The lack of models is an occupational as well as an emotional hazard, not only for the artist but for everyone. My search for models, however, brought together the scholarly and the personal in a way that I had never experienced before. I felt a harmony and a wholeness, for each author uncovered, not only enlarged the general field of American literature, as I saw it, but enriched and validated my existence. I learned that I am not a unique and peculiar aberration, that not every Chinese in America is an engineer or a scientist, that others have also gone the literary route. I realized that uncovering these writers and publishing this book may make the way easier for those who follow.

Alice Walker has written that black women with calloused hands have appeared to her in dreams to shake her hand and to thank her for speaking for them. I too have seen certain of my writers in dreams, and I have spoken with others in the flesh. As Walker says:

> If we kill off the sound of our ancestors, the major portion of us … is lost.

I hope this book will capture the sound of my ancestors and speak to others yet to come.

In one way, this book is also an answer to my father, who asked me a question that has rankled in me since it was posed, when I was 13 or so.

"Why is it," he asked in an innocent tone, "that those who excel in every field, even those considered women's specialties—cooking, hairdressing, fashion design—have always been men?"

Virginia Woolf, of course, has answered that question in A Room Of One's Own, and others have answered it as well. That men have excelled is not because women are essentially inferior, which he was slyly implying, but that women have been denied the same opportunities as men. They have been kept out of the libraries and in the kitchen "barefoot and pregnant." So it was especially gratifying to me to discover that in this very specialized field, literature written in English by ethnic Chinese and Chinese Eurasians and published in the United States, he women not only outnumber he men but the women's books are more authentic, more numerous, quite simply—better.

It has been an exciting search, a rewarding project. Abd a difficult one. First, I did not have such common research tools as he card catalogue and he Library of Congress subject heading directory. In 1960, when I began my research, there was no listing for "Chinese American authors." At the Library of Congress, I asked why and was told no one had yet published a book on this subject, and if no book has been written the subject does not exist, as far as their directory is concerned. Under the heading "Asian American literature" I had better luck, for three anthologies had been published: Asian American Authors by Kai-yu Hsu (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1972); Aiiieeeee! By Frank Chin et al. (Washington, DC, Howard University Press, 1974), and Asian American Heritage by David Wand (New York, Washington Square, 1974).

These pioneering collections gave me a start in identifying some authors. Wayne Millar's Handbook of American Minorities (New York, NYU Press, 1976) and Priscilla Oaks' Minority Studies: An Annotated Bibliography (Boston, G. K. Hall, 1976) were also helpful. Elaine Kim's Asian American Literature (Philadelphia, Temple UP, 1982) was published after most of my basic research had been completed, but Professor Kim gave me some names I had not known. A colleague at Rutgers, Marjorie Li, told me about Lin Tai-yi; another colleague, Peter Li, introduced me to Eileen Chang; and one of the auhors I interviewed, Diane Chan, lent me her copy of Chuang Hua's Crossings, which she had purchased for one dollar at a garage sale. For a while, I combed the national Union Catalogue and scoured the shelves of secondhand bookstores looking for Chinese surnames which, fortunately, are not numerous, and in this antediluvian manner I discovered Hazel Lin and Janet Lim.

The next problem was obtaining the books. Those with copyrights as recent as five years were already out of print and most were not available in local libraries. It was further disturbing to discover that the books my university library did not own, such as Maxine Hong Kingston's China Men, were shelved as sociology or, as in the case of Mai-mai Sze's Echo of a Cry or Winnifred Eaton's A Japanese Blossom, as juvenile books, mainly because they dealt with Asians or were illustrated and had children in them.

Again, the very idea of Chinese American literature seemed nonexistent to the Library of Congress cataloguers who determine a volume's call number. The exception was the Wasson collection at Cornell University, which has nearly all of Winnifred Eaton's novels and from which I obtained many interlibrary loans. I was disappointed to find no listing for the "Asian American Woman's Experience" in the index to Patricia Addis' Through a Woman's I, an Annotated Bibliography of American Women's Autobiographical Writings 1945-1976 (Metuchen, Scarecrow Press, 1983), though the index identifies "American Indian Women's Experience" and "Black Women's Experience" and though the bibliography itself includes at least five Asian American women writers.

However, the tide is turning. Not only are Asian American writers increasing in number but they are also gaining wider recognition, beginning in the early 1970s when Lawson Fusao Inada's Before the War: Poems as They Happened (1971) was published by William Morrow, a major New York press; and Frank Chin's two plays, Chickencoop Chinaman (1972) and The Year of the Dragon (1974), were produced at New York's American Place Theatre. In 1976 Maxine Hong Kingston's The Woman Warrior won the National Bpook Critics' Circle Award for the year's best work of nonfiction. Her second book, China Men, won the American Book Award in 1980.

In 1981, the Obie Award for the Best New Play went to David Henry Hwang's F.O.B. In 1982, Cathy Song won the Yale Series of Younger Poets competition with Picture Bride, published by Yale University Press in 1983. Island Poetry and History of Chinese Immigrants on Angel Island 1910-1940, edited by Him Mark Lai, Genny Lim, and Judy Yung, published in 1980, demonstrated that the literary impulse among Chinese in America has a tradition and a history. In 1982, Elaine Kim's Asian American Literature, the first book-length study of the field, proved that the body of work was large and significant enough to merit serious scholarly attention. In 1985, Genny Lim's play Island was aired on National Public Television. In 1987, Garrett Hongo's M. Butterfly won the Tony Award for Best New Dramatic Play on Broadway. In 1989, Carolyn Lau's book of poetry, Wode Shuofa, and Frank Chin's collection of stories, The Chinaman Pacific and Frisco Railroad Co., won the American Book Awards from the Before Columbus Foundation.

Our numbers are growing, our voices swelling. We are no longer a silent minority.

I have had several purposes in writing this book. My initial impulse, to uncover literary gems, I later abandoned, for axiology itself, the study of evaluation and value judgments, is now in dispute among literary theoreticians and critics, Barbara Herrnstein Smith and Jane Tompkins among them. Barbara Herrnstein Smith's finely reasoned essay, Contingencies of Value, among other works, brought to the open the questionable but hitherto unquestioned systems of evaluation within the academy, among critics, reviewers, publishers, and librarians governing notions of "classic" canonical, or Great Literature. She calls into question the assumptions that "objectivity" governs the evaluator and that "universality" is a gauge of "quality." Jane Tompkins, in reexamining Uncle Tom's Cabin, asks her reader "to set aside some familiar categories for evaluating fiction—stylistic intricacy, psychological subtlety, epistemological complexity." She wants us to see the texts she examines "not as an artifice of eternity answerable to certain formal criteria … but as a political enterprise … that both codifies and attempts to mold the values of its time." Tompkins' request for suspension of the "familiar categories" for evaluating texts is particularly pertinent since these conventional criteria are not always applicable to the writers of my study. Without understanding the social and historical contexts of these authors' work, full comprehension and appreciation would not be possible, and judgment without full comprehension is useless.

And yet, so often the mistaken attitude prevails: if a writer falls into oblivion it must be because s/he\fn{So the text: apparently she/he is meant; but it could be a typographical error:H} was unworthy, and therefore fully deserving of oblivion, for surely, if a writer is "truly outstanding," this greatness cannot help but be apparent and "will stand the test of time," as cream rises to the top.

But such an attitude does not take into consideration fluctuations of taste; personal idiosyncrasies and individual purposes; political and historical conditions; perspectives and proclivities of the scholars and critics who keep an author's work in the limelight and thus in the canon. That the canon has changed may be readily seen by perusing the table of contents of literary anthologies over an extended period.

Thus, fully aware of my personal interest in the subject and equally aware that this project had never before been undertaken, yet was worthy of the undertaking, I plunged in. Setting myself a narrow focus, I have attempted, nonetheless, to be as comprehensive as possible.

This book, then, is an introduction, and a history, as well as my own readings of the full-length prose narratives (autobiographies, memoirs, fictionalized memoirs, and novels) written in English and published in the United States by women of Chinese or partial Chinese ancestry. I have arranged my material roughly in chronological and thematic order to give my readers a sense of the length and breadth of the tradition. The diversity of their themes has been great, yet all the writers have obviously been conscious of their difference in a white society, a society whose attitude towards them as "other" has fluctuated depending on political circumstan-ces. How each author has reacted to this consciousness of difference, to the between-world condition, and to the political and social environment around her is my major unifying theme.

My purpose in writing this book has been to show off the flowers in my mother's garden. I want to put these writers on the scholarly map, to give them a heading in the Library of Congress Subject Catalogue, to validate their existence and their work, to retrieve them from oblivion. With this study I hope that other women like me will not grow up without models, in ignorance of our own history.

Among these writers and the books, I hope such readers will find a source of inspiration and of communal and personal pride. Women and readers from other bi- and multicultural backgrounds will understand much in this book, for the experience of marginalization and the need for self-affirmation is common to us all. And for hose who are neither Chinese American, bicultural, or female, I know that the kind of curiosity, openness, and stretching that leads such readers to investigate the experience of the Other will bring its own reward.

2

Initially, Chinese women in America were a rarity; in fact, they were such an exotic curiosity that money could be made by simply putting them on display. Afong Moy was one of these "displays" and was reportedly the first Chinese woman to come to America. She "caused a sensation in New York" in 1834 by just sitting "amidst the exotic Chinese trappings in vogue at that time." She was followed by others, most notably Pwan-Yekoo, age 17, whom Barnum's touring Chinese Museum billed as > the Chinese belle, with her Chinese suite of attendants, [who] is drawing all Broadway to the Chinese collection. She is so pretty, so arch, so lively, and so graceful, while her minute feet (2½ inches) are wondrous!

In contrast to this effusive and sensationalist praise, the author of a later article in Harper's Weekly, January 30, 1858, had quite the opposite view of Chinese women:

> I defy any but the most catholic women-worshippers to admire the women of Southern China. The taste for the baboon-like faces of Hong Kong women is, I fancy, like that for mangoes, an acquired one. I have learned to like mangoes, but my tailor's wife still excites in me only unmitigated disgust.

Apparently, in judging Chinese women, Americans were divided into two extreme camps: one cloyingly sweet, the other overly sour—both unrealistic and based on fixed concepts within the perceiver's head.

When Chinese men traveled to the States—first enticed by the discovery of gold in California in the 1850s, by western railroad construction bosses desperate for manpower in the 1860s, and by sugar planters in Hawaii from 1851-1884—they customarily left their women at home because marriage before departure was thought to ensure the traveler's return; furthermore, the wife's place was to serve her parents-in-law, and the journey was believed to be too dangerous for women. But there were two nonconformists who braved the journey and became the first Chinese women to immigrate to the United States; they present an interesting contrast, for one was a domestic servant, the other a prostitute.

The first Chinese woman immigrant was Marie Seise, who debarked in San Francisco from the Eagle in February 1848 with the Charles V. Gillespie household. She was one of three Chinese servants; the other two were men. At an early age, she had run away from home in Guangzhou (Canton) to avoid being sold by her family as a slave. She found work with\fn{The text has: for} a Portuguese family in Macao, and adopted their dress and their Roman Catholic religion. Later, she married a Portuguese sailor, who abandoned her shortly thereafter. She then found a position with an American family who, in 1837, took her to what were then called the Sandwich Islands, now Hawaii. Six years later she returned to China, and in 1838 recrossed the Pacific with the Gillespie family to settle in San Francisco. Her story may be found at the Trinity Episcopal Church in the records of Bishop Ingraham, who baptized her in 1854.

The second Chinese woman to immigrate to the United States was Ah Choi, who arrived in San Francisco late in 1848 or early 1849. she was a prostitute, a free agent, and not only popular but enterprising. Within two years of her arrival, she was the owner of a brothel. She charged one ounce of gold (then $16) per visit and had a flourishing business.

These first two Chinese women to immigrate to the United States—the servant and the prostitute—neatly fit the stereotypes of the Chinese, or Asian, woman (for distinctions among Asians by Caucasians are rare), that are widely held in the West. To stereotype, G. W. Allport in his classic study The Nature of Prejudice tells us, is to place a newly encountered entity into a pre-established category to save oneself the effort and time of getting to know this entity and in having to think about it. To stereotype is to shortcut thought, an economy measure we all take.

However, not to allow facts to change the stereotypes we hold is to be prejudiced. Two main stereotypes persist for the Asian woman in America; they are polar extremes, roughly parallel to the whore-madonna or to the "madwoman in the attic"/ "angel in the house" dichotomies for white women. At one end of the spectrum is the Dragon Lady, a female counterpart to the diabolical Fu Manchu. With her talon-like six-inch fingernails, her skin-tight satin dress slit to the thigh, she can poison a man as easily as she seductively smiles and puffs on her foot-long cigarette holder. An "Oriental" Circe, she is as desirable as she is dangerous.

At the opposite end of he spectrum is the Shy Lotus Blossom or China Doll: demure, diminutive, and deferential. She is modest, tittering behind her delicate ivory hand, eyes downcast, always walking 10 steps behind her man, and, best of all, devoted body and soul to serving him.

Like all stereotypes, these contain a kernel of truth, though Japanese and Chinese cultural traits are jumbled together. The kernel is generally a visible trait—long fingernails, slit dress, smiling behind one's hand. However, these visible cultural signs have been misread. In nineteenth-century China long fingernails were indeed the fashion, affected by the empress and ladies of high station and considered marks of beauty. As winter tans are coveted in the Western world today because they signify that one can afford to take expensive vacations in warm southern climates while everyone else is confined indoors by the winter cold, so long fingernails in nineteenth-century China indicated that one could afford to hire other peoples' hands and not need to use one's own. In reality, long fingernails, then, were no more a weapon than tans, now, indicate negroid blood. In fact, special jeweled cases were created to protect such nails because, as anyone who has tried to grow long nails knows, they break easily.

The deference to men, the modesty and shyness of the "lotus blossom," are indeed traits historically inculcated in Asian women from girlhood, as we have seen in the historical overview above and particularly persistent among traditionally reared Japanese women even today. However, laughing behind one's hands is not a sign of modesty but of politeness, akin to the Western custom of covering the mouth when coughing or sneezing. In polite society, teeth are not to be displayed; Chinese men, as well as women, still use toothpicks under cover of their hands.

Allport has stated that stereotypes are self-reflexive, telling us more about the person holding the stereotype than the one being stereotyped:

> Whether favorable or unfavorable, a stereotype is an exaggerated belief associated with a category. Its function is to justify (rationalize) our conduct in relation to that category.

Though little research has been done on the origin of these particular stereotypes, negative images of the Chinese were sent home by Western missionaries attempting to gain support for their "civilizing" cause. However, both the dragon lady and lotus blossom stereotypes have a strongly sexual component, and would seem to point to an origin suggesting a greater intimacy. Using Allport's theory to hypothesize on the particular "self-reflexive" circumstances that spawned the "dragon lady" and "lotus blossom," we may imagine that these two stereotypes were created by Western sailors or soldiers of fortune who had sexual contacts with Chinese women in the early days of trade between Asia and Europe. The dragon lady stereotype may have been the result of a sailor's mishap with an experienced prostitute who robbed himn of his entire voyage's wages. His own drunken stupidity and guilt became transferred to her treachery and wiles; therefore, she became the tawny deceiver, he the lily-white victim. The lotus blossom perhaps stemmed from an affair with a docile, even a virginal girl, whom the sailor/soldier seduced and then abandoned, à la Madame Butterfly. With time and distance, her image took on an idealized, romantic aura—particularly if she killed herself. Ah, she was everything a man could desire, but, alas, she had an Asian face, spoke no English, and could never be taken home to mother.

Whatever their origin, these stereotypes were disseminated and perpetuated through the popular media and continue to distort the way in which Asian women are portrayed and perceived in the Western world. In the 1960s, Madame Nhu, the First Lady of Vietnam, was labeled a "Dragon Lady" by the press, and the "classic" dragon lady reemerged in 1985 in Nicholas Meyer's film, Volunteers, a parody of Peace Corps volunteers and the undefined Asian people who hosted them. The 1950s films Teahouse of the August Moon and The World of Suzy Wong combined the dragon lady and shy lotus blossom into a third variant: the prostitute with the heart of a child.

As a result of these stereotypes then, Asian women, when powerful, are seen as dangerous and treacherous; and when powerless, as sexual objects and submissive servants not to be taken seriously. The stereotypes continue to serve as blinders for dominant Americans and to stand as barriers to the fullest acceptance and development of Asian American women.

Examples that belie stereotypes are considered aberrations and quickly forgotten. One of these was Sieh King King, the first voice for Chinese women's emancipation in the United States. Sieh King King (Xue Jinqin) was a 16-year-old foreign student at the University of California, called by a Chinese editor "the Joan of Arc of her people," whose impassioned speech delivered on November 2, 1902, before a theatre full of men and women, as reported in the San Francisco Chronicle the day after, > boldly condemned the slave girl system, raged at the horrors of foot-binding, and with all the vehemence of aroused youth, declared that men and women were equal and should enjoy the privileges of equals.

Later that evening, undoubtedly as a result of the new ideas she had expressed, women were allowed for the first time to sit down at the same tables as men at a banquet in her honor.

Sieh King King's father was an enlightened Tienjing merchant who had hired foreign teachers for his daughter and had imbued her with progressive ideals. A year later, according to historian Judy Yung, she gave another "eloquent and inspiring speech" to an audience of 200 women and again "expounded on the role of Chinese women and the need to abolish outdated Chinese customs. The revolutionary feminist ideas Sieh King King had expressed became a general concern in the Chinese community in America and, as Yung put it, > what she advocated on behalf of Chinese women—unbound feet, equal rights, education, and public participation—remained at the heart of social change for Chinese women for the next three decades.

A foreign student, Sieh King King most likely did not remain in the United States, for the local newspapers did not report on her activities after 1903. Furthermore, the number of immigrant women from China to the United States was extremely small until the mid-twentieth century. In 1852, for example, of the 11,794 Chinese in California only 7 were women. By the 1880s, the ratio of Chinese women to men in the United States was sill no greater than 1 to 20. From the late nineteenth century until the middle of the twentieth, harsh laws severely limited the immigration of Chinese, particularly Chinese women. In 1882, the Chinese Exclusion Act, renewed until 1943, prohibited entry into the United States for all Chinese except diplomats, merchants, tourists, teachers, and students. In 1924, Congress passed a special law whose effect was to prohibit all immigration of Chinese women, including wives of American-born Chinese, ostensibly to reduce the number of prostitutes, but actually to prevent proliferation of an undesirable alien race. From 1924 to 1930, when this act was revised, no Chinese women were admitted into the United States. Only after 1943 could Chinese women immigrate more freely, and only after 1954 did their numbers in the United States reach parity with Chinese men.

The majority of Chinese women immigrants to the United Stats in the late nineteenth century were working class with neither the education nor the leisure to write books; their lives were engulfed by the duties of childbearing childcare, and the business of earning a living. Contemporary authors have researched and recreated the daily life of these pioneers. Monfoon Leong's nineteenth-century unfinished novel Precious Jade, for example, vividly recreates the life of a nineteenth-century Chinese woman in the western United Sates, whose youth and energies are sapped by the grinding work of her husband's small hand laundry. Ruthann Lum McCunn's Thousand Pieces of Gold is a fictionalized biography of the eventful life of Lalu Nathoy, or Polly Bemis, who as a young woman in 1872 was sold naked on the block in San Francisco to a saloon keeper from Oregon and who ended her life as a respected homesteader on the Salmon River (the River of No Return) in Idaho. Her life bore certain general similarities to that of Negro slave women, but she had neither the time nor the inclination for writing her own story as did ex-slaves Harriet Wilson and Harriet Jacobs. Lalu Nathoy's story remained untold until nearly 100 years later, when McCunn, a former librarian who is herself one-quarter Chinese, researched and reconstructed it.

Thus, through cultural and historical circumstances, the majority of authors in this study are not only foreign-born but also upper- or upper-middle class in background. Because of the immigration restrictions, many come from families in diplomatic circles, often Christian families, who educated daughters as well as sons in Western cultures and languages. The majority are first-generation immigrant women. Some, such as Edith Eaton, Mai-mai Sze, Chuang Hua, and Bette Bao Lord, immigrated as children. Others (Helena Kuo, Hazel Lin, Eileen Chang, Yuan-tsung Chen) immigrated as young adults. One (Han Suyin) maintains a residence in New York where she spends three or four months a year and the rest of the time in other parts of the world. Another (Lin Tai-yi) lived many years in the United States, then lived in Hong Kong, but she continued to write in English and has recently returned to the United States. Only 5 (Jade Snow Wong, Virginia Lee, Diana Chang, Maxine Hong Kingston, and Amy Tan) of the 18 authors in this study were born in the United States. One (Winnifred Eaton) was born in Montreal.

Though some readers may consider this group unrepresentative of Chinese Americans or overly narrow in its perspective because of the preponderance of émigrés, we must remember that since racial characteristics have an immediate visual impact race has always played a more significant role in the lives of minorities in white America than has class. Thus, the experience of an upper-class Chinese émigré in white America is closer to that of a working-class American-born Chinese American than to that of any white person. And, thus, Mai-mai Sze, daughter of Ambassador Alfred Sze, could say to an African American woman whom she had seen snubbed at a lunch counter in Wellesley, Massachusetts, in the 1940s,

"We're cause people, whether we like it or not."

In addition to the difficulty of writing in a second language, another handicap peculiar to women in the upper- or upper-middle class, despite their Western education, was social constraint, as expressed by Han Suyin in the forward to Destination Chungking: writing was frowned upon as an activity lacking in respectability. Modesty and reticence were the ideals established for women; writing was extreme egotism, even self-exposure. Therefore, in order for a Chinese immigrant woman to write and publish a book in English, she must be something of a rebel, for writing, an act of rebellion and self-assertion, runs counter to Confucian training. Also she has to possess two basic character traits: an indomitable will and an unshakeable self-confidence. She must also be propelled by the undeniable drive to communicate with the readers and speakers of the dominant language of the society into which she has been transplanted, either because of the rightness of her cause or because of the force of her need to express herself.

In addition to nationality or ethnicity, one's sex is a third factor significant to the experience of immigrant and minority groups in the United States. The women of a minority group, whether Asian, African, Indian, or Hispanic, have received a different treatment at the hands of the white majority than have the men of their race, and for this reason their writing, their record of their particular experiences, thoughts, and feelings are separate from those of the men of their ethnic group. Though their men may feel, with resentment, that "the dyad of Asian women and Western male [is] … the essence of any relationship between East and West," and though physical beauty may, in individual cases, seem to offset certain liabilities of race, beauty itself is short-lived, and the notice or status gained by it momentary and borrowed.

Without doubt, the female sex itself is a liability in any patriarchy, and the ethnic minority female is triply vulnerable: as Chinese in a Euro-American world, as a woman in a Chinese man's world, as a Chinese woman in a white man's world. How these women writers responded to their between-world position and how they manifested this response in their writing will be the subject of this study. And not only do their texts tell us something about individual women of Chinese ancestry, but, as responses to living in the United States, they tell us something about Americans as well, reflecting a portion of American cultural history.

When comparing books written by men of Chinese ancestry and those written by women, I discovered three startling facts: first, women writers have been more numerous; second, women have written more books; and third, women's books have been more authentic, meaning that fewer women have fallen into what I call the alien observer trap.

The Chinese as alien observer may be traced back to Oliver Goldsmith's Letters from a Citizen of the World (1762), which purported to be written by "Lien Chi Altangi", a Chinese traveler to England; these letters derived their humor and charm from he unexpected and unfamiliar angle of vision given to things familiar to the readers themselves. Since then, Chinese have been asked so often to write their impressions of life in the Wet that we may call this form a subgenre.

The rational behind this subgenre is simple: everyone knows that the Chinese come from the other side of the globe and thus do many things in an upside down sort of way—for example, reading books from the back cover to the front, from the right to the left, and up and down on a page; beginning their diners with a sweet and ending with soup—thus, one can assume that their initial reactions to unfamiliar customs they encounter in the West cannot help but be amusing to the Western reader. The popularity of the series of more than one dozen books published by the painter/writer Chiang Yee, from The Silent Traveler in Lakeland (1937) to The Silent Traveler in San Francisco (1964) may be attributed in part to this appeal. (Since the Chinese have lost a modicum of their strangeness, the most recent manifestation of the alien observer is now the extraterrestrial, as seen in such television shows as My Favorite Martian and Mork and Mindy, and such films as The Man who Fell to Earth and Star Man.)

The other side of the "alien observer" was the "tourist guide" role, in which the alien was asked to describe how things are don in his country with the expectation that he would provide titillation by his exotic and quaint revelations. Lee Yan Phou's When I Was A Boy in China (Boston, Lothrop, Lee & Sheppard Co., 1887), Wu Ting Fang's America Through the Spectacles of an Oriental Diplomat (New York, Frederick Stokes, 1914), and New Il-Han's When I Was A Boy in Korea (Boston, Lothrop, 1928) are representative samples of this genre.

Though a few women have written books that fall into the category of "alien observer" or "tourist guide," there are fewer of this type written by women than by men. Women writers account for most of the novels and the more personal, rather than the official, autobiographies. The very first Asian American fiction writers were women: the Eurasian sisters, Edith Maud Eaton and Winnifred Eaton. Thus, to concentrate on the women writers of Chinese ancestry is not to spotlight a minority within a minority but to focus, in the areas of fiction and autobiography at least, on the most significant texts and writers.

How can we account for this great productivity among the women and for the greater authenticity of heir voices? Restrained by a traditionally oppressive background and blocked by a society holding alien and negative views of her, what would prompt a woman of Chinese ancestry in the United States to draw attention to herself by writing?

The answer lies in the very oppression itself. Physicists tell us that every action has its equal and opposite reaction, and this also holds as well in the animate world, where the greater the repression, the greater the force for liberation, or, as Emily Dickinson put it,

"A wounded deer leaps highest."

In the case of Chinese women, whose repression has been protracted and extreme, the reaction from one who has managed to break free will be strong and vocal. Such a woman is imbued with so intense a sense of her own identity and the validity of her personal experience and perspective that despite, or perhaps more accurately because of, opposition, her perspective must come forth and be expressed. Her expression may fall into one of two types, or, as in he case of poet Li Qingzhao, into a conjunction of the personal and politial Her work may have its source from her own internal and individual well-spring, or a catalyst may come from outside, from a consciousness of social wrongs and injustices to he larger group with which she identifies and from her desire to right wrongs by writing them. In either case she must have faith in herself—that her words deserve a hearing—and faith in the power of the word, either to recreate her interior world by giving substance to the insubstantial or to move people and create social change, or both.

If it seems incredible that greater oppression can result in greater creativity and productivity, one might, as a useful analogy, think of the damming up of a stream; when one route is cut off, the water finds other channels in which to low, for flow it must. What Julia Kristeva has noted as an unexpected result of foot-binding seems applicable in the present case as well. Kristeva writes, perhaps somewhat romantically, that along with the suffering of foot-binding comes > the symbolic premium as well: a sort of superior knowledge, a superior maturity, because it is in her feminine world that the difficulty of the social contract is felt, in all its most painful, impossible, murderous aspects. Thus, the depreciation of woman becomes its own opposite: the refuse of society retains society's secret … As if the first archaic matriarchal model had avenged itself on the patriarchy by slipping in under the door and drawing certain advantages from the very oppression itself.

The same paradoxical principle seems to be at work in the case of these writers: the result of silencing has been stronger voices; out of humiliation and handicap has emerged beauty and strength.

Not only have women of Chinese ancestry in the United States not been entirely silent and demure, but loud and vocal warriors who, like African American women, in the words of Alexis DeVeaux, are > fighting the central oppression of all people of color as well as the oppression of women by men.

This study, then, is a work of what Elaine Showalter has coined "gyno-critics," or "the study of women as writers, and its subjects are the history, styles, themes, genres, and structures of writing by women." It is a work of literary archaeology, excavating and bringing to light the "word warriors" of Chinese ancestry who have had he courage and rebelliousness to express themselves, despite silencing forces, through the written word, in English, in prose, and in the United States. My purpose in unearthing them, in gathering them together so that their light can shine collectively for the first time, is manifold: to break the old stereotypes of demure lotus blossoms and treacherous dragon ladies, to give young Asian American women much-needed models and a female literary tradition in which they may root themselves, and to contribute to feminist scholarship by retrieving the work of women.

1940

21.1 The Iron Inspector\fn{by Wang Hsing-yüan (1940?-)} Kwangtung Province, China (M) 5

Everyone for miles around is full of praise for the way Apricot Village has gone from poverty to prosperity by increasing production over the past year or two. All the villagers think that this year will be better than ever, and anyone who goes there can see the truth of it. The soil has been improved in sixty or seventy per cent of the village's two hundred or so mu\fn{A note reads: A mu is a fifteenth of a hectare, or about one-sixth of an acre.} of paddy fields, and each mu has already been given sixty to seventy carrying-pole loads of fertilizer of some sort or another.

Hoeing and the care of the rice-shoots are all up to date. The mountain streams have been cleared, the paths between the fields have been weeded, the dikes round the paddy-fields have been trimmed neatly into shape, and the way the fruit trees have been pruned and heaped around with earth has made the mountainside orchards look like gardens. Since the beginning of spring the peasants have been working hard, competing with each other in skill and ability. As soon as the team leader gives the order they set to work like a platoon of soldiers. This whole atmosphere should be enough to convince anyone that this year will be even better than ever.

How was it that Apricot Village, which used to be called Three Kinds Village, improved so quickly? Ask any of the villagers and they will tell you, “We’ve got the Communist Party to show us the way, there are good cadres in charge, and we’ve trained able men like our ‘iron inspector’ who can cope with anything.” But not so fast. You’ve never heard of this “iron inspector.” If you are curious enough to inquire further I can guarantee that anyone who asks more about him will be full of admiration for his unselfish sense of justice.

The reader does not know who this “iron inspector” is, does he? He is no bigwig, only a humble work-point recorder called Li Zhenping, a seventeen-year-old with parted hair, a boyish face, clever eyes, and a very strong character. His mother will tell you that he is a poor orphan who lost his father as soon as he came into the world. He was reared on thin rice porridge and salt vegetables, and he grew up wandering through mountains and fields as he clung to his mother’s skirt. He only started primary school in 1956 at the age of eleven. Although he had hoped to go on to secondary school, it happened that when he finished his primary education the team’s work-point recorder had just walked out on them. As the villagers wanted Zhenping, the Party secretary said to him, “Come back and take over. You can’t let the accounts get into a mess by refusing to help us.” The secretary persuaded him in this one conversation to go home and enter “The University of Work.”

He made a start worthy of a tiger or a dragon, and the villagers were pleased with him from the moment he left his studies. He was extremely conscientious about setting quotas, assigning work to people, posting work-points on the wall, and everything else. He did it all very carefully. He was friendly too, and used to read the paper aloud to the villagers after he’d entered all the points. He put a picture of Chairman Mao on the wall of the work-team’s office to liven it up, and covered the walls of the little village hall with New-Year pictures, scrolls of birds and flowers, and newspaper cuttings, making the place look grand and cheerful.

No needle is sharp at both ends: Li Zhenping could not use an abacus to calculate work-points. He had to add them up every night with pen and paper. Seeing what a lot of trouble this was for him the members of the team urged him to learn how to use an abacus. He made up his mind to do so. But when he brought the subject up somebody coughed drily in the comer and said, “Hmmm. It’s finding a teacher that will be difficult. The only problem about learning to use the abacus is when the teacher is worried that the pupil will learn so fast that he’ll soon be better than he is himself. But if you found a teacher you’d have no trouble learning.” The speaker was Li Zhenping’s uncle Li Wanben, and his remarks drew many mocking glances from everyone else.

“That’s right,” somebody said, “it’s only natural for an uncle to teach his own nephew.”

“He didn’t get any business when he advertised for pupils,” snorted somebody else.

At this comment Li Wanben slipped off without another word.

This Li Wanben was well known in the village as a calculating monster. He was famous for being grasping and selfish like an old silkworm that gobbles up big leaves: he could work out ways of getting bones from eggs. In the old days he had been quite a rich trader with a good “reputation.” When the commune was set up he refused to use its lavatories. He used his family’s excrement to feed three big dogs he was raising at home. One morning the dogs started fighting for his shit when he went to feed them, and in the melee one of them bit his backside. He lay idle on his stomach in bed and sent his wife to tell the team leader that he had a bad cold and to ask for the money to get it treated. When the money was refused he wept and made a great fuss. Then someone told the team leader what had really happened and revealed his dirty secret. His prestige was completely destroyed. The people in the village who gave out nicknames changed his name from Wanben to Wangben (“Origin-forgetter”).

“Wangben it shall be then.”

When he accepted the nickname the villagers thought he had seen the error of his ways, but it would have been harder to change his nature than to draw blood from a turnip by peeling it. They often saw him coming back in the evening from working in the communal fields with an agonized expression on his face, walking on tiptoe, and bent double with a hand pressed to his belly. At first they thought it must be bellyache, but on repeated observation they realized that the old rogue was holding back his urine to water the vegetables in his private plot by the village.

Li Zhenping wanted nothing to do with a man who had so bad a name. He could learn from the brigade accountant. But when Li Zhenping was eating lunch the next day Li Wanben came in with an abacus under his arm to teach his nephew. '

“We shouldn’t let our sewage be wasted by flowing into someone else’s stream,” saId Li Wanben. “You must get with it and learn all the tricks.” The boy’s uncle seemed so sincere that Zhenping’s mother insisted that he should take lessons from him.

Now that Wanben had come round to their house Zhenping had to agree, unable as he was to refuse. Thus it was that Zhenping mastered addition, subtraction, multiplication, division, and the “under nine technique”— everything except pounds and ounces—in eight midday rest periods and nine evenings.

Skill strengthens the will, as the saying goes. Now that he knew how to use the abacus Zhenping rattled away at it to his heart's content as he calculated work-points; and Wanben, feeling that he now had a well-placed supporter, started to get up to his tricks again. The way he divided the labor in his family was that his eldest son went up to cut firewood on the hillside to sell for ready cash, while his daughter-in-law had to toil away at their private plot. Thus when the commune members set out for work in the morning his son and daughter-in-law were the support troops who only reported in long after the others had started. Apart from being the last in, they were the first out when it was time to stop work. Li Wanben himself did not start late or finish early, but he carried a little bamboo basket at his waist and dropped his mattock to chase any frogs or edible locusts he saw. If they dived into one of the low dikes round a field he insisted on breaking it down. When exhausted by the pursuit he would sit down at the edge of the field for a smoke. This enabled him to feed his huge numbers of hens, geese, and ducks; and without this joint state-private enterprise he reckoned that he could not have managed to survive.

While Wanben was up to no good every day Zhenping went daily to the fields, keeping his eyes skinned to see how hard each commune member was working and whether those who were not on the system of contracting to carry out a particular job were up to the minimum standard; he also inspected the quality of contracted work. Seeing how disgracefully his uncle Wanben was behaving he went up to him and said, "You must fill your quota, uncle."

"Quota my foot! I've eaten more salt in my life than you've eaten rice." Wanben gave his nephew an evil glare and started resentfully to work.

One day Li Wanben had been extremely lucky: he had caught two basketfuls of frogs in one go. This was going to be the day on which the commune members put Zhenping's integrity to the test. The job Wanben had undertaken to carry out for the work team was to plough and harrow a piece of land in the date orchard somewhat bigger than a mu. He had put too much weight on the plough, leaving the ground looking as though it were covered in mountain ranges, and even after he had harrowed it the soil was still uneven and not properly broken down. Among the villagers some were worried that Zhenping might not be clever enough to avoid being taken in by Wanben. Some were making all sorts of critical remarks and others were warning him. Aniu, the work team leader, slapped him on the shoulder and said, "Now we'll see whether you're a pillar of strength or not."

Zhenping wondered how, feeling more on his guard than ever. That evening he was still pacing up and down in the date orchard examining the land his uncle had ploughed and harrowed. He really had dont a very shoddy job. When calculating the work-points that evening Zhenping felt awkward with the abacus and used pen and paper instead. He was bursting with anger and determined to humiliate his uncle that night. He worked out everyone else's work-points first, deliberately leaving his uncle's to the last.

Li Wanben was as pleased as punch that day. He squatted in a chair by the accounts desk with a grin so broad that his eyes were half closed while he waited for his points to be worked out. As he saw his nephew passing over him again and again to work out the others' points first his face darkened. Was his own nephew, the student he himself had taught, daring to turn on him like this? He coughed occasionally as a hint to Zhenping.

When the points of everyone in the team except Wanben had been worked out Zhenping thought for a while before saying to the commune members, "I hope you will all report anyone doing shoddy work." After a long silence the deputy team leader lost patience. "Write down the truth," he said decisively. "I'll back you up if there's any trouble."

"Hmmm. How can I know how shoddy it was? Everyone must report on him."

Zhenping had been intending to say straight out who it was who had worked badly, but he decided to give his uncle a chance to show a little political awareness. The owlish gaze his uncle fixed on him showed that there was no hope, so he said to Wanben, "You're the one who's worked badly, uncle. I think you ought to re-do the piece of land in the date orchard."

"What?" said Wanben with an evil glare, adding through clenched teeth, "Very well. Write it down then. I've finished with you." He slapped the desk and stalked out.

Zhenping sat there quietly as Wanben's clogs could be heard stamping out through the door. The commune members burst out laughing. "Zhenping," someone said, "you're like the barber's apprentice whose first customer was a hairy old man. We're going to see what you're like with the razor now."

"It's a steel one," said Zhenping with determination. "Unless he does it over again I'll only give him three-fifths of the points. If he doesn't like it he can lodge a complaint against me." With that he wrote down the points. To pay off the favour Wanben had done him, and to leave himself under no obligation to anyone as work-point recorder, Zhenping transferred five of his own points to Wanben as a very fat fee for teaching him the abacus.

Although the team members said the points should be given to Wanben from the general pool, Zhenping refused, generously wrote down the transfer, and went. The people who had been waiting to see Zhenping face this test had to clap and laugh.

"Good. Apricot Village really has got an iron inspector."

When an unhappy Li Zhenping went home and opened the door he saw that hin uncle and hin mother were chatting about something. "No need to ask," he thought, "he's complaining to mother. I don't care. He can complain as much as he likes." He went straight into the inner room, climbed into bed, burrowed under the bedclothes, wrapped them around himself, and waited for the complaints to begin.

"You're getting much too big for your boots," said his mother. She was very embarrassed by Wanben's complaint and at the sight of her son she lost her temper. Without going into the rights and wrongs of the question she grabbed the bamboo pinchers she used for driving her hens and started to belabor Zhenping as he lay there on the bed. "Nothing will stop you. How could you show so little feeling, and you an educated boy?" Giving one whack with every phrase she made the dust fly out of Zhenping's bedding. He neither moved nor cried. His mother went on beating him till Wanben snatched the pinchers from her and said,

"That's enough. Don't be like a puppy chewing a stone that somebody has thrown for him. It doesn't really matter if I've been hard done by. It must be because my ancestor Shunxing didn't leave a legacy of good deeds. That's why his descendants are all like worms in the ground that get chopped up by other people's spades. You'll have to eat your way through many more sheaves of rice yet before you're in a position to lay down the law, my lad."

Zhenping's mother turned to Wanben and apologized to him profusely. When at last she saw him out she said, "The boy is still very inexperienced. He'll need a lot more of your advice in future, uncle."

That night she went on and on at the boy as if she were reciting scriptures, scolding him for "trying to block out the sun with a chopstick." At first he ignored her, but when he could bear her nagging no longer his temper flared up. He leapt out of bed and shouted at his mother, "The more you go on with your capitalist and lousy feudal ideas the more they stink." After this outburst he went back into his quilt and shut his ears to all his mother's abuse. He felt that what he had done was honorable and right and did not care who attacked him for it. At the same time he was aware of how sharp and complicated the struggle in the villages was and how difficult it was to do the right thing.

When the commune members went to the fields to harvest the winter wheat and pick peas the next morning Zhenping went with them as usual. Li Wanben's family started work particularly early. Everyone noticed that he had no basket at his belt and was working very conscientiously. When he had to watch the frogs that he could not catch leaping around in the fields, it was as if lumps of his own flesh were jumping about. The other commune members were quietly delighted. Seeing how well Wanben was now behaving the team leader Aniu said to Zhenping, "As long as you bake it in ashes the prickly eel can't do you any harm." Then he turned to Wanben and said provocatively, "How terrible. Such a pity to see all those frogs hopping about with nobody to catch them." Grinding his teeth so hard that he almost broke them, Wanben angrily raised his sickle and cut a frog in half.

As several days went by Wanben had to watch his ducks laying smaller and smaller eggs or even stop laying altogether. But it was not worth catching frogs for them if he lost work-points for it. Neither could he bear to feed them on rice. For Wan ben, a man who calculated his every move, to be reduced to such a state made him hate Zhenping to the very marrow of his bones.

After four days of solid hatred he managed to think up an evil plan. When nobody was looking he threw a packetful of broken glass that he had collected into the team office through the crack between the doors. "That'll cut his feet to shreds," he thought. "Now we'll see if he can come into the fields to spy on me."

You cannot be on your guard against a danger you do not know about; and as Zhenping, his bare legs covered in mud, was the first to unlock and go in at midday several jagged pieces of glass cut right into the soles of his feet. He collapsed, blood gushing out. The commune members helped him, as soon as they heard about it, by removing the glass and bandaging his wounds. Wanben too pretended to sigh when he heard the news, but really he was chuckling to himself, "Try boiling the head of an ox and a chicken in the same pot and you'll see which has more flavour."

This sneak attack on Zhenping meant that he was unable to go to work. He had to stay at home and recover. The cadres, the team leader, and he decided that this must have been a trap set by some evil person. The cadres urged him to carry on and not to weaken. He was also greatly consoled and encouraged by the concern the commune members showed for him. Now that he could not go out with the others the bamboo basket reappeared at Wanben's waist and disaster struck the frogs in the fields once more. When one horse stops the others rest.

Those who shared Wanben's stinking outlook began to slacken as well. Zhenping could no longer go on sitting around when he learnt of this. He could not let anyone make trouble and hold up production now that it was well into spring and the rice shoots would soon have to be transplanted. Even though he could not work with the others he could sit beside the fields and help the team leader to keep an eye on things. He would sort them out.

Three days later he limped out to the fields on crutches. When his mother and the other commune members tried to hold him back and make him rest, he threw the crutches away and said, "They don't hurt at all." When he reached the field he sat beside it and watched. Thus Li Wanben's plan to get rich was foiled by the iron inspector once again.

After the spring harvest the rice shoots were transplanted. Apart from what was sold to the state or kept for the seed nearly all the wheat, peas, and sweet potatoes were shared among the villagers on the basis of work-points. It worked out that each point was worth a little over four pounds of wheat and three of peas, as well as some sweet potatoes. They had worked hard and now they were being amply rewarded. They were all delighted to receive the fruits of their labour—apart from Li Wanben. He went round with an evil face, making snide remarks and saying that he had been robbed and bullied by the cadres. He and his sympathizers made a lot of bother. They threatened not to work and demanded transfers to other teams.

These troubles were the work of Wanben too. The team leader Aniu was an imperturbable man who knew how to cope no matter how Wanben twisted and turned. As for Li Zhenping, his feet were now toughened up again and he was determined to carry this battle through to the end. Several days after the share-out his cousin came from the county town to visit them, and Zhenping's mother talked about the rights and wrongs of what he had been doing. Wanben came along too to make his complaint. When he had heard both sides of the story the cousin, who was a government worker, took Zhenping to one side and said, "It was right of you to put the common good above your personal feelings; but all the same, we cadres have to weigh up the character of every commune member and be patient in educating and reforming them …" This explanation made Zhenping realize that he had not done nearly enough to change his uncle's way of thinking. Then he thought that trying to change his thinking at this stage would be a waste of time, like a hen pecking at a closed clam.

At last an answer came to him. At noon the next day, when his mother was not there to know, he slipped over to his uncle's with a scoopful of his own family's wheat in the hope that this would mellow Wanben so that he could then tackle his uncle's attitude of mind. But when he reached his uncle's front door and called out to him, Wanben came out and spat at him and gave him a vicious glare like that of a ghost seeing a fire.

"Damn you! My evil star." With that he slammed the door.

As Zhenping stood under the eaves wiping the spit from his face, he glared back at the door feeling humiliated and angry.

"If you won't reform that's your look-out," he said at last, marching off in a great fury.

One day about a fortnight later Zhenping went to the marketing and supply co-operative to arrange for the sale of some home-made baskets, brooms, and such things. Instead of going straight back that afternoon as he had intended, he went to the clinic to buy some basic medicines for the village's first-aid worker. While he was there Li Yongfu happened to ring up the clinic asking for a doctor to visit his sick son. The doctors were all out. Rather than let one take the mountain path by himself, Zhenping felt he'd better wait till one came back and go with him. The pediatrician did not return till evening. Zhenping took him back to Apricot Village that night, and it was nearly ten by the time they reached Li Yongfu's place. Zhenping hurried back to the office without stopping at Li Yongfu's.

He unlocked the door, went in, and turned on the light. A tray had been turned over. When he switched on his torch for a closer look he found to his horror that a basket of wheat and another one of beans were missing. A desperate search failed to reveal any sign of them. Who had stolen them? Another hunt round the room revealed a cigarette end that he recognized as his uncle's. Wondering how it had got there he hurried over to the team leader Aniu's house.

It was a pitch-black night with not a star to be seen, and as he rushed along in his impatience his torch danced around like a firefly. When he was past the second lane he heard scurrying footsteps in the third, and he looked up just in time to see a dark figure flit across it. His eyes probed the night like searchlights now that he was thoroughly alerted. He ran after the figure to the beginning of the third lane and shouted, "Who's there?" Then he heard a sound and saw the dark figure drop something. Running up and shining his torch on it he saw that it was the wheat seed stolen from the team office: Third Team was painted on the basket in big red letters. He started off in pursuit again, shouting, "Stop thief, stop thief!" All the dogs in the village started to bark as his shouts woke the sleeping commune members.

With Zhenping after him the dark figure stumbled and ran in terror past the third lane and back into the first lane, not realizing that it was a cul-de-sac walled off at the end. “Stop thief. He’s stolen the team’s seed,” shouted Zhenping when he reached the entrance to the lane. Zhenping’s mother was the first person to open her door, and she came to the threshold brandishing a carrying-pole.

“Where is he?” she asked Zhenping. “Where is the damn thief?”

“At the end of the alley. Catch him, mother. He’s stolen the team’s wheat seed.”

“Right then.” After a quick search she saw a piglet jump squealing out of the sty of the house opposite. Without a moment’s hesitation she charged at it, waving her carrying-pole. Just as she was about to bring it swinging down she heard a hoarse, imploring voice saying,

“It’s … it’s me.”

“Oh … it’s you.” She recognized it immediately as Wanben’s. As she stood rooted to the ground with shock, not knowing what to do, she saw Wanben shoot out of the pigsty and into her house.

She shut the door and shouted, “He’s got away. Stop thief!”

“Where did he go?” asked Zhenping, shining his torch around in his own house. By now everyone in the lane had opened their doors and joined the hunt, and in answer to all their questions Zhenping’s mother waved and said, “The thief went over the wall.” They all came rushing down the lane. When Zhenping reached the wall at the end of it he saw that as there was no ladder the thief could not have got over it. This made him curious. He searched the woodpile and pigsties nearby. No sign of him. The way his mother was shaking all over as she shut the door aroused his suspicions.

“Afraid of the thief?” he asked.

His mother made a tutting noise and said, “Forget about it. He’s miles away by now. Go to bed.”

“All right. But I’ll cook a bowl of rice first—I’m hungry.” He pushed his mother aside and went into the kitchen. As she could not stop him she went in with him, shutting the door of the room behind her. He shone his torch under her bed, on the stove, and in the corners. He was just going to climb up into the loft, which she knew would be disastrous, when she grabbed hold of him and whispered,

“Son, this is terribly important, terribly important.”

“I’m seeing this through to the bitter end,” he replied, shoving her aside and storming up the ladder. In the beam of his torch he saw Wanben crouching like a dog under a cupboard and gazing pathetically at him.

Wanben, who had been dissatisfied with the share-out after the spring harvest, had been watching for a chance to destroy Zhenping. That evening he had taken advantage of his absence to go along to the team’s office with skeleton keys and steal some wheat. Now he was caught—like a junior devil who had run into the great wizard’s net. Zhenping hesitated for a moment at the sight of him, stunned at meeting his enemy so unexpectedly. He glared malevolently at his uncle.

Now that the cat was out of the bag Zhenping’s mother pointed at the tip of her son’s nose and began to scold him under her breath: “You’ll be the death of me. Even an ox’s horn bends inwards so you ought to show some consideration for your own family. The gods themselves sometimes make mistakes. If your uncle has gone wrong the right thing to do is to criticize him on the quiet. What else can you be thinking of?”

“That would be like wrapping dogs muck up in clean white paper,” said Zhenping, flaring up. “You’ll see what I’m going to do.” He turned to go downstairs.

“I’m not dead yet,” she said, hanging on to him with both hands and not letting him take a step. “Even if you have no consideration for him please show me some.”

“I’ll show none for anybody.”

Seeing the hard expression on Zhenping’s face Wanben pretended to be tough and said, “Let him go. It must be the fault of our ancestors that we’re in this state now.”

Zhenping ignored him and insisted on going downstairs, dragging his mother to the top of the ladder with him as she would not let go. “How can you be so heartless,” she pleaded.

“You’ve no more chance of stopping me than of pouring all the water out of the reservoir in the mountains.”

At this his mother lost her temper. “I’ll do it, I’ll do it,” she said, slapping him in the face and making him so angry that his hair stood on end. As he thrust her forcefully aside he heard the team leader Aniu shouting, “Where’s the thief, Zhenping?”

“Here,” Zhenping shouted back, his voice shaking the whole village and making all Wanben’s cronies tremble.

The cocks crowed. The “iron inspector,” the public-spirited recorder of work-points, realized that this was his moment of victory at last.

20.110 The Moon On A Frosty Morning\fn{by Fang Shumin (1940?-)} Hopei Province, China (M) 5

Cassia had just fed her one-year-old baby and was covering her head with a towel to go to the fields, when her four-year-old son Shigour said to his granny, “Why are you making shoes for my father? He’s away.”

“I’m not making them for that spineless father of yours.” She rubbed the awl against her hair and thrust it hard and angrily through the sole of the shoe. “I’m making them for your mother.”

“But her feet are too small for those shoes,” Shigour protested solemnly.

“Out of the way, brat.”

With Shigour driven away the old lady handed her daughter-in-law the black canvas shoes for which she had just finished making the sole.

“Oh well,” she said, smiling till her eyes creased right up, “you can’t blame the boy. You’ve been so busy these last few months rushing all over the place through mud and water. No wonder these great boots aren’t proper women’s shoes. Try them on.”

Cassia tried on the new shoes and found that they fitted perfectly. Even she could not help laughing. Then she tucked a sickle in her belt and hurried off to the threshing-ground.

The threshing-ground lay to the north of Bean Hamlet, as the village was called. It was bigger than last year, and heaped within new fencing in the middle of it were two huge mounds of bright red sorghum that had yet to be milled; the corn-cobs stacked in frames built of sorghum stalks gleamed in the autumn sun like a golden palace, and the piles of late millet were pushing at the fence round the threshing-floor, making it lean like an overhanging cliff.

The rich fragrance of grain drifted across the threshing-floor. Although it was now late autumn and the light north-west wind blowing across the fields was reminding everyone that the cold season had begun, Cassia felt only warmth at the sight of the fine harvest on the floor as she cut off the sorghum tops with her sickle.

Eyes sparkled as people returning to other counties from market passed the threshing-floor. They sighed with admiration and said, “What a good harvest they’ve had in this team.”

“Indeed,” somebody agreed awkwardly. “Looks even better than the Cherry Orchard Team we passed earlier.”

“A fat lot you know. They left the famous Cherry Orchard Team behind months ago.”

“Which team is this then?” asked the ill-informed man with another sigh.

“Bean Hamlet.”

“At last. So this is the famous ‘Poor Bean Hamlet,’” a voice said with a hoarse chuckle. “The paupers have managed a decent harvest this year—like a blind man catching an eel.”

This last remark stung Cassia as she worked. There was an explosion in her head as she flung a bundle of sorghum tops to the ground, flicked her short, untidy hair back and shot a furious glare at the hoarse, middle-aged man. He blushed in fear and embarrassment. She softened her expression, suddenly realizing that she had no reason to lose her temper like an eighteen-year-old. A woman of thirty-two should be more tolerant; besides, she was deputy work-team leader. She waved to the men in the road and smiled at them.

“Are you thirsty, friends? Take a rest on the threshing-floor.”

“No thanks,” one of them replied. “Looks like a good harvest you’ve had this year.”

“It certainly is,” she shouted happily, stepping back with her strong legs. An old man in a little felt hat jumped off his grey donkey and croaked, “Hey, comrade, come here, comrade.”

A cheeky youth beside him who was grinning all over his face grabbed him and whispered: “You’re asking for trouble, you shameless old devil. You’re not on comrade terms with her.”

When Cassia heard this she ran to the fence and said to the old man, “Never mind that nonsense, Uncle. You go and and call me ‘comrade’ as bold as you please. What do you want to say?”

The old man shifted the pouch-sack on his shoulder before relaxing and letting himself reply.

“I came through here on the way to market during the floods in July, and the oceans of water covering the fields made me think that you’d been washed out again. Aafter two bad years running I was sure you’d be going hungry again this year. I’d never have dreamed you could get this good a harvest.”

Cassia waved her sickle and laughed, her eyebrows raised.

“You can’t have been to market since then. You may have seen the floods, but you didn’t see how we fought against them.”

The old man now apparently understood everything. He took off his hat, nodded, jumped back on his donkey, and rode away.

Cassia smiled as she watched them go off towards the Grand Canal ferry. The full evening sun cast a golden light over her tanned face. The boundless plain beyond the village and the fields of green wheat shoots that covered it gave her a feeling of expanse and excitement. At the same time she was a little depressed. She had wanted badly to tell those strangers who did not know the story how their village had fought against the flood. But she must put all such ideas out of her head. Anyone would think that Bean Hamlet was not tough enough.

As she gazed into the distance deep in thought she saw a trail of yellow dust rising from the road behind the brick-kiln. She knew it came from a rider and trembled as she realized that it must be Big Wu galloping at that speed. Just then she heard some women on the threshing-floor crying out,

"It's Big Wu."

"It's him, it's Big Wu."

Unable to think of anything else she dropped her sickle and ran after the other women and the children towards the road. Shielding her eyes with her right hand she made out a chestnut horse pounding through the dust, and the bare-chested man astride it was indeed Big Wu, the team leader.

"Big Wu!"

She was waving and shouting. The chestnut horse carried its rider to the fence. The tall rider, a man in his forties, dismounted with a leap into a cloud of dust and put his hand on the horse's back.

"Have you been impatient waiting for me to come back? Come and take a look at our horse."

Cassia was the first to reach it. "It's a fine sturdy beast," she said.

"It's kicking," shouted Big Wu, deliberately frightening the women and children so that they scattered like chickens. Cassia alone stepped forward and grabbed it by the mane. When it shook its head violently, she pinched its nostrils shut and forced its mouth open.

"Be quiet, you devil." It whinnied, pawed the ground, and then calmed down.

"What did you want to make it do that for?" she said to Big Wu, adding, "Tell me quickly, how old is it?"

"Six. It's a strong one all right."

As she kneaded the horse's back she could not hold back her praises. "And such a glossy coat. What breed is it?"

"It's Mongolian—from beyond the Great Wall."

"Good." Then she anxiously asked, "Have we bought her yet?"

"I paid on the nail and I've got the papers to prove it."

"Good." Cassia tugged at the reins as she said, "Yesterday Tiedan and I built the stable, and last night Grandpa Baishun was chosen as stock-keeper. He's so pleased he's spent the morning cooking and rolling feed. I'll take him along to be watered and fed. I've got the cart with iron-rimmed wheels ready at the granary door to take the state grain, so you'd better go there and check the grain. Now that we've got our horse we must load the cart tomorrow morning, and I'm going to drive it. After two years on relief grain from the government our team must be first to deliver."

