryung ensures the safety of both the eastern and western lines; and from here we have complete control of the movements of the enemy to a depth of scores of kilometres. If they ever succeeded in capturing this position, they would use it as a jumping-off point for an assault on the main peak to our rear; and if the main peak fell into their hands, they would try to drive the wedge in deeper, greatly endangering our entire line of defence."

"Naturally, our enemy covets this important position. Their intention is also to step up military pressure here in the hopes of compelling us to yield to their demands in the talks at Kaesong. Further, they believe that if they can win a victory on this height it'll give them a stronger hand in demanding additionaI cannon-fodder from their satellites in the United Nations so as to extend their war of aggression. Failure on the part of you men here would mean a great loss of face before our motherland—before the whole world, for that matter—for the Volunteers.

"Safeguard World Peace—What do the words mean? As far as you are concerned, safeguarding world peace means safeguarding this hilltop! Never consider it as just another hill. Our over-all defence network and the entire land of the Korean people is made up of a series of such hills!"

The two officers re-entered the tunnel unnoticed by the group of men who stood talking together. Among them was Liu Tsai-hsueh, who held the habitual cigarette in his fingers. He was gesticulating wildly as he rambled on in a low monotone.

"I tell you, it's a cert! We'll be seeing some action soon. Why d'you think the divisional commander came here personally—"

The divisional commander looked at Chang Wen-kuei, who nodded his head and smiled. Liu suddenly stopped short, seeing that the divisional commander had returned.

"Well, what are you all talking about here, eh? Aren't you going to let me in on it too?" asked the divisional commander, looking directly at Liu.

"Er … Nothing. Nothing really, Commander," came Liu's ready reply. "We … Er … We heard that a delegation from home was coming to visit us, and we were wondering what they'd bring for us."

"Tobacco, I suppose," the divisional commander suggested humorously. "You seem to be very concerned about what the motherland might send you, but what do you have to offer the motherland in return?"

"We can fight! Commander, may I ask you a question?"

"Certainly, go ahead."

"When will we get the chance of some real fighting? We've been stuck in this tunnel for months, and aside from firing a blind shot now and again, or snatching an occasional prisoner, we just sit here twiddling our thumbs. On other parts of the front our army has been scoring victory after victory. Wiping out a company here. Wiping out a platoon there. How about letting us see some action too?"

"You will. Believe me, you will. Keep your weapons well oiled—and wait!"

Long before breakfast was ready, the divisional commander had finished checking over all the ammunition and food supplies in the tunnel. Furthermore, he had made Chang take him to visit the squad on the forward position. Chang tried to protest, but he knew it was futile. His experience as the commander's orderly had taught him that when Tsui Hsin-wei asked for something, he meant it. No matter how dangerous the circumstances were, he had never once been able to prevent the commander having his own way.

"Comrade Chang Wen-kuei, this is not the time for us to take either a 'big step forward' or a 'big step backward'. We'll have to hold out on this impregnable line, matching our perseverance and technical know-how with the enemy's. And we will, perhaps, at a given time and place, have to match iron and steel with them too!"

The two men left the tunnel and hurried over a patch of scorched earth towards the communication trench. A gust of chill wind blew up, carrying away the grayish-black smoke of a recently fired shell, and heralding the approach of the Korean War's third winter.\fn{So ends the first chapter of Lu's book. The Battle of Sangkumryung was known as the Battle of Triangle Hill, or Operation Showdown in the West. It began on October 14 and finally ended on November 25, when the [United Nations] forces disengaged from the battle. In any case, the Supreme U. N. Commander, Matthew Ridgeway, had ordered Van Fleet on November 12 of the previous year to cease offensive operations; and from that time on the Eighth Army was limited to an active defense. Throughout 1952, the opposing armies "limited themselves to constant patrolling and occasional small, violent clashes along the opposing outpost lines." [ENC,XIII,473]* It is true that during this 43 day period, 365 U. S. soldiers were killed and 1,174 were wounded; the forces of South Korea lost 1,096 killed and 3,496 wounded, and some 7,100 Chinese troops were killed with a further 8,500 wounded. One American soldier was captured and 97 Republic of Korea personnel were listed as "missing in action." But these were virtually insignificant statistics in a war which eventually cost 33,720 American, 70,000 South Korean, and perhaps as many as 960,000 Chinese battle deaths—not to mention a further 400,000 non-battle deaths the soldiers soffered from disease; some 3,000,000 North Koreans who died from disease or other causes directly attributable to the war; and close to 500,000 South Korean civilians who were killed or died from war causes. *Encyclopedia Britannica, 1966 edition, volume 13, page 473.}

150.265 Mother Fish\fn{by Xi Xi aka Cheung Yin [Zhang Yan] (1938-)} Shanghai, China (F) 9

1

At daybreak the mother fish, looking stately and solemn, was floating on its back on the surface of the water, its entire body covered with a translucent silvery sheen or extraordinary luminosity. On each side of the tank were filter tubes shaped like shepherd's pipes. Out of their tiny air holes sprayed arcs of water that joined in midair to form a single waterfall, tinkling melodiously as it cascaded back into the tank, stirring up an endless flow of effervescent spume. Silently, this raft of pearly bubbles held aloft that soul of peerless splendor and beauty now lying in calm repose.

Since goldfish have no visible sexual organs, we have no way of determining their sex when they are young. Nor can their gender be deduced from such traits as gentleness versus aggressiveness, boorishness versus refinement. Most newborn goldfish never make it to adulthood. Fluctuations in water temperature, bacterial infections, and human negligence all tend to contribute to their premature demise. The reference books tell us that, when goldfish reach maturity, the edges of the gills and pectoral fins of the male fan out with tassellike appendages, while the abdomen of the female swells up with spawn. But these features can be seen only in adult fish at least three years old, after they have survived the many perils of life to reach their prime, those years of glorious heroism and heartbreaking pathos.

*

Across the top of the piano that stood next to the tank, a luxuriant bouquet of lilies sprawled in a rich display, their stems bundled together tightly in an imitation Greek amphora. Here and there a few buds, their heads dangling gently, still slumbered in spring's soothing embrace, while blossoms in full flower spread their cleft corollas to their widest. Stamens thronged around their fairy queen, their bright yellow pollen arousing insects to take wing. The clear bright light of the morning sun made its way onto the entrance and through the tassels of the canvas awning, the tinted glass of the French windows, and the sheer gauze curtains with the lacy butterfly pattern to present, with impeccable timing, the silhouette of a single lily sticking firmly out of one ear of a bust of Beethoven. The delicate fragrance of the white blossoms wafted gently through the air, permeating the room Against the unchanging, implacable rhythm rapped out by the metronome standing its ground as majestic as one of the pyramids, I could hear the flowers singing their hallelujahs. Flowers, those trumpets of the angels.

I remember the fragrance of lilies.

*

The box that the Christmas cards came in had a glassine cover. The sides of the cardboard container were printed with illustrations of stories from the Bible—shepherds abiding in the fields, the three wise men from the east, the newborn babe in the manger. The paintings, simulating the effect of needlework, showcased the splendors of folk art and craftsmanship. The wool of the sheep was etched in identical curlicues; the shepherd's staff emerged from a procession of chain stitches; the shepherd's staff emerged from a procession of chain stitches climbing ever higher; Joseph's headdress was as ornate as a Persian tapestry; and the face of the infant was presented in bas-relief. In the background, the boundaries of hills and pastures dissolved into each other. Flowers and leaves were done in delicate petit point.

She scooped the mother fish out of the water with both hands and gently placed it in the box. The fish was still soft and tender to the touch, flawlessly beautiful as always, its eyes gleaming bright and full of life. "I am leaving the goldfish in your care, Sis." Suddenly her mind went back to that beautiful sunny day last autumn, to the airport filled with young people leaving for their studies abroad, and her younger brother, a backpack on his shoulders, smiling cheerfully as he shook hands and said good-bye to all the friends and relatives who had come to see him off.

*

"Have a smooth flight, Cousin."

"All these people to see you off!" said Grandma.
"Take good care of yourself," said Mother.
"I'm sure they'll be healthy and strong, Sis."
"Remember, you must study hard," said Grandpa.
"I promise I'll send you the biology magazines regularly," said Cousin.
"You'll find the recharger for the dry-cell batteries on top of the bookcase, Sis."
"Come on everybody, let's take a picture together."
"We'll save all the newspapers for you," said Mother.
"You'll come back for Christmas, won't you?" said Grandma.
"You should go see Paris on your vacation," said third Auntie.
"Everything in the Louvre\fn{A Paris museum complex of buildings (constructed 1546-c.1850), covering some 48 acres and housing the National Museum of Art.} is a masterpiece," said Third Auntie's husband.
"A batfish looks just like a pine cone in the rainy season, Sis."
"When it rains, make sure you use an umbrella," said Grandpa.
"Let's take a picture over here. The view in the background is really pretty."
"Here's an impromptu present for you, Cousin."
"The credit card is just a backup, in case of an emergency," said Father.
"There are two spare air canisters in the drawer, Sis."
"Who says down jackets make you look clumsy?" said Grandpa.
"They do have central heating in the school, don't they?" said Grandma.
"When it turns cold, remember to put in the heating tube, Sis."
"This present is something the Family Planning Association handed out on the street just now, cousin."
"The plane ticket is free," said Mother.
"A credit card is not a winning lottery ticket," said Father.
"I'll send you a box of instant noodles every month," said Grandma.
"If you're squeamish about the red worms, just give them fish food, Sis."
"Don't just hang around with Chinese kids," said third Auntie.
"Make lots of friends and socialize with people," said third Auntie's husband.
"Write home when you have time," said Grandpa.
"We will call you," said Mother.
"So long, Cousin."
"Thanks for taking care of the goldfish, Sis."

2

As the spell of damp, rainy weather continued into its third week, the pantry began to look like a greenhouse—the garlic and ginger were sprouting, and a bright yellow mushroom burst from a crack in the chopping block. She did not have a single pair of shoes dry enough to wear to school. The droning noise inside the house came not from an air conditioner but a dehumidifier. The city had turned into a gigantic cistern, its citizens groping their way through a miasmal haze. Foghorns called to each other all day long from the ferries plying the harbor, their din finally coming to rest on the motionless sleeves of garments hanging limply on the clotheslines. A long line of customers snaked outside the laundromats, all waiting eagerly to feed the gaping, greedy mouths of the dryers.

She thought it was the weather that was giving her dizzy spells and rumblings in her stomach, as if a road crew were tunneling inside her body. Sometimes these invaders remained in one spot, sometimes they marched single file to their other bases and continued to drill. Grandma wailed that she couldn't see anything clearly, Grandpa hobbled around painfully on joints that seemed to have rusted, and Mother said she felt like a thousand-pound load had been slung across her shoulders. As for her, she became aware of the sharp medicinal odor that hung in the air, overpowering even the smell of the various forms of vegetation growing in the bathroom.

After the second attack of nausea, she suddenly remembered the spur-of-the-moment gift presented to her brother by their older cousin on that beautiful autumn day at the airport. At the time, his baby face had instantly turned a deep pink, and he had insisted on giving the present back to his cousin. All their other cousins had broken into sly, mysterious grins. She had not actually seen the gift but she knew that it had been something that resembled a rubber glove, except, of course, a pair of gloves would have had ten digits in all. Supermarkets and twenty-four-hour convenience stores all carried this item, prominently displayed on the counter next to the cash register. At first, she had assumed it was a new kind of spearmint chewing gum, or a specially packaged book of matches, like the kind you find in cafés.

It was all very well for the family Planning Association to hand out these free gifts to all the men passing by on the street, she thought to herself, but the ones who really needed protection were not the adults, nor the lusty young men just beginning to feel their oats, but the callow young maidens still innocent of the ways of the world. In every school and classroom, teacher should convey the facts of life to every girl, so that later their mothers would not have to sit at the breakfast table trying to cajole their nauseous daughters into drinking the scalded milk they have so solicitously prepared.

*

They were both open cities. It was early spring; the water was still cold, the secluded beach all but deserted. After a little while, they swam back ashore and lay down in the shelter of an abandoned vacation cottage, their bodies coated with tiny grains of sand. They both loved playing in the sand, and soon they wre building castles and moats on the beach, giving shape to surrealistic landscapes.

*

He was wearing a pair of swimming trunks with a marine-life print: crabs and eels and whatnot lurking among coral reefs. Idly, she began to draw shapes in the sand on his back, slowly expanding the universe in the original aquarium until it encompassed all infinity. As the fine grains rustled and rolled across her human canvas, she created thick tangles of seaweed, sunken galleons, rusted anchors, and Spanish doubloons. Under the sun's gleaming rays, she saw Portuguese men-of-war, crabs, seaweed, and eels all coming to life before her eyes.

She could hear the rain-like splashing of the surf as it rolled in. The beach was now completely deserted. The sand felt as fine and soft as pollen. He began drawing pictures on her body—a school of fish, a covey of ever-shifting clouds, a procession of undulating hills, a little house hidden deep within the forest. She could feel him removing the wooden shutters, throwing open the windows overgrown with pink, white, and purple hollyhock blossoms. Gently, he undid the latch on the silent, well-fastened front portal and began to turn the twin rings of the beautiful brass door knocker.

All the starfish, jellyfish, and mollusks she had sketched earlier now floated before her eyes. She herself was ocean and seaweed and coral reef. She felt the slithering of an eel, experienced the shock of a bite from a crab's claw. I love you, I love you. Summer had not yet arrived, its advent no more than a faint drumbeat tapping in the distance. The spring rains had brought mud and a perpetual pea-soup fog.

The mother fish's belly began to balloon rapidly. She stared intently as the docile, long-suffering mother swam slowly back and forth, back and forth, its fan-shaped pectoral fins undulating softly. As it glided along, it seemed by turns to be bearing a heavy, juicy plum; it seemed as though its belly had been wrapped around an overripe peach; seemed as though its abdomen had become a pomegranate on the verge of bursting. The skin on its underside looked extremely thin, almost filmy. The overlapping shingle-like scales had all separated, the tectonic plates on the map of its body transformed into continents, permanently adrift. But the mother fish continued to look healthy and happy; its sweet friendly eyes bright and alert, its dainty mouth and gills opening and closing with each serene breath. Its tiny tail fin fluttered elegantly, as though its bulging belly were not big with child but rather a swim bladder filled with air, accentuating the lissome gracefulness of its body. When the air-conditioner repairman—who had brought back the overhauled motor and was reinstalling it—saw the mother fish, he couldn't help exclaiming, "What a beautiful Lanchou!" But right away he sighed, "The delivery could be very difficult."

The mother fish was, in fact, a Lanchouo. Her brother was partial to this mutant breed with their torpedo-shaped bodies. They are characterized by the absence of dorsal fins, a short bulbous trunk, a tail-fin that looks just like a pair of cotyledons, and a sharp right angle where the back and tail intersect. Prime specimens of Lanchou have well-developed head muscles that ripple and bulge into fleshy protuberances, making them look as if their heads were covered with soap bubbles. After visiting every shop in the fish market, he had picked out eight Lanchous, going methodically from the very first to the very last. He even got out of bed before sunup one morning to check out the specialty market on one of those side streets near the railroad terminal. At each place he stopped and scrutinized every tank, doggedly carrying out his exhaustive search until he had found exactly what he wanted. When he brought the fish home, they were still quite small, each no more than the length of a little finger, and as flat as a willow leaf. But in the blink of an eye, they grew into handsome, elegant adults.

The reference books say that the male fish tend to be somewhat smaller, while the females are generally larger and very robust. Two years later only one of the eight Lanchous remained small and skinny; the others had all grown to the size of one's palm, at least. At the time, she had been puzzled by that single frail-looking fish. It has seemed healthy enough and quite carefree. Thinking back, she finally understood that it must have been a male. Earlier this spirit it had lost its life to the virulent epidemic of white fungus raging at the time. Now, she realized with a start, the inhabitants of the fish tank constituted an all female kingdom

3

Easter vacation brought with it a string of family gatherings. There were Pure Bright Festival\fn{A note reads: One of the twenty-four solar periods in the lunar calendar which generally falls in early to mid-April. It is the traditional day for people to visit their ancestors' tombs and is also known as Tomb-sweeping Day.} ceremonies for the grown-ups, April Fool's Day pranks for the teenagers, and general high-spirited play by the children on vacation. All provided an excuse to get together for celebration and fun. Once gathered for one reason or the other, many members of the extended family who ordinarily didn't get to see much of each other took advantage of the holiday to continue the festivities at somebody's house. Her home was no exception. By midafternoon on the day of the Pure Bright Festival, the house was teeming with guests.

The living room, dining room, study, and bedrooms had all been commandeered by mah-jongg enthusiasts, who filled the air with the sound of their clacking tiles. Those who couldn't get together a four-some for mah-jongg were watching television. The screen flickered sporadically as it told the story of a girl, thin as a pencil, whose name was Rosemarie and who was just then walking absentmindedly past the colored tiles of the Long Corridor.\fn{A note reads: A covered walkway in the Summer Palace in Beijing, famous for its brilliantly colored and glazed ceramic tiles.} The younger children were playing electronic games in her brother's bedroom. A steady stream of squeaks and squawks came from the kitchen, where Mother and third Auntie were bustling about. Was it the vegetables whimpering in the wok, or the clucking of the two women as they chattered about this and that?

She sat down in front of the tank to feed the goldfish. With its bulging belly, the mother fish looked like a balloon floating in the water as it swam back and forth. She wondered whether the fish's stomach would explode like a lighted firecracker. Now whenever she walked up to the tank, the mother fish would swim over delightedly, its eyes turning toward her with warmth and affection She had been trying to help the expectant mother since early spring, but it was no use; her brother was the only one who knew what to do to save it.

She made her way to the dining-room table and began to cut the chestnut cake into equal-sized wedges, putting each piece onto a paper plate together with a little plastic fork. She poured soda from a liter bottle into glasses and garnished each one with a slice of lemon. She steeped premium-grade oolong in a Yixing teapot, brewed fresh coffee, and prepared tea with milk, English style. Then she brought the beverages and desserts into the various rooms, stopping to exchange a few greetings with the respective parties before broaching the question of how to help a pregnant fish.

With the men, the topic of conversation never strayed from the pros and cons of stereo equipment:

"What do you think of compact discs?"

"They're small and easy to store."

"They're durable and never wear out."

"But what do you do with the old LPs?"\fn{Long Playing records.}

"(What should I do about my goldfish?)"

"Keep them as antiques."

The women talked about fashion:

"(What should I do about my goldfish?)"

"Pair the gold with the black, it's all the rage this season."

:Are we getting a little too old for patterned stockings?"

"Those gray-and-white outfits by Giorgio Armani are just gorgeous."

The older folks were still grumbling about their health:

"There's no cure for bone spurs."

"There's no cure for presbyopia."

"There's no cure for rheumatism."

"there's no cure for gray hair."

"(What should I do about my goldfish?)"

"There's no cure for any of that."

The little kids were excitedly punching buttons on the video games:

"(What should I do about my goldfish?)"

"Just gobble up that green flower."
"Jump up on the bricks and knock out that flower."
"When you eat the flower you'll have the strength of Superman."
Several of the teachers couldn't keep their minds off school business:
"Not a day goes by that I don't confiscate a stack of comic books."
"Every other picture shows a skirt hiked up to here."
"Or a chemise unbuttoned down to here."
"(What should I do about my goldfish?)"
"The student who got pregnant went quietly off to Shenzhen."\fn{A note reads: A city in mainland China just across the border from Hong Kong.}
Suddenly a joyous shout came from the kitchen:
"Third auntie is going to be a mother!"
"What should I do about my goldfish?"\fn{Not bracketed in the text before me.}

*

Mother said, "Why don't you go shopping with Third Auntie?" Third Auntie was thirty-eight years old and not at all like other women her age. She was petite, baby-faced, and still childless after fifteen years of marriage. "I don't want to have any children," she had insisted. She was an overage woman-child who refused to grow up and balked at becoming a mother. That was why every grown-ups who heard the cry from the kitchen looked so astonished. At the dinner table, Third Auntie made only one comment: "Just one slip, and you're done for."

*

They ventured deep into the heart of the shopping center, wandering among its labyrinthine corridors and walkways. Third Auntie had always been more like an older sister to her; they often played tennis and went swimming together. Perhaps this was why Mother had asked her to go shopping with Third auntie. But she knew noting about babies and what they needed. The only thing she could offer was a pair of hands to help carry packages.

All the stores had loving, cuddly names: Little Angel, Little Darling, Care For Mothers. No one had any idea that the two women looking over the merchandise were both expectant mothers. Looking was all she could do. The place was full of things she ought to be buying but couldn't; on the other hand, it had none of the things she needed, like a wonder drug, or one of those horrible, grim-looking surgical tools. Third auntie was in high spirits. All of a sudden she had turned into an honest-to-goodness Little woman, rummaging happily through racks of tiny pink or blue baby wear and picking over pans, milk bottles, brushes, and diapers. Standing in the midst of this fairy-tale world of little white bunnies and baby squirrels, she, however, felt terribly depressed. What she carried inside her was not a little angel. Those who cared for mothers cared not for mothers like her.

*

The extravagant trappings of the arcade made it seem ornate yet somehow dissolute. Above the soaring main atrium, in the center of the high ceiling, was a bas-relief of reclining cherubs carved in alabaster; on top of the huge stone pillars in each corner loomed the howling visage of the god of the winds. The colonnades on each side supported doomed ceilings, the floors were made of marble, the walks were covered with whorls of gold-leafed sprays. Low-backed sofas upholstered in a richly textured fabric surrounded creamy white coffee tables, each of which held an amber-colored vase graced with dainty pink carnations. The afternoon sun left a yellow glaze over the glass doors, beyond which pedestrians scurried by. Shops and boutiques were arrayed on each side of the atrium. In one of the store windows, a sprig of spring flowers bloomed radiantly atop a bridal veil. The table was set with a sparkling silver tea service. Laid out on lacy paper doilies lining plates of bone china was a colorful assortment of delicacies: ham, tuna, and tomato finger sandwiches; liqueur-filled petit fours; soft and buttery scones studded with raisins; jam and Devonshire cream. The sound of an unseen piano came wafting from the mezzanine. Perhaps it was Aeolus's whistling. I could hear the murmurings of the gods.
I remember the sweet taste of the scones.

*

This was a course she should be attending.
It was already the fifth session.
The first one was about the prenatal examinations that most pregnant women should undergo.
"I had an amino, the baby's just fine."
"I saw the fetus on the sonogram. It was like a little kitten, all curled up inside me."
"It kicks me all the time. What a miracle life is!"

The second class was about nutrition.
"You must drink milk every day, you need a lot of calcium."
"Eggs every day, for the protein."
"Drink lots and lots of water."
In the fourth session a movie was shown. It was about the birthing process.
All the pregnant women in the class suddenly fell silent.
The nurse said, "You're all scared now, aren't you?"

4

She decided to make a nest for the mother fish. To get it right, she chose a densely branching alga, a daffodil-like stonewort, and a water lily whose miniature leaves looked like little pouches as they floated on the surface of the tank. The reference books say that a fully mature male fish will lure a mother fish to a secluded spot provided by the nest, and, using the pointed end of its mandible as a prod, will nuzzle and poke the female's abdomen. This stimulated the secretion of hormones that causes the ovarian membrane to break so the spawn can be discharged. However, while the tank now boasted a nest, it still lacked a male. It had never occurred to her that the bellies of female fish, even when segregated from the opposite sex would automatically swell up with eggs. how utterly different from the way females of the human species became pregnant!

When she told him about the mother fish's predicament, he immediately set out to look for a male. Soon vendors all over the market were being called on by two young people urgently seeking a male goldfish. At firs they limited their search to Lanchous, but soon they expanded it to include other varieties as Lion's Head, Paved-with-Gold, Bubble eyes, Pearly Scales, and black Peony. But no one could provide them with any clues, not even the fish sellers. In the end, they had to rely on supposition and guesswork when they bought several specimens that looked to them like adult males. Despite their efforts, they did not succeed. Well-fed and content, they swam happily around the tank, completely oblivious of the presence of the mother fish.

She had no choice but to cradle the mother fish in her own hands and gently massage its belly, hoping that this might help it release the eggs. But it was all in vain. As the mother fish's abdomen grew more and more distended, the skin over the belly was stretched ever more thinly, and the distance between the scales grew quickly. While the belly looked tight and firm, it felt exceedingly soft and delicate to the touch, as thousands struggled within for a chance at life. Meanwhile, the other fish in the tank nibbled away at the algae and water weeds, and within three days the nest had disintegrated. So they decided to take the mother fish to a nearby park where they would slip it into the pond when the guard wasn't looking. There were lots of goldfish in the pond, and if the Fates were kind, perhaps the mother fish would get a new lease on life.

When he arrived early that morning to escort the mother fish to the pond, it had already bidden farewell to this world, and the burial had been completed. She seemed utterly grief-stricken. Thinking that her anguish had been brought on by the death of the mother fish, he waited quietly for that memory to fade. But that was not what happened, and her sorrow did not subside. After watching only one of the Easter specials, Werner Herzog's Nosferatu the Vampire,\fn{Made in 1978 by German motion-picture director Werner Herzog (1942-   ).} she had absolutely no further interest in seeing any of the other movies. Holding her hand, he felt as though he were hanging on to a spirit flitting and gliding through the depths of night. He was stunned at how quickly she had become inhuman.

*

For her birthday he gave her two records: Horowitz's concert in Moscow\fn{Vladimir Horowitz (1904-1989), Ukrainian-born Russian-American pianist.} and his rendition of Mozart's Piano Concerto no. 23. The maestro was already eighty-two, but his hands were nimble as ever, every note sprang crisp and clear from his fingertips, as exquisite as a string of pearls. Only twenty-two when he fled Russia, money for the journey hidden in his shoes, he had thought he would never be able to return. He did not go back again for sixty years. At the border the guard had recognized him and said to him, "Don't forget your motherland." Now he was a wealthy man: he could afford to have his own piano shipped by air to wherever he was performing; his favorite fish dish was served to him every day without fail. He lived as lavishly as one of the Incan kings in the remote mountains of long ago. Bu this homesickness was an illness that money could not cure.

She opened the booklet inside the record sleeve and leafed through the gloss photographs—of him visiting the homes of Tchiakovsky\fn{Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky (1840-1893), Russian composer.} and Scriabin,\fn{Aleksandr Nikolayevich Scriabin (1872-1915), Russian composer and pianist.} examining the handwritten scores of his illustrious predecessors, of him sitting in front of their pianos, looking as though he had at last found peace. At his triumphant homecoming concert, Horowitz did not perform a signature piece such as Chopin's\fn{Frédéric François Chopin (1810-1849), Polish composer and pianist.} Polonaise in A Flat, perhaps because it would have been too passionate, too flamboyant. Instead, he played a short lyrical composition by Schumann,\fn{Robert Alexander Schumann (1810-1856), German composer.} the seventh piece in the suite Scenes from Childhood\fn{Composed in 1838.}—Träumerei, or Dreams. It allowed him to conjure and ponder the early years of his life, reliving those once-distinct experiences.

She adored the way Horowitz performed Mozart\fn{Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (1756-1791), Austrian composer.}—sorrowfully, yet not sentimentally. For the cadenzas, he had chosen to follow Busoni.\fn{I.e., the interpretation of Ferruccio Benvenuto Busoni (1866-1924), Italian composer, pianist, conductor, and author.} He played the second movement in five minutes and thirty seconds flat. She was astonished. His tempo was almost two minutes faster than Perahia's.\fn{Murray Perahia, American pianist.} but his style had always been brisk and vigorous; even the melancholy pieces were taken con brio. Perhaps in the end it was Horowitz who came closest to touching the soul of Mozart, whose works exuded such vitality and life, for whom sorrow always coexisted with joy and grief and happiness were never far apart.

He shared her opinion. What distinguished Horowitz was his boldness and spontaneity. Neither of them believed that a pianist should be a slavishly faithful interpreter. He said, "Horowitz is a brilliant, asymmetric pearl."

"Yes," she answered, "extremely baroque."

Slowly, she lost herself in the beautiful world of the music. I could hear many sounds during the recital other than the piano:—people shouting Bravissimo, people hacking and coughing.

I remember Horowitz and Schumann.

5

Downstairs from the office of the Family Planning Association was a shelter for the homeless. Most of the city's vagabonds, however, preferred to sleep under highway overpasses, or on stone benches in the parks, or along the covered walkways by the ferry piers rain or shine, in deepest winter or the heat of summer, they would rather brave the elements than seek refuge at the shelter. Probably for the same reason, unmarried mothers were reluctant to go to the association for help. The Family Planning Association was set up to help those women who were, or were about to be, married and starting families, she thought to herself. Agencies such as this may say they want to serve and help you, but in the end the so-called solution they propose is always the tried and true: "Tell your parents." As soon as she stepped inside the building she would, in effect, have thrown herself into a net. They would ask for her name, address, age—would all that really be kept "strictly confidential"? After all, the Family Planning Association was not the government's Anti-Corruption Unit.\fn{A note reads: An agency of the Hong Kong government that investigates citizens' complaints of official corruption and that promises to keep whistle-blowers' identities in strictest confidence.} the personnel would say, "It's for your own good." And then, within half an hour, her parents would arrive and take her home; within twenty-four hors, the school principal and her teachers would all be counseling her; within three days, all her relatives, friends, teachers, and classmates would be discussing and passing judgment on her morals. When news about the pregnancy of someone such as thirty-eight-year-old Third Auntie was greeted with so much surprise and speculation, what kind of reaction would she—an unmarried seventeen-year-old girl—get?

It was now only two months to Third Auntie's due date and she had already received many presents: a sterling-silver baby spoon, a backpack for carrying the infant, a portrait of a plump, healthy baby. She continued to busy herself with preparations for the imminent arrival of the little one—decorating the nursery, ordering the baby's bed and bassinet, painting the walls a soft pink. She seemed cheerful and content, full of the joy of motherhood. She even got instructions from Mother about how to make red-dyed hardboiled eggs, how to brew ginger vinegar tea, how to steep ginseng in chicken consommé.\fn{A note reads: Red-dyed hardboiled eggs are customarily given to friends and relatives in celebration of a safe childbirth. Ginger vinegar tea and ginseng steeped in chicken consommé are both considered tonics in traditional Chinese medicine.}

But none of these things concerned the younger woman. She had made up her mind not to have the baby.

*

She knew of a place: Shenzhen. Every day pregnant women went to this neighboring municipality to take care of their urgent personal problems. If they left in the morning, they could be home that evening, bringing back fresh vegetables, or pottery, or woven bamboo mats that they had supposedly picked up on their outing to the countryside. Shenzhen was an open secret. In the seedier sections of the city, a tangle of signs had sprung from the sides of buildings, overhanging the streets and the heads of passersby. They advertised the services of various medical clinics, all engaged in what had become a flourishing business in the last few years.

Every year on her birthday, her father would give her a gold coin and say, “My daughter’s dowry is really building up.” And, indeed, the price of gold had risen tenfold in the last ten years. She decided to spend one, two, even ten of the gold coins in exchange for her once-lithe and –graceful body, her former carefree self. She had never imagined that her dowry would be spent not on her wedding but on something like this that was nevertheless so intimately related to marriage. What concerned her was not the cost of the operation but its consequences. What is he went to Shenzhen, only to depart forever? Would she end up like the mother fish, floating belly-up and all alone on the surface of the water? She decided she would take the risk, alone. She would put away her Hong Kong identity card and give a false name and address, so that if something went wrong, nobody would know who she was.

*

In the presence of the stranger, she would lay bare her beautiful young body. Once she had faced the prospect of death, she was suddenly filled with courage, she could see the gloomy room with its sickly green walls and dirty gray ceiling high above, lit by a hanging lamp coated with dust and grime. A rancid, putrid odor filled the room. In a peeling enamel tray, metal clanged against metal. Instead of the soft caress of war, tender flesh against her own, she would feel the coarse, slimy, toad-like skin of a large hideous snake as it thrashed about at will across her body, sinking its sharp fangs again and again in to her flesh and veins.

She remembered a news story about a young couple who got into an accident while riding in the taxi. In the collision the wife received a blow to her forehead, and her husband and the driver both jumped out of the cab to get help. But every car on the road whizzed by without stopping, until the two men managed at last to flag down a passing truck. After demanding an exorbitant rice, the owner of the truck diddled and dawdled before finally driving the injured woman to the hospital. By the time the husband had completed all the forms, complied with all the requirements, and rushed to the appropriate office to pay for the blood transfusion—in advance, please—the wife had slipped into a coma from loss of blood. Even after she was put on a respirator, the husband had to stay by her side and manually operate the pump to make sure it was working properly. Six hours later, the woman, who had originally received only a minor injury, died without regaining consciousness. That was exactly the kind of place she would be lying in.

*

Every day at the appointed hour, she fed the goldfish, using a little measuring spoon to scoop out the roper amount of fish food. The flakes smelled vaguely like dried seaweed and, once scattered onto the water, fluttered slowly toward the bottom of the tank. All the goldfish swarmed around the sinking flakes, sometimes sticking their heads into the nooks and crannies among the pebbles that lined the bottom, their upturned tails resembling flowers stalks swaying in the wind. While she fed the fish, she examined them for signs of injury and disease: were the tips of their fins broken or split, were their scales falling off, were there any cuts or scratches on their gills, were their backs covered with a thin gray film, where there white spots on their bulbous heads?

By now she had become not only a nanny to the goldfish but their doctor as well. she regularly cleaned the tan, the filtration system, and the pebbles. On really cold days, she even brought the water to room temperature by warming it on the stove before refilling the tank. She knew that a fish that swam off and stayed by itself must have come down with a disease, while one that wheeled about was suffering from an attack of worms. She had also learned how to set up a little tank as an infirmary, where she wold immerse the ailing fish in a saline solution, and she knew how to apply medication directly to infected areas.

She was no longer stumped by any of the afflictions that goldfish were subject to, except for one, pregnancy. There were still seven Lanchous in the tank, and since they were all female, each would become a mother sooner or later. At some point their bellies would swell rapidly, and then they would die from the complications of labor. In a letter to her brother she said: “Life and death are so close to each other, yet there’s not a thing I can do. Mother said, ‘Don’t worry, just three more months and your brother will be back,’ Father said, ‘Don’t take it so hard, it’s only some fish.’”

*

It was not the fish. But Father could not have known that. They saw her with strips of litmus paper day after day, sometimes red, sometimes blue, and they assumed she was checking the water quality in the tank. Was it acidic or alkaline? Was it positive or negative? Locking herself in the bathroom, she too waited for the result. The instructions said that red meant the test was negative, yellow meant it was positive. She had already done the test many times, holding a glass tube I one hand as she measured droplets of the reagent with her other hand. When it came out yellow the first time, she felt as though all heaven and earth were spinning around her.

She should not have done the test in the afternoon. Also, she was not supposed to have had any milk, spinach, fruit, or vitamin pills. So she performed the test again in the morning. Several days in a row, in fact, she carried out this onerous task. When she saw a tube of raspberry-colored liquid, she was relieved. But why did it turn yellow at some times and red at other times? The colors confounded her.

6

He went with her to buy cigars for Third Auntie. On the telephone Third Auntie had said, "Oh dear, I forgot to get cigars." They went to Davidoff's and carefully reviewed every brand on display. Which kind should they get? He vetoed the Grand Cru series. He said, "Davidoff's biggest mistake was to name cigars after French châteaus. After all, cigars are not wines." She didn't like the Bouquet assortment, because those were not hand-rolled. They read out one name after another: Larrañaga, Partagas, Juan Clemente, Bolívar.

"Bolívar sounds good—he was a great Latin American hero."\fn{Simón Bolívr (1783-1830), South American revolutionary, responsible for the independence of Venezuela, Colombia, Ecduador, Peru and Bolivia.}

"If you were the father, which brand would you choose?" she asked.

"Monte Cristo No. 1, of course, because of the story, and because of Alexander Dumas.\fn{Alexandre Dumas (1802-1870), French novelist and playwright; The Count of Monte-Cristo was written in 1844, translated into English in 1846).} What about you?"

"Romeo and Juliet, because of Shakespeare, and because of a rose by any name," she replied.

What she really liked were not the cigars themselves but the boxes they came in—all made out of plain unvarnished fir with not a speck of paint, even the ornate lettering seared into the wood with a dark, smoky tint. Some had rolltop covers, others came with brass-plated latches. Suddenly she remembered the Christmas-card box that had become the mother fish's coffin. After paying for their purchase, they headed home along the embankment by the harbor. Hugging the box of cigars, she broke into tears and began to sob inconsolably. He finally found out why.

"Don't be so sad, silly girl," he said. "Why don't we just get married? We're just in love, like other people; we're just going to be parents, like other people. Why do something stupid? Shenzhen is out. That's no way to deal with this situation. A child would be wonderful—we both love kids. I am nineteen; I will make a good husband, a good father. Let's get married and have the baby. We'll go to the baby boutique and buy baby clothes and little toys, just like your Third Auntie did, and we'll also buy cigars to give to our friends and relatives. We'll give cigars even if it's a girl. If it's a boy we'll give Monte Creisto No. 1, if it's a girl we'll give Rome and Juliet. We'll still go to the university. We'll bring the baby to class. We'll both study hard, and after graduation we'll get good jobs and have a cozy little home of our own, where we'll bring our child along. We'll go to Florence to see Botticelli's La Primavera."\fn{Sandro Botticelli aka Alessandro di Mariano Felipepi (1445-1510), Florentine painter; La Primavera seems to have been created in 1478.}

"I'll go up by myself," she said.

He knew it was pointless to argue with her further, so he stayed downstairs and waited. Glancing at his watch, he told himself that if she didn't come down within half an hour, he would go upstairs to look for her. He looked up and saw the overhanging jumble of sign-boards and shingles that cluttered the space above the alley. Coming here was her idea. He didn't agree with it but thought they could give it a try. He watched as she stepped into the elevator and then turned around to give him a wave. He knew that she was scared but had put on a brave front.

She had to ring the bell twice before a middle-aged woman answered the door. The place was set up like an ordinary residence, but there was no one else in the living room, and imprinted on the glass door was a red cross. "I am here for a test," she said, beginning to relax once she realized she would not have to give her name and address after all.

"Did you come alone?"

"He's waiting downstairs."

"You don't want a baby, is that right?"

"I'm always feeling nauseous."

"Do you have problems with your stomach?"

She came out of the bathroom and gave the jar to the woman, who poured it into an array of smaller container and performed one test after another, carefully examining each reaction. During the rainy season, when water was running and dripping everywhere, here body's canal had dried up. Now that summer was here, the sun burned off every last bloom of mildew in even the darkest nooks and crannies. And now here, in this unfamiliar room, she suddenly discovered to her great astonishment that her waterway was once again flowing. Outside the window the sun shone very, very brightly.

She came out of the elevator and saw him running toward her. The lobby appeared to be deserted except for the two of them. Throwing her arms around his neck, she blurted out, "I'm okay, I'm okay." Then, like exuberant little sparrows, they tripped out of the narrow alley overhung with signs that blocked out much of the light, Looking up, she pointed to one of the signs and said, "I thought I'd have to go to one of those places and I'd never see you again." And the tears came streaming down.

*

I am your tousheng, your firstborn, born out of your head.\fn{A note reads: firstborn; also a pun on its literal meaning, "born out of the head."} I am your fantasy. Most tousheng creatures are but fictional characters created by writers, brought into this world for the sake of the story. I do not belong to the story, nor did you create me in order to write a story. It was as a result of love's taking shape that you conceived and gave birth to me.

Writes take loving care of their tousheng characters, bringing them to maturity, breathing life into them, displaying them proudly before all. Most mothers are like this too. But you, you have spared no pains in your effort to stow me away, to keep my existence a secret; you stand ready to destroy me, because I represent darkness and shame. This is your sorrow, the sorrow of the female sex. Why do you continue to submit to a life of such humiliation and self-abasement? Out of nothingness into being-—t should have been a process of discovery, of creation, of propagation. Birth should have been the greatest joy of all—why turn it into tragedy?

It has been only three months since my birth, yet I have already lived with you awhile, through sunshine and stormy weather. Since you gave birth to me out of your head, before all else, I have become part of your memory, your consciousness, a spray of ever-flowing spindrift in the ocean of your mind. I wish you health and happiness; I pray that you will grow ever stronger, mother. Love is nothing to be ashamed of. I love you, and I love my father. He is the precious male fish.

262.128b 1. Sinking 2. Cloud Dissects Itself 3. Footpaths Cross In The Rice Field 4. Vague Apprehension 5. Woman Wall: Five Poems\fn{by Lin Ling aka Hu Yun-shang (1938-)} Sichuan Province, China (F) 2

1

Endlessly sinking—
My wings into the waves of your eyes.
How much I hope,
How much I hope,
That we will sink beautifully down,
Into a kingdom forgotten by Apollo,
Where we will walk and leave no footprints,
Just as the rivers there do not rise in the high mountains
But originate in the ocean.
That breeze is no more a breeze.
The wood on the hill is no more
A wood on the hill.
We are no more ourselves.
We are dust.
We are everything.
Yet everything again, all in one brief glance
Will be denied all value.
Oh, how I hope. …

2

I was born in the old home of the sun,
My tomb will be the blue green ocean,

Just like the tiny meteorite in the sky.
The lights of the fishing boats,
Returning late in the night,
Will be the tears of my mourners.
I always remember,
Many years ago there was a girl
Who loved to dress in red.
She slowly walked through the human world,
With gestures of mist,
With the rhythm of rain,
With the melody of a flowing stream.
And the flames and snowflakes
She scattered so freely
Became the Equator and the North and South Poles.
I always remember—
Like the tiny meteorite in the sky,
The ocean is my emerald tomb,
The lights of the fishing boats,
Homeward bound in the late night,
Are the tear drops of my mourners.

3

You are horizontal.
I am vertical.
We divide the heavenly bodies
And the four directions between us.
We come from the place of becoming,
Pass by here,
And encounter each other
In this final meeting
In a flooded rice field.
An egret descends on still eings.
We quietly chat about the weather,
And say, “I’ll see you again.”
Quietly make an appointment,
Climb two far apart hillsides,
And look back from the summits.
A pure white feather floats down.
As the feather floats down,
Oh, at that monment
We both hope that happiness
May also be like a white bird,
Quietly descending
We hope—
Even though birds
Are creatures with wings.

4

On your breast,
In your arms—
O night of Monte Carlo—
The man I love

Warms himself at the fire.
He did not gather enough
Pine branches to make a blaze.
Night of Monte Carlo.
He asks for my hair,
My vertebrae.

5

I have been expecting it so much.
Only I
Walked in its shadow.
*
This time, the second time that I have come,
I dream no more the vastness.
With hands behind my back,
I walk from one end to the other.
I am thinking—
How can so slight a thread tie up a city?

41.142 Excerpt from Humanity: The Vagabond: He Jingfu\fn{by Dai Houying (1938-1996)} Shanghai, China (F) 2

… In 1962 the university informed me that I could return from my exile and continue my studies. But I had become accustomed to living in the countryside. I had secretly taken up philosophy, in an attempt to find out how a Marxist should treat some of the basic questions of human life and personal emotions. I no longer wanted to return …

I had never felt more alone. I decided to go away. I left a note for my sister and set out, with no idea of where I was heading. I wandered aimlessly, learning whatever lessons life presented to me. The only books I had with me were The Dream of the Red Chamber and Selected Works of Marx and Engels.

I became a non-person, completely cut off from the society around me. I had no residence permit, no grain or cotton coupons, no friends or relatives to look after me, not even a postal address. No one cared who I was or what I was doing; no one asked me where I came from or where I was going. People just knew me as Old He—the charcoal burner, the builder, the stone carrier, the blaster, the carter, and even the story-teller. I made enough to keep my rice bowl full, but that was all.

*

One year, I joined a transport team near the Great Wall. I'd just bought myself a horse and cart with my hard-earned cash. It was a lousy horse, but it was cheap.

I love the Great Wall. When I first climbed from the First Pass Under Heaven up to the highest beacon tower, I forgot my vagabond existence completely. Every brick in the Wall seemed to me like an individual. The endless winding Wall was like a mighty army, and I was a new recruit. Almost every stone in the tower had the names of travelers scratched on it. Why do they do that? To make a name for themselves? But I don't think anyone has ever achieved fame in this way. I think they came to enlist, just like me. The stones were our muster roll. But I didn't carve my name on the Wall. I gave it my body instead. Whenever I could, I would climb up onto it. I was prepared to stay there for the rest of my life, and to be buried at its foot when I died.

Our transport team was "black," like each one of its members.\fn{I.e., people in Maoist China officially categorized as enemies of the State: A previous note defines them, and reads: Landlords, rich peasants, counterrevolutionaries, and bad elements were the original Four Black Categories; rightists were added in 1957, and, early in the Cultural Revolution, capitalist roaders and "cow or ox demons and snake spirits," to make seven. Subsequently there was a revision; to the earlier five were added renegades, spies, capitalist-roaders, and intellectuals, who brought up the rear, as "stinking ninth elements."}Most people know nothing about this of course, but outside conventional society there are all sorts of "black" societies, made up of a mixed bag of people: self-employed laborers, the unemployed, people who have been rejected by society for a variety of reasons; and of course, people whose only interest in life is to make money. We have to form gangs, otherwise we'd never be able to find work or buy grain and cloth coupons on the black market. And every gang must have its chief. I have never been one, and I don't want to be. I've never been able to handle people, no matter how hard I've tried.

Until you've been in one of those gangs you can't imagine how weird it all is. There's no greater insecurity than working in one of those deformed miniature societies. Nobody knows anything about anybody else; nobody cares for anybody else. They have joined forces to make money, and that's the only thing that keeps them together. The chiefs are mostly local thugs. They get work contracts to make things legal. The others are all terrorized by them, and let them skim off part of their hard-earned wages. Of course, I too had to pay my contribution to the chief.

This particular fellow was a ex-con, that is to say, he'd been released from labor camp. His face was fair and thin, like that of a scholar. But something about the muscles in his face gave him a ferocious look. The flesh on his cheekbones formed big bags unger his eyes, making him appear especially terrifying. He looked so greedy and vicious that everybody was afraid of him. I certainly didn't want to rub him up the wrong way.

But one day I discovered, after settling our accounts, that he had taken advantage of the fact that I was a newcomer and paid me eighty yuan too little. It wasn't a question of the money, I simply couldn't accept his attitude. I quarreled with him. He hit me; I hit him back. I had carried many a two-hundred-pound boulder in my day; why should I be afraid of being beaten up by this man? I ended up dislocating his arm.

I was taken to the police station, where they asked for my identity card. I didn't have one. I told them: I am He Jing-fu, always have been, always will be. But I have never done anything wrong. You can check it for yourself if you don't believe me!

The policeman wasn't a bad sort. He simply lectured me: behave yourself and don't make any more trouble. And they threw me out.

As I drove my cart back to my temporary lodgings, I was on the verge of tears. Identity card! Identity card! I don't have an identity card! Without one, don't I still count as a human being? I whipped the horse violently all the way, driving it to a gallop; I wanted to overturn the cart or to crash into the Wall. If it was to be my death then let it kill me now! What was the point of going on like this?

Just then a man drove his cart right in front of mine, but I saw him too late to avoid a collision. My cart wounded his horse, the shaft went right throug the beast's shoulder. It took the two of us a lot of effort to pull it out. Blood spurted all over the place, splashing my head and face. I took off my shirt and stuffed it into the wound to stop the bleeding.

After a little while the horse died. The carter grabbed me in case I tried to run away. His horse was state property, and I had no alternative but to hand him my whip. Because my horse was inferior to his, I had to give him my cart as well.

"Well, now I am as naked as the day I was born and as carefree as the wind again," I muttered to myself and lay down on the ground.

The carter was a kind man. Seeing me suddenly bereft of everything I owned, he felt unwilling to abandon me. He took out a small gourd filled with liquor from the inner pocket of his coat and insisted that we have a drink together. He asked me where I had come from and where I was going, and I told him my story.

"Don't worry," he kept saying, "every dog has his day. Every dog has his day."

Before he drove my cart away, he offered me the horse's carcass, saying I could make some money out of it. I didn't want it, so he dragged it away.

I didn't want to go anywhere. I lay down at the foot of the Wall. How grand and quiet it was! If I died here nobody would ever find me. The Great Wall would gradually absorb my corpse. And yet—to die or not to die, that was the question. I lay there, staring motionlessly at the stars in the sky and began like Hamlet to ponder my fate …

I was just thirty years old, the age by which a man should have made something of his life. But what had I achieved? For myself? My family? My career? Nothing. I had nothing. Not even an identity card. No one needed me. Did life for me consist only of food, drink, clothing, and shelter? Did I really have no choice but to measure the value of my life by the demands of that labor contractor, who fed off my sweat and blood? No!

I jumped to my feet and ran along the Wall up to the highest beacon tower. I took out a pocket-knife and by the light of the stars carved the three characters of my name into the stone: HE JING FU. Now I had enlisted myself into that army. This stone was my identity card, it certified that He Jing-fu has Chinese blood, that he is a descendant of the Yellow Emperor. I sat down and leant against the tower.

I took a look. One more look over the landscape of China. What a spectacle! Inside the Wall, all was green and luxuriant, while outside it lay a stretch of rolling yellow earth. Yet it was the yellow earth that evoked my tender affection more than anything else in the world. I could feel all the beauty and power buried beneath the earth, lying undiscovered. It enticed men to sacrifice their lives, it fired the imagination.

A shooting star sped across the sky from east to west, and fell. But the sky remained as spacious and serene as before. The stars still winked contentedly, and the “silver river” of the Milky Way still glimmered dispassionately at the separated lovers, the Cowherd and the Weaving Girl, standing poised on its banks. To them it was as if nothing had happened. In this boundless universe, who notices a small shooting star? To the rest of the world my death would amount to little more than the fading of a falling star in the night. It would pass by soundless, unnoticed.

And yet I am a human being, a man of flesh and blood. I thought of my grandmother, who had often told me stories: about the Milky Way and the stars.

“Every one of us has a drop of dew above his head, and we all have our own fate,” Granny often said to me pointing at the stars in the sky. She said that people were just like the stars, each with its own position in the firmament, each with its own right to exist. The stars still hang in the sky without needing any support or sustenance; and men live on in the world without help or assistance. The stars shine in the sky, the dew glitters on the earth. This was the earliest philosophy I was taught.

Had my own drop of dew really dried up? No! It had not! It enabled me to see my dead parents, my distant sister, all those whom I loved …

My horse was gone, and so was my cart. But I still had my hands. Why need I be afraid, just because I had no identity card? The value of my existence did not depend on some bureaucratic document.

I sat up all night in front of the tower. Early next morning I came down. I was not going back to the transport team. I needed to find a new job. I went down along the Great Wall, inquiring at every village along the way to see if I could do any odd jobs for them.

It was all in vain. When I had spent all my money, I had to tear myself away from my beloved Great Wall and made my way south, to the banks of the Huai River. …

1939

78.23 The Travels Of Erh Ts’an\fn{by Erh Ts’an aka Joseph S. M. Lau (c.1939?-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (M) 6

… On arriving at the Boston airport that evening, Erh Ts’an boarded a bus for the Hilton, the venue of this year’s Asian Studies Association Annual Conference.

Having checked in at the desk, he followed the bell-hop into the elevator and moved into the room to which he was assigned. He was somewhat fatigued, but felt like a new man after taking a shower. Since he had eaten on the plane, he was not particularly hungry. However, it was only a little past eight, and he was not about to pass up the opportunity to sample the seafood for which Boston was justly famous. He changed into casual clothes and obtained from the hotel information desk the names and locations of a few seafood restaurants. After roaming the streets for a few blocks, he found one that caught his fancy.

The Oyster House was not only crowded, but also most of the customers appeared to be fellows of the Asian race. Aside from some unfamiliar languages which he could not. identify, the dominant language spoken appeared to be various versions of Chinese. As Erh Ts’an stood in line waiting to be seated, he could not help salivating as he watched the waiters hoisting platters of oysters and clams to their various destinations.

He was at last seated at a corner table. As he studied the menu, he was reminded of the atrocious ways in which seafood is served and eaten in America. If it is not fried, it is invariably broiled. What do they do to a luscious succulent fish? They dip it in batter and then fry it to a crisp. When brought to the table, it comes with a wedge of lemon but without its head! The more Erh Ts’an thought about it, the more his appetite left him. When the waiter returned to take his order, he settled for half a dozen raw oysters and half a dozen clams, topped off with two bottles of beer.

“No crabs tonight?” the waiter volunteered. “That’s our specialty, you know.”

“Not tonight,” Erh Ts’an replied, not wishing to seem unappreciative of the waiter’s good intentions. “Eh … I’m sort of allergic to crabs.” Oysters and clams, of course, can be eaten raw, unspoiled by the ministrations of the chef. Presently in walked two couples, speaking in a brand of Chinese that gave them away as southerners. They were shown to a table next to his.

“My dear fellow,” one was heard to remark, “let’s order the best on the menu. Since your return from Peking, I have been so occupied that I just wasn’t able to call on you. Let’s make this a welcome home party, and let me be the host tonight and remove the travel dust for you.”

“No, no!” the other protested, “it’s been quite some time since I returned from Peking. Even the clothes I took with me to Peking have made several trips to the cleaner. What travel dust is there to remove?! When in Rome, do as the Romans do, and make this a Dutch treat. What’s more, to be quite honest, after having your taste buds tickled for over two months on the mainland, American food comes off as pretty poor fare. If you insist on treating us to dinner, I’ll take a rain-check on a Chinese dinner in New York instead.”

Since the foregoing snatches of conversation were sprinkled with references to Peking and the mainland, Erh Ts’an’s curiosity was somewhat piqued. Putting down his oysters, he took a good look at the two couples. They looked a decent sort and urbane to boot. One of the men was a middle-ager, with a pipe in his mouth, and a pair of gold-rimmed glasses. His temples were dappled with gray which somehow gave him an air of poise and suavity. Erh Ts’an could swear he had seen him before, but where? Aiyaya; when one reaches middle-age, one’s memory begins to slip. While he was digging in the back of his mind, the man with the pipe was heard to say to the other man who appeared to be a little older:

“Po-wen, have you received your visa yet?”

“Ai, do you really have to ask?” the other replied. “If I had gotten my visa, would I be here attending this hustling-bustling meat market? It’s over six months now, and I haven’t heard a word. Come to think of it, since you are on such good standing with the ‘motherland,’ isn’t there something you can do to speed things up?”

“Of course I can try, but the Chinese don’t do things the way they used to. Connections don’t necessarily open doors anymore, but as I said, I’ll see what I can do.”

When the waiter came back to their table, the man addressed as Po-wen, noting the lack of enthusiasm on the part of his friend for American food, without consulting the two ladies in the party, asked the waiter:

“What’s the specialty of the house? … I know what! Bring us some shrimps, crabs, fish and oysters … and a bottle of good boujoulais if you have it.”

Having polished off the half dozen oysters and half dozen clams, Erh Ts’an put a dollar tip under the plate and left the Oyster House.

It was early spring and the wind was biting cold. He turned up his collar and made his way back to the hotel. The jumble of words like “Peking,” “mainland,” and “motherland” kept tumbling in his mind. Try as he would, he was still unable to place the man with the gold-rimmed glasses who seemed so vaguely familiar. One sure can lose touch with things when one has lived so many years in the backwaters of the South, away from the mainstream!

Back in his hotel room, Erh Ts’an broke open a small bottle of Cutty Sark he had brought from the South, and without bothering to dilute it with water, took several swigs from a glass. The whiskey, he thought, should see him through the night. His “act,” an exposition on the poetic works of Su Tung-po in exile, was not scheduled until the next afternoon. He had all the time in the world to sleep.

That however, was not to be. Just as he was dozing off, the telephone started to ring. With half-closed eyes, he asked in his customary muted voice, “Who is it?”

“Who, indeed!” the voice answered. “My dear fellow, do you realize the trouble we went through trying. to lcate you! What have you been up to anyway all by yourself? Chicken hunting, eh? Just let me give you a word of warning. Boston teems with female as well as male stranglers. Among the habitues of the wild chicken coop—"

“Hey, hold your horses! You were not expected to arrive until tomorrow morning," Erh Ts’an, now jolted sober, countered in reply to Old Buddy’s salvo. He was, however, interrupted by the voice at the other end of the line.

“Let’s come to the point. I couldn’t wait to leave the office to take the first plane to come visit you buddy- boys here. Come on down and join us at the bar.”

Without waiting for a reply, Old Buddy plunked his receiver down.

Erh Ts’an had no choice but to get dressed and make his way to the elevator. As soon as he got to the bar, he was grabbed by Old Buddy and led to a booth at the end of the bar.

“Look, fellows!” Old Buddy said to the party, “our ‘reactionary’ here has just returned from his chicken hunt and is still recuperating from the rigors of his exertions, so don’t be too hard on him if he isn’t all that lively!”

Except for two new faces, the seven or eight members of the party were all fellow alumni of National Taiwan University. Erh Ts’an was more than a little pleased to see them, the more so since the encounter came as a complete surprise. For this reason, he wasn’t overly offended by the off-colored remarks Old Buddy just made. He squeezed his way into a seat and ordered an Old Fashioned. As soon as the waitress brought his order, Old Buddy addressed Erh Ts’an again:

“My dear fellow, are we friends or aren’t we friends? Look at the gang I’ve rounded up to do you honor. We are going to listen to your sermon tomorrow afternoon. Are you going to buy the drinks or are you not?"

"All right, all right!" Erh Ts'an replied, "but you have yet to introduce the two new friends to me."

"Oh, yes!" Old Buddy said, "this here is Ho Chia-fu, a history major, the cream of the crop at Harvard. He is in the midst of writing a dissertation on The Role of Mao Tse-tung in the History of Modern China. Isn't that something? And this here is Ms. Chen Chin-chang, or in 'Chinglish,' Long-love Chen, but not Miss or Mrs., mind you. That's because she is neither married nor unmarried, sort of in between you might say. You can figure that one out for yourself. She used to specialize in Yuan drama at Yale, but as a result of the change of command following the uprising in the Chinese Department there, she had to suspend her studies. Her present specialty is translations. She is particularly fond of the poetic works of Hsin Ch'i-chi. Come Ms. Chen, 'O, I search in the crowd for her a thousand times …'" That was greeted by a roar of laughter. Even Erh Ts'an was somewhat embarrassed. In the dim light, he couldn't tell whether or not Ms. Chen blushed at that remark.

"Erh Ts'an, how have you been all these years? We hardly ever get to see you anymore. That's why, when we discovered your name on the Conference program, we all decided to drive up en masse to be your cheerleading squad. Seriously, you've had a number of books published, it shouldn't be too difficult for you to get a teaching job elsewhere, why keep hibernating in the South? With you that far away, it's difficult even to find enough people to get up a mahjong game."

The speaker was none other than Hu Hsien-hua who was not only in the Foreign Languages Department with Erh Ts'an at National Taiwan University, but his roommate to boot. After coming to the U.S., he had switched to Library Science and later found a job in New York. As for Erh Ts'an, he took a major in English. Upon graduation, he found a job teaching English in a small college in the South.

Aside from Hu Hsien-hua and Old Buddy, Erh Ts'an's other classmates included Chang Ta-feng, Ouyang Pu-hsiu, and Liu Fang-chang. After coming to the United States, Chang majored in Political Science, Ouyang in History, and Liu in Chinese. Like Erh Ts'an, they all graduated over ten years ago. At that time, jobs were not as difficult to come by as they are now. They all found jobs and settled down in their respective homes.

Since they were scattered all over the country, it was rare that they got to meet. When they first went their separate ways, they made a pact to keep in touch every two or three months. In the first couple of years, they managed somehow to honor their "gentlemen's agreement." Later on, however, as one by one they got married and had kids, it became impossible to keep their promises. Except for sending Christmas cards, they hardly ever corresponded. Fortunately, annual conventions have become an honored tradition in this country. In addition to the MLA, there is the Asian Studies Association, both of which duly held annual conventions in the big cities in the East, Midwest, or the West Coast. It was at such annual conventions that these old chums usually managed to get together. In the last two or three years, however, Erh Ts'an had been teaching English and the only conventions he attended were those sponsored by the MLA. And since this association was dominated by interest in European and American literature, it was rare to find Chinese friends at its conventions. His attendance at the Asian Studies Association convention to present his paper was, professionally speaking, in the nature of an "amateur," so Old Buddy was justified in his remark about the difficulty in getting to see him.

Hu Hsien-hua's quip about his "hibernating in the South" gave Erh Ts'an's heart a sour jolt. Though not particularly prestige-conscious, and English being his specialty, he never considered teaching English in the South as "hibernating." In fact, he took a certain pride in being a Chinese teaching English to Americans. Nevertheless, aside from a certain satisfaction derived from this "ego trip," he had become less and less enchanted with the teaching of English. Shakespeare and Milton may be great, but they are not the same as Li Po or Tu Fu after all. Every time he gave a lecture on English poetry, he wished his blue-eyed fair-haired students could read and appreciate, in the Chinese original, such lines as, "Do you not see the Yellow River cascading from heaven?" the way he himself appreciated the original version of "Thou hast nor youth nor age, but as it were an after dinner sleep, dreaming of both." How wonderful that would be! It was precisely because Erh Ts'an had succumbed to this silly missionary zeal that five years ago, he accepted a visiting professorship with the Chinese Department at a big university on the West Coast. If he chose to switch to teaching Chinese on a permanent basis, the head of the Chinese Department assured him, he would take the matter up with the university.

Something, however, changed all that into an empty dream. Erh Ts'an remembered it well. One morning, he was teaching a class in modern Chinese literature and the subject was the poetry of Li Chin-fa. One of the students, without raising his hand, addressed him by name and asked him point-blank:

"Erh Ts'an, do you realize that all the poets you selected, the like of Li Chin-fa and Hsu Chih-mo, moan and groan without cause, and are totally devoid of social significance?"

"Oh?" Erh Ts'an was somewhat taken aback. Before setting out from the South, he had been warned by friends that the school he was going to had the reputation of being "tough," that the students and teaching staff took inordinate pride in being known as die-hard liberals and that any attempt to curtail their freedom of expression would be met with dire consequences. But when it's your turn to exercise the same freedom by expressing your differing viewpoint, they would take issue with you in relentless opposition. Now Erh Ts'an was confronting what he had only heard about before.

"Well, in that case," he responded, "which poets, in your opinion, do not fan into the category of those guilty of moaning and groaning without cause?"

The student was prepared. Holding a collection of poetry in his hand, he rattled off the names of Kuo Mo-jo, Ai Ching, Tien Chien, and needless to say, comrade Mao Tse-tung himself.

"Let me read for your benefit this poem by Tien Chien entitled To My Comrades." With that, he read in stilted Romanized Chinese the following:

Comrades, mount your horses,
The Revolution is our home.
Look at the horse's back.
How like a mountain range!
A mountain range crested
By an iridescent river of clouds and mists.

Erh Ts'an had not read this poem before. Worse still, the halting way in which the student handled the poem in his Yankee accent didn't help Erh Ts'an comprehension either. About all he could make out were words like "comrades" and "revolution." Since he was not in a position to comment on the merits of the poem, he said, "Granted, the poem you have just read is not without social significance. Nevertheless, we cannot downgrade a poem just because it is lacking in social significance. Poetry is poetry whether the subject is revolution or love, and they can co-exist, don't you think? What's more, this being a class on Selected Readings in Modern Chinese Literature, it stands to reason that I cannot give comprehensive coverage of all the modern poems that have been written over the last thirty years."

"That may be so," the student countered, "but that does not excuse you from your responsibility to include socially-conscious poets in your lectures."

Erh Ts'an may not have completely understood the definition of a socially-conscious poet, but he certainly had no doubt about the meaning of "responsibility."

Responsibility? He himself wasn't so sure what the word implied anymore. So far as he was concerned, the responsibility of being a teacher was to teach his students all he knew and to the best of his ability. Since there was no written stipulation by the university as to what to teach, and since a university was neither an elementary nor high school, he felt he was under no obligation to select any particular material or any particular writer or any poetry with "social significance." He was not opposed to teaching socially significant poetry per se, but that was his option, not his "responsibility."

The more he thought about it, the surer he was of the soundness of his position. Not wishing to create an impasse, however, he explained courteously to the student that since he was not too familiar with the works of Ai Ching and Tien Chien, he would be happy to study these poets with him individually, but that he did not feel sufficiently competent to deal with their works in class.

This conciliatory gesture on the part of Erh Ts'an had no effect on the belligerent attitude of the student. He could feel his hackles rising. He remembered saying to the student bluntly:

"I have my freedom to teach what I please, just as you have your freedom to select what courses to take. This is not a required course, and besides, as a visiting professor, I'm here for only one year. If you are not happy with my teaching and the material I selected for the course, there is nothing to prevent you from taking it next year instead."

This exchange led to something Erh Ts'an had not anticipated. It developed that the student took it upon himself to report the matter to the dean and the head of the department. That happened to be a year marked by student demonstrations and slogans demanding "student power." The matter put the department head John Liberal in quite a spot. It would have been too awkward to summon Erh Ts'an to his office for a formal "discussion." Instead, he invited him to a nearby bar for a late afternoon drink. After downing half his drink, John Liberal said, by way of opening the conversation:

"Dick came to my office yesterday." He was an American in his late fifties, a Harvard man. He had taught English at Peking University before the Communist take-over. By education and background, he was steeped in the concepts of freedom and democracy. It was obvious that even before he opened the conversation, he felt himself to be in a ticklish situation. After breaking the silence, he took out his pipe, rubbed his tobacco and lit it, stalling for time.

"I'm not surprised," Erh Ts'an picked up the conversation to ease the tension. "I can also imagine the gist of his complaint. What I can say to you is very simple. I have tried to be reasonable and conciliatory. If Dick chooses to adopt a belligerent attitude, I have no choice but to respond in kind. The Chinese of my faith have lost the entire country, losing a job is no great disaster in comparison."

"Erh Ts'an," the head of the department said, "aren't you taking this more seriously than necessary? Dick is only a young whippersnapper, so why take issue with him? If that's what he wants to study, you could select one or two pieces just to make him happy. Why bring the matter to a head over a difference in political opinion?"

"Well, boss," Erh Ts'an addressed John Liberal in Chinese, "let's not lose sight of the fact that what is involved is not a matter of political opinion. If I am anti-Communist, that's my business as a Chinese. I have no wish to impose my views on anybody in your university. I myself may not appreciate the politically motivated poetry of Tien Chien and Ai Ching, but as a teacher, I realize only too well that politically motivated poetry is also poetry. My refusal to accede to Dick's demands yesterday had nothing to do with politics. First of all, it was Dick's belligerent attitude that got under my skin. Having lived in this country for over ten years, I am in many respects Amercianized, but please understand that insofar as human relations are concerned, I'm still a Chinese. The second point is, I have not made a serious study of the poetry of Ai Ching and Tien Chien. That is not my specialty. If I were to try to appear enthused about it just to satisfy Dick, I would not be honest with myself or with my students."

"Yes, I understand that very well," John Liberal remarked. "Nevertheless, the Dean's instructions—"

"Actually, there is no problem at all," Erh Ts'an broke in. "You could tell the Dean that I'm only a visiting professor, and that although my contract has a year to run, I would be quite willing to leave at the end of the semester. That way, the university could save half a year's salary. Please convey to him also that as a Chinese, I have entertained the highest respect for the American tradition of freedom and democracy, and that I hope to continue to do so."

It was apparent that what Erh Ts'an had said had a somewhat unsettling effect on the department head.

"Erh Ts'an," he said, in an attempt to reach a satisfactory solution, "let me talk to Dick tomorrow. I'll tell him to drop the course for the rest of the semester, and we'll settle the matter after the storm has blown over."

"I appreciate that very much," Erh Ts'an replied, "but whether or not the storm blows over, as soon as my contract runs out, I will return to the South."

"You mean you really won't consider staying on?" John Liberal asked in disbelief. To his way of thinking, it was inconceivable that anyone from some obscure university in the South could pass up an opportunity to teach in his prestigious institution.

"No, I think it's best that I go back to teaching English in the South," Erh Ts'an replied.

*

"Hey, Erh Ts'an," Hu Hsien-hua could not help asking when he saw Erh Ts'an nursing his drink as if in reverie, "what's on your mind?"

"Oh, I'm sorry. I haven't been sleeping well the last couple of nights," he said by way of apology, and forced himself to liven up a bit. Not particularly noted for his social grace to begin with, Erh Ts'an had an aversion to baring his innermost thoughts in the company of strangers. Aside from the monologue carried on by Old Buddy, the party was not particularly convivial.

After the party had broken up, and sensing that Erh Ts'an had something on his mind, Hu Hsien-hua pulled him aside.

"Come, if you are not too tired, come to my room and talk about old times, just you and me and Ouyang Pu-hsiu. How about it?"

"Sounds like a good idea," Erh Ts'an replied, "and let's call room service for some coffee." Whereupon, he followed Hu Hsien-hua and Ouyang Pu-hsiu into the elevator.

Hu and Ouyang occupied a double room, much more comfortable than Erh Ts'an's. After the coffee had been brought, they puffed furiously on their cigarettes. Strange to say, although the three of them had known each other for close to twenty years and despite the fact that they had not met for a number of years, they seemed to be at a loss for words. All they did was blow smoke rings into the air. After a long pause, Ouyang Pu-hsiu said, somewhat tentatively:

"Did you know, Erh Ts'an, that Chang Ta-feng made a trip to the mainland recently?"

“Oh?” he asked casually. “No, I didn’t. Where I come from, even a copy of the Sunday Times is not that easy to come by.”

“Then you are not surprised?” Ouyang Pu-hsiu couldn’t resist asking, noting his apparent lack of curiosity.

“Should I be surprised?” Erh Ts’an remarked flatly. “Visiting the mainland is no big deal.”

His attitude had undergone a drastic change. . Only three years before, when he first heard that Wu Chien-jen, a fellow National Taiwan University alumnus and a distant cousin, had gone on a visit to the mainland, he couldn’t sleep a wink all night. “What made him do it?” he kept asking himself. Since Wu Chien-jen’s parents and brothers were all in Taiwan and he was not known to have relatives on the mainland, did he go just to watch the tidal bore at the Chientang River? It was only later that he learned that following his visit to the mainland, Wu Chien-jen’s stock skyrocketed in academic circles, and that the business at his wife’s restaurant increased by ten or twenty full-course banquets on an average night. In fact, a full-course banquet “a la Nixon” had to be ordered two weeks in advance.

Since Wu Chien-jen’s visit to the mainland, Erh Ts’an discovered that many of his former cronies at National Taiwan University began to keep their distance. He thought at first that he had somehow offended them, until he learned that they were all awaiting visas to visit the mainland. Since that time, it was no longer news to Erh Ts’an who did or did not visit the mainland.Knowing Erh Ts’an’s feelings on the subject, Hu Hsien- hua could not help bursting into laughter.

“Erh Ts’an,” he said, “snap out of it! At least, you can trust me and Ouyang. We have not visited, and we have no wish to visit the mainland. Are you satisfied now?”

At that, he himself broke into a smile. It was only then that the ice was broken. The best friends are those who know what’s in each other’s hearts. After all, what’s the point in friends talking when they have to hold things back?

They settled down to exchange the latest tidbits. It turned out that Ouyang Pu-hsiu had been teaching Chinese history at a university in the midwest noted for being ultra-activist, and that in the last few years he had had a number of confrontations similar to that Erh Ts’an had experienced. More nimble-minded than Erh Ts’an, Ouyang, claimed to have a secret weapon, so that he could handle any situation without allowing it to get out of hand.

“What’s your secret?” Erh Ts’an wanted to know.

“Nothing can be simpler,” Ouyang replied, after lighting his cigarette and taking a sip of coffee, “but you’ve got to stare death in the face in order to survive. If the opponent is an American, I would say to him, ‘Americans like to meddle in other people’s business, and yet, when other people meddle in what you consider to be your business, you start to scream bloody murder. I am a guest in your country. If you don’t like me., you can take whatever measures as are appropriate to get me out, but you leave my country alone! If you can tear Nixon to shreds, why can’t I do the same to Mao Tse-tung? If, on the other hand, the opponent is a fellow countryman,” Ouyang continued, warming up to the subject, “the problem is even simpler. I’d keep my cool and simply say, ‘It is your prerogative to love your “motherland” just as it is mine to love Taiwan. Let’s put our love where our mouth is by serving the people we profess to love. Why don’t we both surrender our permanent residence in the United States? You start applying for a visa to return to the mainland and I do the same to return to Taiwan. The one who sneaks back to the United States is a son of a turtle.’”

“The ploy is guaranteed to work every time,” Ouyang concluded with finality. “Here in the United States, they cannot intimidate you with the little Red Book. The most they can do is to call you a poisonous weed.”

Carried away by his own eloquence, he burst into laughter.

“How about that, Erh Ts’an?” Ouyang asked. “If I were on the spot to pass on to you some tricks of the trade, you would not have had to take any gaff from the kid. Do you still want to change jobs? I understand that the University of Central California is looking for somebody to teach Chinese literature. Why don’t you give it a try?”

He dismissed the idea.

First, his application might not be successful.

Second, now that he was a family man, he felt he ought to stay put.

Third, there were ways to transmit Chinese culture other than teaching Chinese literature. For the past few years, in addition to teaching English, he had been translating Chinese literature into English on the side. There was little tangible advantage in delving into Chinese literature while teaching English. Perhaps more so because of this, he felt somehow that he was doing his bit in passing on the cultural legacy bequeathed by his forebears.

The three of them talked about this and that for two or three hours. Soon it was past three o’clock in the morning. Remembering next days’ agenda, Erh Ts’an got up to take his leave.

"Erh Ts'an," Ouyang grasped his hand tightly and said in a serious vein. "Now that you know that I and Hu Hsien-hua have not become turncoats, let's keep in touch. Too bad there are only the three of us left, not enough to get up a mahjong game." …

39.151 & 113.110 1. Grandma Qi 2. Chinese Roses: Two Short Stories\fn{by Li Tuo (1939-)} Hohhot, Inner Mongolian Autonomous Region, China (M) 9

1

First came the pungent aroma of chives mixed with scallions and ginger. Must be the Changs in the north house getting ready to make dumplings—pork-and-chive dumplings. Then came the smell of burnt wheatcakes. That's probably Lil' Four, fourth daughter of the Liu's to the west. The girl was forever lost in a book—must have forgotten to give the pancakes a flip. Still later came the delicious smell of fish stewing. But Grandma Qi had no idea whose house this was from, nor could she be bothered. She was too busy minding the goings-on in her own kitchen. The little cookhouse was right across the courtyard from her room, and bustling about inside was her daughter-in-law Yu-hua, just home from work. With difficulty Grandma Qi managed to raise herself a little so she could look out the window. But smack on the windowsill were two pots of cactus blocking her view. Worse yet, her glaucoma had been getting so bad the last couple of years, all she could make out was a shadow here, an image there, even though she gazed long and hard in the direction of the kitchen.

No telling what that woman was up to now. Just for a few moments, though, she'd had the vague feeling that Yu-hua was stoking the fire. If only she weren't half deaf! Then she'd be able to figure out what was happening just by listening to the sounds from the kitchen—and she wouldn't be far off the mark. But now, now she had no way of knowing whether Yu-hua was actually stoking the furnace. This filled her with alarm. Straining to peer around those two pestiferous plants, she propped herself up on her arms and tried to ease toward the edge of the bed. But her legs, still crossed together, seemed rooted to the bed and refused to budge. Undaunted, she struggled to lean forward, stretching her arms until both hands were grabbing onto the edge of the bed, then summoned up all her strength and gave it another try. But it was no good. What used to work every single time just wasn't working today.

She refused to give up. Clenching her teeth, she kept tugging at the edge of the bed as if her very life depended on it, even though her heart was pounding and her breath came in short gasps. A sudden bout of coughing finally made her let go, a coughing fit that seemed to turn her inside out and in no time at all had covered her face, neck and back with large beads of sweat. She felt as though she were choking on a plug of cotton so that even her eyes were popping out of her head, and it was all she could do to gasp for air in that brief spell after one attack was over, before the next one began. She was terrified she wouldn't be able to breathe, that she would die just like that.

Even so, she had no thought for anything but the kitchen. Was Yu-hua puttering with the coal stove or not? What was that woman really up to? Eyes swimming in tears as well as sweat, she could no longer even see shapes and shadows, nothing but a pale shimmering blur. Just now she'd sensed that the fire had gone out in the stove and Yu-hua was poking about trying to rekindle it. In that case she would have been able to smell it by now, that white smoke from the kindling just before the fire roared to life. But at the moment there wasn't even a hint of smoke in the air. Instead it was the pleasant aroma of dumplings—pork-and-chive dumplings, freshly cooked—that came wafting over from the Changs' house. Fresh out of the pan, dumplings always smell so good.

*

What a sharp nose she had when she was little! She was famous for it. Back then her father used to drink—not much, really, just a jigger or so as soon as he came in the door after pulling a rickshaw all day, and then he'd go straight to bed. It was she who went to buy the liquor every day, carrying a little tin flask and shuffling along in her mother's cloth shoes, the ones that were so worn the heels had fallen off. Every day she did this, even when it snowed.

How cold winters were back then! Each time it snowed there'd be half a foot on the ground, at the least ankle-deep. One New Yea''s Day—which year she couldn't recall now—there had been a big snowfall overnight, and in the morning nobody could open his front door. If you so much as coughed, a clump of snow would tumble off a branch. Back then things were so different. Now, heaven knows, winters aren't winters and summers aren't summers. But back then things were different.

Take drinking water, for instance-now there's something you don't see anymore. Just imagine—delivered door-to-door every morning, in a creaky wagon pulled by a little donkey who knew where to stop without being told. Then there's the layer of moss covering the water wagon—how pretty it was, so green and moist and lush. And the water? Straight from a well, none of that bleaching powder nonsense. Back then even business was done differently. In the evenings the wonton peddler would come right up to your door with his little pushcart, the wontons bubbling away in the pot. She never ate any, though—couldn't afford them. But she did taste those yundou\fn{A note reads: A kind of bean.} pies. They were sold at night too, late at night, when the streets were almost empty. It was then that the peddler would come around with a wooden bucket on his back.

"Yundooouuu—" His voice rang like one of those Peking opera singers, his cry could be heard several alleys away. These days "home delivery" is something special, but back then everything was delivered to your door. Smash a pot or break a bowl, you could get the tinker to fix it all right on your front step.

Except for the wine sellers—they never made deliveries. So every single day she'd have to carry that tin flask with the big dent in the middle to buy wine, no more than a jigger each time. Every single day she'd flop along in her mother's big shoes that no longer had any heels. Rain or shine, winter or summer, she had to bring this wine home or she'd be in for a thrashing. What a good nose she had back then. One sniff and she could tell if water had been added to the wine, and how much. Every day she'd have to go around to several shops to find the strongest drink. Once she had to go all the way to Sipailou be/ore she found wine that didn't have too much water in it. When she got home she was spanked but good, so hard even the broom handle snapped. What a sharp nose she had back then.

*

She was growing more and more alarmed. Who knows, maybe it was this very panic that made the awful coughing fit go away, just like that. Quickly she wiped her tears with a sleeve and struggled to look out the window again, but the two cactus plants were still blocking her view. How many times had she told them to move those things! Her son had promised, but never did anything about it. Now suddenly a thought popped into her head: Yu-hua must have been behind it all. Of course! It must have been she who stopped her husband from moving them. On purpose. That woman was so mean she was capable of anything. Time and time again Yu-hua had lied to her, pretending to cook with the coal stove, but each time Grandma had managed to see through the trickery. Not for a moment could she let her guard down with this woman. Something fishy was going on right now. Dimly she could tell that the door to the cookhouse was open (she had laid down the law to her son about this: anytime Yu-hua was in there cooking the kitchen door had to stay open), and through it she could see a figure stirring about that had to be Yu-hua.