"Fine, fine," Big Wu cut in. "You take him over to Grandpa Baishun for a feed, and I'll be with you when I've checked the grain."

Just as they were about to move Big Wu suddenly remembered something.

"Cassia," he shouted. "Wait a moment. I've got good news for you!"

"I didn't hear a magpie this morning," she said,\fn{A note reads: A magpie is thought to bring luck in China.} turning her head, "so I don't see how there can be any good news for me."

"Shigour's dad, your husband Waizi, is coming back from Cherry Orchard tonight!"

Cassia was shattered. This sudden news was like being hit on the head with a brick. Try as she did to control the anger that surged up inside her she could not help her face turning pale and her voice shaking as she replied, "Don't you dare mention his name. Our family is getting along very well without him."

"Keep your temper, Cassia," said Big Wu. "If he's seen he was in the wrong and is willing to come back you should be ready to help him. The return of the prodigal is something to be pleased about."

"So am I expected to send a bridal chair with eight porters to fetch him?" Cassia asked indignantly. ":If he had the nerve to leave he can have the nerve to sleep out in the village's reed beds."

"Hmmm," said Big Wu. "Waizi wasn't in that sort of mood at all. When we met at the market he grabbed hold of me and wouldn't let me go. And when he asked me about his mother, yourself, and the two kids, his eyes were red although he is a grown man."

"It's none of his business," Cassia cut in, sounding as if she were gnashing her teeth. "We haven't starved to death."

"Listen," said Big Wu. "'Waizi,' I said to him, 'your wife has changed. These last months she's really been doing things. She's a candidate Party member and has been elected deputy team leader—"

"You seem to have enjoyed gossiping with him, you old gas-bag," she interrupted again.

"The best part of the story is still to come," grinned Big Wu. "He hung on to my hand until I said, 'Let me go, I've got to buy a horse for the team.' Tears were pouring down his cheeks, so I asked him if he wasn't all right staying with his in-laws. 'Don't ask me about that,' he said. 'I've heard all the news from Bean Hamlet. If they'll have me back again I'll …' 'Wha'll you do?' I asked him, and he started howling. 'Never mind, Waizi,' I said. 'If you know you've gone wrong you should come back and admit it; from now on you must forge ahead with all the rest of us. I'll back you up this time. When will you be coming home/' His answer came back like a shot: 'Tonight.'"

Cassia was so angry that she stamped her foot and flung out her arm.

"I never signed any undertaking to have him. Even if he does come I won't have him back."

"Oh well," said Big Wu, still trying to win her round, "you should at least let him stay tonight. He's coming back this evening, whether you let him stay on can be decided later. After all, we can't ignore him now he's turning over a new leaf. Look! The horse is eating Old Deng's fence. Take him away this moment!"

*

It was night by now. The north-west wind that had been blowing across the plain had dropped, and the frozen stars shivered in the late autumn cold. Cassia let the horse relieve itself, then watered it beside the well. Grandpa Baishun tethered it in its newly-built stable and fed it as carefully as if he were fingering a jewel. A moment later Big Wu was there, standing under the swinging hurricane lamp and saying happily, "Mmm. That feed smells good." With a nod to Grandpa Baishun he said to Cassia, "I've checked the state grain. The stuff in the sacks is all up to standard—first-rate stuff—so it can be taken in first thing tomorrow. When I've had a drink of water I must be off to the river bend to hear how the laborers from our village are getting on with the canal. Which of the men should take the cart?"

She stretched out her arm.

"I told you I was going to drive, didn't I?"

He shot a sidelong glance at her and, seeing the determined way her eyebrows were raised, could only smile. It would have been a waste of time to say anything more.

She was a long time settling in the new horse with Grandpa Baishun before going home. As it was the end of the lunar month there was not even a sliver of moon above the -trees. She felt her way into the courtyard and grimly remembered to wedge the gates shut by sticking a pole hard against them. In the house she heard her mother-in-law ask sleepily from the darkness, "Is that you back? Shall I light the lamp?"

"No," Cassia replied quickly. "Are the children asleep? Why are you still awake?"

"I rocked them to sleep. Why did you have to make such a noise shutting the gates? We haven't used the date-wood pole for months, so why shut the gates with it tonight?"

"I thought the wind would blow them open."

"Fool," the old woman went on, "idiot. Didn't you notice that the wind had dropped ages ago?"

Cassia did not want to tell her mother-in-law that Waizi was coming back that night in case the news gave her a seizure and killed her. She climbed on to the kang, but no matter which way she lay she could not get to sleep. She gritted her teeth and hardened her heart, longing to hear him trying to force the gates while she lay there on the kang and would not get up to open them. He could freeze—he had asked for it. As she lay there her heart would start to pound at the slightest sound from the yard, but as she waited she heard no loud noise to follow.

An evening in July flashed before her eyes. That night when, with one cloud-burst following another, she had waded home from a team meeting through the floods, her feet heavy with mud, supporting herself with difficulty on the vegetable-garden fence. Just as she and her mother-in-law had been looking for a big spade in the shed they had heard squelching footsteps in the yard. She had opened the door and said, "Oh, you're back."

The stocky Waizi had come in and was wiping the mud off his feet while she lit the lamp and asked him, "Where've you been? We shouted ourselves hoarse trying to get you to the team meeting."

"I went to Cherry Orchard," he had said.

"What a thing to do," she had replied, flari.ng up. "You just don't care about the team's crops. Big Wu's been elected team leader and he'll be a good one. He's taken men and women from our village down to the river bend as fast as they can go to drain the water out. But you had time to go and visit the children's granny. What do you mean by it at a time like this?"

"You want to know what 1 was doing?" said Waizi with a laugh. "I was negotiating. It's all settled. Tomorrow the whole family moves to Cherry Orchard."

Cassia had been stunned. “What? What did you say?”

“What’s the point of thinking about nothing but work all the time? Can’t you see that this poverty-ridden hollow has been a frog pond for two years running? Even the team’s donkey has starved to death. Now this year’s rains have drowned us again. There’s nothing to stay for. The sooner we find some dry land the better.”

Cassia had realized at once what he was thinking.

“Frightened of starving?” she had said. “Want to sneak off, don’t you?”

Waizi had tilted his head to one side and replied, “Say what you like as long as you understand that tomorrow we’re shutting the place up and going, bedding and all.”

“Who’s going?” she had asked.

“All of us,” he had said.

At this she had flared up and shouted furiously, “You can clear off by yourself. You may have it all nicely worked out, but nobody’s going with you.”

The stocky Waizi had rushed forward and grabbed her. 'Stay where you are. Where are you going with that spade?”

“Get away from me,” Cassia had said, breaking away from him. “I’m going to drain off the water and guard the dike with Big Wu. This is a crisis. I’ve got no time to waste talking to you.”

Waizi had raised his hand, but Cassia had moved her spade instantly to parry it, screaming, “Don’t touch me. If you lay a finger on me you’ll get a dose of this.”

With their quarrel. the room had felt as hot as a kiln; gongs were being beaten outside to tell everyone to go to the dike at once, the boy was crying, and the adults were shouting at each other. It had been too much for the old woman, who released a torrent of abuse on him: “Worthless wretch, evil son, get the hell out of here and eat and drink as well as you can.”

When Cassia had come back the next day from her work at the river she had tried to win him round, but he was so set in his twisted ideas that when she had finished he just replied, “The flood waters are here to stay. This dump won’t ever get rich. Are you coming with me or aren’t you?”

“No,” Cassia had said, steeling herself, “I won’t go.”

“If you’re not coming that’s your lookout. Mother and Shigour are coming with me.”

The old lady had jabbed her finger at his nose and said, “You’re not going to take even a hair of any of us, not one hair.”

Red-faced and hoarse, Waizi had issued his last warning:

“Very well then; don’t come if you don’t want to. But don’t expect me to be nice to you when you come begging from me in the autumn.”

This had made the old lady angrier than ever:

“If that’s how you’re going to talk to us you’d better clear out at once. Go off and hatch your plans, my fine lad. There may not be much flesh on us but our bones are hard, really hard.”

Waizi had wrapped up his bedding and gone, his pipe between his teeth.

His last superior glance at them was deeply etched on Cassia’s mind. The thought of it still made her almost burstwith indignation; she gave an involuntary and contemptuous snort. This woke her mother-in-law, who rolled over and asked:

“Are you cold?”

“No, mother, I’m boiling hot.” She tried as hard as she could to calm herself down as she lay there in the dark, her eyes wide open, struggling; to drive away the image that flickered ill front of them. But it hovered there more clearly than ever. She imagined him coming back and apologizing to her. She would tell him straight out that what he’d done had been completely wrong, and it had all been because he had not had confidence in the group and the people’s commune … She fell into a doze.

When she woke again a little later there was still no sound from the courtyard.

“He hasn’t come back,” she thought. The crescent moon setting in the south-west was filtering its light through the window, and she could hear the first cock-crow of the morning. She could stay in bed no longer. The old lady leant over to her and said:

“Why are you tossing and turning so?”

“Keep your voice down, mother.” Cassia sat up smartly and felt for her clothes. “I’ve got to get up early to take the tax grain in.”

“You’ll be frozen right through this early in the morning,” the old lady said, “so mind you wear a jacket over your green tunic. I finished the soles of your new shoes last night and put them by your pillow. Have you found them?"

"I've put them on," Cassia replied.

"It'll be a long, cold journey, so wait till I've boiled you some noodles and egg."

"No thanks." Cassia got down from the kang. "I must be on my way before the third cock-crow. I can get something to eat on my way through Zimu township."

She groped lightly for her child's head, kissed his lips, and went out. She felt the cold in the courtyard at once, pulling her warm hands straight away from the frozen window-sill and sucking in her breath. There had been a frost that night, the first since last winter, and the young crows perched in the locust tree in the yard were cheeping miserably. Some dead leaves, covered in white, were drifting to the ground. She looked up again at the golden crescent of the moon in the southwestern sky and at the stars shimmering in the cold air, overcome with a warm feeling of pity. It had been the height of summer when Waizi left wearing only a thin shirt and trousers. He would choose the cold season to come back, the pig-headed fool. Well, if he wanted to come back he'd have to change his way of thinking.

She regretted her anger of the previous night. He hadn't come back, so she need not have blocked the gates so securely. She went over and worked the heavy date-wood pole loose. As she stepped through the gates all her courage could not stop her from gasping with fright: there was somebody squatting in the shadows outside.

"Who's that?" she called.

The man did not look up. He stayed there with his arms clasping his shoulders and his head buried in them.

There was no need to ask any questions. The faint moonlight was bright enough for her to see that it was Waizi.

83.42 Nausea\fn{by Yen Chu (c.1940?-)} Shantung Province, China (M) 5

"Do you feel nauseous when you brush your teeth?" The doctor turned around and asked me as he washed his hands. He sounded genuinely concerned as any doctor new at his job would be, or, for that matter, any teacher, drill officer, or pastor. He looked much younger than I, yet he aroused in me a feeling of admiration arid trust.

"No." I answered after some deliberation.

"Do you get car-sick?"

"No."

"Is your stomach upset by filth?"

"No."

The doctor pulled up a chair from near by and sat down. His fair-complexioned face began to show a trace of pink. He covered his face with his right hand, bowed his head, and thought hard for a moment. Then he lifted his head and looked at me through the cracks between his fingers and asked, "Do you feel nauseous when you smell something odorous?"

"No," said I, apologetically. "On the contrary I love to eat smelly foods such as smelly duck eggs, smelly bean curd, smelly salted fish."

He got up uneasily. He contemplated me for a while, hands akimbo, and said, "Have you ever suffered from stomach disorder, urinary troubles, ulcers or any organic disorder of the stomach and the intestinal tract?"

"I have gone through many examinations, but they never could find anything wrong."

"But you are quite sure that you are suffering from nausea."

"Yes, doctor," I hastened to answer, trying the best I could to sound and look as earnest as I possibly could. "I feel nauseous every day. Lately it is getting worse because it makes me restless and not able to do my job. That was why I asked for a day off to come to this hospital for a thorough check-up. Doctor, please tell me if there is anything the matter with me."

"There is a trace of abnormality in your glandular system, but nothing else seems to be wrong." He seemed at a loss, but a moment later his eyes began to twinkle and the lost look vanished from his face.

"Did you say you feel nauseous every day?" The way he asked that question brought to my mind a picture of a village boy trying to beach a slippery catfish.

"Right!" Now that he showed a renewed interest in me, 1 felt excited and my heart quickened. I had found a friend after my own heart. At previous examinations doctors found nothing the matter with me, and they generally smiled a smile that did not reach their eyes, and stood up to signal dismissal. "I feel nauseous every day, and I want to throw up all the time."

"Exactly under what conditions do you feel nauseous?" he asked immediately, and he pulled his chair up closer.

"I can't be specific." I said timidly. I sensed that we were approaching an embarrassing moment. "For instance, when I am watching TV, or reading newspapers and popular literary works, or when I am listening to the radio, to lectures, or to certain people; even riding on a bus, or walking in the streets, or in a public lounge, I get the painful feeling of wanting to vomit and yet I can't."

At this point he stood up suddenly. He looked anxious and ill at ease. The expression on his face once again reminded me of the village boy who had to let go of the slippery catfish in his hand because its gills stung him, but just then he saw another fish, much larger. My words seemed to have stung the doctor where he hurt, and what I felt seemed to be exactly the feeling that was troubling him too. He shouted at me hysterically, as one would try to shake off the hold of a recent nightmare by telling about it in a loud voice.

"You! You are some joker! Are you saying that everybody is ugly to look at, dull to listen to, and they all make you want to puke?" He got carried away as he went on. He was practically pointing at my nose and screaming at me, and he said, "The way I see it, your kind of people are nauseating! You people pretend to be ill; you put yourselves above all others, and you are always whining! You are nauseating!"

As I watched him throwing a temper fit, the unexplainable depression I felt in my chest began to melt away. The truth was, no one had spoken to me in such an angry voice for a long time. When I told people about this sensation of wanting to vomit, the response was usually silence, or a knowing smile, or a change of subject. The painful feeling of being unable to communicate made me feel that I was living in a callous world. I began to feel that the pleasure of conversing with friends was a thing of the past. The way the young doctor criticized me for my attitude toward life without mincing words was a luxurious experience. Hence, his accusation did not make me mad, on the contrary it felt like a soothing tonic which cleared the head and chased away my melancholy. It hit directly at my troubled spot. I looked up at him like a school boy who had been wronged for a long time. I tried to refute him, and I said,

"Doctor, I am not feigning an illness, absolutely not! And I surely do not have the mental energy to think that I am above everybody else. Think about it, if this sensation of wanting to vomit does not really make me sick why should I brave this heat and—"

"Life makes you nauseous." He sounded quarrelsome. "You are a misanthrope, a person who hates all mankind."

"I am not a hater of all mankind."

"What are you if not a misanthrope when people make you want to vomit?"

"Not everyone makes me want to vomit. For instance … for instance …" It was hard to put my thoughts into, words. "For instance, I just love the smiling faces of infants … for instance … in short … I don't hate everybody, only those—"

"Only women, right?" He sounded dogmatic. He seemed intent on misinterpreting me, or, maybe, on drawing his own conclusions. "Then you are a misogynist, a woman hater."

"Please don't venture wild guesses." I was quite piqued. "I don't hate all women. On the contrary I love women and I respect them."

"Ha! Ha!" He leaned back and laughed loudly. I discovered, to my surprise, there were very fine crow lines at the corners of his eyes. The pink glow on his face had now receded behind his ears, much as a colorful sunset would be blown away by an evening breeze. His nose no longer looked handsome. The look of determination around the corners of his mouth disappeared. His trembling, twisted body made him look much older all of a sudden. He was aware that I was staring at him, and he made some small motion to cover an unguarded moment. He put both hands in the big pockets of his white coat, then immediately took out a book from one pocket and put it on top of another book on the table. All of this was done in a very casual manner. A while later, he seemed ill at ease and put it back in his pocket again. But I had already made out that it was a Chinese translation of the French author Albert Camus's\fn{(1913-1960, born in Algeria.} L'etranger. The book on the table was The World as Will and Idea, an English translation of Arthur Schopenhauer's\fn{German philosopher (1788-1860).} Die Welt als Wille und Vorstellung.

After a short moment of unease, he recovered and was once again relaxed and sure of himself. He returned to his chair and said to me, with all the concentration he could muster, continuing from where we left off way back.

"You like women, and you also respect women. What kind of women do you like? What kind do you respect?"

"I like … I like …" I let myself go and said, "I like Yun in Fu Sheng Liu Chi,\fn{Six Chapters of a Floating Life.} and I like a student of mine who wanted to open up a sky light in her bedroom so that she could lie in bed and watch the stars with the farmer she was going to marry. I respect the young nun I met on a bus, and Beatrice in Dante’s Divine Comedy.”

“And who else?”

When he asked me that question his expression was so solemn, so serious that I could hardly believe my eyes and ears. I had expected him to lean back and have another good laugh.

“I like all those who are pure and beautiful and yet do not think of themselves as pure and beautiful, and I respect all those who are virtuous and great and yet do not think of themselves as such.”

I saw tears flicker in his eyes, but I did not know whether they were tears of joy or of pity. Then, he covered his face with his palms and muttered, “No wonder you want to vomit.”

I looked at him with a question mark in my eyes. He wiped his face with his left hand, took a deep breath and said, “You were just saying that those who make you nauseous are … are only those kind of people?”

“Only those who are favored yet who have no respect for themselves; and those who do not care about the fate of a nation, but only their own individual freedom; those who pretend to commiserate, to promote the pure and eliminate the evil, but actually, in the name of one ‘ism’ or another, try to cut a figure for themselves; those who because they make a few rotten dollars think that they are one notch above all others, and that they have the right to blaspheme human nature; and those who look most like angels but—”

“But are actually the devil’s disciples!”

He did not let me finish, but he finished it exactly the way I wanted to. I was not surprised because I was quoting a famous American gynecologist, now retired.

“But those are the people who are most likely to catch the eyes of the news media, and are most active socially.”

I went on to say, “The young people model themselves after these people, copying their words and deeds.”

“Was it the words and deeds of these people that made you nauseous and wanting to vomit every day?” He propped his elbows on the table and covered his face with both hands and said,

“Think about this: if a high school graduate was interested in literature, but his parents forced him into medicine because they were interested in status and money; what was he to do? After he was accepted by a medical college he found that those friends and relatives who used to be aloof were now bringing their daughters around and were very ingratiating; what was he to do then? And, when he discovered that many of the students in his class were killing themselves over their courses solely for the purpose of making a lot of money and attracting a tremendous dowry; what was he to do now?”

At this point he raised his head and looked at me. Seeing that I was just listening and had no intention of answering him, he smiled sadly and went on,

“After he left medical college and walked into a hospital, he was determined to give his all to the sacred mission of saving the world and saving lives. He was determined to sacrifice everything for the sick and suffering people. Then there were his other colleagues flirting with the nurses in front of dying patients and their worried families. What was he supposed to do then? What was he supposed to do when he saw his colleagues pretend to be very professional when meeting with reporters, but show a decidedly different side of themselves when faced with imploring families? And, when he read in the newspapers that someone in his hospital sold a big block of ice used on a corpse to a vender of cold drinks, what was he to do? What do you think? Should he feel nauseous? Should he vomit?”

I wanted to say something, but I had no answer.

“He endured this, this indescribable suffering, day after day, month after month. He tried his best to push away the urge to vomit, because he felt that a doctor on whom suffering people depended had no right to vomit.” He sighed deeply and said, “Sometimes he is so weak he has to seek enlightenment and strength from certain personalities in the past, both Chinese and foreign; sometimes he felt so lonely he had to look for solace in the works of pessimjstic authors.” His face and his voice which a moment ago seemed so resolute now turned very soft, yet they had the effect of a spring breeze on me, making me feel good all over, making me feel that he was a good doctor who cared for the distressed and would sacrifice himself for others.

“But, Doctor,” said I, “it is not that easy to suppress the sensation of wanting to vomit.”

“Have to try your best to endure and to be sympathetic. The reason that Prospero in Shakespeare’s The Tempest\fn{Written c.1611.} could forgive his enemy was because he understood human weakness. The reason Schweitzer\fn{German doctor, musicologist, theologian, philosopher, missionary, and Nobel laureate (1875-1965) born in Alsace, now part of France.} left civilization to practice medicine in the African wilderness was not because the backward natives there were more likable than his compatriots or more pleasing to the eyes."

Just then a nurse came over and announced loudly that there was someone to see him. As she finished she turned right around and walked away, but she found time to pause and joke with another doctor. Suddenly I realized that since I had walked into that room, the other workers talked and laughed among themselves, but not one of them looked him straight in the eye. As he was going away, he turned and said to me,

"The sensation of wanting to vomit that you mentioned generally indicates that a person's moral courage has reached a limit. It indicates this person's mental condition is in a state of confusion and that his nerves are very fragile. If this goes on, he will first despise others, and may eventually despise and destroy himself. You have reached a very serious state; better be very careful."

On my way home I kept thinking of the story of Prospero in The Tempest. I thought about the ancient philosopher Hstin-tze and his theory on human nature, or Mencius'\fn{Chinese philosopher (371?-289BC).} about man and beast, of Confucius\fn{Chinese philosopher (551?-479?BC).} on forgiveness, and about the transcendentalism of Emerson\fn{Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882) American philosopher.} and Russell.\fn{Probably Bertrand Arthur Russell (1882-1970), English philosopher.} Lastly my thoughts returned to Schweitzer and Camus and the young doctor. The image of the latter, a mixture of youth and senility, of determination and discontent, lingered in my mind.

Although this picture evoked in me an indescribable feeling of sadness, at the same time it cleared my mind the way alum works on a pool of dirty lake water, precipitating the filth to the bottom, thereby clearing the lake gradually. At the bus stop I noticed once again some women who threw icy glances at their more fashionable counterparts, yet I felt no resurging desire to vomit. On board the bus I saw two hippies take seats reserved for the disabled and the old, completely oblivious of the old and the young standing right there in front of them. The sight of this did not make me nauseous either. Not only that, I was even light-hearted enough to enjoy the scene of a seated lady tapping a middle-aged woman standing in front of her with her fingertips then pointing at the floor. The fat lady in her wooden clogs was standing on the lady's toes. Incidentally, I recognized the fat lady as one who operated a shoe stand at the entrance to our alley. She was a courteous person, so my wife and I often bought our shoes there. Now, the fat lady moved her foot away and apologized automatically, out of habit as a saleswoman I presumed. She then looked over the casually dressed lady and at her own maxi outfit and beaded colorful bag. Then, in an annoyed tone of voice, she tapped the lady on the head and said, "Hi, Miss, if you want comfort you should have taken a taxi."

Even months after my conversation with the young doctor my moods had decidedly improved, along with the old sensation of wanting to vomit. I was even able to watch certain TV and news programs. But as the days went by my inner tranquillity was once again disturbed, my peace of mind was once again troubled by many annoying matters. And when it was difficult for me to get rid of the waves of nausea once again surging in my chest, I appeared once more in front of the young doctor. He asked me to sit in a chair beside a table and sat down himself. Before he asked me about my condition, he put a cigarette in his mouth. When he lit it, his hands shook; when he puffed at it, he also looked very clumsy. One could tell right away that he was new at it.

"How have you been?" He threw the match in an ashtray and took the cigarette from the corner of his mouth. There was a sliver of brownish tobacco on his lower lip; he looked awkward.

"Nothing much." I smiled awkwardly. "Am having intense feeling of nausea again."

"You should know better than to look for trouble."

"Do I look like I am at the looking-for-trouble age?" I said. "I can hardly keep them away; no way would I look for them."

"Be more broad-minded." He was looking at the tip of his nose when he said that as if he were talking to himself.

"It is easier said than done."

"What is there to do if one does not keep an open mind and take it easy?"

"Nothing."

We looked at one another and threw each other troubled smiles, like two old friends. Just then I, quite by chance, saw on another side of the room a few doctors, nurses, and a working student in uniform whispering to one another. Shortly afterwards the student-worker walked huffily towards the back. When I turned around the young doctor pushed into my hand a prescription in English and said, "Get this medicine later."

I did not understand.

"It will help your digestion; does you no harm to take."

"Didn't you say that I don't—"

He pressed his lips with his right index finger indicating that I should not ask too many questions. At the same time he stood up to greet a doctor who was approaching from behind me and whose stomach reached the table before he did.

"This gentleman is—"
"My friend."
"A friend? In the clinic—?"
"Also my patient."
"Oh?" He lifted his left eyebrow and asked, "What is wrong with him?"
"Umm!" The young doctor pointed at the prescription in front of me. Big Stomach picked it up, glanced at it and threw it back. Before he left he muttered a few words in Japanese-English and added at the end of it, "They say you are here not quite a year yet, and you are already switching to psychiatry."

"Chief, you—" The young doctor was going to say something, but Big Stomach was already gone. The young doctor returned to his seat, dejected. He said,

"It is all because I was critical about the pharmacy he strongly recommended at a conference. How can we use medicines that are out of date and of unknown sources? Some of the white robed angels who once upon a time held holy candles in their hands and swore that they would follow the foot- steps of Florence Nightingale\fn{British nurse, hospital reformer, and humanitarian (1820-1910).} are now helping him to find fault with me. Even the student worker … even she … was his willing stool pigeon." At this point, he suddenly put his right hand on his chest, stretched out his stiff neck, closed his eyes tight, his mouth partly open, his tongue suspended, his face red, like a cock who was about to crow. I knew from my own experience that he was trying very hard to suppress an upsurge from within. After a while he massaged his chest with a thumb. As he was doing that, he opened his eyes, his lashes laden with tears, and he said in an angry voice, his head lowered,

"Sir, what makes you nauseous is just the superficial filth in society, but what I witness every day is a new class of patricians who built their wealth and arrogance on the pain and anxiety, the tears and the pleading of other people."

I did not have the heart to bother him in person after this. There were two or three occasions when I looked him up as I was passing by the hospital. He grew thinner and older every time I saw him. His back, once straight, was now bent. He seemed to work as if there were no tomorrow. There was always a cigarette in his hand. He was so alone and so busy, yet there was still a look of stubborn persistence about him which was typical among the young and which was hard to kill. But I dreaded to see the pain in him, the same pain of a cock trying to crow. I wanted to cry every time I saw him. He reminded me of the monk who could not get along with the abbot. He listened attentively to his patients about their symptoms, his thin neck stretched out. I wanted to cry.

83.76 A Woman Like Me\fn{by Hsi Hsi (c.1940?-)} Canton, Guangdong Province, China (F) 6

A woman like me is actually unsuitable for any man's love. So the fact that the emotional involvement between Hsia and me has reached this point fills even me with wonder. I feel that the blame for my having fallen into this trap, from which there is no escape, rests solely with Fate, which has played a cruel trick on me. I am totally powerless to resist Fate. I've heard others say that when you truly like someone, what may be nothing more than an innocent smile directed your way as you sit quietly in a corner can cause your very soul to take wing. That's exactly how I feel about Hsia. So when he asked me: Do you like me? I expressed my feelings toward him without holding back a thing. I'm a person who has no concept of self-protection, and my words and deeds will always conspire to make me a laughing stock in the eyes of others. Sitting in a coffee shop with Hsia, I had the appearance of a happy person, but my heart was filled with a hidden sorrow; I was so terribly unhappy because I knew where Fate was about to take me, and now the fault would be mine alone.

I made a mistake at the very beginning by agreeing to accompany Hsia on a trip to visit a schoolmate he hadn't seen for a long time, then later on, by not declining any of his invitations to go to the movies. It's too late for regret now, and, besides, the difference between regretting and not regretting is too slight to be important, since at this very moment I am sitting in the corner of a coffee shop waiting for him. I agreed to show him where I work, and that will be the final chapter. I had already been out of school for a long time when I first met Hsia, so when he asked me if I had a job, I told him that I had been working for several years.

"What sort of job do you have?" he asked.
"I'm a cosmetician," I said.
"Oh, a cosmetician," he remarked. "But your face is so natural," he said.
He said that he didn't like women who used cosmetics, and preferred the natural look. I think that the reason his attention had been drawn to my face, on which I never use makeup, was not my response to his question, but because my face is paler than most people's. My hands too. Both my hands and my face are paler than most people’s because of my job. I knew that as soon as I divulged my occupation to him, he would jump to the same erroneous conclusion that all my former friends had. He has already assumed that my job is to beautify the appearance of girls in general, such as adding just the right touch of color to the face of a bride-to-be on her wedding day. And so when I told him that there were no days off in my job, that I was often busy Sundays, he was more convinced than ever that his assumption was correct. There were always so many brides on Sundays and holidays.

But making brides-to-be beautiful is not what I do; my job is to apply the final cosmetic touches to people whose lives have already come to an end, to make them appear gentle and at peace during their final moments before leaving the world of man. In days past I had brought up the subject of my occupation to friends, and I always immediately corrected their momentary misconception, so that they would know exactly what sort of person I am. But all my honesty ever brought me was the loss of virtually all my friends. I frightened them all off; it was as though the me who was sitting across from them drinking coffee was actually the ghost of their own inner fears. And I never blamed them, for we all have an inborn, primitive timidity where the unknown mysteries of life are concerned. The main reason I didn’t give a fuller answer to Hsia’s question was my concern that the truth would frighten him; I could no longer allow my unusual occupation to unsettle the friends around me, something for which I could never forgive myself. The other reason was my natural inability to express what I think and feel, which, over a long period of time, has led to my habit of being uncommunicative.

“But your face is so natural,” he said.

When Hsia said that, I knew that it was a bad omen for the emotional road he and I were taking; but at that moment he was so happy—happy because I was a woman who didn’t use makeup on herself. Yet my heart was filled with sadness.

I don’t know who will someday be applying makeup to my face—will it be Aunt Yi-fen? Aunt Yi-fen and I have one hope in common: that in our lifetimes we will never have to make up the face of a loved one. I don’t know why, after the appearance of this unlucky omen, I continued going on pleasure excursions with Hsia, but maybe, since I’m only human, I lack self-control and merely go where Fate takes me, one ordained step after another. I have no logical explanation for my behavior, and I think that this might just be what humans are all about: much of our behavior is inexplicable, even to ourselves.

“Can I come and see you work?” Hsia asked.

“That shouldn’t be a problem,” I said.

“Will they mind?” he asked.

“I don’t imagine any of them will,” I said.

The reason Hsia asked if he could see how I worked was that every Sunday morning I have to go to my work-place, and on those days he never has anything else to do. He offered to walk me to work, and since he’d be there already, he might as well hang around and take a look. He said he wanted to look at the brides-to-be and their maids-of-honor and all the hustle and bustle; he also wanted to watch me as I made the pretty ones prettier or the attractive ones plain. I agreed without a second’s thought. I knew that Fate had already led me up to the starting line, and what was about to happen was a foregone conclusion.

So here I am, sitting in a small coffee shop waiting for Hsia, and from here we’ll go together to my workplace. As soon as we get there he’ll understand everything. Hsia will know then that the perfume he thought I was wearing for him actually serves to mask the smell of formaldehyde on my body. He’ll also know then that the reason I wear white so often is not a conscious effort to produce an appearance of purity, but merely as a convenience in going to and coming from work. The strange medicinal odor that clings to my body has already penetrated my bones, and all of my attempts to wash it off have failed. Eventually, I gave up trying, and even got to the point where I no longer even notice the smell. Hsia knows nothing of all this, and he once even commented to me:

“That’s a very unusual perfume you wear.”

But everything will soon become crystal clear. I've always been a technician who can fashion elegant hairdos and tie a bow tie with the very best. But so what? Look at these hands of mine; how many haircuts and trims have they completed on people who could no longer speak, and how many bow ties have they tied around the necks of totally solemn people? Would Hsia allow me to cut his hair with them? Would he allow me to carefully tie his tie for him? In the eyes of others, these soft, warm hands have become cold; in the eyes of others, these hands, which were made to cradle a newborn infant, have already become the hands for touching the white bones of skeletons.

There may have been many reasons why Aunt Yi-fen passed her skills on to me and they can be clearly perceived through her normal daily remarks. Sure, with these skills, no one would ever have to worry about being out of work and would be assured of a good living. So how can a woman like me, with little schooling and not much knowledge, compete with others in this greed-consumed, dog-eat-dog world? Aunt Yi-fen was willing to pass the consummate knowledge of her lifework on to me solely because I was her niece. She had never let anyone watch her when she was working until the day she took me on as her apprentice, when she kept me by her side instructing me in every detail, until I lost my fear of being alone with the cold, naked corpses. I even learned how to sew up the sundered bodies and split skulls as though they were nothing more than theatrical costumes.

I lost my parents when I was very young and was reared by Aunt Yi-fen. The strange thing is that I began to resemble her more and more, even becoming as taciturn as she, as pale of hand and face as she, and as slow in my movements as she. There were times when I couldn't shake my doubts that instead of being me, I had become another Aunt Yi-fen; the two of us were, in fact, one person—I had become a continuation of Aunt Yi-fen.

"From today on, you'll not have to worry about your livelihood," Aunt Yi-fen had said. "And you'll never have to rely upon anyone else to get through life, like other women do," she had said.

I really didn't understand what she had meant by that. I couldn't figure out why I wouldn't have to worry about my livelihood if I learned what she had to teach me, or why I wouldn't have to rely upon anyone else to get through life, like other women do. Was it possible that no other profession in the world could free me from worrying about my livelihood or let me avoid having to rely upon others to get through life? But I was only a woman with little knowledge, so of course I would not be able to compete with other women. Therefore, it was strictly for my own good that Aunt Yi-fen had taken such pains to pass her special skills on to me.

Actually, there is not a single person in this city who doesn't need help from someone in our profession. No matter who they are—rich or poor, high or low—once Fate has brought them to us, we are their final consolation; it is we who will give them a calm, good-natured appearance and make them seem incomparably gentle. Both Aunt Yi-fen and I have our individual hopes, but in addition to these, we share the common hope that in our lifetimes we will never have to make up the face of a loved one. That's why I was so sorrowful last week: I had a nagging feeling that something terrible had happened, and that it had happe.ned to my own younger brother. From what I heard, my younger brother had met a young woman whose appearance and temperament made her the envy of all, a woman of talent and beauty. They were so happy together, and to me it was a stroke of joyous good fortune. But the happiness was all too short-lived, for I soon learned that for no apparent reason, that delightful young woman had married a man she didn't love. Why is it that two people who are in love cannot marry, but wind up spending the rest of tbeir lives as the bitter victims of unrequited love? My younger brother changed into a different person; he even said to me:

"I don't want to live anymore."

I didn't know what to do. Would I someday be making up the face of my own younger brother?

"I don't want to live any more," my younger brother had said.

I couldn't understand how things could have reached that stage. Neither could my younger brother. If she had merely said, "I don't like you anymore," he would have had nothing more to say. But the two of them were clearly in love. It was not to pay a debt of gratitude, nor was it due to economic hardships, so could it be that in this modern, civilized society of ours there are still parents who arrange their daughters' marriages? A lifetime covers many long years, why must one bow to Fate? Ai, I only hope that during my lifetime I will never have to make up the face of a loved one. But who can say for sure?

When Aunt Yi-fen formally took me on as an apprentice and began passing her consummate skills on to me, she said: "You must follow my wishes in one respect before I will take you on as my apprentice." I didn't know why she was being so solemn about it. But she continued with extreme seriousness:

"When it is my turn to lie down, you must personally make up my face; you are not to permit any stranger to so much as touch my body."

I didn't feel that this would present any problems, but I was surprised by her inflexibility in the matter. Take me, for example: when it is my turn to lie down, what will the body I leave behind have to do with me? But that was Aunt Yi-fen's one and only personal wish, and it is up to me to help her fulfill it, if I am still around when that day comes. On this long road of life, Aunt Yi-fen and I are alike in that we harbor no grandiose wishes; Aunt Yi-fen hopes that I will be her cosmetician, and I only hope to use my talents to create the "most perfectly serene cadaver," one that will be gentler and calmer than all others, just as though death were truly the most beautiful sleep of all.

Actually, even if I am successful, it will be nothing more than a game to kill a little time amidst the boredom of life; isn't the entirely of human existence meaningless anyway? All my efforts constitute nothing more than an exercise in futility; if I someday manage to create the "most perfectly serene cadaver," will I gain any rewards from it? The dead know nothing, and my efforts will surely go unnoticed by the family of the deceased. Clearly, I will not hold an exhibition to display to the public my cosmetic skills and innovations. Even less likely is the prospect that anyone will debate, compare, analyze, or hold a forum to discuss my cosmetic job on the deceased; and even if they did, so what? It would cause as much of a stir as the buzzing of insects. My work is purely and simply a game played for the benefit of myself in my workroom. Why then have I bothered to form this hope in the first place?

More than likely to provide a stimulus for me to go on working, because mine is a lonely profession: no peers, no audience, and, naturally, no applause. When I'm working, I can only hear the faint sound of my own breathing; in a room filled with supine bodies—male and female—I alone am breathing softly. It's gotten to the point where I imagine I can hear the sounds of my own heart grieving and sighing, and when the hearts of others cease producing sounds of lament, the sounds of my own heart intensify.

Yesterday I decided to do the cosmetic work on a young couple who had died in a love-inspired suicide pact, and as I gazed into the sleeping face of the young man, I realized that this was my chance to create the "most perfectly serene cadaver." His eyes were closed, his lips were pressed lightly together, and there was a pale scar on his left temple. He truly looked as though he were only sleeping very peacefully. In all my years of working on thousands of faces, many of which had fretful, distressed looks on them, the majority appearing quite hideous, I had done what I felt was most appropriate to improve their looks, using needle and thread or makeup to give them an appearance of unlimited gentleness. But words cannot describe the peaceful look on the face of the boy I saw yesterday, and I wondered if his suicide should be viewed as an act of joy.

But then I felt that I was being deceived by appearances, and I believed instead that his had been an act of extreme weakness; I knew that, considering my position, I should have nothing to do with anyone who lacked the courage to resist the forces of Fate. So not only did I abandon all thoughts of using him to create the "most perfectly serene cadaver," I refused to even work on him, turning both him and the girl who had joined him in stupidly resigning themselves to Fate's whims over to Aunt Yi-fen to let her carefully repair the cheeks that had been scalded by the force of the powerful poison they had ingested.

Everyone is familiar with Aunt Yi-fen's past, because there are some around who personally witnessed it. Aunt Yi-fen was still young at the time, and she not only like to sing as she worked, but she talked to the cadavers who lay in front of her, as though they were her friends. It wasn't until later that she became so uncommunicative. Aunt Yi-fen was in the habit of telling her sleeping friends everything that was in her heart—she never kept a diary—letting her monologues stand as a daily record of her life. The people who slept in her presence were mankind's finest audience: they listened to her voluble outpourings for the longest time, yet her secrets were always completely safe with them.

She told them how she had met a young man and how they had shared the happiness of all young lovers whenever they were together, even though there were times when they had occasional ups and downs. In those days Aunt Yi-fen went to a school of cosmetics once a week, rain or shine, fifty weeks a year, to learn new techniques, until she had mastered all that the instructor could teach her. But even when the school informed her that there was nothing left for her to study, she persisted in asking if there weren't some new techniques that they could pass on to her. Her interest in cosmetology was that keen, almost as though it were inborn, and her friends were sure that someday she would open a grand salon somewhere. But no, she merely applied this knowledge of hers to the bodies of the people who slept in front of her.

Her young lover knew nothing of any of this, for he was convinced that physical beauty was a natural desire of all girls, and that this particular one was simply fonder of cosmetics than most. That is, until that fateful day when she brought him along and showed him where she worked, pointing out the bodies that lay in the room and telling him that although hers was a lonely profession, in a place like this one encountered no worldly bickerings, and that no petty jealousies, hatreds, or disputes over personal fame or gain existed; when these people entered the world of darkness, peace and gentleness settled over each and every one of them. He was shocked beyond belief; never in his wildest dreams had he thought that she could be a woman like this, one engaged in this sort of occupation. He had loved her, had been willing to do anything for her, vowing that he would never leave her, no matter what, and that they would grow old together, their mutual love enduring until death. But his courage failed him, his nerve abandoned him there among the bodies of people who could no longer speak and who had lost the ability to breathe. He let out a loud yell, turned on his heel and ran, flinging open every door that stood in his way.

Many people saw him in a state of complete shock as he fled down the street. Aunt Yi-fen never saw him again. People sometimes overheard her talking to her silent friends in her workroom:

"Didn't he say he loved me? Didn't he say he would never leave me? What was it that suddenly frightened him so?”

Later on, Aunt Yi-fen grew more and more uncommunicative. Maybe she had already said everything she wanted to say, or maybe since her silent friends already knew all about her, there was no need to say anything more—there truly are many things that never need to be spoken. When Aunt Yi-fen was teaching me her consummate skills, she told me what had happened. It was I whom she had chosen as her apprentice, not my younger brother, and although there were other factors involved, the major reason had been that I was not a timid person.

“Are you afraid?” she asked.

“Not at all,” I said.

“Are you timid? she asked.

“Not at all,” I said.

Aunt Yi-fen selected me as her successor because I was not afraid. She had a premonition that my fate would be the same as hers, and neither of us could explain how we grew to be so much alike, although it may have had its origins in the fact that neither of us was afraid. There was no fear in either one of us. When Aunt Yi-fen was telling me about what had happened to her, she said: “I will always believe that there have to be others somewhere who are like us, people who are unafraid.” This was before she had become so uncommunicative; she told me to stand by her side and watch how she reddened lips that had already become rigid, and how she worked gently on a pair of long-staring eyes until she had coaxed them into restful sleep. At that time she still talked now and then to her sleeping friends:

“And you, why were you afraid? Why do people who are falling in love have so little faith in love? Why do they not have courage in their love?”

Among Aunt Yi-fen’s sleeping friends were many who had been timid and cowardly, and they were even quieter than the others. She knew certain things about her sleeping friends, and sometimes, as she powdered the face of a girl with bangs on her forehead, she would say to me:

“Ai! Ai! What a weak girl she was. She gave up the man she loved just so she could be considered a filial daughter.”

Aunt Yi-fen knew that this girl over here had placed herself into Fate’s hands, of her own accord, out of a sense of gratitude, while that one over there had done the same by meekly accepting her lot. She talked about them not as though they had been living, feeling, thinking human beings, but merely pieces of merchandise.

“What a horrible job!,” my friends said.

“Making up the faces of dead people! My God!” my friends said.

I wasn’t the least bit afraid, but my friends were. They disliked my eyes because I often used them to look into the eyes of the dead, and they disliked my hands because I often used them to touch the hands of the dead. At first it was just dislike, but it gradually evolved into fear, pure and simple; not only that, the dislike and fear that at first involved only my eyes and hands later on included everything about me. I watched every one of them drift away from me, like wild animals before a forest fire or farmers before a swarm of locusts.

“Why are you afraid? I asked them. It’s a job that someone has to do. Is it that I’m not good enough at what I do, or that I’m not professional enough?”

But I gradually grew to accept my situation—I got used to being lonely. So many people search for jobs that promise sweetness and warmth, wanting their lives to be filled with flowers and stars. But how does a life of flowers and stars give one the chance to take firm strides in life? I have virtually no friends left today; a touch of my hands reminds them of a deep and distant land of ice and cold, while a look into my eyes produces innumerable images of silent floating spirits, and so they have become afraid. There is nothing that can make them look back, not even the possibility that there is warmth in my hands, that my eyes can shed tears, or that I am warmhearted. And so I began to be more and more like Aunt Yi-fen, my only remaining friends being the bodies of the deceased lying in front of me. I surprised myself by breaking the silence around me as I said to them:

“Have I told you that tomorrow I’m going to bring someone named Hsia here to meet you? He asked me if you would object, and I told him you wouldn’t. Was I right in saying that?”

So tomorrow Hsia will be here, and I think I know how it’s all going to end, because my fate and Aunt Yi-fen’s are one and the same. I expect to see Hsia as his very soul will take wing the moment he steps foot in here. Ai! We cause each other’s souls to take wing, but in different ways. I will not be startled by what happens, because the outcome has already been made clear to me by a variety of omens. Hsia once said to me: “Your face is so natural.” Yes, my face is natural, and a natural face lacks the power to remove someone else’s fear of things.

I once entertained the thought of changing my occupation; is it possible that I am incapable of doing the kinds of work that other women do? Granted that I'm not qualified to be a teacher, a nurse, or a secretary or clerk in an office building, but does that mean I can't work as a saleswoman in a shop, or sell bakery products, or even be a maid in someone's home? A woman like me needs only a roof over her head and three square meals a day, so there must be some place I could fit in. Honestly speaking, with my skills I could easily find work as a cosmetician for brides-to-be, but the very thought that lips I was applying color to could open to reveal a smile stops me cold. What would be going through my mind at a time like that? Too many memories keep me from working at that occupation, which is so similar to the one I have now.

I wonder, if I did change jobs, would the color return to my pale face and hands? Would the smell of formaldehyde that has penetrated to my very bones completely disappear? And what about the job I have now, should I keep Hsia completely in the dark about it? Hiding the past from a loved one is dishonest, even though there are countless girls in the world who will do anything to cover up their loss of chastity and the authentic number of years they have lived. But I find people like that despicable. I would have to tell Hsia that for a long time I had done cosmetic work on the sleeping bodies of the deceased. Then he would know and would have to acknowledge what sort of woman I am. He'd know that the unusual odor on my body is not perfume, but formaldehyde, and that the reason I wear white so often is not symbolic of purity, but a means of making it more convenient for going to and coming from work. But all of this is as significant as a few drops of water in a vast ocean. Once Hsia learns that my hands often touch the bodies of the deceased, will he still be willing to hold my hand as we cross a fast-flowing stream? Will. he let me cut his hair for him, or tie his tie? Will he be able to bear my gazing intently at him? Will he be able to lie down in my presence without fear? I think he will be afraid, extremely afraid, and like all my friends, his initial shock will turn into dislike and then fear, and he will turn away from me. Aunt Yi-fen once said:

"There can be no fear where love is concerned."

But I know that although what many people call love is unyielding and indomitable on the surface, it is actually extraordinarily fragile and pliable; puffed-up courage is really nothing but a layer of sugar-coating. Aunt Yi-fen said to me:

"Maybe Hsia is not a timid person."

That's one of the reasons why I never went into detail with him about my occupation. Naturally, another reason was that I'm not very good at expressing myself, and maybe I'd botch what I wanted to say, or I'd distort what I hoped to express to him by choosing the wrong place or time or mood. My not making it clear to Hsia that it is not brides-to-be whom I make up is, in actuality, a sort of test: I want to observe his reaction when he sees the subjects I work on. If he is afraid, then he'll just have to be afraid. If he turns and flees, then I'll just tell my sleeping friends:

"Nothing ever really happened at all."

*

"Can I see how you work?"he asked.

"That shouldn't be a problem,"I said.

So here I am, sitting in the corner of a coffee shop waiting for Hsia to arrive.

I spent some of this time carefully thinking things over:

Maybe I'm not being fair to Hsia by doing it this way. If he feels frightened by the work I do, is that his fault? Why should he be more courageous than the others? Why does there have to be any relationship between a fear of the dead and timidity where love is concerned? The two may be totally unrelated. My parents died while I was still young, and I was reared by Aunt Yi-fen. Both my younger brother and I were orphans. I don't know very much about my parents, and the few things I have learned were told to me later by Aunt Yi-fen. I remember her telling me that my father was a cosmetician for the deceased before he married my mother. When they were making their plans to get married, he asked her:

"Are you afraid?"

"No, I'm not," she said.

I believe that the reason I'm not afraid is that I take after my mother—her blood flows in my veins. Aunt Yi-fen said to me that my mother lives on in her memory because of what she had once said:

"I'm not afraid, and love is the reason."

Perhaps that's why my mother lives on in my memory too, however faintly, even though I can no longer recall what she looked or sounded like. But I believe that just because she was my mother and that she said that love had kept her from being afraid does not mean that I have the right to demand the same attitude of everyone else.

Maybe I ought to be hardest on myself for accepting my fate from the time I was a child, and for making this occupation that others find so hard to accept my life's work. Men everywhere like women who are gentle, warm, and sweet, and such women are expected to work at jobs that are intimate, graceful, and elegant. But my job is cold and ghostly dark, and I'm sure that my entire body has long been tainted by that sort of shadowy cast. Why would a man who exists in a world of brightness want to be friendly with a woman surrounded by darkness? When he lies down beside her, could he avoid thinking that this is a person who regularly comes into contact with cadavers, and that when her hands brush up against his skin, would that remind him that these are hands that for a long time have rubbed the hands of the dead?

Ai! Ai! A woman like me is actually unsuitable for any man's love. I think that I myself am to blame for all that has happened, so why don't I just get up and leave and return to my workplace; I have never known anyone by the name of Hsia, and he will forget that he once had such a woman for a friend, a cosmetician who made up the faces of brides-to-be. But it's probably too late for that now. I see him there through the window, crossing the street and walking this way. What's that in his hand? What a large bouquet of flowers! What's the occasion? It is someone's birthday?

I see him enter the coffee shop; he spots me sitting in this shadowy corner. The sun is shining brightly outside, and he has brought some of it in with him, for the sun's rays are reflected off of his white shirt. He is just like his name, Hsia—eternal summer.

"Hey, happy Sunday!" he says.

"These flowers are for you," he says.

He is so happy. He sits down and has a cup of coffee. We have had so many happy days together. But what is happiness, after all? Happiness is fleeting. There is such sadness in my heart. From here it is only a walk of three hundred paces before we arrive at my workplace. After that the same thing will happen that happened years ago. A man will come flying through that door as though his very soul had taken leave of him, and he will be followed by the eyes of the curious until he disappears from view. Aunt Yi-fen said:

"Maybe somewhere there is a man of true courage who is unafraid."

But I know that this is just an assumption, and when 1 saw Hsia crossing the street heading this way, a huge bouquet of flowers in his hand, I already knew, for this was truly a bad omen. Ai! Ai! A woman like me is actually unsuitable for any man's love; perhaps I should say to my sleeping friends: Aren't we all the same, you and I? The decades fly by in the blink of an eye, and no matter what the reason, there's no need for anyone to shock anyone else out of their senses. The bouquet of flowers Hsia brought into the coffee shop with him is so very, very beautiful; he is happy, but I am laden with grief.

He doesn't know that in our profession flowers symbolize eternal parting.

146.32 1. The Filial Son 2. The Despised Scholar: Two Folktales\fn{by Shih Lich (c.1940?-   )} Hopeh Province, China (M) 3

1

In the Chinese cultural tradition, the true foundations of the nation are the respect and honor that children pay to their parents. For this reason there are twenty-four stories which have been handed down from generation to generation, and each one tells of acts of filial piety. .

This story is not one of the traditional twenty-four, but is the true story of a filial son who lived in my own native village, a place in Hopeh Province, called Hua-yang. In Hua-yang there was a family of the surname Liu which consisted only of the father and his young son. They were very poor because the father had fallen into bad habits. Although they were entirely dependent upon one another, the father assumed no moral responsibility for his son. He was continually drunk or gambling or playing cards or associating with prostitutes. No matter what people said, he refused to behave as a father should.

The son, on the other hand, gave proper attention to his studies and, in spite of his father's bad habits, was always obedient to his father's commands and wishes, and at all times paid him the respect and courtesy naturally due from a child towards its parents. In all this, the son gave no thought to the idea that there was anything unusual or special in his attitude and behavior towards his father. People all said,

"There goes a truly filial son."

One day the father fell ill and was in a very grave condition. It seemed as if there was no cure and no hope. When this happened, the son was stricken with grief and could neither eat nor sleep. He spent all his time looking after his father. One day, the father turned to his son and said,

"I want something to eat; I want cakes made of freshly ground new maize."

Now maize-cakes are plentiful at certain times of the year; but the father had specially yearned for cakes made of freshly ground new maize. And there was none to be had. No, not anywhere! In the season just before harvest, the grain is still heading into cobs and has not yet hardened. So where could the boy find freshly ground, newly ripened maize to make cakes for his father? The boy was so concerned about what seemed to be his father's dying request that he went out to the family field to see if he could find any cob which was well formed and hardening to ripeness. He searched carefully throughout all the rows of maize, weeping as he did so. What devotion to his father! What a true desire to meet his father's need!

Of course, he was attempting the impossible; he was inviting disappointment even as, with a heavy heart, he went on with his search, weeping and sighing as he did so until his whole body ached with weariness; for you must remember that he had been watching over and looking after his father day and night. Therefore it was natural that he felt in need of a short rest. There was a shady tree at the end of the last row, so he sat down under it for a few minutes. Then, without intending to do so, he fell fast asleep. He slept for an hour or so and then woke up with a start. He looked around him.

"Where am I?" was his first thought.

He soon realized that he had fallen asleep on the edge of the family maize field. Then, while he was still rubbing the sleep from his eyes, he saw that the cobs of maize at the edge of the field nearest to him were ripe and ready for harvesting! This was totally unexpected. It was indeed a miracle. It was the kind of thing we Chinese people have in mind when we say,

"Filial piety moves the heart of Heaven."

The doctrine of filial piety indeed honors God and is expressed in compassion towards men. But the boy did not stop to think about moral teachings. He gathered the ripe cobs as quickly as he could, carried them home, rubbed the corn off the cobs, took out the grindstone and ground the freshly ripened grain into flour. Then, as quickly as he could, he made the maize-cakes his father had asked for. His father ate the cakes and then fell into a restful sleep. When he woke up, he knew that he was going to get well again.

You may be asking me whether this is a true story or not. Is it just a traditional tale which has been handed down through: countless generations—a story that people tell?

I assure you that it is true.

There was a very great man who was passing through Hua-yang not very long ago. He had heard about this boy and was so deeply moved by what he heard that he went to visit the father and son in their home in order to find out for himself whether this thing had really happened—whether the story had any foundations in fact. When he entered the house there he found the boy Liu and discovered that he was indeed the filial son of my story.

At the time of the great man's visit, the father was well again, and had been so deeply moved by his son's devotion and filial behavior that he was letting everybody know about this wonderful example of filial piety.

2

The Linhsien District of Hunan Province is famous for producing five outstanding persons, namely the Emperor Shen Nung,\fn{The legendary emperor (c.2838BC) who supposedly introduced husbandry into China.} the man of genius Chung K'uei, Prince T'ieh T'ou,\fn{"The Iron-headed Prince."} the exemplary filial son Loh P'u\fn{Customarily referred to as Loh P'u Hsiao-tzu.} and that paragon of women Mrs. Meng Chiang.\fn{Whose husband was conscripted to work on building the Great Wall of China and who never returned; and whose weeping so moved the emperor to compassion that he gave her permission to take her husband's bones home for burial.} The story I am about to tell you concerns the second of this group of five, Chung K'uei Ts'ai-tzu.\fn{A genius, a man of distinguished talents.}

Chung K'uei Ts'ai-tzu was a man of outstanding scholarly ability. His literary works, both in poetry in its different forms and in prose, were spontaneous compositions. In the course of his studies, he had learned that Shantung Province had produced the Sage Confucius but, although he looked upon Shantung as setting the standard for Chinese culture, in his heart he doubted whether Shantung scholars could really surpass him; so he set out for Shantung to find out for himself what standard they actually set there. With this purpose in mind he hired a horse and cart and set out on the long journey from Hunan to Shantung in order to visit the ancestral home of Confucius and call on the descendants of the famous sage. He would then measure his own scholarly ability against theirs.

The men of the K'ung\fn{The surname of Confucius—K'ung Fu-tzu.} family received him at their home. Then, the one among them who had attained the highest level of scholarship stood up and challenged Chung K'uei Ts'ai-tzu to solve a given problem within the next three days.

The problem consisted of taking a roll of cloth about ninety yards in length, having it held stretched out taut and then taking a writing brush and, with a single dip of ink, inscribing one Chinese character which would fill the whole length of the cloth—but the character should not be the one-stroke character yi\fn{Which resembles nothing so much as a dash.}

Chung K'uei saw no difficulty whatever in taking up the challenge.

"That's easy," he said. "I take up your challenge. Please have a sufficient quantity of ink ground for me."

"There's no problem in having that done," replied the challenger. "The K'ung family has plenty of sticks of ink and plenty of servants too to grind the ink for you."