But what was she actually doing in there? If she had been chopping firewood for the stove, then where was the smoke? It should have begun drifting over a long time ago. All these years Grandma had been breathing in this stuff, she'd never mistake it if it was in the air. But at the moment all she could smell were the pleasant odors of cooking from the other houses, no matter how long and hard she sniffed. That's it, Yu-hua must be up to her tricks again.

All at once Grandma could feel her hairs standing on end. Though the coughing had stopped earlier her heart was still racing and her breath still came in gasps. Now she became worse. Her heart thumped away even more furiously and she could hardly breathe. Once again she felt like she was choking on some- thing. She tried to shout, but a fit of coughing rattled her from head to toe, as though someone had seized her by the shoulders and was shaking her vigorously, violently. Even so, she still tried to shout, shouted inwardly, but not a sound came out.

*

That's what Uncle Chang said, and he never talks through his hat. There was this household with a propane stove that had somehow sprung a leak. It was in one of those apartment houses, not sure how many stories exactly, but anyway a pretty tall building. The people in that household had all gone to work, so nobody was home at the time. The leaking gas went all over the apartment, then seeped out onto the balcony, slid down to the balcony below, and snuck into the apartment downstairs like a thief in the night. Not a soul saw what was going on.

But it so happened that someone was home downstairs—most likely the man of the house, who wanted a smoke, who struck a match. And the whole place went up in flames—sheets of fire hanging in the air, fire shooting up his nose and into his lungs, lungs that were filled with gas. That was how the man died, burnt alive. What's more, said Uncle Chang, it could have been much worse. If the canister itself had exploded, the whole building would have been blown sky-high.

Now what kind of a person would invent such an evil, evil thing? Just the thought of it was enough to make her flesh crawl. To put a bomb in your own home and then to cook on it—how vicious can you get?!

*

Ever since the day she fainted she had not seen that propane stove again. They stuck it in a corner along the north wall of the cook-house so she wouldn't be able to see it at all, even when the door was wide open. At first she thought her son had wanted it out of sight, out of mind, so as not to upset her again. It was only later, after she found out that many a time Yu-hua had cooked with the gas stove, that she realized she had been fooled. Yu-hua would pretend to use the coal stove by setting a pan on top of it, but she wouldn't bother to light the fire. Now each day, every day, as soon as it came time to cook, Grandma Qi's heart would begin to pound and her hands, legs and eyelids would all begin to tremble. Even after the food was set down in front of her she'd still be afraid and suspicious, now even meals cooked on the coal stove would taste of gas to her.

Since Yu-hua had come home later than usual today she might well try her old tricks again. She had to watch that woman. What she should do is call Uncle Chang over and have him look in on Yu-hua. Get him to keep an eye on her. It'd be all right, by now he should have eaten enough dumplings already. But she was coughing so hard she could barely catch her breath, never mind calling out to anyone. This coughing just wouldn't let go of her today.

Out of desperation she began to pinch herself in the thighs, pinched them hard. But her legs, which were almost numb to begin with, didn't feel any pain at all, nothing—as if they weren't even connected to her. She tried slapping herself, left hand against left cheek—thwack!—right hand against right cheek—thwack!—back and forth, a dozen times and more. But even this didn't hurt much. For one thing, she was shaking so hard from the coughing, like a tree in a storm, that she had hardly any strength left in her arms. For another, her face was so slippery with sweat her hands kept sliding right off. Finally she had to stop.

Again she looked over at the kitchen, again she could see nothing but Yu-hua's figure flitting about. That was enough to fill her heart with dread and send a shiver through her body. All of a sudden she had an idea. A pair of scissors lay on the bed, several feet away from her. Now if she could only hurl them against the window and break the glass, Uncle Chang and the other neighbors would hear the crash and come running to see what had happened, and then she'd get her chance. But even though she bent down as far as she could the scissors remained beyond her reach. Nor could she stay in that position for long. Coughing while bent over like that, she thought she'd suffocate on the spot. She had to wait till the worst of the hacking was over before she could lean forward again and continue to stretch and grope. Once or twice her fingers brushed against the scissors, but she just couldn't get a firm grip on them.

In desperation she began pinching herself in the thighs again. That gas canister kept spinning before her eyes. She seemed to hear a loud rumble, followed by bodies and blood splattering everywhere. A cold sweat broke out beneath the layer of warm perspiration that already covered her. But somehow all that desperation paid off, and at last she closed her fingers around the scissors.

Just when she was about to throw them at the window, however, she began to have second thoughts. What a pity it would be to smash the glass! Almost fifty years of living in this house, and in all that time she had never broken anything, except for one goldfish bowl. That bowl must have been at least a foot wide. She lifted her arm to toss the scissors, but still couldn't bring herself to let go.

At that very moment a faint whiff of smoke drifted over. In an instant she had dropped the scissors and was sniffing hard. That's it all right, she knew this odor only too well. Thank goodness she had held on to the scissors. What if she had broken the glass for nothing? She'd never have forgiven herself. With the smell of smoke in her nostrils she began to relax.

Somewhere a child was throwing a temper tantrum. Grandma listened. The cries were coming in through the rear window, which opened onto a narrow alley. Someone was spanking the child right under this window. She seemed to hear the little one screaming:

"A donkey roll!\fn{A note reads: A kind of sweet pastry.} I want a donkey roll!"

*

Donkey rolls aren't all that good, they stick to your teeth and make you gag. But as a child how she too had loved them! First time she ever tasted one was when her father took her to Longfu Temple. That was also her first visit to the fair. After that she must have gone back umpteen times, but they were never as much fun as the first. Now the Longfu Temple grounds have been turned into the People's Market. She went there once, a couple of years after the change, but what a far cry it was from the hustle and bustle of the old fair. Call it a market if you like, it was no more than a department store without the big building. What's so special about that?!

On the little street right opposite the main gate was her favorite place at the old Longfu Fair, a bird market where she used to hang around watching all the activity and excitement. What a lot of birds there were—mynahs, parakeets, guinea hens, love birds, peacocks, pheasants, even a kind of bird that was supposed to have black bones (its meat was delicious, or so people said)—every kind of bird under the sun. She'd heard tell that even tigers were sold there sometimes, but she never saw any. Nor could you buy a donkey roll there—for that you had to go into the fair.

Inside Longfu Temple were three streets. The one in the middle was always the busiest because that's where most of the acts were set up. You could watch Third Treasure doing his wrestling and acrobatics, Mr. and Mrs. Mutt in their "Family Fun" show, Cloud Flier and his comic operas, plus storytellers, picture lantern shows and magicians galore. Mixed in with these booths were food stalls selling things like fermented soybean drinks, wontons, fried sausages, seasoned millet mush, plum cakes, cotton candy, and buckwheat noodles. Further along you'd find the face readers, fortune-tellers, and peddlers who sold those picture cards that came inside every packet of cigarettes and were collected by children.

Beyond these was the back gate, where she once saw a beggar sitting on the ground pounding his chest with a gray brick. His hair and whiskers were snow white, but his body was filthy black. Next to him sat a big black dog. People said the animal was actually sent by the chief of beggars to watch his followers. If any of them tried to pocket some of the money, the dog would pounce on the poor jellow and tear away at his delicate parts. No telling if the story was true.

The street on the west side of the temple had a lot of food stalls as well. Right inside the west gate was a big stand selling every kind of rice-flour cake you could imagine. In winter there were bean cakes steamed in straw baskets and served piping hot; in summer there were chilled custards, cool and refreshing; autumn meant chestnut cakes, of course; and spring brought those little date pastries glazed in a syrup seasoned with fresh roses. Much tastier than donkey rolls, all of them. Back then her family lived right near Longfu Temple, and she never missed the fair days on the ninth and tenth of every month. So as not to get a licking at home she'd always bring her little brother along. She would buy him taffy shaped into a monkey, or a noisemaker, or some marbles. That monkey-shaped taffy was the best thing for keeping a kid happy, it was so cheap and filling—but now you can't find it anymore.

How many years ago that was! She wasn't afraid of dying, but oh, how she wished she could visit the fair one last time. Three nights in a row last week she dreamed that she was back at Longfu Temple with her little brother, strolling around buying a feather duster here, a goldfish there, a steam basket further along. These days people use pressure cookers instead. She heard tell those things could also explode and blow your head wide open. These newfangled doodads in the home nowadays—why is it that all of them behave just like bombs? What is this world coming to?

*

She must have dozed off for a little while. Then with a start she woke up again. She was forever doing that. Night or day, she never could get a sound sleep, never any rest. No wonder she was all tuckered out. Raising herself slightly, Grandma Qi looked out the window at the kitchen again, but, just as before, couldn't make out a thing. Those two cactus plants were such a nuisance. What's more, some time ago the Lius' big black-and-white tabbycat had jumped onto the windowsill and plunked itself down right between the two flowerpots. Now she couldn't even see the kitchen door.

The afternoon sun cast its slanting rays onto the tabby and the plants, and then, carrying the shadows of the cat and the cactuses, found its way onto Grandma's bed, and onto her hands, knees and feet, warming them through and through. Once more she started to doze off, but with a jerk she came to again. Right away she sniffed the air and became suspicious. What happened to that smoke? Was the kindling all burned up already?

Then suddenly it hit her: Yu-hua must have fooled her again! That smoke must have been another one of her tricks. The woman was a real live fox spirit, she knew exactly how to cast a spell on people. Why else would her son have insisted on buying the propane stove, come hell or high water? Yu-hua must have been behind it all, it was all her doing! If it weren't for that woman there'd be peace under heaven. If it weren't for that woman, Grandma would never have ended up paralyzed from the waist down, a useless lump stuck on a bed, not quite alive and not quite dead. Without realizing it she began to grind her teeth, making all kinds of loud, crunching noises.

*

That day she and Uncle Chang were sitting under the trellis, sipping tea and shooting the breeze. Uncle Chang was singing her son's praises to her:

"That boy of yours, heh, he's like this!"

And he raised his right fist, then stuck out his thumb. At that very moment her son came into the courtyard pushing his bicycle, and there tied onto the back was a metal doohickey, kind of round and kind of long. As soon as she saw that thing she felt all her hairs standing on end.

Once when she was a child she had seen a ghost. It was just getting dark when she passed by a graveyard surrounded by cypress trees, and she could see fireflies twinkling here and there among the branches and in the clumps of overgrown weeds. The ghost was standing right behind a headstone, ashen white from head to toe and not a single feature on its face, just like one of those blank tiles in a mah-jongg game. That scared the living daylights out of her. Every hair standing straight up on her head, she ran home like a wisp of smoke. Afterward she was sick for three whole days.

But keeping a gas stove in the house was even more terrifying than keeping a ghost at home, it would make your hairs stand on end every single day. The ruckus that day shook all the neighbors in the alley. If she hadn't collapsed in a dead faint right then and there she would have blocked the cookhouse door for at least three days and three nights. At the time she was also coughing and wheezing so hard she couldn't get a word out. How she had wanted to give that wench a few good swings of her walking stick! But her arms refused to obey. For the rest of her life she would never forget those eyes, those ferocious eyes.

She had wanted to go down on her knees before her son, right there in front of the whole neighborhood: I'm begging you on my knees! Look, everyone! See how this mother is kneeling to her son! But somehow, as soon as she saw those eyes of her daughter-in-law's she fainted dead away. Death is like a light going out. If only she had died right then.

*

Even though she didn't hear that crackling at the beginning, she could tell from the delicious aroma that the minced scallions had just been tossed into the hot oil and were still sizzling away in the pan. That must be Yu-hua getting ready to stir fry. The smell was so close by it could only have come from their own little cookhouse.

Right away Grandma relaxed. It's going to be all right now, she'd finally made it through another day. And not just her, but all dozen or so families in their courtyard, plus the people in the immediate neighborhood, fifty or sixty households in all—they too had made it through another day. Only the tabby on the windowsill was none the wiser, still fast asleep. But at last even it had had enough. It stood up and rubbed itself against the flowerpot, then, arching its back and lifting its head, let out a great big yawn before jumping off the ledge and scampering away. Now the space between the two pots was empty once more.

Quickly she raised herself and stared out the window at the kitchen again, only to find the sun shining right in her face. The wider she opened her eyes, the more blinding the light, so bright and harsh that tears came to her eyes. With the back of her hand she wiped them off, but as soon as she lifted her head and looked out the window tears would gush out again. Tearing, wiping, wiping, tearing—she kept this up for a long time, although she knew in her heart that, even if the sun was not blinding her, she still would not be able to see clearly into the kitchen.

But she had to keep looking. Some time later it occurred to her to scrunch her eyes up into tiny slits and shade them with her hands. There, that's better. She could look over at the kitchen again. Now for some reason her heart began to thump and she had a feeling that something was about to go wrong. But what? She couldn't say. Nevertheless the pounding of her heart grew worse. In her mind she kept telling herself: steady there, steady does it. That seemed to work. She could see something at last. She could sense a figure like that of Yu-hua's stirring about the cookhouse, though she still couldn't see what she was up to. Again she told herself: steady there, steady.

And that was when she finally saw something not quite right about the kitchen. If Yu-hua was actually cooking with the coal stove, then she should have been facing the south wall. Why then did she keep bustling around on the north side of the kitchen? Grandma Qi felt a sharp cramp in her chest, as if someone had gripped her heart tightly and was squeezing it. for dear life. Frantically she sniffed and snorted, but she could smell nothing unusual in the air. She had long heard that gas had a special odor to it, though she could never tell what it was. She must be getting old, after all—her nose just wasn't what it used to be. No, no, she couldn't just sit there, she had to think of some way to look into the kitchen and get help if need be. She must move herself over to the edge of the bed, must try again even though she had tried just now but failed.

Taking a deep breath she thrust herself forward again, stretching her arms until her fingers closed around the edge of the bed, then pulled and tugged and hauled as if her very life depended on it. This time, she thought, this time she had a chance. She held her breath. She felt that come what may she could not let go of this breath, she had to pull herself over, do what she had to do while she was still holding on to it. How was she to know that just when she could feel her legs beginning to budge, another fit of coughing would seize her like the dickens and turn her inside out again?

But this time she didn't let go. Her hands gripped the edge of the bed ever more tightly. She had only one thought on her mind: she had to see what was going on in the kitchen, even if that was the last thing she ever did.

2

Lu Xiaoling loved flowers and her favorites were Chinese roses, so when she saw a pot of them in the florists, she hesitated for minute or two and then bought them.

Chinese roses are a rare variety of rose. When Lu Xiaoling boarded the bus she carefully placed the flowers beside her on the seat. The snow-white blooms, the size of saucers, were shaking and rocking with the rhythm of the bus. A light perfume came from the petals, immediately attracting the attention of the other passengers nearby. Many unabashedly looked a both the flowers and their owner, and it was evident from their gazes that they appreciated what they saw.

Lu Xiaoling of course was sensitive to their stares: she knew perfectly well that although she was over thirty she still looked very youthful and in fact was quite beautiful. She was especially attractive today as she was wearing a new pleated, print skirt. The skirt was a light purple and it really complemented the blooms beside her. But she appeared nonchalant, her eyes on the traffic.

The bus quickly drove out of the city and closer and closer to her stop. She was no longer thinking about the flowers but instead was anxious about her home. For one thing, her husband, Li Mingyan, had not come home for three days. Would he return today? Before he left they had quarreled. If he returned today how should she greet him? Should she pretend to be angry still and force him to apologize? That might work. But there was his temper to consider. If he refused to admit he was wrong, then neither could back down.

Another idea was to pretend she had forgotten the whole unhappy incident and they could cheer each other up admiring the pot of roses. However, this plan had its shortcomings. Of late Mingyan was often impatient with household matters and .this really upset her. If she let him win every time he would probably become even bossier and this would not be good either.

After several stops to rest, Lu had managed to carry the flowers up to her fourth floor flat. Her new pleated skirt was soiled from holding the pot but she did not have time to worry. She hurriedly checked the wall beside her front door. There, she had pinned a small note:

"Comrade Li Mingyan, when you come home please remember that I've just polished the floor. Don't tramp all over it and ruin someone else's hard work."

The note was still there. Lu was disappointed as it meant her husband had not come back. At the same time she heaved a sigh of relief as she had worried that if he had returned he would be oblivious to the note and tramp dirt all over the clean floor. In order to polish the floor she had risen around four o'clock that morning and slaved alone for ages—even now her back still ached.

Lu placed the flowers in the hallway and from the top of the radiator, picked up two small mats to use as foot pads. She opened her door and placed them on the floor. She stepped gingerly on the foot pads like a novice ice skater and then stood dumb-struck. What was she looking at? Li had returned and was fast asleep on their bed. While polishing the waxed floor, Lu had used today also for a general clean-up. She had put on a new quilt cover and sheets and had changed the pillow slips, but now here was Li, still wearing work clothes that were filthy from top to bottom, stained with sweat, scorch marked and covered with factory dust, and in trousers so extraordinarily dirty that you could not even guess their original white color—here he was, wearing this outfit, fast asleep on their bed. Evidently it had crossed his mind how appallingly filthy he was and how the bed would be if he lay on it, as he had put a plastic cloth and a towel underneath, but they were far from clean. Lu had used the plastic today as a dust cover, and the towel in fact was a dish towel. How could he?

When Lu saw him she was furious, hurt and resentful. Apart from that, she felt numb, a feeling she had never had before, as if Mingyan had suddenly become a stranger to her. Could this man in work clothes sprawled asleep on her bed be her husband? He had come home from work filthy before but never quite so filthy as now—what's more, and to Lu this was the crux of the matter—in the past he had always been careful to change in the hallway and had never worn his work clothes into the flat. How could he have slipped so badly?

It was not that Lu despised the dirt on the work clothes. As she was a factory worker herself she knew the grime was part and parcel of industrial work, even for a technician like Li. It would be ridiculous to expect him to be spotlessly clean. But that was not the problem. What really infuriated and hurt her was that Li had become more and more indifferent to her, to their home and to the many things that they had both cherished so much over the years. Of late they seemed to be always at loggerheads and snapping at each other. This was the trouble.

Lu suddenly felt utterly drained and was about to lie down on the sofa for a rest. When she kicked off the slippers she realized the floor was already filthy with muddy footprints everywhere. She did not know why but this really was the last straw. She saw that a pair of heavy suede work boots had been flung down beside the bed. Rushing up, she grabbed the boots and threw them into the corridor, and then peeling and yanking the socks off Li's feet, she tossed them away as well. Then she opened all the windows including the windows of the "conservatory." This was in fact a room which Li had made four years ago by glassing in the sun porch. After this Lu ran back to the bed and began shaking Li and screaming,

"Still sleeping? Get up!"

She shook him quite hard but still he kept on sleeping. Finally she grabbed both of her husband's shoulders and really heaved, and then he stirred. He blinked several times as if he did not know where he was, until he caught Lu's furious gaze and sat up with a start.

"What's the matter, Xiaoling? Why are you so angry?"

"What's the matter! Look at the mess you've made of the flat!"

Li looked down at the bed, looked at the opened windows, looked down at his boots and socks in the hallway and realizing the seriousness of the situation, gave a long sigh. He had not slept in days. Was it three days and four nights, or vice versa? He had lost track. The time had gone by like a whirlwind, a whirlwind caused by their steel plant's frenzy to cast a two hundred and eighteen ton steel ingot. That afternoon, when the last of the steel had been poured, all the workers and cadres had crowded around the red hot blast furnace. No one had wanted to leave and instead had gazed with admiration and pride at the towering colossus in the furnace sand pit. This was an engineering feat of international stature.

Li Mingyan was not in the crowd. He was off to the side, alone, quietly smoking a cigarette. This was quite in character, for he preferred to slowly mull things over by himself rather than join the general hubbub. He had taken a few puffs when the party secretary, Liu, came over and sat with him on the pile of bricks. Liu said in a grave voice:

"There's something I'd like to discus with you." Li thought it was about a new job assignment.

"What is it?" he asked. Liu just as solemnly said,

"Go home and sleep." Li was surprised at this and said,

"I can't. Tonight I've got a class to teach, I've got to coach some young people from neighboring factories in physics. I've already postponed. it once, I can't put it off again."

"Well, at least go home and see if everything is okay. Today's your wife's day off."

So, Li had come home. Who would have thought it would cause so much trouble. In truth he was really exhausted. He had only intended to rest a short time, not sleep through until Lu's return. Now, looking at the filthy bedclothes and his wife's face, white with anger, he did not know what to say. Should he explain that he was so short on sleep that he felt dizzy? Should he tell her of their triumph in casting the two hundred and eighteen tons of steel, and thus calm her down? No, it was no use. He looked at her silently and suddenly his heart was filled with sorrow. How miserable it was when they could no longer talk to each other.

"You, come on, say something, why don't you?"

What did she want him to say? She was at a loss herself. All she knew was that she felt angry and vindictive.

"Xiaoling, don't be mad. I'll wash everything. As Lu spoke he got up, rolled up the bed clothes and took them into the kitchen. He could not find the wash pan in the kitchen so he went into the hallway to look for it. The wash pan was in the corner, along with a lot of odds and ends, and in their midst were the roses. Without thinking he placed the flowers on the heater and bent down to pick up the pan.

The action of suddenly lowering his head made him quite dizzy, and afraid that he would black out, he reached up to grab something. His free hand knocked the flowers off the heater and the pot came down with a crash.

Hearing the commotion Lu rushed into the hallway. For a minute she did not realize what had happened but then she stopped and saw the broken pieces. Not only was the pot smashed, but the soil had spilled everywhere, exposing the roots of the flowers. The two main stalks were bent, and the snow-white petals were scattered.

She could not help bursting into tears. The most piercing sorrow was the change in Mingyan. He had become a stranger to her. She recalled someone comparing love to a flower. No matter how precious and wonderful it is in first bloom, with marriage must come eventual withering. When she thought of this she stood, in a frenzy, alternately sobbing and screaming at Li:

"You're selfish, you're selfish! If only I'd known this before …"

Without completing the sentence she turned and ran back to the main room, flung herself on the sofa and gave herself up to bitter sobbing.

While all this was happening, Li. still felt wretchedly dizzy. He held the wash pan in one hand and steadied himself on the heater with the other. After a while the flickerings and blackness in his eyes receded and the swaying ceased. He blinked and looked around to see what he had done this time. He had not taken in his wife's outburst but her sobbing was enough to make him realize what must have happened.

He slowly squatted and inspected the damage. He was also a flower lover. In the past, particularly during the recent political turmoil of the Anti-Confucius, Anti-Lin Piao campaign,\fn{Lin Piao (1908?-1971), former Commander of the People's Liberation Army and the officially designated heir to Mao Tse-tung, apparently made an unsuccessful attempt to assassinate Mao, but died with his family when his aircraft was shot down and crashed over Northeast China. Confucius and Confucianism were attacked as an individual and a philosophical system essentially in a fundamentally incompatible conflict with the direction in which the Chinese Communist Party wished to lead the people of China.} he would sit for hours alone in the conservatory with the flowers. Thus when he saw what a lovely plant he had ruined he was really upset and immediately tried to salvage it. He could not find a suitable flower pot so he took a cracked ceramic pot from the kitchen and tenderly transplanted the flowers into it.

He then carried the pot back into the main room. thinking to cheer Lu up. But when he saw her, her face buried, sobbing her heart out, he stopped dead.

Obviously cheering her up would be no easy thing. What should he do? Apologize to her? But for what wrong should he apologize for? In fact the problem now was not who should apologize to whom. The basic problem was their estrangement. In nearly every respect they had grown apart, and now had conflicting views on life, their family and love. But this estrangement was only a recent thing, so surely he could think of a way to heal the rift before it worsened.

But how difficult it was! That afternoon, when he and Party Secretary Liu were walking through the gate on their way out of the steel plant, Liu had casually commented (why had he brought this up? Had he perhaps heard about their rows? Yes, for sure!):

"Little Li, in my opinion, love can't be philosophically dissected and analyzed. You can compare it to a tree, and you know how difficult it is for a tree to mature without mishap. From the seedling onwards, you have to watch for insects, disease, drought, storms: you really can't afford to take it for granted."

Well, if their love were a tree it really was stricken. What was worse, even as a seedling, there must have been something amiss …

A shrill bell interrupted his thoughts. Before he had nodded off he had set the alarm in case he did not make his night class. Now the alarm hurried him on.

"Xiaoling, I've got a class tonight and I have to run. When it's over we'll discuss this, OK?"

She did not answer, she did not even lift her head, so woeful was her crying …

*

When Lu Xiaoling finally stopped the flow of tears the sky was already dark. Outside she could see the neighboring apartments' lights diffused through the rustling poplar leaves. Further away she could make out the silhouettes of a few factory chimneys, still clearly risible in the fading light.

Lu stood up, and whilst gazing out the window, came to a decision. She would go to Li's factory straight away to drop off his key, which he had left behind in the rush, and then would go to her mother's house. In any case, that was where her children already were!

*

When Lu arrived at the plant, it was easy to locate Li. As soon as she had inquired she was told,

"Oh, he's giving night classes in the building over there."

The building they pointed out was dwarfed by the enormous workshops of the plant, but even from afar it seemed all of its windows were especially well lit, as if it were a big auditorium.

She hesitated to enter it. As it was almost nine o'clock she had supposed classes would have been over by now. She was in a dilemma. A group of young workers who had given her directions asked,

"Aren't you Li's wife? Go in and sit in on his class for a bit. Have you ever heard him lecture? If I were his wife I'd want to attend everyone of them. Go on! The class will be over in a minute."

After opening the small metal door to the building Lu was immediately hit by the odor of machine oil. Then she heard Li's voice over the microphone,

"Well class, today we've finished going over this lesson on electricity from the senior high school physics text. We should stop now, but before we do I'd like to leave the text for a minute and say a word or two of my own about electricity."

As soon as Lu had entered the room she had been astounded. It was in fact a workshop, but there were people everywhere, not only on the workshop floor itself, but perched on machines, on window sills, on cabinets, on the metal stairs leading to an overhead crane, even in the half empty crane itself, everywhere there were people avidly listening. Among them were workers wearing blue visored safety helmets, electrical welders with their canvas work clothes, machinists whose sleeves were thick with machine oil and molders who had. rushed to class without washing their faces. Even more people had changed from work clothes and now sat holding pens and balancing notebooks on their knees, their faces alert. Everyone's gaze was focused on the blackboard on which were written numerous physics formulas and mathematical notation. Above the blackboard was the slogan:

Let's mobilize, struggle and accomplish the great task of the New Period.

Next to the blackboard was a floor model microphone, and there stood Li. He still wore his stained and scorched work clothes, and his cap with the dark blue safety goggles. His enthusiasm, lively speech and magnetism were communicated to everyone there.

"Class, I want to take the discovery of electricity and its application as an example to point out the speed of human progress. We all know that it was the discovery of fire and its application that allowed primitive man to differ from animals. That was an enormous advance for mankind. How long did the process take? At least five hundred thousand years. In 1782 in North America there was an ordinary printer, named Franklin, who one stormy evening used a kite to conduct the electricity from a lightning flash to the ground, thus igniting some methylated spirits. From this the study of electricity was founded. How long ago was that? Only two hundred years. But what gains we have made since that time! The discovery of electricity has spurred the development of production—we all acknowledge this. But we should also note that the invention of electronic computers only dates back a few decades. The tremendous industrial changes brought about by computers are also self evident and I don't need to point them out. But from these examples we can see that the possibilities of technology are limitless, and as we come closer to the present age, the faster such advances come. In short, modernization can't be waited upon. If we miss one step, it won't be easy to catch up."

Lu was really amazed. She would never have thought Li could speak so well. She had slowly become engrossed in the subject, but then she heard his say,

"Okay, my lecture ends here. If any of you have questions, come and see me anytime. You can find me in my office, or feel free to drop by my home."

Lu's ears appeared to be ringing and she did not hear anything else. What, all these people are "free to drop by?" Then when will we ever have any peace? How often will I have to wash the sofa cover? And all those cigarette ashes on the floor, who is going to clean them up?

Utterly confused and disconcerted, Lu did not go to her mother's but made for her home. The scene in the factory classroom had really affected her and now she examined her conscience. Why did she not have such spirit? Could it be her own interests were too narrow? The memory of Mingyan's animation and energy continued to haunt her thoughts and she felt rather ashamed of her attitude towards him. But then the thought of all those young workers invading their cozy home! She could not help but panic.

Suddenly, she heard footsteps in the hallway, and Lu knew at once Mingyan had returned home. In that instant she realized she had been longing for his return. But what should she say? On the other hand, she did not want to speak first. What should she do?

Musing, she went into the conservatory, switched on the light, and went to rearrange the pot plants. The first one her eye fell on was the pot of Chinese roses, now in their cracked ceramic bowl.

Lu's heart raced, and picking up a small watering can she watered the roses. At the same time she could not help questioning: how would she go on from here?

78.116 Our Family's Cook\fn{by Mu Guozheng (1939-)} Jinxi, Liaoning Province, China (M) 11

For the last. few days complaints about the quality problem of every meal had been flying right and left in our house. Think for a moment: if you lift the lid of a rice pot only to have a pasty, overboiled smell assail your nose, or the rice is as sticky as thick gruel, how can you get it down? Can yellowish steamed buns covered with blackened spots the size of broad beans do anything but weaken a person's appetIte? Not only did stir-fried cabbage become a usual dish on our table, it did not even taste as good as it could have. But even though complaints were heard everywhere, we only muttered them jokingly: no one dared to speak up in protest.

In our family of seven you could say that I have special status, because I am the only girl in the house. One day after chewing through yet another steamed bun with blackened spots, I could not contain myself. I snapped at my second brother:

"Second Brother! Every day we get this stuff to eat. Now is not like a few years ago when we could use time in the factory to store up energy—the work is rough now. I even have to run when I want to go to the toilet."

My sister-in-law put in her two cents too. For a newly promoted research associate—a no-nonsense scholar—she is surprisingly quick and interesting in conversation. As she washed the dishes she looed at Second Brother and said:

"Shouldn't the comrade who does the cooking study 'Serve the People' with the problems of his job in mind?"

Second Brother laughed. His grave smile was only a twitch at the corners of his mouth that did not even reveal a glimpse of teeth, so it did nothing to diminish his melancholy look. He stated his position:

"All I do is help out: I'm not the cook. Don't bring your opinions to me."

"Whatever has Papa been thinking about these days? From morning till night he studies the People's Daily and Reference News, and he has us go look for speeches by leading cadres. When it comes to cooking, though, his mind just isn't on it." I turned to Mama and said threateningly:

"Mom, I'm going to eat at the factory tomorrow!"

Mama was at the desk straightening up a big heap of student composItion books. Lifting her eyes, she said laughingly:

"Wherever you eat is all right; it's not my business."

Mama was sixty years old and taught English in middle school. Daily struggles to squeeze onto the bus seemed to make her more and more sturdy. No matter what we said, she wouldn't retire. Oh well! Even her retirement would not do anything to improve our daily fare—she was not in charge of the household! Sister-in-law said:

"Yanan, don't be difficult! Wouldn't Papa's feelings be hurt if everyone left?" My little nephew Peipei stamped out of the inner room, stood in the center of the floor, waved his little arms and said:

"All right! You're saying bad things about Grandpa. Auntie started it and Mama went along. I'm gonna go tell Grandpa!" With that he turned and ran for the door.

I caught him by the arm:

"Don't you want to be friends with Auntie?"

"If you say bad things about Grandpa, I won't be friends with you!"

This little squirt was only six years old, and he was a barrel of fun. He had a big forehead, a flat-bridged nose and a pair of black eyes just as pretty as Sister-in-law. Everyone in the family liked him. Even the dark clouds on Second Brother's melancholy countenance would clear quite a bit when he held Peipei's little hand. But little Peipei's favorites were Grandpa and Grandma—especially Grandpa. Back in the days when he did not go to nursery school he would carry a blue metal bucket, ambling along behind Grandpa all day long, bearing messages for Grandpa, fetching things and bringing newspapers. Elder Brother and Sister-in-law sometimes joked that he was Grandpa's "personal guard." Trying to tease him, I would say to him that he played up to Grandpa. At this, point I said:

"All right, you go tell. I knitted the sweater you're wearing, and I bought your bell-bottom pants. Take both of them off!"

"You gave them, so you can't ask for them back!" He ran towards the door laughing.

A cough sounded outside the door. Sister-in-law and I exchanged looks of warning, held our laughter in and quieted down. The door opened. Papa—our family's cook—came in. Peipei rushed towards him. I stamped my foot nervously. Mama hastily called:

"Peipei, come help Grandma grade homework papers."

Do not underestimate Peipei. At three the little squirt started learning English every day from my Papa. The two of them, one old and one little, often spoke together in English. Peipei was even better at it than I. Helping Grandma grade middle-school English exercises was something in which he took the utmost pride and pleasure. Sure enough turned and ran to Grandma, climbed onto a chair and forgot about telling on us.

Papa seemed to sense something strange in the room's osphere. He looked around without seeing anything amiss, then pulled up a chair beside Peipei and listened rapty to him calling out in a cutely affected voice:

"Right! Right! Worry! …"

Seeing him yell until his face was red and his cheeks ere puffed out, Papa patted his little head and said, "Not so loud, not so loud. You'll get tired."

A near argument faded away along with my and Sister-in-law's suppressed laughter.

*

Papa is the figure of authority in our house. This is definitely not because he is the head of the household: there are plenty of fathers who are not respected by their children. My father is really worthy of respect. His knowledge is quite vast. Elder Brother and Sister-in-law work at the Chemical Engineering Research Institute, and their research topics are pretty difficult. Just looking at their notebooks full of cluster after cluster of formulae makes my eyes glaze over. But when Papa reads rough drafts of their articles he is able, seemingly without much trouble, to point out where ideas are set forth imprecisely, and they nod their heads in agreement. Second Brother does research in classical literature and spends his time buried in a pile of musty-smelling woodblock books. When he runs into an unpunctuated text that he cannot parse, he goes to ask Papa. Papa can always put a punctuation mark in just the right place so that the passage falls into one piece. And even when an insignificant second-grade worker like myself asks about technical problems, Papa can start to give me an answer before I have finished speaking. We respect and love Pa but, aside from Peipei, no one dares to get close to him. Time has made his eyebrows and whiskers gray, but it has not added a tinge of benignity to his long, narrow, stern eyes. Only Peipei is favored with kindly, loving glances.

When I was little, I barely saw his shadow except on holidays. Even while at home he always holed up in his study, working at designing projects or reading heaps of suggestions or whatever—he was so busy that there was never an end to it. If I ran to his door, Mama or my brothers would call me before I pushed it open:

"Come back, Sis, see what I have here!"

Sometimes, knowing that they were deceiving me, I pushed open the door with a thud, but as soon as my eyes met Papa's reproachful, vexed gaze, I hurried back to leap into my brother's arms. Elder Brother held me and said, "Papa's working now!" As he said this he tiptoed to the study door, respectfully took a look at Papa and quietly closed the door.

I too turned my head to look. Papa was wearing a tight brown sweater that made him seem even thinner and taller than he was. One hand braced against the table, the other holding a yellow T-square, he was looking at the diagrams on the desk before him. Though it was daytime the desk lamp was on, illuminating Papa's dark, sturdy face. His expression was so intent, so unfathomable that he resembled a general inspecting battle plans. As I look back, a sense of something sacred and forbidding looms in my memory.

Papa seldom spoke with us, and if he did occasionally say a few words at mealtimes, he spoke in short judgmental sentences without adding any explanations. We were accustomed to thinking that he was right as a matter of course.

During the Cultural Revolution, Papa, who had possessed such exalted status in our home, was actually reduced to being solely responsible for the cooking in our house. In 1971 or 1972—I cannot remember which—all work units were carrying out the policy on purifying class ranks granting "Imperial amnesty" to "demons and monsters" who had been collared on trumped-up charges a few years before. But somehow a "reverse wave" was stirred up in Papa's factory: an "underground Petofi Club"\fn{A note reads: It was a term used in accusation of those allegedly intending to launch a counterrevolutionary coup against Chairman Mao in the fashion of the Petofi Club, a Hungarian literary group associated with the Hungarian Uprising of 1956.} was unearthed among technical workers. Papa, who had just been rehabilitated and released from among the "targets of distatorship" was almost pulled in again. Thanks to Papa's rigid conventionality and ineptitude at socializing, he was, after some in-fighting, finally cleared of suspicion. However, the special investigatory committee still put pressure on him to expose others. He would neither accept the hints and inducement, nor would he give in to threats. Finally his blood pressure climbed to 220 and he could not go to work. I lived in the factory then, ardently spending my youthful years demonstrating in the streets and arranging all sorts of minor dread-inspiring activities. I only made it back home when I got around to it. Though my poor mother, elder brother and sister-in-law were not in on any misfortunes, in that combative atmosphere ("whatever you think about, keep the class struggle in mind") they spent their days acting only with utmost caution, half out of their wits with fear. They were honest and upright, and they would never kick people who were down in order to gain favor with power-holders.

On the other hand, being antagonistic was not such a good idea, so the only choice was to look to their own safety by working long hard hours.

What was on Papa's mind as Mama and Sister-in-law dragged their tired bodies to the kitchen to fix supper? Was he indignant or despondent or maybe pained by deep regrets? Whatever it was, one evening he suddenly said to Mama:

"I'll fix meals for you! Make me a list of what to buy."

In an instant Mama's eyes were full of tears, When my brothers and were small—a time when Mama's work was hardest of all—the thought that he ought to help Mama wash vegetables or check the rice now and then had never entered his mind. And now, his hair turned gray and children grown, he turned around and started worrying about household work.

"I'll give it a try," he said insistently.

Next evening, as soon as we got home we rushed to the kitchen to see what Papa had cooked for us. The kitchen light was on, but stove and pots were cold. A piece of raw pork was on the counter; tomatoes, cucumbers and cabbages were spread out on the floor. They had not even been washed, let alone cooked.

Papa probably heard our footsteps. He walked out of the study, one hand at the frames of his bifocals and the other holding a book. What a character! He had forgotten all about cooking the meal.

"Papa, let's eat," I said, being intentionally stupid. "Let us appreciate your skill!"

Papa ignored me and asked Mama:

"How much is a 'small amount?'"

"You and your knowledge!" I said. "A 'small amount' is a little bit."

Papa threw me a stern glance, then held the book up to Mama's face and pointed to a short sentence, saying: "This 'small amount' stumped me." I stretched my neck for a look; the sentence was:

"Add a small amount of soy sauce."

The book was PopuLar Recipes. Papa was a scholar through and through: he had to look in a book for "manufacturing techniques" just to make stir-fried cucumber. Mama, Elder Brother, Sister~in-law and I burst out laughing. Mama pushed the recipe book aside and said:

"All right, old master! Go take a rest."

"'Small amount' and 'large quantity' are not absolute. A drop of soy sauce is a 'small amount,' but there is nothing that says a large spoonful cannot be called a 'small amount." Papa sheepishly tried to justify himself: "It should specify a certain number of grams in the book. 'A small amount;' that's not scientific! Not scientific!"

As this bookwormish point was being made, I fell laughing against Sister-in-law's shoulder. She too turned her face away and chuckled without end. When Papa had gone into the kitchen she said:

"We still don't have the good fortune to eat food prepared for us. Who would have thought that Papa's intelligence would work against him?"

Papa's precise mind only recognized the existence of concrete, definite numbers; it did not allow for vague "small amounts." He threw the recipe book aside in irritation and practiced at making every-day dishes for a few days with Mama and Sister-in-law.

The first dish he made on his own was ground meat stir-fried with pickled mustard greens. That day I had just come in the door from work when he pompously barked out an oraer for us to hurry up and wash our hands for supper. Before the table was set, he had already brought in a platterful of dark green mustard greens. I took the first taste. The flavor was really good: our supply of oil and meat had probably taken a beating! I yelled in applause:

"Hey! This is more flavorful than what Mama and Sister-in-law make."

Papa looked at me with self-satisfaction and, exceptionally enough for him, cracked a joke:

"Well, you know, 'the pupil often surpasses the master,' that's the rule."

Suddenly I let out a clanking sound; an expression that must have been frightening came over my face.

"What's wrong?" Papa asked hurriedly.

"A piece of grit." I spit it out with a ptui. By that time, everybody had taken their places and the spitting spread as if by contagion. Ptui, went Mama. Ptui, went Elder brother and Sister-in-law, Second Brother ptui-ptuied without stopping.

Papa looked at us in shock, picked up a bite with his chopsticks, and munched it gingerly. He did not ptui, but he did not have the courage to swallow it either. Sister-in-law said:

"Papa, didn't you rinse the mustard greens?"

Papa gave no answer, but the answer was written clearly on his face. Everyone seemed to feel cheated; a hubbub of protest arose. I picked up the mustard greens and dumped them in the garbage can; when I went back to the room Papa defended himself:

"Can Sichuan pickled vegetables be rinsed? If they are rinsed what happens to the peppery taste? That's what I was thinking. . . . Oh well, I have to admit it was a false step! …"

Second Brother leaned back in his chair listlessly, neither taking part in our protests nor paying heed to Papa's explanations. I reproached him crossly:

"Second Brother, you could have helped him with a little advice. You might as well be made of wood."

Second Brother turned up his eyes at me and walked out without a word. I felt terrible about saying that to him. How could I have said he was made of wood? By doing so was I not deliberately opening a wound that had not yet healed?

In 1969 at the height of the campaign to clear up class lines, his girlfriend was implicated by a bunch of no-good bastards because she had written a word incorrectly on a political poster. They framed her at random and branded her an active counter-revolutionary. Subdued and delicate though she was, she had an extremely unbending temperament. She accepted interrogation, but she refused to be insulted. One winter night as the snow flew thickly, she quietly ended her life in its spring. I still remember how Second Brother, when this news reached him, locked himself in his room without eating, drinking or speaking for.a whole day. Mama could not contain her fear. She knelt at the door, sobbing a wailing, and begged him to open the door. Finally Elder Brother smashed a window and climbed in clumsily. Second Brother came out, but his heart had died—or perhaps flow away together with his beloved girl—leaving only a numb wooden shell. In that period his work unit lost its original building because of repeated changes in the administrative set-up: the workers had nowhere to work. Stewing all day at home, he had no outlet that could dissipate his suffering

That evening we had no choice but to help our rice down with salty, hard canned carp in black bean sauce and Sister-in-law's tomato egg soup.

*

There were quite a few other amusing incidents connected with Papa's cooking. However, whenever a person —particularly a talented, meticulous person like Papa—concentrates his energy on one thing, there is no difficulty he cannot overcome. Soon Papa picked up Popular Recipes again. For him a "small amount" was already a concrete quantity that could be understood flexibly.

I really did, not understand why Papa suddenly developed such prodigious enthusiasm for cooking. Soliciting our opinions, he picked a few dishes from the book and tried them one by one himself. His serious manner made him look as if he were working on a scientific research project at the factory. He often handed us slips of paper and had us go to Xidan Market to buy the groceries he needed; sometimes in the dead of winter he had me run to markets all over the city looking for mugwort stems. If one ingredient for the dish he wanted was missing, he could not make do with what he had. He would gravely say:

"This is beancurd with fresh shelled shrimp. Do you expect me to use dried shrimp instead? The color, aroma and flavor would all be wrong."

While cooking he tied a piece of blue muslin around his waist and carried himself in a solemn, dignified way. He chased Mama and Sister-in-law out of the kitchen, leaving only Second Brother as a helper. At first we got a kick out of this; taking it to be the child-like quality of an old man. No one had high hopes for his cooking. Mama said:

"Don't any of you meddle in this. He makes over 200 yuan a month. Let him waste a little of it."

I knew that Mama was protecting Papa. It was as if there were something eating Papa from the inside, and only she knew what was on his mind.

One day Elder Brother, having finished one bowl of rice, lifted his chopsticks and let them hover indecisively over a plate of sliced meat and green peppers. According to the diet he was on, he should have left the table and rinsed out his mouth right then.

"What, can't you tear yourself away?" Sister-in-law often joked with Elder Brother.

"No more for me." Elder Brother looked at his protruding belly and put down the chopsticks. "Papa's cooking is really up to high standard—much better than yours. These slices of meat are so tender, so juicy!" We intently savored the taste for a moment: sure enough, it was not a run-of-the-mill dish. Everyone praised it in unison. Papa's eyes crinkled with a bIg smile as he picked up a piece of green pepper and said:

"That's the trick—bright green and almost translucent, as if it had just been picked, but it has been cooked."

Everyone knew that Papa was going to mouth that old cliche about "color, aroma and flavor," but this time no one acted indifferent. Elder Brother praised him:

"Papa used the same hand that works a slide rule to add seasonings." Sister-in-law chipped in:

"Papa used the same eyes that observe the chemical reaction in a test tube to make sure that it was cooked just right."

Papa laughed humbly, accepting our compliments. Ma and Sister-in-law were giad to yield the honor to him. It was a matter of course that Papa should become the cook in our family. He took great pleasure in this. On every holiday and festive occasion he liked to demonstrate his skill by putting together a multi-course meal for us to feast on. When Peipei could sit up to the table, he became even more enthusiastic and went so far as to celebrate each of our birthdays according to the household register book. Each time he ran around busily, making lots of food, but when it was time to eat he only drank a small glass of brandy, ate a few bites and withdrew to the sofa to smoke. Or else he sat beside Peipei, picking up whatever morsels Peipei pointed to. Looking at the grease of food sticking to Peipei's cheeks and nose and listening to his high-pitched yell—"I want that; I want it!"—Papa was as happy as could be. However, if you looked under the surface of his happy-looking face you would discover faint hidden feelings of dejection and loneliness.

Actually it would not be right to say that Papa was always so enamored of cooking. Papa seemed to have a lot of things on his mind; 1 could not get a clear idea of what they were. Often he hid in his study smoking, pacing back and forth and letting out long sighs. No longer did he throw his energy into work that could never be finished. In my child-hood memories his desk had always been too small to hold the spread out books, diagrams and papers, but in the last few years all of this was gone. A finely made purple ashtray of cut glass, a covered china bowl with blue flower pattern and a layer of fine dust that looked like down in the sunlight made the desk look wide and untouched. The slide rule that he had hardly ever put down was put away somewhere and the yellow T-square hung forlornly on the plaster wall.

Sometimes Papa stood before it and set it in motion with a touch of his finger. It swung like a pendulum, but before it to stopped Papa had already turned around to resume his seemingly ceaseless pacing. There were times when he read, proping a thick technical book on his knees in deep concentraion for two or three hours straight—not like me, humming to myself as I read. But sometimes he would abruptly clap the book shut and bury his face in the palms of his hands. Sometimes he walked agitatedly up to Mama:

"Where is that Number 37 notebook of mine?"

Mama immediately put down her work—no matter how important—and went to help him look. The two of them went through three glass-door bookcases, raising clouds of dust. At last Mama found it behind a pile of books. Pleased and yet angry, she said:

"They were here all the time! Like I said, nobody touches your things."

By this time Papa no longer felt the pressing impulse that had made him look for the notebook. Glancing at it indifferently he said, "Leave it there. It's no good to me—completely unnecessary!" Whenever this sort of situation arose, he spent more time than usual in his lonely room, and Mama seemed not to know what to do with herself. Every so often she looked in the window of Papa's study, and finally she said to me softly:

"Go take Peipei in there. Let Peipei play with him a while."

Seeing the sorrowful look in Mama's eyes sent shudders through my heart.

Once when Papa was in the kitchen cooking and Second Brother was attending a meeting at his work unit, Mama had me give Papa some help. I walked in the kitchen door and saw him in his muslin apron cutting bitter melons. For some reason he suddenly flung the vegetable knife clanging on the counter in a burst of irritation. The two bitter melons tumbled onto the floor. Without bothering to pick them up he narrowed his eyes and gazed through the small window at the faraway sky for quite some time, not moving in the slightest. The look in his eyes was really somewhat frightening—so lonely, so isolated. It was as if he were not somone who belonged to a loving family but a solitary man traipsing through a bleak desert, being tossed on raging sean or wandering in limitless black night!

After a moment he gave a long sigh, reached for the knife with lowered head, and tapped the dull edge lightly of the counter. In the drawn out tones of classical poetry recitation he said to himself:

"What a little man you are, Han Guanfang!"

This lament issued from the depths of his heart! The air of chilling misery it left in the little kitchen took a long time to disperse. I was shocked by his dejected expression.

"Papa, what did you say you are?"

He seemed startled, but in the blink of an eye he straightened his tall frame and the usual sternness came back to his face.

"What are you doing here?"

"Mama sent me."

"I don't need you."

I ran away in fright.

*

We had already grown accustomed to enjoying Papa's fine cooking during the past few years. Who would have thought that lately he would start being negligent of his duties! On a few occasions he waited until we had come home from work to throw down his People's Daily or the transcript of a leader's speech and start cooking. He was either in too much of a hurry to chop scallions or he forgot to add soy sauce. Sometimes he did not even buy vegetables, in which case he would scour up a few seeds or a head of cabbage from some dark corner of the kitchen, scrape them around in the pot for a minute and call it a meal. Anyone else who had done the same would have been duly reproached, but no one did this to Papa. For one thing. we did not feel right about Papa's having to cook in the first place and there was no way to stop him. And so, no matter what his cooking was like, we had to put up with it. Anothr thing was that Papa's temper had changed over the past er years. It would be too much to say that he was obstinate, but he did lose his temper sometimes for no good reason. Elder Brother was old enough to be respected. Second Brother had gone through a personal tragedy, and Peipei was the pearl in his palm: they could all get by without any trouble. I was the unlucky one who often became the object of his rebukes. Everyone knew about his pent-up frustration, so they did their best to keep from getting him angry. Even though we were quite displeased with the recent fare, we vented our complaints without his knowledge.

This Wednesday was Peipei's birthday—one of the happiest days of the year for Papa. We had expected to enjoy a delicious repast because of Peipei, but, unexpectedly, when the time came there was only yet another platterful of tasteless cabbage. This really took us aback. What was wrong with Papa?

*

On Saturday evening Papa asked Elder Brother: "Do you have anything planned for tomorrow?" According to Papa's accustomed usage, this "you" included Sister-in-law.

"I have to read two articles," Elder Brother said. "Meng-jia has had an experiment going for over two months. She hasn't had a chance to go back to the teacher's college, so she's going to take Peipei tomorrow to see his grandma and grandpa."

"Have Mengjia call them and say she'll go next week," Papa ordered without a moment's thought. Then he asked me:

"What about you?"

"It's not tomorrow yet. How should I know?" I answered.

"You stay home tomorrow." Papa then turned to Second Brother.

"Get up early tomorrow; we'll go to the market together."

Elder Brother and I exchanged delighted glances—at last Papa had taken pity on us and was going to boost our morale with a good meal!

Next morning when I went to get a basin of water from the kitchen, Papa and Second Brother had already returned from the market. On the floor were things not often seen in winter—lentils, leeks and tomatoes. Dried pressed shrimp, cuttlefish and yellow croakers were soaking in a basin. Pork was lying on the counter, while a bottle of brandy and three bottles of beer stood in the corner. There was an awful lot of food there! I went and asked Mama:

"What day is today? What's Papa making such a banquet for?"

Sister-in-law laughed:

"I just got done leafing through the calendar and the household register book. Today is neither a holiday nor the birthday of anyone in the family. Papa may feel that his prestige has slipped, so he's not sparing any cost to get it back."

Elder Brother lifted his head from his magazine and said laughingly:

"Wrong! Papa's not one to be so aware of his own failings." I hugged Mama and asked:

"Is today your and Papa's wedding anniversary?"

Mama pushed my arms aside with a smile.

"Nonsense. We don't have that custom in China."

Just then Peipei pulled a little toy car carrying his blue metal bucket into the room, rocking his head from side to side.

"I know! Papa must be making up for this little brown-nose's birthday celebration. Wasn't Wednesday Peipei's birthday?" Peipei shouted as he jumped into my arms:

"You're calling me names, stinky Auntie! I'm gonna tell Grandpa."

I placated him by diverting his attention:

"There are lots and lots of good things to eat in the kitchen. You go ask Grandpa if he is going to celebrate your birthday late."

In a moment Peipei came running back and said, "Grandpa said to ignore you. He says you are a blabber-mouth." I called into the kitchen:

"Second Brother! Second Brother! Come here!"

Second Brother came in shaking his dripping hands. The minute I saw his melancholy air, I knew I had called him for nothing. Sure enough he spoke as if I were not there:

"When you help Papa in the kitchen there is no need to think—just having a pair of hands is enough." On his way out he turned his head. "Go ahead and ask Mama."

"What do I know?" said Mama with a laugh. "Your Papa has never told me what goes on in his mind. He keeps the lid on so tight that he's like a pressure cooker."

But I discerned something ambiguous in Mama's smiling face. Shaking her shoulder, I said:

"You know. You must know!"

"Go help Second Brother wash the vegetables. Meng-jia, you two bring down that purple chest: I want to look for something."

Elder Brother and Sister-in-law went to get the chest. I went to the kitchen. Papa was cutting the cuttlefish. drawing his knife across it to make a dense pattern of angular slashes. It looked like he was making cuttlefish twists.

"You're going to a lot of bother," I said. "Wouldn't friing it in strips be just as good?"

Papa only stared at me. My tongue darted out of my mouth as I realized my mistake.

"All right, assign me a task!"

Papa had me clean the yellow croakers. Before long I had scraped off the scales, cut away the fins and gutted them.

"Did you pull out the vein next to the bone?"

According to Papa's theory the vein up against the spine must be cleaned away or the flavor will be too fishy. Not having learned this by experience, I naturally skipped this part of the job.

"What are you acting so lazy for? Out! Out!"

Second Brother threw a look my way; I scurried out in a fluster.

Mama's room was permeated with a thick smell of camphor so biting that I sneezed again and again. A heavy old-fashioned chest of hard wood was sitting in the middle of the floor, its lid slanting open. It was packed with old clothes which Papa and Mama had no use for but could not bring themselves to throw away. Bending over, Mama pulled out a flattened old red briefcase from among dresses she had grown out of long ago and Papa's old suits, then tossed it on the floor. To little Peipei, who had pressed against Mama for a better view, it was a treasure, and he lost no time in picking it up.

"Why are you back?" Sister-in-law asked.

"I was driven across the border," I said. "Don't laugh. Papa is not like himself today. Whenever he used to treat us to a nice meal, he may not have laughed, but the merriment showed around his eyes. Today Papa is holding his head like this. Like this!" I imitated Papa as I spoke. Elder Brother and Sister-in-law both laughed. Mama pulled out Papa's foreign-cut vest of worn leather and hung it on my arm, saying:

"Hurry up and air this, blabbermouth!"

In the courtyard I ran into my former classmate Chen Ying, who wanted me to go with her to a movie shown to a limited audience. That was great because I was just preparing to sneak away. When I ran back into the house to let Mama know, she did not approve, nor did Elder Brother and Sister-in-law.

"It's not the right mood for a banquet today anyway. When I get back I'll eat by myself: it will taste better that way."

"All right! If you want to leave, I'm going to tell Grandpa." Little Peipei tore off my scarf and ran towards the kitchen. In a moment Papa stood at the doorway.

"What's going on?"

"I said yesterday that I didn't know whether or not there would be something to do today."

"Watching a movie is nothing."

Judging from Papa's tone, there was no room for further discussion. I stared hard at Peipei, who was behind Papa's back laughing at me, that little rat!

*

Usually our family ate at two different tables. Sister-in-law and I ate at a small table with Peipei. Today, at Papa's instructions, we moved two tables with three drawers together to make a big one, just like at New Year's and other holidays.

To tell the truth, Papa had outdone himself on this meal. The dried pressed shrimp stir-fried with leeks had vividly contrasting colors to delight the eye. The cuttlefish twists looked like plump little hedgehogs with their quills up; just looking at them was enough to make me hungry. The yellow croakers simmered in tomato sauce and lentils stir-fried with meat strips were also excellent in color, aroma and flavor. The food was really great, but the pity was that no one knew what to make of Papa's intentions. Snow like heads on the beer rose with a fizz and overflowed onto the table, but nobody raised a glass for toast. Everyone seemed to be waiting for some sort of signal from Papa.

Papa sat at the head of the table smoking a cigarette and holding Peipei. His face was calm and composed: Perhaps he was satisfied with our silence. At last he stubbed out the cigarette and began to speak.

"I've been convalescing at home now for seven years, two months and three days. I've been a cook for exactly six years today."

Aha! So Papa was celebrating the sixth anniversary of his change in occupation. If he had only told us earlier we would not have gotten all worried about nothing and sat looking at the table covered with delicious-smelling food, too suspicious to get started. How silly! I took a sip of beer and my chopsticks moved towards a cuttlefish twist. Sister-in-law poked me, under the table. Her laughing eyes seemed to say: "Listen. Papa is making a speech before the toast."

I looked at Papa. Sure enough, he was looking right at me. His glance was not a rebuke: but it was definitely not meant to encourage my outstretched chopsticks. I quickly pulled my hand back.

"I can't bear to look back on those years. In my unit everyone was out to get everyone else. It was just like a cicada about to be pounced upon by a preying mantis. Behind the preying mantis was a sparrow, and behind the sparrow was a boy drawing a slingshot. Twenty years of study here and abroad taught me to save our country through science, to respect teachers and honor friends, and to be loyal and honest. Though this antiquated mentality of mine was modified quite a bit after liberation, I still could not appreciate the 'philosophy of struggle' that was popular at that time. Having tasted the bitterness of being the object of struggle, I did not have the good fortune of being able to stomach attacking other people. Thinking it over, I decided that the only thing to do was to stay at a respectful distance—to hide in the sheltered cove of home for comfort and and find solace in pots and bowls and ladles."

Ah! His words were enough to break a person's heart! No wonder Papa showed such great enthusiasm for cooking: it was a way of numbing himself. That enthusiasm had arisen from the ashes of his ideals. How painful this must have been for a high-level intellectual who aspired to making a contribution to his country. I suddenly remembered that scene in the kitchen when Papa had hit the counter with the knife and chanted:

"What a little man you are—Han Guanfang!"

How stupid I had been! For years I had been eating Papa's food without realizing that this misery which could not be told had been hidden deep in his heart.

"I am a political mediocrity. I was disheartened by everything then, and I thought there would be no way to contribute to this country in my lifetime—I threw more than seven years of my life away for nothing."

Papa sighed heavily, as if those dark, futilely spent years were before his eyes. His creased eyelids drooped as he painfully shook his grizzled head.

A family banquet that had begun depressingly became even more depressing. Mama, Elder Brother and Sister-in-law all had somewhat delicate nerves. Nowadays they were never willing to mention the psychic humiliations they had suffered in those years of senseless strife. Hearing Papa's words, they hung their heads dispiritedly as flashes of red and white went across their faces. Second Brother turned his face, and the sunlight caught the corner of his eyes, lighting large, crystal-like teardrops. Fondly devoted Second Brother—at thirty-five he still could not forget that subdued and delicate, yet unbending, young woman.

Peipei could not endure the depressing atmosphere bearing down upon him. He tugged lightly at Papa's sleeve. Papa took his little hand and grasped it lightly, meaning that he was not to interrupt.

"Now the focus of our country's work has turned to economic reconstruction. I'm embarrassed to say that I have no ability to fight the class struggle on an expanded scale; as for reconstruction, however, I like to think of myself as a seasoned veteran. I can be of use! I did not dare to say this before."

"Why?" I asked.

"Starting in 1957 Chairman Mao announced that large-scale class struggle had for the most part come to an end. He called upon us to do battle with the natural world and to develop our economy. For the past twenty years his summons has been interfered with from many sides. The crests of political movements have followed one after another, while surges of economic development have been few and far between. During the Cultural Revolu-tion, in particular, I was sure that I would live out the remainder of my years in the midst of political movements."

"Weren't you being a bit pessimistic?" laughed Sister-in-law.

"Maybe. I never expected then that there would be a Third Plenary Session of the Eleventh Central Committee of the Communist Party like this one! It signifies that we Chinese are going to open up a new era of prosperity and strength. I've been waiting decades for this. There is no question of what I should do."

Here Papa stopped, pulled open a drawer, pulled out ration books for non-staple foods, meat and grain, and put them down in front of Mama.

"From now on all of you will have more work to do. I'm quitting."

Papa's expression showed that he was in earnest. A flush of vitality shone again on the wrinkled face that for years had been lacking in liveliness.

Papa's grand gesture earned the applause of the whole family; even Second Brother expressed support with a controled smile. Only then did I understand why the whole family had be present at this dinner. Of course Papa resigned from his duties as cook in front of the whole family in order to impart an air of solemnity to the proceedings, but at the same time he was educating us too. Normally Papa seldom conversed with us, but this was definitely not the same as letting us do whatever we pleased. Through his actions he told us how we should study, work and live. With his words just then he had bared his soul, and he had made a new demand of us—from now on we were to march to the same drum as he.

Mama took the ration books, her eyes filling with tears, and laughed again. Pointing through the window at the leather vest hanging on the line, she said:

"Isn't that your battle dress?"

Papa looked out the window. He nodded, overcome with emotion, as if he had caught sight of an old friend not seen for years.

"Peipei, what about your grandpa's briefcase?" Mama asked.

Well, what do you know! Second Brother had kept a sharp eye on things after all—Mama really knew what was on Papa's mind and had already made preparations ahead of time for his reinstatement. The leather vest and briefcase were precious objects for Papa's work. In the winter Papa always wore the worn leather vest to work. He said that in the machine room he could conveniently slip out of his quilted jacket and into work clothes. And the red briefcase was something Papa never went anywhere without. When I first laid eyes on Papa twenty-four years ago at Maternity Hospital, I probably saw it too. Then it bulged tightly, but in the chest it had been pressed flat as a pancake.

Elder Brother asked cautiously, "Is your health good enough to take it? Your blood pressure is still high."

A somber shadow passed over Papa's face. He seemed unwilling to answer this question. After pondering it for a while, he said:

"As far as I know, a lot of the illnesse suffered by intellectuals in the past years have not stemmed from purely physical causes. As individuals they may have been as insignificant as blades of grass, but they took upon themselves the concerns of a whole nation. Furthermore they were not in a position to do anything. And so they got tense; anger burned inside them; weariness oppressed them; and they became confused and despondent. These psychic afflictions alone are enough to make a person ill.

"'Anxiety can injure' is no lie. The saying goes: 'An illness of the heart must be cured by medicine of the heart.' I'll entrust my health to my future work." As Papa said these things his mood was grave and even somewhat indignant. I was deeply moved. Papa then turned his head and looked probingly at Second Brother for a long time before speaking these carefully thought out words:

"What I said is applicable to you too. I think the best memorial to the dead is to shoulder their unfulfilled responsibilities.. You ought to accomplish something."

Second Brother lowered his head; his lips quivering, but he did not speak.

Actually this was unfair to Second Brother. For more than a year he had been annotating the poems in Du Mu's Collected Works of Fan Chuan and he had completed more than half. While cleaning up his room I had seen the crispy copied second draft.

Peipei popped his head through the crook of Papa's elbow and asked, "Won't you take care of the cooking at all any more, Grandpa?"

"No more," said Papa, stroking Peipei's face and leaning towards him. "If I did cook, I couldn't make it taste delicious any more.

I spoke up brazenly:

"There are still people now who agree with the current policies of the Central Committee of the Party. Whgat if things get turned around again?"

As Papa glanced at me, his expression clouded over. His withered, bony hands slid slowly off Peipei's shoulders and his eyes became vacant. He looked as if a sore spot in his heart had been struck again. The atmosphere in the room, which had just become exuberant, plummeted again like lead. I sensed Mama's and Elder Brother's reproachful looks. I felt terrible for saying it. I had killed Papa's enthusiasm.

Sister-in-law, ever the quick thinker, said merrily:

"This is the last meal Papa will ever make for us. This opportunity is not to be missed: eat it while it's hot!" She stood up and placed food on Papa's and Mama's little plates. Papa lifted his wine glass and spoke with slow assurance:

"Those who gain the people's hearts will gain the country; those who lose the people's hearts will lose the country. So it has always been. The Party Central Committee's present course of working at the four modernizations and trying hard to upgrade the people's standard of living has won the hearts of the people and of Party members, and no one can bend their allegiance!"

I had never thought that Papa had such clear awareness of these things! Sister-in-law said with a laugh:

"A little while ago Papa said that he is a political mediocrity, but now he shows his firm political opinions. Maybe Papa was being humble just now, or maybe he was suddenly anointed from above and became enlightened." Everyone laughed and Papa laughed along, saying:

"It definitely wasn't all of a sudden."

Thinking about what Papa said, I realized for a fact that it had not been all of a sudden. That he carefully studied the communique of the Third Plenary Session of Eleventh Central Committee of the Communist Party, the People's Daily, Reference News and the speeches of leading cadres goes without saying, but the enthusiasm which gradually ignited in his heart some time ago was shown in little things which I previously overlooked. In the past Papa retired to his room after dinner, but recently he would stay on the sofa listening to us chat. Mama talked about English parties at school; Elder Brother and Sister-in-law talked about new scientific research projects at the institute; I talked about enlightened production techniques at the factory; and sometimes we talked of exciting news we had heard by word of mouth—Papa was interested in all of this. He sat smoking and quietly listening; he never broke into the conversation. From the amazement that occasionally flashed in his eyes I am now sure that he sensed the genuine vitality in the air as the whole country buckled down to the four moderniza-tions! Last Sunday, the new secretary of the Party committee at his factory and the factory manager came to visit him, accompanied by a few "Petofi Club" members who had just been cleared of all blame. Perhaps this is what spurred his resolution to change. They talked very amiably for an entire half day. I changed the tea leaves in the teapot three times, and the cigarette smoke was so thick that it made me cough. That day was the first time in years that I had heard Papa laugh heartily. I exclaimed:

"No wonder! These few days Papa has been guzzling oil of anointment himself, while he makes us eat. nothing but cabbages." Everyone laughed. Little Peipei shouted:

"Auntie and Mama are talking bad about Grandpa again. That's not allowed!"

"Now Grandpa will leave you at home and forget about you," I kidded him. Peipei set up a ruckus and held tightly to Papa's arm. Papa hugged him around the shoulders and whispered:

"You come sleep in Grandpa's and Grandma's room. No matter how late Grandpa comes home, he can see you, all right?"

Little Peipei's disturbance loosened things up completely. Elder Brother raised his glass and, facing Second Brother, said:

"Now, to this epoch-making change in our country and to the opportunity that we intellectuals have to do something for our country …"

Second Brother unabashedly raised his glass towards Papa.

Peipei knelt on a chair, lifted his plastic bowl brimming with orange juice, and pushed it towards where the glasses were meeting in midair. The glasses made clinking, sounds. What nice-sounding music!

The next day Papa—the chief engineer of Swallow Hill Chemical Products Factory—assumed his office.

79.126 Are You A Communist Party Member\fn{by Zhang Lin (1939-)} Faku County, Liaoning Province, China (M) 9

Liu Dashan, Director of the Northern Railway Bureau, will be sixty in two years, and will then be joining the rank of the old. To him, his past life has been marked by numerous twists and turns; all very complicated indeed, and yet he also feels that essentially it has been a simple life.

In his early years, when he was not even as tall as the small carbine he firmly held in his hands, he took part in the guerilla war against the Japanese, together with a group of sturdy and strong young men. That war over, almost immediately he found himself fighting against the Kuomintang. On a rainy night, when the Liaoxi-Shenyang battle was about to begin and the army was getting ready to leave for the South, the regiment commander summoned Liu to the headquarters and told him that he was to remain with the divisional commander and that his job from now on was to look after the railways. Upon hearing this, tears came to his eyes as he was holding his rifle in his hands. The whole night he wept, and his tears came faster than the rain outside. He obstinately demanded that he should be marching south with the regiment. His tears moved his comrades-in-arms, who went to appeal to the regiment commander on his behalf. But they were reprimanded and came back in silence.

Early the next morning, the divisional commander came to their barracks. He shouted as soon as he entered the room:

"Who is Liu Dashan?"

Liu stood up sulkily.

The divisional commander shrugged his shoulders under his overcoat and walked towards him. He shook his broad and black eyebrows and bawled:

"Weeping like a young wife! Are you a Communist Party member?"

Then he left.

Liu Dashan was dumbfounded, his ears filled with the echoes of the roar of the divisional commander. Finally, he stealthily kissed his rifle, handed it over to another soldier, and stayed behind with the divisional commander to look after the railway tracks. Gradually he developed a fondness for iron rails, as if he could feel the warmth of the icy cold tracks, as if he could hear a heart throbbing therein. The former divisional commander, caretaker director of the railways, passed away many years ago. Liu, however, still frequeptly thought about him, that very hot-tempered old man.

Liu Dashan was born in the Jiaodong district of Shandong Province. His father was a farmer; so, too, his grand-father and his ancestors. In appearance, he was a typical tall and sturdy man from Shandong, with a large nose, a wide mouth and a head of thick, bristly black hair. At one time, he wanted to have a more stylish hair-cut, but his hair was too wiry and it could not be pressed down. So he had to be content with a crew-cut, and let his hair stand erect like the bristles of a shoe brush. Appropriately, however, the stiff hair signified his strong character. Totally uncompromising, he would never desert his principles. During the ten years of the "cultural revolution," he refused to bend to the political opportunists' will and, naturally, had to suffer on account of his "stubbornness." That nightmare over, after the implementation of the Party's policy, he was given a very high post which did not involve much work. He did not like it and said that it was worse than the job of digging graves. It was only very recently that he had been reappointed Director of the Railway Bureau.

Though young, the secretaries of the Railway Bureau were all smart and knew very well the ways of the world. But they did not know much about Liu Dashan. From what they heard, he liked to swear. He would swear when he was angry, and swear when he was in a good mood—there was a difference in tone of course.

Before his arrival, the secretaries had rearranged everything in the office for him. There was a desk bigger than a double bed with legs shaped like those of a tiger. On the desk were three telephones. The walls had been painted cream yellow, which, scientifically speaking, was a warm color, and it was supposed to help create a genial atmosphere for the irritable director. However, the director stayed in this "warm nest" only one day. The next morning he summoned Secretary Zhou Feng to his office and said:

"Let's move out! We'll use that room near the railway station."

The secretaries were busy again for a whole morning. The work of changing the office room was finally done and they were all exhausted. The new office was a smaller room overlooking the station. The walls were not painted. Through the wide window, which looked rather like a big TV screen, one could see clearly everything that was going on in the station. The voices of the dispatchers, the cries of the loaders, the shouts of the inspectors and, above all, the loud whistles of the locomotives—all these combined to pierce the air. Now Director Liu felt comfortable and relaxed as if he had drunk some good wine or was listening to some soothing music. Sitting in his chair facing the window, and grinning from ear to ear, he exclaimed:

"Good! That's how it should be!"

It was not difficult for the secretaries to find out more about their new director. Before long, they succeeded in digging out some particulars about his past, among which two incidents were of particular importance.

Incident No.1:

In the extremely cold winter days of 1965, the railway lines in the area were all covered with snow and the switches were not working properly. The trains, when ascending the slopes, soon got stuck. In that terrible weather, there was once a serious accident, but at the time the director of the Longhe branch bureau was not in his office. He was fast asleep at home. When Liu heard about this, he was livid with rage, and at six o'clock that evening when the shifts changed, he rang up the director. As soon as he answered, Liu cleared his throat, frowned and started swearing at him:

"Damn you! Our men are out there day and night in the wind and snow, but you, as soon as the shift was over, hurried off and back home after drinking two ounces of your damned smelly wine, snuggled down in bed under your wife's quilt. Are you a Party member? From now on, all branch bureau directors will be on night duty. I'll call the roll by telephone at twelve o'clock every night. If you're tired, you can sleep with the tracks! No one is allowed to go home!"

So the directors of the branch bureaus were at their posts, there were no more accidents and things ran smoothly.

Incident No.2:

In 1964, many workers grumbled that the hospital of the Railway Bureau was in a state of disorder. The medical services were very poor and the staff didn't care very much about their patients. Two patients had died because of a wrong diagnosis. One of the doctors even examined his patient without even using the stethoscope. When Liu heard about these reports, he did not swear; instead, he bit his lip. One night, several days later, he suddenly complained of a stomachache. He did not take a car or allow anyone to accompany him to the hospital. He walked slowly to the emergency ward. The doctor on duty was of course sleeping soundly, his mouth foaming. Liu called him several times. The doctor opened his heavy eyes, closed them again, and began to inquire what his trouble was. Then, showing signs of impatience, he told Liu to lie down on the bed, casually examined his abdomen, yawned, and concluded that the patient had appendicitis and should have an emergency operation. Liu jumped up on the bed, glaring at him, and shouted:

"Damn you! You and your appendicitis! What kind of doctor are you? You are a disgrace to your white overcoat!"

The doctor instantly woke up and, rather confused, stared at the unusual patient.

"You?"

"Yes, I'm Liu Dashan. I have come especially to call on you today, my dear doctor!"

The doctor's face turned pale, and his shoulders slumped. Liu jumped down from the bed, buttoning up his clothes.

"Go and ring the administrator and ask him to come here!"

After a while, the administrator arrived in a car. He did not know what had happened because the nervous doctor had not told him anything. When he pushed open the door, he found the Director of the Railway Bureau standing before him in a rage.

"Are you a Communist Party member?" Liu asked him in a mild tone.

The administrator nodded his head, not knowing why Liu was asking such a question. Liu frowned and said coldly:

"You say you are a Communist Party member, but I think you look more like a member of the Kuomintang!"

There could have been some minor inaccurate details as reported in the above accounts. Exaggerations were inevitable as the stories circulated among the railway workers. It was also known that Liu had been told off by the authorities that his rudeness and his partiality for swearing were the habits of guerilla fighters. Liu accepted this criticism and expressed his determination to get rid of these undesirable habits.

But not more than a week later, he was cursing and swearing again. He felt that he could express himself more forcibly by using such language, just as some writers were fond of using exclamation marks! When the "cultural revolution" began, he was one of the first persons to have a large board hung round his neck, as a sign of public disgrace. His "crimes," as listed, were numerous; even that slight remark of his about a Communist Party member behaving more like a member of the Kuomintang was enough to make him suffer hell on earth. When he was publicly criticized for this very crime, the hospital administrator jumped up on the platform and testified on his behalf that he did not mean that as an insult to the Party and that his criticism of the hospital was very fair indeed. But then, as a result of his defence, the administrator was condemned as a "royalist" and he, too, had a board hung on him. Liu Dashan was very appreciative of his integrity and bawled at the so-called revolutionists:

"Damn you lot! This is utter nonsense!"

Of course, what happened after that could be easily imagined.

All these were things of the past. Liu Dashan had become a legendary hero and his numerous anecdotes were well known in the Railway Bureau.

*

Liu also had the habit of dropping in each day on the various departments and offices of the Bureau to see how the workers were getting on. As he saw it, the railways were the main arteries of a country, and they'd better be functioning well. So, too, the bureau that looked after them. The bureau should not slack off in attending to all its duties.

One afternoon at four o'clock, after inspecting the transportation and finance departments, Liu came to the typing room. He did not come here often. When he entered the room, he saw a typist, more than forty years old, trying on a light blue embroidered woollen coat. She took a long time in trying it on, her eyes gleaming with excitement. Another girl, about twenty years old, clapped her hands lightly in admiration. Liu felt very awkward, but he did not shout or swear, for he knew that if he did, they would be very upset. He usually tried to control himself in front of women. He was thinking of saying, "If you must try that on, please do it at home. The office is not a place for this sort of thing." He also intended to speak gently.

But before he could open his mouth to say anything, the two typists had already noticed his presence. The younger one stuck out her tongue, and they both sat down hurriedly at their typewriters and began to work as if nothing had happened. Liu left the room without saying anything. He thought to himself: a woman of her age still wearing light blue colored clothes embroidered with cream yellow flowers? Was that really appropriate? People said she was an old maid and, in her younger days, had tried to find herself a handsome young man. Surely, such a man existed only in her dreams, for God had not yet created him! Now that she was already over forty, of course she realized she couldn't be so choosy in her search for a partner. She only wished to have a cadre, even an elderly one, for husband.

Liu was a little preoccupied with these thoughts, as he went to the secretariat. There was no one there, however. He was told that the transportation department had managed to get some fresh fish and that the whole staff had gone there to have a share each. Liu felt his anger mounting. He thought: How irresponsible! Leaving their work at the smell of some fish! I'll sit here and see when they will return! He sat on a chair, and looked at a picture under the thick glass on the desk. It was the picture of a pretty girl, looking like a ballet dancer. It was probably cut out from a pictorial magazine. Then he saw a letter on the desk, addressed to "Director Liu Dashan." He opened it and read it at once. And he was mad with anger.

"Damn it!" he swore as he read the letter. It was a letter, giving him all the details of a train collision that had happened at the Baita Railway Station the previous month. It exposed how the Baita Railway Station and the Beicang Branch Bureau, had together tried to deceive the authorities by describing a major accident as a minor one, in their report. Liu had already dealt with this accident, as he had been led to believe that it was something ordinary. But, according to the letter, it was a major accident indeed! He banged his fist on the desk, and the ink bottles were jumping.

"Damn it!" he yelled. "You've played a dirty trick on me! I have been totally deceived! If what this letter says is true, just you watch out!"

Then he wondered if the letter was giving a false accusation. After all, since the "cultural revolution," false accusations had been quite common. He read the letter again to see whether or not it was signed. If there was a signature and address, it was at least eighty or ninety per cent true.

Yes, the letter was signed:

"Lü Jiucai, a pointsman at the Baita Railway Station."

Liu licked his lips and exclaimed, "Good! He has the guts to put down his name and address. He's a man!"

There was the clatter of heels in the corridor, rather like that of girls. Secretary Zhou Feng came in joyfully holding in his hand several fat fish on several strings; the tail of one of them was still wriggling. Zhou Feng produced the best of the lot and said:

"Director Liu, these are yours."

Liu Dashan kept a straight face and asked, "Where on earth did you get these?"

Zhou Feng did not reply, but smiled awkwardly.

Liu's face twitched, the corners of his mouth also quivering:

"I've caught quite a big fish too, and, in addition, some small ones." He waved the letter in his hand.

Zhou Feng was somewhat taken by surprise and he nearly dropped the fish.

"When did this letter arrive?" asked Liu.

" ……………."\fn{So the text.}

"Tell me the truth!"

Zhou Feng looked at Liu and felt that it would not do him any good to tell a lie. So, he answered:

"Three days."

"Why didn't you pass it on to me immediately?"

"Bai Fan, the Chief of the Beicang Branch Bureau, telephoned me to say that a worker there was making a fuss about the whole matter. I thought that since you were in detention for two years together with Bai during the "cultural revolution," you'd be embarrassed if I gave you this letter."

Liu blinked his eyes. "Did Bai Fan know about this letter?"

Zhou Feng looked timidly at Liu and nodded. "Yes. He telephoned to say that the branch bureau would soon be given a red banner for winning the competition. But if this leaked out …"

Liu Dashan's facial expression changed again. He was biting his lip, breathing heavily through his nose.

"Humph! You couldn't care less about principles when people flatter you and give you presents. I see, you have been an excellent secretary! How long have you been in this dirty business?"

He was walking about, absolutely furious. The trains were whistling outside. A train-load of wood had just left the station. Suddenly, he walked towards the secretary and asked him:

"Have you seen the film Lenin in 1918? Rememeber that captain of the guard at the Kremlin? He was truly a fine fellow, a man of iron! The capitalists offered him pots of money. Did he waver? Wouldn't you waver if so much money were given to you?" He yelled so loudly that he did not notice the door had been stealthily pushed open and then closed again by someone.

The secretary stood there petrified unable to utter a word. He had seen the picture, but he had never thought about what he would do if he were the captain of the guard.

Liu paced the room. Then he suddenly picked up the telephone receiver and said, "Hello. Is that the Party school? This is Liu Dashan. I want to recommend a student to you." A somewhat husky voice replied:

"Our classes began a week ago."