"I shall also need the biggest writing brush you can find," added Chung K'uei. "I'm afraid three days will not give you time enough to get ready these things which I need."

"We assure you we shall have the brush made and enough ink ground for you within the next three days," said the men of the K'ung family.

They forthwith gave orders for the biggest writing brush possible to be made, while they themselves all set to work to grind enough ink. They also procured the biggest bolt of cloth obtainable, saying among themselves,

"We specified ninety yards long; this bolt consists of a hundred yards. We'll see now whether this man is able, with one dip of the brush, to write a single character which is not a "grass character"\fn{I.e., a running hand style of writing in which the brush is not lifted for the various strokes of which a complex character is formed.} and is not the character yi, and which will fill the whole length of the cloth."

While the K'ungs were busying with preparations, Chung K'uei stood aloof smiling to himself and treating the matter almost as a joke—as if the challenge constituted no problem at all. And so the men of the K'ung family were puzzled and angry and said,

"How dare you, a greenhorn from Southern parts, a man of no family background whatever, one who has never studied the works of Confucius or of Mencius, how dare you come here and hold in question the undoubted scholarship of members of the K'ung family! What effrontery, that you, a man of no cultural background, should come prying into our private affairs!"

Meanwhile people around were talking about Chung K'uei in similar terms and discussing him from different points of view. Some said,

"If Chung K'uei isn't careful, the challenger is out to make a fool of him." Others said,

"The challenger has not laid down any conditions to govern the way in which Chung K'uei should solve the problem set—no conditions to control how he is to write that one character." When three days had come and gone, Chung K'uei sought out the men of the K'ung family and said,

"Is the writing brush ready? Have you ground a sufficient quantity of ink? And the bolt of cloth—is that ready too?"

"Everything is ready," they replied.

"That's good!" replied Chung K'uei. "If you're sure everything is ready, I want the most eminent scholars among you to stretch out the cloth for me as tightly as possible, another to hold the vessel of ink, and yet another to hand me the writing brush. Now I'm ready to write." The men of the K'ung family had no difficulty in meeting these requests.

"But hold a minute," said their spokesman. "There is another condition: if you, you upstart creature, fail in the attempt, or if you, in the course of writing, lift your brush from the cloth or if you end up by writing yi, I myself will punish you."

"Just as you please," replied Chung K'uei. "And what punishment will you mete out to me, pray?"

"You came here riding in a cart. I will force you to return on foot. Moreover, before you leave I will put up public notices everywhere, notices in which you confess that you are an uneducated fellow who has dared to come here to try to make scrambled eggs of our learning." To this Chung K'uei replied,

"What you will do to me if I fail is not my concern. The question is, what will you do if I succeed?"

"If you succeed we of the K'ung family will not only send you back by cart but will provide a fine horse and gifts of gold and silk for you to carry home with you. In addition, we will recognize that your scholarship surpasses ours."

"Agreed," said Chung K'uei. "The matter is now settled in the presence of everybody here."

Then Chung K'uei took up the writing brush and, using both hands, let it absorb ink until the bristles were full. Then he turned to the outstretched length of cloth and, with one steady stroke wrote one long yi character. Then, with one upward fling, he threw down the brush and turned bowed to them and began to walk away. The spectators at once dragged him back saying,

"That won't do! You've broken the conditions! You agreed that the character yi was not acceptable, yet that's what you have written!"

"Please look again," Chung K'uei calmly replied, "and see whether I have written the yi character or not."

"Very well," said the spectators, "we will do as you say."

Then the scholars who were assisting unrolled the length of cloth and everybody looked at what Chung K'uei had written. And there, for all to see, was not yi but p'u.\fn{Which resembles a dash with a tiny down-ward slanting jag depending from the upper right of the dash and about a third of the way down it.} You see, the upward thrust of the brush as Chung K'uei threw it down, had made a brush-stroke which had changed the yi character into the p'u character.

So the men of the K'ung family had no choice but to acclaim Chung K'uei's success in meeting the challenge. They forthwith invited everybody to a celebration feast at which many cups of wine were quaffed in Chung K'uei's honor. Then they brought out gifts of gold and of silk and a fine horse for him to take home with him.

But this notable scholar was not satisfied with this achievement. He next proceeded to the capital to sit for the next highest imperial examination. When the results were published, Chung K'uei's name, designated as Chuang Yuan, headed the list. The next formality was for his thesis to be carried in to the Emperor to receive the royal signature and for the Emperor in person to confer the Chuang Yuan degree upon the successful candidate. The Emperor took up his pen to sign the thesis, but before he did so, he took one look at Chung K'uei and decided that the man's appearance was too uncouth for the degree to be conferred. His bearing was not impressive enough, and men would certainly despise him.

"He is such an ugly, repulsive looking man. It passes my belief that our country can produce no better candidate than this for our leading appointment! If we approve this fellow as Chuang Yuan, our country will lose face."

So the Emperor withheld his signature. There was, however, in attendance a high-ranking official who spoke up and said,

"Your Imperial Majesty, our country needs men of outstanding ability rather than of handsome presence. Men's abilities are of more service than handsome faces. If Your Majesty does not approve this man as Chuang Yuan we shall, Sir, be acting unjustly." A second official then spoke up and said,

:"Whether or not we are unjust, we have to consider the reputation of our country; that is of prime importance." Then followed a lengthy discussion, at the end of which the verdict was given:

"We are unable to approve this man as Chuang Yuan. The matter of his appointment to any post must be dropped." On hearing this, Chung K'uei protested,

"Sirs, consider my outstanding academic achievements—I have achieved the rank of Chuang Yuan—and yet I am now turned down not because of my scholarly deficiency but because of my uncouth appearance and ugly face! Allow me to tell you what happened when I visited the K'ungs in their family home. When I took the wind out of their sails, they gave me respect and heaped honors upon me. Yet, when today I come into the presence of the Emperor I am dropped from the appointment list."

With the thought of this he was so enraged that he bashed his head against one of the pillars of the hall and fell down dead. When the Emperor saw this happen, he was overcome with remorse and said,

"We have done wrong in not approving as Chuang Yuan this man of such outstanding ability and scholastic achievement. We have thrown away a man of unusual talents and, moreover, we are responsible for his death. We stand abashed before the very thought of him."

The Emperor's regrets knew no bounds and so, as a sign of his remorse, he bestowed upon Chung K'uei the posthumous title of "The Great Apprehender of Ghosts." That means that, after death, Chung K'uei became the official ghost-catcher.

Throughout the Linhsien District there are stone statues of Chung K'uei and pictures of him too. People affix a district government seal to these pictures and then paste them on the walls to frighten off ghosts and keep them away. You may think that this practice is only superstition, but the origin of the practice is the historical person, the highly talented Chung K'uei, who lived in Linhsien.

146.22 The Horses Leap Over Tan Torrent Lake: A Folktale\fn{by Lu Chi-fang (c.1940?-)} Hupeh Province, China (M) 1

In Hupeh Province, not far outside the west gate of Hsiang-yang City the river T'an flows swift and deep and widens out to form the T'an Torrent Lake. The lake is several score of yards across and, on the mountain-shore of the lake, there is a big stone which bears the deep imprint of a horse's hooves. My story is about how that imprint, so deep, so beautiful, so clear-cut, came to be there.

In the period just before the establishment of the period of the Three Kingdoms,\fn{221-c.264AD.} there were three generals, sworn blood-brothers, Liu Pei, Kuan Yü and Chang Fei, who fought against the rebel leader Tsao Tsao and eventually, with the help of Chu-Ko Liang, brought comparative peace to the region. The period of fighting was long,\fn{168-221AD.} and the three brothers suffered many defeats before the end of their struggle. After one of these defeats, Liu Pei was forced to retreat to Hsiang-yang.

While he was in Hsiang-yang his host plotted to betray him, so Liu Pei escaped from the dinner-party and mounted his horse which was waiting for him in the courtyard.

Liu Pei was very fond of his horse which bore the name Thousand Li Steed, but most people feared the creature, regarded it as a horse of ill-omen, and called it "Tilu," which means The Vicious One.

As soon as Liu Pei was in the saddle and took up the reins, Thousand Li Steed galloped away carrying his master out at the west gate of the city. There, the road of escape was blocked by the T'an Torrent. What was to be done? Liu Pei pressed on to the place where the torrent widens into the lake. There was no bridge. Liu Pei could hear his enemy in pursuit. There was no turning back. At a signal from his master, Thousand Li Steed took a mighty leap into the deep and dangerous waters.

Liu Pei, up above his waist in swift-flowing water, was truly very anxious and not a little frightened. But, after a moment of hesitation, he took a firm hold of the reins, bent forward, and whispered into his horse's ear,

"Tilu! Tilu! You won't let your master down, will you?"

That word from a familiar voice was enough. At the whispered word, Thousand Li Steed gathered together all his strength and, with one flying leap carried Liu Pei up out of the water, across the remaining part of T'an Torrent Lake and landed him safely, fifty or so yards away, making, as he landed, a deep imprint with his hooves on the rocky shore.

Some people declare that Thousand Li Steed did not leap across the lake but across the river. Such people are wrong, for I have lived near T'an Torrent Lake and have seen for myself the historic hoof-marks on the rocky shore not of the river but of the lake.

What a magnificent horse that was! What superb strength and powers! But we know many more things about Thousand Li Steed besides his historic leap across T'an Torrent Lake.

For one thing, he was extraordinarily fleet-footed and had unusual powers of endurance. He could cover a thousand li in a day and eight hundred li in a night. That's why he was called Thousand Li Steed. He could travel a day and a night without any rest between and, on many occasions, put big distances between his master and the enemy and so helped Liu Pei in many exploits and escapes.

Among its remarkable powers, Thousand Li Steed could scale high mountains and cross deep rivers as if on level ground. One of its accomplishments could not be matched by any other horse, for Thousand Li Steed could walk steadily across a long, narrow, single-plank bridge, drawing one hoof and then the other alternately up behind its fellow until, step by step, he had carried his master safely across.

Thousand Li Steed's outstanding characteristic was that he would obey nobody except his master. If anyone other than his master got into the saddle he stood stock-still for a while, and nothing would induce him to set off and then, he would throw the strange rider. But, if he saw his master hand the reins to a guest rider, it was as if the horse recognized that his master had handed over authority for he was then willing to respond to the reins handled by the guest. But, if he had not seen the reins handed over, he would, without fail, throw the stranger.

Another of Thousand Li Steed's characteristics was that he usually did not utter a sound, but when he did so his loud neighing warned his master of impending danger.

The imprint of this horse's hooves, mad3e when he leapt so magnificently across T'an Torrent Lake, is there to this day, clear-cut and deep, an abiding proof of the truth of T'ilu's historic leap across T'an Torrent Lake.

186.170 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Yang (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) 2

… "My husband had died a year before, and my daughter and I lived in a fifth-floor flat allocated by the work unit. We had only one room, and shared a common kitchen and bathroom. It wasn't a big room, but we didn't find it cramped. Because I hate extremes of heat and cold, my half of the room was by the inner wall, and my daughter's was by the outer wall.\fn{The disaster involved was the great Tangshan Earthquake of 1976, which killed some 300,000 people:H}

"That mormng, I was woken suddenly by rumbling, banging and a violent shaking. My daughter called out, and tried to get out of bed to come over to me. I tried to stand, but couldn't stay upright. Everything was tilting, the wall was leaning towards me.

"Suddenly, the wall by my daughter disappeared, and we were exposed on the edge of the fifth floor. It was very warm, so we were only in our underclothes. My daughter screamed and wrapped her arms around her chest, but before she could react more fully, she was thrown over the edge by another falling wall.

"I screamed her name as I held on to some clothes hooks on the wall. It was only after the swaying had stopped and I could stand still on the sloping floor that I realised this was an earthquake. I looked frantically for a way to get downstairs, and staggered off, shouting my daughter's name.

"I hadn't realised that I wasn't dressed. All the other survivors were wearing very little too. Some were even naked, but nobody thought about these things. We were all running around wildly in the half-light, weeping and shouting for our relatives.

"In the cacophony, I screamed myself hoarse asking everyone in sight about my daughter. Some of the people I approached asked me if I had seen their relatives. Everyone was wild-eyed and yelling, nobody took anything in.

"As people gradually realised the full horror of the situation, a grieving silence fell. You could have heard a pin drop. I was afraid to move, in case I made the earth start shaking again. We stood surveying the scene before us: collapsed buildings, broken water pipes, yawning holes in the ground, corpses everywhere, lying on the ground, hanging over roof beams and out of houses. A pall of dust and smoke was rising. There was no sun or moon, nobody knew what time it was. We wondered if we were still in the land of the living.

"I'm not sure how long it took, but I began to feel thirsty because I had shouted my throat raw. Someone echoed my thoughts in a weak voice, 'Water …' reminding everyone to turn to the immediate matter of survival. A middle-aged man stepped out of the crowd, and said,

"'If we want to live, we must help each other and get organised.' We murmured in agreement.

"It was starting to get light, and everything before us became more distinct, and more horrible. Suddenly someone shouted,

"'Look over there, someone's alive!'

"In the wan light, we saw a girl wedged in mid-air between the ruined walls of two buildings. Although her hair hung over her face, and her lower body was trapped and hidden from view, I knew from the colour and style of her bra, and from the struggling movement of her torso that she was my daughter.

"'Xiao Ping!' I shouted.

"I called her name over and over again, wild with joy and grief. She continued writhing desperately, and I realised that she could not hear or see me. I pushed my way forward through the crowd, gesturing towards her and sobbing hoarsely that she was my daughter.

"Rubble blocked my path. People started to help, trying to scale the wall my daughter was trapped in, but it was at least two storeys high, and they had no tools. I shouted Xiao Ping's name over and over again. She still had not heard me.

"A few women, then some men joined in shouting to help me. Soon, almost everyone was calling, 'Xiao Ping! Xiao Ping!'

"Xiao Ping finally heard us. She raised her head, and used her free hand—her left—to push her hair off her face. I knew she was looking for me. She looked confused; she couldn't find me in the crowd of naked or near-naked bodies. A man next to me started pushing everyone around me aside. None of us understood what he was doing at first, but soon it became clear that he was trying to clear a big space around me so Xiao Ping could see me.

"It worked; Xiao Ping shouted 'Mama!' and waved to me with her free hand. I shouted back, but my voice was hoarse and faint. I raised my arms and waved to her instead. I don't know how long we spent calling and waving. Finally, somebody made me sit down. A big empty space was still left around me, so Xiao Ping could see me. She was tired too, her head was lolling and she was gasping for breath. In retrospect, I wonder why she never screamed for me to save her. She never said anything like 'Mama, save me', not a word.

"Someone shouted to Xiao Ping, 'It's 5.30 in the morning, there'll be someone coming to rescue you soon!' He wanted to comfort her, to help her hold on. But seconds, minutes and hours passed, and nobody had come to the rescue. What kind of a country was this in 1976? A big city lay in ruins and three hundred thousand people had died, yet no one knew. How backward China was! I think that if we had been more advanced, many people might not have died. Xiao Ping might have survived."\fn{"When did the rescuers arrive?"}

"I can't say for sure. I can only remember that the army came first. The soldiers were all sweaty from running, but not one paused for breath before they split up and went to the rescue. Equipped with ropes and pitons, two soldiers started to climb up the wall in which Xiao Ping was trapped. It looked like it might collapse at any moment and crush them all. I could hardly breathe as I saw them edge closer and closer to her …\fn{ "She fell silent for a few minutes"}

"When Xiao Ping saw that someone was coming to rescue her, she burst into tears. The first soldier to reach her took off his uniform jacket to cover her. She only had one arm free, so he had to wrap half the jacket around her like a Tibetan robe. The other soldier held a water bottle to her mouth. The two soldiers started pulling away the bricks and stones around Xiao Ping, and soon freed her right arm, which was bruised and bloody. For some reason, they suddenly stopped digging. I shouted to them, asking what the matter was, but they couldn't have heard me.

"After a while, they climbed down and walked over to me. Gesturing with bloodied hands, tttey told me that the lower half of Xiao Ping's body was wedged between the reinforced concrete slabs of the wall, which they couldn't dig away by hand. I asked them why their hands were all bloody. They put their hands behind their backs and said that they were not allowed to use tools to dig people free, for fear of hurting them.

"After it was all over, I found out that some soldiers' fingernails and fingertips had been worn away by digging, but they had bound their hands in cloth and carried on. Some soldiers shouted madly as they dug, because they could hear moans and cries for help deep within the rubble. How much could they do by hand? The heavy rescue equipment couldn't get to the city because the roads were destroyed. How many people died waiting for rescue?"\fn{ "Xiao Ping must have been very strong"}

"Yes. She used to howl over a scratch from a branch, and blanch at the sight of blood. But in those last fourteen days she was so strong, she even comforted me, saying,

"'Mama, I'm numb, so it doesn't hurt a bit!'

"When her body was finally freed, I saw that her legs had been crushed to a pulp. The person who laid her out for the funeral said that her pelvis had broken under the pressure. I hope she really had lost feeling in her lower body in those fourteen days, when she was exposed to the elements. I counted every minute. Throughout that time people tried all sorts of different methods to rescue her, working round the clock, but nothing worked.

"Finally, the soldiers helped me to climb the wall up to Xiao Ping, and piled up a makeshift seat for me so I could sit holding her in my arms for long periods at a time. Her small, weak body was icy cold, though it was summer.

"For the first few days, Xiao Ping could still talk to me, and waved her hands about as she told stories. After the fourth day, she grew weaker and weaker, until she could barely lift her head. Although food and medicine were brought to her every day, and someone came to nurse her, the bottom half of her body must have been bleeding all the time, and gangrene must have been setting in. More and more people were concerned about her fate, but there was nothing anyone could do. The whole of Tangshan lay in ruins: there just weren't enough emergency workers or equipment to go round, and the roads to the city were impassable. My poor daughter …"\fn{"'Auntie Yang,' I murmured. We were both crying."}

"In the last few days, I think Xiao Ping might have realised that there was no hope for her, though people made all sorts of excuses to keep her spirits up. She lay helplessly in my arms, unable to move. On the morning of the fourteenth day, she forced her torso upright and said to me,

"'Mama, I feel like the medicines you've been giving me are taking effect. There's some strength in me, look!'

"When they saw her sit up, the people around who had been watching her attentively for fourteen days all started clapping and cheering. I thought a miracle had happened too. When Xiao Ping saw how excited everyone was, she seemed to get a new surge of strength. Her face, which had been deadly pale, flushed bright red and she spoke to her well-wishers in a clear, loud voice, thanking them and answering questions. Somebody suggested that she sing a song, and the crowd clapped in approval. At first, Xiao Ping was shy, but people cheered her on:

"'Sing a song, Xiao Ping! Xiao Ping, sing a song!' At last, she nodded weakly, and started singing:

"'The red star is shining with a marvellous light, the red star is shining in my heart …' Everyone knew this song back then, and many people started to sing along with Xiao Ping. The sound of singing amid the desolation was like the flowering of hope. For the first time in many days, people were smiling. After a few verses, Xiao Ping's voice faltered, and she slowly sank back into my arms.

"Xiao Ping never woke again. I thought she was sleeping, but when I realised my mistake, it was too late. She had no last words; her last experience of this world was of people singing and smiling around her. When the doctor told me that she was dead, I was calm—those fourteen days and two hours had wrung me dry. It was only four days later, when they finally dug out Xiao Ping's body, which had started to smell, that I began to weep. Her body was in such a state … my own flesh and blood … I hurt, how I hurt!

"Poor child, in her fourteen years she only saw three films, Tunnel Warfare, Mine Warfare and The Battle of North and South, and eight model operas. She never laid eyes on a pretty dress or a pair of high-heel shoes …"\fn{"'That is a great sadness in Chinese history. I came out of those times too, and had virtually no experience of youth or beauty.' Mrs.Yang sighed."}

"Some people say the earthquake was divine retribution for the events of the Cultural Revolution. But who were the gods taking revenge on? I have never done anything to offend them or anything immoral. Why did they destroy my daughter?" …

186.172 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Chen (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) -1

… "Not a day goes by when I don't think of that day.\fn{Of the the great Tangshan Earthquake of 1976:H} I don't think anyone who survived it can ever forget. Everything was so unreal.

"That morning, before it was light, a strange sound woke me, a rumbling and hooting, like a train was being driven into our house. I thought I was dreaming—dreams are so strange—but just as I was about to cry out, half the bedroom caved in, along with my husband in his bed. The children's bedroom on the other side of the house suddenly appeared before me, like a stage set. My elder son was staring, mouth open; my daughter was crying and calling out, stretching her arms towards me; and my little son was still sleeping sweetly.

"Everything happened so quickly … the scene before me suddenly dropped away like a curtain falling. I was terrified, but I thought I was having a nightmare. I pinched myself hard, but didn't wake up. In desperation, I stabbed my leg with a pair of scissors. Feeling the pain and seeing the blood, I realised this was no dream. My husband and children had fallen into an abyss.

"I shouted like a madwoman, but no one heard me. The sound of walls collapsing and furniture smashing filled the air. I stood, trailing my bleeding leg, facing the yawning pit that had been the other half of my house. My husband and my beautiful children had vanished before my eyes. I wanted to cry, but there were no tears. I simply did not want to go on living.

"It's been nearly twenty years, but nearly every day at dawn, I hear a train rumbling and hooting, along with the cries of my children. Sometimes I'm so frightened of those sounds, I go to bed very early with the children and put an alarm clock under my pillow to wake me before three. When it rings, I sit up until it gets light, sometimes I go back to sleep after four. But after a few days of this, I crave those nightmarish sounds again, because my children's voices are in there too."\fn{ "Does it make you feel better to have so many children around you now?"}

"Much better, especially at night. I watch them sleeping and feel comforted in a way I can't explain. I hold their hands to my face as I sit by them. I kiss them and thank them for keeping me alive." …

186.173 Narrative Of An Earthquake Survivor\fn{by Mrs. Ding (c.1940?-)} Tangshan?, Hebei Province, China (F) 1

… "You must have heard many times about how much destruction the earthquake caused—I don't need to go over it again. In fact, words cannot fully describe that scene. You only know what it feels like to be at the end of the world if you experience it yourself. In a situation like that, you think of your family first.

"The aftershocks had not yet died away when my husband and I managed to leave the building we had lived in, which was on the point of collapse. We discovered that the room where our children slept had been torn apart, but they were nowhere to be seen. My heart contracted with fear. Because there was a military airport near us, we were quickly rescued by the garrison.

"They soon dug my son out, but his legs had already been crushed, so they were amputated above the knee, as you see today. It's lucky he was rescued in good time, otherwise, on such a hot day, his wounds would have turned gangrenous and put his life in danger. After two days had passed and my daughter had still not been found, I was close to losing my mind. I saw injured, maimed and dead people dug out and carried away every day; almost never a whole person with nothing missing and no injuries.

"When I had almost given up hope, someone told me that many injured people had been taken to the airport runways. As long as there was a thread of hope, I had to go and have a look.

"But when I made it to the airport I was speechless with shock: the long runways were packed solid with groaning bodies, laid out in four or five rows. Only then did it really sink in that the earthquake had not just shaken our building, it had destroyed an entire city of hundreds of thousands of people. Filled with dread, I started to try to identify my daughter from among the rows of dead and injured people; they must all have been alive when they arrived, but some had died before there was time to administer first aid.

"It was difficult to identify anyone: hardly any of them were wearing clothes; some of the women's faces were covered by their hair; some people were covered in mud. After half a day, I had gone over less than half a runway. When dusk fell, I went to the tents the garrison had provided for us. I planned to continue my search the next morning.

"Many people were sleeping in the tent I was in. There was no distinction between the sexes, and no distinction between rich and poor either. People collapsed in any empty space they could find, exhausted from rushing about desperately, searching without eating or drinking, living on hope. Just as I was nodding off, the voices of two men drifted over from close by:

"'What are you up to? Still not sleeping?'

"'I'm thinking about that girl—'

"'Still?'

"'I'm not thinking about that. I was just wondering if she mightn't die after being dumped in that place.'

"'Damn, I hadn't thought of that!'

"'What we did was bad enough, what if she dies?'

"'What do you mean by that? Do you want to go and check? If so, we'd better go quick. Then there'll still be a space for us when we get back, otherwise we'll get soaked by the rain if we sleep outside.'

"I looked around to see who was talking, and was shocked to see a length of multicoloured string trailing from one of the men's shorts. It looked like the string my daughter used to tie her hair back. I didn't want to believe that it was my daughter they were talking about, but what if it was?

"I rushed over to the men and asked where the multicoloured string had come from. They wouldn't give me a proper answer, which made me even more suspicious. I shouted at them ferociously, asking them where the girl they had been talking about was; frightened, they mumbled something about a ditch by a distant runway, and then they fled. I could not ask them for any more details, let alone catch them; all I wanted was to know if the girl was my daughter.

"I ran off in the direction the men had indicated. When I had reached the edge of a ditch, I heard faint groans, but could not see who it was in the dark. Just then, two soldiers on patrol came over to me; they had electric torches and were guarding the injured people on the runways. I asked them to shine their torches into the ditch. In the weak torchlight, we saw a naked girl. At that moment my feelings were thoroughly confused; I both hoped she was and was not my daughter. When the two soldiers helped me carry her on to the runway, I realised that she was indeed my daughter.

"'Xiao Ying, Xiao Ying!' I shouted her name, but she looked at me in confusion, without the slightest reaction.

"'Xiao Ying, it's Mama!'

"Suddenly, I noticed that the lower part of her body was sticky and wet, but there was no time to think any more of it as I hurriedly dressed her in clothes the soldiers lent us. Strangely, Xiao Ying pulled the trousers down again. When I asked her why she had done that, she just closed her eyes and hummed. She was so tired, she soon fell asleep. I lay dazed for a long time before I too, fell asleep.

"At daybreak, the roaring of a plane woke me. When I saw Xiao Ying lying next to me, I was dumbstruck: she was pulling down her trousers with an idiot grin on her face, and her legs and groin were all bloody. Just then, I remembered the words of those two men. Had they taken advantage of the disaster to rape Xiao Ying? I dared not believe it. And my daughter, a radiant, vivacious girl, had lost her mind.

"The doctor said that Xiao Ymg had had too great a shock, and told my husband and me that Xiao Ying had definitely been gang-raped. That was all I heard before I blacked out.

"When I came to, my husband was holding my hand, his face wet with tears. We looked at each other speechlessly and wept: our daughter had been brutalised and gone mad, our son's legs were gone …\fn{"May I ask if you sent Xiao Ying for treatment?"}

"We did, but we didn't understand that she would still feel the terror even if she recovered. Two and a half years later, just as her memory was starting to get back to normal, the day before we were planning to take her home to start a new life, she hanged herself in her hospital room. In the letter she left for us she said:

Dear Mama and Papa.

I'm sorry, I can't go on living. You shouldn't have saved me. There is nothing in the memories that are coming back but everything falling apart, and the cruelty and violence of those men. That is all that is left for me in this world, and I can't live with those memories every day. Remembering is too painful. I'm leaving.

Your daughter, Xiao Ying.

"She was sixteen, her brother was eleven. My husband tore his hair out with grief, saying that he was the one who had hurt the child, but of course it wasn't his fault. That night, he did not come to bed until very late. I was exhausted, and went to sleep, but when I woke up, his body was cold, and his face was frozen in sadness. The death certificate issued by the doctor states that he died of a heart attack from extreme exhaustion."\fn{"But you carried on."}

"I made it, but I wasn't really brave. I am one of those who are strong in front of other people, a so-called tower of strength among women, but when I'm alone I cry all night: for my daughter, my husband, my son, and for myself. Sometimes, I can't breathe for missing them. Some people say that time heals everything, but it hasn't healed me." …

83.1 The Water Lilies\fn{by Chen Shao-tsung aka Nora Chen (c.1940-)} Shantung Province, China (F) 3

As Chao Yi's car drove onto the suspension bridge over the lake, the first things that came to view were the clusters of water lilies in the lake, white, pink and creamy yellow, set against the dark green lotus pads and scattered among the floating water weeds. Ring after ring of this vision of charm and grace extended all the way to the center of the lake. Chao Yi could not help but feel a quickening of her heart beat.

Though it was not the first time this scene had appeared before her eyes, it had never failed to move her, filling her with a sense of happiness, and also leaving her with a faint feeling of loss. It was only a mere trace of euphoria, a sensation which nobody else could detect and she herself could not describe. At the same time, a feeling of weariness which had been hovering far, far away, seemed to be surfacing from the very bottom of her heart.

*

This was a Friday afternoon. This was the day she went to the psychiatric clinic in the small town of Carnation every week. The weekend was coming up and Chao Yi felt particularly light-hearted. There were only two of them at the clinic, she and an aide. The work was never hectic nor did it constrain her as the daily routine at the main hospital did. Besides, there were not too many patients; she usually had only two or three appointments in the afternoon. When she finished early she could even run out to the field to pick strawberries to bring home.

Among her patients from town Mrs. Logan was a regular. She had long been the laughing stock of the town. She even looked different, and she talked incessantly, taxing the patience of one and all. Chao Yi, though, took a liking to this patient. The symptoms of her disease were very peculiar, even bordering on the absurd. That is: she complained all the time of her loss of memory. Ever since the birth of her fourth child ten years ago she had not been normal. She constantly muttered to herself that she simply could not remember what kind of person she was in the past.

Before Chao Yi came to Carnation, Mrs. Logan had gone through many psychiatrists and had taken many kinds of medication. There was nothing abnormal in Mrs. Logan's everyday conduct. Her life was just like that of any country housewife, cooking, washing, and endless other chores. Her husband was an auto mechanic working in a gas station. Her children were either attending school or working. A ten-year-old daughter was the only one still at home.

Chao Yi thought about the first time she met with Mrs. Logan. It was on a spring day a year ago. Chao Yi was just starting to work at the clinic in Carnation. She had to go over a small hill before reaching Carnation. Along the road the peach blossoms and plum flowers were in full bloom, and in the field several milk cows were grazing. The whole town of Carnation had only one street which was not even half a mile long. There were only two restaurants in town, one bar, a post office, a clinic, a general store, a market, a gas station, two other small stores, a sort of beauty parlor, and a church. There was, of course, the famous Carnation Milk Plant.

One Friday afternoon shortly after Chao Yi started coming to Carnation, as she was parking her car she saw at a distance, a long-haired middle-aged woman standing by a peach tree near the entrance to the clinic. She was wearing a tight fitting black T-shirt with a huge head of a white tiger on the front, her stomach sticking out. Chao Yi could not help glancing at her a few more times.

Chao Yi went into the clinic and the woman came in too. So she was the Mrs. Logan who had an appointment that day. Chao Yi had gone over her history and was not at all unfamiliar with her case.

They sat down facing one another, and before the doctor opened her mouth, Mrs. Logan began her famous recitation for the thousandth time like a machine.

"Doctor, do you think I have amnesia? I got to be this way ten years ago after my youngest Annie was born, and I have become a different person ever since. I have never recovered from it. Some called it a nervous breakdown, but what exactly is a nervous breakdown? Will I ever get over it? Doctor, do you think that I may one day regain my memory?"

Chao Yi told the patient to describe in detail her so-called "amnesia." She asked if the patient remembered her childhood; if she remembered her parents and brothers and sisters, her life after her marriage, etc. Chao Yi wrote down in great detail all that Mrs. Logan said while observing her expressions and tone of voice as she related the events.

"I do remember," said Mrs. Logan. "However, I seem to remember them only in a vague way. They don't seem real at all; they don't seem to be part of my life. Doctor, do you understand what I mean?"

Chao Yi shook her head. She listened attentively and was observing Mrs. Logan's facial expressions at the same time. Mrs. Logan had a simple childish-looking face, but her gray hair and wrinkles made her look like a woman over fifty. Aside from the fact that she dressed comically and talked absurdly, one could not detect any general symptoms of a nervous breakdown.

Mrs. Logan repeated her story every time she came for treatment.

"I cannot remember anything. It is ridiculous to go on living like this. I feel like a stranger in this world. They all make fun of me, my family and the others. They say that I am ridiculous. Why don't they understand? Why doesn't anybody believe me. I say I don't know how the days have gone by, that I don't know how the years have passed on from one to the next. These last few years my days have been passed in a daze, and life seems to have slipped by me. I have no recollection of what happened during this time. How come I seem to have no sensation at all."

*

While Chao Yi's thoughts were so occupied, her car had already reached the middle of the suspension bridge. The vision of clusters of water lilies left a sweetness in her memory and excited her for no special reason. She began to hum a long forgotten tune, Toselli's Serenata Rimpiant. Instantly it brought back memories from over twenty years ago of far away Taichung Park.

It was the twilight hour of a summer day. She was standing next to the lily pond in Taichung Park. The colorful evening clouds were drifting towards the horizon; people were beginning to drift away too; only the wisp of a fiery red cloud lingered in the distant sky. The air was soft with moisture; it was almost damp. There certainly were a lot of mosquitoes and gnats near the pond, and they kept finding their way up her sleeves and under her skirt so that she had to flap her skirt continuously. She was wearing a new full pink skirt with gray stripes. Her blouse was made of broadcloth with a white lace-trimmed Peter Pan collar, and she wore a pair of sandals. She strolled around the pond again and again. She lingered for a long while and could not bring herself to walk away, hoping against hope that a miracle would happen, hoping that the person she was waiting for would suddenly appear beyond the bushes or on the path leading to the pavilion; or he might possibly be among the cyclists …

He had not made a definite commitment to meet her here. He only mentioned in his letter that within a week he would be accompanying his father to visit the city she lived in. He mentioned no specific date. In his letter he said he would get word to her through her neighbor Hsiao-ling as to when they could meet. He was Hsiao-ling's cousin, and Hsiao-ling was her bosom friend. This was of course a secret among the three of them. It would never do to let the grownups know that she had a boy friend, because she was not quite seventeen, and he was barely nineteen then.

For several days during that time she left home right after dinner, telling her mother that she had to go to school for a rehearsal, while in fact she ran directly to the Park and waited around the pond hoping that he would appear unexpectedly from one of the corners and nooks right before her eyes. She was watchful and did not miss any tall, lean figure in light brown khaki uniform.

On the evening of the third day Chao Yi had become extremely agitated and felt a little faint. She sat down dejectedly on a stone bench, her eyes wet. It was at that moment that she heard the melody of Toselli's Serenata Rimpiant, played on a recorder by some passerby. The music was so sweet and so haunting that for a moment she forgot her own melancholy. She just sat there quietly listening. When the music was over she got up and left, however, the melody haunted her the entire evening.

*

This had happened twenty years ago, and after all these years whenever Chao Yi happened to hear that tune or when she happened to hum the melody, memories of the lily pond and of her thoughts that day would hit her with full force; so much so that she seemed to smell the fragrance of the park and visualize the creamy white and pastel green lily petals fluttering in the evening breeze.

This kind of very intense reflection usually lasted only a few short seconds. In fact, in the last twenty years, Chao Yi seldom thought of this episode. Where would he be now, that nineteen-year-old boy in the uniform of those bygone days? The bitter sweet taste of first love had also long disappeared without any trace.

Come to think of it, Chao Yi was not at all sure about the trivial details of life during the past twenty years. At this point she could only remember a series of names of places and people and of dates and events, and maybe some general descriptions of certain years as "hard ones," certain years "smooth," or "unlucky" or "happy" ones. Did putting together all these adjectives and names and dates and events represent the sum total of the past twenty years of her life? Such thoughts troubled her; they depressed her.

After the car had crossed the suspension bridge, it went eastward for another twenty miles and crossed over a small hill before entering the town of Carnation with its many plum trees and peach trees. The melody of the nocturne lingered in her ears the entire afternoon. When she reached the clinic, Mrs. Logan was already there, waiting.

Today Chao Yi seemed to have a different feeling towards Mrs. Logan. As they sat facing one another she seemed to sense a gradual dissipation of the curtain of thick fog between them.

Mrs. Logan, as always, began her usual speech without deviation just like a record player.

"Dr. Chao, why do people not believe me when I say I have amnesia? I really do not remember my past, and I also cannot savor every aspect of life as I did before. In any event, life seems to pass me by, day after day; it's not the same as before. I feel numb. Things that mattered or were exciting before do not move me anymore. How very meaningless this kind of life is …"

Chao Yi gazed deeply into the light brown eyes of her patient. She sensed in Mrs. Logan's eyes the passage of time. The sensation was the same as when she looked at herself in the mirror in the morning and saw in her own eyes the traces of bygone days. She had felt the same way just now at the lakeside among the clusters of water lilies, that she was peeping at her own youth of long ago and far away.

For the first time Chao Yi called Mrs. Logan by her first name and said,

"Louisa, the past is long gone and impossible to recapture. If this is amnesia to you, then everyone has it. I have it too."

"Really?" Mrs. Logan was wide-eyed and unbelieving.

Chao Yi told her about the memories the water lilies had brought back to her. Talking about the doctor's own life broke all rules and principles of therapy.

"Louisa, today it dawned on me all of a sudden what your so-called amnesia is. In my opinion, the symptoms you mention are not in themselves related to loss of memory. You seem to wish for a revival of old feelings in all their detail and intensity. What you are longing for is to once again experience all those feelings deeply. But this is impossible, and you, therefore, are disappointed and pained. This is what you call amnesia. Am I right?"

Louisa listened very attentively, as if not fully understanding, but she nodded hesitantly. She then lowered her head.

When she lifted her head again, there were tears in her eyes. She turned and looked out through the window at the field of bright green strawberry plants. The summer sun shone brightly on the jade green outdoors. Far away a milk cow was swishing her tail. A bee was buzzing around the windowpane singing her song. Chao Yi seemed to hear the melody of the nocturne swirling vaguely all around her …

Mrs. Logan turned her eyes back from the strawberry patch as if she suddenly remembered something. She said in one breath,

"In those days we went to pick strawberries or cherries by the bushel. We brought them home and I made jam and stored it in jars. The two older children were in elementary school then; the third child was only a toddler, and I was pregnant with Annie. The kids just loved jam. You have no idea how strong I was. I worked long days taking care of things inside the house and out. In those days Sam had not stopped drinking. He did not care that we were poorer than church mice. Fortunately my brothers were around and they helped out, and we were able to eke out a living. We were young then and did not mind. Later, after Annie was born and I became ill, things were never the same again. I am like a vegetable. I keep hoping that I will recover, for I know that if I keep nagging like this, Sam and the children will all lose their patience with me. I asked my second child something the other day, and he stuck out his tongue and made a face at me. He has no regard for his mother at all …"

Louisa played with her fingers as she told her story with helpless pain.

*

What Louisa referred to as the “later” events Chao Yi had read about long ago in the patient’s history and had heard the patient mention them. It was a series of nightmarish catastrophes which all happened in a short period of time. To this day it is still hard to tell if some of the happenings were Louisa’s mistaken recollection in her confused state of mind, or if they really did take place. Time moved on; things were different now, and there was no way to check or prove it one way or the other.

All these things happened ten years ago in the countryside around the town of Carnation. It involved the murder of her twin brother. The culprit was never found. It also involved a relationship between her husband Sam and a niece who was staying with them. While all these calamities were taking place one on top of the other, Louisa’s beloved dog was killed by a car. That very same night Annie was born. She had a difficult time, and her life hung in the balance for quite a few days afterwards. In the middle of one night she was screaming and yelling, pointing at the foot of her bed, and looking terrified. She claimed that her dead dog was there staring at her. The doctor had to give her a heavy sedative to calm her.

After she left the hospital Mrs. Logan was described as having had a “nervous breakdown” and as being “psychotic.” She had worn these labels ever since, unable to shake them off.

Mrs. Logan came from a poor family and only had a primary school education. She was badly abused by her alcoholic mother, ran away at eighteen and married Sam who was ten years her senior. She had four children in ten years and had been gravely sick once, so now at thirty-nine she looked well over fifty. Sam used to be a loafer and an alcoholic, but it was said that he had stopped drinking and had been working regularly at the gas station in town and acting like the head of a household now.

It seemed that while Mrs. Logan turned “psychotic,” the Logan family life took a turn for the better. Mrs. Logan’s illness brought the family peace and tranquillity. The price was high, indeed.

Chao Yi thanked God silently for giving man a “subconscious” mind when He created the body with all its other functions. This “subconscious” mind worked in secret ways; sometimes it brought endless sorrow; sometimes unexpected miracles. What happened to Louisa was the latter.

Based on her observation and analysis of the year past, Chao Yi could only come to the conclusion that Louisa’s illness was indeed brought on by the trauma of all those events happening at the same time. It drove her crazy, but the madness of the following ten years was really the working of her subconscious mind. You couldn’t say she feigned it. To protect her from further blows and deeper collapse, and to enable her to live on under all sorts of adversity, her subconscious mind urged her to remain muddled. Why return to the miserable environment of the past? So long as she continued to be ill, Sam had to continue to abandon his wayward life and walk the straight and narrow. Her relatives would not bother this poor woman or exert relentless pressure on her.

At the same time “forgetfulness” alone could make her forget and forgive. Those horrible and fearful happenings were mere dreams, something that appeared on a distant shore; were they real or were they imaginary? Other people denied their happening, so she claimed forgetfulness.

Only through actual loss of memory was she able to live on. Not only that, but it also enabled her to begin another leg of the journey of life. Draw the curtain; the past is the past. When the next act begins, the set is new; all the excitement and all the earth shattering events begin to fade away and eventually die.

The subconscious mind took over the sense of reality. Louisa saw what was real as unreal, and after a while she really could not remember her “past.”

*

On her way home Chao Yi munched on the strawberries, tasting their flavor and tanginess. Before she realized it she was on the suspension bridge again. The water lilies once again appeared right before her eyes. The pink and white petals of the lilies were swaying in the evening breeze, blooming leisurely … the past came alive in her mind again.

In the shadow of the lilies, Chao Yi seemed to visualize a shy young girl looking uncertain and agitated. She also saw a village woman picking strawberries in the field. All these were surely things of a long ago past, and yet they seemed to be taking place just then. Ripples of shadows of the past, together with the melody of the serenata were drifting away in ever widening circles.

187.32 Excerpt from Grandmother Had No Name\fn{by Alice Murong Pu Lin (c.1940-)} Chengdu, Sichuan Province, China (F) 9

The water surrounded me. I had fallen into the river. The tadpoles I had been trying to catch must have been darting away from me now. But I couldn't see a thing. I swallowed the river water, an unpleasant taste of underwater weeds. After that, I remembered nothing.

When I came to, I was being carried up the slope to my house on the outskirts of the city of Chengdu, on the back of a teenager, a girl in Girl Scout uniform. I felt my wet and clammy clothes and shoes clinging to my skin and feet. I had completely ruined the new red leather shoes Mother had bought for me for celebration of the traditional Children's Day. I was supposed to attend the school picnic later that day with my classmates from the kindergarten class. With a bottle and a notion of my own, I had slipped away to catch tadpoles in the river. Luckily for me the teenager had happened by just as I fell into the river, and rescued me. I was less than three at the time.

From my own partial and disjointed memories and Mother's reminiscences, I was probably not an easy child to raise. While I could turn on the charm and win over any adults in the family, I had a mind of my own and was very stubborn. It would show up in some unusual circumstances.

My entry into school was one example. Mother loved to tell how, at age two, I had followed my cousin Zhenli, three years my senior, into the kindergarten class and refused to leave. The teacher, a good friend of Mother's and unaccustomed to small children showing a keen interest in school, did not order me out. Instead, she offered me a special table and chair complete with her own drinking cup, and there I stayed.

I would go on to complete the first grade by age four, under the same unorthodox arrangement. Not that I was an exceptional student in those early years. My interest in school probably had more to do with group activities than anything else.

The city of Chengdu, where I was born, is in western Sichuan province. Here I spent the first few years of my life before we returned to Hubei province, my mother's birthplace. Life seemed easy and comfortable there, even with the Sino-Japanese War going on and lowered living standards. I was growing up in a completely female household, with Mother, First Aunt, my cousin Zhenli, and Grandmother Li. The occasional male visitors were usually close relatives. Nurtured and protected, I had no memory of pain or discomfort even when the adults were facing their own crises.

I remember one summer evening I was abruptly awakened by my first aunt and was rushed out, bed-covers and all. I looked up and saw a flaming red light through the window. A fire! In no time I was deposited safely on the grass of the front yard with the rest of -the family. Together we watched a big fire in progress down the hill. It was the elementary school, the beloved school where I went daily for stories and cookies. I heard the adults' urgent conversation, but did not quite get the gist of their discussion. Still half asleep, I was fascinated by the bright glare, the smell of charred wood, the burning buildings. Years later I learned that arson had been suspected, evidently engineered by the superintendent of the school to cover up the irregular books he had kept, because he anticipated an outside audit. To me, however, that evening was more or less a summer interlude-1 loved the colors of the sky above and felt safe in my first aunt's arms. Fear was foreign to me.

Children in China were often held and carried in the arms or on the backs of the adult women who could not afford to have their daily household chores interrupted. Carrying the child close to the body was convenient and comforting for both the adult and the child. Chinese men and women, however, rarely showed physical affection toward each other in public, contrary to their responses to children. I sensed, even then, that the adults played by an entirely different set of rules.

After the end of the Second World War in 1945, we all moved to grandmother's house in Wuhan, Hubei. There my second uncle and aunt gave me my first lessons in adult- hood and its problems. They were the first couple I had the opportunity to observe close-up. Second Uncle was some sort of bank clerk. Hi,S marriage to Second Aunt, Mother's second eldest sister, was considered a good match: both families were Muslim. In addition, Second Uncle was from an educated, professional family, his sister being one of the few women at the time studying for a medical degree. Living next to Grandmother's house in Wuhan, both Second Uncle and Aunt were regular visitors to the family. Second Aunt was a competent homemaker, her culinary skill was the equal of First Aunt's and her needlework surpassed that of most of her sisters. My mother was very fond of her second eldest sister. Both quick-witted and quick-tempered, they spent lots of time in each other's company. It seemed logical for me to stay overnight with Second Aunt's family when Mother's work took her out of town. It was to be an eye-opening experience for me.

Second Uncle evidently had his after-work routine down pat. Upon entering his front door he would call in a commanding voice for the chambermaid.

"Spring Flower!" he would bellow, "come and get me my slippers!"

Spring Flower, a girl not more than fifteen or sixteen, would scurry forward with a pair of clean slippers and a warm hand towel. I was mesmerized by what I saw: Second Uncle's total dominance over everyone in the family and poor Spring Flower's thankless task. Not knowing the root of my feelings, I felt indignant for Spring Flower. Why did Second Uncle order her about as if he were so much more important? Why couldn't he get his own slippers? For reasons that were not clear to me at the time, since I was only about four or five, I never developed any warm feelings toward Second Uncle. I would hear whispered conversation between Mother and her sister, my second aunt, when they thought they were out of everyone's hearing (not counting a little girl like me). They insinuated some irregular activities on the part of Second Uncle, that he was not shy about making advances toward female servants of his household nor visiting certain brothels in town. Typically, Second Aunt would lament her fate, being trapped in this predicament, and Mother would be consoling. I was puzzled by the complexity of the adult world and the seemingly helpless positions in which women found themselves.

Nor was I to escape, even as a tiny girl, from being an easy target for male attention. One of my older cousins, a teenage boy, was developing an unnatural interest in me. When we were out of the adults' sight, he would call me in private his "future darling little wife." He would bring me candies and cupcakes and show me nude pictures of movie stars. When we were alone he would expose himself and make lewd gestures. Sensing these to be inappropriate behaviors, though I was genuinely fond of his storytelling, I finally told Mother about these episodes.

Mother was putting me to bed one evening when I told her what my cousin had said and done that day. Face white, she got up from the bed and walked out, muttering that she was going to have a good talk with his mother. Moments later she came back and we had a talk, mother to daughter. Mother told me that men always tried to take advantage of women and that this had been true throughout the history of China, and that she was glad I had confided in her. She commented on the absence of a male in the house and wondered about Father's return to China.

Father did return, in 1947, two years after the war ended. Mother and I took a riverboat from Wuhan to Nanjing, where Father had set up housekeeping for us. On the boat, two young men, complete strangers, struck up a conversation with me. Impressed with my ability to read and write at such a young age (I was probably showing off as usual), they asked me to write down the names of my parents, at which point Mother quickly walked over to retrieve me from them. She seemed nervous and worried, and insisted that I sit with her during the remainder of the journey. I sensed her discomfort and obeyed, not totally understanding the natural fear of single women traveling in China during the post-war era. The social order was not strong enough to assure young women of their personal safety and stories about extortion, kidnapping, and worse were fairly common.

Mother probably had another good reason to be anxious. She was on her way to meet her husband after more than four years of separation. She kept reminding me to call my father by his name when I met him. I nodded. Father had been only a concept to me up to then. He was the greeting cards during holidays and birthdays, pictures on the wall, and presents in the boxes sent from overseas. I knew I had a father in the United States. I was told he was there to pursue graduate studies. I repeated it each time people asked me, but I had no feeling about him as a person.

I finally had a glimpse of Father. A tall, dark man. He came onto the riverboat after an inordinate wait and waved to Mother, who had become very emotional upon spotting him. I stood next to Mother on the deck and looked at this stranger. He was not like any of the pictures I had seen, for he seemed much bigger and stronger. I saw them hugging each other. Then Mother patted my shoulder, turning me to face him and said,

"This is your father, Rongrong."

I found my voice and called him "Dad," as if in a dream state. He picked me up to give me a big hug. Then all three of us left the boat. In his shiny new jeep, Father took us, our baggage, and all our years without him, to our new residence. Our jeep crossed the wide boulevards of Nanjing, with huge trees along the roadsides. It started to drizzle, clouding the street lamps with a heavy mist. I had no idea where we were going, but I knew instinctively that this stranger, my father, was taking us to a dry and comfortable place, a place that would hold much hope and promise.

Father had joined the Nationalist Air Force after graduating from the Shanghai Communication and Transportation University with a degree in aeronautical engineering. He had easily won the award to study in the United States, sponsored by the air force as part of the government's move to modernize. He had subsequently earned a master's degree in aeronautical engineering from Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute and went on for a doctorate. But his stay was cut short by his commitment to the air force to return to his duties.

Father returned to his homeland with new ideas and strong ethical standards. Promoted to the rank of lieutenant major in the air force, he found himself pursued by staff seeking personal favors and businessmen seeking lucrative contracts. Father's response to these attempts was a uniform rejection coupled with his eloquent speech on the patriotic duty of citizens to abide by the rules of proper conduct. I remember one afternoon when a lower-ranking officer brought two boxes of imported goods, a rare find during the last years of the Nationalist regime when inflation and food scarcities hit all urban centers without warning. The man was hoping to get Father to grant him a personal favor at work. Father shoved him and the two boxes of gifts out the front door. He sternly told him never to return, because he was a disgrace to the entire air force. Mother and I rushed out to see the commotion. I saw the hurt and awkward expression on this poor man's face and Father's explosive anger. My father had a real temper, I noted to myself.

But most of the time Father was a caring and compassionate man. Friends and colleagues came to the house seeking his counsel on domestic as well as work-related problems. Those managerial positions were responsible not only for the staff at work but also for their family affairs at home. This was true in the military services, business, and the academic community.

Having been without a father for more than four years—Father had left when I was a few months old—I was delighted to have him with us. I quickly adjusted to the new routine of rushing to the door when he came home from work, and going out with him on summer nights to sit under the sky. Father would carry out a big bamboo seat and I would sit on it while he told Mother and me stories—stories about far away places and things he had done over the years. He would show us a miniature statue of the Empire State Building in New York City. He told me there were miniature people hiding in it—for years I believed his stories and would look gingerly through the little windows to get a glimpse of these tiny people. When I was too tired to stay awake I would fall asleep on the bamboo seat and be carried back to the house. We also had outings to the memorial tomb of Sun Yat-sen, the tomb for the founding emperor of the Ming Dynasty, and to the Xuanwu lake for a boat ride.

We shared the big house in Nanjing with another family, that of Father's schoolmate in the United States, who had also returned to China to start his own manufacturing factory. The common ground between the two families was the central courtyard. So once again I was to be witness to the goings-on of a typical courtyard, where visitors came in to chat, where families met face to face, privacy temporarily forgotten, where the fundamentals of human life and relationships could be so easily observed.

Our neighbors, the Zhang family, had two children, a boy and a girl, about my age. We became fast friends in no time. I took a special liking to the boy, a couple of years my senior, who had a pair of lovely dimples and big, brown eyes. 1 spent more time however with his sister, both of us sharing an enthusiasm for baby dolls.

The Zhang family had a maternal grandmother living with them, and soon my paternal grandmother came to live with us, bringing her newly adopted son, Jing, a ten-year-old boy. Grandmother Pu, having raised four sons and one daughter, had decided to adopt another boy to keep her company at home.

The two grandmothers were treated in totally contrasting ways. Grandmother Zhang had no standing in the family; she was maid, cook, and washerwoman for her daughter's family. Frugal and tightfisted, the Zhangs insisted that Grandmother Zhang use the rainwater to wash clothes, whereas most families with means would get fresh water from the faucet down the road, paying a price for it. I remember watching Grandmother Zhang doing a full load of laundry in the central courtyard, her hands swollen and scaly, her silent tears dropping into the wooden bucket.

"Your grandmother has such a good son and daughter-in-law. She does not have any housework. But look at me," she said, holding out her hands. "Look at my poor hands!"

I would feel so sorry for her that I would rush to my room to get her some of my butter cookies, the only token I could think of to console her.

"I wish you were my granddaughter," she would say smiling, after eating my cookies, for she was not allowed nibbles between meals in her own family. I felt so good about relieving some of her pain that I thought about soliciting help for her from the family, but obviously I was not getting very far in changing her plight.

The visit of Grandmother Pu was itself not without trauma. At an advanced age, after a life of hard labor, Grandmother Pu was looking forward to joining her third son in family harmony. She would find that life with Father, Mother, me, and her newly adopted son was not an easy one to get used to. The boy, Jing, in frail health, was chronically incontinent. Given his lack of interest in school, and the need to change his bed linen often, Mother began to complain to Father about the burden of caring for him. Grandmother Pu, on the other hand, was protective of her adopted son and saw Mother's duties as the expected services of a daughter-in-law. She was particularly troubled by Mother's quick temper and outspokenness. Mother and Grandmother Pu spoke different dialects and had difficulty communicating with each other, which compounded the tension between them. Caught in the middle, Father would be the peacemaker when he could, and ignore them both when he could not.

One night I was awakened by voices in my parents’ room. Half-awake, I got the drift of their argument: Mother was complaining about Grandmother Pu and her adopted son, Jing, while Father was getting defensive. Then I heard Mother’s muffled crying. The next morning when Mother came to dress me for school, I asked her what had been the matter, but by then she had evidently resolved whatever differences she might have had with Father and was her cheerful self again.

I knew that, despite this argument, my parents cared for each other. After a while, feeling homesick and uncomfortable in the cold winter of Nanjing, Grandmother Pu took her adopted son Jing home, back to Guangzhou, where the climate was warmer and more pleasant for her.

Life for us in Nanjing seemed to return to normal. My parents would go out together in the evening to a show or to dance. I was often left by myself in the house with instructions not to touch the electric stove. And I would venture out into the courtyard to chat with the Zhang children. All three of us would sit on our individual wooden benches under the sky and make up stories about our future.

It was the same sky, on those evenings when I was alone, that I had watched while living with Grandmother Li in her big house in Wuhan and it was the same flaming red sky over Chengdu, when I and my family watched the fire at the elementary school from the top of the hill; it was the same sky under which I listened to Father’s storytelling. For me, the sky was the universe, where dreams could be pinned to the stars, where fantasies could run wild and deep—the sky of my childhood.

*

My maternal grandmother had no name of her own. I never knew the significance of this until I returned again to China in 1982, my second visit since Liberation. The fact is, I had learned years ago that grandmother had no name. During my early teens I came upon photos of her among old family documents. Two photos stood out in my memory. One was a three-by-five glossy black-and-white picture, showing her in a velvet turban with a piece of jewelry, probably jade, right in the center. Grandmother had a rather long face, unlike most moon-faced Chinese women of her generation, and her features looked distinctly Western—large double-lidded eyes, high-bridged nose, high cheek bones, and a wide mouth. I thought she looked at once exotic and beautiful. Only years later did I associate her Western features with her Muslim background. Another photo had her sitting in a rattan chair in the courtyard, with her children standing beside her, all five girls and one boy. She looked powerful but lonely in this picture, without Grandfather’s presence—he had passed away when the children were young. As I searched through the old family albums and documents, I saw an old household registration, commonly used in those days as a substitute for individual identification, in which Grandmother was listed as Mrs. Li—no first name, no maiden name, just Mrs. Li.