"That doesn't matter. His name is Zhou Feng." Liu put down the receiver, blinked and said:

"Listen, my handsome young fellow, you can go to the Party school tomorrow to register. Knock some sense into that head of yours, will you? Go and see Lenin in 1918 a few more times."

Zhou Feng nodded and picked up the fish again. He was about to say something, when Liu shook his head:

"Send them back to where they came from! I've already caught my big white fish."\fn{ A note reads: "Big white fish" refers to the Branch Bureau Chief, Bai Fan; the character bai means "white.".}

Zhou Feng's white face was sweating. He thought, "Oh shit! When there are so many people in the world, why did I have to come up against him?"

*

That afternoon, Liu called a meeting and organized a special investigation group which included the chief of the transportation section, the chief of the technical section and, of course, the chief of the discipline inspection section. They were to proceed to the Baita Railway Station. Before they started, Liu called them to his office and warned them:

"You are all Communist Party members … Good! When you are at the Baita Railway Station, don't drink. Whoever invites you to a meal, refuse. Keep your mouths shut. If you accept sqmebody's hospitality, you will find it difficult to say anything against him later. Make sure you won't be bribed. If you really want a drink, I'll treat you when you come back."

They set off that afternoon on a freight train, because there was no passenger train available. Two days later, they returned and went straight to Liu's office. He was at a meeting. After a while, he came back, his face flushed. The meeting was not yet over, in fact, and there were probably some very heated. discussions going on. He left because he heard that the investigation group was back. They reported to him in detail all that they had learned. The statements made by the pointsman were true. The group had questioned the workers and examined the scene of the accident and the damaged trains. The accident was truly a major one. While there, somebody did try to invite them to dine at his home. That man was none other than the station-master, a smart fellow and a lively and persuasive talker. His words were like the grapes of Turpan, much sweeter than any produced elsewhere. Of course, the members of the group did not accept the invitation. The report on the accident was written by this very man, who had also made a verbal report by telephone to Bai, giving his reasons for what he had written. He then received the following praise from Bai:

"You've got a good head on your shoulders!"

"Damn them! These people always mess up everything!" Liu exploded after listening to the report. Suddenly he stood up, stroked his bristly hair and said, "Get me through to the Baita Station and ask Lü Jiucai to come here at once. Dismiss that smart-ass, the station-master, and appoint an honest man for his job!"

Everyone left except Liu. He closed his eyes, listening to the whistle of the trains. He thought: How shall I deal with this big white fish? Yes, I was demobilized and transferred to work on the railways with him, and we were in detention, through no faults of our own, for two years together. There we talked endlessly and it appeared as if we had talked about all the problems in the world: We said that the earth was round. I said that it was a place filled with all sorts of problems. Wasn't that so? Some questions we could answer, but most of them we could not.. When we were unable to answer a question, we felt miserable. Gradually we started to drink. We used to ask that sissy young man, who was supposed to be keeping an eye on us, to get us some wine without being noticed. The wine cost us one yuan a catty and so we called it "the yuan spirit." We often drank from the bottle when we could not get to sleep at night. After having some wine to warm our stomachs, we would talk passionately about this and that. Sometimes, Bai drank so much that his face became as red as a lobster. He would half close his eyes and sigh repeatedly:

"Ai, ai! Old Liu, when we do get out of here, will you still work on the railways? I've had enough of it. I've worked on the railways for twenty years, and all I've got to show for it is this!"

Liu would then gulp down another mouthful, smacking his lips, and move nearer to Bai, confiding:

"I can't leave these tracks any more than I can leave my wife. Tell me, Old Bai, do you ever think of your wife?"

Bai's eyes would redden, and he would ask in reply, "Do you?"

"And how I do! How can a man not think of his wife!"

Then, they stopped talking; the wine was all drunk and they fell silent, in deep thought. After a while, several rats appeared and ran along the foot of the wall. Then their squeakings were heard. Liu thought, "Those squeaks probably come from baby rats, looking for their mother. That's their world. But isn't that the same in our world? There are men and there are rats. There are good men and also bad men. There may be more good men than bad men. But wouldn't it be better to have still more good men?"

After their release from confinement, they also frequently met and drank together. They used to drink straight from the bottle. They were not accustomed to the use of fine wine glasses. Although it was proper to drink from these glasses, it was not mouth-filling. Later, Liu's wife admonished him that drinking from the bottle was the way of the American soldiers. So they used white porcelain jars on their drinking sessions. Sometimes, when Bai had drunk a good deal, he would unbutton his clothes and show the scars on his body, the marks of the beatings he had received from the so-called revolutionists. But Liu refrained from showing his, saying with a flushed face:

"Why bother? They only reveal the dreadful past!"

An ear-piercing whistle brought him back to the present. Liu stood up, and walked towards the window. The railway station lay before him; it was a key railway transportation station. Several hundred trains arrived and departed daily, but all its installations were old, looking somewhat like present-day people dressed in the clothes of the Qing Dynasty. The dense smoke from the stream locomotives rose, blackening half of the sky. Some of the engines were from the days of the anti-Japanese war. He muttered to himself:

"Oh, so backward! China's backwardness is the shame of us Communist Party members. There are men who tell lies openly, and there are also those who listen happily to those lies and believe in them. What is evidently false\fn{I.e., false because of evidence to the contrary.} is taken seriously as if it were true. Damn them! A branch bureau chief has cheated his subordinates and fooled his superiors. What will the men think of us? The Party's prestige is already low and it will suffer even more if things continue like this. People will lose all their faith in us. This is the greatest shame for Communist Party members! Bai, I've caught you today and I won't let you get away with it. I'll have to deal with you, and announce it in the bureau bulletin."

He picked up the telephone receiver and rang up Bai.

"Hello, I want to speak to Bai Fan. Old Bai? You can change your job! … What new job are you after? … Go and be an actor! … You're laughing? What a good actor you are! You can turn lies into truth! Damn you! I was nearly taken in by you! Where did you learn such tricks? You've lied to the bureau over the Baita Station accident. One Communist Party member cheating another! … I've investigated the whole matter thoroughly. I heard you wanted to give Lü Jiucai trouble. Damn you! You just try it! But I'm on his side. Your little glib-tongued station-master must be dismissed, and you also will have to face punishment!"

Bai's arguing and pleading could be heard over the telephone. Liu threw the receiver down on the table, walked round the room, and picked it up again.

"Listen Old Bai, are you still a Communist Party member? Wait till you see the consequences!"

Then, he banged down the receiver.

A meeting of the bureau Party committee was held that evening, and a decision was reached regarding the penalty to be imposed on the Beicang Branch Bureau for not giving the real facts of the accident. Someone felt that the penalty was too severe and that it might affect the present emphasis of our unity and stability, but Liu looked grim and held on to his opinion. He said, penalty and unity and stability were two different matters; they should be considered separately. In order to maintain discipline, a serious warning was to be given to Bai Fan and recorded in his file. The chief of the safety supervisory office of the Beicang Branch Bureau was to be dismissed, as was the station-master of the Baita Railway Station. Furthermore, a reward of fifty yuan was to be given to Lü Jiucai. The above measures were to be published in the bureau bulletin the following day.

After the meeting Liu felt tired. His back ached. He returned to his office, pummelling his back. He had only just sat down when a stranger wearing a railway worker's uniform came in. He took off his cap, showing his white hair and he had a wrinkled face. Holding the cap in his hand, he walked towards Liu and said:

"I want to see Director Liu."

"Here I am. Please take a seat." Liu pointed to the chair opposite him. The old man, however, did not sit down.

"My name is Lü Jiucai, I am the pointsman of the Baita Railway Station," the old worker said slowly and softly.

Liu slowly stood up, looked tenderly at the old worker and asked in a low voice, "Are you a Communist Party member?"

"Yes, I joined the Party in 1950."

"Me too. I joined the Party in 1942."

The two men remained silent. They felt that words were unnecessary; it was just right to be silent. The power of language was limited, but the power of sentiment was boundless. The two men looked at each other, each finding in the opposite's face the honest eyes of a Communist Party member. Suddenly Liu embraced the old worker, and, with tears in his eyes, said:

"Old comrade, you are really good." Then, controlling himself, he asked, "How old are you now?"

"Fifty-nine years and four months."

"You are older than me by one year. You're my elder brother, my elder brother!" Liu exclaimed joyfully. He gazed at the old worker, at his gray hair and the many wrinkles on his face, and said sadly, "What a pity! If only you were ten, even five years younger! How do we need honest men like you in so many places!"

The old worker shook his head. His lips trembled slightly.

"Don't wish me any younger, that's impossible; but try to help the younger men to mature faster than they can. It's up to you!"

Liu nodded his head in approval. The old worker continued:

"I'll retire next year. I've been working on the railway switches for thirty-two years. I know how many pebbles there are in the switch-room. I really hate to leave …"

Liu's mind was in a turmoil. He wanted to pay respect to this old Party member. Embracing him again, Liu said, "You rest here in our hostel tonight and go back tomorrow." After saying this, he took up the telephone.

"Hello, is that the hostel? This is Liu Dashan speaking. We have a guest who will be staying here tonight. Prepare dinner for him … What? What rank of cadre is he? Wait a minute."

Liu smiled, covered the mouthpiece with his hand and winked at Lü Jiucai. "They're asking what rank you are."

"I am only a worker," said Lü.

Liu again spoke into the telephone:

"What rank? He's my superior!"

*

At ten o'clock that night, Liu Dashan walked back home with an empty stomach. His wife had already warmed the wine for him. Although Liu was tired out he looked relaxed and he grinned at his old wife.

Liu fell in love with a peasant girl many years ago when his army unit was stationed in a village. But his unit commander, on learning this, cautioned him that they were fighting a war and that it was not the right time to consider having a wife. That must wait until the war was over. Though Liu had to leave, he left his heart behind. After he was demobilized and transferred to work on the railways, he went again, in 1950, to that village to look for the girl. The villagers told him that she was already married and about to give birth to a child. On hearing this news, he left the village like a wounded animal. Finally, he pulled himself together and took a train to his native village in Jiaodong, where he married a girl who was now his old mate. Although she was not as pretty as the girl of his first love, she was simple, honest and very considerate. His love for her grew and he knew that he could never leave her.

Liu drank his wine; his wife was beside him. She had something to say to him today, but she would wait until he had drunk so much that his face was red and his eyes beamed with smile. About half an hour later, she looked at his face and began:

"You've done it again. The same old mistake."

"What mistake?" Liu asked, holding his wine jug before his mouth.

"What mistake? Your bad temper. Why did you penalize Old Bai?"

Liu stared at his wife, banged his wine jug on the table and declared, "Women should keep themselves out of politics! When women interfere in politics, they're bound to mess up everything!"

His wife knew that he was in a comparatively better mood after drinking, so she continued:

"Don't forget the lessons of the 'cultural revolution.'"

Liu raised his voice and said slowly as if singing:

"We cannot allow bad people to do as they like even if there is another 'cultural revolution.' I'll give up only when I die."

"No! You must help Old Bai and do something about his penalty."

Liu raised his eyebrows and said grimly, "I'll do nothing! It was I who proposed his penalty to the Party committee!"

"Then—" His wife was not going to give up. Liu pushed the wine jug away from him. He would not drink any more. "If you say one more word, damn it, I'll divorce you!"

Unable to bear it any longer, his wife retired to the inner room to weep. Liu sat still for a while, thinking: "Shit! The guerilla habit has got me again!" Then, he went inside and lovingly embraced his wife.

"I'm sorry I lost my temper. I wouldn't part with you for all the young girls in the world! You are my dearest treasure!"

His wife looked hurriedly at the door, and said reproachfully:

"Let go. What if our granddaughter should see us!"

Several timid knocks were heard, so Liu went outside with his wife and opened the gate. A young man entered, his head down. He was about thirty years old. Quite lean, he had a small white face and was carrying a large bag.

"Whom are you looking for?" Liu asked.

The young man did not answer. Suddenly he covered up his face and began to cry bitterly. This made Liu feel very uncomfortable. He gave the young man a chair and asked:

"What's the matter? Come on, tell me."

"I was the station-master of the Baita Railway Station … but now I am no longer … I've made a mistake …" He sobbed still more, as if his parents had just passed away. Although Liu was a man of experience, he was rather taken aback by this peculiar scene. He walked round the young man, studying him from different angles. Suddenly he stopped before him.

"You bastard! Are you crying because you've lost your job? Or are you sorry for your mistakes? Don't put on an act! Will crying help you get your job back? Don't think I'm a merciful-faced Buddha!"

The young man's shoulders heaved for a while and then he stopped crying. Liu couldn't help laughing. He thought to hirmself: what an actor! How many good actors had been trained these past ten years!

The young man moved his hands away from his face. There were no tears on it, though it was quite flushed. He darted a brief glance at Liu and then pursed his lips in disapproval.

"Director Liu," he cautioned, "if you go on like this …"

"What will happen? Tell me."

The young man shook his head and sighed as if he pitied Liu.

Liu began to laugh. He stroked his hair.

"So you think the sky's going to come crashing down just because I';ve kicked you out! You're not very old, but you're a tricky customer. You began by flattering me; when that failed, you resorted to tears, then threats. Damn you! Are you a Party member?"

The young man looked up and met the furious gaze of Liu. Then he timidly bent his head again.

"Go on, try to be an honest man! Don't give me this nonsense any more. I'm sick of it!"

The young man had prepared some other "moves," but as soon as he put them forward, they were dismissed by this big Shandong man. He left, finally, and when he was far away from the house, he took out two bottles of wine and several cakes from his bag and hurled them away, swearing, "Let the blasted dogs eat them!" Soon, the aroma of strong sweet wine filled the night air.

*

When the penalty was published in the bureau bulletin, it seemed that a minor earthquake had occurred all along the tracks. Some people were awakened from their deep slumber, and one man seemed to have been struck by lightning. Bai Fan collapsed with a coronary heart disease that very day. When Liu heard of this news, he thought: was he faking illness because he was ashamed, or because he felt he had been wronged? How many incidents of this kind had occurred in our society these last few years? People had the tendency of falling ill, in order to prove they had been overworked!

Liu decided to visit Bai that night to see for himself how he was getting on. Most people would avoid such a confrontation, but not Liu.

At night, the stars and the moon were in the sky. There were not many people on the road. A few pairs of young men and women were heading for the woods not too far away.

Liu reached a newly-completed apartment block. He went to the first flbor and walked straight into a room without knocking at the door. There he found Bai lying in bed, with several pillows placed under his head. On the bedside table were many bottles of medicine, including some imported Japanese and German ones. The seriousness of his illness was quite evident. When Bai Fan saw Liu he tried to lift his body towards the wall and he closed his eyes. Then, the door leading to the inner room opened. Lingling, a pretty young girl stuck her head out. On seeing Liu, she shut the door again with a bang. Liu stood there, thinking, “Such haughty airs!” Then he took a chair and sat down.

On the table he saw a photo of a pretty woman. She was Bai’s wife, who died two years ago. When she was still a girl, she was a well-known beauty. Bai Fan was originally named Bai Erzhu. In wooing this girl Bai changed his original name to Bai Fan, in order to give it a somewhat romantic air. Liu Dashan objected to the change at that time. Bai Fan asked for the help of a university student to draft his letter to the girl. The letter began with the words “My dear,” so that the girl thought that Bai had been to Europe for study. She disliked the words “My dear” very much. Because of these unlucky words, she prolonged her period of examination of Bai Fan by three months. Now this beauty had vanished from this world, and could only look at her home with sorrowful eyes as if saying to Bai Fan and her daughter Lingling, “Without me, how can you go on living?”

Liu sat for quite a long while. Bai did not move. Liu looked at the door, coughed and called, “Lingling, we have a guest here. Can you bring in some tea?”

There was still no response from the inner room. Liu raised his voice and called again, “Lingling, have you also got coronary heart disease?”

Nothing stirred in the inner room. Suddenly, Bai turned round and called loudly: “Lingling, this is something between grown-ups. Keep out of it and bring in some tea!” His voice was very stern. Then he turned his back again and closed his eyes.

Lingling appeared, pouting. She poured out a cup of water and placed it before Liu. He noticed she had tears in her eyes.

“Uncle Liu,” she said, wiping the tears from her face. “You treat my father like this. If he dies, what shall I do?”

Liu stroked her head and said very much moved, “No, he won’t die.” Then he added, “If he dies, I’ll be a father to you.”

Lingling smiled. Liu moved his chair nearer the bed and said to Bai, “Damn it! You should at least speak to me.” Bai moved a little, but he did not turn his face. Liu continued:

“You’re suffering, I know. But do you think I’m so happy? When Lingling wept, I also felt very bad! But what, can we do? Give up our ideals and principles? Quit the Party? You know more than I do. Come. Let’s have a drink.”

“Drink?” Bai turned to face Liu and asked, “For friendship? For our two years in detention? For your penalizing me?”

Liu did riot answer. After a while, he said, “Damn it! Why are you so stubborn?” He opened the cupboard, took out a porcelain jar and a bottle of erguotou.\fn{A note reads: A strong spirit usually made from sorghum.} He removed the cork and poured out half a jar of wine. Then he picked it up and toasted:

“To our friendship!”

Liu drank a large mouthful and pushed the jar towards Bai, who did not move. Liu again toasted:

“To the end of the steam locomotives and to automatic switching!” He gulped another big swig and again offered Bai the jar. Bai still refused to pay any attention. Liu then took up the jar for the third time and declared:

“To both of us, members of the Communist Party and to my recommendation, quite rightly I hope, of you for membership of the Party!” He drank and held out the jar to Bai.

This time, Bai rose his face all red, his hands trembling, as he took the jar and slowly drank the wine.

Liu stood up, took his leave and went out. He did not hear anyone follow him. He left and, after going some distance, turned round and saw Bai, supported by Lingling, standing outside the door looking in his direction. Liu again felt touched.

"Ah! So he's not a log of rotten wood."

The night deepened. Liu felt that there was something on his mind as he was walking home. A pair of lovers went past him, the girl with her head on the young man's shoulder; neither of them was saying a word. Liu did not give them another look. He was reminiscing about his past life. He saw in his mind's eye the land of Jiaodong, red dates and the faces of his dying fellow fighters. He saw the face of the old divisional commander and heard his roar:

"Are you a Communist Party member?"

He felt that he must answer this question properly, as should Bai and every one who had joined the Communist Party.

81.89 Train 257\fn{by Ching Mu aka Ching-p'ing aka Thunder, Wild, Armor, Light-blue (1939-)} Kueichou Province, China 5

Another sunset. More than one thousand suns had set since Chang Gin-yi's hopes vanished like the sun at evening into the deep dark sea. Gone were the thousand dismal, fine, windy, misty, cold, warm suns, yet they were only daily burdens to him:

Moving like a dinosaur, train 257 crawled away from Lou-Tong station toward the far distance, belching heavy smoke. Chang Gin-yi felt that the hope of his father's return was crushed under the wheels. He looked to the horizon and saw the sunset, and tears came to his eyes. As the evening grew it seemed the wind blew his tiny, lonely, shadow away and darkness swallowed him. His thoughts were far away.

He remembered the words of his father whispered into his ears long ago:

"If I become rich, I'll be back by train 257." He couldn't help sighing,

"Oh! Pa, the train has come and gone over a thousand times, but you didn't show up, you must have forgotten us."

His feet, taking short lonely steps on the streets of the old town of Lou-tung were heavy as if walking on quicksand, and seemed too frail to bear his burden of sorrow and yearning. Yet all through the past three years, they had carried him and his burden home each time after train 257 passed through his town.

Gin-yi hated to go home and see his mother's sad face but there was no other place for him to go to.

"Did Pa really forget?" he wondered. "He loved me so much." He recalled the winds on Li Je Gien. His father had left many footprints on Li Je Gien Beach, he remembered him as the ruler of the beach. He remembered clearly being on the beach, carrying a fish-basket in his hand and staying close at his father's heel. There he had tried to pick up the sand which held his father's big footprints but he failed. He recalled he had measured those prints with his own foot and stated awesomely, "Oh boy! They're enormous!" His father was a giant to him, and he thought that nothing in the world could be greater than he.

"Pa, you're a giant!" he once exclaimed.

"Giant?" his father questioned and looked as if he was not aware of his greatness.

"You have left huge footprints," he explained.

His father looking back at the clear footprints thought, "What a poor greatness—footprints on the sand." Then he had laughed and said, "So, I leave footprints in the sand."

"Yes, Pa, every time you walk." The sincerity of his words silenced his father, making him sad to think he was good for nothing but leaving footprints on the sand. His father, sitting on a rock at his usual place, started fishing. Gin-yi sat next to his father, very close. Suddenly his father said,

"I will leave the world nothing."

"Oh! Yes, you will Pa," Gin-yi reassured his father. "Whose footprints are so big and deep?"

"Do you know how many people have walked on the sand?" his father asked; "but where are their footprints now?"

This confused Gin-yi, because he thought nobody except his father had walked and left deep foot-marks in the sand.

"Yes, there should be a lot of footprints," he thought. So he went back searching and found nothing but the footprints of his father. He wondered why there were no other footprints.

His father watched the fishing-rod silently; a little fish was swallowing the bait. He pulled the rod and knew it was not a big fish so he retracted the line and then put the bait back in.

"Found any other footprints?" asked his father.

"Not a single one, even the footprints we left last time have also vanished."

"The tide washed it away," said his father.

"We can follow the tracks coming and going had those not been washed off," he said, "and it'll save us a lot of trouble."

His father smiled, his face wrinkling so that the lines on his forehead looked more distinct. People said that those special lines on his forehead meant. that his father would someday make good. But Gin-yi wondered when that fine day would be. His father, having always been poor, would never make it. Li Je Gien beach was beautiful; the blue sky was at the end of the sea, as one could see clear to the horizon. In the small yard at home, one's vision was limited within the square confines of the yard.

"No wonder Pa enjoys coming to Li Je Gien beach. Everything here belongs to him," he thought.

"Pa," he suggested, "if you tread deeper next time you come here, the footprints will not be washed away."

"It won't work, because it is sand." His father shook his head wondering why this boy kept thinking of foot prints in the sand. He said, "Why do you want to keep those footprints?"

"Then when you are busy I would be able to come alone and walk in your prints," He answered.

"No! Don't keep on thinking of walking in my footsteps, walk by yourself, and make footprints of your own," said his father.

The rod jolted, his father jerked the rod and the reel started to whirl.

"It's a big one," said his father. The fish struggled for quite a while. Finally, it was pulled up on the sand where it flopped up and down. It was a big fat fish, at least weighing two cattys.

"Boy! It's a big one, Mom will like it," Gin-yi praised.

"Huh! had wanted to catch a whale, but it is still a fish," Father answered, not at all excited as he was. He picked up the fish, looked at it for a while, then tossed it back into the sea.

"Pa, you—"

"The fish looks unhappy," said his father.

"But Mom will nag you when you get home."

The lines vanished from his forehead and his face became sullen and cold as the wind which blew along the coast.

*

"I say you're born to be poor. If I wait for you to support me with your fishing, I would be so thin my bones could be used as drumsticks!"

"One day I'll catch a whale as long as the Li Je Gien beach, you'll see, Ah-shi."

*

His father's words were answered by a cold sneer from his mother. He had read in storybooks that a woman's love was warmth and security. He thought; mother is a woman.

"Enough, En Shiou. We don't want any whale. Just give us enough food to eat, and enough clothes to wear. We'll be running out of rice by tomorrow."

This was a problem mentioned quite often by mom. And this problem, like a difficult mathematics problem, always made Pa wrinkle his eyebrows.

*

"Let's borrow some from someone; or—"

"Borrow? Not even if we starve to death!"

"You're born poor, yet you're so proud, you think you can support us by catching the wind."

*

And so his mother would go on complaining; she'd say it was unlucky for her to have been married to his father. It'd be better if they divorced. She would go on and on, over and over like a record playing. But last night, his mother's words really hurt his father like a knife. His mother said that she would go to the tea-house and be a tea-house girl so as to keep the family going.

*

"What did you say you were going to do? You!"

"People may look down upon a poor woman, but not a rich whore—"

His father slapped her to stop her from finishing the sentence.

"What right do you have to hit anyone, you who fail to support your wife and child! And you won't let me do the supporting!"

"I have my pride, understand? The pride of a man, a husband." His father's eyes were red.

"Pride?! You are unable to support your own family, and you are talking about your pride?"

"Ah-shi, we're still alive, we can't just do anything cheap because we're poor."

"Doing anything cheap is better than being poor yet not admitting it." His mother wept. Her tears made his father feel ashamed and guilty. So he murmered gently:

"Ah-shi, its not that I don't want to give you a better life. I've tried everything. What else can I do? Poverty is always my shadow. I can't go and steal or rob. Be patient. It's good enough that we are still alive."

"Just to be alive is not good enough. The children have to go to school, and I want to be clothed, a house to live in. Do you think that just having enough to eat is everything?"

*

His father lowered his head in silence. The fish that was tossed back into the sea disappeared into a whirl of bubbles.

"Pa, you deserve Ma's scoldings."

His father looked at him speechlessly, then heaved a deep sigh, reeled in the fish line, and readied for home. The fish-basket was empty just as it always was.

"Look! Pa." He showed his father the empty fish-basket. What he meant was that when they got home they would have to listen to the endless complainings from his mother again. The basket was empty, the opening was like his mother's mouth.

"I've caught a basket of nothing, a beautiful nothing!" His father shrugged his shoulders in a nonchalant way.

His father's words made him wonder—caught a basket of nothing? A beautiful nothing—how could nothing be beautiful?

"What is beautiful about nothing, Pa? How can nothing be beautiful?"

"You won't understand until you grow up." His father thought a while, then as if he felt he should try to make it clearer, he explained, "Man catches nothing but nothingness."

The explanation still meant nothing to him. His thoughts were like his mother's: to have enough to eat and wear; then to be able to have good food to eat and nice clothes to wear. would be more beautiful and also better than nothingness. For example, that fish was much better and more beautiful than nothingness.

But perhaps Pa had a point there? He had read a lot of books. His father had once said that knowledge was power, that knowledge was wealth; then why was he still poor although he had read a lot? Did he come all the way to the beach to catch nothingness? Was what he was doing in the carpenter shop also nothingness?

Every time was the same. He didn't remember why or when his father began to change; perhaps it was because of the quarrel that night, perhaps not. Maybe it was because everyone in the family looked so undernourished. But his father no longer caught nothingness, he swallowed his pride.

His father asked for some loan from his uncle who ran a soap factory, and also from many other relatives of theirs. Every time he went out with high hopes but came back with disappointment. During their days of poverty relatives and friends were still relatives and friends, but since his father began to borrow from them they began to turn their backs, and even when they met on the street, they would turn away, becoming strangers.

"When you are rich, relatives come from afar to see you, money is everything. Only with money do you have honor, character and love."

"Love?!" Chang Gin Yi's father smiled wryly at the irony of it all. Ah-shi had said she would love him to the end of the world. And now where was that love? Without money, love changed and vanished.

*

Only money can bring good fortune. His father became so sure of that, that he began to change and change thoroughly. He wanted to go searching for money. He had spent half of his lifetime in Lou-tung but it was just like the sands of Li Je Gien beach, he could never leave any footsteps behind him. He made up his mind to go far away. He wanted to go and get drunk, because only when drunk could he forget his pain. He left the carpenter shop with the little money he had earned and went into the small wine shop. He drank the Red-Rice wine, which created for him a beautiful world.

Chang Gien-yi remembered that cold midnight three years ago. His father had come home very late.

His mother was angry and had barred the door. His father shouted outside the door, "Open up! Ah-shi open up! Ah Shi"

His mother lay unmoving with eyes wide open. It was as if she didn't hear his shouting at all.

"Ma! Shall I go and open the door?" he asked timidly as he started to get off the bed.

"Such a father! What's the use of having him back?!"
"Open up, Ah-shi!"
The knocking was gentle and timid, and the voice was full of pitiful pleading.
Finally his mother got up to open the door. The smell of wine was blown inside by the cold wind, and that added to her anger.
"Why don't you just drop dead outside, you …"
"Ah-shi! You …"
"How nice for you to have the money to go and drink while the whole family is hungry and cold.":
"Oh! I feel pain in my heart—"
"Feel pain, so you go and drink? Hah!"
"This will be the last time, Ah-shi."
"That's enough, since you don't care about us, then let's split up."
"Split up? You must be joking?"
"Who is joking? Just let me go my way and let the children have their lives."
His mother's words were just like bullets piercing right into his father's heart and made him twitch with pain.
Poverty had made love a lie. His father looked woodenly at the ordinary flat face before him. He couldn't even keep a wife like that even she wanted a divorce.
A useless man indeed.
Thus the tragedy began; his thoughts of going far away became firmer. He would go away, for their sakes and for his own. Seeing the children sobbing she had said:
"No way to go on—my leaving may lessen your burden."
His father's face had turned pale. "I'm sorry, Ah-shi." The giant on the beach had fallen. He knelt down before her, holding her legs, looking up at her.
"I am the one who should go. Let me go." He told her that he wanted to go and try his luck in Taipei.
She caressed the rough hair on his father's head with regret, the rough hair that was a symbol of his pride and stubbornness. It was his pride that she had fallen in love with and had married. When had this begun to change?
His father got up and looked at the undernourished faces of the family, then he said with shame and guilt, "It's all my fault."
Chang Gin-yi knew that his father had always felt guilty every time he was on the Li Je Gien beach.
"Where will you go?" said his mother. He could hear his mother's voice was trembling.
"Taipei, I'll go to try my chances there." His father said, "If you want to be rich. you have to go to a big city."
"We could stick together although we're poor. What did I say? Has poverty driven me crazy?" His mother did love his father, who could say that she didn't?
"Ah-shi. I know how the children are suffering, please stop it."
"You must understand I only want you to better yourself."
"Yes, I know."
"It isn't necessary to go to Taipei. I just want you to control your strong temper."
"Not exactly. Ah-shi! I swear that I won't come back before I get rich. I will never see you again for the rest of my life unless I become rich."
"You!" His mother was shocked. She had never thought that things would turn out this way. Chang Gin-yi could see that both their eyes were clouded. He knew that his father had never left Lou-tung before, neither had their ancestors. But this time his father was going far away. Taipei was just like the tide of Li Je Gien sea, it would swallow his father. But poverty also swallowed people. They were all unwilling to have their father go, but he went anyhow. And now he had been gone for three whole years.
Was it the 257 train or was it the next train which bore his father away?
He seated himself where his father had sat three years ago and it seemed that his father's shadow was alive, sitting there in that chair.
That day, truly an unforgettable one. Train 257 came into the station, letting down so many people! The station was like a stage, presenting so many comedies as well as tragedies of life. His father was huddled in the corner of the waiting room with a little bag in his hand.
"Pa! Are you really going?" He clung to his father.
"Yes. It's true, I am really going."
"Please stay! Pa," he cried.
"Silly boy. Pa is going to make money so Pa can buy you a new school bag, a new pen and—"

“No, Pa! I don’t want anything. I just want you.”

Those new things were tempting, but at this moment, he wanted nothing but his father.

“My Child Oh, you are so good.” His father caressed his soft hair with his hand, and his touch was full of love and care.

“Pa! When will you be back? Please come back soon.”

“I will come back when I have made a lot of money.”

“And how long will that be?”

“Maybe soon, maybe.”

The train whistle blew, it was ready to move away.

“When I come back, I’ll take this same train.”

“Then, I’ll be here every day at the same time, waiting for you.”

“Don’t be silly. I don’t know what day that will be.”

The north-bound train started moving along, and his father picked up his bag and hurried toward the railing of the station. The railing came between him and his father. The wheels started rolling. The earth started shaking. The wheels crunched over the iron tracks and it was as if they were crunching over his heart.

His Mother had hurried in just as the train had already started. Grasping the railings, she looked as if she had wanted to rush into the station, her heart and soul yearning to fly away with the train. He saw her mouth gaping—not laughing, not crying, with such depths of pain, there was no way of showing it.

His father became a vague shadow in his eyes. He was holding the railings—his whole body leaning against it, his whole heart reaching out in an agony of love.

Most probably, there had been many other hearts and souls right there on the train and on the station that were feeling the same pain as he did.

The eyes and hearts of his mother, his brother, his sister and of his own were dragged along by the train his father had taken. His father’s face became vaguer and vaguer, then vanished in the whirling of the wheels. It was like the tide at the Li Je Gien beach, his father would never appear again in all that blank stretch of space.

“I wonder how far is Taipei from here?”

“It must be far away, otherwise, why should mother be crying?”

Father was separated from us by such a distance, a distance that was like a knife—sharp enough to separate flesh and blood, to kill love.

He was waiting—with his elbow against the railings to brace himself while his thin legs dangled to and fro. In his young mind, he tried to recall his father’s face, but somehow he could hardly do so. The profile of his father was now like the footprints left on the Li Je Gien beach—to be washed away by time. He didn’t want to go home. He wouldn’t go home until the train arrived and then left. And then his heart would wander along the tracks leading to Taipei, that remote place.

*

His father appeared suddenly at the door of train 257. It was the same father as the one on Li Je Gien beach. Father came running, with a big handbag which he put down before hugging him and holding him up in the air. Though he was not what he was like when father had left, being fourteen now, Father was always father and he still had strong arms.

“Pa! Pa!”

“Child! Child!”

“Pa, you forgot your bag.”

Father unzippered the bag and out came silver, gold, pearls, diamonds. Then Poverty fled. And the happiness that had been taken away by father was brought back again. He hid himself in his father’s arms. Father was great and in his arms, poverty became nothing.

“How did you know I’d be back today?”

“I’ve been here waiting for the five-ten train for the past three years.”

He was crying in his father’s arms. He did not care about the people, about being shamed; he had to cry out this once all of the tears of the past three years. At that instant, all his tears flowed like the tide at the Li Je Gien beach. He sobbed out all the sufferings his mother working as a servant, his brother being a laborer—he wanted his father to feel his mother’s hands, which were as rough as a chisel. Those hands were the reason for their being alive today, the price paid for the glorious survival of the family. He wanted to tell his father that life was like fire, burning them all; and that poverty had frozen their laughter.

*

The train arrived and left, like a dinosaur from whose belly came so many wandering fathers, but not a sign of Chin-yi's father.

The train left again, the wheels crushed all his rosy dreams. A thousand dreams-like the bubbles in mother's washing.

A pitiful dream.

He had but gathered a disappointment at the station. He had grown up in hardships. He had learned much. He had picked firewood after school. He had gathered sawdust from the carpenter shop. He had learned to share the burden of supporting a family. This time, he had brought home with him the same disappointment, the faces of his mother and brother were as if covered with frost.

"What's wrong?"

He could not find any answer from their faces.

"Oh!" Mom sighed a long sigh. Young as he was, he understood. It was a wordless sound expressing her regrets, intermingled with yearning for his father. He understood it very well. All too well.

"Mom … you …" He put down the dried twigs. Silence was more noisy than any words, mother's wrinkles had deepened, she was stooped over, worse than ever. Her hair had suddenly turned white although she wasn't as yet the age for it to be so. Every lock of white hair penetrated his. heart and pained him.

His brother was silent. He was always like that. He had known the hardships of life all too soon.

"Mom, don't sigh like that, we have gone through all kinds of hardships, what can't we face now?" Poverty had made him mature beyond his age. The fourteen-year-old Chang Gin-yi comforted his mother. His words brought tears again and his mother sobbed:

"Since your father left, the family has depended on me and your brother and now here comes this draft!"

"That's all right, mom, men are supposed to be soldiers."

"But what about us? How shall we manage to live?"

This was like a thunder bolt from the blue. After his brother went into the service, the whole burden of the family of five would fall on mother alone. Sister and another brother were too young to be of any help. What now? What now?

"Mom, let brother go. I can quit school. and help out with the family."

He would try to do what his father had done—make footprints on the sand at the Li Je Gien beach. His feet were small, but they would leave prints. He would walk to the place under that rock where his father used to sit on. He had followed his father's footsteps before, and although those footprints were gone now, he would still go on searching. Things always come from searching. Even if he had not tried it, I would go on trying. His mother nodded with bitter smile.

He came out from that damp wooden house for a breath of air. It was late and lights glimmered from all the houses of Lou-tung.

I will go wherever there's light, and gold, I will go to search for a living.

But he was too small. He tried for several days and his efforts failed. Staring up at the little square of sky above the yard, he called softly.

"Pa, where are you?"

"Pa, why don't you come back?"

"Pa, have you really forgotten us?"

*

There was no answer from above. The application for the postponement of his brother's draft was granted, so he didn't have to go into the service now. All the same, his father did not come back. Night after night, staring at that little square of sky above, he would call out softly.

81.110 Tainted Love: Five Parnas\fn{by Lei Hsiang (1939-)} Shanghai, China (M) 2

1: Lotus Seed-Pod

The monk crouched high on the alter. His kasaya hung down from his thin and lean shoulders, covering his rush mat. He looked like a splendid flower of Buddha.

The monk was giving a sermon to eight hundred believers in a large hall. No breeze blew through the various styles of windows which had been thrown open. The believers sat on bended knees, stuck tight side by side, streaming with sweat and staring at the necks of the people in front of them. But the flower of Buddha sat still and looked straight ahead expositing and explaining the meaning of “tainted love.”

“I thought it was a Japanese phrase in Chinese characters!” he said in his heart.

“A pure mind disturbed by lust is polluted—leading one to committing endless sins and rendering one incapable of cultivating his/her mind. This is what a Buddhist should guard against,” the monk said.

He fanned himself with the printed handout, trying to get the air to circulate. He felt that it was just his obligation to accompany his elders here, yet he had planned beforehand to pick an aisle seat close to an exit. Then he excused himself with an inscrutable gesture, and he walked out of the auditorium after making a respectful and cautious kowtow.

The explanation of “tainted love” continued as he walked beside the building. “Indulging, in, obsessed with, and lusting for love …,” the speech of the monk was repeated by a female voice in Taiwanese. He could see the cherry-red lips of the nun utter the words without difficulty.

He looked at the scenery around the monastery. His yearning for the hills and woods knew no bounds at this instant, as if he had discovered for the first time in his life that lust and landscape were actually an integral whole. He imagined a naked girl standing under the shower head shaped like a lotus seed-pod, lifting her head to let the water run down her body, and with one of her hands she spread her thighs to let the water flow into that most hidden place …

The chanting of a sutra could be heard from the hall.

2: Fetus

He wished his unborn child would look like his young wife, and have her wide forehead and long neck. He did not know that at birth the similarities among babies far exceeded the characteristics of their mothers or fathers.

Sometimes he silently looked at his wife’s swollen belly, which protruded as if something strange had invaded and stationed itself inside her; her nipples, like flower buds, were full, to the point of bursting. “I am entirely under its control,” his wife said smiling and panting.

Even when she was in a deep sleep, he could tell when her heartbeat had quickened, because sweat clung to the tip of her nose even though it was winter. Her body was transformed almost beyond recognition but her face remained pretty. Her big eyes under her arched ink-dark eyebrows, her high nose, and her soft mouth all gave her an unconstrained air—but now she was utterly constrained. Sometimes, for no reason; his wife’s face made him think of young Akutagawa.

His mother who lived nearby was very happy about her daughter-in-law’s pregnancy, and started making preparations. She bought a guidebook on postpartum care by a woman doctor. It was said that this OB\fn{Obstetrics.} doctor became famous by curing a certain queen’s sterility. The doctor professed that all Chinese medicinal tonics should be prepared with wine, instead of the usual water. How could his wife, who generally detested wine, bear this? All their relatives and friends said, “It would be better to die than to follow such a method.”

After that the whole family sank in to an inextricable atmosphere of uneasy expectation.

3: The Blind Person’s Flute

On a dark night, she finally met the blind masseur on the street. In order to record the night sounds, she had made tremendous efforts in seeking out the sound of a flute that only consisted of two or three scales and that was heard in the alleys a long time ago. First she went to Beitou to ask the advice of the cab drivers who took the masseurs to the hot springs there. She then visited some professional masseurs who told her that they no longer had to play flutes at night to solicit business and that a phone call was now enough. However, she found out through a retired teacher from a blind and deaf-mute school, that there was still a masseur who still notified people of his services by playing a flute in the streets at night.