I remember asking Mother if Grandmother’s first name had been inadvertently left out. Mother explained that it was the proper way of registering married women in the old days—a woman was known only as a wife in her new family. Mother did not recall Grandmother’s given name, if she had one, for she was always Mu-ma to Mother, Mu-ma meaning Mom in the local Wuhan dialect. Though I thought at the time the situation odd and archaic, I did not pursue my curiosity further. I was then more interested in Grandmother’s life as wife in the Li family.

Mother told me that Grandfather Li had come from an old Chinese Muslim family whose ancestors had emigrated to China via the old Silk Road, ending up in Xian centuries ago. The family later moved eastward into Hubei, in central China. Li was not their original Muslim name, but the imperial name of a Ming emperor, given to Grandfather’s ancestors in recognition for good services performed for the emperor.

This association with the imperial family would have a profound impact on the occupational choices of the Li men. No longer limited to the merchant trade, they began to assume various government and military positions during the next centuries. By the time Grandfather was born, his immediate ancestors had developed a strong family tradition in military service. Thus it was not surprising that Grandfather found himself enrolled in the Wuhan Military Academy,\fn{China’s West Point under the Koumintang:H} demonstrating a keen interest in a military career. Grandfather was one of the few graduates of the Academy chosen to go on to study in Japan. But to his deep regret, he never made the trip. Instead, he settled down in Wuhan with the Muslim girl chosen for him by his parents, a girl he had not met before the wedding.

Arranged marriage was still practiced well into this century. This could be done through a matchmaker or arranged by the parents of both families, depending on their relative social status, economic ability, and the ties between the two families. As a child, I was only dimly aware of the trauma a couple must have gone through facing the unknown, namely each other and their new life together. One sunny morning, while living with Grandmother, I joined other children to watch a wedding procession in the neighborhood. The bride, under a heavy veil of scarlet brocade covering her entire head and face, was being led to a waiting carriage by her family, her mother sobbing incessantly. Face unseen, the bride also seemed visibly shaken.

Puzzled by the sad and tearful scene, I followed the carriage to the house of the bridegroom's family. Watching brides arrive at their new residence was a favorite pastime for neighborhood children. They had practically surrounded the house, fighting to get a closer look at this bride. I joined the crowd and after considerable struggle reached the bedroom window. I looked in.

The new bride was sitting on the bed, wiping tears from under her veil. I was disappointed in not getting a good look at her, but I heard an older child next to me muttering,

"Wait until she sees the bridegroom. He's as ugly as a toad."

After his marriage to Grandmother in 1904, Grandfather's military career began to prosper. He was soon appointed the military envoy to supervise affairs along the border with Burma, far away from his family in central China. Rarely home, he left the running of the household to Grandmother (although, despite his protracted absences, they still produced six children). As we expected in those days, Grandfather soon felt the need to set up a household away from home; he was seriously contemplating taking a concubine.

When the news of his intention reached Grandmother, she wasted no time. Despite this common practice among well-off males, Grandmother was not about to be left out of the arrangement. Feet bound and inexperienced in travel, she gathered her expanding family brood and headed for the Burmese border, traveling one thousand miles to get there.

The concubine-to-be was so terrified of Grandmother's arrival and her potential negative vote that she pulled out all the stops to make Grandmother's stay comfortable. Mother recounted the first encounter: the middle-aged matron and the slip of a girl sizing up each other. The concubine, recognizing her own inferior status in the family hierarchy, knelt down in a deep kowtow to pledge her loyalty to her "elder sister" and to their master. Grandmother soon warmed to the girl's attempts at sisterly affection and felt comfortable enough to return home to Hubei, only to learn a few months later that the concubine had eloped with Grandfather's lieutenant.

One woman had out-witted another, and in the end, outsmarted the man in their lives.

Grandfather and Grandmother seemed to become closer after the affair of the concubine. Grandmother declared that she needed to take over the matter of looking for another concubine. For whatever reason, she never found one. Grandfather, on the other hand, was growing tired of his constant travels, and contemplated an early retirement from the service.

Mother was close to Grandfather Li. Being the fourth daughter, she was treated more like a boy by Grandfather, who by then had given up any hope for a son—he would go on to have another daughter before the only son was born—and seemed to take particular liking to Mother's outgoing personality.

"My fourth one," he would call out to her on returning from an extended absence. "See what I've got here for you!" Mother would jump into his lap, an unusually affectionate gesture toward a father for a little girl at that time; and delightedly examine the souvenir he had brought for her.

Grandfather's constant travels had also expanded his knowledge and awareness of the outside world. A believer in education, even for girls, he encouraged Mother's schooling. Hence, unlike the three sisters before her, Mother was able to receive a regular public education. Grandfather Li also brought ideas about the "natural feet" movement from the Guangzhou region, where women at the turn of the century had stopped the practice of footbinding. None of his daughters would have to go through this inhuman treatment, he declared, even if their prospect of marriage was diminished by a pair of big feet. While Grandfather was loud and demanding, accustomed to commanding armies during his military career, he was unusually gentle around Grandmother and deferred to her in most domestic decisions. Grandmother, on the other hand, secure in her position in the family, never flaunted her hold on Grandfather in front of the children.

Grandmother held the purse strings in the family, a practice common among the Chinese women of her generation, based on the belief that men should take care of the affairs outside the home, women in the home. After Grandfather retired from military service, he decided to go into the confectionery business, but not being a businessman nor interested in becoming one, he quickly lost the family fortune. Mother recalled the final years of Grandfather's management of the business: food was freely given away to friends and relatives; baskets of black sesame seeds, used in cookies and pastries, were pilfered from the store with no accounting; the books were in disarray.

This would have a profound impact on Grandfather. The once powerful military commander became an unhappy old man, squandering his time in the teahouse swapping stories with old friends. Grandmother, on the other hand, remained stoic and serene throughout those financially turbulent years. So adept in financial matters, she single-handedly raised the six children without outside financial help.

I grew up in Grandmother's household. Mother went home to stay after my birth, while Father was studying in the United States. By then, most of Grandmother's children had left home. The only son had died during the Sino-Japanese War as a pilot in the air force, and his surviving daughter, Zhenli, three years older than I, had been left with Grandmother by her mother, who had eloped with another man after my uncle's death. Also living with Grandmother, in addition to Mother, Zhenli, and myself, was First Aunt who had returned home following the death of her husband, long before the rest of us joined Grandmother in her big house.

To supplement the family income, Grandmother had to rent sections of the house to distant relatives. I remember watching the comings and goings of countless uncles, aunts, and cousins from the center courtyard. In my childhood memories, Grandmother was a petite, frail woman, moving quietly in the background, who in her final years had relinquished the major household responsibilities to First Aunt, her eldest daughter. Grandmother seemed to speak little, and when she did, it was in a low whisper.

With her reduced responsibilities at home, Grandmother spent a lot of time with me and my cousin Zhenli. Her bound feet limited her movements. She had to walk slowly and every step put a sharp pain through her entire body, so Zhenli and I would act as her substitute for a walking cane whenever we ventured outside together. She had developed a love for the waterpipe, a popular activity among ladies of the leisure class, and I was assigned the task of making long straws from yellow rice paper to light her pipe. After supper, we would all sit in. the back yard, watching the stars in the sky, listening to her storytelling, and the burbling of her waterpipe. 1 would often be lulled to sleep and carried back into the house. But, more often than not, after a long story, Grandmother would ask me to massage her back.

"I want those tiny fists pounding on my back, Rongrong," she would say to me, and I would oblige her by using all my might to pound her backbones as hard as I could. Most of the time I thought of Grandmother as a hopeless and dependent old woman. I would be proved wrong soon enough.

The occasion was the visit from my paternal grandmother, Grandmother Pu. A native of Guangzhou province, she had big feet, spoke the hard-to-understand Cantonese, and, worst of all, was a pork-eater—a non-Muslim woman. Evidently Mother had broken with Muslim tradition by marrying a non-Muslim from another province, an event close to being open warfare with the parents in a Muslim family. Since Mother usually got what she wanted, she had gone ahead and married my father despite her family's opposition, and Grandmother Li had to become resigned to having a non-Muslim son-in-law.

With this as a backdrop, the visit from Grandmother Pu was a critical one for Grandmother Li, who was determined to show utmost civility and hospitality. Having met Grandmother Pu before and having picked up some of the Cantonese dialect, I was the chosen family interpreter for the two grandmothers. The most immediate concern was food preparation, since Grandmother Pu loved her pork dishes and Grandmother Li forbade any pork products in the house. However, Grandmother Li hoped to convince Grandmother Pu that the healthy, delicate Muslim foods—Qingzheng cuisine—would be sufficient for her during her short stay with us. Grandmother Pu, on the other hand, had very little awareness of the importance of this issue and was soon asking for cooking utensils for herself so that she could cook in a separate section of the house. Eager to help and not recognizing the severity of the situation, I obtained the necessary cooking utensils for her.

When the aroma of pork—the "evil smell"—penetrated the thin walls of Grandmother Pu's room and escaped into the central courtyard, Grandmother Li became outraged. Along with my hapless Mother, I was summoned to Grandmother Li's room. Sitting on top of her high rosewood bed, Grandmother sternly told me I had offended Allah's wishes and that I was a naughty, sinful girl. I stammered, "But … Grandmother Pu can't have our kind of food,: but was stopped short by the cold stare, the only time I had faced real anger from Grandmother Li. Mother intervened at the appropriate moment and quickly ushered me out of Grandmother's room.

It was in 1982, when I visited Grandmother's house for the first time as an adult, that I began to see her in a new light. Here I was, standing in what had once been the central courtyard, the decayed stone pavement worn and darkened by years of neglect and abuse, recalling it as it had been more than three decades ago, with its very different inhabitants. The blurred image of Grandmother, in photos and childhood memories, became clearer. This exotic and mysterious woman had once put her life and soul into this. house, but she did it in silence and anonymity. She came to the house nameless, and she left without leaving her name. Yet I did not imagine Grandmother sad and wistful, nor angry and resentful. She went about her own business quietly accepting it all. The imprint of her influence could still be felt decades after her departure.

As I reflected on this during my brief visit to Grandmother's house, I passed through her old bedroom, now occupied by a distant aunt. I looked in. The same rosewood bed was still there, with a starched white mosquito net hanging from the ceiling. Suddenly an old image came back to me. I saw Grandmother sitting on the bed, her bound feet on a stool, unwrapping her bandage—a daily ritual that never ceased to fascinate me. I saw her concentrated attention to her poor deformed toes, bent deeply into the soles of her feet, as she slowly and meticulously put her unwrapped feet in a basin of warm water. Fresh flower petals floated on top of the basin, adding to the aroma of the fragrant oil Grandmother had put in the basin to soften her feet. She looked up and smiled at me. She seemed so proud and so undaunted.

*

Whenever I think of my first aunt, I am reminded of the passages in typical Chinese romantic novels depicting the first day in the life of a newlywed girl in the old society.

> Awakened before dawn, she slipped out of her bed quietly so as not to disturb her husband's slumber. The dim early morning light shot through the rice-papered windows onto the mirror on the dressing table. She made herself up meticulously before preparing the morning tea for her new parents. She could not help but notice the critical scrutiny from her mother-in-law as the tea was served, who was undoubtedly looking for clues that the newlyweds had been properly active the night before.

Like the heroine, my first aunt went through the torment- ing experience of a young girl married into a powerful family of the 1920s. But, unlike the brides of the fictional romances, her marriage did not have a happy ending.. She was a victim of marriage throughout her life.

First Aunt was sixteen when she was married into a Muslim family more prominent than her own. Her father, my grandfather Li, had considered the match suitable because First Aunt was to wed the eldest son of an important family, an enviable position for any girl seeking a marriage prospect.. According to Chinese tradition, the eldest son, in addition to occupying the senior position among the siblings, holds.the second most powerful rank in the family hierarchy. Second only to the family patriarch, he stands to inherit the bulk of the family fortune.

By then, Grandfather's confectionery business had been failing steadily. For him, marrying off a daughter, particularly the eldest, was a logical step to alleviate .the burdens of a financially troubled family.

According to First Aunt;'s own account, she knew nothing about her future husband except for his being the oldest son. As was typically the case with arranged marriages, she was in no position to voice her own reaction to the match. At age sixteen she was considered old enough to marry, and marry she did.

The first shock for First Aunt following the marriage was learning about her husband's physical condition. At a young age he had contracted tuberculosis and was now an invalid with a heavy opium addiction. Apparently his family had considered the marriage the proper way to turn around his poor state of health. The use of a wedding to bring good luck to the family and the bridegroom was called chongxi or "filling up happiness."

His family had kept the illness from outsiders, including First Aunt's family. Needless to say, Grandfather was furious that he had been tricked into accepting the marriage proposal, but the shame of terminating a marriage after its consummation was so strong that he could not take any action. Grandmother Li, though pained by her daughter's unfortunate position, attributed the circumstances to fate. She advised First Aunt to be patient and loyal to her new family.

As if this discovery of her husband's condition was not enough, First Aunt found herself a nursemaid to her invalid husband who, on days when he was more lucid and drug-free, would demand her toral attention in waiting on him. He rarely left his bedroom, because his condition had excused him from taking up a vocation and the family continued to support his idle lifestyle. First Aunt would stay with him, filling his opium pipe, bringing food to his bed and escorting him to the toilet when he was too weak to help himself. He was especially tyrannical in his demand that First Aunt, not any maid or manservant, be the one to perform the most intimate tasks for him.

As a young bride, First Aunt also had the obligatory morning ritual of kowtowing to her parents-in-law and serving them breakfast tea. The breakfast tea ritual, practiced well into the middle of this century, served to demonstrate the power hierarchy in the bride's new family. Not only were the bride's delicate manners in serving tea appraised, but so was the bride herself, like a specimen to be tested and molded—not one strand of hair out of place, nor any misapplication of makeup, nor improper choice of clothing. Otherwise, the bride would be confronted with her shortcomings and told to correct the deficiencies.

It was difficult for me to picture First Aunt as the delicate, ill-fated bride, for when I knew her, she had lost all her youthful looks. She was a rather masculine woman, big-boned and tall (considered uncomely in those days), with an awkward gait and unusually high cheek-bones and square jaw, her straight hair tied up in a severe bun at the nape. She seldom smiled at us and often gave her horrifying stare at our mischievousness. I and my cousin Zhenli were more than once intimidated into silent obedience by First Aunt's stare. Only years later did I understand the self- protective function of her lack of femininity. Her gender had brought her nothing but misery in life.

My aunt's first year with her in-laws was oppressive, especially for a girl of sixteen. At the same time, contact with her own family was limited and frowned upon. A bride's return to her old family, other than at the acceptable holiday season, was considered a betrayal of her new family. Not being able to share her miserable state of mind, least of all with her husband, First Aunt took the step many women before her had taken. She attempted suicide by swallowing a large amount of opium from her husband's supply.

It was the fear of scandal that finally brought a change of attitude in her new family. First Aunt was laid up for a while, to recuperate from the failed suicide, and had some respite for the first time since entering the household. Miraculously, she also became pregnant, thereby enjoying the pampered state of an expectant mother who drew attention and delicate treatment from all, to ensure the birth of a healthy child.

Her good fortune in being left alone did not last long, however. Before long her husband died of an opium overdose, while First Aunt was still pregnant. The only son, Lianfeng, would be born without knowing his father. What went through First Aunt's mind at her husband's death would never be known, for she never discussed it with Grandmother Li or her four sisters. Grandfather Li passed away soon after, in the same year, leaving First Aunt completely at the mercy of her in-laws.

Luckily, giving birth to a healthy son was viewed as the single most important accomplishment a married woman could make, and this dramatically changed First Aunt's status with her in-laws. Having suffered the loss of the eldest son, they now devoted their full attention and care to the eldest grandson. Thus First Aunt, despite the absence of any male support from her own family, was able to gather some strength on her own, and her life became less stressful for a few years.

But then her in-laws passed away. A fight for the family fortune erupted. With a large number of relatives fighting for their share of the family fortune, First Aunt, being meek and agreeable, did not fare well in the ugly struggle for control of the estate. In the end, she was given a big family house as the sole inheritance for her son and herself. Discouraged and anxious to sever ties with her husband's family, she sold the house and moved in with Grandmother Li. The two widows, mother and daughter, formed a team of mutual support to raise the rest of the family, four girls and one boy, plus First Aunt's own son.

Mother, the fourth of five daughters, was brought up more by her eldest sister, First Aunt, than by her own mother, partly because the ten years difference between them fostered First Aunt's maternal affection toward her younger sister, and partly because Mother relied heavily on First Aunt's support during her student years. First Aunt, though largely self-taught, was more educated than her own mother, and could take a more enlightened view of Mother's carefree ways in school and her less-than-brilliant performance as a student. First Aunt also helped Mother with her home economics assignments from school, for Mother was hopelessly inadequate when it came to cooking and sewing and all the other domestic activities expected of young girls of her day. During Grandmother Li's final years, the household responsibilities had been transferred to First Aunt, who took them over effortlessly; she became the true matriarch of the Li family. Though skilled in sewing and needlework, she did these mostly for others, she herself maintaining the same plain-looking exterior.

First Aunt also cared for me during my stay in Grandmother's house, while Mother was working and Father was studying abroad. As the years went on, Mother became more critical of First Aunt's ways as she outgrew her dependence on her. She was particularly dissatisfied with the way First Aunt dressed me.

"You make her look like a peasant boy!" Mother often complained.

Due to her work schedule and the distance of her work place, she was only home on weekends. Thanks to my Muslim lineage, I was born with a full head of curly hair and Mother took great delight in fixing my hair with ribbons and bows. She was therefore shocked, on returning home one weekend to find me totally bald. First Aunt had decided I should have my head shaved, like all little girls, to get rid of the "baby hair" and foster the healthy growth of thicker, straight black hair.

Mother was beside herself. She cried and carried on for days. Fortunately, my hair grew back with some wave, even into adulthood, a saving grace for my first aunt.

First Aunt was without a doubt the most popular and helpful neighbor in the district where we lived. Always quick to assist anyone in need, she cooked for the poor, helped nurse the sickly, and seemed to be forever doing things for others. While indulgent of her younger sisters, she was rather severe with their children, my cousin Zhenli and me. We were the ones always underfoot whenever she was busy cooking or sewing. First Aunt's cold stare was employed as a special tactic to deal with our mischievousness. With eyes bulging almost out of their sockets, she would let out a stern yell, "Zhenli! Rongrong! That's enough!" Without fail, Zhenli and I were brought into line.

I had the uneasy impression that First Aunt favored Zhenli over me, probably from First Aunt's protective instinct of giving more care to the less fortunate. Zhenli was born without a father, and her mother abandoned her to elope with someone else when Zhenli was just a few months old, whereas I had Mother's undivided attention, and a distant father abroad who showered me with presents. Besides, Zhenli, though a few years older, cried easily and was often scolded for her frequent crying bouts, contrary to my unflappable, stubborn demeanor. I seldom cried, even under trying circumstances.. I also managed to get on the good side of the adults in the family and stayed out of trouble more skillfully than Zhenli.

Zhenli and I fought a great deal. As naïve and cruel children sometimes do, I would let Zhenli know during some of our ferocious arguments that she didn't have the love of real parents, which inevitably reduced her to tears. First Aunt would come to the rescue by slapping me on the behind or taking Zhenli away from me.

In 1979, when I visited Zhenli again, she had left Wuhan, to work in Peking, after graduation from college. Neither of us had seen each other for thirty years, and I was finally able to apologize for my childhood follies. Zhenli, her own memories altered by the subsequent suffering of the Cultural Revolution, seemed perplexed by my apology:

"What are you talking about, Rongrong? Those years were the best times in my life!"

After Liberation in 1949, First Aunt had continued to live with Grandmother Li and Zhenli in the same old house in Wuhan, while my family had gone to Taiwan with the Nationalist government. Cut off by the communications blockade between the mainland and Taiwan, Mother could no longer write home and we lost contact. Zhenli told me, when we met again at last, that First Aunt never had any true joy in her life. Her only son, Lianfeng, had been captured by an aboriginal tribe during the retreat of his Nationalist army unit, and First Aunt died without ever seeing him again.

In the same big house in Wuhan, Zhenli and First Aunt became the sole inhabitants after the death of Grandmother Li. Fortunately the death was uneventful and a Muslim burial was arranged with the approval of the new government. Without any means of support, First Aunt had continued to rent sections of the house to relatives and friends until even this meager income was discontinued when the government took over all private properties and allocated them to other residents of the neighborhood. First Aunt took in sewing and laundry to help support herself and Zhenli, who, as the daughter of a war hero, received a small stipend and free education.

Zhenli recalled the harsh years during the Great Leap Forward movement in the 1950s when the entire country had a serious food shortage. Zhenli had longed for a red sweater for the upcoming Chinese New Year but dared not hope to get one in light of the financial situation at home. Sensing her desire, First Aunt had said,

"I'll see what I can do. Don't you worry about a thing."

A few months later, returning home from school, Zhenli found a flaming-red sweater, brand-new and inviting, on top of her bed, evidently the fruit of First Aunt's ingenious ways of saving money and knitting the sweater herself. Zhenli showed me the same red sweater on my 1979 visit to her apartment in Peking. The flaming red had faded, both elbows were patched and worn, but it was kept clean and fresh, carefully wrapped in a plastic bag, as a reminder of a lovely, selfless lady.

Zhenli told me of First Aunt's sudden death, from a fall and fatal stroke. First Aunt had just returned from the store, carrying a heavy bag of rice, when she slipped on the doorstep and fell, never regaining consciousness. Zhenli was in school when this happened. Barely a teenager and not very strong physically, Zhenli managed to have First Aunt taken to a local hospital, where First Aunt was pronounced dead.

A Muslim burial was arranged by Zhenli with help from the neighbors. All in their individual ways had received help from First Aunt who, in her last few years of life, had in fact been elected leader of the powerful neighborhood association, and had been considered one of the best local leaders.

The day of the funeral, everyone in the entire neighborhood turned up to pay their respects to First Aunt, each with individual memories of this woman, their friend and helper. The entire alley was lined with people who had come to pay their last tribute, their public recognition of her selfless devotion to family and community. It is sad that she could not witness this public testimony, and that mother and I could not be present to express to her our joint gratitude for all those years of loving care. Sad too, that she died before her only son returned home after long years of hard labor for the aboriginal tribe and then in a reform camp, that she never saw the pain and tears he brought to her tombstone after being away for more than thirty years.

She could never know how I had observed her and learned from her, that her example would finally teach me the courage and determination to break free from the shackles of tradition, the bondage, the suffering that women of her generation had endured in powerless silent dignity. …

73.9 The Consultation\fn{by Lin Yeh-muh (1940-)} Shanghai?, China (M) 9

Up on top of the Wai T'an Customs Building a clock announced the time with the song, The East is Red—it was exactly seven o'clock in Peking. Li Yen was already making his way through the hospital gates, reporting for work an hour early.

He had been coming to work early practically every day for the last month or so. Ever since he was transferred back from the May Seventh Collective Farm by the hospital's Revolutionary Committee he had often thought"

"The Committee's decision to recall me to the hospital must mean that my case has essentially been cleared. Perhaps it won't be much longer before the leadership announces my liberation. I'll be allowed to pick up my stethoscope again and devote my time to treating patients again."

The pleasant thought of his soon being able to don a white coat and sit in the consultation room diagnosing ailments brought an involuntary smile to his face and even a new briskness to his steps.

Li Yen was not a blind optimist. He had given these wishful fantasies his careful scrutiny, always looking for the worst, just as he would in diagnosing symptoms of a highly complex and difficult case. But even then, among all the twenty-odd problem cases at the May Seventh Collective Farm, had he not been the first to be called back to the hospital? Granted, his work since returning continued to be very much in the nature of compulsory re-form—his daily duties consisted of sweeping the floors, emptying spittoons and washing bedpans. But compared to shoveling earth and hauling buckets of manure, this was less strenuous by far. Even better, he now finished his day along with the rest of the revolutionary masses and could return home each day to his wife.

And Li Yen had more than that to be happy about. Since his return he had often been called upon by the hospital's Workers' Publicity Corps (for the Propagation of Mao Tse-tung's Thoughts) to attend the consultation sessions held by the doctors to discuss difficult cases from both the out-patient and in-patient departments. On these rare opportunities when his medical opinion was sought, Li Yen would always give his best, wishing that he could somehow transmit all the knowledge and experience within him to the younger and less experienced doctors so they would be better able to make precise and informed diagnoses, and bring quick relief to the patients. These occasions were of great importance to him. Ever since the Cultural Revolution, anyone who was politically suspect was not allowed to treat patients. It was extremely unusual political treatment for him to be asked by the Workers' Publicity Corps to participate in these conferences, and perhaps a really significant omen.

He recalled that time in the lavatory when Supervisor T'ang had come in to use the toilet and had seen him kneeling on the floor, vigorously scouring the urinal. He had called out a friendly greeting and had even spoken to him in a solicitous tone:

"Old Li, the skills you have are to your advantage. All you need to do is be resolute in your desire to reform and thoroughly turn away from your capitalist ways of thinking, then the people will be sure to accept and welcome you."

Supervisor T'ang was not only a member of the Workers' Publicity Corps, he was sent by Chairman Mao to occupy a top level position in the hospital and to re-educate the intellectuals. Were his words not to be taken as a hint of what the people at the top thought of him?

He. looked back at all these little things that had happened in the last month or so since his return. Soon after coming back, the leadership had ordered him to report to work at seven thirty, half an hour earlier than the rest of the hospital's revolutionary workers. But after he saw how the three years' Great Cultural Revolution had left the entire hospital covered with dirt and debris, he decided on his own that he might as well make it a whole hour earlier and come at seven o'clock. In that way he could be of even greater service to the people and it would also constitute a greater act of atonement on his part. He became determined to give the entire place a thorough cleaning both inside and out; he was going to make the hospital into a clean and sanitary environment!

As he stepped into the building he was confronted with the sight of a long winding row of people lined up in front of the Registration Office, some of whom had already collapsed onto the chairs and were asleep. These people, Li Yen knew, had all come at some absurd hour of the night to stand in line and wait to be registered the next morning. He had become a familiar sight to some of them and drew silent looks of friendly compassion as he passed. Li Yen lowered his head to avoid their eyes and quickly strode across the waiting room into the long corridor which was lined on both sides with signs indicating the various departments.

The doors to each of the departments were ajar. Inside the rooms the lights were still on and the doctors and nurses of the night staff had already shed their whites, rushing through the last of their duties. Walking past each of the rooms, not one person inside spoke to him or even called out a greeting. It was as if he were a stranger, some one they didn't even know.

*

Li Yen pushed open the swinging doors of the lavatory. A wave of foul odor assailed his nostrils. Rubbing his eyes, he paused on the urine-drenched tile floor. It only took a moment to brace himself against the smell, then he took out his glasses and put them on.

"Ai, clogged again. No wonder it stinks so much."

He tied an apron around his waist and bent down to inspect the urinal. This sort of thing would never have been permitted to happen when he had been Director of Internal Medicine at the hospital. He had set a number of rules and regulations that had to be followed. Not only had he personally inspected the sickrooms and each patient's chart every day, he had also been highly exacting in his standard of cleanliness. He had a pet slogan, and he was fond of using it during meetings or even in conversation with the doctors and nurses on his staff:

"We must provide our sick comrades with a clean, comfortable, and quiet environment in which to convalesce."

During the Cultural Revolution, however, his brand of capitalist revisionism was very quickly ripped to shreds, bag and baggage, and dumped into the Garbage Heap of History. Even Chu the janitor in his own department had joined the Labor Guard and was going about militantly inciting rebellion. So now, in accordance with the great directives of Chairman Mao to "Spit out the old and accept the new" and "To let all three—old, middle-aged and young—unite and work together," Little Chu had not only become a Party member, but had also been given official status as Deputy Director of the hospital's Revolutionary Committee. And there had been no one to take over the responsibility of the cleaning and sanitation of the wards of the Department of Internal Medicine until Li Yen had returned from the farm.

Li Yen worked from dawn to dusk every day. Though still not spotless, the wards were on the whole kept decently clean. Quite unexpectedly it was the patients who were moved to sympathy, seeing a man of his age whose hair was already specked with white mopping and sweeping all day long. Although they had heard it said that he was undergoing re-education through labor, they could clearly see how hard it was on him. And so they always made an effort to keep their rooms clean, carefully disposing cigarette butts, fruit peels and waste paper in the proper places. In fact, it was the doctors' and nurses' offices and the lavatory that Li Yen found difficult to keep clean, no matter how hard he worked.

The lavatory was practically impossible to clean. Almost every other day or so the urinal would clog up and spill urine all over the floor. It was not only unhygienic, it had given Li Yen an additional set of problems to worry about. At first, Li Yen had written a sign saying, "Please do not discard cigarette butts or waste paper in the urinal" and had posted it in a spot where it could be easily noticed. Days went by with no effect and it was almost as if everyone was illiterate until one day, as he was clearing the drain, he came upon a slip of paper that had been torn from one of the hospital's medical chart forms. On it was written:

"Li Yen has not tried hard enough to re-educate himself through labor, for that he must eat shit and swallow urine every day."

Only then did he understand why the urinal was always clogged. Members of .the revolutionary medical staff had purposely intended it for him.

Li Yen got down on his knees with great difficulty and using a pair of prongs, began to remove one by one the cigarette butts and clumps, of paper from the pool of urine. Then, after prodding with a piece of thick wire, he finally managed to get the pipe to drain freely. He got back on his feet, took out a mop and began to wipe the floor with broad, vigorous strokes. By the time the tiles were cleaned to their original white surfaces, Li Yen had lost track of how many moppings it had taken or how many times he had had to rinse the mop. All he could feel was the pain in his back and an insufferable heat all through his body. He put aside the mop and stood in front of the window to rest for a while then went over to scrub the toilets. By the time he was done cleaning all six toilets, including the doors and walls of each of the stalls, his shirt was soaked with sweat and stuck to his skin. Stopping only to wipe his glasses and forehead with a handkerchief, he then went over to the corner where the nurses had dumped a pile of dirty bedpans. The patients would be needing them at any moment; they should be washed right away.

Sunlight streamed past the branches of the tall wu-t'ung tree and in through the window. As the loudspeaker on top of the tree began to play "The East is red, the sun rises …", one by one, voices began to join in until the entire building was echoing with the song. At eight o'clock every morning, all the revolutionary cadres and workers in the hospital reverently expressed their morning obeisance to Chairman Mao. Following this ritual, they then began anew their revolutionary work as directed by Chairman Mao. Working to the refrain of the revolutionary tune, Li Yen's hands began to move with great speed. By the time the song ended with its "Heigh and Ho" he had finished washing all the bedpans.

"They'll be making the rounds at nine. I'd better hurry if I'm to clean out all the spittoons before they come."

He slipped on a pair of rubber gloves and dashed out of the lavatory to collect the spittoons from each of the rooms. Hands and feet in constant motion, he seemed to be on a merry-go-round as he whirled from room to room. The sound of his footsteps mingled with the waves of muffled chanting that floated down the long corridor —the revolutionary hospital workers were now reading the Three Old Tales out loud in unison. Mean- while the patients were all lying quietly in their rooms, waiting for the doctors to start their rounds as soon as their morning obeisance was made. There was no one else in the corridor. To the chanting of "Serve the People," Li Yen alone worked si1ently and ceaselessly.

At the end of the first of the Three Old Tales, he had emptied the spittoons in five of the rooms. By the end of the second piece, he had finished up to room eleven. When they came to The Old Fool and the Mountain he had taken all sixty-odd spittoons from the fifteen rooms to the lavatory, cleaned and dried them and then put them back into the rooms.

When the solemn recitative was over Li Yen was panting from exhaustion. Bent over and gasping heavily, he dragged himself back to the lavatory. He had high blood pressure and this time he had over-exerted himself. He felt dizzy, nauseous; his eyes blurred. By now, the doctors and nurses were on their rounds, so very few people would come in for the time being. Li Yen pushed open the door to one of the stalls, flipped down the toilet seat cover and sat down to rest. He leaned against the water tank and sat there panting with his eyes shut. Gradually he began to recover.

He tried to get up but the pain in his back was so agonizing he couldn't straighten up and had to collapse back down on the toilet. His back had been bothering him for over two years, ever since the beginning of the Cultural Revolution when he had undergone a "struggle" and had been whipped like a dog and thrashed like a snake. It had been permanently damaged by the Red Guards and their "shooting air method." And now, the least bit of exertion or even a change in the weather would make it start acting up again.

Li Yen sat on the toilet massaging his back with both hands. At times like this, when the pain was unbearable,. his point of view seemed to waver. The ray of hope that had shone earlier now appeared distant and obscured, with hardly a glimmer in sight.

"What crime have I committed, why must I suffer such torment."

He searched and probed but failed to come up with any reason. All he felt was pain and a sense of having been wronged for some unclear cause. He groped for some understanding until finally, tired old tears streamed down his cheeks and on to his thighs.

"Li Yen! Li Yen!"

A woman's voice was sternly shouting his name down the corridor.

Li Yen burst out of the lavatory as if shot from a spring. He stood in the corridor, his head bent low, waiting for her command.

She was a Red Guard leader in the Department of Internal Medicine, a radical in the cleansing of the ranks campaign, once known to him as Little Chang, a nurse whom he himself had trained. She stood with her head held high and without bothering to look at him, relayed an order in an icy tone.

"Li Yen, the Revolutionary Committee and the Workers' Publicity Corps want to see you at once. You are to go to them immediately, without delay!"

"Yes, yes," answered Li Yen, as he swiveled around quickly and headed for the stairs.

He went without hesitation yet his alarm grew with each step.

"I wonder what I've done wrong this time. What makes the Revolutionary Committee and the Workers' Publicity Corps so anxious to see me?"

He went back over each day, trying to recall everything that he had done, but saw nothing that could possibly be construed as an error or negligence on his part.

"Could it be they're prepared to announce that I've become liberated and want to see me first to discuss the self-criticism that I'm to write?" His eyes brightened at the thought and his heart pounded with excitement. But when he thought of the prospect of being the subject of a public self-investigation and self-criticism session, his joy was soon extinguished, as short-lived as a sparked match. He wasn't sure he could pass through that. A plain and honest man, every inch a "bookworm" in his clumsy and artless manner, he just didn't have it in him to put on a good show of denouncing himself before everyone in the hospital, and to curse himself as if he wasn't worth a dog's fart, finally sobbing and pleading for Chairman Mao to recognize his confession. And if his confession wasn't convincing enough, it would only incur the wrath of the radicals. They'd suspect him of trying to confess only the petty offenses while concealing the more serious ones. Who knows how many more sessions of criticism and struggle might be in store? The day of his liberation receded even further into the distant future. And the liberation he had looked forward to in such eager anticipation developed into a deeper fear and anxiety. Suddenly, he was struck with an odd feeling:

"If I have to revile myself against my own conscience, I'd rather not be liberated. I'd just as soon spend the rest of my days sweeping floors, washing bedpans and emptying spittoons."

Li Yen came to the office of the Revolutionary Committee. He stood indecisively outside the door for a long moment before finally mustering the courage to knock.

"Reporting!" he called out in a loud voice.

The door opened. The people inside seemed to be chatting, yet it also looked as if they were holding a meeting. The room was filled with smoke so thick that it sent Li Yen into a fit of coughing. Supervisor T'ang came forward, reached out and slammed the door shut with a bang. The room was again filled with the sound of talking and laughter.

"Old Li, a foreign visitor has fallen ill. She has been seen in our out-patient department twice in the last two days, but hasn't gotten any better. The Revolutionary Committee and the Workers' Publicity Corps have studied your case and consider your performance during this period quite satisfactory. They have decided to send you to the Foreign Guest House to see what you can do."

Having said this, Supervisor T'ang fixed Li Yen with a steady look and began to speak in an extremely solemn voice.

"A directive has come down from a high level in the Party. The foreign visitor must be cured as soon as possible. You are to take great care and not make any mistakes. What happens will have a direct effect on how Chairman Mao's revolution will be carried out in important issues concerning our foreign policy. It also concerns our national prestige. In entrusting you with such great political responsibility, the leadership is expressing its faith in you, and also giving you an opportunity to, ah— Supervisor T'ang hesitated for a moment, then continued—"to distinguish yourself in service of the State. You must do your utmost to fulfill this mission."

Li Yen's nerves had been stretched taut as a bowstring as he listened to Supervisor T'ang. Now he gradually felt himself relax. He was almost sure Supervisor T'ang had wanted to say "an opportunity to serve and exonerate" but, for some unknown reason, had left out the word "exonerate." He felt his heart fill with a sudden surge of heat.

"Supervisor T'ang, when should I go to see the foreign guest? May I first take a look at the foreign visitor's medical history?"

"Go back to the office of Internal Medicine. I'll call and have them deliver it to you there. Then go home and change your clothes. Now this is very important, be sure that you wear your best clothes when you go see the foreign. visitor—do you have a white coat?"

"Me?" Li Yen shook his head with discomfiture. "Not since a long time ago."

"I'll have them get you one." Supervisor T'ang paused to consider, then spoke again as if something had just occurred to him. "Have a bite to eat at home before you go. If the foreign visitors offer you food, you must decline it graciously. Be aware of the possible consequences of all your actions, do you understand?"

"I shall remember."

"All right, you may go and make your preparations. Go home and wait. At eleven o'clock someone from the Revolutionary Committee will come for you."

Li Yen walked out of the office feeling relieved and happy. There was nothing on earth that could give him greater pleasure than to heal the sick. He walked down the cement path lined with shrubs. The grass was yellow and dry, the air was filled with falling leaves of the wu-t'ung trees. No flowers bloomed, but to Li Yen's eyes, everything around him looked beautiful. For the first time in a long while he walked with his head up. In his excitement he looked up at the sky. The rich blue autumn sky stretched high above, echoing with the cries of flying birds. Li Yen drew in a deep breath of the clean, fresh air.

*

Li Yen wolfed down the bowl of shrimp noodles his wife had especially prepared for him. The hands of the small clock on the bureau pointed to ten twenty-five: still another half-hour to go before the appointed time. He rushed to wash up and get ready. By nature a very punctual man, he had never once in seventeen years been late to work or to a meeting, even in rain or snow. Now, under such extraordinary circumstances, he didn't dare delay for a second. It was difficult for intellectuals like him to conduct themselves to everyone's satisfaction these days. It didn't take much to make a person accuse you of being an elitist; he might just be in a bad mood at the time, or something about your appearance might not suit his eye. Li Yen decided it would be better to be ready early and waiting when they came, than to be rushed and make a bad impression..

His wife had dug out his blue serge Sun Yat-sen suit from their trunk and was helping him put it on with painstaking care. The pungent smell of mothballs pierced his nostrils.

"This suit seems to have grown larger lying at the bottom of the trunk for the last three years." The wool suit didn't seem to fit at all and it made him feel very uncomfortable. He had gotten so used to his blue cotton work clothes that it made him feel a little awkward and self-conscious to suddenly switch into a stiff wool suit.

His wife had been surveying him in his suit and the tears welled up in her eyes.

"How can the suit become larger? It's you who lost so much weight in the last few years."

She thought of all that he'd had to suffer in the last three years. She quickly bent her head and wiped her eyes with the front of her blouse.

"So I've lost some weight—nothing to worry about! Actually, I've never felt better."

Li Yen patted his wife's shoulder lightly and said to her comfortingly, "What's past is past, no point in thinking about it too much. The government's policy now is to bring intellectuals down from their ivory towers. Later on everything will get better."

Seeing that it was still early, Li Yen pulled his wife down to sit with him on the bed. Sadness filled him as he saw how thin her hair was and how deep her wrinkles had grown. During the last few years, she had experienced the same fears, suffered the same insults and scorn that he had. He grieved over what this had done to her. In his sadness he lay his hand over hers, thinking in silent grief:

"What these, three years have done to her spirit—the trials and humiliations! It has made her older and more tired than ever."

A car honked its horn in the street outside. Li Yen hurriedly got into his white coat, snatched up his doctor's case and ran downstairs. Deputy Director Chu—the one who had been a janitor in his department—stood outside the gate. He was waving his arms about, directing a small, gray, Shanghai-made car as it made a U-turn. The neighbors from both sides of the street had come out to their doors and were looking on with curiosity; some even bent their heads together whispering. Li Yen understood that it was right that he ride in a car. He was going to treat a foreign visitor, and it was for the sake of his country's honor and reputation. Still, he couldn't help but feel that it was a little ostentatious. With his head bent low as if he were doing something he didn't want seen, he walked quickly to the car and got in.

The car sped through the flourishing Huai-hai Chung Road and then turned onto beautiful Hsi-tsang Road. Soon, they stopped in front of a large building. Deputy Director Chu led Li Yen into the lobby of the Guest House and told him to sit down on a sofa and wait while he went in first. Ten minutes later, Deputy Director Chu came out with a young man. Li Yen followed the two into an elevator. They rode to the fourteenth floor, where they were taken by the young man to Room 147.

Inside, Li Yen saw an anxious looking foreigner sitting on a sofa and a woman lying on a luxurious bed. Most likely she was the foreigner's wife, he thought. The foreigner quickly stood up when they entered the room.

The youth who had been their guide was an interpreter. In stiff and awkward English, he spoke to the foreign gentleman at great length. The general meaning was that because they were concerned about his wife's condition, the hospital's Revolutionary Committee had specially sent over one of their doctors to attend to her. The foreign gentleman nodded politely to express his thanks. He even reached to shake hands with each of them.

When he grasped Li Yen's calloused hand, a strange look appeared in the foreigner's eyes. He quickly turned to the interpreter and asked in English:

"Is this gentleman the doctor?"

The interpreter nodded his head. But the foreigner turned back to stare at Li Yen, and laughed knowingly.

"No, no! I've taken my wife to the hospital twice and both times we've seen this man sweeping the floors, emptying spittoons …!" Then he slumped his shoulders and motioned with his arms, as if he were using a mop. He shook his head disbelievingly and looked over at his wife. She had pulled herself up to a sitting position on the bed and was staring at Li Yen with alarm.

"My wife is sick and she's getting worse. I beg you to help us find a qualified doctor and bring him here." Saying this, the foreigner threw his hands up in despair and sank back on the sofa. His wife, grasping the situation, cried out in a shrill voice:

"My God, Charlie! What's going on? Why have they sent some old spittoon cleaner?"

Li Yen had studied abroad and knew both English and French, but the leadership had not specified that he was permitted to speak. Under the circumstances, he could only stand and bear it in silence. Deputy Director Chu, who had appeared full of dignity and highly pleased with himself during the hand-shaking, now began to get nervous. He saw that the foreigner was very angry but he couldn't understand what was being said. Unmindful of the fact that the foreigner couldn't understand, he tried to reassure him, tugging at. the interpreter's shirt at the same time.

"Your wife's going to be all right," he said, "I'll make sure she'll be taken care of, don't you worry! Hey, what's bothering this foreigner?"

Only after the interpreter had explained the situation and asked what he should say did Deputy Director Chu recover his dignity. Puffing out his chest, he answered without hesitation.

"Why is that so hard to explain? Just tell him the man's a snake-demon ox-devil anti-Party anti-socialist rotten egg! That's why he has to sweep floors and empty spittoons."

The interpreter replied uneasily, "That doesn't sound very good. If we've brought a man like that to treat the foreign visitor, won't the foreigners laugh at us for not having anyone more qualified to do the job?"

"Then …" For a moment Deputy Director was at a loss. He scratched his head, then quickly changed his tune. "Then you must say that it's the Great Proletarian Cultural Revolution, and all sorts of strange things can happen. Hospital workers become leaders. Workers—lots of them—learn to treat illnesses. That is the great achievement of the Cultural Revolution."

"But if we say that, the foreign visitors will still think we've insulted them by irresponsibly sending them some barefoot doctor to mess around. If something goes wrong and it gets out, we'll all get punished."

Deputy Director Chu again scratched his head but couldn't come up with a more appropriate response.

Li Yen felt terribly insulted by what the two men were saying. He looked over to the foreigners and saw the bewildered and suspicious expressions on their faces. He could see that an explanation of the situation had to be given or it would eventually be known to the entire world outside and told as a monstrous joke to ridicule his country. At the thought of what it might do to his country's reputation, he decided that it was time for him to speak up, regardless of the consequences that he might have to face.

"Sir, you are correct. You did see me mopping floors and emptying spittoons. However, I have also been a doctor for thirty years, and I was once the Director of Internal Medicine at the hospital. But I was criticized during the Great Cultural Revolution because of my errors and for having followed the path of Liu Shao-chi's revisionist health policy. Now the revolutionary masses have given me the chance to reform and I have been allowed to re-educate myself and to correct my past mistakes through physical labor. That is why I must labor every day. As for being a physician, that has always been my profession. You and your wife have no need to worry."

The young interpreter was struck with surprise at Li Yen's fluent and thoroughly correct English. His surprise gave way to displeasure and anger darted from his eyes. As for the two foreigners, they were filled with delight at this sudden enlightenment.

The foreign gentleman quickly stood up to say, "Pardon me, pardon me." He reached out a hand to Li Yen and pulled him to the sofa and made him sit down. With renewed courtesy, he turned to Deputy Director Chu and the interpreter and also asked them to take a seat. He went on to apologize to Li Yen again, saying:

"My wife and I thought you were just a cleaning man at the hospital, we had no idea you were once the director. You Chinese sure can pull surprises on us foreigners! Please forgive my stupidity."

"No matter, please think nothing of it. I myself, through studying the works of Chairman Mao, am slowly beginning to realize the necessity and the importance of re-educating the intellectuals in their ways of thinking."

Li Yen saw the meaningful glances Deputy Director Chu was casting in his direction and hastened to end his conversation with the foreigner. "May I ask you, sir, where your wife is feeling discomfort?"

"You speak English so well, I'm sure you'll be a great help in treating my wife." After he had added this, the foreigner finally led Li Yen over to the bed and began to describe his wife's condition.

Li Yen put on a face mask and drew out a thermometer and sphygmomanometer from his bag. After he had taken her temperature and blood pressure, he put on his stethoscope, and proceeded to carefully examine the patient …

*

A careful examination promptly. led Li Yen to conclude that the foreigner's wife had typhoid fever, not a cold as the other doctors had diagnosed. To prevent the infection from spreading to the peritoneum and causing further complications, his advice was that she immediately enter the hospital for treatment. Upon hearing this, Deputy Director Chu and the interpreter decided that the situation had become serious and that immediate consultation with someone from the Foreign Visitors' Reception Committee was necessary. Li Yen was told to return to the hospital.

Li Yen took a streetcar to go home before returning to the hospital. As soon as he got home he took off his wool suit and got back into his coarse cotton work clothes. He quickly ate a bit of the meal his wife had warmed up for him. When he put down his chopsticks, he got up to leave for the hospital immediately. His wife was worried, noticing how little he had eaten.

"Do you feel all right?" she asked. "Why did you eat so little?"

"It's only been two hours since I ate that bowl of noodles. My stomach hasn't even had time to digest it yet!" Li Yen answered with a laugh.

"Don't you worry, there's nothing the matter with me."

"You're not so young anymore and you have high blood pressure. You mustn't strain yourself. Whatever you do be sure to take care of yourself."

Her words caught in her throat. However cheerful Li Yen might be at the moment, she could never be rid of the shadow that hovered over them. She had felt its presence for the last two years, and from time to time it would strike her with fear. Now, it brought pain and sorrow to her wrinkled face.

"What if you should get sick? Both your children are far away: one north in the mountains of Heilungchiang, one south on a farm in Hsi-shuang Ban-na. What would become of me, just an old woman?"

"How could that ever happen?" protested Li Yen. "A doctor half my life and I don't even know how to take care of myself? Don't talk such nonsense! It's time for me to go to the hospital."

Li Yen added some words of comfort to try to cheer her up, then headed on downstairs. She followed him down and stood at the gate, watching him go. Her eyes were fastened on his retreating figure: stooped back and graying hair. Li Yen kept turning around, waving at her to go back upstairs, but for some reason, she wouldn't go. She stood there by the street as if in a daze. When Li Yen reached the corner and turned to look back again, his wife was still standing there like a wooden figure, sighing soundlessly.

But Li Yen was feeling unusually elated today. As he went on his way to the hospital his mind was engrossed in a treatment plan that would cure the foreign woman. When he reached the hospital he went straight to the office of the Revolutionary Committee to report to Supervisor T'ang and to tell him his treatment plan. Supervisor T'ang listened to him nodding his head with satisfaction.

"Good, very good. Should any more problems arise with our patient, I'll come to you again."

Li Yen felt he had done the right thing. He was very happy. A proper diagnosis had been made. Now all that was needed was to place the foreign woman under intensive care in a special room in the hospital and she'd recover in no time. The thought so pleased Li Yen that he smiled with childlike glee.

This was the way he had been all the years of his practice. Whenever he had met with a difficult case, it would be as if he himself had come down with something. The worried expression would never leave his face; he'd lose his appetite and become restless, unable to sit still. Needless to say, he was even worse when a patient was in critical condition. He'd stay with the patient night and day, even refusing to go home. But once his patient was better, the joy that Li Yen felt was tremendous, surpassing that of the patient's own family. Before the Cultural Revolution, not one of his patients could have claimed that he was not conscientious. No one had anything but praise for him.

In his happiness, the queasy feeling he had felt earlier was gone. He went straight back to the lavatory over in the medical building, got out a broom, a mop and a bucket of water, and began to clean the floors in the sickrooms. The patients were secretly happy to see the sunny expression on his face. They all looked at him with quiet smiles.

A rush of thoughts came to Li Yen as he mopped. In what ways could he assist in curing the foreign visitor's wife? After his liberation, how would he help the younger doctors to compensate for their lack of bedside experience so that they could master the ability to diagnose quickly and treat patients with greater competence? As his mind soared to even higher flights of fantasy, Nurse Chang came up to him.

"Li Yen, Director Chu wants you!" she said.

She stood in the doorway waiting. Li Yen hastily put his mop and bucket out in the corridor and followed her to the Office of Internal Medicine.

Deputy Director Chu sat behind his desk with a cigarette in his hand. Near him sat Nurse Li and the new director of the Department, Dr. Hu, who had been appointed the year before the Cultural Revolution—just after graduating from medical school.

Li Yen stood at the door and asked cautiously, “Director Chu, you wanted to see me?”

Deputy D.irector Chu ignored Li Yen as he smoked his cigarette. He smoked until the cigarette was about to burn his fingers, took one last sharp puff, spat the butt on the floor and grounded it with his foot. He raised his head and with a cold stare, signaled Li Yen to enter.

Li Yen went in and stood before Deputy Director Chu. His head drooped instinctively; he stood rigid as a pole. Deputy Director Chu glared at him with a livid look:

“Li Yen, when you paid your visit today, we would like to hear you tell us what you were thinking about in front of the foreigners?”

Li Yen couldn’t make head nor tail out of this. He looked about furtively and noticed Nurse Li had a notebook and was taking notes. There was a sneer on Dr. Hu’s face as he looked over mockingly.

Nurse Chang sat in front of Deputy Director Chu with pursed lips, her face full of anger. Something was obviously wrong but Li Yen couldn’t figure out what it could be. All he could do was answer frankly.

“At the time, my whole mind was on making an accurate diagnosis of the foreigner’s illness so as not to disgrace my country—I thought of nothing else except that.”

Dr. Hu cocked his head and raised his eyebrows. He spoke in a sarcastic tone, saying:

“Your loyalty to the fatherland is extremely admirable.”

Nurse Chang bolted up in anger and said accusingly:

“Old Li, your attitude is insincere.”

Deputy Director Chu started to speak, enunciating slowly and placing heavy emphasis on every word.

“Are you going to pour it all out like a bottle or are you a tube that has to be squeezed? Think it over carefully, which attitude would be best for you to take.”

“I really wasn’t thinking of anything else,” Li Yen protested. He felt they were being unjust and rushed to defend himself. “I was only thinking about how the foreigner ought to be treated—”

“Damn you, do you think you can fool us?!”

Nurse Chang slammed her fist on the desk and shouted at him.

“You were pouring out your grievances to the foreigner, thinking you could get his sympathy! You blamed the Cultural Revolution for having lost your office. You spoke resentingly about your re-education. Do you pretend to deny that?”

Dr. Hu joined her in pounding on the desk in anger, saying:

“You told the foreigner that it was because we made the wrong diagnosis that his wife’s recovery was delayed. Why? What were your motives? A little thing such as that and you used it to slander and attack the Great Cultural Revolution! A rattle snake could not be more poisonous!”

Li Yen felt as if he had been struck on the head, as if they had thrown a bucket of cold water over him. A chill rose from his heart and spread over his entire body. He was speechless and stood like an idiot.

“Speak up! Speak up! Do you think you can hoodwink the revolutionary masses and get away with it by acting dumb, pretending you’ve gone insane? You sly old fox!”

Nurse Li jabbed her pen at Li Yen’s nose, trying to make him confess.

Li Yen woke from his fear and turned his eyes to Deputy Director Chu, saying:

“The diagnosis was wrong and that is the truth. But I never told that to the foreign visitor. I only mentioned it to Deputy Director Chu.”

“Do you persist in telling us lies?”

“Li Yen, tell the truth.”

“You are fighting a losing battle, you’re signing your death warrant.”

Nurse Chang, Nurse Li and Dr. Hu all screamed at him at once. Li Yen took one look at them, opened his mouth and started to speak, then changed his mind. Experience had told him that it was useless to say anything, even if he had a thousand good reasons. He decided it was better to retreat into silence and let them yell at him.

Deputy Director Chu had lit up another cigarette and was puffing away madly as if only that restrained him. It seemed like he wanted to make it clear that he stood on a different level from the others, that he was a leader, a man of policy, guided by the will of the Party and not his own personal emotions.

“Li Yen, you know and we know all the filthy lies that you told to the foreigner. You know very well what you were thinking about, and we can figure it out. The Party has always been lenient towards those who confess, and strict with those who resist. I'm sure you are acquainted with that fact. Whatever the crime, as long as one confesses, we act leniently. We deal with the concrete circumstances and don't delve into the past. Even those who deserve death or imprisonment can be pardoned. You have, of course, already studied the experiences of our six factories and two schools here in Peking. Go and think it over, and after work, put it into the hands of the people. I've shown you the paths open to you; now it's up to you to decide which one you will take."

As if struck by a thunderbolt out of a clear blue sky, Li Yen stumbled out of the office on numbed legs and returned to the lavatory. He was terrified, but the fear slowly gave way to confusion.

He had never thought his good intentions would sow such disaster. "Put it into the hands of the people." That meant he would have to go onstage for a struggle session right after work. Forcing himself to calm down, he tried to remember all that had happened that morning. There simply wasn't anything he had said that was wrong. If anything, his one mistake was not to have kept his mouth shut and let that embarrassing scene drag on with that foreigner continuing to ridicule and insult him.

The more he considered it all, the less it made sense and the more unjust it all seemed. But then he remembered Supervisor T'ang. He had to go find him, he would understand. Supervisor T'ang was unbiased, a man who stood firmly on Party principles.

He raced out of the lavatory. For a moment, everything turned black and he almost fell. That session had made him feel as if he had been physically beaten and his head was reeling. He reached for the wall to support himself and leaned against it. The corridor rocked from side to side like a ship at sea. The floor seemed to slip away under his feet as he staggered over to the stairs. Grasping the railing he slowly went down the steps, one by one. But halfway down, he was gasping for breath and couldn't go any further.

Li Yen stood on the platform at the curve of the stairs where there was a large window. He reached over to grasp the two sides of the window frame and propped himself up to catch his breath. Looking out he saw a group of people outside the office of the Revolutionary Committee putting up huge posters on the wall. Steadying himself, he was able to read what was written on one of them.

"Stand up with resolution and bring down the anti-revolutionary Li Yen."