“It’s hard to believe that the person who gave me directions was a blind person,” she told me later. “His detailed description of the place where we were supposed to meet was incredibly clear, much better than that by people who can see like myself.”

She let me listen to parts of the unedited live recording. In the recording the masseur said, “The streets are completely different day and night—you can tell from the hollow or muffled and garbled sounds in response to my flute!” The sound of a car driving by in the distance interrupted her—demonstrating that she was “looking” with her sense of hearing. “I listen to my flute, and at the same time I listen to see if there are any sounds in response to it. If I hear a window open, I know there is business for me.”

A week later, during the final broadcast, I heard the wind rustling first, then her voice came on, saying, “In a piercingly cold wind, a blind masseur like an armed escort in an overcoat, playing a short tune, walked toward us, closer and closer …”

4: Castanets

Standing on the bustling streets where the shops stood one next to another, I heard the rat-tat twice, first distant then near, then near then distant. It didn’t matter if the buses were roaring down the street around noon, if music was playing in the shops, or if there was a busy hum of shoppers—the concise and sharp sound of castanets overwhelmingly stood out from the human clamor.

That regular and measured staccato rat-tat shook my eardrums and made me turn my head and look. I saw approaching along the narrow arcade in front of the shops the, silhouette of a person with sloping shoulders and a limp. In one hand that stout silhouette of a man carried an old briefcase shiny from use; with the other he clapped a pair of black wooden castanets, which sounded clear and loud.

He wore sunglasses and walked with difficulty. It seemed that he had to kick out his left foot in order to take a step. He passed me in no time and kept on walking without a pause. Was he in a hurry to examine a patient, or to help people handle some public business? He never looked around, nor dilly-dallied. Presumably his castanets were a way of soliciting business— most likely to divine by trigrams or to tell fortunes.

He seemed to anticipate that there were customers on this street who needed his help because he walked to the end and back again—in a hurried manner. He never stopped except when someone called him. However, no one from any of the shops called him. The ruthless street stood by while the sounds of the castanets passed farther and farther away.

5: A Cart

Every morning a stooped old woman sold her home-grown vegetables in a rural village in the east. The vegetables were put in a cart which she pushed to a stall that she had leased.

Sometimes, when she sold all her greens before noon, she would buy some from a neighboring stall at a trade price to continue her business till the market closed. Then she bent over and pushed her empty cart home. Taking a napa cabbage out of the empty cart, she said to her daughter-in-law:

“This is gain for nothing. You can have it.”

The piece of land where she grew vegetables was a rent-free vacant lot eight hundred meters from her house. Only when she first began cultivating the land did she need her children’s help. After that, she did the sowing, fertilizing and weeding all by herself. She always pushed a cart containing her tools: shovels, a water bucket, a basket and a small stool, on which she sat and moved along inch by inch while weeding or loosening soil.

She used to be a diligent and prolific woman. She never stopped working from her pregnancy to the time of her labor. One time when she was in the middle of carrying the night soil and water mixture with a shoulder pole and buckets to the farmland which her husband worked, her labor pains started. She stopped a neighbor, asking her to carry the manure to the field, then she tidied up herself to give birth to a boy—in this same way, her eight daughters had also luckily survived.

Now she was eighty-three years old. Her husband died just the year before, and her children were filial and supported her, yet she worked hard as before. She pushed her cart no matter what she did as even for her morning exercise, for she was too rickety to stand up straight. Without the support of the cart, she might fall down.

83.94 Fog\fn{by Yin Dih aka Ko Ching-hwa (1939-   )} Chekiang Province, China (M) 2

For a very long time now, I had been living in fog; for an interminable fall, a whole spring, and half a summer. It was not until a rain-soaked night that I saw the sun again; and yet the sun was black.

It was Kang Chun’s birthday. We ate and drank our fill until evening, and then the bunch of us headed for Sweet Lotus’s to get some ice cream. The bunch of us, that is, Kang Chun, Li Pin, Chen Chin and I. We were all regular customers of Sweet Lotus’s; and we always had the same thing there—strawberry ice cream. Needless to say, the humid, blazing May had nothing to do with it. Ai! through the bleak winter and damp, moldy spring, we had been coming here every day. To make it clear, we came only for the two girls here: Lai Hsiu-chi and Lin Pi-chiao.

"Lai Hsiu-chi's got the roundest hip there is!"

Intoxicated, Li Pin was babbling to himself all the way. "Roundness is the perfection of beauty. It betokens maturity. That's it, maturity! That's what turns me on."

He liked maturity, but it was Lin Pi-chiao that I cherished. However, I never could reveal my feelings to her. I did not have Li Pin's ways with women. He could tease any woman into giggling, even if they had been total strangers and meeting for the first time. But these two girls always held their grounds. They would receive us with friendly but professional smiles. They served us ice cream, but never condescended to joining us in a chat, as the so-called coffee girls would. But this time, Li Pin was obsessed. The minute he stepped into Sweet Lotus's he grabbed Lai Hsiu-chi into his arms without any warning. Apparently he was playing drunk, thinking that we could not blame him this way. But right after that, he threw up and made a mess of the place.

Seeing that he really was drunk, Lai Hsiu-chi loosened up her stiff face.

"Some friends you are! Why did you make him drink so much?" Saying this, she cleaned up the table and chairs that Li Pin had made a mess of. She looked down with tender affection at Li Pin's sweating forehead, gave a shrug, and fetched a glass of water. Affection! Now how do you explain that? Perhaps, such is woman. Li Pin had long ago given his last word on it: Women were just like that-the less serious you were, the more so they become.

Somewhere deep in my heart, I was serious about Lin Pi-chiao. She was not so mature as Lai Hsiu-chi, but she looked so amazingly classically beautiful. Naturally it is more lovely than being mature. She sat timorously in her corner, looking as if her heart was still beating violently over what had just happened. When she felt that I was watching her she immediately lowered her head. She was always like that, looking so .innocent, so easily embarrassed.

Only you know no embarrassment, I said to myself. Coming to Sweet Lotus' again and again, just to watch her, to silently admire her classical beauty!

"Bye-bye!" Having thrown up all the wine, Li Pin was his own careless self again. He finished his glass of water, and shook his head at Lai Hsiu-chi with a dry smile.

"I was drunk. I didn't know what I was doing!" As he said this, he tossed a crumpled-up ten NT dollar bill, much as a dead shot basketball player would toss his ball. Whist! it went and landed inside Lai Hsiu-chi's low, round collar.

"Bye-bye!" he said again. Outside Sweet Lotus's, Li Pin cocked his head and announced his crooked idea: "Let's go to Flower Street;\fn{A note reads: The euphemistic name given to the red-light district. In Taiwan, green lights are used instead of red lights.} what do you say?"

"Flower Street?" Chen Chin stopped, nailed where he was.

However, under our urging and pushing, this tough Conservative finally became our "leader." All in a hurry, he took the lead, as if catching the last train, and walked into the street that could be the dampest and gloomiest one in the world.

"Not so fast!" Li Pin caught up with him, and gave him a slap on the shoulder. "Now that you are here, you got to tear down that mask from your face. Don't be so damned Confucius-like."

Flower Street. Every door was wide open. And from the inside of each door shone a green light. Just as Chen Chin was hesitating between continuing to walk forward or turning to flee, a woman emerged out of the green light and grasped hold of him, with a depraved smile on her face. This was too much for Chen Chin.

"What are you trying to do?" he shouted at her in desperation.

"F - - - you!" the woman answered off-handedly, as if she were born with the expression. Chen Chin stared in amazement. He was stunned for quite a while. Then he turned and fled.

"Never mind him," said Li Pin. "Let him go home and make love to his pillow!"

Turning a corner, Li Pin took Kang Chun and me to the third floor of a hotel.

"Three by five; that makes a hundred and fifty. That's money enough," he said, feeling in his pocket. "Fat ones or skinny ones, you guys? I'm going to get myself one slender in the waist and round in the hip."

Kang Chun seemed very hesitant. I felt my heart beating violently. Thud, thud, thud it went. An unquenchable burning was at duel with a voice that could not be heard.

The duel was going on. A very fat woman came to the third floor.

"Want girls?" she asked. Her eyes squeezed into two tiny cracks in her face.

"Yeah. Young ones. Nice and tame. Got it?"

The fat woman piled up a face-full of I-got-it, and went downstairs. Li Pin pushed the window open and took out his cigarettes and lighter from his pocket. The air inside the room seemed to freeze, silent and heavy. Time ticked by, second by second. There seemed to be a fog rising up before my eyes. If I were told to go downstairs at that time, I would not have known which way to go.

Footsteps rang on the stairs, up from the first floor. No doubt about it. It was a woman's high heels, tapping up to the second floor. It got closer. Third floor now. On the porch. Tap tap tap. The woman showed up at the door.

She covered half her face with a fan and looked at us, wearing a professional expression. So this was the goods? There was no curve at all in her figure. The impression was that of a gasoline barrel, a tall and big one. She was about thirty. Her skin was covered with red pimples. Her hair resembled a bird’s nest, done up in what they called the Elizabeth Taylor\fn{After Elizabeth Rosemond Taylor (1932-   ), American actress.} style. It could contain at least a basket-full of rotten oranges. That was it, a basket-full of rotten oranges. The woman was herself a rotten orange.

Naturally rotten oranges were not welcome. She left. A weighty silence was spreading among us. Someone else was on the stairs. The door opened. The fat woman brought a big girl this time. White flat shoes, grayish dark, narrow skirt, light blue blouse, without any make up, not even lipstick, the girl looked so green, like a newly peeled green pea. She smiled awkwardly at me. A faint scent of fragrance emitted from her smile.

Li Pin gave me a nudge. Should I take her? I did not know. I had the first pick among all the girls we ordered tonight. Li Pin and Kang Chun had generously agreed upon that before we came up here. If only I would, this girl in front of me would be mine tonight. But, would I? I did not know. Blood seemed frozen inside me, and I kept still. Kang Chun thought I did not like her, and took her away with a shrug. They went to a room next door.

Wind swept over the windowpanes with a swishing sound. For the first time I noticed it was raining. The curtains were occasionally blown open. Gusts of fine, dense raindrops sprayed inside, like fog.

Fog. I was losing myself in fog. Kang Chun took her away. I suffered an unspeakable sense of loss. It was real loss. He and she were right in the next room.

“I don't get it," said Li Pin. "Are you picking a lover, a wife, or a simple whore to solve your inflation?”

“ …”

He didn’t understand; as if I did! All I felt was the suffocation and bewilderment in the fog. The world looked so strange to me. Kang Chun and the girl were right next door.

“Dumb!” Li Pin was almost shouting at me. He swept around and dashed out. He went downstairs and left me all alone in the room.

Most of the space in the room was taken up by a large bed, and the bed was expanding towards me, seeming about to swallow me up. Suddenly I was possessed by a nameless sense of horror. Life, youth, love, past, future, present—what are you doing at present? Whoring!

The fog lifted. The door was gently opened. I thought it was Li Pin coming back. Looking up, I caught a glimpse of a girl hurrying out, as if she had been pushed from behind. Following her was an instinctive reaction. She was not alone. There was another one ahead. They were in such a hurry, as if panic-stricken. They looked so familiar from behind. I hastened to catch up, but they had turned the corner and started downstairs. The stairs were a spiral one. Looking straight down from the third floor, one had a fine view of everything in sight. God! I was barely able to suppress a cry. There could be no mistake. It was them!

I stood petrified: fog sealed my eyes again. Lurking pain now sprang to tear me into shreds like a hungry wolf. Life could be so cheap! What was this thing called love? No one knew my secret. For a year now, I had been going to Sweet Lotus’s for ice cream every day with Li Pin and the others. God knows! A hundred reasons for my going there were pitiable enough excuses. What really attracted me there was that little woman, that silent little woman sitting in her corner. It was she. And yet, she was all along so easily to be gotten. All one needed to do was pay the price, and she would come naked into your arms. I was the one who could not be naked. I never dared to express my love to her. Even stretching my lips and smiling at her was beyond me. I was mortally afraid, afraid that it would have offended her!

Li Pin rushed upstairs again, almost running into me.

"Guess what? Boy! Would you be surprised at this!” he said with his finger tip on my nose. He thought I did not know.

“ …”

“What are you thinking about? Didn’t you hear what I said?” he was almost shouting again. “I’m telling you. You get Lin Pi-chiao, and I’ll get Lai Hsiu-chi. OK?”

Stepping out of the hotel, I saw women streaming, flooding the streets; and I could not tell which was that kind of woman and which was not. The streets were chilly at midnight. Streetlights were arguing with each other in silence. Suddenly fog fell in front of my eyes again, gust after gust.

One is always hearing them say, “Women in ‘business’ are all over the place.” All over the place! Should I believe that or not, by now?

The fog grew thicker. Tomorrow, and the day after, would Li Pin and Kang Chun still be going to Sweet Lotus's every day? Not I, I'll never go again, not ever, ever.

118.219 Flaw\fn{by Wang Wen-Hsing (1939-)} Foochow, Fukien Province, China (M) 5

I must have been eleven that year, because I had just enrolled in junior high. At that time we were still living on Tung-an Street, our earliest home in Taipei, and had not yet moved to Tung-hua Street, after which we moved again to Lien-yun Street. But it has always been my impression that the earlier the home, the better it seemed; every time we moved, it was to a less attractive place. Perhaps it was the nostalgia for early childhood, strongest for the earliest years, that gave rise to such an illusion.

Tung-an Street was a quiet little alley, with less than a hundred families along its entire length. Slightly curved around its middle, the street stretched all the way to the great gray river at the end. Actually, viewed from the vantage point of the river bank, there were very few pedestrians on the street, which, with its palish body and meandering path, was virtually a small river itself. Such was the tranquil picture when I was eleven; later, as small cars were allowed to pass through the street, the atmosphere of quiet seclusion was lost altogether. My present reminiscences hark back to the era before the arrival of the cars.

In any event, on Tung-an Street at that time cats could be seen strolling lazily along the tops of the low walls, from one house to the next. The whole landscape was filled with glistening green foliage and delicately fragrant odors from the profusion of flowers and plants growing in the front yards. Flowers especially took to Tung-an Street; they bloomed in the spring and in the fall. Most unforgettable, however, were the evenings of that tiny street, when silent street lamps illuminated the darkness of the road. Night seemed even quieter than day. The little grocery stores, unlike their counterparts in the crowded city, closed at half-past nine. Midnight began at half-past nine. Night enjoyed its deepest and longest sleep on this street. Light breezes rustled among the leaves while remote stars twinkled in the skies, and after a few hours, night passed and day broke. In the early morning mist, the owners of the small grocery stores, still unlike their counterparts in the city, began taking down the wooden panels of the shops.

In spring that year, a young seamstress opened a shop at the end of the street near the river. It was at a time when Taipei, still untouched by affluence, was just beginning to prosper, and a number of three-storied buildings could be seen cropping up here and there. Ever since the previous winter, we children had been watching with interest the construction of such a building on the vacant lot in front of our houses. Our feelings were excitement mingled with sadness; we were excited because, as children, we felt an immense satisfaction with all novel experiences—new sights, new sounds, new objects, new undertakings—and sad because we were losing our favorite playground for after-school ball games. The building was completed in spring, and the young woman moved in. The house consisted of three compartments, and was three stories tall. The young woman and her family occupied the entire compartment on the right, while the second and third floors served as family rooms. It was said that she owned the entire building and we children had naturally assumed that she would occupy all the space herself, but it turned out she reserved only one compartment for her own use and offered the others for rent. A week after they had been taken she changed her mind and sold them off. And we felt a slight tinge of regret for her that she had been able to occupy only a part of the building.

I was a precocious child then, although I looked at least two years younger than my eleven years. Like all underdeveloped children however, my mental growth compensated for my physical weakness by being two years beyond my age. One day, I discovered that I was in love with the young woman. The realization dawned upon me during the spring vacation, right after the soft spring showers, in the blossom-filled month of April.

Being a sensitive and inward child; I had an instinctive fear of glamorous and sophisticated women, and took only to those with kind faces (I still do even now). The woman at the dressmaking shop was exactly the type I like.

She was about thirty-five or so, and did not wear much make-up (this was very important). She wore neither rouge nor powder on her face and only a tiny trace of lipstick on her lips, which were often parted in a white warm smile. Her eyes were not only beautiful, but, even more important, glowed with gentle kindness. My love for her stemmed not only from approval of her looks, but was rooted in sincere admiration for the goodness of her character as well.

Love in a precocious child, like a heavy blossom atop a frail stem, was a burden too heavy to bear. Only then did I realize the consuming nature of love; if the blazing flames were the joys of love it was the burning of the fuel itself which made these flames possible. I found it impossible that true happiness could consist in achieving joy from the masochistic burning of one's own self. Although I had been in the world for a mere eleven short years then, I had undergone enough minor suffering to be able to devise a means of avoiding pain. That was: if you happened to form an emotional attachment to a certain thing or a certain person, the best thing to do was to immediately look for a fault therein, upon which you would then be able to withhold your affection and thus lighten the burden. During the next few days, I often concealed myself directly opposite her shop and scrutinized her with cold detachment, in an effort to discover some ugliness in her. But the longer I watched, the more beautiful she seemed. I realized then that love had so deeply embedded itself that there was no way of uprooting it. I would have to live with it.

It was already the last day of the spring vacation. I made up my mind to enjoy it to the full by playing outdoors for the whole day. Early in the morning, I went over to our new playground (which had been relocated at the vacant lot in front of the garbage heap beside the grocery store) to wait for the other children to gather. We started our ball game much earlier that morning than usual—it must have been before eight o'clock, for our shrill cries woke an office worker living in one of the wooden buildings. Still clad in his pajamas, he opened the window and leaned out to scold loudly. Our ball often hit the ragged old woman who kept a cigarette stand next to the garbage heap and she tried to chase us away with a broom, but as she lacked the strength and energy, could only stand brandishing her broom like a sentinel in front of her stand, hitting out at whoever ran near her, but we were all careful to stay away. On top of it all, Ah-chiu's pet mongrel kept dashing among us madly. For some reason or other he seemed to have picked me for his target, jumping on me repeatedly and causing me to fall several times. It was only when Ah-chiu's mother appeared and summoned him and his four brothers back to breakfast that we finally broke up the game and dispersed. The sun had splashed the entire street golden by then. Thick greenery clustered over the tops of the plaster walls. Market-bound housewives were already holding summer parasols to ward off the sunlight, whose beams had become so strong lately that some buds were bursting into flower before their time. I felt thirsty and wormed my way into Liu Hsiao-tung's yard in order to drink from their faucet. Water flowed over my face and neck, where I left it for the sun to dry. As I passed the dressmaking shop, I saw the young woman standing in the doorway talking with another lady, teasing now and then the baby the latter held in her arms. I climbed up the incline at the end of Tung-an Street, walked down the steps on the other side and headed for the river.

The river under the sunlight was alive with undulating glitter, like a million thumb-tacks rising and falling in rhythm. On the opposite bank, two ox-carts were crawling along the sandy beach. Standing under a newly budding tree, I could smell the fragrance of the baked earth along the river bank and feel the coolness of the river breeze on my skin. As I walked away from the tree, I raised my voice and started singing Crossing the Sea in Summer. Keeping time with my hands, I went singing all the way up the river. I walked into a bamboo grove, found a relatively flat patch of land and lay down.

In front of me stretched the river, glimmering through the bamboo leaves; at my back was a piece of farmland colorful as a Persian rug. The huge patches of green were rice paddies; big blocks of rich dark brown were earth freshly plowed but yet unsowed; slender strips of light green, like the thin glass squares used under microscopes, were bean tendrils, while the golden patches were vegetable blossoms, swaying in the spring breeze. The short dark figures of the farmers could be glimpsed working in the distance, and occasionally the faint odor of manure drifted in from the fields.

I lay quietly, thinking of all kinds of whimsical things, but they were all happy thoughts; I allowed my fancies to roam like the breeze-driven clouds in the sky. I turned over, and, resting my chin upon my arms, gazed at the river through the bamboo leaves. I thought of the young seamstress. I had no one in whom I could confide my love, only the river. Later this river also became the witness to my pains in learning to swim. I would often steal away from home, make my way alone to the river under the summer sun, and, bracing myself against fears of drowning, would try to teach myself the art of floating above water. But 1 never did succeed. I gave up my efforts finally, because I no longer had the courage to struggle.

The river could not respond to my confidences. I returned to my former position on my back and covered my face with a hand- kerchief.

I lay until the sun had traveled directly overhead, then removed the handkerchief and sat up. Thinking that my mother would be waiting for me to go home for lunch, I stood up and headed for home. The farmers had all disappeared from the fields.. Probably they too had gone home to eat.

At home I saw our Taiwanese amah. She had not gone home yet and was still doing the ironing. As soon as she saw me, she asked:

"Young Master, have you seen my Ch'un-hsiung?" I replied that I had not.

"Weren't you playing with him outdoors?" I said I was not.

"I can't think where he could've gone. I told him to come and help me mop the floors, but there hasn't been a trace of him all morning. My Ch'un-hsiung just can't compare with Young Master, Ma'am. Young Master is smart, and works hard; so young and already in junior high; he'll be in senior high next, and after that, a top official," she said, shaking out one of my father's shirts.

Our amah often praised me thus, remarking that I would proceed to senior high school after finishing junior high. She could not imagine a college education beyond that of senior high, so after that, I was to become a high official.

Mother answered her in broken Taiwanese, "It'll be the same with you. Ch'un-hsiung will also go to school, also earn money and support you."

"Thank you, Ma'am, thank you. But I was born to suffer, Ma'am. Ch'un-hsiung's father died early, leaving me alone to raise him. I have no other .hopes, only that Ch'un-hsiung will be like Young Master, work hard in school, study in junior high and afterwards in senior high. No matter how hard I have to work, wash clothes all my life even, I want him to be educated."

"He won't disappoint you," my mother replied. Amah only sighed.

That kind old woman. I still remember her broad tan face, like a piece of dark bread, warm and glowing, the perfect blending of simple goodness and unpretentious love. Where she had gone, no one knew. As I grew older, gentle people like her were harder and harder to come by. They are not the kind to adapt easily within an increasingly complex society, I suppose. I also recall another minor detail about her, the result of the peculiar powers of child-hood observation: I often noticed her bare feet, with ten stout toes fanning out, pattering along on the shining floors of our house. The reason I found this extraordinary perhaps was that we all wore slippers in the house and there were many pairs of spare slippers in the hallway reserved for guests. Amah probably had never become used to this alien custom and thus never wore any. I often mused to myself then that even if she consented to wear slippers like the rest of us, where would we find such a large pair to fit her?

That was the last day of the spring vacation. Another detail I remember was that I went out and bought a diary that afternoon. A certain fascination for the surrounding phenomena, interest for the musings within my mind (for my newly-sprung love), and for spring itself urged me to imitate Liu Hsiao-tung's elder brother and keep a diary. All my thoughts for the day were faithfully recorded that evening in the first entry of my diary.

After the spring vacation, love continued to plague me, as if. urging me to some action, to do something which would bring me closer to her, albeit only in my feeling. I thought of taking something to her shop and asking her to mend it for me (a sorry means of courtship, I admit). But that shop of hers took only women's clothing. I could not think of anything else, so one day I finally brought along a Boy Scout jacket with a missing button to her shop.

Her shop was tastefully furnished. Pictures cut from Japanese fashion magazines adorned the walls, and a vase of bright red roses stood on a small table in one corner. Four girls were sitting in the room, talking and laughing among themselves as they pedaled on machines spread with pieces of brightly colored material.

"What do you want, little one?" A rounded-faced girl wearing a string of imitation pearls lifted her head and asked.

"I want a button sewn," I said, turning to the seamstress, who stood at the table measuring a dress, "Can you do it?"

The woman took my jacket and said: "Ah-hsiu, sew the button on for him." She handed the jacket over to the round-faced girl, then turned and went on with her measuring.

I felt the sorrow of rejection.

"Which button is it?" the girl asked me. I told her, with my eyes on the woman.

"How much?" I asked the woman.

"A dollar," replied the girl. .

The woman seemed not to have heard my question, for she did not even lift her head. My grief sank its roots into the depths of my heart. But after a while I saw the woman put on a pair of glasses, and curiosity took the place of sorrow. I found it strange that she should wear glasses, as if it were the least probable thing in the world. I did not like the way she looked with glasses; she no longer looked like herself. Moreover, she was wearing them too low. They made her look old and gave her an owl-like expression.

Suddenly aware that I had stood gazing in the shop much longer than necessary, I asked the round-faced girl:

"Can I come back and get it later?"

"No, stay. It'll be ready in a minute."

I waited nervously in the shop for her to finish. I glanced again at the pictures of the Japanese women on the walls. They were all very pretty, with dazzling smiles, but strangely, their eyelids all had only single pleats. I looked again at the roses in the corner. They were still flaming red. Feeling that they seemed to be redder than roses usually were, I took a more careful look and discovered that they were plastic flowers.

After a while, a boy came down the stairs, munching a piece of fruit. He was taller than I, also in a Boy Scout uniform, and was wearing a pair of glasses. With sudden intuition, I realized this was her son. I had seen two smaller children with her, but had never seen this one; like all newcomers to the neighborhood, he never came out to join our games. Amidst surprised confusion I, who was secretly in love with his mother, watched him as he went upstairs again with a water bottle.

After the button had been replaced, I hurried out the door with the jacket. In the doorway I met our amah coming in. Afraid that she would report me to my mother, for I had come to the shop without her knowledge, I slipped away as unobtrusively as I could.

Despite the fact that I had been received with cold indifference at her shop, that I had seen a son of hers who was much older than I, my love did not change; the love of a child does not change easily. I still gave her all the passion of my eleven years.

Thus I loyally allowed my love to continue, without hope, without fulfillment, and without anyone's awareness. This hopelessness, however, colored my love with a nuance of melancholy beauty. Actually, I could not tell whether this sense of futility gave me sorrow or happiness. But I was sure of one thing, that with such love I was happier than adults in one respect. I was spared any unnecessary anxiety; I did not have to worry over the fact that one day my love would suddenly come to an end. As long as my admiration existed, my love existed. Looking back now, I should say I was quite happy then.

The trip I made to her shop, I recall, was the only time I undertook such a venture. I never found another opportunity; besides, for some reason I suddenly lost all courage, and found myself deeply ashamed over the incident. Whenever I thought of myself going into her shop on the mere pretext of replacing a button, my shame would grow until the experience became a positive terror, causing me to sweat in anguish. For three days afterward I did not have the heart to pass in front of her shop. Courage is a strange thing: the first plunge should never be merited as true courage until tested by subsequent tries.

Although I was never in her shop again, I was often in front of it. Opposite her shop was a dry-goods store which sold all kinds of tidbits for children and at which I frequently stood vigil. Munching on a cracker, I watched as she moved around in her shop. Sometimes I would see her husband, a man of thirty-some, riding a motorcycle and said to be working in a commercial bank. Strangely enough, I never felt a trace of jealousy for this man. This showed, I suppose, that I was still a long way from maturity. I did not seem to realize the full significance of the word "husband." I thought of him as merely another member of her household, like her brother, her uncle, or her brother-in-law. But should she be talking with another man, for instance if she chatted momentarily with the barber next door, my jealous rage would lead me to visualize the barber lying on the ground with a dagger in his heart.

Thus the days slipped by, one after another, like the turning pages of my diary. Soon it was summer and the end of the school term approached. I began to worry about my grades; I was very weak in algebra, and was afraid I would not be able to pass the finals. My algebra teacher had already warned half-jokingly that he expected to see me again next semester. I shook with fear; I had never in my life had to repeat a grade, and now the threat loomed large. Yet mingled with the anxiety was a sense of unbound expectation, expectation for the freedom, the happiness, and the unlimited possibilities of the summer vacation. Under the dark shadow of the finals, I sat for hours on end with the algebra text in front of me, but, instead of studying, I often simply gazed at it anxiously. I grew thin and pale.

Finally, the heavy, burdensome finals were over. All the students hurled themselves into the free skies of the summer vacation like birds escaping from captivity. I was merely one ecstatic soul among thousands. Countless youngsters, burdened by the exams, had eagerly awaited the arrival of the summer vacation, and, in waiting had imagined that it would never become a reality, otherwise their joys of expectation would have been canceled by the pains of suffering.

That first morning of the vacation, I opened my eleven-year-old eyes to the riotous singing of birds and a world brilliant with sunshine. Exams were a thing of the past. No matter how badly I did on them, they were no longer on my mind. All children, perhaps, are unable to worry over the past. Sitting up in bed, a shiver of excitement told me beyond a shadow of doubt that the summer vacation had finally arrived. That certainty did not come from any indication on the calendar, but from a certain sound, a certain odor, a patch of sunlight, all distinctively characteristic. I heard the shrill buzz of the cicadas, saw the reflection of a basin of water shimmering on the ceiling, smelled the cool fragrance of mothballs as my mother took out our winter clothing from the trunks and laid them out in the sun-and I knew that this was it. Happiness was that child as he jumped out of bed.

Each year with the awareness of summer came the reminder to sort out our fishing gear. We would rummage among the coal bins in the kitchen and come out with a slender bamboo pole which our mothers had put aside (and which we had painstakingly whitted ourselves), take it to the bathroom and, with great effort, try to clean it, thinking of the great catches in store this year, although for the most part we were only able to catch frogs.

I found my fishing pole that day as usual, and cleaned it up as before. But holding it in my hands I all of a sudden felt that it was much too homely. It was my own handiwork, of which I had once been so proud, but now I saw its crudeness. I felt that I needed a brand new fishing pole, a bona fide one, not a plain home-made one like this. I wanted one with a reel, a tinkler, and one that was gracefully pliant like a whip. I made up my mind to ask my father to buy me one. I had high hopes of getting it, because I had an indisputable reason: I was eleven.

I threw my fishing pole back into the coal bin. I headed for the garbage heap to look for my friends. It had been two whole weeks since we played our last ball game, all because of the final exams. Our mothers would not let us play.

I passed by the dressmaking shop, hoping to catch a glimpse of the young woman, but today her shop was closed. She must be out with her family. I felt a little disheartened. I saw her every day, but one day in which I did not was enough to give me that feeling of voidness.

My friends were already in the middle of a game. I hurriedly joined in and immediately became involved in the ferocious battle. We played happily until noon. The side I was on lost and they blamed me, while I blamed myself for joining the wrong side. But we all determined valiantly to fight again tomorrow and win. As I walked home, the dressmaking shop was still closed. Again I experienced a loss.

At home my mother was complaining over the fact that Amah had failed to show up that morning to do the laundry, and that if she was too busy to come she should have sent Ch'un-hsiung over with a message. Then she turned upon me and said that I had disappeared all morning like a pigeon let out of the cage; she wanted me to go and look for Amah, but she could not even find me. I was surely headed for trouble if I played like that every day, and I should not spend all my time in ball games even though it was the summer vacation. Naturally, these words were ones I liked least to hear.

After lunch I felt drowsy. The white-hot sunshine outside made it hard to keep my eyes open; in the room a few flies were buzzing intermittently upon the dining-room table. Unconsciously I dozed off for about ten minutes. Awaking, I gazed at the bright sunlight outside the window and the flies on the table in the room and a familiar sensation dawned upon me. How could I have forgotten? Summer vacations were always boring after all.

Just then Mrs. Liu, who lived next door, came over for her daily chat with my mother. With hair curlers bobbing she stepped in the doorway and asked:

"Is your mother at home, little one?"

"I'm in the kitchen, Mrs. Liu," my mother called. "Find a seat and I'll be out in a minute." But Mrs. Liu had already traced the voice into the kitchen.

Then they both emerged. My mother's hands were covered with soap suds. She found a piece of cloth and started wiping them.

"How come you're doing the wash yourself?" Mrs. Liu asked as she sat down.

"Amah didn't show up today, I thought I might as well."

"That's what I came to tell you," Mrs. Liu said, setting her curlers bobbing again. "You know what's happened to Amah? She's lost all her money. Twenty thousand dollars of savings, and she lost it all last night. No wonder she's sick."

"Oh? Is that so? I didn't know she had so much saved up," my mother remarked in surprise.

"All the money she earned by working day and night as a washerwoman, saved up bit by bit. She says she was saving for her son's education. Bad luck that she should lose it all. But this time lots of other people on our street were hard hit too. Mrs. Yeh lost ten thousand—seems like she just put the money in a couple of days ago, and it being the money for the fuel coupons of her husband's office at that. Mrs. Wu lost three thousand. It's all that witch's fault, and now the whole family's skipped."

"Who're you talking about?"

"That woman in the dressmaking shop. You can't imagine how unscrupulous she is. One hundred fifty thousand, gone just like that. Who'd believe she was capable of doing such a thing? Everyone saw that her business was good and trusted her, saw that she offered higher interest, of course, and never dreamed she would suddenly skip out like that. Sheer betrayal, that's what it is."

"Unbelievable," my mother mused, "she seemed to be such an honest person. Oh, poor Amah, what is she going to do …"

I did not stay to hear my mother finish. I ran out of the house and headed straight for the dressmaking shop.

The shop was still closed. A few women were standing near the doorway chatting. I stood gazing at the shop as pieces of the conversation nearby drifted into my ears.

"They left in the middle of the night. No one knows where they are now."

"They could report her to the police, have her arrested."

"No use. All she'll have to do is declare herself bankrupt, and she wouldn't have a care in the world. Besides, now that she's got the money, the law can't touch her."

"It was all planned," another said. "You notice she was in a hurry to sell most of this building as soon as she moved in."

"They say she sold this shop of hers last week too."

A few maids were peering in from the windows on the right. I went over and looked in through a small pane of glass: the room was empty, all the sewing machines and the furniture were gone.

"Just imagine, she didn't even pay the girls their wages. How mean can one get?"

Hearing this I suddenly felt my ears bum with anger.

Mrs. Liu had already left when I got home. Seeing me, my mother murmured:

"Unbelievable, just unbelievable. People are getting worse and worse. More people get rich and more cheating goes on. People are getting prosperous, but if morals go bad, what's the use of all this prosperity? Luckily we aren't rich; otherwise, who knows? We might also have been duped."

Our family was not rich. My father was teaching in a high school then, and, in Taiwan, a teacher was by no means well off. But was Amah well off? Why cheat her out of all her money? And those girls who had worked for nothing, why deprive them of their wages?

I went with a book up to the rooftop that evening; I had decided to heed my mother and do a little studying. The sky above was a soft quiet blue. I sat on the reddish tiles and leaned my head against the railing.

I could see the dressmaking shop down across the street. The door was still closed; the chatting women had gone.

Thinking of the young woman, of her comely yet gentle face, I found it hard to believe that she was a fraud. But she was a fraud. Every time I told myself the truth, my heart contracted in pain.

I still cherished my love for her. I wanted to keep that love. I closed my eyes and thought of her lily-like face—yet I was always reminded of her flaw. I saw the. ugliness of that face; and the flower hung down and withered.

Dusk slowly enveloped Tung-an Street; wisps of pale smoke began to curl from the chimneys nearby. The scene in front of me got misty, and I discovered that my eyes were filled with tears.

Oh, youth, perhaps my sadness then was due not only to a woman's having disappointed me, but to the discovery that some element in life had been deluding me, and had been deluding me for a long time. The sorrow and the anguish of the discovery disturbed me deeply.

From that day on, I understood a bit more; I learned that disillusions were an integral part of life, and that more disillusions were to come. From that day on, I forgot the beauty of that woman, although I never could forget the details of this incident. No wonder; that was my first love.

188.15 Excerpt from Hunger Trace\fn{by Adrienne Poy Clarkson (1939-)} Hong Kong, China (F) 12

When I tell a man that he is a marvelous lover, I mean that he makes me believe he loves me when we are in bed together. I once explained this to Tiercel and his bare shoulders shook with relieved laughter because he thought I had meant something to do with his technique or his capacity or some of those other things that apparently haunt the post-adolescent male ego. And I suppose he laughed because it was so easy for him to make me believe he loved me, I wanted him to so much; a bird feeds on crumbs and doesn't know whether there is another handful coming or not.

With Tiercel, I ate every crumb and never asked if there was more, for with him, as with no one else as much, it was not just a question of appetite. Often we met, in an hour in the afternoon or very late at night, and I thought with one part of my mind that this time would be the last—after this I would not want him again—but it was never true. Never, and not yet. I can feel Tiercel caught in my craw even when I hunger for other things or other people. I know I have to swallow past him and I do, but he is there all the same.

There are nights when I have awakened to find that I have formed his name on my lips, willing myself to believe that he is there breathing lightly in sleep beside me. If I am not alone, I think of him, even while I realize that it is not his skin I touch, that his neck does not join his shoulders in quite that way, that the hair at the base of his neck is longer, and I repeat Tiercel, Tiercel with my tongue, because it is a name which doesn't require the lips to form it fully. I told him this once—that I could say his name anywhere, anytime, without revealing it and still feel the joy, tbe delight of having even that tiny bit of him, like the paper label of a rare wine, inside me.

Because of Tiercel, I have become a kind of whore, lying with my body and heart, because I have wanted to forget him, or because I have wanted to remember him while someone else is holding me and touching me and thinking he possesses me. I can't count the number of times I've cheated men at the very moment when I should be closest to them by saying Tiercel's name under my breath to the rhythm of their momentary love. Of course I'm exaggerating when I say I can't count the number, but I really don't know exactly and I'd rather exaggerate than face any precision. I would rather think of the quality of those nights when I cannot escape from thoughts of him, when I reach out to hold, not just a body which is warm and welcoming and demanding, but a person whose name was Tiercel and who did not always love me.

We met when I had just returned to Toronto with Jos, after that delightful passive period of looking at baroque churches, of eating with the eyes and sleeping with an empty head. I had began to work in Jos' stockroom, expediting gross upon gross of licorice sticks to deepest, darkest Manitoba. At the time, I hadn't made my peace with Aunt Maeve or my mother and I was staying in a tiny room off Jos' office with just enough space for what Jos called my three body coverings, my large economy size bottle of Chant d'Aromes and my Penguin edition of Auden.

I never own many things at a time: I have a horror of houses filled with precious furniture, of minds filled with objects. I like space and emptiness around me and I will throw away, break or destroy anything that clutters it. So far, I had stayed close to the office (it was winter and I was adjusting, I told myself) except for excursions to Jos' mother's house to be crammed full of meat with thick sauce and cakes covered with cream or caramel or custard. If all things were equal (as they never are) I would be a vegetarian—a head of lettuce and three cups of yogurt a day would content me. Jos' mother was horrified at my thinness, which she said was twenty pounds below the average weight for my height in the Canada Food Rules; at each meal, while Jos half-ignored her and smiled enigmatically, she put cream on everything, trying to make up for my thirty-two years of gastronomic deprivation in a single meal.

Jos received an invitation to a party on the morning of March 22, 1967 (I just looked it up to make sure) and he tossed it across the desk we shared. It was a hastily-scrawled note from someone named Marion inviting him to come to a party at 63 Cluny Drive any time after nine.

"Go and wear your breastless dress," he challenged.

He was referring to a Russian smock which we used to take turns wearing after we bought it in Kiev with our black market rubles; it is made of lawn so sheer that I never wear anything under it. I feel that underwear emphasizes rather than protects, but I realize, too, that a lot of people don't share this view. At any rate, since my breasts are so small as to be practically non-existent (my sister always referred to me as the titless wonder) the question is purely academic. In the end, though, after scrutinizing my three dresses, we decided that the thick, white caftan Ahmud had given me would be best for 63 Cluny Drive. I put on the two yards of silver pennies on a chain; they needed polishing but clinked beautifully all the same. Jos and I decided that I should wear my hair twisted into a figure eight and pulled tight over the ears. Then Jos splashed me with Chant d' Aromes and announced that he wasn't coming with me. At that stage, I never questioned Jos' intentions or statements, because he never gave reasons.