Li Yen was paralyzed with fear. In the past, he had been accused of being a reactionary, then somehow he had become an evil remnant of the Kuomintang. Now he was suddenly an anti-revolutionary. Li Yen stood woodenly by the window. A hundred thoughts passed through his head, but not one could explain what was happening to him. What on earth was the Cultural Revolution aiming for? Why were they mounting such a campaign against him, each charge more ferocious than the last? He peered at the people outside as if the answer could be found in their bustling movements.

Suddenly he saw Supervisor T'ang. He looked again in amazement to see if he wasn't mistaken. Yes, it was Supervisor T'ang. He was holding up a large printed exclamation mark. He was gluing it to the wall that Deputy Director Chu had smeared with paste. On the wall was a poster reading:

Death and destruction to Li Yen if he does not surrender!

Li Yen's eyes blurred. His spirit was crushed to see this last pillar crumble, the last glimmer of hope extinguished. He stood hopeless on the steps, unable to decide whether to continue down or go back up. His heart felt like a potful of boiling water; all the events of the past which had settled down to the bottom now came bubbling back up again.

For seventeen years he had diligently served the sick, yet had been condemned as an academic capitalist reactionary. He had never in his life joined any party, but had been accused of being a Kuomintang remnant. Forced to write an endless number of confessions, he had been attacked to the point of exhaustion, never permitted to sleep. His heart wrenched at the thought of all he had been through. During the anti-Japanese Resistance, he had left France without completing his studies to rush home and fight on the front line. On the eve of liberation, he had followed the rest and had joined the revolution. And now, he was cursed as a scum of the Kuomintang, as a vile traitor …

The memories all came back to Li Yen. How unjust the world was! His chest burned like fire.

"Let them do what they will. I am not guilty!"

Li Yen turned from the window to go back up. The stairwell and the ceiling above rocked from side to side.

After a few steps he reached hurriedly for the railing; the entire building began to revolve. He felt a floating sensation; he was being lifted up, flying …

A patient saw him stagger and fall down the stairs.

“Something’s wrong!" he shouted. “Someone come quick!”

A group of men in white coats came rushing over. Other patients had also heard the cry and came running from their rooms. They looked below and saw Li Yen lying head down at the bottom of the stairs, saliva running from the corner of his mouth. Some of them went down and carried him back up. They laid him down on the floor of the corridor.

A middle-aged doctor knelt down, quickly loosened Li Yen’s clothes, and put a stethoscope to his chest. His face darkened. Putting aside his stethoscope he reached over and opened Li Yen’s eyelids. The light was gone from his eyes. The doctor rearranged Li Yen’s clothes, slowly rebuttoning the shirt.

Nurse Chang was looking at the doctor with suspicion in her eyes.

“Do you think he committed suicide out of guilt?”

The doctor stood up and spoke in a cold voice.

“He had high blood pressure. Most likely it was a cerebrovascular accident.”

He looked down again at Li Yen for a moment, then turned and walked away without another word. The other doctors quietly followed him.

The patients went silently back to their rooms. Some wiped tears from their eyes with the sleeves of their pajamas.

The sun set and the corridor grew dark. The hospital was unusually quiet. The only sound was the loudspeaker on the wu-t’ung tree outside.

“Urgent! This is urgent! The struggle session scheduled for six o’clock has been postponed.”

73.115 The Hole\fn{by Chang Jhy-chang (1940-)} Peking, China (M) 8

Even P’an Man-kuei himself could not recall clearly when his habit of drinking alone had begun. He remembered only that in his boyhood he had been afraid of the pungent taste of liquor, and that the drunken scenes he had witnessed had disgusted him. At New Year’s time and during other holidays, as well as at poi-pais, the Taiwanese worship festivals, there were always a good many guests who, along with his father, would drink until they were red in the face. Their finger-guessing games and their shouting would continue late into the night until they finally stumbled off a few at a time to their own homes. They would leave behind them a floor cluttered with chicken bones and shrimp shells.

On each occasion P’an Man-kuei’s two elder brothers would scramble up onto the tables in order to scrounge a few pieces of boiled meat left behind by the guests and, while they were at it, drained the glasses of the few drops of wine that remained. P’an Man-kuei could never win out over his brothers, so he didn’t even try. He would simply wait until the two of them had left, then sneak up onto the tables to look for crumbs of meat that they had missed. But he would not sop up the dregs of wine.

Yes, from the time they were small, his brothers were just like his papa: big eaters, heavy sleepers, coarse and fearless, and knew how to drink. All of this was in direct opposition to the mild disposition of P’an Man-kuei. Their papa seemed to favor the elder brothers because of their ability to drink. Often, during slack seasons on the farm, he would take his three sons out into the front yard, where he would lay out the wine bottles, cups, and some peanuts, and, as they drank, tell them stories of selling herb medicines in the wilds of the mountains.

Now although P’an Man-kuei liked to eat the snacks, he hadn’t the nerve to drink any of the wine, so he just stood off in the distance. Once in a while his father would call him over and teasingly force him to take a drink, but he would keep his mouth tightly shut and angrily run even further off, passing up not only the snacks, but the stories as well. At such times his father would laugh at him for being too eccentric and too soft, and would chide him for being no match for his elder brothers—in other words, a sissy.

Papa had been dead now for eleven or twelve years, and Mother had remarried, to a cabbie. Eldest Brother was very accomplished in the martial arts, traveling the year round throughout the world with an acrobatic troupe, demonstrating his manly skills. He had made a great deal of money. The other brother used his brain and his glib tongue to sell pharmaceutical products. In a letter sent the previous week he had written about his purchase of a 1973 Mazda.

And what about P’an Man-kuei? He had spent two years in a trade school before dropping out, and was now employed in the composition room of a newspaper, setting type. His wages were only slightly over three thousand Taiwan dollars a month. Staring him in the face every night were rows of cold, gray lead type; he spent the night busily engaged in this tedious work.

"When will I finally be able to make some real money and live an interesting life like my brothers?"

One day, after drinking more heavily than usual, P'an Man-kuei had dreamt that all those rows of lead type had turned into gold nuggets, all gleaming brightly and neatly stacked in the type tray. Excitedly, he had picked them, and picked them. Covered with sweat and exhausted, he had awakened somehow, only to find that he was sleeping, as always, in his steamy, oppressive room, his back soaked with sweat.

Although P'an Man-kuei read no deep meaning into this dream, still he was reminded of it every time he drank to relieve his boredom. Worn out by his work every evening and bored by the tedium of his daylight hours, he had begun to take his pleasure in drink, and this gradually became a habit.

After pouring himself another glass of rice wine, P'an Man-kuei picked up a couple of slices of dried squid and began chewing on them. He had lived in this forty-tatami third-floor apartment nearly a year, and he had no thoughts of moving. First of all, it was near the newspaper office, so on rainy days he had only to take his umbrella and, leaving his bicycle at home, could walk to work in fifteen minutes. Secondly, the rent wasn't too high; the place cost twenty-four hundred a month, and since he shared it with two college students—each of the three had his own bedroom—it came to eight hundred dollars apiece. The two students were away at school during the day, leaving the three bedrooms and the living room exclusively to P'an Man-kuei. He could drink, eat some hoodles, or simply lie on the run-down sofa that belonged to the landlord and think about anything and everything, without anyone around to bother him.

As for the two college students, P'an Man-kuei considered them his best friends. That was primarily because he had no others: most of his classmates had done far better than he, so naturally he could not go to see them; the fellows who worked with him in the composition room were generally much older than he, and they had little to say to one another. But his two roommates were about his age, and although their educational backgrounds were different, they too were from rural southern Taiwan, so he sometimes had friendly chats with them.

When they weren't chewing the fat they played chess, and educational background played no role in chess—the person with the sharpest mind came out on top. P'an Man-kuei was a thinker—he liked to use his mind—so he was pretty good at chess. They often had matches among the three of them, and even though he lost once in a while, most of the time the two college students took turns challenging P'an Man-kuei. This gave him a sense of pride. Winning or losing at chess was of no great importance, but the fact that college students could not best him was a source of satisfaction.

Tap, tap, tap. His train of thoughts was broken by a familiar sound coming down the staircase. He quickly put down his glass of wine and walked over to the door, where he bent down slightly and put his eye right up to the small peephole in the middle of the door. He looked out through the small inset of glass.

The sound coming down the staircase was now joined by the familiar sight of those brown slippers and, above them, a pair of sparkling, sensual calves. Today, instead of the blue skirt of her school uniform, she was wearing a short mini-skirt, the sight of which caused something of an extraordinary sensation in P'an Man-kuei. When the calves reached the final step leading to the third floor they turned nimbly and proceeded on down to the second floor.

In the brief ten seconds that P'an Man-kuei had been pressed up against the door, a slight soreness had already begun to develop in his nose. He stretched a bit, never taking his eye from the peep-hole in the door.

"In just a moment she'll come walking back upstairs with the evening paper. At the most one minute, certainly no more than two," P'an Man-kuei thought to himself with anticipation.

Living on the fourth floor directly above him was a middle-aged couple; the girl with the lovely calves who had just walked downstairs was their only child. She was a night-school student at one of the girls' high schools. P'an Man-kuei had never once greeted the couple, even though he had lived here for nearly a year, but still he harbored good feelings towards their daughter. She was not a beautiful girl, but she had good-looking calves, especially when viewed through the peep-hole. This sight produced wild and fanciful thoughts in him and a vague sense of fulfilment. From the very beginning he had fallen in love with them, or, more accurately, was infatuated with them.

P'an Man-kuei had never been close to any women, let alone had a girlfriend. There was just the one time, when he was still a student at the trade school, that he had been taken to a nightclub by his second brother, who had just gone into business. There he had been faced with a bevy of heavily made-up, voluptuous women. Foolishly following the lead of his brother and a good friend of his in some heavy drinking, he had engaged in a good deal of caressing and fondling right there at the table. He still recalled how, after leaving the nightclub in the early-morning hours, he had vomited on the street, after which he had been taken to his brother's place.

Looking back on the incident, it now seemed both stimulating and enjoyable, and it had had two effects on his thinking: first, any man who does not know how to hold his liquor is good for nothing; and, second, he just had to make some money some day, for that was the only way to enjoy the good life. But how was he to do that? Could he make any money at his present job as a type-setter? The lead type turning into gold nuggets had been only a dream; it could never happen in real life.

Tap, tap, tap.

Finally the pair of calves made their way back upstairs, and P'an Man-kuei quickly pressed his nose back up against the door. Since the girl was now going upstairs and was reading the newspaper in her hands as she walked, the progress of the calves was slower than it had been a few moments earlier. Possibly because something in the newspaper had caught her interest, she surprised him by stopping briefly at the third-floor landing to read the paper.

From his vantage point on this side of the door, P'an Man-kuei experienced pangs of anger over the fact that all he could see through his peephole was the newspaper and eight fingers; nothing else was within range of his sight.

TRUNK-MURDER DISMEMBERMENT CASE SOLVED:
POLICE STEP UP EFFORTS TO LOCATE HUANG CHEN-HSIUNG.

P'an Man-kuei had no interest whatsoever in this, and only wished that he could see right through the newspaper.

Finally the newspaper was folded back up, and the brown slippers, the mini-skirt, and, especially, the pair of shapely calves came back into view as they headed up to the fourth floor, one step at a time.

P'an Man-kuei liked most of all to watch the girl climb up to the fourth floor, particularly when she was wearing a skirt and he was about half-drunk. The pity was that after reaching the sixth step on the stairs she moved completely out of view. Even though his peep-hole was fitted with a convex bubble, which produced a wide field of vision, the range was still limited to the first six steps of the stairs. But even with this knowledge, P'an Man-kuei never once failed to press up as close as possible to the door and cock his head in hopes of being able to see two more steps. Naturally, he was disappointed each and every time.

When he heard the sounds of the door upstairs first open then close, and the stillness had returned, he disappointedly walked over to the broken-down sofa and sat down.

P'an Man-kuei had never entertained the thought of making the girl's acquaintance or passing the time of day with her. Neither did he have the courage to open the door and have an unobstructed look at her. All he would do was make every effort to take advantage of the ten or twenty seconds each time she walked up or down the stairs; other than that, there were the few glimpses of her back that he had from his third-story balcony as she walked to school in the evenings.

As he poured the last drops of wine from the bottle into his glass he unmindfully looked up at the peep-hole in the door.

That peep-hole was a remarkable thing: through it the inside and the outside of the apartment were connected, but it was a one-way connection; from inside one could clearly see everything that was going on outside, but from the outside looking in, nothing could be seen. He had tried it himself: leaving the inside light on, all he had been able to see from the outside when he looked in was a brightness inside the room. It was the same effect as when he had held a marble up close to his eye as a child and looked through it at a lighted lamp. Because of this, the person inside the room could be as bold as he wanted and look at whatever he desired without any fear. And, because of this, P'an Man-kuei had gotten into the habit of looking through his peephole when he had nothing else to do. Just when this habit of his had begun, he could not recall. Like his habit of drinking, in the final analysis, it was something that had started after he had begun working at the newspaper office setting type and after renting this apartment.

In addition to spying on the girl student from upstairs, he watched everything else that appeared before his door. There was another couple who lived on the fourth floor with their five children and were constantly shouting and making an uproar; but they were of no interest whatsoever to P'an Man-kuei.

The family that lived directly opposite him on the third floor was composed of a young childless couple and an older woman. Upon moving in a month ago they had brought with them two full truckloads of furniture. It had taken them nearly an entire afternoon to move all of their belongings in, an afternoon that had found P'an Mankuei standing behind his door the entire time. As a result, he had been bothered by sore eyes and a stiffness in his lower back as he set type that night at the newspaper office.

On the day the people across from him moved in, P'an Man-kuei had slept till noon when the loud commotion of the movers had awakened him. Out of curiosity, he had gone over to look through his peep-hole before even getting dressed.

He could see two burly moving men shouting and clamoring as they carried in a large, shiny, white refrigerator. Another mover was holding the door open and directing the other two so that they wouldn't damage the refrigerator. After the refrigerator had been lugged inside, a shapely young woman in jeans, carrying a red cosmetic case in one hand and several women's fur coats and wool overcoats in the other, entered the apartment across from him. She put the clothes and the cosmetic case down off to the side atop what was probably a table or chair—it was out of his line of sight—then gave orders to the movers to carry the refrigerator into one of the inner rooms—most likely the dining room or kitchen. Then the four of them came out in single file and headed back downstairs.

At that moment P'an Man-kuei spotted something small and shiny on the floor in front of him. Since he was seeing it through the bubble-shaped lens of his peephole, his field of vision was quite broad, and the small bright object on the floor looked even smaller by comparison. In fact, all that he could see was a glistening little doodad, which just happened to be located at the base of the bannister on his side. For that reason, neither the movers nor the young woman were aware of its presence there. He guessed that it must be something like an earring that had fallen from the load of clothing she was carrying or from her ear.

He instinctively made to open the door to go out, pick the thing up, and return it to them, but just then he heard someone coming up the stairs. He stopped where he was and looked out once again through the peephole, where he saw a young man carrying an armload of suits up the stairs. He was tall and slim like P'an Man-kuei, and about the same age, but his attire was far more stylish than P'an Man-kuei's. He was wearing a handsome, fashionable dark blue silk pull-over shirt atop a pair of sporty, loose-fitting slacks that the foreign men on TV shows so like to wear. He gave every appearance of a young man who has found success in his career and special skills in his studies. Every encounter with someone like this engendered contradictory feelings of envy and hostility in P'an Man-kuei. That was because people like this had more money than he and were more successful than he. But what does it mean to buy success? It's just a matter of luck.

"P'an Te-huei, don't come downstairs just now; the movers are bringing the TV set up."

Their name is also P'an? So this wealthy young man upon whom fortune has smiled is also named P'an?

P'an Man-kuei gave up his thought of a few moments before to return the object to them; he decided to wait until they had finished moving in before making up his mind what to do. Maybe he wouldn't return it to them at all.

The P'an family had quite a few possessions: there was a lot of beautiful furniture, two rolled-up objects that looked to be carpets, and, the last thing to be brought up, a very heavy small strongbox. P'an Man-kuei was puzzled by all of this: they seemed to be a quite well-off family, one that should, by rights, be living in a home with a yard in the suburbs, or at least in a large apartment. So why would they be willing to crowd themselves into this small third-floor apartment?

As he was thinking these thoughts he could see the four moving men standing in the doorway discussing their wages with the young man and his wife. The movers were reasoning that because of the quantity of things they had moved and the fact that they had had to climb to the third floor, there should be an extra hundred Taiwan dollars for each truck and a tip of a hundred Taiwan dollars for each of the men—altogether an additional six-hundred Taiwan dollars. The arguments of the young man and his wife were no match for the movers, and ultimately she reached into her big handbag and took out a thick wad of bills. She first counted out the amount originally agreed upon, then handed the movers six additional hundred-dollar notes, after which she sent the men away.

P'an Man-kuei witnessed the transaction, and in his mind he reckoned that the outlay of such a large quantity of money probably meant nothing to them, but if that had been his money, just think how many bottles of wine he could have bought to while away how many afternoons!

After the movers had departed and the door opposite him was closed, the shiny little object still lay in the same place on the floor. P'an Man-kuei waited for a moment, then opened his door very gently, walked out into the corridor, bent over, and picked the thing up.

It was a diamond ring! Earlier, from his vantage point on the other side of the peep- hole, he had tried to guess just what that shiny object was. Maybe it was just a sliver of broken glass, or one of the young woman's copper earrings, or, more valuable than these, possibly a gem of some kind or a gold ring; if not, it might be a diamond.

Now here it was, much to his surprise, a diamond ring! His mouth parted in a happy grin, his heart pounded rapidly; it was as though he had just won the grand prize in the national lottery. He gripped the diamond ring tightly, walked back into his room, closed and locked the door. Then he went into his bedroom, where he turned on the light and looked closely and wide-eyed at the ring even more avidly than when he spied on the young student's calves through his peep-hole.

The setting of the ring was made of gold, the diamond in it was the size of a soybean, or maybe even larger. Beneath the light it glowed with a multicolored luster, and P'an Man-kuei was a bit frightened to be holding it in his hand.

"How many carats is it? How much is a carat worth? Maybe ten or twenty thousand? No, more than that, for sure. Maybe forty or fifty thousand; even a hundred or two-hundred thousand is possible …"

Never in his life had P'an Man-kuei been so close to anything like this, so it was only natural that he could not estimate its value.

What should he do now? Take the impoverished look he had about him, did he give the impression of one who should be in possession of an expensive thing like this? What would he do if his neighbor reported the loss to the authorities, and the jewelry store made a phone call to the police?

Should he pawn it? Absolutely not; pawnbrokers eat you alive! The year before, when he was looking for work in Taipei, he had taken an old watch his stepfather had given him into a pawnshop, and with all his cajoling, had gotten a mere 140 Taiwan dollars.

Tuck it away for the time being and see what happens. Having something like this around was just like having a gambling stash. A feeling of secure confidence and light-heartedness settled upon him. Perhaps this was just the break he needed to become a rich man and find himself a girl friend. Couldn't he open up the heart of someone on the strength of this diamond ring alone?

Where to hide it? The living room's no good, for sure, since we all use it. As for the bedroom, all it had was a bed, a table, a chair, and a vinyl wardrobe—nothing that could be locked, including, for that matter, the bedroom door itself.

Suddenly he thought of the pair of rainboots beneath the bed. Every time it rained he wore these boots home, feeling very embarrassed about them because of the terrible odor they produced. At first the two students who shared his apartment had been embarrassed to say anything about them, but later, once they had gotten to know each other, not only had they mentioned the matter to him, on one occasion they had even kidded him about it.

That's the right place, in the pair of rainboots. No one would willingly touch those boots; even if there were a thief in the room, he wouldn't pay the slightest attention to those rainboots. Who would ever think that inside the smelliest objects in the room was hidden a valuable treasure?

As P'an Man-kuei sat on his broken-down sofa deep in thought, he could not resist the impulse to go once more into his bedroom, take his rainboots out from under the bed, reach in and remove the plastic bag, open it and carefully scrutinize the diamond ring. How many times had he done this very same thing during the last month? Small though it was, each and every time that he looked at it, fantastic visions and a great many hopes filled his mind; how wonderful it would be, he felt, if he could convert this diamond ring into cold, hard cash. P'an Man-kuei had observed no signs of activity on the part of the P'an family across the hall over the past month. All he had noticed was the nattily dressed man and beautifully decked-out young woman leaving together on their way to work. Once in a while they would have a few guests over, all of whom looked like businessmen. Not only had the police never been by, the facial expressions on the man, his wife, and the old woman indicated that they were not even aware that one of their valuable possessions was missing. Could they possibly be so well-heeled that they didn't even care?

Denied the results he anticipated, his nature of rejoicing in others' calamities remained unsatisfied. P'an Man-kuei was somewhat disappointed; in fact, he was even a little angry.

The quieter things became, the more restless he grew, until he could barely contain himself. It got so bad on occasion that he was nearly driven to taking the diamond ring and stealthily slipping it underneath the P'an's door and forgetting the whole affair. Naturally, he never actually followed through on this. As time went on, the excitement over the whole matter gradually began to fade, and P'an Man-kuei found this diamond ring that was rendered useless somewhat disgusting.

His uneasy mood gradually began to seriously affect his life; he lost his taste for taking the diamond ring out of his rainboot and looking it over, and even his interest in ogling the calves of the young girl student was not as intense as it had been. He had, in fact, gotten into the routine of morosely going over to his peep-hole and waiting for some activity in the apartment across the hall. In addition, his capacity for alcohol had increased. Where previously a bottle of rice wine had lasted him two or three days, now he finished off a bottle in one sitting. He was unaware of the changes taking place in his life until the day of that terrifying incident.

*

It all happened at a little after two o'clock on a rainy afternoon. P'an Man-kuei was in his kitchen preparing some noodles, when he heard the doorbell ring at his neighbors, the P'an's. Instinctively he put down his bowl, walked over to the door and put his eye to the peephole. He could see the backs of two men who were waiting for someone to open the door.

The door opened, exposing part of the old woman's face. The two men burst through the door, the force of their actions knocking the old woman to the floor. One of the men slammed the door shut behind him, but in the instant before he did so, P'an Man-kuei thought that he saw the other man in the act of drawing a knife.

P'an Man-kuei was struck dumb with terror. In his fright, his legs felt unsteady, his mind became a complete blank, or as if filled to overflowing with something. He did not know what to do. He remained in this state for some time, before finally coming to his senses. This was not a time when young Mr. P'an or his wife could be expected to return home. The two men, naturally, would be doing just what they pleased. But what about the old woman? He did not know what was happening behind the closed door.

He did not have the courage to open the door and slip downstairs to call the police, for he was afraid that just as he stepped out the door he might run into the two men. Neither did he dare go out onto the balcony and yell for help, for if, instead of being heard by his neighbors, his shouts attracted the attention of the two men, he'd be in a real fix. He didn't even dare abandon his spot behind the door and hide in his room, for he depended upon the view through his peephole to assure himself that he had not drawn the men's attention and could rest easy on that score. And so he remained plastered against the door, staring hard through the peep-hole without so much as blinking. He saw only a quiet, deserted hallway that gave the appearance that nothing was amiss.

The door opened abruptly as one of the men stuck out his head and looked up and down the corridor. At that moment P'an Man-kuei held his breath and shut his eyes, unwilling to look; he was hoping that by not seeing the man's face, afterwards he could act as though nothing at all had happened. But he couldn't bring himself to close his eyes tightly, for what would he do on the chance that the two men came and rapped on his door? So he narrowed his eyes to fine slits and watched what was going on through a sort of haze.

He could see two men emerge quickly from the apartment, one of them carrying a strongbox. They closed the door behind them and took off down the stairs. This was followed by the sound of an automobile starting up and driving away. Strangely enough, the terror P'an Man-kuei had been experiencing left as quickly as it had come once the car drove away.

Just then he detected the odor of gas, which brought him immediately to his senses. He ran to the kitchen, where the water in the pot of noodles he had been preparing had bubbled over and put out the flame; after turning off the stove, he hastily opened the kitchen and living room windows, then the front door.

At a glance he could tell that the door to the P'an's apartment had not closed securely. Listening intently, he could not detect any sounds from within, so he screwed up his courage and gingerly opened the door with his foot. The room was on the dark side, owing to the fact that the living room drapes had been pulled shut. The old woman, who had been tied securely to the sofa, was struggling to get free. She had been gagged and blindfolded, and seemed unaware that she was not alone in the room.

P'an Man-kuei had been curious about the P'an family from the very beginning, so he gingerly took a few more steps into the room. The bedroom was a shambles: the closet doors yawned open, the contents of suitcases and dresser drawers had been dumped out onto the bed, and the floor was strewn with worthless objects like women's bracelets and lipsticks. Leaving all of this untouched, he was about to walk over and free the old woman when his foot kicked at some object on the floor; looking down, he discovered that it was a man's brown wallet.

Driven by his curiosity, P'an Man-kuei bent over and picked it up. Inside it he discovered a wad of folded bills; it had apparently been overlooked by the thieves in their haste. His first impulse was to toss it back onto the floor, but the feel of the bills in his hand was too much for him, and he began to count them. There was the equivalent of $25 or $30 in Taiwan currency folded around three one-hundred-dollar bills in American currency.

This threw a fright into P'an Man-kuei.

"Should I take it? It wouldn't be as though I stole it. Besides, no one is watching, and even if the case is broken, the guilt will fall on the two thieves. I'd be crazy not to take it!"

He made his decision: taking the bills out of the wallet, he stuffed them into his pocket, threw the empty wallet away, then walked stealthily across the living room and into his own apartment, closing the door behind him.

He was in a state of total agitation the entire afternoon. Every time he looked out through his peephole, he was greeted by an unchanging deathly stillness all around the landing. He was tempted to go across and release the old woman, but, laden with a guilty conscience, he couldn't muster up the courage. So he made up his mind to go out and take a long walk to get away from the whole scene.

Outside the rain had stopped. But since there was still water on the ground, he took out his rainboots and removed the plastic bag that held the diamond ring. Unable to think of a good place to hide it, he thrust it into his pants pocket. After putting on the rainboots, he took a look out through his peephole and, seeing that there was no activity in the corridor, opened the door and headed downstairs.

P'an Man-kuei walked the streets aimlessly for a while until the sky grew dark and he grew hungry; he went into a small restaurant and sat down. Emboldened by the wad of bills in his pocket, and feeling somewhat extravagant, he ordered a plate of fried pork liver and one of boiled cuttlefish. Then he ordered a bottle of spicy millet wine and settled back to enjoy these luxuries.

Millet wine packs a great deal more punch than rice wine, and before he had even finished the small bottle he was feeling a little giddy. Sitting there looking at the food and wine before him and at the guests at neighboring tables as they ate and drank, he was reminded of the pai-pais of his childhood: how he hadn't had the courage to scramble up onto the tables with his two elder brothers to scavenge for drops of wine and morsels of food. Now the three of them had gone their own ways. His two brothers hadn't fared badly; they were both well established in their careers, while he was here drowning his sorrows in wine.

It was too bad that his papa was no longer alive, for if he could see him now, having finally learned how to drink (learned too well, for that matter), it would be only logical to expect that he would praise him as he had the elder boys in the past.

A peal of thunder brought P'an Man-kuei abruptly out of his reveries. He got up, paid his bill, and headed back home. As he neared the entrance to the lane a sudden rain-shower began to fall, the raindrops as large as soybeans. He broke into a run, heading for the apartment building. Even though the lane was only a few dozen meters long, by the time he reached the entrance his coat was soaked through and the water was streaming down from his hair, dripping past his eyebrows and over his eyelids. He was a mess as he climbed the stairs.

Two cars were parked at the foot of the stairs, bright red cars with the identifying marks of police vehicles. But P'an Man-kuei hadn't noticed them. When he reached the third floor he suddenly spotted bright lights coming from the P'an apartment across the hall. Two khaki-uniformed policemen were having a discussion about something with Mr. and Mrs. P'an.

P'an Man-kuei was now in a real dilemma and was frightened, but he quickly decided to force himself to open the door of his own apartment as if nothing were wrong. He was called to a halt by one of the policemen.

"Excuse me, are you Mr. P'an Man-kuei?"

P'an Man-kuei was speechless; his heart was pounding like a drum. He felt blood rush into his face, already flushed from the effects of the wine, and his blood vessels seemed about to burst. Water continued to drip from his wet hair, and all of this made him terribly ill at ease. Forcibly suppressing the fear inside him, he answered:

"Yes, yes I am."

"There was a robbery here this afternoon. We've investigated the incident throughout the building; I wonder if you heard anything unusual this afternoon?"

"N … no."

So the police were still in the dark. Breathing somewhat easier with this discovery, P'an Man-kuei took his handkerchief out of his pocket to wipe the water off his face.

Plunk!

A transparent plastic bag came out with the handkerchief and fell to the floor. The light from the apartment illuminated the shiny diamond ring inside. Before he could pick it up, the policeman had already retrieved it and was holding it in his hand. He casually handed it back to P'an Man.-kuei, asking as he did:

"Yours?"

"Yes!" Then he corrected himself: "Oh, no, it's … it's Mrs. P'an's. I saw her drop it the other day and I … I was going to return it to her," he said, stammering nervously as the blood once again rushed to his head.

Surprise showed on the faces of both Mr. P'an and his wife, but they said nothing. With this turn of events, the policeman sensed that he was getting closer to the truth. He turned and asked Mrs. P'an:

"Is it yours? When did you lose it? Did you include it in the list of things taken?"

"It's mine, all right, but I don't know when I lost it. Maybe it was this afternoon, but it might have been some time ago. I didn't include it in the list, because it's worthless—it's an imitation."

An imitation! An imitation! An imitation diamond ring! I've been hoarding an imitation diamond ring for over a month! And now it's been discovered! P'an Man-kuei, feeling light-headed, reached out to catch hold of the bannister to steady himself, but his wrist was grabbed by the policeman.

"Mr. P'an, please come with us to the stationhouse. There are a few questions we want to ask you, and we'll want to take your fingerprints."

Fingerprints? Fingerprints?

My God, the brown wallet!

That's right! The man's wallet!

That wallet, which is even more damning than the diamond ring!

"I, I … I didn't steal anything, I didn't … I just went in … I didn't steal anything … honestly, I didn't …"

P'an Man-kuei wanted badly to confess to something, but he was too flustered; his lips trembled, his teeth chattered, and he merely mumbled incoherently. Partly because his legs felt rubbery, and partly because he wanted to express something—anything—he finally began to sink slowly to his knees, but was stopped by the policeman, who half-supported, half-restrained him.

"Don't be frightened. We'll straighten out this whole matter at the stationhouse."

As they made their way downstairs, P'an Man-kuei sensed that his apartment door was open and that the two college students were standing there in a state of shock. Instead of raising his head to look at them, he lowered it and walked quickly downstairs in the company of the policemen.

His thoughts turned to the money in his pocket: the Taiwan currency didn't amount to anything, but what about the U.S. bills? What about them? He would like to have secretly thrown them away, but both of his arms were being held.

This is it; it's over. It's all over now …

*

P'an Man-kuei lay peacefully on the bed—it was the same size as the one he normally slept on, but it was a little harder and a bit cleaner. The white stucco ceiling was also about the same size as his, although the hanging fluorescent light was a little too bright. The door, which was more solid than his, also had a peep-hole, a big peep-hole; in point of fact, he had yet to try to look out through it. P'an Man-kuei's thoughts returned to that delightful little peephole in the door of his apartment; with them came thoughts of the pair of calves, the ones belonging to the girl in the mini-skirt.

The monotonous sound of footsteps drew near, invading his thoughts. He jumped quickly down from the bed and plastered himself up against the corner of the wall alongside the door.

A partially hidden face appeared on the outside of the big peep-hole. P'an Man-kuei pressed his heels up against the base of the wall and flattened his back even more tightly into the corner. He lamented the fact that he couldn't force his way into the wall itself to avoid the pair of eyes in the big peep-hole, even though he knew there was no way he could escape them.

The footsteps finally faded away, and P'an Man-kuei lay back down on his bed.

At that moment he longed to have a partner for a game of chess. On occasion during the group recreation period after dinner the opportunity for a game of chess presented itself, but the competition was different: the men here were a crude lot, and their chess skills were no better, certainly no match for his. This kind of victory gave him no pleasure. He was aware that this group of inmates included the other two men, whom he did not recognize, but who had been sentenced to even longer prison terms than he. Fearing that he might run into them, he avoided playing chess with any strangers.

P'an Man-kuei had no desire to return to the outside world; it seemed to him that the outside world had never belonged to him. He had never owned anything out there. The little peep-hole had been the one and only thing that had belonged to him.

But now he "owned" something: this small room, which separated him from the outside world, was his. No one else could lay any claims to it, and no one could encroach upon it. It was peaceful and safe.

P'an Man-kuei had no intention of crawling out of his hole, because the world at the bottom of this hole belonged to him—he could be at peace and remain forever satisfied in his hole.

73.264 Excerpt from Soul Mountain\fn{by Gao Xingjian (1940-)} Jiangsi Province, China (M) 11

The old bus is a city reject. After shaking in it for twelve hours on the potholed highway since early morning, you arrive in this mountain county town in the South.

In the bus station, which is littered with ice-block wrappers and sugar cane scraps, you stand with your backpack and a bag and look around for a while. People are getting off the bus or walking past, men humping sacks and women carrying babies. A crowd of youths, unhampered by sacks or baskets, have their hands free. They take sunflower seeds out of their pockets, toss them one at a time into their mouths and spit out the shells. With a loud crack the kernels are expertly eaten. To be leisurely and ca:refree is endemic to the place. They are locals and life has made them like this, they have been here for many generations—and you wouldn't need to go looking anywhere else for them. The earliest to leave the place travelled by river in black canopy boats and overland in hired carts, or by foot if they didn't have the money. Of course at that time there were no buses and no bus stations. Nowadays, as long as they are still able to travel, they flock back home, even from the other side of the Pacific, arriving in cars or big air-conditioned coaches. The rich, the famous and the nothing in particular all hurry back because they are getting old. After all, who doesn't love the home of their ancestors? They don't intend to stay so they walk around looking relaxed, talking and laughing loudly, and effusing fondness and affection for the place. When friends meet they don't just give a nod or a handshake in the meaningless ritual of city people, but rather they shout the person's name or thump him on the back. Hugging is also common, but not for women.

By the cement trough where the buses are washed, two young women hold hands as they chat. The women here have lovely voices and you can't help taking a second look. The one with her back to you is wearing an indigo-print headscarf. This type of scarf, and how it's tied, dates back many generations but is seldom seen these days. You find yourself walking towards them. The scarf is knotted under her chin and the two ends point up. She has a beautiful face. Her features are delicate, so is her slim body. You pass close by them. They have been holding hands all this time, both have red coarse hands and strong fingers. Both are probably recent brides back seeing relatives and friends, or visiting parents. Here, the word xifu means one's own daughter-in-law and using it like rustic Northerners to refer to any young married woman will immediately incur angry abuse. On the other hand, a married woman calls her own husband laogong, yet your laogong and my laogong are both used. People here speak with a unique intonation even though they are descendants of the same legendary emperor and are of the same culture and race.

You can't explain why you're here. It happened that you were on a train and this person mentioned a place called Lingshan. He was sitting opposite and your cup was next to his. As the train moved, the lids on the cups clattered against one another. If the lids kept on clattering or clattered and then stopped, that would have been the end of it. However, whenever you and he were about to separate the cups, the clattering would stop, and as soon as you and he looked away the clattering would start again. He and you reached out, but again the clattering stopped. The two of you laughed at the same instant, put the cups well apart, and started a conversation. You asked him where he was going.

"Lingshan."

"What?"

"Lingshan, ling meaning spirit or soul, and shan meaning mountain."

You'd been to lots of places, visited lots of famous mountains, but had never heard of this place."

Your friend opposite had closed his eyes and was dozing. Like anyone else, you couldn't help being curious and naturally wanted to know which famous places you'd missed on your travels. Also, you liked doing things properly and it was annoying that there was a place you've never even heard of. You asked him about the location of Lingshan.

"At the source of the You River," he said, opening his eyes.

You didn't know this You River either, but was embarrassed about asking and gave an ambiguous nod which could have meant either "I see, thanks" or "Oh, I know the place." This satisfied your desire for superiority, but not your curiosity. After a while you asked how to get there and the route up the mountain.

"Take the train to Wuyizhen, then go upstream by boat on the You River."

"What's there? Scenery? Temples? Historic sites?" you asked, trying to be casual.

"It's all virgin wilderness."

"Ancient forests?"

"Of course, but not just ancient forests."

"What about Wild Men?" you said, joking.

He laughed without any sarcasm, and didn't seem to be making fun of himself which intrigued you even more. You had to find out more about him.

"Are you an ecologist? A biologist? An anthropologist? An archaeologist?" He shook his head each time then said,

"I'm more interested in living people."

"So you're doing research on folk customs? You're a sociologist? An ethnographer? An ethnologist? A journalist, perhaps? An adventurer?"

"I'm an amateur in all of these."

The two of you started laughing.

"I'm an expert amateur in all of these!"

The laughing made you and him cheerful. He lit a cigarette and couldn't stop talking as he told you about the wonders of Lingshan.

Afterwards, at your request, he tore up his empty cigarette box and drew a map of the route up Lingshan.

*

In the North it is already late autumn but the summer heat hasn't completely subsided. Before sunset, it is still quite hot in the sun and sweat starts running down your back. You leave the station to have a look around. There's nothing nearby except for the little inn across the road. It's an old-style two-storey building with a wooden shopfront. Upstairs the floorboards creak badly but worse still is the grime on the pillow and sleeping mat. If you wanted to have a wash, you'd have to wait till it was dark to strip off and pour water over yourself in the damp and narrow courtyard. This is a stopover for the village peddlers and craftsmen.

It's well before dark, so there's plenty of time to find somewhere clean. You walk down the road looking around the little town, hoping to find some indication, a billboard or a poster, or just the name "Lingshan" to tell you you're on the right track and haven't been tricked into making this long excursion. You look everywhere but don't find anything. There were no tourists like you amongst the other passengers who got off the bus. Of course you're not that sort of tourist, it's just what you're wearing: strong sensible sports shoes and a backpack with shoulder straps, no-one else is dressed like you. But this isn't one of the tourist spots frequented by newlyweds and retirees. Those places have been transformed by tourism, coaches are parked everywhere and tourist maps are on sale. Tourist hats, tourist T-shirts, tourist singlets and tourist handkerchiefs printed with the name of the place are in all the little shops and stalls, and the name of the place is used in the trade names of all the "foreign exchange currency only" hotels for foreigners, the "locals with references only" hostels and sanatoriums, and of course the small private hotels competing for customers. You haven't come to enjoy yourself in one of those places on the sunny side of a mountain where people congregate just to look at and jostle one another and to add to the litter of melon rind, fruit peel, soft drink bottles, cans, cartons, sandwich wrappings and cigarette butts. Sooner or later this place will also boom but you're here before they put up the gaudy pavilions and terraces, before the reporters come with their cameras and before the celebrities come to put up plaques with their calligraphy.

You can't help feeling rather pleased with yourself, and yet you're anxious. There's no sign of anything here for tourists, have you made a blunder? You're only going by the map on the cigarette box in your shirt pocket, what if the expert amateur you met on the train had only heard about the place on his travels? How do you know he wasn't just making it all up? You've never seen the place mentioned in travel accounts and it's not listed in the most up-to-date travel guides. Of course, it isn't hard to find places like Lingtai, Lingqiu, Lingyan and even Lingshan on provincial maps and you know very well that in the histories and classics, Lingshan appears in works dating back to the ancient shamanistic work Classic of the Mountains and Seas and the old geographical gazetteer Annotated Water Classic. It was also at Lingshan that Buddha enlightened the Venerable Mahakashyapa. You're not stupid, so just use your brains, first find this place Wuyizhen on the cigarette box, for this is how you'll get to Lingshan.

You return to the bus station and go into the waiting room. The busiest place in this small town is now deserted. The ticket window and the parcel window are boarded up from the inside so knocking is useless. There's no-one to ask so you can only go through the lists of. stops above the ticket window: Zhang Village, Sandy Flat, Cement Factory, Old Hut, Golden Horse, Good Harvest, Flood Waters, Dragon Bay, Peach Blossom Hollow … the names keep getting better, but the place you want isn't there.

This is just a small town but there are several routes and quite a few buses go through. The busiest route, with five or six buses a day, is to Cement Factory but that's defmitely not a tourist route. The route with the fewest buses, one a day, is sure to go to the furthest destination and it turns out that Wuyizhen is the last stop. There's nothing special about the name, it's just like any other place name and there's nothing magical about it. Still, you seem to have, found one end of a hopeless tangle and while you're not ecstatic, you're certainly relieved. You'll need to buy a ticket in the morning an hour before departure and you know from experience that with mountain buses like this, which run once a day, just to get on will be a fight. Unless you're prepared to do battle, you'll just have to queue up early.

But, right now, you’ve lots of time, although your backpack’s a nuisance. As you amble along the road timber trucks go by noisily sounding their horns. In the town the noise worsens as trucks, some with trailers, blast their horns and conductors hang out of windows loudly banging the sides of the buses to hasten the pedestrians off the road.

The old buildings on both sides stand flush with the road and all have wooden shopfronts. The downstairs is for business and upstairs there is washing hung out to dry—nappies, bras, underpants with patched crotches, floral-print bedspreads—like flags of all the nations, flaping in the noise and dust of the traffic. The concrete telegraph poles along the street are pasted at eye level with all sorts of posters. One for curing body odor catches your attention. This is not because you’ve got body odor but because of the fancy language and the words in brackets after “body odor.”

> Body odor (known also as scent of the immortals) is a disgusting condition with an awful, nauseating smell. It often affects social relationships and can delay life’s major event: marriage. It disadvantages young men and women at job interviews or when they try to enlist, therefore inflicting much suffering and anguish. By using a new total treatment, we can instantly eradicate the odour with a rate of up to 97.53% success. For joy in life and future happiness, we welcome you to come and rid yourself of it …

After that you come to a stone bridge: no body odor here, just a cool, refreshing breeze. The bridge spanning the broad river has a bitumen surface but the carved monkeys on the worn stone posts testify to its long history. You lean on the concrete railing and survey the township alongside the bridge. On both banks, black rooftops overlapping like fish scales stretch endlessly into the distance. The valley opens out between two mountains where the upper areas of gold paddy fields are inlaid with clusters of green bamboos. The river is blue and clear as it trickles over the sandy shores, but close to the granite pylons dividing the current it becomes inky green and deep. Just past the hump of the bridge the rushing water churns loudly and white foam surfaces from whirlpools. The ten-meter-high stone embankment is stained with water levels—the new greyish-yellow lines were probably left by the recent summer floods. Can this be the You River? And does it flow down from Lingshan?

The sun is about to set. The bright orange disc is infused with light but there’s no glare. You gaze into the distance at the hazy layers of jagged peaks where the two sides of the valley join. This ominous black image nibbles at the lower edges of the glowing sun which seems to be revolving. The sun turns a dark red, gentler, and projects brilliant gold reflections onto the entire bend of the river: the dark blue of the water fusing with the dazzling sunlight throbs and pulsates. As the red sphere seats itself in the valley it becomes serene, awesomely beautiful, and there are sounds. You hear them, elusive, distinctly reverberating from deep in your heart and radiating outwards until the sun seems to prop itself up on its toes, stumble, then sink into the black shadows of the mountains, scattering glowing colors throughout the sky. An evening wind blows noisily by your ears and cars drive past, as usual sounding their deafening horns. You cross the bridge and see there a new dedication stone with engraved characters painted in red:

> Yongning Bridge. Built in the third year of the Kaiyuan reign period\fn{713-741:H} of the Song Dynasty and repaired in 1962. This stone was laid in 1983.

It no doubt marks the beginning of the tourist industry here.

Two food stalls stand at the end of the bridge. In the one on the left you eat a bowl of bean curd, the smooth and tasty kind with all the right ingredients. Hawkers used to sell it in the streets and lanes but it completely disappeared for quite some years and has recently been revived as family enterprises. In the stall on the right you eat two delicious sesame-coated shallot pancakes, straight off the stove and piping-hot. Then at one of the stalls, you can’t remember which, you eat a bowl of sweet yuanxiao dumplings broiled in rice wine. They are the size of large pearls. Of course, you’re not as academic about food as Mr. Ma the Second who toured West Lake, but you do have a hefty appetite nevertheless. You savor this food of your ancestors and listen to customers chatting with the proprietors. They’re mostly locals and all know one another. You try using the mellifluous local accent to be friendly, you want to be one of them. You’ve lived in the city for a long time and need to feel that you have a hometown. You want a hometown so that you’ll be able to return to your childhood to recollect long lost memories.

On this side of the bridge you eventually find an inn on an old cobblestone street. The wooden floors have been mopped and it’s clean enough. You are given a small single room which has a plank bed covered with a bamboo mat. The cotton blanket is a suspicious gray—either it hasn't been washed properly or that's the original color. You throw aside the greasy pillow from under the bamboo mat and luckily it's hot so you can do without the bedding. What you need right now is to off-load your luggage which has become quite heavy, wash off the dust and sweat, strip, and stretch yourself out on the bed.

There's shouting and yelling next door. They're gambling and you can hear them picking up and throwing down the cards. A timber partition separates you and, through the holes poked into the paper covering the cracks, you make out the blurred figures of some bare-chested men. You're not so tired that you can drop off to sleep just like that. You tap on the wall and instantly there's loud shouting next door. They're not shouting at you but amongst themselves—there are always winners and losers and it sounds as though the loser is trying to get out of paying. They're openly gambling in the inn despite the public security office notice on the wall prohibiting gambling and prostitution.

You decide to see if the law works. You put on some clothes, go down the corridor and knock on the half-closed door. Your knocking makes no difference, they keep shouting and yelling inside and nobody takes any notice. So you push open the door and go in. The four men sitting around the bed in the middle of the room all turn to look at you. But it's you and not they who gets a rude shock. The men all have bits of paper stuck on their faces, on their foreheads, lips, noses and cheeks, and they look ugly and ridiculous. They aren't laughing and are glaring at you. You've butted in and they're clearly annoyed.

"Oh, you're playing cards," you say, putting on an apologetic look.

They go on playing. The long paper cards have red and black markings like mahjong and there's a Gate of Heaven and a Prison of Hell. The winner penalizes the loser by tearing off a strip of newspaper and sticking it on a designated spot. Whether this is a prank, a way of letting off steam, or a tally, is something agreed upon by the gamblers and there is no way for outsiders to know what it's all about.

You beat a retreat, go back to your room, lie down again, and see a thick mass of black specks around the light globe. Millions of mosquitoes are waiting for the light to go out so that they can come down and feast on your blood. You quickly let down the net and are enclosed in a narrow conical space, at the top of which is a bamboo hoop. It's been a long time since you've slept under a hoop like this, and you've long since passed the age of being able to stare at the hoop to lose yourself in reverie. Today, you can't know what traumas tomorrow will bring. You've learnt through experience everything you need to know. What else are you looking for? When a man gets to middle age shouldn't he look for a peaceful and stable existence, find a not-too-demanding sort of a job, stay in a mediocre position, become a husband and a father, set up a comfortable home, put money in the bank and add to it every month so there'll be something for old age and a little left over for the next generation?

*

It is in the Qiang region halfway up Qionglai Mountain, in the border areas of the Qinghai-Tibetan highlands and the Sichuan basin, that I witness a vestige of early human civilization—the worship of fire. Fire, the bringer of civilization, has been worshipped by the early ancestors of human beings everywhere. It is sacred. The old man is sitting in front of the fire drinking liquor from a bowl. Before each sip he puts a finger into it and flicks some on the charcoals which splutter noisily and send out blue sparks. It is only then that I perceive that I too am real.

"That's for the God of the Cooking Stove, it's thanks to him that we can eat and drink," he says.

The dancing light of the fire shines on his thin cheeks, the high bridge of his nose, and his cheekbones. He tells me he is of the Qiang nationality and that he's from Gengda village down the mountain. I can't ask straight out about demons and spirits, so I tell him I'm here to do some research on the folk songs of the mountain. Do traditional song masters and dancers still exist here? He says he's one of them. The men and women all used to form a circle around the fire and dance right through to daybreak, but later on it was banned.

"Why?" I know quite well but I ask. I'm being dishonest again.

"It was the Cultural Revolution. They said the songs were dirty so we turned to singing Sayings of Mao Zedong songs instead."

"And what about after that?" I persist in asking. This is becoming a habit.

"No-one sings those anymore. People are doing the dances again but not many of the young people can do them. I'm teaching the dances to some of them."

I ask him for a demonstration. Without any hesitation, he instantly gets to his feet and proceeds to dance and sing. His voice is low and rich, he's got a good voice. I'm sure he's Qiang even if the police in charge of the population register insist that he isn't. They think anyone claiming to be Tibetan or Qiang is trying to evade birth restrictions so they can have more children.

He sings song after song. He says he's a fun-loving person, and I believe him. When he finished up as village head, he went back to being one of the mountain people, an old mountain man who likes good fun, though unfortunately he is past the age for romance.

He also knows incantations, the kind hunters employ when they go into the mountains. They are called mountain black magic or hexes and he has no qualms about using them. He really believes they can drive wild animals into pits or get them to step into snares. They aren't used only on animals, they're also used against other human beings for revenge. A victim of mountain black magic won't be able to find his way out of the mountains. They are like the "demon walls" I heard about as a child: when a person has been travelling for some time at night in the mountains, a wall, a cliff or a deep river appears right in front of him, so that he can't go any further. If the spell isn't broken the person's feet don't move forward and even if he keeps walking, he stays exactly where he started off. Only at daybreak does he discover that he has been going around in circles. That's not so bad, the worst is when a person is led into a blind alley—that means death.

He intones strings of incantations. It's not slow and relaxed like when he is singing, but just nan-nan-na-na to a quick beat. I can't understand it at all but I can feel the mystical pull of the words and a demonic, powerful atmosphere instantly permeates the room, the inside of which is black from smoke. The glow of the flames licking the iron pot of mutton stew makes his eyes glint. This is all starkly real. While you search for the route to Lingshan, I wander along the Yangtze River looking for this sort of reality. I had just gone through a crisis and then, on top of that, a doctor wrongly diagnosed me with lung cancer. Death was playing a joke on me but now that I've escaped the demon wall, I am secretly rejoicing. Life for me once again has a wonderful freshness. I should have left those contaminated surroundings long ago and returned to nature to look for this authentic life.

In those contaminated surroundings I was taught that life was the source of literature, that literature had to be faithful to life, faithful to real life. My mistake was that I had alienated myself from life and ended up turning my back on real life. Life is not the same as manifestations of life. Real life, or in other words the basic substance of life, should be the former and not the latter. I had gone against real life because I was simply stringing together life's manifestations, so of course I wasn't able to accurately portray life and in the end only succeeded in distorting reality.

I don't know whether I'm now on the right track but in any case I've extricated myself from the bustling literary world and have also escaped from my smoke-filled room. The books piled everywhere in that room were oppressive and stifling. They expounded all sorts of truths, historical truths to truths on how to be human. I couldn't see the point of so many truths but still got enmeshed in the net of those truths and was struggling hopelessly, like an insect caught in a spider's web. Fortunately, the doctor who gave the wrong diagnosis saved my life. He was quite frank and got me to compare the two chest X-rays taken on two separate occasions—a blurry shadow on the left lobe of the lung had spread along the second rib to the wall of the windpipe. It wouldn't help even to have the whole of the left lobe removed. The outcome was obvious.

My father had died of lung cancer. He died within three months of it being discovered and it was this doctor who had correctly diagnosed it. I had faith in his medical expertise and he had faith in science. The chest X-rays taken at two different hospitals were identical, there was no possibility of a technical mistake. He also wrote an authorization for a sectional X-ray, the appointment was in two weeks' time. This was nothing to get worried about, it was just to determine the extent of the tumor. My father had this done before he died. The outcome would be the same whether or not I had the X- ray, it was nothing special. That I in fact would slip through the fingers of Death can only be put down to good luck. I believe in science but I also believe in fate.

*

I once saw a four-inch length of wood which had been collected in the Qiang region by an anthropologist during the 1930s. It was a carved statue of a person doing a handstand. The head had ink markings for the eyes, nose and mouth, and the word "longevity" had been written on the body. It was called "Wuchang Upside Down" and there was something oddly mischievous about it. I ask the Qiang retired village head whether such talismans are still around. He tells me these are called "old root." This wooden idol has to accompany the newborn from birth to death. At death it accompanies the corpse from the house and after the burial it is placed in the wilderness to allow the spirit to return to nature. I ask him if he can get me one so that I can carry it on me. He laughs and says these are what hunters tuck into their shirts to ward off evil spirits, they wouldn't be of any use to someone like me.

"Is there an old hunter who knows about this sort of magic and can take me hunting with him?" I ask.

"Grandpa Stone would be the best," he says after thinking about it.

"How can I find him?" I ask right away.

"He's in Grandpa Stone's Hut."

"Where's this Grandpa Stone's Hut?"

"Go another twenty Ii on to Silver Mine Gully then follow the creek right up to the end. There you'll find a stone hut."

"Is that the name of the place or do you mean the hut of Grandpa Stone?"

He says it's the name of the place, that there's in fact a stone hut, and that Grandpa Stone lives there.

"Can you take me to him?" I ask.

"He's dead. He lay down on his bed and died in his sleep. He was too old, he lived to well over ninety, some even say well over a hundred. In any case, nobody's sure about his age."

"Are any of his descendants still alive?"

"In my grandfather's generation and for as long as I can remember, he was always on his own."

"Without a wife?"

"He lived on his own in Silver Mine Gully. He lived high up the gully, in the solitary hut, alone. Oh, and that rifle of his is still hanging on the wall of the hut."

I ask him what he's trying to tell me.

He says Grandpa Stone was a great hunter, a hunter who was an expert in the magical arts. There are no hunters like that these days. Everyone knows that his rifle is hanging in the hut, that it never misses its target, but nobody dares to go and take it.

"Why?" I'm even more puzzled.

"The route into Silver Mine Gully is cut."

"There's no way through?"

"Not anymore. Earlier on people used to mine silver there, a firm from Chengdu hired a team of workers and they began mining. Later on, after the mine was looted, everyone just left, and the plank roads they had laid either broke up or rotted."

"When did all this happen?"

"When my grandfather was still alive, more than fifty years ago."

That would be about right, after all he's already retired and has become history, real history.

"So since then nobody's ever gone there?" I become even more intrigued.

"Hard to say, anyway it's hard to get there."

"And the hut has rotted?"

"Stone collapses, how can it rot?"

"I was talking about the ridgepole."

"Oh, quite right."

He doesn't want to take me there, nor does he want to find a hunter for me, so that's why he's leading me on like this, I think.

"Then how do you know the rifle's still hanging on the wall?" I ask, regardless.

"That's what everyone says, someone must've seen it. They all say that Grandpa Stone is incredible, his corpse hasn't rotted and wild animals don't dare to go near. He just lies there all stiff and emaciated, and his rifle is hanging there on the wall."

"Impossible," I declare. "With the high humidity up here in the mountain, the corpse would have rotted and the rifle would have turned into a pile of rust."

"I don't know. Anyway, people have been saying this for years." He refuses to give in and sticks to his story. The light of the fire dances in his eyes and I seem to detect a cunning streak in them.

"And you've never seen him?" I won't let him off.

"People who have seen him say that he seems to be asleep, that he's emaciated, and that the rifle is hanging there on the wall above his head," he says, unruffled. "He knew black magic. It's not just that people don't dare go there to steal his rifle, even animals don't dare to go near."

The hunter is already myth. To talk about a mixture of history and legend is how folk stories are born. Reality exists only through experience, and it must be personal experience. However, once related, even personal experience becomes a narrative. Reality can't be verified and doesn't need to be, that can be left for the "reality-of-life" experts to debate. What is important is life. Reality is simply that I am sitting by the fire in this room which is black with grime and smoke and that I see the light of the fire dancing in his eyes. Reality is myself, reality is only the perception of this instant and it can't be related to another person. All that needs to be said is that outside, a mist is enclosing the green-blue mountain in a haze and your heart is reverberating with the rushing water of a swift-flowing stream.