I roared down Mount Pleasant, pushing the Mini-minor as far as it would go in second before shifting into third. At times I coasted in neutral, which I love to do (although Jos used to screech at me that it was so bad for the machine). I feel I'm saving gas and I have a remarkable sense of being barely in control, which is superb. Driving is one of the things I can do with a really reckless gaiety, regardless of the fact that it is basically mechanical. I got a bit disoriented in Rosedale and ended up passing Aunt Maeve's house twice (instant guilt, quickly swallowed) but I felt comforted that she wouldn't have recognized me with the large white scarf I had twirled around my head and the bottom half of my face. The scarf I would have worn all the time if I had become Ahmud's second wife and gone to live in that obscure Arab country in Africa of which his brother is president. Ah-mud, who took me to see the Norwegian fjords, who taught me to eat cous-cous, who hummed the arias from The Magic Flute (he had seen it eleven times) and who made love to me much in the way that he had learned to drive his brother's Chrysler Imperial—somberly, earnestly, and with a determined effort to master Western expertise. Darling Ahmud, if he had possessed a single grain of self-consciousness, he could have conquered all the women in the world with his elegantly-etched walnut beauty. But being shy and feeling the underdevelopment of his country as his own, he concluded only two affairs with any success—the phenomenally virtuous but aging Middle Western wife of the librarian at the U.S. Information Services—and me. I often think that if he remembers Paris in terms of us, he has a highly original vision of the function and purpose of American technology.

I was thinking of Ahmud when I finally lurched upon Cluny Drive and identified Marion's house—the caftan tangled a bit in my legs and I stumbled up to the door clutching the large inlaid music box which Jos wanted me to give to Marion. The door was opened by a pleasant-looking matron with short, prematurely gray hair. String of matched pearls and red wool molded decorously from neck to knee.

"Yes?" she asked inquiringly.

Elegant as she looked, she didn't hide the fact that she had no idea who I was; it was obvious and funny. I began suddenly to enjoy myself. The Arab messenger service with a message from Morocco; I could hear Aunt Valancy whispering that play-acting without the consent of the intended audience was puerile.

"Hi, I'm Regina. A friend of Jos. He can't or won't come, make up your own mind which, and he's sent me instead. Are you Marion?"

She immediately smiled and I felt that I would like her. Just chemistry—no judgment involved.

"How like Jos! Do come in, Regina."

She paused, debating whether or not she would ask me to remove my caftan; she held out her arm tentatively to receive it and then swiftly withdrew it.

"You look extraordinary."" And her tone told me she meant it as a compliment. I smiled and charged into the living room to relieve her of any awkwardness and I knew then that I really did like her.

Some men stood together in front of the fireplace which was crackling behind their legs; the women were arranged in a group in the bay window. One of the men, tall with a ruddy look about him, detached himself from the group, and politely trying not to stare, asked me if I would like a drink. Then Marion propelled me towards the fireplace (astute of her, I thought) and introduced me.

A thin blond clergyman smiled warmly at me and told me his name was Peregrine Margrave; the others, all of whom wore shades of deep gray, introduced themselves, presenting me with the garland of their Anglo-Saxon names, impeccably and modestly intertwined. Suddenly, a man who was obviously drunk pointed at the music box which I was still holding and asked brusquely,

"What the hell do you have in there? The family jewels?" I stuck my tongue out at him, causing a slight, barely perceptible ripple in the group.

"None of your business," I retorted, and turning to talk to Peregrine, saw the drunk man make his way, limping slightly, to the bar. I moved myself over to where he had been standing and felt the rug pushed down and smooth under my bare feet.

No, I didn't love Tiercel Margrave at first sight, or on second sight either, the way you're supposed to in the enchanted-evening or strangers-in-the-night tradition; I didn't feel any warm electric waves or mystic illuminations or any of that crap. What I did see was a man in his fifties, about my height, definitely drunk but still in control, tired-eyed, his features a blurred version of his brother Peregrine's. We chatted when he came back from the bar, our initial skirmish forgotten or mutually forgiven, and I remember now with amazement how easily I turned away from him to find Marion and give her the music box—how eagerly I went towards the group of women who watched my approach with curiosity, some hostility and a singular lack of amusement. I stretched my toes a bit to draw attention to them and answered their polite inquiries about Jos.

They had all been at college with him and apparently they considered him to be the village eccentric—he had gone to Marrakech by jeep, he had been an extra in numerous Italian movies starring either Steve Reeves or Lex Barker and he had managed his candy factory while going to divinity school. The theological part of Jos' life thus revealed surprised me, but I quickly realized that I had known that Jos prayed; there was something going on in the back of those hard blue eyes which could not be explained by emotion, humor or detachment.

Those neat, inconspicuous, expensively-dressed women! How easily I could have become one of them if I had heeded my mother or Aunt Maeve, instead of tearing off to be with Aunt Valancy, the "world's greatest unjustifiably ignored bilingual novelist" (her own words) and being ruined and undermined (my mother's phrase) from the age of seventeen on. How regular and ordered my life would have been, with one or two semi-serious engagements and football weekend love affairs and then marriage and a ten-room house and drip-dry clothes for the children and a connubial interest (feminine, constant but never threatening) in company law or chartered accountancy! I knew as I stood in Marion's living room that I was beyond the string of matched pearls and the weekend dinners with college friends; I would never be one of those women. I was aware that they looked well-kept and were probably reasonably content most of the time and that I was rangy, squalidly-dressed and had a wild look in my eye. Let's forgive one another, I said to them silently as we chatted about their children, and I had a kind of instant nostalgia (add a little rationalization and stir) for what I could never be. One of the illusions I guard about myself is that I am capable of being anything—a murderer, a veterinarian or even a wife; the difference lies only in what I want to be. I can never imagine life without this variety of possibilities and my choosing between them. The illusion of freedom, Aunt Valancy would have said mockingly, is more important to the prisoner than the freedom itself.

As we were all leaving, I saw that the Margrave brothers were not collecting women around them and I heard Tiercel say, in his slurring tenor which sounded so un-Canadian and yet wasn't foreign, that Betty would be sorry that she hadn't been able to come, but he was sure that she would call Marion when Gretchen was better.

I was about to say a collective good-bye to them with the distance of the front steps between us when Tiercel came directly towards me, and gripping my elbow, said,

"You can't go on working in a candy factory, even if it is owned by Jos Leyden. I'll give you a job."

I tugged my arm away, more as a gesture than anything else, because I had liked his touch but I always felt, until I knew Tiercel, that drunk men should have things made hard for them.

"What have you got against cheap candy?"

"Never eat it. Come for dinner tomorrow night. A nice party. Perry will bring you, he likes you."

I looked at him, at the shape of his head against the porch light and I saw how intent he was. It changed his whole appearance, that intentness; it sharpened him and I suddenly thought that he wasn't drunk anymore.

"Yes, I'll come with Perry. But only with him."

I could feel myself deliberately holding his look and was astonished to feel a kind of self-loathing for using that trick—the suddenly-widened eyes and the slight frown. But his expression didn't change as he said,

"Good. Where are you staying?"

"Jos' office." He paused.

"All right. Jos' office. Perry will pick you up at seven."

When I got back to Dufferin Street, Jos was still there, going through some files. He made me some Postum while I called the hospital and they told me that Da had had a restless night. Jos brushed my hair in that competent, even way he has and when he thought I had had enough, he fluffed it up with his fingers and then separated it and put a piece over each of my shoulders. He made no comment when I told him I was going to Tiercel Margrave's for dinner the next night but he did look intrigued when I said I was to be picked up by Peregrine Margrave.

"What's the matter? Is he married?" A trace of a smile shadowed Jos' face as he shook his head.

"Well, I liked him a lot. Better than his brother. He won't try to convert me, will he?"

"No, Regina, never fear. He has enough to do without that."

I wanted to ask what that was, but I could see Jos wanted to call a halt to the conversation and I decided to play the good sport by telling him to go home and go to bed.

I hadn't had to meet a group like Marion's party for some time, and I guess the impact of social converse had overstimulated me; at any rate, I couldn't sleep. Mind you, that isn't unusual for me; I have a whole twilit insomniac existence in which I try to read (thereby avoiding the issue of night and sleep entirely) or prowl around my room in the darkness having imaginary conversations with Aunt Valancy or the man who reads the ten o'clock news on the radio.

Sometimes I want to tell Jos about these conversations, especially when we are working late with our tallies in the stockroom. All the green and yellow and red jellybeans, the rosebuds and the imitation Smarties would be lying on trays and in jars and we would have stock sheets in front of us and Jos would look up and say,

"Regina, did you eat two bags of Rosy Crystal Drops? They have disappeared as though they had never been." And I would answer,

"Woe is me, caught in the act! Can I be forgiven for my intemperate lust for sweet things?"

Then we would return to our work—our ritual and fictitious communication done for the moment. Actually, I hate candy, and Jos Leyden's candy factory is the least tempting place I have ever worked in. Even when I tested television tubes, I was more tempted to steal one than I am to take a raspberry jujube. A question of taste, not essential, but real all the same. I wouldn't be working there if it hadn't been for Jos and that first morning in Austria.

*

There had been a pile of apricots in the heavy brown net by the wall. I was really quite hungry—I hadn't eaten for two days except for some coffee and some raisins—and was trying to eliminate the rotten and wormy ones. It was the hour just before dawn, which Jean-Gilles used to call entre le chien et le lour (it was the hour when he left to creep home to his wife, his briefcase and his respectability) and a gray-pink light was slowly spreading over the apricot tree, over the white wall of the goat-house against which it grew and over the lake below us. There he was, thin and accidentally brown-looking, like a piece of pine furniture stained walnut by mistake, picking through the fruit with me.

"Hungry?:" His voice was cool and clinical. He handed me an almost perfect fruit.

"Very." I jammed the apricot in my mouth, separated the pit from the flesh with my tongue and spat out the pit.

"You American?" He took some of the greener fruit that was still hanging on the boughs and put them in his haversack."

"No, Canadian. You too?"

He nodded. We ate in silence. His features were sharp and his hair looked burnt-out, as though it had suffered from a flash-fire.

"Hitch-hiking?"

And then I found myself telling him why I was there in Hallstadt, how I had left Madame Gratien at Cabris when things had become too difficult with Jean-Gilles, how I was thinking of drowning myself in that cold Austrian lake. I wasn't really, but I thought I'd try him out with a little emotional extravagance right at the start and see how he could take it. He said nothing, but looked interested—I silently gave him top marks for sangfroid and for seeing through me. We walked on towards my hotel; he stared at it.

"How can you afford to stay there when you have to steal the birds' fruit to eat?"

I explained to him that I had come to Hallstadt determined to stay in the room with the best possible view of Salzkammergut and the lake; I had money enough to pay for that if I didn't eat.

Well, Jos paid for my meal—and for two months of meals after that. I wasn't entirely broke (I still had my watch and gold earrings which made me rich) but I wanted him to pay for me, because he was getting nothing in return. Over that first bowl of coffee, I suppose I had naïvely assumed that we would sleep together and all my problems, financial and emotional, would be solved for at least ten days. Not that I was particularly attracted to him, but he didn't repel me either and that was a start. I was just waiting and seeing. Curiously, though, my feeling for Jos (and I assume his for me) never went beyond that first day of calm talk beneath a placid morning sky with a cold lake directly below us. Whenever I think of a completely neutral country, I think of Jos Leyden; to me he is a human Switzerland—self-contained, respected and inviolable. After all that has happened, I still feel this, though now we are kept apart by the chasm of total understanding.

I remember how he reached over for my haversack that morning and casually ransacked the contents of it until he found my passport.

"Mary Regina Adler," he said aloud, pronouncing my name the Latin way which I love—Raygeena—perfectly seriously, as though it were beautiful and not the capital of Saskatchewan, for which, God help me, I was named.

"The name of Kierkegaard's great love," he noted dryly. "I'm writing a musical comedy all about that. The greatest love story of the nineteenth century. The world is hardly ready for it yet." He eyed me with mock appraisal.

"And you're not yet, either. But sometime." I didn't know whether to believe him; I found it easier to listen to his account of his thesis about star imagery in Victorian poetry and his passion for Scrabble.

"Also," he concluded somewhat breathlessly, "I've seen every movie ever made" (there was a curious tone of genial deprecation), "and Susan Hayward is my favorite actress. Did you see her in The President's Lady? A great star." He drew out of his pocket a small white card on which was printed:

JOSIAH LEYDEN
Manufacturer of candies and delicacies.
1234 Dufferin Street,
Toronto 17, Canada

I was rescued from destitution and hunger by an immigrant producer of gumdrops. Of course, I didn't realize at the time that Jos' business was quite phenomenally sucsful and that practically every vending machine in the country carried his candies, made, bagged and distributed by him. His father had started the business when he came out from Holland in 1948 with three hundred dollars and Jos had taken it over at age nineteen, when his father died. Except for an incidental loss when Jos decided to challenge the dairies' monopoly of popsicles, the profits have steadily mounted.

But I am getting ahead of myself, talking about the success of Jos' business (my ill-disguised longing for the crass and secure, Tiercel would have said). That morning in the Hallstadt was the beginning of our relationship. How I hate that word! I would like to use something simple and meaningful like "friendship" instead, but I don''t really know if it applies to Jos and me. He is much more a background, a frame, than a real presence; sometimes we hardly speak for weeks—out of habit, not animosity—and yet there are so many things which I have never told him, and also too many things which I have told him. He always smiles and asks the right questions and lets me talk or not talk, but we never get at each other. With Jos, I never feel relief, or change or joy; I just feel—well, Jos.

We traveled for the rest of the fall together, looking at baroque mainly because that was what Jos wanted to do and I tagged along, passively looking when told and appreciating in tune to Jos: thousands of cubic meters of marble altars the color of raw legs of veal with nubile anges and puffy blue skies painted above them. We stared at a great deal of wrought iron, which Jos caressed when the guards weren't looking as though the black curves. were human flesh; we compared the quality of stucco at Melch with that at the Hermitage. With Jos, everything was effortless—traveling in the Soviet Union (where he bought black market rubles with a dry ease which I, even at my most larcenous, was too terrified to emulate), getting rooms or taxis where there weren't any (at Salzburg and Bayreuth at the height of the festivals and we in our dirty shorts) and generally never taking no for an answer. We've never been lovers and we never will be and neither of us seems to be sorry. I used to wonder in the first few months whether things wouldn't have started out differently if I hadn't been grieving for (romantic phrase calling up Ruth in fields of alien corn and solitary maidens weeping into their golden hair) Jean-Gilles, the bastard. Anyway, I told Jos about Jean-Gilles, the aging seducer of the working girl (I lied a great deal about him at first—less later) with his apartment in the rue Dominique which had been in his family for generations and which I, naturally, have never seen. Jean-Gilles, passionate and smelling of garlic in the pungent late afternoon, with his quick, tiny wife and two children (the second one an accident), going to the country on Saturday mornings in his Renault Dauphine, leaving me to wander through the streets of Paris as though they were museum corridors. It seemed important to me at that time in Europe to paint him to Jos as a wicked despoiler, but in reality, he was so far from that that you could almost say that I seduced him. Yes, I did really, but my mind was only half-committed to it, and he was saying je ne peux pas me passer de toi with damp eyes, before you could count three, and there was Regina Adler with another mess on her hands, initially caused by pity coming up in her like a burp.

Because Aunt Valancy was in Italy, I was living in a little hotel on the Quai d'Anjou and my work consisted of having lunch each day with a group of French businessmen to give them practice in English conversation. It was easy, I gained weight, and I met Jean-Gilles. When I realized how much he cared for me, I began to be deliberately unreasonable, demanding things—presents, more time, a meeting with his wife. He did the first two (the l watch, the earrings) but steadfastly refused the last.

It is a funny contrast, but the first thing Tiercel did after meeting me at Marion;'s was to introduce me to his wife. It was as though Tiercel was the French one and Jean-Giles the hypocritical Canadian. But Tiercel wasn't ever ordinary; he was himself. Tiercel always wanted to challenge me; I never stopped being surprised or alarmed by him.

Well, Jean-Gilles became quite agonized and even stopped eating; I demanded more gifts and more time and he finally told me that he would have to stop seeing me. I cried and became hysterical (O ritual, thy name is Regina!) and the next day I received a money order by pneumatique which enabled me to go to Cabris to accept a job from old Madame Gratien whose companion was dying of advanced virginity. Then a cable arrived from Jean-Gilles, begging to be forgiven for his clumsiness and stupidity and offering me not only a meeting with his wife but a holiday in Brittany with them. How that poor, anguished, gauche man could have managed that, I can't imagine. But I cabled back and ran off to Austria. I have an instinct for total destruction and like to pull darkness around me when I leave. That last phrase was Tiercel's, then, he was a poet and poets often will do anything for an image.

NON MERCI MOI JE PEUX: TRÈS BIEN ME PASSER DE TOI

Halfway through my trip in baroque Europe, I received a cable from my mother (I think she would catch up with me if 1 went to Hell; in fact, she often used to tell us when we were children that she would):

STAY AND ENJOY YOURSELF HOUSE BEING PAINTED YOUR FATHER IS DAYING.

Jos realized more quickly than I that the cable meant my father was dying and we paced up and down between the acts of Taminauser arguing about whether I should go home or not. I didn't want to go; I couldn't believe the cable. I felt I would know, deep inside myself (where my mother said there was a soul—albeit a wicked one) if it was true. I felt nothing, no loss, no knowing. And so I could not believe that my father the falconer was dead. And I was right; he didn't die that quickly, but my mother was also right, he was dying faster than the rest of us. So I didn't go home and I didn't answer the cable and there was a kind of amusement and a shocked respect in Jos' eyes when he looked at me from time to time after that.

*

How can I describe Betty Margrave? She is the kind of woman who looks as though she wears glasses, but doesn't. She is Tiercel's wife and the mother of his children. She was chosen in his youth and hope as the suitable accompaniment to his desires and dreams (I always phrase things this way when I feel both emotional and awkward.) And if anybody ever loved Tiercel Margrave as much as I did, it was Betty Margrave. Which is probably why I find it difficult to describe her. If I can take myself back to that first evening when Peregrine and I walked into the Margraves' living room, perhaps I can recapture the feeling that I had about Betty, before I began being obsessed by the idea of her as Tiercel's wife.

We were late arriving because I had rushed over to Jos' house at the last minute to borrow his Italian gold silk bathrobe which he bought just before we got on the plane in Milan. Jos, in case I forgot to mention it, is 6 feet 5 inches tall and his bathrobe makes a lovely dress for me. But his mother had different ideas and we had a small altercation when she wanted me to "wear a dress like all the other girls." Jos' mother is strong, uneducated and has fixed ideas about feminine beauty, garnered mainly from Eaton's catalogue. By the time I got back to the factory, Jos had disappeared and the special order of marzipan had been left lying on the molding table (probably by him-he loves marzipan and tests the quality of each batch himself) so I put it into trays and into the cool room. Peregrine turned up, apologizing, suddenly making me realize that we were, in fact, late.

His clerical collar was narrow and it effectively cut off his head from the rest of him, emphasizing the length of his skull, the prominence of his jaw and the pale gold of his hair. I asked him to wait in the main workroom while I put some vaseline on my chin and forehead (a trick I learned when I modeled; it gave what Billy Brustein called "that innocent never-seen-it-all-before look"). Peregrine looked at me calmly as I walked out of the tiny bathroom and asked,

"Don't you ever wear shoes?"

I had really forgotten about my feet and was annoyed with myself because I didn't want Peregrine to think of me in a barefoot free-spirit stereotype. I realized then that I valued his opinion of me, as I valued Jos', objectively and unemotionally. I found my ballet slippers and Peregrine explained to me that he was late because one of his boys had had to be bailed out that afternoon.

"What boys?" I asked.

Peregrine told me that he ran a halfway house for male prisoners out of his run—down parish. He put it in a humorous way, but I could see immediately how important the work was to him. He asked me to drive, as he felt somewhat preoccupied. I was delighted; my idea of the perfect job would be as the chauffeur of a homosexual millionaire who would like me to drive him on photographic safaris through the zoos of Europe and the parks of East Africa. I would be driving continually, I would have all my time for myself and I could see as many animals as I wanted. I was having such a delightful fantasy about this that I got us lost somewhere west of Christie and missed the opening to Wychwood Park several times. The technique of driving is one thing, the direction another.

Betty Margrave's first words to me, after Tiercel introduced me, were "Miss Adler," which surprised me by its formality. Then she smiled and a warmth fell out of her, spilled out, so that her presence filled the space between us. Slightly overweight, her black hair drawn into a soft and inefficient bun at the nape of her neck, she was as tall as I was, her hands and feet smaller than mine, her voice strangely flat, but soft.

Tiercel brought me a drink and instead of handing it to me, he took my right hand in his and clasped it around the glass for me. Perhaps that was the first time I looked at Tiercel and saw the hard tiredness of his eyes, the lines grooved around them, the eyes themselves opaque and hazel, somberly challenging. I felt those eyes for the first time, as though I were a piece of film on which an image was being imprinted. His hand remained around mine, as though I were insulating him from the frosted coolness of the glass, and when I looked down at that hand, a great exultation raced through me, as though every cell in my body were cheering. When I look at a man's hands, I know whether I want to be in them or not. Tiercel's hands were the most extraordinary that I have ever seen: lean, strong, the fingers half again as long as the palm, the nails flat and rectangular. And the skin on them dry and warm and seeming to be exactly the same temperature as my own. Yes, I count that as the first sight of Tiercel Margrave. I knew then that I wanted my body to be in those hands, but I didn't know yet about my heart.

"You are an incredible looking girl, Regina Adler. 'Hollow of cheek as though it drank the wind and took a mess of shadows for its meat.'"

I was disappointed by this opener, even with the nice dose of Yeats; I didn't want Tiercel Margrave to be banal. Of course, I am an incredible looking girl: I am as tall as the average man, my skin is dead white and I am twenty pounds underweight, according to the Canada Food Rules. What's more, I have a certain sullen appreciation of myself that I manage from time to time to foist on others.

"You look like a schoolgirl let loose in Malabar's—a perverse popsy."

"I'm thirty-two years old next week. Very mature. Not a popsy." He shook his head, smiling in such a way that his lower lip completely covered his upper one.

"No. A popsy. I'm old enough to be your father."

His hand dropped from mine and I had a sudden frenzied moment of missing it. I hastily took a long swallow; it tasted so fresh and clear, that double Scotch. Happy medicine, Willem used to call it.

"My father's dying. Are you?" He didn't flinch.

"Aren't we all?"

"Yes," I answered. "Yes." And I moved away from him to a crowd of people I didn't know, to be introduced, to have my bathrobe commented on (it comes from Milan—the newest look). But he followed me and took my elbow; it felt so different from the night before in front of Marion's when I had felt his grip as an intrusion.

"Let go." I said it over my shoulder without looking at him.

"I haven't finished yet. Very rude popsy."

I put down my drink in an ashtray (there didn't seem to be any coasters and I decided that Betty Margrave would mind if I left a ring on the inlaid mahogany side table).

"Glad you didn't let go."

I wheeled on him suddenly. He lit a cigarette and said softly,

"What am I supposed to do, grovel in appreciation for that remark?" I grabbed at a cherry tomato as it was whisked by in a bowl.

"Was the hem of my robe what you had in mind? Why is your voice so un-Canadian? Do you want to talk about death? Are you morbid?" We were speaking in very low tones for there were people all around us.

"What is your father dying of?"

"Cancer."

"Do you love him?"

"I don't know."

"Where did you get that scar?"

"From an untrained, frightened goshawk. My own fault." As I said this, I thought of his name, Tiercel, and his brother's, Peregrine. "Are your names family names?"

"Yes. We're a pair in a series. Family's sadly decayed, though. Dying of creeping middle-classness. Death by caution."

"Everyone in Canada is middle-class. It's the unavoidable national pastime. We'd feel guilty being anything else."

"You're right. You're not stupid. We were storekeepers in 1821. But we aren't now. Neither Peregrine nor I would be the least good at keeping a store."

"What do you do?" He looked at me, and blinked slowly with amusement.

"Everything. But basically, I'm a Senator."

"You can't be!"

"I take it you mean that as a compliment; I'm flattered. I'm also a stockbroker. Shall I invest your money for you?"

"Have none. But maybe I'll have a bit someday. My great-aunt who lives in Paris has paintings and things."

“You see—I might be useful after all.”
“Perhaps. I hate the principle of saving money.”
“What about all the silver pennies you were wearing last night?”
“Given to me. By a beautiful Arab with lust in his heart.” Poor gentle Ahmud, I always throw him into conversations with an extravagant disregard for his true character. "I sold myself to him for them.” Half a lie only—I don’t have a price; that’s what my mother means when she says I was undermined at an early age; she thinks always in terms of barter. “He could have bought two horses and a saddle with them.”
“Do you always make up stories as you go along?”
“Always.”
Apparently dinner had been announced, for everyone began moving towards the small dining room table laden with cold beef, cold ham and thank God, lots of salad. Peregrine caught up with me and smilingly detached me from his brother.
“Tiercel likes you.” It was stated flatly, as an observation.
“I like him. And you.” He squeezed my hand and it made me think of Jos.
“Hungry?” he inquired.
“I’m never hungry. I’ve been trained to eat; I’d never do it if I didn’dt have to. Waste of time.”
“Not silly ideas about dieting, I hope. You’re pretty close to the bone.”
“Hell, no. I couldn’t care less.”
“Your outfit is getting you lots of comments.” I shrugged.
“I don’t do it for that.” Which is not entirely true, but I already trusted Peregrine enough to tell him something positive and let him sort through the truth or falsity of it.
“You’re an ascetic.” Again that flat tone of observation.
“Very far from it. I was first seduced by my vocational guidance counsellor at the age of fifteen in the equipment room of the gym. There, in the shadow of a wooden horse, I decided for a life of arrogant sensuality rather than education, and here I am.”
“Flamboyant, if true.” He put a piece of ham on my plate and helped himseH to some alarming-looking cold macaroni with little red things all through it.
“Nice of you not to say lying! I don’t want to tire you with confessions.”
“Not a question of being tired.” I put the ham back on the silver serving platter. “How dreary. The same actions, all thirty-four of them, straight out of Leviticus via Saint Paul, repeated to you over and over again.”
Peregrine was about to reply, but Betty came up to him and told him there was a phone call. She turned to me and I was suddenly assaulted by her softness; it was like running into a massive soft curtain in the dark, trying to find your way to the bathroom.
“Are you enjoying working with Jos Leyden?”
So she knew about me. Tiercel had come home and said I’ve met an unusual young woman and I’ve invited her for dinner; she’s Jos Leyden's bookkeeper; be nice to her. I could see it in my mind; she had been sitting up waiting for him, her hair in braids, reading the paper that she hadn’t had time for all day because of her sick child.
“Yes. Jos is an entertaining boss.”
I said it that way in order to detach Jos from me in her eyes. Don’t think I’m so easily taken care of, lady; I have an eye on your husband. Betty paused for a moment, flicking her eyes over her guests, caring that they should eat her dreadful hams and stodgy salads, all lovingly prepared.
“We used to see a lot of Jos. When he was in Divinity with Perry.”
“Were they in the same year? Jos is a bit younger, isn’t he?”
“Perry was a schoolteacher for seven years before going back. He’s only been ordained for four years.”
I leaned on the edge of the sideboard and shoveled in some salad. Betty broke open a bun thoughtfully, examining its interior as though it might yield a secret.
“Make them yourself?” She nodded slowly.
“Is your little girl better?” Her face opened in a smile which transformed her face.
“Yes, thanks. Just some kind of bug that’s going around. Violent for a day or two and then today, not even a temperature. Would you like to see her? I don’t think she’s contagious any more.”
I was led upstairs over the beige broadloom into Gretchen’s room. It was painted white and there were tiny chairs and tables with plush bears and a Raggedy Ann sitting at them. By the low bed there was a night light with a merry-go-round slowly turning on it, the golden light tracing a pattern across the ceiling. As we peeked into her bed, she stirred but did not awaken. The night light showed tendrils of blond hair, like Peregrine's, surrounding a face whose soft rounded features were a miniature of Tiercel's.

"She looks like Tiercel," I volunteered, in a whisper. Betty hovered over the bed and adjusted the blankets gently.

"My little luxury," she said softly, almost cooing.

I would normally have felt embarrassed or contemptuous of such a tone, but I didn't that night. There was a step behind us and I sensed that it was Tiercel. Betty put her finger to her lips without turning. He put his arm around his wife and around me and we hung over that child's bed, like some kind of unholy trinity, each with our own thoughts about love.

*

Gratton Fairfield, lean of body and pink of face, scion of the Hamilton Fairfields but with the daring to break away and found his own firm in Toronto, drove me home from that first party at Tiercel's. When I came down from Gretchen's bedroom, Peregrine was in the act of rushing away to meet a new arrival for his house at Union Station and he apologized, but didn't offer to take me along. Betty parceled me out to Gratton, as he was the only person who seemed to be driving west and he gallantly behaved as though 1234 Dufferin Street were not out of his way at all.

Gratton is a healthy-looking man who plays squash; he is full of decency and fair play and never forgets Mother's Day. He probably even believes in it. His wife is a championship golfer whose elegant legs I had noticed earlier in the evening, but she had rushed home just after dinner to placate an edgy baby-sitter. Her husband, meanwhile, stayed on to give Regina Adler a kindly lift back to her factory (full of genial bonhomie for the working classes), and in the act of reaching over to open the door for her (to unlock it, he said) he made a not-undetermined pass at her.

Determined but awkward; my head bumped against the window and hurt so much I said ouch. At which point, he seemed to regain both courage and facility and kissed me with an expertness and desire to please which engendered my total cooperation. As his tongue slid perceptively along mine, I decided (a) that he was not drunk and (b) that I wished he were Tiercel. The last thought surprised and stimulated me and Gratton Fairfield received a vicarious bonus caused by my mind knowing bloody well what my body was doing. But as suddenly as he had begun, Gratton stopped; I suppose he'd told his wife he'd be home at a certain time. I really began to think of Tiercel then, while exchanging a quite delicate, ludicrously demure good night with Gratton and saying Yes, it really would be very nice if he would call me.

I never cease to be surprised by something which must for want of any other phrase be called sexual compatibility. Gratton, until the moment when our heads bumped, had been a tan, ruddy-faced man—nothing more. I was not warned by any of my responses to him that he would be the least bit sexually attractive to me. But he had been, even though I had thought of Tiercel throughout that stimulating and incomplete grappling in the car. I suppose we all begin with romantic notions that we will have a hint from a voice or gesture that this is really going to be it.

I remember being suddenly swooped upon ten years ago by a handsome and famous man in a moonlit orchard; I had heard his name for years, I had admired him all evening and the setting was perfect. Yet when he kissed me, I thought I might break out in hives. I let him make love to me, just to make sure, and it was a distinct and pallid failure. Certainly there is such a thing as a chemical reaction which has nothing to do with romance or technique or will, and men find it more difficult to face than I do, especially the ones, like my handsome and famous friend, who think that everyone is more or less a good lay. I always make a point of telling them immediately if it won't work, and it is then that I am always surprised at how incurably, wretchedly romantic men are, even when all evidence is to the contrary.

Gratton called the next day, offering me lunch—very civilized and not at all necessary. I had already decided that I liked him well enough to take him on as a lover, but the preliminaries seemed to be necessary to him, the simple man, so I said Yes. I told Jos about the whole evening including Gratton, but leaving out my new reactions to Tiercel. He listened and offered the observation that Gratton Fairfield was a devout Roman Catholic, a lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Navy Reserve and a pillar of the symphony.

"Why in hell should I care about all that crap?" I handed Jos a cup of coffee.

"I don't know that you should care. But you should know."

"Not interested." And I wasn't. The person I wanted to hear about was Tiercel Margrave, but Jos probably knew that and for some reason any information he had was not forthcoming.

That afternoon after lunch at Gaston's and a bit of soulful glancing during dessert, Gratton and I went to bed together in his father's company's suite at the King Eddie. From the first (excluding that unfortunate head- bumping incident) Gratton has been adroit and careful. As he undressed, folding his suit and waistcoat neatly (he had to return to his office later to pick up calls), he inquired as to whether I took the pill. I answered Yes as I slipped into the bed; then he asked whether I wanted him to wear a prophylactic or not. That question annoyed me so intensely that I turned my head into the chilly hotel pillow and murmured, "Fuck off, you stupid bastard," in English and French, against the cold case. Gratton said innocently,

"Pardon me? I couldn't hear what you said, Regina."

And then I remembered what Jos had said about his having been in the Navy; I guess his V.D. drill had always stood him in good stead. So then I said gently that I didn't think so. (Question A in the Gratton Fairfield Selection Examination for Suitable Sexual Partner: Do you now have, or have you ever had, syphilis or gonorrhea?) Then he lay down beside me and I discovered that he was not the type of man who is only interested in getting a woman into bed but doesn't really care what he does once he's got her there. For all the iciness of his preliminaries, Gratton was satisfying and grateful and I was sorry that I had wanted to snap at him. I remember that afternoon so well, because that was the first time I thought entirely of another man while enjoying sex with someone else. And I really did enjoy it; I would give Gratton a certificate or three stars or Michelin crossed forks and spoons any time, Tiercel notwithstanding.

I am trying to remember whether it was merely that no one had made love to me for seven months (since Jean-Gilles) that made my initial encounter with Gratton work so well. I have never longed for sexual contact until I meet someone with whom I want to have it; then suddenly it becomes interesting, and in the case of my love for Tiercel, almost uncontainable. I have never just needed a man, although I suppose sometimes a headache or a stomach upset or inebriation after one beer might be what my sister (who is a psychologist) would call sublimated need. My great-aunt Valancy who is so aged and selfish that she has never loved a man in her life draws the distinction between brutish activity and resolved activity.

Whatever you call it, I know that I can only appreciate a lover who talks well before and after and is good during. Before Tiercel, resolved activity always meant someone like Ahmud. Willem, Jean-Gilles or Gratton—chemical compatibility, consideration and a certain amount of confusion as to what I was really up to. I don't mean that I deliberately set out to mystify, but I have found that men are always confused by a woman who is in full control of all her faculties and yet makes no demands, emotional or otherwise, before what my Aunt Maeve quaintly refers to as her "surrender."

Aunt Valancy went to great pains to teach me that pleasure does not bring love nor love pleasure; that there was in fact, no necessary correspondence between them (she had absorbed Gide to the point where she was sure that most of his ideas were her own), and I had never found out what the correspondence meant until Tiercel.

*

My visits to my father in the hospital were not auspicious. For one thing, I dreaded meeting my mother or Aunt Maeve there; my total contact with my mother since my return had been my sending her my Air Canada ticket with Arrived scrawled across the back of it. In return I received a receipt from the Longstreet Housepainters and an agenda for a Voice of Women weekend seminar. In this way, my mother and I were aware that we were both alive and in Toronto, without having to risk the inevitable abrasions of personal contact.

My mother and I had reached the stage of cold peace where we did nothing that might cause a spontaneous eruption of the bitterness and anguish which is latent between us. It is one of those unspoken family understandings which my mother's family, the Hobbes, are so good at.

Your father, my mother used to say to us when we were small, was never received in Toronto by my family because he was foreign. The word foreign came to have a meaning associated with the Hobbs, a special meaning which only had a significance in relation to them. My mother would go on to recount that only Aunt Maeve (her eldest half-sister) had been good enough to receive us at tea when we were making our way from Saskatchewan to Ottawa. Relations between Aunt Maeve and my mother gradually achieved a tepid state approaching an understanding and from the age of eleven on, I used to spend some time in the summer (usually around Exhibition time) with my sister Alta (yes, she was born in Edmonton), with Aunt Maeve and her strange husband, Clough, in the house where my mother was brought up in Rosedale.

Nothing in that house had changed in sixty years, except the dust. Uncle Clough spent the better part of his days in winter polishing silver and doing something unspecified in the attic; in the summer, he rode his balloon-tired C.C.M. bike around the streets and slept between lunch and dinner. I only realized when he died three years ago that poor Uncle Clough had been an alcoholic for most of his life, but naturally we did not learn it from Aunt Maeve. It was tacitly assumed that we understood and that we would never speak of it. For the Hobbses, understanding and subsequent silence are linked like confession and absolution.

So my foreign father lay dying in the Toronto General Hospital for nearly a year but I didn't know then that it would be for so short or so long a time. I can see his head against the pillow now, that large, thin nose with the hook in it so close to the bridge that the rest of that remarkable feature seemed to hang down from it with an eerie elephantine grace. My mother used to tell us regularly how relieved she was that none of us had inherited our father's nose, although some of us (namely me) had inherited his surly, unruly temperament.

"Temperament" was a word used by my mother to describe anything which she didn't feel herself. It was temperament which drove my father from Germany to France to England to a homestead during the Depression, to school-teaching in Regina, to selling sod in Ottawa; it was temperament which made him unsure of what his income was from year to year (once when I had to ask him for a school questionnaire, he laughed and said, "Pick a figure"); it was temperament which made him take up falconry as a hobby.

My father got his first falcon before I was born, when we were living in Saskatchewan in that place I was named after, and he trained it patiently in the garage, making it hop farther and farther each day for food, hooding it between encounters, letting it suffer the weight of the jesses on its claws, until he was sure enough of it to take it out and let it fly for him. Fly it did, straight at me, leaving a two-inch gash just above my right eyebrow, and then away from my father, until it disappeared over the horizon. But some dream of emperors and kings made him persist and he obtained another one shortly after, training it more successfully this time.

There were a series, but only one was important. Her name was Calliope and she had bright, mad, yellow eyes, a wingspan of 4½ feet and tense claws; she was a good hunter and caused him to have a visit from the local Humane Society, who not only thought he was crazy, but also thought he was ruining game for the good, civilized hunters with their twenty-twos and their shotguns. We were strange enough anyway in that prairie town: my father with his English accent, clipped short by his faintly Germanic intonations, his small pointed brown beard, his concern for the uncommercial; my mother pale and publicly quiet, a concern for good works masking a latent hysteria and rage which became the constant background of our lives, like the slow drumming of percussion in a Wagner opera.

There was a large, brown Easter egg sitting on the night table beside my father's head and 1 knew at once that it must be a present from my mother. My father dislikes sweet things as much as 1 do, and even if he hadn't, cancer of the stomach would have inhibited his activities. But my mother is fond of the celebration of small events (I myself had received a chocolate bunny three days previously—talk about coals to Newcastle) and she insists on celebrating them, regardless of circumstance. I began to tell my father about working with Jos (I thought he would be pleased with my salary) and Jos' thesis on star symbolism and Jos' interest in baroque churches, but he interrupted me with his eyes closed, reaching for an Export.

"Doing any modeling?"

I said No, I wasn't; the one photographer who likes to use me, Billy Brustein, was doing a large assignment for the government ("Boost the White Fox Industry") somewhere near the tree line.

"I'm tired of it. I'm wasting my life."

I always speak like this to my father. Mutual optimism has never been one of the games we've played with one another. He shrugged his thin shoulders.

"You were born to do that. Not like your sister."

Alta wanted to be a psychologist from the time she saw James Craig rescue Olivia de Havilland from madness in The Snake Pit; she married a man who reminds me a lot of Olivia de Havilland. Thank God they live in Vancouver.

"Your mother giving you any money?"

"I don't need it; I just told you what Jos is paying me." My father shook his head upon the pillow, his long, white hair crackling.

"I'm not saying you need money. Get it from your mother. It's yours by right."

I didn't answer, letting my father rave on about the Hobbs fortune which rightfully belonged to his daughters; it is the one area where he cares anything about money as a thing in itself and where he is totally unreasonable. The Hobbses perhaps did have money of a certain kind once, but my father made them sound like Canada's Rockefellers, which they most certainly aren't. My mother had had a useless and elegant education to prepare her to be an upper-middle-class matron; it was all wasted, she pointed out to us frequently, when she met and married my father in London. Fortunately for her, her share of the Hobbses' assets was intricately bound up in trusts and agreements and inviolable capital; our Canadian wanderings were financed (as were my father's singularly futile business ventures) by the tiny bank-strangled income on forty thousand dollars. Once when I asked my father whether he had been aware of my mother's quasi-heiress status, he said,

"I was crazy to marry her, even if she had a million dollars." Which was not really an answer nor was it meant to be. The nurse asked me to leave when she came in with some bottles and a white tray and I said to my father,

"Do you want me to bring you anything? I'll come the day after tomorrow."

"Your mother does all that. Go and see her; it'll make her happy."

Typical of my father to say something like that at the end of a visit. And so typical too that it should be a half-meaningful statement, recalling all the emotions that I refuse to feel for either my mother or my father. Happiness has never been a concept in our family: survival, triumph, hatred, resentment-yes—but happiness—no. I remember telling my mother when I was five or six that I wasn't happy; her crisp, white-bloused back was turned to me as I said it and she replied over her shoulder,

"Of course you're not happy; children are never happy; you'll be happy when you grow up."

Since it was a promise that her own maturity had not fulfilled, I remember it as a saying only, barren of any significance except the delusion of thinking of happiness as temporally possible.

My father asked me to bring Jos the next time I came, if he could spare the time from his overdue thesis. Then he asked,

"Any interest in women?"I caught the nurse's curious look, traveling from my father to me.

"Likes them. Likes me most. But not particularly hungry for female companionship."

Female companionship was my father's general circumlocution for intimate relations between the sexes; he is really a very shy man. My father lay back and closed his eyes.

"Hunger, hunger. What kind of word is that to describe delicate emotions? Make sure your mother feeds Calliope a little less than usual; she's not getting any exercise." I hadn't realized that Calliope was still alive and suddenly wanted to see her very much.

"Bye-bye, Mrs. MacGregor; mind your carrot patch."

My father always likes to remind me of my earliest childhood, before I could read. I bent to kiss his dry, slightly mottled cheek and he neither accepted it nor rejected it; he was passive, but at least he didn't cringe the way he did when my sister Alta, determined to turn us all into the average Canadian family, full of love and trust, threw her arms around him when she greeted him.

My father never held my hand when I was a child, nor did he seek or give kisses, pats on the cheek or hair-rumplings. He didn't reach to help me when I stumbled beside him, determined to keep up with him as he marched across the fields, his arm held rigid in front of him, supporting his falcon; if he felt kind, he would watch silently while I picked myself up and brushed off some mud from the scrapes; if he was not, he would mutter "stupid" or "careless" to the wind that blew around us. But it never occurred to him (or to me either) that he would help me or pity me. The closest we ever came to embracing was when we stroked Calliope together, when she had had a bad day with no prey caught and her hunting blood had to be stayed by gentle hands. Then when I saw my father soothe Calliope, I felt as though I were the bird, hooded, leather-thonged and captive, allowing myself to accept an alien will with sympathy and love as the price of my surrender.

"Bye-bye, Da. I'll bring Jos."

I went directly to meet Gratton at the Ward-Price auction preview. We met by pre-arrangement in the old-books room and proceeded slowly around the gallery, examining Louis Quinze furniture made the day before yesterday and Kroehler dining room suites. Gratton was looking at Royal Crown Derby china (Edna collects pattern 1432) and he put in a reserve bid and then we went next door to Fran's for coffee. Gratton was always very careful about establishing the proper alibi (unlike Tiercel whose carelessness was arrogant and who kissed me in plain view of three hundred people on the grounds of Government House, but more about that later) and he vented a great deal of what in another person might be called fantasy on contriving situations in which it was plausible that we could have met by accident: the HOME show at the C.N.E., St. Lawrence Market late on Saturday morning, the A&A record shop. When I think of the amount of organization that Gratton put into our meetings, I realize what a very competent man he is.

This second encounter of ours was less pleasing than the first; Gratton ejaculated while he was still undressing me and we had to wait three quarters of an hour before he could manage a second erection. Then he was hurried and oblivious and seemed to want to get it over as quickly as possible. I know he was disturbed by his lack of timing; like most men, Gratton holds great store by his ability to perform according to a certain pattern—erection, entrance, ejaculation and exit. The four E's of virility are very important to someone like Gratton; they are the signposts of self-assurance. I am always glad that I don't depend on such mechanical physical manifestations; if sex is nice, that's very good, but if it isn't, that's too bad but nothing is there for tears.

Gratton was overcome with embarrassment and anxiety, and turning his head against the pillow, he confided that Edna allowed him to make love to her only two or three times a year—usually Christmas Eve and her birthday, and sometimes the weekend they opened up their cottage. I pretended to be incredulous, but I have heard this sort of thing before. He nodded wretchedly.

"And then she feels terrible for three days afterwards. Headaches, nausea, bitchy. Not worth it. Honest to God, it isn't."

I sometimes think I should write an anonymous treatise on the sex life of the married woman whose husband has affairs. I've got reams of material stored in my head, most of it objectively astonishing. Like Edna Fairfield, for example—a sexy-looking blond in anyone's terms. I felt sorry for her with her remorse hidden in that perfectly articulated athlete's body, her dislike of something her husband was very good at. God knows what happens in other people's marriages; that is why I have never envied the wife of any man with whom I have ever had a love affair. Usually I am having my love affair because of them and for that, I owe them a small deference, like the excise stamps that used to go on checks.

Betty Margrave is the only wife I have truly envied, whose husband I was not content to let be her husband; Tiercel Margrave is the only man whom I loved so much I could never find it in my heart to pity him. …

256.76 Excerpt from Scream Quietly Or The Neighbors Will Hear\fn{by Erin Pizzey (1939-)} Tsingtao, Shantung Province, China (F) 8

… It would probably take a Charles Dickens to do full justice to the labyrinth of indifference, red tape, callousness, and simple incompetence that exists between people in need and so many of the agencies that are meant to help them from the DHSS\fn{Department of Health and Social Security; abolished in 1988} to the NSPCC.\fn{National Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. This book was published in 1977:H}

The women and children who end up at Women's Aid are living evidence of just one corner of that maze. They show that when a woman tries to gather herself and her children away from the muggings of a brutal husband, she can limp to her GP, stagger to the casualty ward, drag herself to the social worker, cry out to the police, beseech the Marriage Guidance Council, implore the Family Service Unit, plead with Dr. Barnardo's, beg the NSPCC and come away, through the swish of hands being compassionately washed in all directions, with only a babble of conflicting advice and not one jot of practical help.

5,500 women have come through Women's Aid so far, and every one of them adds evidence to the case that says the agencies which we might like to believe in as proof that ours is a humane society simply do not work. This chapter looks at some of the main agencies and how they fail.

In the rush of coping with so many cases in two and a half years, documentation at Women's Aid has sometimes been erratic. But 270 cases that I did manage to record in detail over one period give an idea of how widespread are both battering and official failure to deal with it. Incidentally in sixty-seven of those cases it wasn't just the mothers who were battered but the babies and children as well.

The cases were referred to Women's Aid by the social services, the police, the probation service, the Citizens' Advice Bureaux, St. John's Ambulance, doctors, hospitals, the Samaritans, Shelter, the NSPCC and the press.\fn{There follows a list of the locations of the referrals, and the text resumes as follows:}

Now let's look at some of the agencies who referred these cases to Women's Aid, and who still are referring cases, and see how they fail.

*

The motive behind the work of all family case-work organizations is the support and strengthening of the family. A battered wife struggling to break away from a disastrous marriage can expect little sympathy from a social worker, and in many cases she will experience downright hostility.

The social worker is trained to consider both sides of a marital problem, which is normally a just and fair approach, but where the woman is being savagely beaten it seems hardly reasonable to pause and weigh the merits of the case.

In the majority of cases where a battered woman presents herself at the social services she will be told that there is nothing that can be done for her because (a) she is technically not homeless, as she has a home to go to and a husband to maintain her, and therefore she is not the responsibility of the State; and (b) the social services cannot make a moral judgement on a marriage. By that they mean that they don't want to take sides—and giving a wife refuge presupposes guilt on the part of the husband. However, it never occurs to them that by refusing her refuge they presuppose that the husband is innocent.

The only real offer of help she will get is an offer by the social worker to visit the husband. This puts her in a dilemma because if she agrees and goes home after the social worker has visited him he may well beat her severely for putting him in a humiliating situation. Many is the husband who has promised total reform to a social worker only to round on his wife and black both her eyes half an hour later. It always amazes me to hear a social worker telephone and say,

"Mr. Jones has promised never to hit his wife again and I feel she should give it another try."

In that particular case the woman had been married for nineteen years. She had been battered so badly that her face looked like a ploughed field and both the children had been beaten ever since they were born.

Women's Aid was the first place that had offered her refuge in all that time. She had tried to get away many times and her case was well known in her area. Yet here was the social worker who knew the husband and his reputation and even admitted that he was frightened of him, saying that on the strength of a promise he advised this woman to go home. How any social worker believes that a man who has been violent for years can just suddenly stop overnight is beyond me. I feel that most social workers know very well that the man is not going to change, but when the wife has moved away they become the recipient of some of the man's aggression. Many of the husbands do make a menace of themselves, particularly if they believe the social worker knows where their wife is and is not telling them. Some social workers don't bother to keep it a secret. They give the husband our phone number or address, thus removing the burden from their own shoulders.

As most of these husbands have been violent since well before they married, it is hardly fair to insist that the problem lies within the marriage. But the social worker, trained or brain-washed into this limited form of thinking, will continue to plaster over the cracks, telling the mother that her husband is ill and needs her and that she must stay for the good of the children. This last comment is made in spite of overwhelming evidence from school, neighbours, etc., that the children are being severely damaged in the situation.

As social workers mostly deal with problem families they have come to accept that violence amongst their clients is the norm. They will produce arguments to prove that an uneducated man who beats his wife is showing an inarticulate form of love for her. When you point out that wife-battering is not a working-class syndrome and is spread right through society, they are amazed. This is because they have probably never come across a middle-class woman asking for help.

Social workers must learn to respect the woman they are there to help. Too many accept that beatings are a part of life and urge women to put up with them. Every time the mother turns up at the social services she is told that nothing can be done except to have her children taken into care. This is a terrible trap to fall into.

Once she agrees in desperation to hand over the children, she is then no longer considered a family. On her own without children she can probably find a bedsitter, but to get the children back she must find suitable family accommodation. But because she no longer has the children in her care she cannot be considered for council accommodation, so she faces the usually impossible task of finding and paying for a family house in the open market. Usually she loses the children for good except for visits. Then, all too often, nature takes over and she replaces them with yet more children.

Social workers who offer to take the children into care are well aware of these consequences but they don't ever warn the mother and they don't consider the inhumanity of depriving the children of the one parent that does love them.

Many social workers are angry and upset over the problems of battered wives but few take any steps to alter the situation. These problems have been allowed to exist for years in a supposedly sophisticated and caring welfare state. All social workers stand condemned by default because they knew and did nothing about it.

Social services have referred cases to Women's Aid from all over the country but none has ever paid us a penny for taking the mothers in. Hammersmith, who are one of our biggest customers, promised to pay but ignored our bills. Ealing, our second biggest customer, agreed that we took their families but said that as we were persona non grata they were unable to contribute to the cost. We have always been in a difficult position because the mothers matter far more than the money. When a social worker says that unless we take the family he will be forced to send them home we ask for money even though we know there is no chance of getting it—but we always take in the family.

Sometimes the social worker packs the family into a taxi and sends them off to us. The mother arrives with a piece of paper in her hand with our address but no idea of the social worker's name—some social workers make a point of not mentioning their name. Once the mother has spent the night in our boruogh the social workers from the original area can and do refuse to have any more to do with her because she has technically moved out of their area and thus lost all rehousing rights. Our borough quite rightly resents this approach because they now have some 200 extra mothers and children in Chiswick joining the already lengthy queue for housing.

It seems ridiculous that social services and social security are run from separate buildings because they are inextricably entwined. Instead of hand-in-hand policy between the two departments a rivalry exists and if, for example, a mother has had her gas and electricity turned off for non-payment, social services will argue that social security should pay part of the bill, and both sides will haggle while the mother sits in the cold and dark with her children.

Social workers are bound by all sorts of cumbersome rules and tied in official red tape. A major problem is that their only way towards better pay and job prospects is up the administrative ladder, so you soon lose the really gifted, humane social worker who has a family and a mortgage and cannot survive on the disgustingly low pay given to the field-workers. Within a few years he can be found with a long title, pushing an administrative pen for more money but less job-satisfaction and at the expense of the people who really need his skill and talent.

One bright ray of hope are the new community workers who are seconded to Women's Aid for a three-month training period. These people come from North London Polytechnic, LSE, Chiswick Poly and other places. They have been trained in community work and they are the future for the social services. They don't see themselves as some sort of guardians of society's conscience and handers-out of advice and bounty from above. They are moving away from the old idea that help from the social services is of an advisory nature and towards the idea that what the majority of people need is practical help to solve immediate problems.

I would like to see the present social services dissolved. In the place of these offices full of desks, typewriters and instructions in triplicate there should be large community houses with area social workers coming in daily to talk with the people who come in for advice or for a cup of coffee or to see the health visitors. The administration can be carried on in the Town Hall but the actual records kept on the clients could be reduced to a bare minimum.

At the moment there is little point in trying to get hold of a social worker in the morning because he will be in a meeting. These meetings go on all morning and then there is lunch and then he goes out to do his visits. This means that most of his clients who do not have telephones must lurk surrounded by children at phone kiosks and it can take days to get through to him.

I once asked a social worker what would happen if an emergency arose during one of the meetings and the client was unable to contact her social worker. The social worker said that there was a maxim used in his office to the effect that "If there is an emergency call, ignore it for twenty-four hours and it will go somewhere else." During the meetings the duty officer can be called to the phone, but of course he knows nothing of the case and is even less help than the social worker.

As most social workers come from a middle-class background or have been educated into middle-class prejudices, their attitudes to mothering and caring are largely inappropriate in working-class situations. Many times you will find a social worker more concerned about the cleanliness of the children than the quality of the loving, and far too ready to resort to the children's home should he feel that the mother is not coping. Many social workers will complain that the battered mother is a slut because she is dirty and dishevelled, never stopping to think what repeated vicious assaults must have done to her personality. Instead of a helping hand the mother gets the cold glare of disgusted authority, and it is no wonder that mothers arrive at Women's Aid full of hostility towards social workers and the welfare state.

*

The police attitude to wife-battering reveals an understandable but unacceptable schizophrenia in their approach to violence. Imagine that Constable Upright is on his beat one night and finds Mr. Batter mugging a woman in the street. Mr. Batter has already inflicted heavy bruises to the woman's face and is just putting the boot in when Constable Upright comes on the scene. The constable knows his duty and does it. He arrests Mr. Batter, who is charged with causing grievous bodily harm and goes to prison for ten years.

Ten years later Constable Upright is on his beat when he is sent to investigate screaming which neighbours have reported coming from the home of the newly released Mr. Batter. Mr. Batter is mugging his wife. He's thrown boiling water at her, broken her nose, and now he's trying for her toes with a claw hammer. When Constable Upright arrives what does he do? Does he make an arrest? Of course not.

He knocks on the door and Mr. Batter tells him to "sod off". He tells Mr. Batter that the neighbours are complaining and he wishes to see his wife. Mr. Batter says they have been having a minor row and he gets his wife who is looking bruised round the face and crying. The policeman will not arrest. In one case the husband even assaulted his wife in front of a policeman but still there was no arrest. All that he did was to advise her to go to the local magistrates' court the next morning and take out a summons against her husband, but he knew that she was unlikely to do this because she would have to live in the same house as her husband while she was taking him to court.

Some policemen are sympathetic and show a degree of understanding of the battered women's predicament, but the usual attitude from the police force is one of growing hostility as they are called out again and again to the same house and each time the woman refuses to take action. Soon the family gets well known to the police station and they take their time about going round.

I think the police become immune to violence, dealing as they do with so many forms of violent crime. It is far easier to fall into the habit of thinking of the woman as an ill-deserving slut than to watch helplessly as she reappears time and again, getting more and more desperate each time.

The police never seem to feel that it is their responsibility to notify social services or the NSPCC even when it is obvious to them that the children have been beaten. Time and time again we have had arguments with police stations when a mother has been beaten up and thrown out leaving the children with the husband. Usually the man has a history of violence and is already known to the police. The mother's first place of call is at the police station, where she will be told that as far as the children are concerned, possession is nine tenths of the law and there is nothing that the police can do about getting the children out. It would seem obvious that the police station should then notify one of the caring agencies that the children are at risk. But they don't.

One night we had a call from a couple who had found a small boy down the road, crying bitterly and covered in bruises. They called the police, who took a long time coming. While they were waiting, the couple thought of phoning us. We gathered that the boy was terrified. The bruises had been inflicted by his father in a drunken rage, and he didn't want to go home. We suggested that the couple bring the boy to us for the night and we would call in the NSPCC. Unfortunately, before this happened the police arrived at the couple's home and took the child off. We checked with the police station the next day and we were told that they had simply called in the parents who had taken the boy home. Had they notified the social services?

"Of course," came the prompt reply. I checked and they hadn't.

*

This congested organ of the welfare state\fn{Social Security} exists to alleviate suffering by handing out money to the poor and needy. By outlook and training the staff that sit behind the counter tend to consider that anyone coming to ask for money is shiftless and idle and to treat them accordingly. Yet the clerk at the counter is often taking home less than the families who are claiming, so they can't be blamed for being shitty sometimes.

As usual with huge organizations, too much emphasis goes or administration and too little on results. Too much money goes on the machine and too little to those it was set up to help Large sums are spent on snooping and prying in order to catch the relatively minuscule number of people who are cheating thereby proving to the public that social security is mindful of it duty as guardian of the public purse.

The first person a battered mother is likely to see will be the woman behind the reception desk at her local office. She will be told that they have no intention of giving her money becaus she has a home to go to and a husband to maintain her. Only if she can show proof that she is taking legal proceedings will they perhaps reconsider the matter.

Tears will not move them because there are usually two or three people in tears either of misery or rage at the treatmen they are receiving. Small children clinging to her skirt will have no effect either. But if the hour is late enough and the mother is brave enough to refuse to leave, a payment of a few pounds may be made for a place for the night.

If she comes back the next day having seen a solicitor they will tell her that before she can have money for rent she must find somewhere to live and wait for a visit there from a social security officer. It is almost impossible to find somewhere to ive if you cannot put down a deposit and rent in advance. Catch-22: the poor mother gives up and has to go home to violence.

Women's Aid are lucky in that we have managed to build good relationship with our local social security branch. They are flexible and generous towards all the women who have come us. But even they could not help us when it was decided that the total rent we could be allowed for a family, however many kids it included, would be £3.50 a week. Even the meanest hostel subsidized £6 for each adult, plus more for each child, but seem to get nowhere when we try to argue.

This is not the fault of the local office; it is regional policy. But until voluntary bodies like us can begin to rely on an imaginative approach from social security, they may well be killed at birth by lack of funds. What could be helpful and beneficial attempts at solving pressing social problems will wither and die.

The Department of Health and Social Security may want to think that there have been “several developments” since we first presented a dossier to Sir Keith Joseph in summer 1972. If they’ve come a long way, they’ve got nowhere in particular.

Jack Ashley has shown me a letter from Edward Heath, who was then Prime Minister, saying that any woman who presented herself at social security and asked for help to escape from a brutal situation would immediately be given money for accommodation and food. This statement was either a bare-faced lie or a reminder that politicians and the civil servants who advise hem are too often the last people to know and understand the real situation. The experiences of the women coming to the centre have proved this.

*

Hospitals have their heads buried firmly in the sand. They resolutely mutter that their job is to heal and what happens outside the hospital is no concern of theirs.

A woman married to a taxi-cab driver was rushed by ambulance with a police escort to a local hospital. The medical social worker telephoned us to say that, though she had been badly shocked, the woman would be ready for discharge after a few hours’ rest, but was too frightened to go home, and would we take her? We agreed, but by the time we got through to casualty to say we would come and collect her, a doctor had persuaded her to go home and the police had driven her back.

The next-morning the police telephoned me and said that she had come into the station wearing a coat over her bra and pants because she had fled from her husband after another battering. They wondered if they could bring her to us. When she arrived we were all shocked into silence. Her whole body was covered with enormous bruises and she was bleeding from several gashes. The night before when the police had returned her to the house they found that her husband had gone out, locking the door.

The police had forced an entry and left her there. Later the husband came back drunk and beat her.

I talked to one orthopaedic surgeon in a hospital, who calmly agreed that he often repaired a woman’s nose five or six times at vast expense to the public and a great deal of discomfort to herself, but he did not see it as part of his job to question how her recurrent injuries were inflicted.

I often find a reluctance on the part of the staff of the hospital to confirm any diagnosis that might cause them to be called to court to give evidence, or to take any steps that might involve them in controversy. In one case, a three-month-old baby was admitted to hospital after a blow to the side of the head which made him vomit continuously and made it necessary to insert tubes to drain fluid from the brain daily. The hospital would not confirm that the blow was relevant to the fluid collecting, even though this would have been one way of getting a court injunction to keep the very violent husband away from the baby. The hospital stuck to its safe, non-committed position and merely said that the trouble could have been caused by a knock or a blow but might possibly stem from natural causes. As I write, the father is waiting to get the baby back, if it lives. He has a history of violence and is a drug-addict. It is this kind of pussy-footing that keeps the hospitals like huge ships afloat, separate from the communities that they should be serving.

If they have a difficult case to deal with they call a case conference and decide that the case is indeed difficult and by the time they all have a long chat and a cup of tea it has probably gone away in desperation.

Violence just does not occur inside nice clean and tidy hospitals. And if anyone is bad-mannered enough to show temper there are plenty of competent, cool people around to subdue him with a well-aimed needle. This was one hospital’s solution to the problem of having one violent man assault his wife in the casualty ward. They took no further action.

A hospital will have no compunction in discharging a woman who has been dreadfully assaulted. A West Indian nurse arrived at Women’s Aid three weeks before she was due to give birth. Her neck had been dislocated and her body was covered in scratches and bites. She was moaning and crying and we couldn’t get much sense out of her. I telephoned the hospital which had put her out and asked them what they were doing, only to be told by a disapproving nursing sister that this girl was carrying another man’s child. The unspoken attitude was, “she’s only got what she deserved”. A few hours later the poor woman swallowed all the pills the hospital had given her and we had her taken to another hospital. However, this was yet another case where it would be fair to say that though that extent of damage inflicted on an ordinary member of the public would have kept them in hospital for a week, because this was a woman who had been beaten by her husband she was patched up and sent out as though she somehow had deserved to be beaten.

The sooner large hospitals are no longer considered the best way of serving the community the better. The bigger they are the more impersonal they become and the easier it is for the staff to get out of touch with the people they are there to serve. In the days of small cottage hospitals there was much more care and concern for the individual.

Above all no hospital should be allowed to discharge any patient who has been a victim of assault without making sure she has somewhere safe to go to and notifying the appropriate social services.

Dora had fifteen pregnancies and ten children and the only holidays she ever had were in the maternity ward and the times she was in for injuries received from her husband. Four times the hospital had called in the priest to perform the last rites but they always sent her home to more violence. They were more concerned about the state of her soul than her body.

*

A battered woman is likely to find herself in the local mental hospital on several occasions. In the majority of our cases she is admitted because she has taken so many overdoses that the local hospital is fed up with her and passes her on to the psychiatrist, who puts her into the mental hospital for "depression". The staff know that she has been beaten over a long period, but the matter is conveniently forgotten while she is heavily tranquillized for a few weeks, told that she is much improved, and sent home.

The psychiatrists are usually male and many hold the belief that subconsciously she needs the violence. If only she could look deep inside herself and admit her faults all would be well and her husband would not batter her any more.

This approach fills her with guilt and uncertainty. Is it her fault? She begins to wonder. It is easy to make her feel a failure when she already feels she's failed in the main purpose of her life—her marriage. She usually believes the psychiatrist and goes home determined to do better.

But she goes home to a husband whose pattern of violence was evident well before she married him and soon she is back at the mental hospital again, even more depressed. She gives up and neglects herself. She wrings her hands and cries because she has left her children at home but feels safe in the hospital and dreads going back. Meanwhile, the psychiatrist, bored with her crying, decides sometimes that the most useful move would be to perform a leucotomy\fn{Pre-frontal lobotomy} and remove the anxiety.

We see the results of this operation when the women come in and recount their horrifying life histories with utter indifference. The operation does indeed remove all their anxieties and usually their children have been taken away and put into care because the mother has also lost all sense of responsibility. The husbands continue to beat them but now they put up with it with cheerful indifference. A surgical triumph?

It is sad for us because the mothers who have had this operation usually come in to ask us to help them get their children back. We feel very bitter because though they've paid a terrible price for their husbands' violence, it is far too late, and gently we have to persuade them to leave them where they are.

It is more common to see mothers who have had ECT,\fn{Electro-convulsive therapy} or "shock treatment" as it is commonly called. Nobody really knows how or why it works but it does relieve depression. Unfortunately it also erases memory and has other side-effects if used too often. Again many of our mothers go into the mental hospital and are given a course of ECT. It helps for the moment, but they go home and are repeatedly battered until in the end you find a confused, witless forty-year-old sitting in front of you, trying to remember when and where she was last jolted out of her rapidly deteriorating mind.

When a husband comes to court and is put in prison, the prison doctor or psychiatrist will often, if he sees that the man is sick, try to have him put into a mental hospital for treatment, as prison is of no therapeutic value. However, the prison psychiatrist will run up against a major snag.

Mental hospitals are geared to treating the mentally ill, but the majority of the husbands have a "personality problem". In other words, there is nothing organically wrong with their minds, but their personality needs re-educating. To cure a man who is suffering from a recognized mental illness such as schizophrenia is a complicated but not necessarily impossible task. But to cure a man with a long-term personality disorder will take years and cost an enormous amount of money.

So far our society has made almost no provision for the people we term "psychopaths". Given that most mental hospitals are hopelessly overcrowded and understaffed it is not surprising that they usually refuse to take on a man who is not mentally ill, but is liable to be intractable, disruptive and dangerous. The hospital usually reports that there is nothing mentally wrong with him and sends him home.

Most psychiatrists are men, most are middle class and wealthy. In order to train as a psychiatrist they have to spend years studying and inevitably they tend to become buried deeper and deeper in theory and more and more remote from the problems of a battered woman in a working-class home. When faced with a weeping woman complaining of violence from her husband, the psychiatrist's training is likely to blind him to her real needs and reinforce in him the simple notions that a woman’s place is in the home with her husband, that even if he is violent that only shows his need for her, and that if she won’t stand by him he will be destroyed. Faced with a woman who has put up with years of battering, the psychiatrist is induced to blame her. He doesn’t understand the social conditions that make it impossible for her to escape. I have often had psychiatrists say to me in puzzled tones,

“She must have liked it to have stayed for so many years.”

It is hard for these men to understand the economic and social dependence women have on men, because they have money in their pockets to buy a roof wherever they choose, and they’ve been brought up as men to act independently and make decisions. They really cannot imagine how financially and psychologically difficult it is for a mother with children to strike out on her own and find accommodation and money to live on,

*

Very often the first person a battered woman goes to see is her doctor, and he is the first person to ignore the evidence in front of his eyes. Marie tells me that when she showed a fresh set of bruises to her doctor he laughed and said,

“Call that a beating! Go away and don’t waste my time.”

This is a fairly typical attitude. The doctor does not want to make a note of the injuries because it means swearing affidavits for courts, which takes time. He is middle class and has been brought up to believe that the working class cannot communicate verbally and always resort to fists and that this is quite acceptable. Therefore he is not sympathetic to battered women who clutter up his clinic and he hands out bigger and bigger doses of tranquillizers.

I think all doctors should be obliged to notify a health visitor at the first sign of bruises on either a mother or child so that she can visit the family and take the necessary action. I doubt that the doctors would bother, because it would take a radical change in attitude to get them to accept that women have a right not to be beaten, and, as the doctors rarely see the middle-class wife who is battered because she hides behind her front door, they assume the myth that battering is a working-class syndrome which, like poverty and disease, will always be with us.

*

If you shop at Habitat and cook a la Elizabeth David and your marriage is going gently wrong then Marriage Guidance will probably suit your needs. You can discuss “where it all went wrong”, secure in the knowledge that your councillor will have gone to the same kind of school as you attended and the same kind of dances and probably sold out to the highest bidder. You can also console yourself with the knowledge that “your case” will be discussed with fervour at tea-tables and coffee-mornings in the areas advertised by Roy Brooks.

If a woman comes to see us and wants to try Marriage Guidance we are always told that there is a waiting list, however desperate she may be.

None of the mothers who have come to Women’s Aid found Marriage Guidance any help at all. They didn’t understand most of what was said to them and usually found that the councillor was sitting behind her desk with her fingers interlocked, breathing in-phrases like “marriage is a fit” and relapsing into meaningful silences.

If a wife who left her home town to live with us wanted to attend the same Marriage Guidance centre as her husband so they could at least share the benefit of the experience, she would be told that it’s against the rules. Each must go to the office nearest to where they are living.

How Marriage Guidance, with its £300,000 subsidies from the government, has managed to avoid the problem of battered wives for so long baffles me. It isn’t as though battering is confined to the working classes who don’t go to Marriage Guidance. Rather, I see it as a failure of the organization to fulfil its aims of helping and caring with marriages of all types. They have avoided the problem by taking a comfortable well-heeled position behind their desks and being politely useless whenever it comes up.

The people who benefit most from Marriage Guidance are, I think, those who become councillors. For them it offers instant therapy under the guise of helping others, and under the motherly wing of a tutor it gives them a chance to absorb a bewildering vocabulary of psychiatric jargon suitable for impressing their friends and entertaining at parties.

Marriage Guidance needs guidance itself—towards a role where it can really help people with genuine needs, and away from its present character as the ineffectual illegitimate offspring of the psychiatric consulting room.

*

The Family Service Unit has existed as an organization for twenty-five years. It was set up to deal with the “problem family”. It is a voluntary agency staffed by social workers and helpers and funded by local authorities and voluntary contributions. The following passage was quoted in the Family Service Unit's quarterly journal of winter 1973:

> We feel that it is important to differentiate between sporadic "battering" which can be regarded as part of a normal marriage, particularly in certain cultural groups, and more persistent beating.

Because of that attitude many women who have come into contact with this organization have been encouraged to remain in dangerous situations—sacrificed to the FSU's belief that the family must be kept together at all costs.

In a case where a woman with a child had been cohabiting with a habitual drunkard who was consistently violent, the FSU officer would come into Women's Aid demanding her return. Even though this woman was going to court to get a non-molestation injunction and an eviction order, the FSU worker insisted that time, love and patience could bring them together again.

I do not expect to get "sporadically battered" in my marriage; neither does the woman who helps to clean the house, nor my dustman's wife. The three of us fail to understand how FSU can have reached their conclusion.

In another FSU article on baby-battering, they draw the conclusion that battered babies grow into battering parents but insist that the male confines inherited violence to his children, and that any violence that he inflicts upon his wife is her own fault:

> women usually make use of other weapons, e.g. of nagging but they frequently provoke, consciously or unconsciously, a violent response in their husbands, often in order to relieve tensions in the relationships.

In other words, she gets what she deserves. When a reputable organization condones violence in family life as a normal part of marital wear and tear, what chance have the mothers of getting away?

These kinds of remarks are usually made by case-workers who have never been on the other end of a punch or a kick. They are never there when the damage is inflicted. They only arrive hours later when the mother has pulled herself together and is coping again.

One FSU worker told a mother who had been beaten over many years that she should consider herself lucky that he beat her because it proved that he still cared about her and was trying to communicate with her. She didn't go to the FSU again.

*

The probation officer can play quite a large role in the life of a battered wife. Often when a woman goes to court to take out a summons she is first referred to the probation office. There they will listen to her case and, though they're not legal experts, they will help her decide her best course of action. If they decide that she does have a case they will help her through the humiliating business of appearing in front of the court and exposing her private life to the scrutiny of those sitting on the bench. If they feel her case cannot succeed they will suggest that she seek legal advice and tell her where to find a solicitor.

When the court decides to put a man on probation for battering his wife, he will also come under the care and control of the probation officer. But, of course, it's not an easy task to control a man who you know is violent towards his family and who may be violent towards you if you thwart him.

Sometimes the only relationship that the husband has with anyone except his wife is with his probation officer, so their relationship can be very constructive. Most of my experience with the probation officers has been very heartening. Certainly, the old-style officers seem to have a robust and realistic approach to life and a clear view of the people they are there to serve.

But I don't feel quite so happy about the young officers who are coming in. They seem to have been painted with the all-embracing "case-work" brush—the instant psychiatry that too often dilutes action—and they see so many sides of the situation that they are in danger of falling down the hole in the middle.

Fred was a very famous tramp in our area. He was always in trouble and had been in prison on and off for most of his life. He had been a safe-cracker and, when he described his life's work, his long white fingers would move like restless butterflies and his wrists would become liquid as he mimed the excitement of opening a safe. He did odd jobs for me at Women's Aid and his probation officer would come round to try and track him down.

This probation officer was one of the new ones, enthusiastic but naïve. He used to tell me that though neighbours complained about the twelve or so dogs in Fred's grotty flat, he felt that they were the old man's only companions, and how Fred had explained with tears in his eyes about his wife running off with another man. I didn't like to tell him that Fred was the local dog thief, and that he starved and beat his dogs just as he had starved and beaten his wife.

Nothing in that probation officer's training seemed to have alerted him to the possibility of anyone conning him into believing those wild stories, whereas the old probation officer could smell them a mile off, and, while being just as caring, seemed to retain a sense of humour and reality. Perhaps, given time, the young probation officers will learn, but it would be a pity if, in the race to obtain more and more qualifications, the service loses the kind of officers who react at gut level and goes over to an academic, pseudo-psychiatric approach.

*

Wherever she turns for help the battered wife finds every agency blind and deaf or worse, except one.

Health visitors are a source of real comfort and help. Time and again wives tell of the help they have sought and of the unhelpful attitudes that were shown to their problems, but they speak highly of their own health visitors.

One of the principal reasons that this organization is such a success is that its women go into the homes. They really roll up their sleeves and are prepared to give any aid they can. Sometimes they will scrub out the house, another time they'll have a cup of tea and just listen. They cuddle the children and know their birthdays. They will often enter a house where the man is known to be violent, even when the doctor and the social worker make a point of standing on the doorstep.

In our early days it was the health visitors who referred their clients to us, often bringing them by car and keeping contact all the while their mothers were with us. Our own social services stayed away but the health visitors came in to see what we were doing and stayed to help.

Their organization is always treated as the Cinderella of the social services, yet it is these dedicated women who really are the backbone of any help the families receive. I would like to see their number increased and their influence extended. Then perhaps a little of it might rub off on some of the high-minded theorists who staff the other agencies and make them so useless to a battered woman.

87.57b Excerpts from Born In Tibet\fn{by Chögyam Trungpa (1939-1987)} Kham Region, Tibetan Autonomous Region, China (M) 1

[Enroute over difficult terrain out of Tibet:] … The porter looked very cheerful and said, "It's only a ladder; just follow me." I was still rped to the two porters. When I got on the ladder I saw how immensely long it w3as; we seemed to be so high up that a man at the bottom looked like a mere dwarf. It was made of single pines lashed together from end to end, with notches cut in the wood for footholds. When I climbed down the first few notches I could see the siwirling green waters of the river underneath; a few more steps, and I felt I was poised in space over an expanse of water. There was a cold wind coming up from a large cave under the rock into which the river was pouring; worst of all, the ladder shook in a terrifying way with the weight of the many porters who were trying to help me …

*

… Our journey to India must be thought of as a pilgrimage; something that in the past few Tibetans have been able to make. Whether or not India has changed, the spiritual blessing imparted to that country by the presence of the Buddha remain: the places where he lived, freed himself from the bondage of Samsar, taught, and died have an eternal value … It is fortunate for us that our way is hard and that we are struggling against greater difficulties than the pilgrims of the past, for by this me3ans we shall learn and profit the more from o9ur journey. We should not be thinking only about the enemies threatening us from without …Each moment we should be aware of ourselves and of the forces of destruction that threaten each man from within. If we fail in this, we are indeed putting the spiritual object of our journey in jeopardy; each step along the way should be holy and precious to us.

*

[Somewhat later, on journeying by plane across the Indian border:] … This, our first flight, was a strange new experience, skimming over cloud covered mountains, seeing far below us the small villages and footpaths leading up to them; only by the moving shadow of the plane on the ground could we gauge how fast we were traveling.

We thought about the teaching of impermanence; this was a complete severance of all that had been tibet and we were traveling by mechanized transport. As the moments passed, the mountain range was left behind, and the view changed to the misty space of the Indian plains stretching out in front of us …

292.150 Excerpts from Between Worlds: Women Writers Of Chinese Ancestry: 1. "Preface" 2. "Chinese Women In America"\fn{by Amy Ling (1939-1999)} Peking, China (F) 8

1

Like Alice Walker, but from a different cultural background, I too have felt compelled to go "in search of our mothers' garden," and this book is the fruit of my search. Born in Beijing, brought to the United States at age six and educated here from first grade through a PhD in comparative literature, at a time when the "Classic" authors were white and nearly all male, I had never encountered in all my reading any Chinese American authors or even Chinese characters except Bret Harte's Heathen Chinee.

I can still remember the red hot humiliation I experienced as my fourth grade teacher in Mexico, Missouri, read Harte's verse aloud to the class. I remember, too, her sudden embarrassed realization that my perspective on the poem was radically different from hers; she had never had to consider the Chinese perspective before.\fn{This is the text of the poem in question: "Which I wish to remark, | And my language is plain, | That for ways that are dark | And for tricks that are vain, | The heathen Chinee is peculiar, | Which the same I would rise to explain. * Ah Sin was his name; | And I shall not deny, | In regard to the same, | What that name might imply; | But his smile it was pensive and childlike, | As I frequent remarked to Bill Nye. * It was August the third, | And quite soft was the skies; | Which it might be inferred | That Ah Sin was likewise; | Yet he played it that day upon William | And me in a way I despise. * Which we had a small game, | And Ah Sin took a hand: | It was Euchre. The same | He did not understand; | But he smiled as he sat by the table, | With the smile that was childlike and bland. * Yet the cards they were stocked | In a way that I grieve, | And my feelings were shocked | At the state of Nye's sleeve, | Which was stuffed full of aces and bowers, | And the same with intent to deceive. * But the hands that were played | By that heathen Chinee, | And the points that he made, | Were quite frightful to see, -- | Till at last he put down a right bower, | Which the same Nye had dealt unto me. * Then I looked up at Nye, | And he gazed upon me; | And he rose with a sigh, | And said, 'Can this be? | We are ruined by Chinese cheap labor,' – | And he went for that heathen Chinee. * In the scene that ensued | I did not take a hand, | But the floor it was strewed | Like the leaves on the strand | With the cards that Ah Sin had been hiding, | In the game 'he did not understand.' * In his sleeves, which were long, | He had twenty-four packs, -- Which was coming it strong, | Yet I state but the facts; | And we found on his nails, which were taper, | What is frequent in tapers, -- that's wax. * Which is why I remark, | And my language is plain, | That for ways that are dark | And for tricks that are vain, | The heathen Chinee is peculiar, -- Which the same I am free to maintain." }

Thus, when I first read Maxine Hong Kingston's A Woman Warrior and was asked to review Nellie Wong's chapbook of poems, Dreams From Harrison Railroad Park, I was thunderstruck. Here were people like me creating moving and artistic literature from our shared Chinese American experience. They expressed the struggle for personal balance that is the experience of every American of dual racial and cultural heritage, but, specifically, they wrote with pride and affirmation out of our common Chinese American background. My reading of these writers followed upon discoveries in the 1960s and 1970s by African American and feminist scholars working to reclaim their literary history, unearthing such neglected masterpieces as Zora Neale Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God and Charlotte Perkins Gilman's The Willow Wallpaper. I wondered if other Chinese women in America had produced memorable literature, if Kingston had had forerunners. If so, who were they? What had they chosen to express of our bicultural experience, and how they had done it?

Then, I began the journey "in search of [my] mothers' gardens." Walker spoke for me when she wrote in Saving the Life That is Your Own:

> The absence of models, in literature as in life … is an occupational hazard for the artist, simply because models in art, in behavior, in growth of spirit and intellect—even if rejected—enrich and enlarge one's view of existence.