*

So you arrive in Wuyizhen, on a long and narrow street inlaid with black cobblestones, and walking along this cobblestone street with its deep single-wheel rut, you suddenly enter your childhood, you seem to have spent your childhood in an old mountain town like this. The one-wheel handcarts can no longer be seen and instead of the creak of jujube axles greased with bean oil, the streets are filled with the din of bicycle bells.

Cyclists here need the skills of an acrobat. With heavy hessian bags slung across the saddle, they cause loud swearing as they weave through people with carrying poles or pulling wooden carts and the hawkers under the awnings. It is loud, colorful swearing which mingles with the general din of the hawkers' calls, bargaining, joking and laughing. You breathe in the smell of soya sauce pickles, boiled pork, raw hide, pine wood, dried rice stalks and lime as your eyes busily take in the narrow shop fronts lining the street with products of the South. There are soya bean shops, oil shops, rice shops, Chinese and Western medicine shops, silk and cotton shops, shoe shops, tea shops, butcher stalls, tailor shops, and shops selling stoves, rope, pottery, incense, candles and paper money. The shops, squashed up one against the other, are virtually unchanged from Qing Dynasty times.\fn{The old Manchu Dynsty, which abdicated power in 1911.} The smashed signboard of the Ever Prosperous Restaurant has been repaired and one of the flat-bottomed pans used for frying its speciality guotie dumplings is beaten like a gong to announce it is back in business. The wine banner is again hanging from the upstairs window of the First Class Delicacies Restaurant. The most imposing structure is the state-run department store, a newly renovated three-storey concrete building. A single display window is the size of one of the old shops but the insides of the glass windows look as if they have never been cleaned.

The photographer's shop is eye-catching: photos of women in coquettish poses and wearing awful dresses are on display. They are all local beauties and not movie poster film stars from some place at the other end of the earth. This place really produces good-looking women, every one of them is stunning. They have their beautiful cheeks cupped in their hands and their eyes have alluring looks. They've been carefully coached by the photographer but they are garishly dressed. Enlargements and color prints are available and there's a sign saying photos can be collected in twenty days, apparently they have to be developed in the city.

Had fate not otherwise decreed, you could have been born in this town, grown up, and married here. You would have married a beautiful woman like one of these, who would long since have borne you sons and daughters. At this point, you smile and quickly move off in case people imagine you've taken a fancy to one of the women and start getting the wrong idea. And yet it is you who are carried away by your imagination.

As you look up at the balconies above the shops with their curtained windows and pots of miniature trees and flowers, you can't help wondering about the people who live here. There's a big apartment with an iron padlock on the door—the pillars are now crooked but the carved eaves and railings which have fallen into disrepair indicate how imposing the place was at. one time. The fates of its owners and their descendants fill you with curiosity. The shop at the side sells Hong Kong style dresses and jeans, and the stockings on show have a Western woman showing off her legs on the packaging. At the front door there's a gold-plated sign, "Ever New Technical Development Company," but it's not clear what sort of technical development it is. Further on is a shop with heaps of unprocessed lime, and further on still is probably a miller's and next to that a vacant allotment where rice noodles are drying on wires strung between posts. You turn back and go into a small lane next to the hot water urn of the tea stall, then turning a corner you are again lost in memories.

Within a half-closed door is a damp courtyard, overgrown with weeds, desolate and lonely, with piles of rubble in the corners. You recall the back courtyard with the crumbling wall of your childhood home. You were afraid but it had a fascination for you, for the fox fairies of story books came from there. After school, without fail, you would go off alone with some trepidation to have a look. You never saw a fox fairy but that feeling of mystery always lingered in your childhood memories. There is an old stone bench riddled with cracks and a well which is probably dry. The mid-autumn wind blows through the dry yellow weeds in the rubble and the sun is very bright. These homes with their courtyard doors shut tight all have their histories which are all like ancient stories. In winter, the north wind is howling through the lane, you are wearing new warm padded cloth shoes and are with other children stamping your feet by the wall. You can remember the words of the ditty:

In moonlight thick as soup
I ride out to burn incense
For Luo Dajie who burnt to death
For Dou Sanniang who died in a rage
Sanniang picked beans
But the pods were empty

She married Master Ji
But Master Ji was short
So she married a crab
The crab crossed a ditch
Trod on an eel
The eel complained
It complained to a monk
The monk said a prayer
A prayer to Guanyin
So Guanyin pissed
The piss hit my son
His belly hurt
So I got an exorcist to dance
The dance didn't work
But still cost heaps of money

Pale withered weeds and lush green new sprouts in the roof-tiles quiver in the wind. How long is it since you've seen grass growing in roof-tiles? Your bare feet patter on the black cobblestone street with its deep single-wheel rut, you've run out of your childhood back into the present. The bare feet, the dirty black feet, patter right there in front of your eyes. It doesn't matter if you've never run barefoot, what is crucial is this image in your mind.

After a while you find your way out of the little lanes and make it back on the highway. This is where the bus from the county town turns around to go back. There's a bus station by the road with a ticket window and some benches inside, this is where you got off the bus earlier on. Diagonally across the road is an inn—a row of single-storey rooms—and the whitewashed brick wall has a sign "Good Rooms Within." It looks clean and you have to find somewhere to stay, so you go in. An old attendant is sweeping the corridor and you ask her if there's a room. She says yes. You ask her how much further is it to Lingshan. She gives you a cold look, this is a state-run inn, she's on a monthly state award wage and isn't generous with words.

"Number two," she says pointing with the broom handle to a room with the door open. You take your luggage in and notice there are two beds. On one there's someone lying on his back, one leg crossed over the other, with a copy of Unofficial Record of the Flying Fox in his hands. The title is written on the brown paper cover of the book, apparently on loan from a bookstall. You greet him and he puts down the book to give a friendly nod.

"Hello."

"Staying here?"

"Yes."

"Have a cigarette." He toses you a cigarette.

"Thanks." You sit on the empty, bed opposite. It happens that he wants to chat.

"How long have you been here?"

"Ten or so days." He sits up and lights himself a cigarette.

"Here buying stock?" you ask, taking a guess.

"I'm here for timber."

"Is it easy getting timber here?"

"Have you got a quota?" he asks instead, starting to become interested.

"What quota?"

"A state-plan quota, of course."

"No."

"Then it's not easy to get." He lies down again.

"Is there a timber shortage even in this forest region?"

"There's timber around but prices are different." He can't be bothered, he can tell you're not in the game.

"Are you waiting for cheaper prices?"

"Yes," he responds indifferendy, taking up his book again to read.

"You stock buyers really get to know about a lot of things." You have to flatter him so that you can ask him some questions.

"Not really." He becomes modest.

"The place Lingshan, do you know how to get there?"

He doesn't reply so you can only say you've come to do some sightseeing and is there anywhere worth seeing.

"There's a pavilion by the river. If you sit there you'll get a good view of the other side of the river."
"Enjoy your rest!" you say for want of something to say.

You leave your bags, find the attendant to register and set off. The wharf is at the end of the highway. The steps, made of long slabs of rock, go down steeply for more than ten metres and moored there are several black canopy boats with their bamboo poles up. The river isn't wide but the riverbed is; clearly it's not the rainy season. There is a boat on the opposite bank and people are getting on and getting off. The people on the stone steps are all waiting for it to come across.

Up from the wharf, on the embankment, there is a pavilion with upturned eaves and curling corners. The outside is lined with empty baskets and resting inside are farmers from the other side who were here for the market and have sold all of their goods. They are talking loudly and it sounds like the language used in the short stories of the Song Dynasty.\fn{960-1279AD, the beginning of the "Early Modern Period" of Chinese history.} The pavilion has been painted recently and under the eaves the dragon and phoenix design has been repainted and the two principal columns at the front are inscribed with the couplet:

Sitting at rest know not to discuss the shortcomings of other people
Setting out on a journey fully appreciate the beauty of the dragon river

You go around to look at the two columns at the back. These words are written there:

On departing do not forget to heed the duckweed waters
Turn back to gaze in wonder at Lingshan amongst the phoenixes

You're intrigued. The boat is probably about to arrive as the people resting and cooling off have got up and are rushing to shoulder their carrying poles. Only an old man is left sitting in the pavilion.
"Venerable elder, may I ask if these couplets—"
"Are you asking about the couplets on the principal columns?" the old man corrects me.
"Yes, venerable master, might I ask who wrote the couplets on the principal columns?" you say with added reverence.
"The scholar Mr. Chen Xianning!" His mouth opens wide, revealing sparse black teeth, as he enunciates each of the words with great precision.
"I don't know of him." You'd best be frank about your ignorance. "At which university does this gentleman teach?"
"People like you wouldn't know, of course. He lived more than a thousand years ago." The old man is contemptuous.
"Please don't make fun of me, venerable elder," you say, trying to stop him ridiculing you.
"You don't need glasses, can't you see?" he says pointing up to the beam at the top of the columns.
You look up and see on the beam which hasn't been repainted, these words written in vermilion:

Erected during the Great Song Dynasty in the first month of spring in the tenth year of the Shaoxing reign period\fn{1127-1162:H} and repaired during the Great Qing Dynasty on the twenty-ninth day of the third month of the nineteenth year of the Qianlong reign period.\fn{1735-1796:H}

*

I set out from the hostel of the nature reserve and go back to the house of the Qiang retired village head. A big padlock is hanging on his door. This is the third time I've been back but again he's not there. It seems that this door which can lead me into that mystical world has closed for me.

I wander on in fine drizzling rain. It's been a long time since I have wandered about in this sort of misty rain. I pass by the Sleeping Dragon Village Hospital, it looks deserted. The forest is quiet but there is always a stream somewhere not too far away, for I can hear the sound of trickling water. It's been ages since I have had such freedom, I don't have to think about anything and I let my thoughts ramble. There's no-one on the highway, and no vehicles are in sight. As far as the eye can see it is a luxuriant green. It is the middle of spring.

The big deserted compound on the side of the road is probably. the headquarters of the bandit chief Song Guotai mentioned by the reserve warden last night. Forty years ago, a single mountain road for horse caravans was the only access to this place. To the north it crossed the 5000-meter-high Balang Mountains into the Qinghai-Tibetan highlands and to the south it went through the Min River valley into the Sichuan basin. The opium smugglers from the South and the salt smugglers from the North all obediently put down money here to buy passage through. This was called showing proper respect. If there was a fuss and proper respect wasn't shown, it would be a case of arriving and not returning. They would all be sent to meet the King of Hell.

It is an old timber compound. The two big heavy wooden gates are wide open and inside, surrounded on three sides by two-storey buildings, is an overgrown courtyard big enough for a caravan of thirty or forty horses. Probably in those days, as soon as the gates were closed, the eaved balconies with their wooden railings would be thick with armed bandits so that caravans thinking of stopping the night would be trapped like turtles in a jar. Even if a shoot-out took place there wouldn't have been anywhere in the courtyard to escape the bullets.

There are two sets of stairs in the courtyard. I go up. The floorboards creak noisily and I deliberately tread heavily to show my presence. However the upstairs is deserted. One after another I push open the doors to empty rooms smelling of dust and mildew. Only a dirty gray towel hanging on a wire and an old worn shoe show that the place has been lived in, but probably some years ago. When the reserve was established the supply and marketing cooperative, local produce purchasing depot, grain and oil depot, veterinary clinic as well as the village administrative office and the personnel were all relocated in the narrow hundred meters of street built by the reserve administration where there is not a trace of Song Guotai's hundred or so men and their hundred or so rifles once housed in this compound. In those times they would lie on rush mats smoking opium and fondling their women. These women, who had been abducted, had to cook for them in the daytime and sleep in turn with them at night. At times, either because the loot wasn't shared equally or because of a woman, fights would break out and wild rioting probably took place on the floors of this very building …

*

"Only the bandit chief Song Guotai could keep them under control. This fellow was ruthless and cruel, and renowned for his cunning."

The warden of the reserve does political work and he is eloquent and convincing. He says his lectures to university students here for practical work range from protection of the giant panda to patriotism and that his lectures can reduce the women students to tears.

He says that amongst the women the bandits abducted there was even a soldier of the Red Army. In 1936, during the Long March, when a regiment of the Red Army was passing through the Mao'ergai grasslands, one of the battalions was attacked by bandits. The ten or so girls of the laundry detachment were abducted and raped. The youngest was seventeen or eighteen and was the only one to survive. She was passed around several of the bandits and eventually an old Qiang man purchased her to be his wife. She lives in a nearby mountain flatland and can still recite the name of her battalion, regiment and company, as well as the name of her commanding officer who is now an important official. He's quite excited and says of course he can't talk about all these things to the students, then goes back to talking about the bandit chief Song Guotai.

This Song Guotai started out as a junior assistant, he says, for an opium merchant. When the merchant was killed by Big Brother Chen, the bandit chief who had taken over the district, he threw in his lot with the new boss. By wheeling and dealing he soon became Big Brother's confidante and had access to the small courtyard where Big Brother lived at the back of the compound. The small courtyard was later blown up by the Liberation Army in a mortar attack and is now a mass of trees and shrubs. But in those years it was really a Little Chongqing, a replica of the wartime capital, where Big Brother Chen and his harem debauched themselves on sex and liquor. The only man. allowed to wait on him was Song Guotai. A caravan arrived from Ma'erkang full of bandits who had been eying this strip of territory where all you had to do was to sit there waiting for the loot to come to you. A fierce battle raged for two days with deaths and injuries to both sides, but before any clear victory or defeat, they held peace negotiations and sealed an agreement in blood. The gates were opened and the other party invited inside. Upstairs and downstairs two lots of bandits joined in finger-guessing games and drinking liquor.

Actually it was Big Brother's plan to get the other side drunk so that he could deal with them swiftly. He got his mistresses to flit about from table to table, with their breasts exposed. It wasn't just the other bandits; who of either side could resist? Everyone was rotten drunk. Only the two bandit chiefs were still sitting upright at the table. As prearranged, Big Brother snapped his fingers loudly and Song Guotai came to pour more liquor. In one swift action, faster than it takes to tell this, he snatched the rival bandit chief's machine gun from the table and one bullet each sent the pair sprawling, Big Brother included. Then he asked: Anyone who doesn't want to surrender? The bandits looked at one another, not one dared to utter so much as half a murmur of dissent. Song Guotai thereupon moved into Big Brother's little courtyard and all the mistresses came into his possession.

He tells all this with great drama; he isn't boasting when he says he has the women students in tears. He goes on to say that in 1950 they came into the mountains to exterminate the bandits. The little courtyard was surrounded by two companies of soldiers. At daybreak they shouted to the bandits to put down their weapons, change their wicked ways and reform, and warned that there was a blockade of several machine guns at the main gate so no-one should try to escape.

It's as if he'd taken part in the battle himself.

"What happened then?" I ask.

"At first they stubbornly resisted so the little courtyard was bombarded with mortar. The surviving bandits threw down their guns and came out to surrender. Song Guotai was not amongst them. When a search was made of the little courtyard they only found a few weeping women huddled together. Everyone said the house had a secret tunnel which went up into the mountain but it was never found, and he has never shown up anywhere. It's over forty years now, some say he's still alive and others say he's dead but there's no real evidence, only theories."

He sits back into the round cane chair and tapping his fingers on the edge where his hands are resting, he begins to analyse these theories.

"There are three theories about what happened to him. One is that after escaping he fled to another area, changed his name, and settled somewhere to work in the fields as a peasant. The second is that he could have been killed in the gun fight but the bandits wouldn't admit to it. Bandits have their own set of rules—they may be embroiled in a terrible fight amongst themselves but they won't divulge anything to an outsider. They have their own ethics, a code of bandit chivalry if you like, and yet on the other hand they are cruel and wicked. Bandits have two sides to them. The women had all been abducted but once they came into his lair, they became a part of the gang. They were abused by him and yet kept secrets for him."

He is shaking his head not because he finds it incomprehensible but because he is moved by the complexity of the human world, it seems.

"Of course one can't dismiss the third possibility that he fled onto the mountain, couldn't get out, and starved to death."

"Do people get lost on the mountain and die there?" I ask.

"Of course, and not just the peasants from elsewhere who come to dig for medicinal herbs. There are even local hunters who have died on this mountain."

"Oh?" This is even more intriguing.

"Juest last year a hunter went up the mountain and didn't come back for ten or so days. It was only then that his relatives sought out the village authorities, and we were notified. We contacted the forestry police and had them send us tracker dogs. We got them to sniff his clothes and carried out the search by following them. Afterwards we found him caught in a crack in the rocks. He had died there."

"How did he come to be stuck in the crack in the rocks?"

"Could've been anything, he probably panicked. He was hunting and hunting's prohibited in the reserve. There's also the case of a man killing his younger brother."

"How did this happen?"

"He mistook his brother for a bear. The brothers had gone into the mountain to lay traps. There's good money in musk. Laying traps has been modernized—a trap can be made with a small piece of wire pulled out of a steel construction cable and a person can lay several hundred in a day on the mountain. It's impossible for us to supervise an area of this size. They're all so greedy, it's hopeless. The brothers went into the mountain to lay traps and in the process were separated.

"It would be superstitious to believe what the mountain folk say: according to them the brothers fell foul of black magic. The two of them bumped into each other after going in a circle around the top of the mountain. There was a heavy mist. The elder brother saw his younger brother, mistook him for a bear, and shot him with his rifle. The elder brother had killed the younger brother. He went home during the night and lay his and his brother's rifles alongside one another by the bamboo gate of the pig pen so that his mother would see them when she got up to feed the pigs first thing in the morning. He didn't go inside the house but went back up the mountain to where his brother lay dead and slit his own throat."

*

I leave the empty upstairs and stand for a while in the courtyard big enough for a whole caravan of horses, then head back to the highway. There still is no sign of people or vehicles. I look at the dark green mountain enveloped in a haze of rain and mist on the opposite side. A steep greyish-white logging chute is over there and the vegetation has been totally ravaged. Earlier on, before the highway was put through, both sides of the mountain would have been covered in thickly-wooded forest. I am becoming obsessed with getting to the primeval forest at the back of the mountain and find myself drawn to it by some inexplicable force.

The light drizzle gets heavier and turns into a thin film which completely enshrouds the ridge, obscuring the mountain and gully even more. There is the rumble of thunder behind the mountain, muffied and indistinct. Suddenly, I realize that the noise of the river below the highway is much louder, there is a perpetual roar as it charges endlessly at great speed from the snowclad mountains to pour into the Min River. It possesses an intimidating and violent energy not found in rivers flowing over flat country. …

75.9 Daughter Of The Yellow River\fn{by Wang Jiada (1940-)} Lanzhou, Gansu Province, China (M) 13

People called her Granny Duo. Actually she was only twenty-five years old. But among country people, seniority carries weight, and her husband (usually greeted as Grandpa Duo) belonged to an older generation. I was then but a child, yet, by overhearing the conversations of my elders, I knew that Granny Duo was considered an improper woman.

Granny Duo's deep black eyes were very expressive. When she looked at you, her long eyelashes would flutter and a strange light would quiver in her pupils. She also had inexpressibly beautiful hands. Although she was a country woman, her hands were white and delicate. In spring when the flowers were in bloom, she would pound the petals of a nail blossom to a pulp and apply a smudge upon her fingernails, wrapping them with leaves. After ten days, she would remove the leaves and her nails would be dyed red. When gazing at people, she liked to hold her chin in her palm, shielding her face with her pink hand and scarlet nails. When Granny Duo was amused, she would burst out in raucous laughter. Then, coquettishly, she would cover her mouth with the slender fingers and flaming red nails.

Although Granny Duo was a bit short, her figure was well made; walking in town or working in the fields, her every movement was light and dainty. She was, as you might guess, the most showily dressed woman around. In summer she would always wear pink or light green. To relieve the afternoon heat, she would actually remove her shirt and stretch out under the shade of a tree. Often in winter she would wear a tight-fitting scarlet padded cotton jacket. Granny could be quite seductive.

She was also constantly hungry. The tofu peddlers often came to our village in Gansu province, their tofu and salt and pepper carried on sling poles. Sometimes Granny had no ready cash, so she would scoop up some beans and exchange them for tofu. When she got her tofu, she would immediately cut out a morsel and sprinkle it with pepper and salt. The pepper would run down her pretty lips, dying them a deeper red.

Each spring people would come and sell their newly cut leeks. They would walk about the village, calling: "Leek sprouts for exchange!" Granny Duo would always be the first to make a purchase.

Strange to say, her house was always full of people, including the people who abused her behind her back. Her large courtyard faced the sun. So it was especially popular on winter afternoons. Granny Duo would bring out long benches for her visitors. The old men would sit and pull at their long-handled water pipes, then doze away. The younger ones would squat on the steps over a game of chess. At noon Granny Duo's sweet-roots would be cooked (she boiled a potful every day); she would place the pot on the steps and her guests would help themselves. It seemed that she was constantly boiling water and serving tea.

When the snows fell, Granny Duo had fewer visitors. She would sit on her kang, with legs folded, a cotton padded blanket thrown over her knees as she sewed. A few young fellows would perch on the edge of the kang and put their hands under the blanket for warmth. Granny Duo would sit unmoving, her eyes fixed on her work, sewing stitch by stitch, sometimes passing the needle through her hair as if to wipe it.

At these times her black eyes would be like two unfathomable pools of crystal-clear water. Sometimes a hand would stray too far under the blanket and caress her feet. At these times her inch-long needle would prick at the hand and the young offender would retreat, his eyes hungrily seeking out Granny Duo's all the while. As for Granny, she went on with her sewing, unaware of anything out of the ordinary.

*

This was Granny Duo, a most attractive young woman. Why people spoke evil of her was more than I could make out. Was it because she was twenty five years younger than her husband? As far as I could see, she was very good to him. His stomach was weak and she would often cook special meals for him, or send for a doctor.

My elders say that Grandpa Duo had been a first-rate raftsman in his youth. He spent all his early years carrying fruits and vegetables up and down the Yellow River. Poverty-stricken for most of his life, he only managed to accumulate a little money when over forty. He paid two hundred silver dollars—the savings of half a lifetime—for sixteen-year-old Granny Duo. (Her father had contracted lung disease, and used the money to pay a doctor.) At the time she was but a child and had no conception of love and marriage. To her husband she expressed respect, as she would respect an elder who fed and clothed her. However, there seemed a distance between them, as if they were eyeing each other through a mist—familiar, yet strange, close, yet distant. Sometimes indeed, Granny Duo would feel a vague yearning, an undefined blankness, but her cheerful nature would quickly dispel such gloom. On the whole she did not complain; she believed that serving her husband and looking after the house was her plain duty. Later on, severe arthritis kept Grandpa from rafting down the river. By mere chance the two of them took in an apprentice, an outsider. Probably that was where all the rumors about Granny Duo started.

It was the year before liberation, during the springtime. The young man came begging his way into our village. He was dirty and disheveled, with a ragged cotton jacket on his back. Tall, dark-skinned, and spare of words, he was named Ergeze, or Second Brother.

There was a threshing ground at the south end of our village, on the banks of the Yellow River, and nearby a hut for guarding the wheat in summer. The beggar settled there. He would often stand on the bank alone, gazing into the distant mountains. Sometimes he would hum a local huar tune\fn{A note reads: A tune to which words can be improvised; popular among peasants of the Northwest.} in a low voice. His voice was beautiful—and wistful, perhaps with longing for his home. But as soon as he discovered that he had a listener, he would stop.

I once asked him about his home, but he just smiled faintly and turned to face the river. He would often stand like that for hours. Sometimes, without warning he would plunge into the river, disappear, and emerge way over on the other side; he would then swim ashore and lie down on the opposite bank, sometimes for hours. Ergeze was such a strange man.

One morning Granny Duo went to the river to fetch water. As she filled her buckets, she caught sight of Ergeze lying on the sandy bank. Evidently he had just taken a bath and was sunning himself. His muscles rippled in the sun. Granny Duo stood gazing at him for quite a while, then she approached him.

“Hey, you!” she called. “Come help Granny Duo with the buckets of water.”

Ergeze didn't move.

“Hey! Wake-up!”

No response.

“Lazybones! I’m speaking to you!” She filled a gourd full of water and splashed it over Ergeze. She laughed as Ergeze shot up, his eyes blazing, his hands clenched.

But Granny Duo soon recognized her mistake in teasing the outsider. Shouldering her buckets on her pole, she hastily backed away. From then on, everybody knew that the wandering stranger had a deep sense of self-respect and would not be trifled with.

But a few days later Ergeze helped Granny Duo of his own accord. It had been raining in torrents. Hay and lumber had been washed downstream. (The local people called this the “river firewood.”) That day Grandpa Duo took out his raft—eight inflated sheepskin air bags—and went to the middle of the river to retrieve a floating log. But the log was too unwieldy and it overturned his raft. When Grandpa Duo emerged from the water, his rafthad been carried downstream. The wind was strong and the waves high. Grandpa Duo was helpless as he saw the source of his income borne to the mouth of the river gorge, circling round and round a whirlpool.

Some of the villagers gathered on the banks above the gorge. Granny Duo stood out right in front of the crowd, lost in despair as she followed the raft with her eyes. Another wave would hurl it into the vortex of the whirlpool. But the water was so rapid, who could go to retrieve it? This was no joking matter.

Just then Ergeze appeared on the bank. He looked down into the water, swiftly took off his clothes, exposing his wide chest and solid muscles. Suddenly a soft pink hand grasped him by the arm. Granny Duo stood before him, her big black eyes dilated with fear.

“No, no!” she exclaimed. “It’s too dangerous!”

He gave her a glance, gently pushed aside her hand, and stretching his arms wide, plunged into the raging river. Time seemed to be frozen as he disappeared beneath the waters. Granny Duo paled with fear while the sweat stood out on her nose. Soon Ergeze appeared on the edge of the whirlpool, swimming toward the tossing raft. Nearer, nearer—Ergeze was on the point of reaching the raft when he was suddenly caught in the whirlpool.

“Ah!” Granny Duo cried out in spite of herself.

Just then Ergeze made his appearance on the other side of the river, far beyond the whirlpool.

“Come back!” cried Granny Duo. “I don’t want the raft anymore!”

But Ergeze didn’t heed the words. He raised his drip- ping head and plunged back toward the whirlpool. Everybody on shore started shouting:

"Come back, Ergeze! Come back!"
But Ergeze swam on.
At last he established firm footing, reached out, and with one bold sweep of his arm, caught the raft. Then he pulled it to shore. Once on shore, he didn't even glance at the admiring crowd, nor accept Granny Duo's gratitude. Tossing his jacket over his shoulders, he bit his lips, blue with cold, and made off.
That same afternoon, Granny Duo boiled a few eggs, made some pancakes, and took them to Ergeze. At the entrance to the door of the hut she heard voices. Guotai, the lame village chief, was asking Ergeze,
"Where are you from?"
"The other side of the river."
"Why are you here?"
"Begging."
"When are you going back?"
Granny Duo peered inside the hut. The old village chief was lifting his staff and shaking it in front of Ergeze.
"Three days. You make yourself scarce in three days, or else!" he threatened.
"He's not going anywhere," interrupted Granny Duo as she walked up to Guotai. "We have hired him."
"What is that? Did you say you are taking him in?"
"Yes, my husband Grandpa Duo has accepted him as an apprentice. He'll be part of our family from now on." Granny Duo signaled to Ergeze with her eyes as she spoke.
The elder was astonished.
"Do you know anything about his background?" he asked coldly.
Granny Duo laughed outright.
"Why should we care about that? You can go and find out for yourself." She turned to Ergeze and addressed him.
"Remember, tomorrow morning come over for breakfast, and then you set out rafting with the master."
She strode out of the hut, oblivious to Ergeze's look of surprise. Guotai shouted at her back:
"If something happens, you will be held responsible."
The next morning I saw a lot of people standing in the courtyard of the Duo household. It was apparent that something exciting was going on. I dived into the crowd and saw that Granny Duo was shaving Ergeze's hair.
Granny would often give the local children a haircut, not minding the trouble and the dirt. Once, my mother asked the village butcher to cut my hair. The butcher was accustomed to handling a big carving knife, and there was no delicacy in his method. He seemed to be sawing through my hair. I stamped about in pain. So Mother held my head while the butcher sawed away, sweating profusely. It really was like a pig killing. I finally escaped from Mother's grip and shook out my half-cut hair.
The next day Mother acquiesced.
"All right, Little Sheng, let's give Granny Duo a try." I knew that she despised Granny Duo and never liked my lingering around her house, but now she had little choice.
When Granny saw my hair, she laughed until her body shook.
"Little Sheng, you look as if you'd been gnawed on by a dog," she said. She hastily made hot water, brought out a towel and scented soap—at the time she was the only one in the village to use scented soap—and washed my hair thoroughly. Then she wiped the shaving knife on her knees and, holding my head in position with one hand, she performed her task deftly and gently. When she finished, I felt a slight itching, as if an ant was crawling over my pate. She patted my shiny top and laughed.
"There you go, sonny!"
But she had never been asked to cut an adult's hair. That would have been improper. Yet there she was on that spring morning, in front of the whole world, barbering a young fellow about her own age! The crowd looked on, amused, malicious. But Granny Duo did not mind them at all. She sat composedly on the steps of her house, her hand moving swiftly over Ergeze's head with the shaving knife, a ring flashing on her finger. Ergeze was somewhat embarrassed as he lowered his head.
Granny Duo kept her eyes on the moving knife. When she finished, she put her hand lightly on Ergeze's shining pate.
"A handsome young fellow like you, why shouldn't you smarten up a bit?"
She then went into the house and brought out some of her husband's clothes and made Ergeze change into them. Ergeze looked another man. I hardly knew him.
From that day on, he was part of the Duo family. Every morning he would go rafting with Grandpa Duo, and he mastered the craft in a short time. Grandpa Duo's health went from bad to worse and Ergeze ended up doing the job alone. Sometimes when business was heavy, Granny Duo would accompany him down the river. In the daytime he shared his meals with the Duos; at night he slept in the hut next to the common threshing ground. Gradually the cloud over his face cleared away.

But still, he rarely spoke. Apart from rafting, he had to tend to the Duos' farm. He was thus busy all day long. Only at dusk could we see him squatting in his doorway eating noodles from a bowl the size of a washbasin. He kept at a distance from Granny Duo, never joking with her, rarely looking at her. He seemed to have a deep respect for his master's wife. Only once was his behavior strange and unaccountable.

It was a hot mid-afternoon. Granny Duo was washing clothes on the riverbank. As she worked, she decided to take off her upper garments, leaving on only a stomach kerchief that exposed her snow-white arms and neck and shoulders. To cool off, she sprinkled some water on her arms and neck. And then she loosened her hair and, kneeling on a slab of stone by the river, she dipped her hair into the water and washed it. When she finished, she held up her hair in one hand and contemplated herself, bending over the rippling water: a young woman in a pink stomach kerchief, clasping her long jet-black hair, gazing distractedly, full of unsatisfied longings.

Ergeze was walking back from the fields at that moment. As he passed the threshing ground, he saw this spectacle on the riverbank and stood riveted to the ground. His eyes became blank. After a while, with a low moan, he turned and flung himself down on a bundle of hay.

There was another occasion that also seemed like overstepping the bounds, but it was not Ergeze's fault. It happened when we were piling up the hay.

In our part of the province, we do not cut the wheat but pull it up by the roots and knot it into bouquets. Then mules or donkeys carry the bouquets onto the threshing ground, where they are piled up until they form pagodas with a wide base and a pointed top.

Grandpa Duo owned no cattle, so all his wheat was carried to the threshing ground by Ergeze. Granny Duo stood on top of the heap and Ergeze handed the bouquets up to her. In earlier years the wheat of the Duos would usually make up two pagodas, but on that day Granny seemed distracted. She stood on top of the wheat and kept piling and kept piling—until the pagoda was huge and towering. By the time her wheat was all tucked away, it was past noon. Except for Ergeze, everybody else had gone home to eat.

Granny Duo, standing atop a wheat pile ten feet above ground, looked down on Ergeze. Her dark eyes sparkled. Even after the morning's labor, she was so fresh, so lively, so delicate. A mischievous light shone in her eyes, and also something more unfathomable.

"I can't get down!" she cried. "Oh, what's to be done?"

Ergeze scratched his bare head, at a loss. "You must find a way."

"No, I want you to do something," Granny Duo said helplessly, her legs swaying on the tower of wheat.

Ergeze thought hard.

"Supposing I spread some hay and you jump down?"

"Jump! You silly! If I hurt myself, who would cook your dinner?"

"Well, then, I'll stand here and you can step on my shoulders."

"Me! A woman! How can I step on a man's shoulders?"

"Then what's to be done?"

"Carry me down!"

"What!" Ergeze's eyes goggled.

"I want you to climb up and carry me down!" Granny Duo looked down at the shocked Ergeze and smiled mischievously.

Ergeze stood still, not knowing what to do. Then he timidly climbed up a few feet and stretched out his arms to receive Granny. She slipped down from the pile in a twinkling and fell into his arms. At that moment both blushed deeply. When Ergeze stepped to the ground, Granny wriggled free. They separated immediately, as if struck by thunder, and stood apart, unmoving. Ergeze held down his head, his face crimson. Granny recovered her poise first and, picking up her broom, prepared to walk away. She took a few steps, then turned.

"Eh, Ergeze, do you have a wife?"

"No"

"Why don't you get yourself a wife?"

There was no reply.

"Why don't you speak?"

Still no reply.

Granny Duo walked away as Ergeze plopped to the ground, lost in thought, his eyes fixed on something far away. After a while he started to sing a mountain tune in a low voice:

Oh my father, you left in such a hurry, the sweat of labor on your body.
Oh my mother, so hard-hearted, you too left for that faraway place.
That place of lasting peace, to be with father.
No brothers, no sisters, all all alone, what support, what warmth for me?
Found, found, warmth, here on the banks of the Yellow River.
But why is my heart so heavy?"

That was all, all that was supposedly improper between Granny Duo and Ergeze. And what did it amount to, after all? Why should they be blamed for such a little thing? Oh, those backbiting busybodies! In all honesty, it was only later, during that unforgettable raft ride on the moonlit river, that my firm belief in their innocence was shaken.

*

It was the second year after liberation. Our harvest of fruit was very good. We had three huge crabapple trees, all dozens of years old, the trunks thicker than my clasp. In the summer the leafy treetops would cast their shade over the vegetable garden, and water from the irrigation canals would glide quietly by as the frogs kept up their incessant croaking. Father put up a bed under the trees, and I slept there every night to guard the fruit harvest. The fruit hung heavy and, in the seventh lunar month, the crab apples turned a brilliant red. As the wind blew through the branches, the ripe fruit would fall to the ground. Sometimes I could retrieve as much as a basketful in an afternoon.

One day Granny Duo strolled along and said:

"And so, Little Sheng, now that your fruit is ripe, you don't know your Granny anymore! You little rascal, how are you selling your fruit this year? By sea route or land route?"

"You better ask the elders," I replied. "I know nothing."

"But I'm asking you, Little Sheng," she said as she knocked at my forehead playfully.

That evening I brought the question to my father; he pondered a little and replied, "By the land route. Taking the river route means hiring a raft. That is too expensive."

A rutted road winds its way from our village to the city; when not raining, the road is always covered with dust. Father was referring to this road when he said the "land route." At that time there was no bus on this road, only a horse-drawn cart to carry passengers. The cart had a carriage-like covering and two rows of wooden benches on each side, seating ten passengers altogether. We would convey our fruit to the city either on this transportation cart or, more often, by use of our legs.

The advantage of walking was that we didn't have to spend a cent on transportation. But it was very slow and inefficient. We were able to carry and sell only one hundred jin\fn{A note reads: A measure of weight, equivalent to half a kilogram.} of fruit—or less—every day. Later that season my father reconsidered this routine and said to Mother:

"Let's hire the raft after all."

Unfortunately, the next day Father hurt his back in a fall and couldn't move about. The picked fruit lay in heaps waiting to be sold. If we waited, the price would drop. I came up with the solution.

"I'm grown up," I said. "I'll sell the apples on my own."

Father looked at me, as if seeing me for the first time. He nodded.

"Very well, go ahead. You're a big fellow."

That same night I ran over to the Duos to tell Ergeze the news.

"You're so young," Granny said. "Let me go along and help."

So while Ergeze went to haul the raft to the river, Granny helped me pack the fruit.

Ergeze hauled the raft to the riverbank. He then unstrung the sheepskin air bags and blew air into them with all his might, until his face was all swollen and red. Then he placed the inflated raft on the water and the three of us lifted the containers of apples aboard. Ergeze was very clever. He placed the containers carefully one on top of another in the middle of the raft and left empty spaces both in front and behind. His place was at the front, holding the oars, while Granny Duo and I sat at the back. We could only see Ergeze's head and shoulders by lifting our heads where we sat.

We started out at midnight. To be on a raft going down the Yellow River! My heart pounded with excitement. I looked around me. The moon was hidden behind clouds. A thin mist floated above the river.

The banks on both sides were also hidden behind a screen of thin fog, as light as silk tapestry. On shore, likewise, the orchards, melon patches, and fields of grain stretching into the horizon were all enveloped in a mysterious, phantasmal mist. In far-off cottages we could hear someone singing an aria from an opera to the accompaniment of the plaintive Hu violin. Suddenly the sound of the instrument wavered and stopped and then was swallowed by the all-pervasive night.

We took off our shoes, rolled up our trousers, and dipped our feet into the water. Immense stars reflected in the water played around our feet. Suddenly a night breeze blew over, ruffling the waters, and all the stars disappeared, leaving a chain of ripples circling out wider and wider. The breeze wafted the sweet scent of melon and wild pear and the soothing smell of the soil under the autumn harvest. The Yellow River, caressed by the breeze, lay quiet and beautiful, like a weary traveler, finding rest at last.

"Take a nap," Granny Duo advised me. "You have plenty of work tomorrow."

I shook my head.

"You take a nap. I'm not tired." This was my first raft ride on the Yellow River. Wrapped in all the mysteries and wonders of a moonlit night, I was bursting with excitement. It would be impossible for me to sleep.

"All right then. If you won't, I will." She curled up on the edge of the raft, with her back to the containers. She fell right to sleep. After a little while she even started to snore softly.

I stretched to get a look up front. Ergeze was paddling softly, his head and shoulders moving up and down as the raft glided forward.

Water carts on either bank backed away from us one after another as we went forward. Their great wooden wheels covered with moss revolved lazily, lifting the water in buckets. The croaking of frogs broke the silence in the fields—first one, then another, and finally a chorus, bringing life into the night. The moon crept out of the fields and shed its light on Granny Duo's face. She was more beautiful than ever. Her long eyebrows, thin and curved, were slightly puckered. One pink hand hung down from the raft and drifted on the surface of the river, letting the water play over it.

At last I got sleepy too. Granny Duo stirred and sat up, saying:

"You lie down, Little Sheng. Don't be afraid. I'll stay next to you and shield you."

So I lay down, squeezing against the containers, while Granny sat on the edge of the raft, her bare feet playing in the water. A cloudy mist rose in front of me; I was lifted onto it and wafted to a strange place. It was one mass of silvery water, which disappeared into a bluish mist.

A low-keyed, hearty voice sang out:

A high cliff overhangs the Yellow River.
Two clouds are hovering over the gorge,
The clouds make up a bridge for you to cross.
Come over, flower of my heart.

A voice familiar to me replied:

The crystal-clear water keeps flowing.
The water cart aloft keeps turning.
If I'm in your heart, keep thinking,
Keep on hoping against the months, the years.

The first voice was now urgent:

Thinking, thinking all the time.
Longing, longing all day long,
Until the tears keep running.
My tears could set a mill turning,
The mill turning, spinning; the bird alights.

Again that sweet soft voice:

The stars in heaven cluster together.
The star keeps close to the moon.
The moon caresses the Suoluo tree.
Little sister Duo nestles against her love.

The sounds were very soft, hardly discernible, wafted from afar as if heard across a sheet of water, then again right next to my ears. It was like the lapping of the Yellow River, fashioned by a heavenly art, most appealing to the senses, flowing naturally into each other.

I opened my eyes. Everything had been a dream. The moon was again behind the clouds. It had turned very dark. The river looked like a dark satin ribbon swaying slightly in the wind. The trees on either bank looked like huge pieces of rock as we flashed past. The silence was eerie. Suddenly, in fear I called out:

"Granny Duo!"

No answer.

I sat up, but was held down by something. I stretched out my hand and touched a thick rope that was wound protectively over my waist so that I wouldn't slip overboard. One end of the rope was tied to the containers, the other over the edge of the raft. I untied the rope and looked about me. Granny Duo was nowhere to be seen. I put my ears against the containers to catch some sounds at the front. But everything was dead quiet. I couldn't even hear the sound of oars slapping the water. I got into the kneeling position and looked over the containers.

The two of them were there. Ergeze had put the oars beside him and was letting the raft glide forward on its own. Granny Duo sat close by him, her cheek against his broad chest, one arm encircled around his waist. Ergeze lowered his head and touched her forehead with his cheek, smelling the sweet scent of her hair. Ahead on an islet in the middle of the river, a pair of cranes were resting quietly. When they saw the raft, they opened their wings and swept upward as they emitted their sad cry:

"Gah, gah …"

I was so frightened. I lay down immediately, tied up the two ends of the rope, and closed my eyes. After a while Ergeze sang again in a soft whisper:

The stars above are locked in pairs.
The brightest one is over the mouth of the river.
Little sister Duo's eyes are deep and dark,
Her lips are burning red.
Her looks tug at my heart.

And Granny Duo responded:

The peony is king among flowers.
Youth comes first among men.
My brother is linked to me shoulder by shoulder.
No separation ever,
Until the waters of the Yellow River run dry.

Ergeze:

Go up the mountain to look at the plains.
The grapes in the plains grow in clusters.
I cannot disentangle myself from my sister Duo.
Will sister Duo stay with me?

Granny Duo:

The east is turning white; dawn is at hand.
The cows and sheep in the plains are stirring.
Sister Duo has cried her eyes dry.
The city of Lanzhou is right before us.

Their songs stopped. There was a long silence, broken only by the sound of the river beating against the edge of the raft. Finally 1 heard Granny Duo say in a weak voice, "I must go back." She climbed toward me over the wooden containers.

"Little Sheng, Little Sheng!" she called softly.

I made a snoring sound.

"Fast asleep," she said to herself as she sat beside me.

*

In the distance a cock crowed. I opened my eyes slowly. A dark red light suffused the eastern skies, and then burst out into all the colors of the rainbow to light up the river. The mist that hovered over the river through the night slowly lifted until it finally separated itself from the folds of the earth. With the mist lifted, the trees, the undulating hills, the high white pagodas, and the green melon fields bathed in dew now stood out vividly. Then smoke began to rise from hidden chimneys from both sides of the river. Soon after we could discern the faint murmur of the marketplace.

Our raft trip was coming to an end. I looked at Granny Duo. Her eyes were shining with a fierce light; her face glowed with happiness. She held her chin in her hands and looked far away. Her eyelashes fluttered as if she was thinking, or hoping.

The market was on a piece of open ground on the bank of the Yellow River. There was a wooden arched bridge ahead called the Sleeping Bridge. Across that bridge was the gate to the city. And just outside that gate was the marketplace.

Ergeze steered the raft to shore and jumped up on the bank. Granny Duo and I helped him to unload the fruit. Granny and I carried the fruit while Ergeze shouldered the raft. In minutes we arrived at the heart of the market.

The huge market space was bustling. There were stalls with all kinds of fruits and vegetables. At that time things were cheap. Melons were sold in heaps, apples by wooden containers. A whole crowd of retail dealers carried baskets on shoulder poles and hawked their goods through the market, looking for a favorable deal as they strolled around.

On the side of the Sleeping Bridge was a row of stalls selling beef noodles, baked bread soaked in mutton broth, and soups of assorted innards. Some of the peasants who had finished their business would sit under the canopy of woven bamboo, hang up their straw hats on the wall, roll up their sleeves, and get into noisy conversations. They discussed the market, extracting information from each other, nodding and laughing boisterously as they ate from the huge bowls of coarse white pottery until the sweat ran down their faces.

Ergeze stood the raft upright, held it in place by placing the oars against it, and ordered me to keep an eye on it. He and Granny Duo left the center of the market. I watched after them until they disappeared into the gateway of the city.

I unfastened my containers, took off the covering of wild lotus leaves, and exposed my crab apples. A middleman with a little mustache came forward and patted me on the head.

"Where are your elders, sonny?" he asked.

"I am the elder here."

"That's talking big!" He laughed. "Well, master, how are you selling your goods? Will you hawk them yourself, or shall I help?"

"Would you sell them for me? I don't know how." And so he squatted down and started his spiel.

"Bright red crab apples—the sweet scent of one will last for half a month!"

A crowd came over. The middleman set a high price; the buyers offered very low figures; and thus a fierce bargaining campaign was sparked. Soon a compromise was reached. The middleman counted out the money, took two jiao\fn{A note reads: A unit of renminbi (RMB), the Chinese currencyu, that is one-tenth of a yuan*; the current* [1988] rate of exchange is about 3.6 RMB = $1.00.} as commission, and gave the rest to me with the warning:

"Be careful, my boy!"

Lighting a cigarette, he set off again looking for business.

By this time Granny Duo and Ergeze were back. Granny now wore a green kerchief over her head, while Ergeze had a pair of rubber-soled shoes on his feet. The pair smiled at me. Granny handed me some meat packed in rice. They had bought it specially for me.

"Eat, little fool," she said, and looked at me knowingly. I had no trouble obeying her command.

Then Ergeze shouldered the raft. Granny Duo and I followed and we left the market. The Yellow River is very rapid. You can only float downstream; you cannot row upward. So the only way back home was by foot, carrying the raft. This raft was made of eight big-sized sheepskin air bags, two in the middle and three on each side. The insides were lined with tar to prevent leaking cracks. With the rowing pole and the plants, the whole affair weighed almost thirty jin. For a weaker man, carrying that raft back was out of the question. But Ergeze was incredibly strong. He actually carried it on his back and walked the first twenty or so li\gn{A note reads: A measure of distance, equivalent to half a kilometer.} without stopping. He had a knack of changing shoulders every now and then without slowing down. The raft swayed with his movements as if to the rhythm of a lighthearted dance. Granny Duo walked close behind him, with one hand on the raft, her steps quick and light. I somehow felt that she was keeping pace with Ergeze not only in her walk, but also in her heartbeat. Her eyes looked so fondly on him.

We arrived at the foot of the section of the Great Wall by sunset. This was quite near home. Ergeze put up the raft and we all sat by the wall to catch our breath. Granny extracted a few pieces of candy from her bosom and shared them with us. She looked at Ergeze with longing and Ergeze returned her gaze with significance. Slowly they both averted their eyes. Ergeze drew something on the ground with his fingers while Granny Duo was lost in thought. Later Granny Duo raised her head, looked at the brilliant sunset beyond the river, and sighed deeply. We had to go. After the break we walked even faster. Nobody said a word and we reached home presently.

After hearing about the trip downstream, the rumor mongers in the village went wild. As far as I could see, Granny Duo and Ergeze resumed normal relations. They seemed quite distant. Even so, the rumors about their scandalous behavior spread.

Guotai, the lame village elder, was a distant cousin to Grandpa Duo. In fact, the latter was Guotai's senior by one year, so he always greeted Grandpa as Elder Brother Duo. Actually Grandpa was a bit intimidated by his cousin's presence. As for Guotai, he both pitied and despised Grandpa. As to that minx Granny Duo, he could not bear the thought of her!

He had always held that it was the misfortune of the clan that Grandpa Duo had taken such a wife. Such a shallow flirt, so wild and unruly, giving rise to so much gossip. That woman was an outrage to their ancestors! When the rumors were at their most feverish, Guotai felt he could keep his silence no longer. One day he flatly asked his cousin:

"Elder Brother Duo, let me ask you. Exactly whose wife is Granny Duo?"

"What do you mean?"

"Don't you know what's been going on behind your back?"

"What?"

"Your wife and Ergeze. They have been acting like a married couple!"

Grandpa Duo smiled.

"Don't be foolish. Ergeze is a poor orphan. He and Granny enjoy one another's company. That's all."

"Ha!" Guotai was so angry his face turned purple. He stared at Grandpa in speechless fury, then lifted his head and laughed mirthlessly. "Just you wait and see!"

*

And Guotai didn't give up his efforts to attack Ergeze and Granny Duo. In time his malice precipitated the final disaster.

The beginning of the end was the eve of the New Year Festival. The provincial leadership sent down a young woman to organize the New Year festivities. She brought with her a revised edition of a traditional local opera, a Qin Qiang play called Roaming the Turtle Mountain. We were all overjoyed that Roaming the Turtle Mountain was to be staged for the lunar New Year. When it came to picking actors, many young people volunteered. The most coveted role was that of the heroine: Hu Fenglien. Several village girls auditioned with prepared verses and songs. The female official was clearly not impressed with what she saw or heard. Her eyes wandered over the little crowd who had come to witness the auditions—and her eyes lighted on Granny Duo.

"Come over, please," she said.

Granny Duo edged over, very embarrassed.

"Would you like to take a part?"

"Me?" Granny Duo was so surprised that for a moment she was speechless. Grown women never took part in acting in our village.

"Yes," the official replied. "I want you for the heroine. You are the living image of Hu Fenglien."

Granny Duo was elated by this vote of confidence. She blushed and nodded.

Other actors were then chosen. All the minor roles were settled very quickly, but they could not find a suitable actor to play the hero-lover, Tian Yuchuang. Granny Duo gathered up her courage and said:

"Let me choose somebody. Ergeze! He would be perfect. He has a beautiful voice."

When Ergeze learned that he was being solicited to act in a play, he shook his head repeatedly.

"No, no, no!"

Then he felt a pair of burning eyes fixed on him and saw Granny Duo looking at him earnestly. He swal- lowed his unfinished words of refusal and silently joined the group of actors.

Later events proved that Ergeze was indeed a good singer. For years he had sung the local huar, and since the impassioned Qin Qiang tunes had much in common with the huar, he gave a masterful performance. And so did Granny Duo. But one person in the audience was not pleased: Guotai. For him, the pretend lovers were not play-acting. Rather, they were both sending out covert messages of love.

Directly after the performance, he dashed over to Grandpa Duo's in a fury.

"Did you watch the play?" he demanded.
"Yes," Grandpa Duo replied.
"What do you think of it?"
"Nothing."
"What!" Guotai gave him an angry look.
"Not bad, considering it's just peasants acting."
"Your wife and Ergeze's acting was the personification of lewdness!" Guotai laughed dryly.
"This is the new society," Grandpa Duo said complacently.
"Nonsense!" Guotai couldn't contain himself any more. "What has the new society to do with a bitch in heat!"
"Cousin!" interrupted Granny Duo, who had just arrived home. "To whom are you referring?"
"You better be careful," Guotai warned, looking at her threateningly. "People are talking about you!"
"Which of those shameless busybodies is slandering their grandmother? Let them bite their own tongues!" said Granny Duo.
Guotai's face turned black with anger.
"Didn't the whole world see you making eyes at each other onstage? Do you think everybody is blind? Damn your impudence!"
"Let them think what they want! I don't care a whit for their opinion!"
"Well, I care. I can't stand there and see people bringing shame on their ancestors."
"My body and my heart are my own! I don't need other people's meddling."
"I must and will interfere!" Guotai stood up suddenly.
"It's none of your business."
"You're shameless!"
"You're a hypocrite."
"Harlot!"
"Bully!"
Guotai's face changed from white to crimson and then to purple. Nobody had dared speak back at him, not to mention abusing him to his face. This was not to be tolerated! A vicious stream of choler shot up to his head. He picked up a piece of firewood and hit out at Granny Duo.
Granny hurled herself at the old man and laid her nails into his face. Guotai was now furious beyond bounds; the end of firewood in his hand beat like hail on Granny Duo's body and hands. Granny Duo continued to curse him, and even though it brought more blows on herself, she kept on cursing.
Grandpa Duo, at first frozen in shock, finally thrust himself between the two. With tears streaming down his face, he implored Guotai:
"Hit me! Hit me instead!"
Guotai gave him a contemptuous look, then stamped his feet in exasperation. Throwing away the stick, he left. That same night Ergeze came back from working in the fields. He saw the bruises on Granny Duo, but didn't say a word. He just sat silently on the steps, unmoving, until the cock began to crow. Then he glided away like a ghost to his own bed in the hut near the threshing ground.
The next morning we heard that Ergeze had given Guotai a severe beating. He broke two of Guotai's ribs.
Of course, the incident was reported to the district. The authorities were very angry. They held that Ergeze had already committed an offense by flirting with the wife of his master, and now to beat the village chief! Ergeze must be punished severely! But Ergeze was nowhere to be found. It was said he had run far away.
With Ergeze gone, Granny Duo pined away. She began to look quite haggard. I seldom heard her talk, much less laugh. On moonlit nights, she would sit on a grindstone by the threshing ground and sew a pair of thick soles, stitch by stitch; her hands worked with loving care while her eyes brimmed with tears.
Once, she took out the raft and drifted on the river; she laid heaps of crab apples on the raft. As she steered the raft hither and thither, she dropped the apples one by one into the water. Suddenly it flashed upon me that it was exactly one year ago that we made that trip on the raft. The words of her song floated across the water:

The curved moon has risen.
A thousand stars are twinkling.
If my love is living, send a sign.
If my love is dead, send a dream.

Her song broke my heart..

*

One afternoon, as I walked by their home, Granny Duo beckoned to me. In fact, she had been on the lookout for me and hastily drew me inside her kitchen, saying to me very affectionately:

"Oh, Little Sheng, Granny has a special word for you. Little Sheng, do you miss Ergeze?"

I noticed that Granny's face was alight with excitement as she looked at me.

"Oh, yes," I said, without even having to think. "Is he back?"

"Yes, he's back." She nodded to me and whispered into my ear. "He's in hiding in the mountain canal."

"Why there?"

"They still want to arrest him."

At that she pushed a little basket into my hands. In it was a heap of pancakes covered with leaves.

"Take this to Ergeze, but be careful. If you meet anybody, just say you're collecting pig's feed."

I took the basket, walked to the door, and turned around.

"Does Grandpa Duo know?"

She nodded vigorously.

The mountain canal she alluded to is to the west of the village, running parallel to the Yellow River. That section of the river runs close to the mountain cliffs. The water lifted through the water cart runs right through this canal—actually a deep cave cutting through the mountain. The cave was a good two li deep and very spacious and very forbidding.

Now, for the sake of Ergeze, I puffed up my courage and crept inside the cave. It was very dark and the farther I went, the darker it became, until finally I could barely see a thing. My heart began to beat wildly, so I called out timidly:

"Ergeze, Ergeze."

Suddenly a hand stretched out and caught me. There was a burst of laughter. Ergeze was right in front of me, a sly twinkle in his eye. He looked much thinner, with an untidy growth of stubble over his lips.

I collected my wits and looked about me. On the dry bank overlooking the running water was a bundle of hay. And a stone, evidently used by Ergeze for a pillow. So this was his retreat. He seemed glad to see me and asked, while gulping down the pancakes:

"Little Sheng, how's your family?"

"Well, thank you," I said. "And where have you been the last six months?"

"Why, I've been to the Flower and Fruit Mountain."

"And where is that?" I asked, never having heard of such a place.

"Near the Water Curtain Cave."

"And where is the Water Curtain Cave?"

"Little brother, don't you even know that?" He looked at me pityingly. "They're all in The Monkey King." He chuckled and passed his hand over my head. "You've never heard of The Monkey King?"\fn{Apparently a reference to the novel Journey to the West by the 16th century Chinese writer Wu Chengen, in which the Chinese Buddhist monk and pilgrim Hsuan Tsang (600?-664AD) relates a series of adventures which happened to himself and his companion, the Monkey King, on their way to India.}

"No," I admitted.

"You poor country child. All right, then, I'll tell you the story of The Monkey King."

So he told me of the Monkey King taking over the Cave of the Water Curtain. It was a wonderful story.

"And how did you know all this?" I asked when he had finished.

"I read."

"Do you mean to say you've been to school?"

"Yes. But, look, Little Sheng, it's late now. It's time for you to go home."

He saw me off to the mouth of the cave and stood under the water cart and watched me walk away. I looked back. He was still there, standing in the moonlight. His long shadow flickered upon the water.

After that I was sent several more times to take food to Ergeze. Each time he told me a new story: Making Havoc in Heaven, The Princess with the Iron Fan, The Cow Monster, and The Flaming Mountain. Oh, what indescribable joy these stories brought to me, a poor boy who had seen nothing except the Yellow River. They opened to me a marvelous new world; they enabled my imagination to soar. I could neither sleep nor drink for thinking of the Monkey King and of his somersault leap over one-hundred-thousand-and-eight li.

Then for several days running, Granny Duo did not send me. One night I lay alone under the grapevine, looking into the starry sky and wondering about all the wonderful things that happened up there. I couldn't sleep any longer, so I got up, dressed, and slipped out the gate and made straight for the mountain canal.

I entered the cave and walked to Ergeze's hiding place. He was lying on the hay, covered with a new jacket that Granny Duo had made for him. He slept soundly. I wanted to wake him, but then I reconsidered. So I sat by his side, and before long I fell asleep myself.

I don't know how long I slept, but I was suddenly wakened by a rustling sound. In the darkness somebody was moving furtively. My hair stood on end. I thought it was Guotai. I squeezed myself against the wall, hoping Ergeze would wake up and run away. The shadow had made its way over.

"Ergeze, my love, I am here."

"Is it you?"

"Yes. Nothing can stop me!"

Two pairs of eyes searched each other in the darkness. Granny Duo bent down; her long hair fell over Ergeze's face. Their lips crushed against each other.

I crept away silently, stealing out by another opening in the cave. Once out of the cave, I began to run. My heart was beating madly, my whole body burning.

*

Evidently Guotai had smelled trouble. One day he brought over a contingent of searchers and invaded the cave. Luckily the cave was so deep, they walked a long way without finding anything and finally retreated.

Every day I prayed that Granny Duo would send me into the cave with food for Ergeze, but she never did. One night I was restless; I crept in on my own.

There was nobody there. Ergeze was gone, and all his belongings with him. Only the bundle of hay was left behind, and the stone he had used for a pillow. I felt the hay. It was still warm. Ergeze had just left. I came out of the cave and looked. Under the glimmering moonlight I searched for him, under bushes speckled with dew, in the shadow of willow trees, by the water cart. As I searched, I called his name softly.

Not a sound, not an echo.

The ancient water cart continued its never-ending revolution. One circle, then another. My eyes watered. I felt something wet and salty running down my cheeks.

I started back, keeping alongside the riverbank. Suddenly I saw a little raft floating silently on the turgid waters, heading out where night was thickest. Under the glimmer of the moon I could make out that the figure in red steering the raft was none other than Granny Duo. Ergeze was crouched behind her. Suddenly I understood. I shot off after them, running along the bank of the river. I wanted to shout but I dared not. I waved my hands, crying in my heart:

"Granny Duo, stop! stop! Let me say goodbye, I want to wish you—"

I stumbled and fell into the mud. When I raised my head again, the raft had become a speck and then it disappeared from view. The tears welled up in my eyes and I was blinded.

*

Thirty years have passed since that night. I have been to school, settled in the city. The peasant boy survived all the intervening years of upheaval and he has metamorphosed into a wage earner.

Looking back, indeed, what have I not passed through? But everything has gone by like whirling clouds. Only the Yellow River, the glimmering moonlight, Granny Duo persecuted by the likes of Guotai, and the wanderer Ergeze—only they have stayed on in my memory. These long years I have been to many places, seen a lot of life, met all kinds of men and women—but the minute I close my eyes, the image of Granny Duo rises before me: her bright eyes, her light figure, her pink palms. And with her arises the image of Ergeze, his big strong body and the firm expression on his handsome face.

Thirty years ago … and here I was back in my home village, during the festival in commemoration of Souls of the Dead.

I went to the grave of my parents. The yellow sands of the plateau were steeped in the warmth and tender green of spring. The peasants came out in families; the young, supporting the old, went to the graves of their ancestors, bringing food and wine. At the grave site, the villagers performed the memorial rites to their respective ancestors, and then gathered together to eat the food they brought, enjoying a simple comradeship, as in a primitive community.

After the villagers left, I stood on the top of a knoll, contemplating the mountains and rivers of my native land, which I had not seen for so many years. In the gloaming I walked to Granny Duo's grave.

*

That night Granny Duo and Ergeze were discovered very soon after they sailed away. Guotai brought out a contingent of men who raced after them on four rafts. Around midnight, Guotai and his cohorts overtook and surrounded their raft. Ergeze slipped into the water and disappeared. Granny Duo, in trying to make her way out on the raft, caused it to overturn. When they fished her out of the water, she had stopped breathing.

*

The day of the burial, the townspeople turned out to bid a last farewell to the woman so many of them had considered evil. When the coffin was lowered into the open grave, a last rite was performed: the opening of the coffin for people to have a last look at the departed. Right at that moment there was a disturbance in the crowd. Ergeze appeared, very thin and worn, his face completely expressionless, his eyes calm and steady.

The people watched him silently. He leapt down into the open grave, bent over the coffin, and looked long and hard at the face of Granny Duo. She was dressed in white; her face was calm, as if asleep. Only her eyes, once so expressive, were parted slightly. Ergeze stretched out his hand and closed her eyes with the long lashes. A tear dropped on Granny Duo's pink palms.

Then he stood up and people made way for him automatically. He made a slight acknowledgment, then walked away in big strides, never looking back.

*

At the insistence of Guotai, Granny Duo was buried in an isolated spot, away from the burial site of her ancestors. Grandpa Duo had loved her deeply. It was a very special kind of love he had for this woman twenty-five years younger than himself, something of an elder's tolerance for a beautiful and capricious young woman. He had carried with him a burden of guilt for his seniority. Whenever he saw Granny busy brewing his medicine, sending for doctors, and looking after him so carefully, his heart would swell with gratitude. Thus when he realized what was going on between his wife and Ergeze, he was not jealous; he forgave them with the understanding of an elder. After Granny Duo's death, he was heartbroken; what with loneliness and illness, he died soon after. The villagers buried him next to his wife, according to his last wishes.

I was shocked to see these two graves so forsaken. Nobody had come to put new soil over their graves; nobody had come to perform memorial rites. It was true, Granny Duo had no children, and their closest relative, Guotai, would not allow anybody to add so much as a spadeful of new earth over their graves. I stood and looked at that desolate scene, unable to check my tears.

A flock of sheep climbed up the slope, nibbling the tender grass as they shook their big fat tails. Following them was an old shepherd in a short fur jacket, with a spade under his arm.. His calmness betrayed a trace of sadness. He walked to the two graves and started to pile new earth onto the gravetops-until they were higher than the surrounding graves. At last he covered them with a layer of turf. Then he squatted down in front of the graves while his bleary eyes welled with tears.

I recognized him as the scene brought back that moonlit night of thirty years ago. He also recognized me. He stretched out a rough palm and held me tightly, shaking my hand up and down as the tears ran down his face.

He was not at all the image of Ergeze that I remembered. He seemed to have shrunk. His brows were furrowed with wrinkles. His hair was gray, as was his ragged beard, and he was stooped. He was every inch an old, old man.

We sat down and talked about old days. He told me that after Granny Duo's death he went back to his native village. Soon land reform was implemented, and with his land allotment, he settled down. For the last thirty years, during every festival commemorating the dead, he would come and add some new earth to the graves of Granny Duo and Grandpa Duo. Sometimes, if the hour was late, he would curl himself up near the graves and spend the night there. With that admission his eyes gave forth a strange light. In that one instant I saw again the young raftsman of the old days.

The lingering rays of the sun finally melted away into the flowing river. I said goodbye to Ergeze and walked down the slope with a heavy heart.

It was dark as I descended. Ergeze had already spread his fur jacket on the ground beside the graves. He said it was too late to go back; he would spend the night there.

I looked back again at the grave of Granny Duo. On the outer border of the grave, the young grass bent slightly in the wind, full of the vigor of life.

79.76 The Moon On The South Lake\fn{by Liu Fudao (1940-)} Hanyang County, Hubei Province, China (M) 10

Some years ago, there was only one state-operated factory on the strip of land which skirted the curve of the South Lake. That was the Wuhan Third Pharmaceutical Factory. Over the last few years, however, the chemical plants in the city had been moved here one after another, consequent upon the vociferous protests of the residents against pollution. This strip of land had now become a chemical industry center.

What factories were these? On the eastern side of the winding asphalt road, a row of signboards pointed out to the passers-by the location of these factories: the Central-South Chemical Factory, the Red Flag Chemical Plant, the Spark Chemical Factory and so on. Their names were all quite imposing and well chosen. But, in truth, they were what one would call "street-operated" workshops, which had only a hundred or so workers each. Some people naturally looked down on them and refused to call them factories; no, they were not worthy of such a designation! Nevertheless, they flourished defiantly and many of their products had no rivals in central and south China.

Take the Spark Chemical Factory for example. It had a pathetic look indeed, and nobody would think much of it. But it turned out a wide variety of products, such as anti-aging tincture, ferric chloride, ferrous chloride as well as small rubber caps for soya-bean sauce bottles with an annual output value of over a million yuan. Its ferric chloride alone was indispensable water-purifying agent for the whole Wuhan triple city.

The full name of this small "street factory" was the Spark Chemical Factory of Lion Street, Wuchang District, Wuhan city, but on its official seal the characters "Lion Street" were deliberately left out. In order to get approval, the factory's Party Secretary Wan had had to do some explaining to her superiors. She said:

"The young men in our factory are all quite worried that the girls they want to make friends with will turn away upon hearing the words 'street factory.' Besides, these two words won't help in business matters. Once people notice them in our letters, they will not take their content seriously."

All this sounded rather absurd, but the explanations, given in earnest by Secretary Wan, seemed quite reasonable and convincing. In view of the seriousness of the young workers' romantic interests and, more important of course, the future of the factory, the authorities concerned, being reasonable, gave their tacit consent. However, had the elevation of status, at least as shown on the factory's official seal, turned out to be a help? Whenever the factory wanted to buy some material, it still had to go through the whole process of imploring people for their understanding of its needs, as if asking for a favor. It also had to do with the fact that the products of this small "street factory," however good, were not for any domestic use; neither were they any good as playthings. And, what's more, whenever people heard the names of its products, they would be nervous and frightened. What the hell were these products? Some poisonous stuff? If so, surely nobody should help in its production.

That was how things stood. Now the fifty-year-old woman Secretary Wan had another problem. The factory's principal source of profit, ferric chloride, had to be changed from a liquid into a solid product. A two-storied workshop had been built for that purpose and all the necessary equipment installed. But the factory had not been able to get a boiler. In the words of Secretary Wan, "The fire is singeing our eyebrows!" It was indeed a desperate situation.

How should one describe Secretary Wan? It was not wrong to see her as a Party cadre, but it was also quite correct to look upon her as a housewife. Her ways and methods of work did not seem to proceed from any well-founded theory, but everybody had to do as she said. When the factory needed something, she would strike the "bell," a piece of steel, two feet long, and summoned all the workers. She then put the problem before them, asking them to suggest a solution. The workers would go home and consult the members of their family. They would, if necessary, call upon their relatives and friends, or go out of their way to ask their acquaintances in certain organizations or larger factories to help. After a verbal promise had been obtained, a formal letter would be issued, with the factory's seal on it. Usually, in order to get as soon as possible the materials of equipment the factory needed, Secretary Wan would have to go and see various people herself.

But this time, in spite of all the usual efforts, there was still no boiler to be obtained. Eventually, some workers got hold of an important piece of information: the Jiangnan New Waterworks had recently purchased a large boiler. Their original small one was. left in the courtyard of their living quarters. Immediately, a messenger was sent to make inquiries about the boiler, but the waterworks refused to sell it. They merely replied that the old boiler was still needed for their own use. Shortly after this, the workers of the "street factory" learned that if Assistant Manager Yuan, who was in charge of supplies at the waterworks, would agree to sign an order, the boiler could be obtained with or without a letter of introduction. The strategy was worked out: obviously, somebody had to go and see Assistant Manager Yuan. However, since he was rather difficult to approach, no one offered to take up the mission.

Dong, dong, dong

Secretary Wan again struck the steel bar. She asked if anyone was willing to accept the assignment but no one responded. The workers were all looking at her in silence.

“It’s no use staring at me like this! What are we going to do?”

“Let me try!” suddenly someone said in a muffled voice.

Under normal circumstances, no one would take any notice of this speaker. But now, caught in this awkward predicament, Secretary Wan and the workers were as anxious for help as starving people waiting for the provision of rice. Whoever accepted the task would appear a savior to them. However, when they looked at the speaker, both the leader and the workers had doubts and their hearts sank.

The volunteer was a young man named Ke Ting. Now that all eyes were set on him, his pale face at once turned a deep red. He was tall, about 1.85 meters, and certainly appeared conspicuous.

“Well, you may go and have a try. Anyhow … anyhow, you must get the boiler for us.” Secretary Wan looked at him with half-closed eyes, not really impressed. She had almost wanted to say, “Well, since no one else volunteers to do it, go ahead, but, I don’t expect miracles from you.” Finally, she thought it best to give him a positive order.

Though Ke Ting held no respectable position or title, he was a well-qualified technician, and, as far as work was concerned, he had a good reputation in the factory. The solid ferric chloride workshop which would soon be put into operation was a large and somewhat modernized one. The blueprints and technological processes for setting it up had all been worked out by this young man, who had never taken any courses in a technical college. Indeed, the road he had taken was very much the same as those followed by most of the Chinese urban youths: soon after graduating from senior middle school he was sent to the countryside for two years and then he entered a street-operated factory after having been brought back. That seemed to be the pattern for the educated youths these days, and he had had no other choice. Yet, not long after his arrival, Ke Ting was able to solve the factory’s numerous technical problems. Whenever some new technology was to be adopted, one could rely on him. As a rule, he would study both the new equipment and the directions carefully, and carry out repeated experiments till he understood exactly how things worked. He never let his colleagues down. All the youngsters in this factory admired him and even the old workers thought he was an extraordinary person.

However, what was regrettable was that, though honest by nature, Ke Ting was far too shy. He had many ideas in his mind and wanted to be sociable, but words always failed him. No wonder the older workers were all greatly surprised when such a shy young man, who had never before done any public relations work for the factory, suddenly offered to go and see Assistant Manager Yuan and try to get the required boiler. Indeed, even Ke Ting himself doubted whether he would succeed.

*

Now let us talk about something else.

In the flourishing shopping center of Wuchang, two rather attractive girls could sometimes be seen, dressed alike, with similar bobbed hair, and they were about the same height, roughly 1.72 meters. No matter how crowded the streets and how numerous the pedestrians on the pavements, they would always walk together, arm in arm. Because they were tall and had well-balanced figures, these two attractive girls used to catch people’s attention. Even the arrogant youths had to make way for them, admiring them as the two of them went by. The girl with a round face was called Li Lu, while the other, who had an oval face, was Yuan Xia. The two of them had gone to the same school, but they were in different grades. However, their similar build, common inclinations and interests somehow had brought them together. As close friends, they had a lot to talk about whenever they got together. They also advised each other in their love affairs. Their fundamental requirement was: the young man should not be less than 1.85 meters tall. Good heavens! That was a tall order! At present, when the percentage of tall people in the whole country is not too high, it was certainly not easy to find a young man of 1.85 meters who was about their age and residing in the same city, let alone the other considerations such as family background, occupation and monthly salary!

They also agreed that they would listen only to each other and not to any of the advice or orders of their parents or match-makers. For example, if anyone introduced a boyfriend to Li Lu, Yuan Xia would have a good look at him. If her dignified nose twitched, signifying disgust, as she pronounced, “Oh, what an ugly dwarf!” Li Lu’s expression would change at once. And that was the end of the poor young man.

I mentioned above that the two friends frequently went out for a stroll in the flourishing district. That was half a year ago. And now, Li Lu had found a boyfriend, approved by Yuan Xia. On Fridays, their day off, Yuan Xia could no longer be with Li Lu as she used to before. True, Li Lu would come to see her with her boyfriend, but Yuan Xia understood that they did so out of consideration for her feelings, that they did not want her to feel neglected. Yet whenever Yuan Xia saw them off she could not help feeling enchanted by the sight of the two of them cycling joyfully, shoulder to shoulder. Yuan Xia’s mother advised her time and again not to stick so stubbornly to her terms. Why not consider a young man who was of the same height, or even a bit shorter? But her suggestion was usually greeted with strong opposition from both Yuan Xia and Li Lu. For example, Yuan Xia's mother said at one time:

"Look at your father. He's shorter than I, but that doesn't bother me." Yuan Xia looked at her mother coldly, saying:

"You want everybody to be like you!" Then, in a single phrase she summed up what she would be looking for in her future husband: a tall, honest young man. She openly announced this at home: she wouldn't settle for less. Father became angry and demanded:

"Don't you think you ought to put political standards first?" Yuan Xia replied stubbornly:

"All right then. I'll say an honest, tall young man. Any more objections?"

Yuan Xia worked in the state-operated Third Pharmaceutical Factory, and she went there and back every day on her bicycle.

One fine spring day in March, she thought of calling upon Li Lu on her way home for a heart-to-heart talk. The road lay along an embankment of the South Lake. The evening sun was shining obliquely on the lake, gilding its ripples, and a circular range of green mountains was reflected in the water. Yuan Xia now and then glanced at the scene far and near, as she complacently rode past several "ugly dwarfs." To her surprise, a rider on a "Phoenix 12" bicycle swept past her. She speeded up and soon got ahead of him again. Looking back, she noticed that the cyclist was a tall young man, about the same height as Li Lu's boyfriend. That was certainly interesting. After riding a bit farther, she looked back again to see if he was trying to catch up. This in a way was an insult to the young man, who was none other than Ke Ting going home after work. Now, we know that he was an honest man. But an honest person sometimes may also behave in a peculiar manner. When he realized that the girl was challenging him, he too speeded up and passed her again. But Yuan Xia didn't like that. Bending both her arms backwards and lowering her body almost parallel to the ground, like a cyclist in a race, she rode with all her might, and soon got ahead of Ke Ting. Without having time to straighten up, she suddenly heard a clanking noise and the pedals suddenly gave way. She glided on scores of meters more and then her bike stopped. She got off and saw Ke Ting riding past her. The "ugly dwarfs" behind also caught up and hurried past her, talking and laughing loudly at her misfortune. On hearing their laughs, Ke Ting looked back and saw the girl was in terrible trouble, not knowing what to do. He felt sorry for her. Turning back, he did a half circle with his bike and stopped beside her.

"Let me have a look," he said, as he took out a test pencil on which was attached a small screw-driver. Then, he got a small spanner\fn{A tiny wrench.} out from his key-ring and started working on the "Phoenix 18" without waiting for any word from Yuan Xia. He tried the pedals and found that the chain was broken. Helplessly, Yuan Xia stared at the young man and could not do anything while he was repairing her bicycle. She sighed:

"What a mess!"

Night was approaching. A chilly gust of wind was blowing across the lake, which changed in color from green to light blue and then to bluish black, appearing as mysterious as the evening sky. Although Yuan Xia was tall she was after all at girl. In the company of a stranger and in this desolate place, she could not help gradually feeling uneasy.

Imperceptibly, the slowly rising moon lifted the veil of darkness off the South Lake, and the evening sky was clearly reflected in the water. In this quite spring night, the moon and a few street lamps shone on the young man and girl who had met by chance. Yuan Xia was worried about her bicycle and she was also a bit scared. Her heart was full of gratitude and she kept wondering how she could thank him properly. Then she reflected: was it not better to let herself suffer alone for what she had done? Why should she involve other people in her trouble? But what would happen if he gave up and went away? Push her bike all the way home or carry it on her shoulder? She was genuinely confused. After considering the question once more, she decided that she had no choice but to rely completely on this stranger, who was working hard to repair her bicycle and whose name she did not yet know.

"Look, let's do it this way," Ke Ting said at last. "If you trust me, you can go home on my bike, so that your family won't be worried about you. I'll be able to fix your bike, but it will still take some time. Tomorrow we'll get our own bikes back." He decided to wheel the girl's bike back home if he failed to have it repaired on the spot.

"But I don't like leaving you behind here," Yuan Xia said sincerely.

"You don't trust me, do you? You're afraid that I may play a trick on you and exchange your fashionable bike for my old one. Don't worry. There is a license plate on my bike. You can go to the police and easily find out my name and address."

"No, I absolutely don't mean that!" Yuan Xia hurried to explain.

"Then why stay here? There's no need. I'll get up earlier tomorrow and bring your bike to the gate of your unit. Are you from the Central China Agricultural College or the Third Pharmaceutical Factory?"

Yuan Xia replied that she was from the latter. But she was still reluctant to go. Apart from her sense of obligation to keep him company until he had finished repairing her bike, she could not think of any other reason for not going home. Ke Ting repeatedly urged her to leave him, and even threatened to stop repairing if she didn't, until she was finally convinced that there was really no need for her to stay. Then she rode away on his bicycle; her brain was in it whirl.

Early the next morning, Ke Ting arrived and waited in front of the gate of the pharmaceutical factory. The exchange ceremony was very simple. There was no handshaking and no signing of names. It was all over after a few brief remarks. In joyful surprise, she asked:

"You've fixed it?" He replied,

"Yes."

Yuan Xia was full of gratitude and was wondering how she could reward him. She was about to ask his name and address but the young man smiled, got on his bike and rode away. Yuan Xia ran after him and called out loudly, "If you need my help, you can find me at the New Waterworks living quarters."

Having heard the above romantic story, Li Lu, acting as Yuan Xia's adviser, slapped the table and expressed her surprise. She thought Yuan Xia was too negligent. If she had taken down his license number she would have been able to find out his name and then it was quite possible that the two could meet again.

However, Yuan Xia defended herself:

"If you had been in my shoes, you'd have been just as careless as I was. I was rather confused."

That was what she said, but she had her regrets.

*

All practical Chinese people are well familiar with the ways of the world. In order to survive, they know they must depend on one another. "To help one another" is the spirit in all their daily affairs. Ke Ting had helped Yuan Xia by repairing her bicycle, but he had never dreamed that he would soon need the help of this girl whom he had met by, chance. Of course, he had no ulterior motive in helping her. It was only when Secretary Wan spoke about the boiler in the New Waterworks' living quarters that he recalled what the girl had said to him.

On coming off duty, he rode directly to the New Waterworks' living quarters. In the courtyard he saw three blocks of new four-storied buildings and some old houses. Not knowing her name at all, how could he find her? He could not simply say he was looking for the girl whose bicycle broke down one evening while she was on her way home along the embankment of the South Lake. Ke Ting was at a loss. Suddenly, he realized it was a ridiculous idea, offering to try and get the boiler for his factory. Still, he was not going to give up. He watched every window, hoping to see that oval face he faintly remembered. Eventually, it grew dark and he left the place in dejection.

The next day, when Secretary Wan saw him she asked at once, "Young Ke what's happened to that boiler you were going to get?"

"I tried, but I failed," he replied.

"Did you see anybody?" she asked again.

"No, I didn't," replied Ke Ting. Secretary Wan became impatient.

"Then go and try again!" she said. "Whom did you ask for last time? Perhaps I can give you some help. If you don't know what to say, I'll tell you."

The young man dared not tell her the truth. He could only say, "I'll go and try again when my shift is over."

Upon hearing the word "try," Secretary Wan became even more impatient.

"I'm telling you, my boy," she said. "This not joking matter: If you have any difficulty, or if you must give them something, tell me. Anyway, take a packet of cigarettes with you."

"Leave me alone! She … doesn't smoke!"

Strange how Secretary Wan could tell Ke Ting had a girl in mind. Had he given himself away somehow? She laughed and began to see a ray of hope.

"Young man, how can you hide that from an old woman like me? Of course, I'll support you if you fancy her. Talk about love and the boiler together. Surely, you can ask her to help you!" Ke Ting said gravely:

"Secretary Wan, you shouldn't be making fun of me."

Displeased, she asked, "And why not?"

Embarrassed, Ke Ting ran away. He worked quietly that day and left half an hour early to find her. After a short wait outside her factory, he heard the whistle. A couple of reckless young workers rushed out first and hurried to the bus station trying to occupy a vantage point. Then, a host of cyclists emerged, gliding down the slope and were soon some distance away. Because of his special mission, Ke Ting looked only at the female workers. He saw many of them, but not “her.” He wondered if she was decking herself out after work. Then, suddenly, she appeared, very neatly dressed, yet not in the current fashion. She was pushing her “Phoenix 18,” surrounded by her girl friends, who were all at least a full head shorter than she. Yes, there she was! Tall and slender, with an oval face and very conspicuous! She was wheeling her bike and when she came to the gate, Ke Ting hesitated for a moment. He plucked up courage, and was about to call her, but she had already got on her bike, ready to go. At this “crucial” moment, Ke Ting’s courage took over and he yelled:

“Hello, comrade!”

The girls had noticed this young stranger and they smiled at each other, wondering which of them he was addressing. Yuan Xia was taken aback for a moment, but she recognized him at once. Yes, it was he, whom she had been thinking of night and day, wanting to repay his kindness.

“Ah, Young … Is it really you?” She was both surprised and happy, her face fully flushed. Her companions all got off from their bikes. Looking at this tall couple, they all had the same thought. One of the girls started making faces and called to Yuan Xia: “Hello, comrade! Do you still want us to wait for you?”

Of course, she didn’t want them to wait! Yet Yuan Xia said: “As you please.”

The girls’ teasing, however, went on. “Come on! Why not tell us to leave you alone?” Then, they “flew” away like a swarm of bees.

Ke Ting said awkwardly to Yuan Xia, “I’ve come to see you about something.”

Such a declaration under such circumstances would hardly mean anything, yet the girl, finding him so embarrassed, giggled and said, “Don’t worry about them, let’s go that way.”

They got on their bicycles and set off in the opposite direction. They talked as they rode along.

“I went to the New Waterworks’ living quarters to look for you.”

“When?”

“Yesterday, after I finished work.”

“I was at home the whole evening.”

“There’re so many apartment blocks in that courtyard.”

“My home is in the second building, second entrance, on the second floor. It is very easy to remember and find. Just ask for Yuan Xia. They all know me.”

This time, Yuan Xia’s reply was quite positive and definite.

“Your father and mother are both old workers in the waterworks?”

“You can say father is an old worker in the waterworks. Mother was formerly in a street-operated factory. Later she was transferred to the waterworks.”

At the mention of the word “street-operated,” Ke Ting felt his most sensitive nerve .had been touched. If he were not in a street-operated factory, he wouldn’t have to come here to ask for help. Feeling uncomfortable, he continued with some reluctance:

“Oh! Your father’s an old worker. What’s he in charge of?”

“Everything and nothing!” Yuan Xia replied mischievously.

Ke Ting caught on.

“You mean he's a cadre, not a worker.”

At this Yuan Xia was somewhat displeased. She retorted, “What if my father is a cadre and what if he is a worker?”

The girl’s words were so abrupt and sharp that the young man could only say honestly, “I guessed you were from a cadre’s family and your father is in a leading position. I didn’t mean that an old worker could not be—”

On hearing this, Yuan Xia thought, “So, like all the rest, you are nothing but a snob!” She lost interest in him and bent down her head, pedaling hard all at once. In a second or so, she was well ahead of the young man. When Ke Ting caught up and was about to say something, she made a gesture to him as if meaning to say “see you again” (or “not see you any more”) and rode away even faster.

“I’ve been blind,” the girl, upset, thought to herself, looking sad and perplexed. Since she accidentally met Ke Ting in the spring, she had kept firmly in her mind Lu’s criticism of her “tactlessness,” and the young man had found a place in her heart. On her way home after work, whenever she could get away from her companions, she would come to that memorable spot on the embankment road. How she hoped that she could find him there again and recognize him at once! She would then be able say to him in a low voice, “See, how sharp-eyed I am!” But, that had remained only a hope. However, the repeated disappointment had only increased the fascination of her first love. With a somewhat guilty conscience she often felt that other people might have noticed the secret yearning in her heart, and she reasoned with herself by saying that she would like to see him again simply because she wanted to repay his kindness. But the unexpected meeting today had made her betray her secret joy, and all the excuses she had given herself for lingering on that memorable place were not to be taken seriously after all!

Yuan Xia pedaled away carelessly. Before long, the memorable place suddenly came into view. It broke her heart as she thought to herself, “When you were repairing my bike then, you looked so simple and sincere, but now you have become so vulgar. Was I really blind?”

Left far behind, Ke Ting wondered why the girl was so offended. Had he said something which annoyed her? However, the boiler was on his mind, and he was not going to give up. He speeded up, shouting as he was getting near her:

“Stop for a moment, please! … I’ve something to say to you.”

To appeal to a girl was, after all, much easier than appeal[ing] to God. It was probably because of the young man’s sincerity revealed on his anxious call, or because of her fresh memory of their first meeting which had since made her heart throb with excitement, or because of her own excuse of repaying his kindness—whatever it was, when the two of them came to the place where they first met, Yuan Xia stopped and got off her bike.

Ke Ting did the same. Realizing he had offended her, Ke Ting changed the topic and spoke to her about the boiler.

The heavy burden in her heart gone, she was rather amused by the thought that the young man did not know she was Assistant Manager Yuan’s daughter. So she said to him gently:

“Don’t worry! Leave everything to me!”

“Leave it to you? Are you sure? I heard that Assistant Manager Yuan is rather difficult to approach. Does your father know him well?”

Annoyed and amused at the same time, Yuan Xia replied, “I’ve told you to leave it to me. What more do you want?”

Ke Ting added: “Well, if an arrangement can be worked out I’ll bring you a letter of introduction.”

“Don’t be so fussy! Let’s talk about something else!” Yuan Xia stopped him. She felt that it was spoiling their fun being together, all that talk about the boiler.

*

After he entered the living quarters of the New Waterworks, Ke Ting suddenly saw the desired boiler lying in the corner, took out his steel tape to take its measurements. Yuan however, was getting impatient and said:

“Even if the boiler is exactly what you need, you don’t know if they’re going to give it to you.”

Ke Ting then hastily followed her into one of the apartment blocks.

They reached the second unit, and went up to the second floor. Ke Ting, however, was oblivious of his surroundings. He was still trying to calculate in his mind the volume of steam the boiler could produce. Yuan Xia pushed open the door, grinned mischievously and announced, “This is Assistant Manger Yuan’s home.”

This Ke Ting had not expected at all. His heart sank and he asked doubtfully, “Didn’t you say that we should talk it over with your father first?” The oval-faced girl gave an equivocal reply in the manner of an experienced actress:

“It’s all the same.”

Inside the small drawing-room three or four people were shrouded in dense cigarette smoke. They looked up and stared at Yuan Xia and Ke Ting. Tightly knitting her eyebrows, Yuan fanned off the smoke with her hand, exclaiming, “Abominable!” She was tired of all these uninvited guests who frequently came to her home.

A middle-aged guest was about to leave. He said, “Manager Yuan, I’ll do as you’ve just suggested. When the time comes, I hope you will personally put in a good word for me.” The two others also rose and said, “Manager Yuan, without you help, our problem can never be solved. We may have to come back and trouble you again.”

By now, Ke Ting had already taken a good look at Assistant Manager Yuan. He was a small man, not even of medium eight, but his bald-head and shining forehead somehow gave him a certain dignity. After all the guests had left, Yuan Xia said to Ke Ting:

“Why don’t you stay here and make yourself at home? I’ve something else to attend to for the moment, but I’ll be back very soon.”

Then she closed the door and went out.

Now that Yuan Xia was gone, Ke Ting felt even more uneasy. He didn’t know what trick the girl was playing on him. Was it because Assistant Manager Yuan was such a difficult man to talk to that she had deliberately left after the first introduction?

"Assistant Manager Yuan—Manager Yuan, I'm sorry to trouble you—"

"No trouble at all! Do sit down, and let's talk it over."

Assistant Manager Yuan took the tall young man seriously. He smiled faintly and asked Ke Ting to sit down on the rattan chair beside the tea-table and gave him a cup of tea. Ke Ting felt that the manager was not so unapproachable as people said. Manager Yuan leaned against the desk in front of the window and sat back. He began chatting with the young man.

"You and Yuan Xia have known each other for a long time. Right?"

"No, we didn't know each other before."

"Well, how did you become acquainted?" Manager Yuan saw that the young man was clearly eligible as far as his height was concerned.

Ke Ting replied shyly and respectfully, "It was by chance."

The manager did not probe further. He picked up a small bottle on the desk, took out some pills and swallowed them with a little water. Then he ran his fingers through his sparse hair and said kindly, "You didn't know each other before, I see, but you are going to see more of each other from now on, and understand each other better, eh?"

Ke Ting felt something was wrong; he flushed and his heart was beating fast. He recalled that when they were talking about the boiler on their way here, the girl had insisted several times, "Leave it to me!" And on entering the house she was completely, at ease, as if it were her own home. Could she be the daughter of Assistant Manager Yuan? Well, she certainly had the same surname. But when he looked at the dwarfish manager, he was again in doubt and could not be sure. However, he hoped that genetics might have played tricks in the present instance and the problem of getting the boiler would be solved. What luck if Yuan Xia turned out to be the daughter of Assistant Manager Yuan!

Nevertheless, the young man held on to his views regarding heredity. He turned the: subject of their talk to the business he had in mind.

"Manager Yuan," he said, "it is this. Our factory wants a boiler—the one in your courtyard. I've seen the brand and measured its size. It's exactly what we need. Yuan Xia brought me here. Will you please help us by giving your consent?"

That had done it! Till then Assistant Manager Yuan had been dreaming of being a future father-in-law, but now he had to resume the status of manager. He was disgusted. "About that boiler again!" And he kept silent for a long while.

Ke Ting begged again. "Our small factory needs your help, Manager Yuan."

After a long pause the manager asked, "What does your factory produce?"

"Our first product is called 'anti-aging tincture.'"

"'Anti-aging … tincture?' Ah! So you're making this! Is it really as good as it says?" The manager got interested, as he toyed with the bottle of pills on his desk.

"It's not bad. Customers in other cities and the armed forces have placed orders with us."

"Oh! That's proof enough. But I don't believe it can really prevent aging. I don't think it's really all that effective."

"It's been tested and approved by the chemical research institute. Besides, our customers are also satisfied."

The manager took up the bottle from the desk, and asked, "How does it compare with these life-prolonging pills?"

"That's something completely different," Ke Ting replied.

The manager laughed heartily, tilting his head backward and resting his weight on the two rear legs of his chair. He said, "I think they're all the same, really. I've taken many bottles of these life-prolonging pills produced by Yuan Xia's pharmaceutical factory, yet I'm still going bald!" Then, as if to prove his point, he again ran his fingers through his hair backwards. "'Life-prolonging pills,' 'anti-aging tincture,' they're lovely names, all right. They won't do you any harm. Don't you agree?"

After a little while, the manager sat up and both his head and the legs of the chair resumed their normal position. He said candidly, "Now here's what we'll do. You go back and talk it over with your Party secretary and factory director to see whether you can provide us with some of your product; then I can discuss your request with our other heads."

It suddenly dawned on Ke Ting that the manager had mistaken the prevention of the aging of rubber for a tonic which would prolong life. He wanted to laugh, but he dared not. He thought that if he told him the truth it would make the manager look a fool. So he could only say tactfully:

"So far we haven't sold it to any private customers, because its price is too high. Moreover, it can't—"

Manager Yuan, irritated by his roundabout reply, frowned and said, "Yes, nowadays we all do everything according to the rules. Which factory is yours?"

"The Spark Chemical Factory of Wuchang District," the young man replied.

The manager queried, knitting his brows: "Has Wuchang District such a factory?"

Ke Ting replied, "Its full name is 'The Spark Chemical Factory of Lion Street, Wuchang District.'"

"Oh, I see, a street-operated factory!" The manager didn't bother to hide his contempt. "Now, we must act according to the rules. I'm not the only one in charge here, so it's not just what I say that counts. Isn't that right? Moreover, we may still need that boiler ourselves. Anything else?"

This sounded like the end of their discussion. Ke Ting at once felt chilled all over; he shivered as if he had caught malaria. Humiliated, he thought that he shouldn't have attempted to play the hero for his factory.

"Young man, you need experience. Perhaps you haven't often been out on business before. From now on, when you try to make contacts, you must bring a letter of introduction." The manager stood up, with a forced smile on his face.

This short man with his bald head! Ignorant! Foolish.! Greedy! Snobbish! Ke Ting almost spat the words out. He was nursing his anger: a street-operated factory. So what? Haven't street-operated factories created millions of dollars' worth of wealth for the country without any financial backing from the government?

In truth, he himself at first had also been prejudiced against them. After work, he studied for the college entrance examinations and begged Secretary Wan to give him a chance. To him that was the only way to get out of the street-operated factory. Secretary Wan, however, said to him:

"Our old master-workers have treated you well nursing you as old birds would nurse the young. Now your wings are strong and you want to fly away. Don't you feel sad at all leaving us?" With a sigh she continued, "Of course, if you insist, I couldn't stop you even if I wanted to. It would be selfish to consider only our interests and not those of the country as a whole. In short, I wouldn't do anything to harm your future. But I hope you'll wait until I've found someone to replace you."

The young man's heart was softened; he wept, touched by her passionate words. Emotions and his personal future were in conflict, and eventually the former won. He could not let down the old masters and Secretary Wan. He felt sorry for his leaders. Secretary Wan should have been at home taking care of her grandson, but instead she was up at half past four every morning, and had to take three buses from north to south to get to work. Why was she working so hard?

As for the sixty-five-year-old factory director, he had to ride on a ramshackle bike a hundred-odd li back and forth each day. Why was he so hard on himself? Having seen Manager Yuan and, comparing him with Secretary Wan and his factory director, Ke Ting appreciated their dedication all the more. Their stature grew all at once taller than ever before in his mind. They were so good, so kind to their workers!

Ke Ting stood up as if he himself, too had become taller. In this small room he had learned a great deal, only to value his integrity the more. He wanted to ask, "Mr. Manager! Is that boiler your private property, or is it the property of the People's Republic of China?" Ke Ting looked at the manager in disgust and said, emphasizing each word as he uttered, "Thank you, manager, for your instructions!" Then he left.

He went down the stairs hastily. He was about to unlock his bicycle when someone grasped his hand. He turned round and found a woman carrying a basket of food.

"Hey! Why are you running away?"

Ke Ting was baffled.

"Look, I've just bought some food for you. When Yuan Xia told me you're here, I ran to the market as quickly as I could. Don't go yet; she'll be back very soon. She's been gone such a long time! Why don't you go up and wait a little longer with her father?"

In this tall, warm-hearted, frank woman, Ke Ting could easily recognize Yuan Xia. But he had been insulted, so he thought that the three of them were all the same; they were all making a fool of him. He replied glibly, "No, I haven't brought the thing required."

Not knowing what he was trying to say, Mrs. Yuan asked hurriedly, "What do you mean? What is it that you need to bring with you? I'm happy you've come just as you are. You haven]'t had a bite and now you want to go. That won't do! Yuan Xia will blame me when she comes back. If you hadn't kindly helped her repair her bike that evening, I really don't know what would have happened to her."

Ke Ting, however, freed himself from the grip of her hand, saying, "I'm too young and don't know anything. I didn't bring a letter of introduction!"

He got on his bike and rode away.

Mrs. Yuan gazed at his back, not quite knowing how she felt. He struck her as a decent young man. The old man must have said something which had upset him! A letter of introduction! Nonsense! Such airs! Did he know what he was talking about?

Yuan Xia was serious—she went straight to Li Lu's home without having first called her on the phone. Having learned that her "man" turned up, Li Lu was most curious to meet him. She grabbed her bike and hurried off with Yuan Xia. The two "phoenixes" flew side by side; the two girls were talking and laughing merrily, leaving the street lights, trees, pedestrians and streams of traffic quickly behind them. It seemed that they were the tallest and happiest girls in the whole world. Good fortune was beckoning them on.

As usual, Li Lu gave a warning signal before she entered the flat. She shouted, "Uncle Yuan, Aunty Yuan, it's me again. Am I welcome?"

However, no one came out to welcome her, so she went in quietly. Oh, no! The small drawing-room had the look of a battleground. Uncle Yuan was, obviously, the wounded captive, bending awkwardly over the desk. Aunty Yuan was standing before him in full glory of victory.

"Where's the young man? Gone?"

Aunty said angrily, "Ask him!"

The manager begged for mercy. "He has helped us, so of course I'm going to help him! What more do you want me to do?"

Mrs. Yuan, seeing that reinforcements had arrived, launched at once a greater attack:

"I don't care about your boiler, what I want now is that young man!"

Her husband pleaded, "Where can I find him now? Tomorrow you can ring up his street-operated factory and say that I've agreed."

Upon hearing the words "street-operated," Li Lu's heart sank. She wanted to ask Yuah Xia privately about it. She therefore tried her best to persuade Mrs. Yuan to go and prepare the meal. The old woman, however, was not so easily pacified. Taking Li Lu by the hand, she harangued the old man for his insensitivity as well as his disgusting airs. How could he have asked the young man for a letter of introduction? She declared she was not going to cook for him. She would rather "let the old devil starve to death."

At this juncture, fearing that any further quarreling might upset Li Lu, the manager decided to keep silent and admit defeat. Of the three, he was the shortest and the most unfortunate. But his wife did not stop giving him a long lecture until she was exhausted.

As soon as she entered Yuan Xia's room, Li Lu asked, "Tell, me. Is he from a street-operated factory?"

Yuan Xia answered reprovingly, "What's wrong with that? Does it mean we think the less of him simply because he is a worker in a street-operated factory? A second-class citizen?"

Li-Lu said, "No! Of course not. Don't get mad at me! I only fear that your parents may have objections."

Of course, Yuan Xia was not venting her anger upon Li Lu. Neither did she think it necessary to explain everything to her good friend. She said, "With his iron rice-bowl in his hand, my dear father has long forgotten the broken basket he once used when begging for food in the past. Indeed, if he had any respect for street-operated factories at all, he wouldn't have pulled every string to get my mother transferred to a state-run factory. So, whenever I hear others criticize bureaucracy and the privileges of high-ranking officials, I always feel both glad and sad at the same time. Sad because I've been deprived of my right to make such criticisms!"

Then Yuan Xia went on to make her stand clear to Li Lu. She held that if a man had a good character, there was no need to worry about his lack of status. Li Lu, out of concern, wanted to know more about the Spark Factory. Yuan Xia told her all she knew and what Ke Ting had explained to her. She said that the ferric chloride produced by the Spark Factory was needed by the Wuhan Steel and Iron Company in a big project. A specialist from West Germany had once suggested if they couldn't produce it, they could import it from his country. But, somehow, this small street-operated factory finally succeeded in producing it. Li Lu, finding Yuan Xia so passionate, could no longer remain indifferent. The two girls quickly agreed that he was the right man. They worked out a plan for action at once.

*

The next morning, Yuan Xia and Li Lu arrived very early at the Spark Chemical Factory. There was really nothing much to be said of its appearance. Of course, if you looked at it from another viewpoint, bearing in mind that they had been struggling against numerous difficulties, it would appear quite different. Standing before the gate of the factory, Li Lu could see everything at a glance. She remembered the numerous products, including the ferric chloride needed by the modem steel plant that Yuan Xia had told her about the night before. Now, having seen with her own eyes the practical condition of this small factory, she couldn't help exclaiming in admiration,

"Who would have thought it could do so much!"

"He's coming," Yuan Xia whispered.

Li Lu looked up. The young man was pushing his bicycle up the road in front of the factory. He was good-looking and tall. Her first impression was quite favorable; he wasn't in any way inferior to her own boyfriend. Then came another exclamation of hers:

"Who would have thought it possible!"

She admired Yuan Xia's choice. Her round face became even rounder. She quietly urged Yuan Xia:

"Be more assertive, more encouraging and more enthusiastic."

Her three suggestions did not seem very effective, though. Yuan Xia had come to apologize, and also she had something on her mind. She usually carried herself with ease and confidence, but now she had become rather tense.

Ke Ting had also changed. After his baptism of fire in Manager Yuan's small drawing-room, he now appeared cool, his eyes steady, and behaved like a crusader determined to fight against all evil. He was surprised to see Yuan Xia. Why had she come here, and what's more, with a companion? He racked his brains to search for the most sarcastic words and the most offensive phrases to irritate both of them. He was going to ask her where on earth she could find the time to come here. What were her instructions for him now? If she wanted to purchase Some anti-aging tincture so that her respectable father could prolong his life, he would be only too happy to comply with her wishes.

"You've come very early," Yuan Xia went forward to greet him.

"You … you are earlier than me," Ke Ting stuttered. He was not used to fighting verbal battles. Moreover, he did not have the heart to ruffle the calmness reflected in her beauty and shyness. All the harsh and offensive words he had prepared in his mind at once vanished.

Silence and deadlock followed. In international discussions, it is not unusual to have a long lapse of time, say a few years, as a result of the postponement of further meetings. But on an occasion like this, the silence of even a few seconds could increase the tension. Silence was now more terrible than open war.

Secretary Wan came out, chewing half of a fried dough cake. She called when she was still some distance away,

"Young Ke, have you got that boiler?"

"They want a letter of introduction!" KeTing replied. That remark was aimed at Yuan Xia of course.

"If you have already made arrangements, writing a letter of introduction won't cause me any trouble." Secretary Wan, not aware of the circumstances, was pleased. On coming, nearer, she asked with great admiration, "Who are these two girls?"

Li Lu quickly said, "Assistant Manager Yuan told us to come here. Yesterday, after Comrade Ke left, Assistant Manager Yuan said, 'Don't let him waste time coming back and forth again. We are all very busy with our work for the four modernizations.' So he personally wrote an order and told us to bring it here as soon as possible."

Yuan Xia very much admired Li Lu's ability to gloss over her father's faults. She did not know what to say. The fact was, the girls were afraid that the matter would not be dealt with at once, and that the boiler might be assigned elsewhere. Li Lu also wanted to see Yuan Xia's young man herself so that she could better play the role of her friend's personal adviser.

So, the two of them had forced Assistant Manager Yuan to write the order himself!

Secretary Wan was full of gratitude. She wanted to invite the two girls to come in for a chat in her office, but was afraid that her oily hand might spoil their clothes. Li Lu, however, said she didn't mind and she followed her to her office. She told the secretary something about what had happened. At the same time, she learned from the secretary some particulars about Ke Ting. The secretary was so pleased that she gazed at Yuan Xia outside for a long time with her smiling eyes. Among their girl workers, some had married young workers of Third Pharmaceutical Factory. Now, such a pretty young girl worker of that pharmaceutical factory, and moreover, the daughter of Manager Yuan, had come over herself to their street-run factory! This would certainly add prestige to its Secretary too! She felt grateful to Assistant Manager Yuan for his generosity: he had not only given her factory a boiler, but had added a pretty young daughter in the bargain!

"Don't look down upon our small street-run factory; even Assistant Manager Yuan himself has a good opinion of us!" she thought to herself with a sigh of satisfaction.

Yuan Xia sincerely apologized to Ke Ting. But Ke Ting was still in a bad mood. He didn't say anything. Then the steel "bell" sounded again and he had to go on shift. Yuan Xia did not know whether or not he had forgiven her.

That same evening, on the embankment of the South Lake, on the same spot where Ke Ting had repaired her "Phoenix 18" bicycle, Yuan Xia was waiting. She saw many bicycles pass quickly by. She wondered, looking a little melancholy, "Will the moon be enchanting tonight? Will Ke Ting turn up as he promised? Or, will he avoid her by taking a roundabout route home? He ought to see the difference between her and her father …"

1941

21.17 The Unexpected Tide\fn{by Dai Qing aka Fu Ning (1941-)} Chongqing, Sichuan Province, China (F) 10

One might well say that human life is like a ship sailing on the sea. Who can tell how many perils she faces once she leaves port and launches into the surging waves of the open water? Who can tell what treacherous rocks, what hidden shoals lie unblinking under the placid waves? Without doubt, there are buoys to guide her path. But who can tell when an evil wind might blow from nowhere and sweep everything away, snapping in two the rudder?

Anyway, her ship of life is stranded. Perhaps it may even overturn. But then, if she sticks to her resolve to sail on, who knows? Perhaps her boat may one day sail again into the tide rushing to meet her. Perhaps …

"Ready to go! Ready to go!"

Old Zhang's voice boomed from somewhere, loud and assertive. Old Zhang had a trick of imitating the famous Peking opera actor Hou Xirei's unique exclamation: Wa-ya-ya! He also had some pretense at spotting sports talent. ("See that young fellow? He's cut out to be champion at the hundred-meter dash," was one of his oft-repeated lines.) That was the extent of his accomplishments as far as culture and sports were concerned. But in our sedate research academy, anyone who had the slightest interest in anything beyond his own specialty was a rare bird, and thus Old Zhang had been honored with the chairmanship of the Sports and Culture Department for twenty years running.

But perhaps the tide did not know the limits of its own strength? It surged upward and then retreated. And the boat riding on its crest? It had high hopes one moment, only to see them dashed in the next..

"Little Wei, why are you still dawdling? It's late!" The aforementioned chief of sports and culture—who doubled as an amateur Chinese-opera singer—pushed open the door to my office and hollered at me.

"Wei, you are the only one missing in the show."

I put aside my ships and tides and fished for my running shoes behind the wastepaper basket.

"She's not going!" Old Mother Liu, whose desk was across from mine, butted in. She kept her eyes on the knitting in her hand.

"Not going? But wasn't everything agreed on ages ago?" Zhang was alarmed; he turned his sweaty unshaved face toward me and searched my face.

This was the eve of the lunar New Year in Beijing, the day for the championship marathon race for government workers. Certainly there was no lack of girls at our academy to take part. But they were so delicate, like swaying reeds as they minced along in their high-heeled shoes. Besides, the significance of the annual marathon was way down the scale of priorities, lumped together with such items as sanitation, birth control, and fire prevention during the holidays. Thus, the task of striving for the championship on behalf of our academy devolved on me, as it had always done in the past.

During morning and afternoon breaks, right in the corridors of our office building, I practiced monkey shadowboxing, which I had learned as a child. That helped keep me in shape. The marathon is no joking matter. This, I thought to myself, was the one important event under Old Zhang's jurisdiction. He was nearing retirement age, and had finally gotten himself a department chair, even though it was the least noteworthy account, mainly in charge of ordering train tickets or booking hotel rooms. I vowed not to let him down. Yet today …

"Little Wei, please!" Zhang pleaded as I stood undecided, my running shoes in my hands.

"You silly old man, why don't you take a hint?" Old Mother Liu declaimed. "Didn't I tell you that she's not running today? What do you know about girls' affairs?"

The old woman stood up from her chair with its battered old cotton-padded cushion and waddled over to us. She always calls me girl, although she knows that I am thirty-three. Once she even knitted a little red cap for my six-year-old daughter.

Old Zhang didn't mind Old Mother Liu, but kept working on me.

"Little Wei, if you let us down, it will be over for our academy."

I hesitated for a split second and began to put on my running shoes.

"Foolish girl," Mother Wei scolded, "you are playing with your own life." She was alluding to my having donated blood a week or so ago. If she had known that I had not slept a wink last night …

"If I must, I must!"

I steeled myself to put on the other shoe and pulled out an old army pullover. The way I see it, my ship is stranded. I must resort to the heavenly oracles to decide on my next step.

*

Old Zhang was not bluffing. We were indeed late. A host of women decked out in all the colors of the rainbow were assembled at the starting line, the starting gun gleaming over their heads.

"We're coming!" Zhang shouted in his eighty-decibel voice. "Wait a sec—"

I saw a wisp of smoke emit from the pistol, followed by a muffled sound.

It is all over, I thought to myself. I have failed, Wu Guo. It's no use striving. Don't you see the smoke dissolving? So it is with everything else in life …

"What's gotten into you?! Run!" croaked Old Zhang as he gave me a shove on the back.

What's the use of running under such circumstances? I turned to answer back. As I turned I noticed that there was still a crowd huddled at the starting line. With two or three hundred people in the race, not all the entrants would start off at the sound of the gun. I quickly pinned on my number and joined the back of the pack.

*

So, Wu Guo! The moon had swerved from its course and decided to give the tide full play.

I found myself running with a few girls taller than myself by a head. I let my legs swing and was careful that I kept my shoulders relaxed. I inhaled every four steps and exhaled every four steps. My sports instructor in middle school had repeated this rule a hundred times. I trained under her for six years and went through twelve pairs of running shoes.

Before we had put five hundred meters behind us, several girls dropped out. They turned green round the gills and collapsed into the arms of their attending beaux. Poor girls, they knew hundreds of knitting patterns, knew how to pile their hair atop their heads without showing a seam, but what did they know of the trick of controlling the soles of the feet and the muscles of the shoulders? Did they know that one must not wear turtleneck tops and tight underwear when running? Did they know about setting your teeth and surviving the first stage of exhaustion and then distributing energy according to a mysterious formula known only to the initiated? All these I knew—I who was their senior by ten years, I who was educated under teachers who were not beaten as theirs had been during the Cultural Revolution. So what if I was thirty-three?

Unobstrusively, I made my way forward—from the three-hundredth to around the one-hundred-and-fiftieth. I still had to force myself to overtake another hundred. That would be devilishly hard, as exhausting as tying the mast in a hundred-mile wind. But I had no choice. I wanted the marathon itself to resolve my dilemmas.

I overtook another dozen. I had my eyes on a girl in white sportswear. She had elasticity, but her movements were too showy. like an under-rehearsed amateur actor. I knew she wouldn't last—that once we turned into the Avenue of Eternal Peace, I could dispose of her.

My boat was not really stranded in treacherous sands, after all. One way or another, I had always made it. Like the time when I had meningitis and was at death's door. I iurvived that. Then I had been cheated when I was working as an office temp; someone cheated me so thoroughly that I had no money left to buy a meal. I had also been labeled a counterrevolutionary—and then became a hero on the same grounds—for copying and clandestinely printing verses in the momentous year of 1976. Looking back, I wondered if it was worth all the passion spent on it. But all these were nothing compared with the last ordeal—just as I was happily feeling my baby kicking inside me, news arrived that my husband and his comrades were caught in the Tangshan earthquake and buried under the barracks they had erected with their own hands. And this on the anniversary of our marriage! But I came through everything. No wavering, no need to seek advice. I knew what I had to do and did it.

How long had I known him? Twenty years? One week? He lived in the building behind us and was in the same class in primary school as my little sister. The two of them shared a desk; the desk was cut by several dividing lines, the exact line of demarcation never having been decided. Whoever's elbow happened to stray over the line would be immediately pushed back. Yes, I knew him as the child who often played in our garden, who would often sit on the wall and count the passing cars or spend hours in our backyard digging holes in the soft soil.

Then I joined the army and forgot about him. Once I came home for a visit and saw a young fellow at the gate to our compound, tall and thin with stiff black hair standing up on his head like a brush. He stopped in his tracks to give way to me, saw who I was, and blushed.

“Sister Liming,” he mumbled, and slunk away by the wall.

“Who was that?” I asked my sister.

“From the apartment building behind ours,” came the reply. “Don't you remember? His name is Wu Guo. He’s now a blacksmith. A little blacksmith. Such a joke.”

I didn’t see him again until 1975, after I was demobbed. It was a hot day and I was pregnant. I had two sets of china in one hand and with the other I was pushing a pram I had just purchased. I was exhausted and could barely keep on my feet. Suddenly a hand relieved me from behind.

“Oh, you, little blacksmith.” I gazed at his thick hair and equally thick eyebrows, helplessly fishing for his name in my memory. “Are you going to work?”

He didn’t specify. The parcels that had weighed me down were like playthings in his hands. He accompanied me upstairs. Just as I was fumbling about for a teacup, he vanished.

When my daughter, Xinxin, grew up, she often came back from play with trophies from a mysterious source. Balloons, chocolates, comic books. When asked, she would say that they were from her little uncle. I did not pay attention at the time. My fatherless daughter was always spoiled by many uncles and aunties among my acquaintances, and I never associated these trophies with Wu Guo.

Even less did I imagine that the shy little blacksmith would accomplish in seven days what conventional people never dreamed of doing in a lifetime. Anyway, my little ship was stranded, and I saw no way of setting sail again. This was why I decided in spite of everything to join the marathon. This race, like all momentous events—the launching of a space missile, for example—was counted backward:

“Four-three-two-one Go!”

So it was with my ship waiting to set sail.

I was barely in my office when Little Sister rang. She said that Wu Guo rang up a friend of hers, inquiring through that friend to ask me if he could take a few photographs of my little Xinxin. There’s not a mother on earth who could resist having her darling’s picture taken. So what were all these convoluted negotiations about? And who was Wu Guo?

“Don’t tell me you don’t remember Wu Guo! The little blacksmith in the apartment building behind ours!”

“The blacksmith? Is he an amateur photographer?”

“Not amateur anymore. On the upward move, I’d say. He’s working as decor artist for a big enterprise. He wants to photograph Xinxin for their print-ad campaign!”

“Oh, him!”

“Come on, what do you say?” Little Sister was losing patience. “She can wear the one-piece woolen dress I just gave her.”

“All right, all right.”

“Don’t fob me off with your all rights. If it’s yes, phone him immediately. Number 553-864. Have you got it? Immediately!”

“All right, all right.”

So I dialed the little blacksmith’s—rather, the little decor artist’s—number to settle this momentous business. The phone barely rang before someone picked it up. It was Wu Guo himself.

*

It was Sunday. Xinxin was still in bed when he arrived. He had a lot of odds and ends with him, strips of cotton cloth and pieces of cardboard.

“Didn’t you bring your camera?” Little Sister loved anything trendy and couldn’t wait to have a look at his camera.

He didn’t say anything. Just put down the paraphernalia in his hands and fished out of a ragged bag a camera worthy of the status of his enterprise, an Olympus OM-10.

“This trash …” Sister touched his cardboard and cotton strips with the tip of her shoe.

“Oh, no!” Wu Guo put down his camera to protect his treasures. “These are for the light adjustment. And I’ll need your help with them.”

We were busy with the photo session for two hours, but Wu Guo spent another four hours because Xinxin insisted on being taken to the zoo.

I saw the two of them off. They had not gone a few steps before Wu Guo stooped to pick up Xinxin and put her on his shoulders. The tears leaped to my eyes. Xinxin had never had a father and never knew the luxury of riding on a father’s shoulders. She had to use her own feet as soonas she could walk.

That same night, Wu Guo called on me. You know, of course, that our academy has a resounding reputation but no housing to match. For four years we have had to make do in prefabricated shacks. As for me, having no family, I became the Permanent Officer for fetching hot water mornings and afternoons and for security duty on holidays. That was Old Zhang's title for me. I had one corner of the office room screened off. There, I set up a plank over two benches and that was my bedroom. Wu Guo brought the package of barely dried photos, the edges not yet trimmed.

There was Xinxin laughing, Xinxin dancing on one foot, Xinxin contemplating the camera with a serious look, Xinxin making faces … She was six years old, yet it seemed that this was the first time I saw my child so closely. How like her father she was, especially the restless eyes twinkling in the shadow of the heavy lashes. My mother gave me a pair of eyes that are perfect as far as vision is concerned, to the satisfaction of doctors and reconnaissance commanders, but they were just narrow slits in shape, not to the taste of artists or photographers. I sometimes regret, but mainly am relieved, that Xinxin's eyes are not like mine.

"Let's use this one. What do you think?"

Wu picked out one picture among the lot. It was Xinxin bundled up like a ball at the moment of stepping on ice. Her arms were stretched out and her little coat was going to burst at any moment. As I looked at the picture it flashed across my mind that Xinxin's eyes are similar to Wu Guo's, too. The thought made me blush.

"You see, everything depends on this button. And that's the ad for our company," Wu explained.

"I'd say it's thanks to the thread that holds the button," I retorted. "It seems more like advertising for the thread factory."

"But only high-quality buttons stay sewed. Otherwise, they will be gnawed through in a couple of days. Didn't you know that?"

"Gnawed through?"

He smiled and drew out of his pocket a handful of buttons of all shapes and sizes. He told me which designs were pressed, which were drilled, where they should be rounded and where back-angled. Then he told me about air traffic accidents in Pakistan:

"On average, one pilot crashes down every year because there is a back-angle missing on the shoulder of the main axle of the generator." He told me this in all seriousness.

"So what if the back-angle is missing?"

"Lack of balance in internal stress."

Wu blew some warmth into his freezing hands and proceeded to demonstrate on a piece of paper the distribution of internal stress. I looked at him, a tousle-headed young fellow. He was twenty-eight, one year older than my little sister. Under normal circumstances, he should have been five years out of the university with five years of work experience behind him. Nowadays, people like Wu Guo were often written off as heady youths who can't be trusted. But of course, the generation of Wu Guo had only had primary-school education.

"Where did you get all this information?"

"Do you mean all this about internal stress? Well, that's the essential of a blacksmith'' job, internal stress. Of course, there's also the problem of hardening by quenching …"

Thus, sitting on the corner of my desk, he began to tell me about the ancient practice of hardening iron by pissing into the fire. He wanted to know whether it was just an ancient hoax or had some basis in chemistry.

"Hardening by quenching is a physical operation, I'm afraid," I reminded him softly.

"Is that so?"

He raised that pair of burning eyes and blushed.

Suddenly I saw myself in one of the photos. I was holding up Wu Guo's self-made contraption for light adjustment and doubled up with laughter.

He snatched it away. He blushed as he rubbed the picture against his trousers and tried to fold it up and stuff it into his pocket.

"Come on." I tried to stop him. "It's very nice. Give it to me. I never had such a flattering picture taken of myself."

"Is that so?"

He handed me the picture hesitantly.

"You are not angry? You were lost in laughter and I couldn't resist clicking. All these years, I had so wanted you to laugh like that. Of course, according to the rules of our profession, it is rude to take your picture without asking permission."

"What rubbish! Who cares about these fine points? Give it to me."

"Certainly. I still have the negative." He took up the photo to have a close look. "In the future, if we need an ad on equipment for light adjustment, we’ll use this.”

Thus we chatted until eleven o’clock. He was on the point of leaving when he saw the stamps under the glass top of my desk.

“Elder Sister, do you collect stamps?”

“I used to, just for fun. Take these if you like them.”

“Oh, no, I can’t do that,” he said as he bent over my stamps with interest. “But we can exchange. I’ve got lots. I’ll bring them tomorrow.”

“All right, all right, but you must go now.”

“Wu Guo, how did you come by such a name?” I asked him the next day. No-fault—who would name a child that?

Wu Guo sniffed. “I didn’t name myself. Don’t blame me!”

I laughed and with a movement of my foot overturned a thermos flask that was on the floor.

He took out a hot-water bottle from his greasy bag.

“I spent three hours here yesterday and went back with a vicious cold. Elder Sister, how can you bear it, night after night, in this place?”

How? Something stuck in my throat. In the old days, when I was in the army, I had been through marches and campaigns and untold hardships. But that was nothing compared with the last several years. Nobody could imagine the difficulties of a woman bringing up a child on her own. If Wu Guo had said, “I''s so cold here, let’s go somewhere else to look at the stamps,” or “It’s disgraceful, how can they turn off the heat at night! Talk to the chief tomorrow,” it wouldn’t have hurt so much. After six years I had grown used to having nobody care for me. But Wu Guo was just a young friend. How could I accept anything from him?

“If you refuse, I’ll cut it into pieces. Now you decide.”

Thereupon he reached into his pocket. I was sure that he had brought the scissors.

“All right, all right,” I said, and picked up another thermos flask to fill the bottle.

I slept very well that night.

*

The next day, Wu Guo was on the night shift. It was seven o'clock in the evening. I had just finished my supper. I spread out a sheet of paper and prepared to copy a manuscript for a friend. The telephone rang.

“Sister, guess what I am doing.”

“What?”

“Listen, can you hear it?”

I put my ear to the receiver. There was a medley of soud but I could still make out the strains.

“The Fifth Symphony! Fate!”

I put down the receiver. How can there be such a coincidence? Seven years ago, when Husheng and I decided to join our lives together, we were sitting on a little knoll outside the barracks and the moon was shining brightly. Husheng turned on his radio and the strains of this very same Fifth Symphony nearly took our breaths away. At the time, felt that the sails of my ship of life were full and heading for unknown waters. “Husheng!” I cried, grasping his big rough hands, a man’s hands. And he had said deliriously, “Yes, fate is knocking.”

At the time, I did not recognize that these were not Husheng’s own words. Far less would I have foreseen that I was to hold the fatherless Xinxin on many a chilly night and immerse myself in that refrain for solace. It was a vital and lasting fount of memory that Husheng had left with me, a unique mysterious knot tying us together.

Except for the even more mysterious link between us: our daughter Xinxin. She grew up with this symphony in her ears. I remember the time when she was watching the Japanese cartoon series Atumu on my mother’s TV. When the little mechanical figure leaped into the air to the strains of the Fifth Symphony, Xinxin turned to me in surprise. “Mummy, how did he know …?” How did Atumu know her own music? she wondered.

“Heh, Sister Liming, do you hear it? It is thus that fate knocks at the door.”

Wu Guo was still at the other end.

“Stop it, Little Wu. The telephone company is going to interfere.”

“But do you hear it?”

“No, there’s too much noise in the background. I’m going to hang up.”

“Sister Liming, what’s wrong with you today?”

“Nothing. I’ll hang up.”

I did not leave myself any time for hesitation, but put the receiver firmly back into its cradle.

It was very quiet, except for the wind and the occasional sounds of laughter from a TV somewhere. Only my own heart was pounding wildly.

I put my hands, stiff with cold, under the hot-water bottle and felt a hot spring bubble up under the placid surface of my river of life. Six years had passed! Xinxin, from a pink-faced infant, was now ready for primary school. And with time, I had found my place in life. It was not that I lacked suitors. Only the other day, a good friend had talked to me long into the night about her brother's offer. And there were many more before that. Six years was a long time. I could have gone through a dozen suitors—but I had refused them all. I couldn't step into the role. We were too cool and calm, going over the terms rationally, according to conventional standards. It was literally looking for a partner. Is that love? No.

That was not how I and Husheng had grown together. We were like two fighting cocks, squabbling all through the three years that we had known each other, and suddenly we couldn't tell how it happened, but we realized we couldn't do without each other. After that, everything was like a dream: writing applications for permission to marry, waiting for approval, getting the use of a little room, putting two wooden planks together to make a bed. And then being together as man and wife three or four times, even though we were in the same regiment. We were not like a couple at all in the usual sense of the word. No pillowcases and tea set. Just a burning love. We figured the rest could wait, commonplace occurrences like going to restaurants or taking long walks together. We had all the time in the world. Who could have foreseen the earthquake that snatched away Husheng in one swoop?

I had Husheng. How could I love anybody else? Besides, Xinxin is vitally important to me. My poor fatherless daughter. I could not bear to think of someone being my husband and indifferent to Xinxin.

"This is fate knocking at the door," Wu Guo had shouted to me from the other end of the phone.

Could it be that there was an invisible link between our two souls?

I knew that Wu Guo was born to a cultured family, but we never discussed music. And anyway I barely knew any tune except the one Husheng had brought into my life. Wu Guo was so young. I wondered if he could also love this kind of music? Could he understand its heartrending impasse and then its cascading overflow into the joy of victory? Perhaps he was just showing off. More likely, though, he just wanted to share his understanding of the world. I should not let my fancies run away with me.

My mother had long said that Wu Guo and my little sister would make a pair. As a matter of fact, they have known each other for twenty years. Wu Guo had been over to my place for several days running. Was his presence merely camouflage for paying attentions to my sister? I was the big sister, after all—big sister to both of them. Should I step aside, I wondered, and benignly supervise the affairs of these two young people? But I felt instinctively that that was not the point. I could sacrifice everything—my time, my little corner, my meager salary—but that was not the point.

Wu Guo had already announced on the telephone that fate was knocking at the door. I knew that if this situation continued, I was going to lose the peace of mind I had acquired so dearly. I decided that on the following day I would bring matters out into the open. I would channel this stream of disaster, or perhaps of happiness—depending on the outcome—into the port of my little sister. Healthy and lively at twenty-seven, she was a flower waiting to be plucked.

I had considered a hundred ways of activating my plan. Eat out? Hepatitis was rampant. Meet at my mother's? Mother was sometimes in the way. Get together at my own corner here? That would send all the wrong signals, making me the center of attention. And anyway it would be too cold. Little Sister is delicate. Go to a park? That wouldn't do. The park with all those couples in it, the women in middle-length coats of the same cut and pattern and hair clasps with the same kind of eight-ring embellishments, accompanied by men in corduroy jackets of the same design, walking in the same listless way while keeping an eye open for a spare bench—it gave you the feeling of being packed off wholesale. Now what was to be done? As I was about to fill my hot-water bottle for the fifth time from the office thermos flask—over the protests of my fellow workers—Old Zhang remarked, "Very likely you are feverish. Just as well. There are not enough tickets to go around for tonight's ball anyway."

My hand caught his in a vise.

"Yours and Old Mother Liu's and my own. Don't say no. I must have all three for tonight. It's an emergency.

The three of us went together. Little Sister, decked out like a flower in full bloom, was invited to every dance. Her face was streaming but she kept on dancing. I had many acquaintances, so I flitted in and out of the crowd, chatting, drinking soda water, introducing my sister and Wu Guo to everybody.

"This is my young friend. That is my sister, the one in the purple sweater. She has style, hasn't she?"

Wu Guo got tired of being shepherded around and edged himself toward the sound equipment. At first he just stood by silently. Then he lent a hand changing the cassettes and helped with the tuning. Later, when I stole over to the group, I saw him in deep conversation in technical jargon.

I was at a loss. Now, I had set up this meeting. Was it going to end up like the countless times they had met in the last twenty years? I had brought them together, like hundreds of thousands of matchmakers from time immemorial. I had done it unthinkingly, following old established practice. But if they had not felt a ripple of emotion toward each other for the last twenty years, could an outsider's meddling fingers stir up those dormant waters? Well, I decided to give up and go home. The manuscript I had promised to copy was still on my desk. As far as I was concerned, she could go on with her dancing and he could stick to his machines.

It was a moonless night. I was trying to locate my battered Flying Pigeon among a sea of bicycles.

"Sis, ours are right here."

He had followed me out! All my surreptitious maneuvers to put on my hat and coat and sneak out didn't work.

"If you don't like dancing, why didn't you say so?"

"I came for the music and to watch the dancing. It's quite fun. And anyway, if I'm not here, who's to see you back?"

"I don't need anyone to see me back. I've walked on darker nights than this, alone, in the country. If you are not interested, you might as well go home. Or you could wait for Little Sister."

"Little Sister?" He smiled. In the darkness, his smile seemed to exude warmth. "She doesn't need me to worry about her."

Did I need him to worry about me? We rode our bikes shoulder to shoulder in the silent streets.

"Sis, why?" he asked.

"Why?" That was his question. It could mean several things. Why did you maneuver this threesome dance party? Why did you not dance yourself? Why did you leave so early? Why rush back to your freezing shack? Why live like this? He could mean any of the above questions. Or anyone of them could include all the rest.

"Wu Guo, you are very young. There are matters that are beyond explanation."

"No. They can be explained. You just don't want to talk." He pressed hard on his bicycle horn for no special reason; the streets were empty. "You think that even if you do explain, no one will understand you."

"Is that what you think?" I countered, feeling that this was treading on dangerous grounds.

"But supposing there is someone who understands. Supposing there is someone who is sick and tired of being misunderstood, who one day discovers that he understands you and that you understand him …?"

"But …"

"Are you willing? Are you willing to give up going it alone, hiding your bitterness from everybody—friends, relatives, colleagues?"

"That's not true!"

"Your cheerfulness is forced." He jumped down from his bike and caught hold of my handlebars. "Now don't rush to deny it. To put it another way, there's something missing in your life. Of course nothing on earth is perfect, but supposing we have the power to make it better?"

His eyes were piercing, forcing me to face the question.

"It's not worth the try. Think of all the inhibitions, enough to suffocate."

"But supposing there is someone who doesn't give a damn, who is above it all."

"Wu Guo, my mother has asked me to approach you, about you and Little Sister …"

"Sis; is this what you really think?"

Perhaps I should have told him that I have put my own brains aside. I was just following ancient patterns …

"And the heart. What does your heart say?"

"Wu Guo!"

"Sister Liming, perhaps this is neither the time nor the place to say this. Perhaps my speaking out now is offensive to you. But what I want to say is: the weather will always turn warm, flowers will bloom, and the waters of the stream are bound to flow. How can one cold blast freeze up a whole river? Why should we let ourselves be bandied about like puppets? Why don't we take our affairs into our own hands? Sis, last night the truth suddenly dawned on me. Isn't the whole situation as clear as daylight? What are we waiting for?"

He grasped my hand across the bicycle. I felt a strange warmth suffuse my body. I raised my head and saw his somewhat childish eyes looking at me earnestly.

No! It was precisely on this account that I must protect him. I extricated my hands slowly.

"Wu Guo, it is impossible. Think of the difference in our ages, my young friend. And my child. I am no beauty. And I am not a good housekeeper. You can see for yourself. I've never had a home, my salary is very small, and I've squandered it all."

"Sis, is this all you have to say to me?" His voice was constrained.

"What will the people around you say? Won't you be ashamed to be seen with me in public? What about your parents? Can you do this to them? I'm used to living alone. I don't need sympathy, much less sympathy at another's expense …"

I got on my bike and rode off, leaving him under a solitary street lamp swaying in the wind.

"Wei Liming," he shouted after me, "you place idle gossip above the treasure of your own heart?"

I flew on my bike. My refusal was weak and unconvincing. If he had caught up with me and caught hold of my hands, I might have risked everything just for the happiness of a few years, a few months, or even for the moment, in gratitude for his understanding.

He did not catch up with me, although he could easily have done so.

*

"It is a dream," I kept saying to myself the next morning. "See, now the sun is out and I am awake."

I emptied the hot-water bottle and put it away in a drawer.

In the afternoon, the porter rang to say there was a letter for me. I ran. It was in an official envelope printed over with BEIJING HOUSEHOLD WARES FACTORY BRANCH 2.

I ripped it open. Inside was an official letter stamped over with a red seal:

To the East District Public Security Office:

This is to certify that Wu Guo, male, twenty-eight years old, unmarried, staff of our factory, has our approval to register for marriage with Wei Liming, female, thirty-three years old, widow, staff of the Art Institute.

Sincerely,
Beijing Household Wares Factory Branch
2 January 24, 1982

The calligraphy was beautiful, probably from the hand of an elderly person who had received proper training. Was that all? I shook out the envelope and a note fell out:

I'll come over agin tonight.

No name of addressee, no signature of sender. Of course, it could only be my young friend who would scrawl such a misspelled note.

I didn't want to see him. I was awake and didn't want to lapse into dreams.

I asked Mother Liu to give him a ring, telling him not to come, that I was away.

My poor little ship had endured so much buffeting, I wanted to dock her for a while, to spread my net under the sun, to dry my sails as I greeted passing boats on their way. Who would have thought that the tide would turn unexpectedly and carry me into open waters, to start again on a soul-stirring, perilous new journey!

The problem came upon me so suddenly it was too brain racking. I was always quick to act—not a thinker. But it was then and there that I decided to compete in the marathon. And I bargained my own terms: if I succeeded in the race, I would ask for a letter of approval to match his; if I dropped out, I would never see him again.

*

I kept on running. By an optimistic estimate, there were probably two hundred behind me, but somehow I seemed further away than ever from the goal. It was like the prospect of communism. It seemed closer in 1921 than in 1971. The more distance you cover, the further away it seems.

I was out of breath, dizzy. I wanted to throw up. My stomach ached first in one place, then in another. Omens. I knew that these aches and pains were illusory, not physical but psychological, a test of will. They were always there to meddle with one's life.

I had long ago announced that I was an atheist, like thousands of good, bad, or mediocre people before me. But only now, through every inhalation, through every movement of my legs did I truly realize that God does not help. Of course he might have been off on holiday. This dilemma came upon me so suddenly, I gave him very short notice.

The crowd of bystanders was getting thicker. They were so relaxed standing there, laughing and chatting. Some shouted out: "Step on the gas." I dragged a pair of legs that felt like logs.

Suddenly it occurred to me that though we all lived on the same planet, how different were our burdens. If I had decided not to participate in the marathon, I, too, could stand idly by, eating big chunks of ice cream. Yes, that would be pleasant.

But what about the joy of hitting the ribbon at the end? That sensation could last a lifetime. And the doggedness of sticking it out to the end, that was also something that could last a lifetime. Not to mention Wu Guo, riding over and above worldly conventions. In my life from now on, I would need all the confidence and persistence I could command to deal with all that might descend on my head. Or perhaps we would need it for all that might descend on our heads.

Suddenly I realized that the bet I made was not just a bet like any other. I thought I was leaving it all to chance. Actually I was testing myself: can you deal with it or can't you?

A sea of multicolored flags greeted me on the way. And a sea of faces. The air seemed so thin. Had the crowds sucked it all up? The sun was so bright, as always during winter in Beijing. It was then I knew I had to make a dash for the finish line!

"Little Wei!" Old Zhang shouted at me, his voice ringing above the noise.

"Eighteen! Nineteen!" The timekeeper, a little flag in his hand, was keeping count of the runners who hit the line.

At that moment I knew that Wu Guo and I had made it. We had won. Our flouting of convention, our search for something better had prevailed. But I wanted it to be still better. I swung my arms as I swept on. I panted as I overtook four or five girls. One more step and …

"Thirty-three!" I had crossed the line. I was the thirty- third, exactly my own age. What a pity I had not dashed forward seconds earlier and made it to twenty-eight, Wu Guo's age.

Suddenly I realized someone was holding me. Strong manly hands. Wu Guo!

"I've never seen the likes of you. Look around, see for yourself. Is there anybody running as desperately as you are?"

I shook the sweat from my eyes and looked around me. So many pretty girls. Laughing, jumping, eating cream cakes offered by the boys.

My throat was burning. I could not bear the thought of food.

All the others had apparently run purely for fun. Suddenly I wanted to cry. Nobody else was like me, so desperate. Life for them was such a lighthearted affair.

*

Wu Guo stuffed the marriage certificate into his greasy bag. He disposed of it as casually as if it were a piece of wrapping paper. When he saw my alarm, he laughed.

"This is just the people's acknowledgment. Or to put it more grandly, the acknowledgment of the state organ. What I want is you. You have given yourself to me this morning at the marathon. Although you looked quite knocked out and can't be put in a bag."

I was still wearing that pair of running shoes and that old pullover. Two hours earlier we had gone to Hongbin-iou Restaurant for lunch. Wu Guo treated, and invited Old Zhang to join us. After the meal, the two of us hijacked Old Zhang to his office to make out the certificate of approval for me to register for marriage. Only then did Old Zhang savor the full implications of his succulent roast beef sirloin. He looked at the two of us by turns and suddenly gave his best imitation to date of Hou Xirei:

"Wa-ya-ya! Your humble servant … has wielded the seal of authority for twenty years. And finally the day has come … when it is put to a worthy use!"

"Well, I suppose we can start practicing the love talk now," I joked. I felt as if I had just lost in a battle to repel the enemy. The battlefield was deadly quiet.

"Why so conventional? It doesn't sound like you." He frowned in a mock imitation of a political-affairs officer. "Considering your performance this morning, we'll withhold the label for the moment. You get washed and join your husband this evening."

"And what about the thirty-five legs due to a bride?"

"Can't afford them. If you had mentioned it earlier, I would have gotten out of this, but now it's too late to back out. Let's settle for two legs, and they are for Xinxin."

*

I went to my mother's house. Mother was wiping the spotless tables in the room.

"I know everything. Last night, the Wu couple came over. They told me not to worry. They said they always had absolute confidence in Wu Guo."

Mother wiped her eyes.

"Your father always said not to worry about you. He said Liming is not the kind to end up unhappy."

"Where's Little Sister?"

"She's off to buy candy. She said you had always spent your money on us. Now we won't let you skimp for your wedding."

I spotted Xinxin's overcoat.

"Where's Xinxin?"

"The Wu family took her away this morning. At first she said she wanted to wait for Mommy, but later she changed her mind and left with them."

So everything was true? I took a bath. Soon it got dark. The children in the courtyard had started to set off firecrackers in anticipation of the New Year. I looked at myself in the mirror. My face was smooth and radiant like the evening sunset. I wonder if Husheng, from where he was, was looking at me at that moment. My thoughts were interrupted by a patter of footsteps.

"Mommy!"

Xinxin rushed in, followed by two younger boys. Xinxin had a big doll in her hands. Was that Wu Guo's contribution of the two legs? The other children, Wu Guo's nephews by his sister and his brother, brought up the rear with a music box, building blocks, and comic books. They made a pile of these objects on the bed. They were her devoted slaves.

"This is from Aunty; this is from Uncle; this is from Granddad; this is from Granny …"

My darling daughter, she had joined the family before her mother!

"Aunty says you must hurry and go over. Aunty knocked on Little Uncle's head …" Her name for Wu was Little Uncle.

"Why did Aunty knock on his head?"

"Aunty said—"

One of the nephews volunteered a reply. "My mommy says, you've done a smart thing after all."

I cried and held the three children in my embrace.

Wu Guo came over. He was dressed in a new suit, which made him look slightly comic.

"Weren't you told to deliver your message and go back? Off with you all!" He shooed the children away and sat down next to me.

"Liming, you are crying. Are you thinking of Husheng? Next year, we'll go and bring back his ashes. Xinxin must keep his name …" My tears continued to flow. He took out a crumpled handkerchief.

"I announced to them this morning at the factory—I'm not Little Wu anymore. I won't be ordered around anymore with Little Wu this and Little Wu that. I announced that I am a father. Not the diaper-swashing kind: My daughter will start primary school next year. Come on, don't cry. I've asked everybody to come over next Sunday. I told them, now Wu Guo is closer to the Party than ever. After all, my wife has twelve years' Party membership and that's not a joking matter!"

I picked up the doll.

"Two legs?"

He laughed as he put his arms around me and led me to our bridal chamber in his parents' house, a room the whole family had readied at a day's notice. In one corner stood a Xinhai brand piano, its two legs gleaming in the lamplight. It was the only new object in the room.

"I've thought it over. We'll just have this one child. And she doesn't have to be a pianist. The piano is there just to give a sparkle to life."

*

The moon dipped to the west. Only the stars were in the sky. Wu was deep in slumber.

"It's just seven days," I whispered in his ear.

"Seven days is long enough. God created the world and Adam and Eve, all in seven days. While I had just married a wife, the best wife in the world, unlike any other …" he murmured as he kissed me.

I realized that he was still young. Earlier, Mother Liu had said as she dragged me to a quiet comer:

"Don't let yourself get carried away for the moment. Right now I'd say you are both young. But what about ten years later? He'll still be young, while you'll be an old woman."

I knew that day would come. But even if one day he decides that he has made a mistake, I'm prepared to pay the price of a lifetime for sharing a slice of his life. It will be my way of thanking him for his kindness now. If that moment arrives, I will be very calm. I will allow him to correct his mistake, just as I am abetting his mistake right now. Life would be so drab if one could not afford one glorious mistake. That's not living. That's just hiding under a mask.

Wasn't this stupid? But stupider things were to follow. I was pregnant. I let myself become pregnant on purpose and then I went and had an abortion. I did this because I heard the whispers. People had gone through the genealogy of three generations on both sides and decided, "There must be something wrong with Wu Guo. Isn't it as clear as day?"

I let myself be pregnant and had an abortion. I can't bear to have anyone cast dirt on pure marble.

My little ship sets sail again.

Oh, you unexpected tide!

39.231 Excerpt from The Foundation\fn{by Jiang Zilong (1941-)} Cangxian County, Hebei Province, China (M)
15

It was shortly before National Day, and many workers in the forging shop were gathered around their director Lu Yong-cun to demand overtime for the holiday. By working three days at double wages, a Grade 3 worker could end up with $5 or so, a Grade 4 worker could get $7 or more, and workers of Grade 5 and above could do even better!

But what could they do for overtime work? There was nothing that needed to be done. Everybody pointed out that since the concrete foundation for the 500-ton rapid press—which was the most important piece of equipment in the shop—had already been poured, the press could be installed ahead of schedule over the holiday.

But Lu Yong-cun emphatically disagreed, arguing that the foundation would have to last well into the next century. He said it was essential to insist on quality as the top priority and to proceed carefully according to the established installation schedule. The workers who were hoping for overtime looked at each other and masked their disappointment as well as they could. But they did not walk away.

This man Lu was tall and thin, with a back that hunched forward and a head of fluffy white hair. His age was difficult to discern—it must have been somewhere between fifty and sixty. His rough, kindly face bore evidence of the tumultuous half-century he had lived through. There was not a trace of guile in his character; he always handled things bluntly. He had a reputation for sometimes passing things up that were there for the taking. The problem now wasn't that he could not see what was on everyone's mind but that he refused to compromise on matters of principle.

The workers expressed their opinions in a clamor of voices, saying it wasn't true that installation ahead of schedule would affect quality, declaring that they might as well just give up and go find odd jobs instead, and tossing unsavory language in old Lu's direction. But Lu Yong-cun did not get flustered or angry. He was always earnest, if somewhat preachy, in standing up for his ideas. Once he had decided something, it was hard to make him budge. He remained trapped in his office by the nagging workers until Kang Tong-yan, clerk of the forging shop, came to extricate him.

Kang Tong-yan was also over fifty, but his hair was still lacquer-black and glossy with oil. The smooth, soft flesh of his face gleamed a childlike pink. His short frame carried an especially protuberant belly which had bent his spine into a bow. But this awkward build belied a great nimbleness. Pushing his way to the center of the crowd, he addressed them in solemn tones:

"OK, everybody, don't just stand around yacking. Get back to work, I've got something important to discuss with Director Lu."

His keen eyes swept over the group. Then, suspecting they did not believe him, he added:

"'The main office has decided to withhold all bonuses in this shop starting this month. I've got to see the director right away so I'll know what to do when I take the matter up with the paymaster."

Not only failing to get the overtime pay they wanted, the workers now saw their bonuses being withheld. Realizing that things were not going their way, they unhappily left the office.

Kang Tong-yan's eyes crinkled in amusement. This was his specialty—every time Lu Yong-cun was stuck with a problem too hot to handle or when people pestered him and he couldn't get free, Kang would fabricate a yarn that contained enough truth in it to convey a sense of urgency. He would say that Lu Yong-cun had an urgent phone call from the factory manager or that something had gone wrong and required the director's attention. No one could tell that he was making it up. Sometimes old Lu himself could not detect that Kang Tong-yan was secretly covering for him. Artless person that he was, old Lu sometimes took Kang Tong-yan's fantastic improvizations at face value, thus obliging Kang to act them out as if they were real.

The workers dispersed, leaving Kang alone with Lu Yong-cun, who looked very serious.

"Who says the bonuses for our shop will be withheld?" he asked.

"I heard it on the grapevine," Kang Tong-yan said with a mysterious laugh.

Lu Yong-cun's mood brightened.

"Hah! The 'grapevine' again! If that's where you got it, why'd you announce it in front of everyone? You made it sound so convincing, like hard fact! Things like that cause trouble, you know!"

"My grapevine is at least 95 percent reliable. And when I picked up the news I had to get it straight to you. Otherwise, when the main office really does withhold the bonuses, how would you explain things to the workers?"

Kang Tong-yan was thoroughly displeased at having been reprimanded, yet smiled apologetically as he spoke. His friendship with Lu Yong-cun went back more than thirty years. Before Liberation, Kang had been the boss's son in the Kangji Iron Works, where Lu Yong-cun had worked as a craftsman. Now the craftsman had become the shop director and the boss's son an errand-running clerk.

After a moment Kang Tongyan offered old Lu some honest advice:

"You must not ignore the workers' demands, Mr. Director. I've had my ear to the ground and know that all the other shops are giving overtime. Isn't it up to the individual shop whether there's work? Forget about the foundation for now. Just find them some work—anything—and they'll have their overtime, right? That'll at least keep them from swearing at you. Why make them resent you?"

"What can I do? If we pay out an extra 20 percent in overtime when there's really nothing to do, who suffers? The country, of course! No, we cadres just have to put up with the insults, that's all."

"You have to take insults just because you're a cadre?"

Kang Tong-yan shook his heavy, mallet-like head but kept the reasons for his disagreement to himself. If the factory belonged to you, he was thinking, then it would be worth taking insults. But, no they give you the thankless task of directing this shop and only about $50 a month for doing it. Is it worth all the flak you get? So what if the workers get their overtime? It's not coming out of your own pocket, so why resist? Besides, if they get overtime, so do you. You could pick up $6 or $7 for yourself and go have a good time. Why not? Why be so obtuse? Kang figured he understood Lu Yong-cun—Lu was a naïve straight arrow. No wonder he had never been promoted and probably never would be. Opportunity could hit him on the forehead and he would let it go by.

Suddenly Lu Yong-cun remembered something.

"Oh, yes, Kang, the Office of Policy Implementation just called and asked you to stop by."

Kang Tong-yan's eyes flashed and widened to twice their normal size. His heart was pounding rapidly as he turned to leave, but an afterthought stopped him.

"Mr. Director!", he admonished. "Don't forget to go to the paymaster's office to ask about the bonuses."

"I'll go in a minute. On your way tell Xiao-qing I'd like to see her, OK?"

Old Lu was turning something else over in his mind.

*

Xi Xiao-qing hung up the telephone, her mind as unsettled as a potful of water ata rolling boil. Her boyfriend Lu Jie, Lu Yong-cun's son, had just called to invite her to his house for the holiday. This was called "making acquaintance with the house," which meant that she would formally pay respects to his parents and, more importantly, let all his close friends get a good look at her. Lu Jie had also told her over the phone that he had brought her some fashionable clothes and high-class cloth from Nanjing.

This put Xiao-qing in an awkward position. They had known each other only a few months, and she had not expected that Lu Jie would already start making such substantial preparations for their marriage. After seeing Lu Jie a few times, she had discovered that he was not the one for her. The two of them nearly always talked at cross-purposes, and his integrity was a far cry from his father's.

Now Lu Jie had invited her to spend National Day at his home. If she went, wouldn't it mean their relationship was definite? On the phone she had neither agreed nor refused but promised to give him an answer before they got off work that day.

Then Kang Tong-yan, who had introduced them, arrived to tell her that Director Lu wished to see her. Kang, his face beaming, lowered his voice to say:

"I have good news to tell you a little later. Lu Jie says you're still short a television set for the bridal chamber. You just leave that to me!"

With that Kang Tong-yan flashed her a mysterious smile and slipped away, his squat body as agile as a bighead carp's.

Xi Xiao-qing's looks were not extraordinary, but she did have an unassuming and wholesome beauty about her. She was quiet by nature and spoke in a subdued, steady voice. She had depth. But the reason she stood so high in Lu Jie's estimation was probably that she was secretary of the shop's branch of the Youth League.

When she walked into Lu Yong-cun's office, her heart was pounding like a small drum. Lu Yong-cun gestured for her to sit down.

"Morale has been pretty low among the workers these days," he began. "They don't work very hard during regular hours, and now they want overtime during the holiday. You people in the Youth League need to do more ideological work among the League members."

Xi Xiao-qing breathed easier when she realized Lu was not bringing up her relationship with his son. She nodded her head.

"Are you having difficulties? Has your branch held its new elections yet?"

"Yes, we have," answered Xiaoqing, "but no job assignments have been made. Nobody's willing to be a League cadre. The ones who've been chosen, and who can't get out of it, will serve only on the organization committee. Nobody wants to be on the propaganda committee."

"Why not?"

"Propaganda committee members have to do propaganda, write reports on the blackboard, print up materials, and drum up motivation. It's a thankless job. Organization committee members only have to collect League dues—a snap!"

"What? They really have that kind of attitude?" Lu Yong-cun was shocked.

The branch secretary smiled wryly.

"I don't know what's going on either, Director Lu. The prestige of our League branch seems pretty low right now. We can't get people to rally around us. The members' sense of honor and responsibility isn't very strong. We still have more than ten League members in our shop, but now more people are quitting than joining. The young ones just don't come. The apprentices won't even fill out a membership application unless you give them a few pep talks."

Xi Xiao-qing was raising questions in Lu Yong-cun's mind. As he thought about the problems this branch secretary was facing, he stood up and walked toward her. He looked at her and felt a burning agitation inside his chest. In both work performance and character, Xi Xiao-qing was one of the best young people in the shop. But old Lu had always felt that she was holding something back, something she dared not reveal to him. He picked this moment to ask:

"Well, we have to keep our own thinking on firm ground. Is something on your mind?"

The girl's face reddened and she lowered her head. After a moment she lifted it again and met Lu Yongcun's eyes.

"May I ask you a few questions, Director Lu?"

"Sure. What questions?"

Doing her best to suppress her intense feelings, Xi Xiao-qing said:

"When the Communist Manifesto was first published, Communism was only like a disembodied spirit, yet it gave the capitalist world a terrible fright. They were really afraid of it. But now that there are so many socialist countries in the world, capitalism is no longer afraid of—and even looks down on—socialism. Why is this? If the socialist system is incomparably superior, why don't its productive forces develop as quickly as those of capitalism? Why can't socialism catch up with capitalism in economic and technical development? I might believe, as a matter of faith, that Communism will triumph, that it will eventually win out over capitalism. But whenever I listen to scientific reports or read technical magazines, capitalism is always ahead of socialism. How can we explain this?"

Lu Yong-cun, a practical man who usually stayed away from theory, was quite taken aback. These questions might not be immensely difficult, but neither were they easily answered on such short notice. He never would have guessed that Xi Xiao-qing would pose such questions.

Xi Xiao-qing had obviously been doing some deep, hard thinking. She had run these questions through her mind many times. Her voice had started to quaver as she asked them. When she saw the shop director's usually crinkled eyes grow wider and wider, she changed the subject to old Lu himself.

"Director Lu, you took part in unions and strikes before Liberation. Was your faith in Communism the same then as now? Revolutionary martyrs used to die for Communism with smiles on their faces, with no doubt that the revolution would be victorious. But how many people have such faith now? And what weight do Communist ideals have in the minds of certain old cadres, even though they lived through those times? How much of their lives is still devoted to the future?"

Lu Yong-cun was truly dumbfounded. He simply could not connect these bizarre questions with the League secretary who was usually so enthusiastic and optimistic. His first impulse was not to address her questions but to feel sorry for her and to worry. She'd be better off if her thinking, rather than being so complex, were like that of all those feather-headed girls who wore flowery, bright clothes and talked incessantly of food and fashion. A serious look came over his face.

"What crazy things you think about."

The girl did not protest, but fixed old Lu with a stubborn gaze as if to say, "You're just as perplexed as I am, aren't you?"

*

Lu Yong-cun ran squarely into a brick wall when he went to negotiate bonuses with the Bonus Evaluation Section. As he walked back to the shop, the argument he'd been having with the head of the section was still running through his mind.

"Your shop ruined its equipment and stopped production for several months. You've operated at a loss month after month, and you still want bonuses? What a nice dream—"

While listening to this, old Lu had stared angrily for some time without knowing what to say. But now the words came to him:

"Of course, by all rights a shop that stops producing and loses money should not get bonuses. But why did our shop stop production? Who is to blame for losing money? Where in the world was there ever a rapid press that went all to hell, including its foundation, only three or four years after being mounted? As soon as the rapid press stopped working last February, we made an urgent report to the main office. Right from the start no one took notice; no one gave a damn. When the cement was there, the reinforcing rods were not. When we got the reinforcing rods, we were short on gravel. We had a terrible time getting the materials together, and then nobody would do the construction work. Things dragged on for more than half a year. You can assemble and mount a whole new press in that much time, but we had to wait eight months just to get the foundation. How could we avoid losses? Am I, Lu Yong-cun, to blame? Is it the fault of the shopworkers? Why do you have to withhold the bonuses? And another thing—all the other shops are giving bonuses. Only the forging shop is being left out. How am I supposed to go on as shop director? What will I say to the workers?"

There were plenty of good arguments, but he had been upset at the time and anger had tied his tongue. Now, as he calmed down, the arguments came to mind one by one. Old Lu was annoyed at himself. He was not actually dull-witted, and was perfectly articulate as long as he was allowed to speak in his slow, judicious manner. He never interrupted when others were talking, and he could not present his opinions well when others interrupted him. When he got involved in buck-passing squabbles and red-faced shouting matches, people needed only to butt in when he opened his mouth, and he was speechless. No matter how right he was, everything stayed bottled up inside. As a consequence he was always the whipping boy at the meetings of middle-level factory cadres. Even the factory manager, when feeling out of sorts, would swallow his anger at the other shops and take it out on Lu Yong-cun by picking on the forging shop. Lu Yong-cun was a sure bet not to get irritated or give any trouble. But although people pushed him around, everyone throughout the factory admitted that he was a great guy and a conscientious, down-to-earth workhorse.

The people in the forging shop were all waiting for the good news their director would bring back, but when they saw the way Lu was hanging his head and muttering as he walked, they cooled off right away. To them, those five or six extra dollars were no laughing matter. People began tossing off insolent remarks, deliberately raising their voices so old Lu could hear.

"Nice guys get the short end of the stick, and that's the way it's always going to be. Our boss Lu's a loser! He's the only flaming soldier in that bunch of flaming generals, and we all take it on the chin with him!"

"You can tell a good horse by how it walks, and a good man by how he talks. Our Director Lu can't pull anything off!"

Honesty is supposed to be a virtue—an expression of Party spirit—but these workers were equating it with foolishness, incompetence, and dullness. When the badgering continued for several days, old Lu pretended not to hear. The sorry state of the forging shop was due to his own failures in leadership. He could hardly blame the workers for their insolent remarks. But the longer he remained silent, the more insistent the complaints became, until some people even stopped working.

This made him lose his temper.

"So you're going to stop work just because of a few lost dollars in bonuses? Money's the only reason you work, huh? Your consciences feel comfortable with that?"

Seeing the change in the director's countenance, the workers fell silent. Everyone knew he was suffering too, and was just as powerless as they. But one young fellow would have no part of this mood:

"Conscience?" he blared. "My conscience tells me to take pay for work, to eat food, and to wear clothes."

"If everyone thought like you, could this country ever modernize?"

"I'm a worker. I can't be concerned with all that."

Old Lu's lips were trembling with rage. The workers prevailed upon the rash young man to leave, and old Lu went back to his office. He was being pressured from above and jostled from below. Caught in the middle, how could he keep doing his job? If things kept dragging on like this, the forging shop really would go to pieces. He would just have to put up with the workers' abuse and proceed with arrangements for the work they would have after the holiday. He suddenly wondered whether Lu Jie, who was supposed to have returned many days ago, had in fact come back. He reached for the telephone.

An impact cushion was needed in order to install the 500-ton rapid press. Twenty days ago the Supply Section had sent Lu Jie south on a purchasing trip. Before his son left, Lu Yong-cun had instructed him in no uncertain terms that he must get the impact cushion and come back with it immediately. Now old Lu was dialing the Infrastructure Construction Section, where Lu Jie himself answered. When he heard his son's ebullient voice, old Lu felt better right away, assuming Lu Jie had succeeded in buying the impact cushion. But Lu Jie casually told him that he had not bought the cushion because the source factory had none. A buzz sounded in Lu Yong-cun's head. If Lu Jie had been standing before him, old Lu would have smacked him. His son had ruined it!

Meanwhile Lu Jie, failing entirely to perceive his father's irritation, prattled on about how he had brought a load of good lumber back from the south. He asked his father to leave work early to help him bring the lumber from the station to their home. When old Lu refused, Lu Jie's tone changed immediately. He complained that his father showed no concern for his affairs and pressed his point with some glib reasoning. When has there ever been a father who did not make arrangements for his son's wedding? He answered his own question with numerous examples: so-and-so's father had bought such-and-such furniture for his son; so-and-so's father had managed to get a certain kind of house for his son. The point was that Old Lu was singular among fathers in his disregard for his son's welfare.

Old Lu, furious, hung up on his son. Preparations, preparations! Lu Jie and Xi Xiao-qing had seen each other only a few times, but most of the things for the wedding had already been rounded up. What about the arrangements for the shop? What about arrangements for the factory?

Lu Yong-cun was at the end of his patience. He:was itching to do something, but there was nothing he could do. He stormed out of the office and, without thinking, found his way onto the new foundation for the rapid press. He was suddenly aware that the shop was uncommonly quiet. How could a forging shop lack the sounds of steel hammering against iron? Where was the rumble of the overhead crane? Even the wheezing, bellowing furnace stood silent. How he wished he could still hear the familiar, deafening sound of heavy impact! Such stillness in an ironworking shop was not a good thing. It was the sort of silence that could strangle a person.

Old Lu had been working with iron most of his life. The conditions and equipment in his line of work had steadily improved, but the work itself had become more difficult and less profitable. Back when he had started as an apprentice, the factory owner had earned piles of money with nothing more than workers swinging heavy hammers. With the money rolling in, the owner had bought a press with upper and lower dies, and this had brought in even more money. After a time the hammer became worn, and its stem had begun to crack around the edges. So they bound it tight with wire and went on using it, and the money kept gushing in. Who ever heard of losing money on an ironworks? How could it be that this mining machinery plant, which employed thousands of people, and this forging shop, with hundreds of workers, would lose money? What was the root of the problem?

Lu Yong-cun was squatting on the foundation, hands clasped behind his head. He stared fixedly at the mass of reinforced concrete as he thought about these questions. He could not answer them, but he did notice a place on the foundation that was not very solid. He knocked at it with an iron bar, and off came a big piece of concrete like a lump of bean curd. This gave him quite a start. He immediately went over the whole foundation very carefully.

What he found was hardly reassuring. Old Lu was not a mason, but he was an experienced ironworker, and he was sure something was wrong. The Construction Section was responsible for the rapid press foundation. He went back to his office and called the head of the Construction Section.

"Supervisor Yu? There's something wrong with the foundation of the 500-ton rapid press! I poked it with an iron bar and a piece fell off. How's it going to take 500 tons of pressure?"

"Well of course if you poke it with an iron bar you can poke some pieces loose!" the supervisor replied sarcastically. "Why don't you try using explosives? Maybe you can blast it sky high!"

"That foundation is nothing to joke about, Yu! The first time we installed this rapid press, we had to dig up the foundation and replace it after only four years! What other country does things that way? Other people use these things for decades or even a century. A foundation is supposed to outlive two or three presses. If we go on like this, our country will lose so much money it's not funny! Why don't you take a sample from the foundation and run tests on it!"

"No need for that. If anything's wrong with the foundation, we here at Construction will take responsibility. It'll be quite enough if you just mind your own shop!"

The supervisor angrily hung up the phone.

This was rubbish. Was there no end to the wrangling, the accusations, the anger? "Just keep on wrangling," Lu Yong-cun muttered to himself. "Wrangle, wrangle, wrangle. Wrangle your hair white! Wrangle the factory to the brink of ruin! But don't stop wrangling!"

*

Kang Tong-yan was prancing along as if there were springs under his feet. The Policy Implementation Office had just absolved him of his "reactionary capitalist" label. What an immeasurable relief! He opened the office door at the forging shop to find Lu Yong-cun staring vacantly at the telephone.

"Old Lu!" he called out crisply.

Lu Yong-cun raised his head to see the look of satisfaction on Kang's face.

"What's up, Kang?" he asked.

Kang Tong-yan laughed.

"Don't play games, old Lu. You were the one who did it all for me, weren't you?"

Kang was a smooth talker. He knew it had been Party Central's decision to press the new policy, but he chose to direct his appreciation to Lu Yong-cun. Lu Yong-cun had indeed been good to him these past years. Even after Kang had been pinned with a bad label, he had not been treated as a reactionary element in the forging shop. When he got older and could no longer stand physical labor, Lu Yong-cun had appointed him clerk of the office. This allowed him to make use of his special abilities and also put a bit of authority into his hands. From then on, he had been willing to scamper everywhere, serving as the big talker for the forging shop. In his heart he was grateful for Lu Yong-cun's consideration.

Lu Yong-cun finally understood what Kang was talking about and handed him a cigarette.

"You should thank the Party for removing your label," he said. "If you want to think about something, think about how to get the forging shop back on the track."

For a moment Kang Tong-yan didn't see what Lu Yong-cun was. driving at.

"Well—how am I supposed to do that?"

"What if I were to turn the forging shop over to you, as if it were your privately owned operation; what would you do?"

"Turn it over to me?"

In his surprise Kang Tong-yan's blood coursed into his head, and his blood pressure seemed to rise. He was confident of his own abilities and was also sure that Lu Yong-cun knew he was no slouch. He had pulled the director out of many sticky situations in the past. Could it be that Lu Yong-cun wanted to promote him to vice-director of the shop now that his label had been removed? Good heavens! Would glad tidings really come twice in one day? His appetite for authority, suddenly revived, burned his face red and sent waves of heat through his body.

Seeing that Kang's thoughts had taken him elsewhere, Lu Yong-cun came back to the point:

"In the old days when your father opened the Kangji Iron Works, he had only those few hearths and a few dozen men. I remember you never came to work. You were always out in the country hunting rabbits and trapping birds, and in the evenings you visited brothels. You'd show up at the shop only if you felt like it. But the place did earn lots of money. These days working conditions are much better. We have more equipment and more people. So why do we operate at a loss?

Kang Tong-yan understood. He clearly realized the shop director's difficulties and frustrations, and replied in an acrimonious tone that he had not dared to use in over ten years.

"I think you've done a respectable job just to get the forging shop to run as well as it does," he said. "After all, it's not your private operation."

"What do you mean by that? You think I'm not giving it everything I have?"

"You've done all you can but in a blind effort. If you owned the shop and it sank to this condition, you'd have to close up. You and yours would have to commit suicide or else go begging in the streets. The unemployed workers would have to look elsewhere to feed themselves. They sure wouldn't have it as nice as they do now, earning money while they gossip all day. The Communist Party is generous and tolerant. The superiority of socialism is in sharing the available food with everyone."

"The shop is going bad because of my inability—"

"What inability? The shop isn't yours, so you don't have complete authority over it. And therefore you have no prestige with the workers. They can listen to you or not, as they choose. Instead of controlling the workers by getting a grip on their basic interests, you have to control them through political campaigns. And after too many campaigns, you find there are certain side effects, just like the side effects of too much medicine. Party members are even less obedient than the activist nonmembers. Remember a few years ago when everybody was competing to get workers of the Four Black Categories, just because they were more obedient and hardworking than people from the Five Red Categories?! If the person in charge of a factory doesn't consider the factory his own, do you think he'll run it well? If the truth were known, there is no boss in our factory now. It doesn't belong to the factory manager; it doesn't belong to you shop directors; and of course it doesn't belong to the workers. You'll probably say it belongs to the Party or the country. But since when can the head of a national government concern himself with every single factory?"

"There you go talking nonsense again."

Lu Yong-cun stared furiously at his former boss's son. What really made him furious was that Kang Tong-yan's words were not entirely nonsense. In fact they made him think of what Xi Xiao-qing had been saying. These two people—completely different in their experience, political background, and age—had expressed some of the same things. This was so uncanny that Lu Yong-cun's fury gave way to a shudder.

But Lu Yong-cun's remark had sent a chill through Kang Tong-yan and had brought him quickly back to his senses.

"What an ass I am," he thought to himself. "I get pleased with myself and forget who I am. Good thing Lu Yong-cun is a decent, kindhearted sort. If he were somebody else I could get reported, and that label I just got rid of would be pinned right back on me."

He broke out in a cold sweat. Wreathing his face in an apologetic smile, he hurried to say:

"I was just letting my mouth flap, Mr. Director. Don't take me seriously."

"You didn't have to feed me that line. Look at the act you put on!" Lu Yongcun said, showing disgust. "There's a problem with the quality of the rapid press foundation, but the Construction Section won't run a check on it. Can you do something?"

Kang Tong-yan perked up. He was always ready to help Lu Yong-cun with a problem and was confident that there was nothing in the factory he could not handle. He pulled a pack of cigarettes from his briefcase and turned it over in his hand.

"Leave this to me," he said with a laugh. "I'll find a way to get somebody over there to do it."

As he finished speaking, Kang Tongyan turned to go. Then something else occurred to him. He pulled a wad of money from his briefcase and put it in Lu Yongcun's hand.

"This is for Lu Jie," he said solemnly.

"Where'd this money come from?"

"He's still short a television set for the bridal suite. As the person who introduced them, I thought this was the least I could do."

Old Lu lost his temper.

"I'll have nothing to do with this!" he roared.

Kang Tong-yan took the money back in chagrin.

"All right, then I'll give it directly to Lu Jie."

*

When Lu Yong-cun read the test results that Kang Tongyan brought back, he stood shaking helplessly in anger. The entire foundation for the 500-ton rapid press was below standard. The design had called for a strength rating of 200, and the actual rating was only 90. Production had been halted for seven months, and this was what they had waited for! Over a hundred tons of cement and over thirty tons of steel reinforcing rods had been wasted. Even worse was the great waste of time. Once again they would have to hack the huge foundation to pieces with picks and put in another foundation. There was no telling how many more months that would take!

In all this misfortune one thing was very fortunate. Imagine the consequences if Lu Yong-cun had not checked for problems with the foundation and had not asked Kang Tong-yan to have secret tests done. If they had gone their merry way and mounted the press anyway, the result could have been genuinely catastrophic. The factory manager, as enraged as Lu Yong-cun, called an urgent meeting. All supervisors and directors were to be present.

The supervisor of the Construction Section had started out as an allotment clerk. Though gaunt and monkey-like, he had a stentorian voice. Known as one of the factory's "four iron mouths," he led the Construction Section with great flair and was reputed to be one of the cleverest and most capable middle-level cadres at the plant.

But today the manager's interrogation left him dumbfounded. He had not had the slightest warning of it. He asked to see the report Lu Yong-cun was holding. One look told him the tests had been done by someone in his own section. This made him seethe inside.

"The bastards sell out their own people to help outsiders. They do sneak tests for others and don't even let me know when they find trouble!"

But by the time he had finished reading the report, he had already formulated a reply. He lifted his head and, with a sincere and comely smile on his face, spoke in a confident and unapologetic tone.

"This is not our fault. There was nothing wrong with the way we did the job. The failure in quality is due to lack of bonding strength in the cement. And I have to point out here that the residence hall now under construction is being built with the same batch of cement. If something goes wrong there in the future, my department can accept no responsibility."

See how cleanly and lightly he shifted the blame? These days personal power, and success as a cadre, require nothing more than the gift of gab. Lu Yong-cun was flabbergasted. Before he could think of a reply, someone else answered for him. This was the supervisor of the Supply Section, a tough-looking middle-aged fellow whose lips were stained from cigarettes. The factory's Supply Section was like a department store or grocery store elsewhere. People often needed its help, but it seldom needed anything from others. Because of this, people involved in supply work were puffed up with a sense of their own importance. This supervisor, who was well known throughout the factory as Lin the Big Taker, now abruptly lifted his head from the sofa and addressed the supervisor of the Construction Section coldly.

"Look, Yu," he said. "If you can't take the heat, don't try to shift it to others. You can't just bite whomever you like with that iron mouth of yours, you know! All of our cement is certified for quality. What do you mean "low bonding strength?" Why didn't you run your tests before you started the job? It was obviously good cement, but your people ruined it, and now you turn around and lash out at me!"

Immediately the meeting was in an uproar as the two antagonists went at each other. Listening to this verbal battle, a person who did not know the true story would have felt quite torn. Both sides had mastered the key to effective prevarication—if one can speak with self-righteous assurance, the validity of one's position is halfway established. The truth counts for nothing.

The factory manager's towering stature and ruddy complexion gave the impression of an expansive heart housed in a generously proportioned body. He wanted to fix the blame and wrap the case up. But when he pointed at the Construction Section, Iron Mouth Yu glibly weasled out of it. When he pressed the Supply Section to admit error, Big Taker Lin was even firmer in his denial. The manager's anxiety to settle the matter was useless; angry stares alone would not resolve it. The situation was most peculiar—a factory manager is supposed to have control over his supervisors, but certain things were now clearly beyond his control. And a supervisor's authority is supposed to be less than a factory manager's, but when these supervisors discovered areas beyond their manager's control, they ran wild. Each exploited the other's vulnerabilities. It seemed that sometimes everyone had authority and sometimes no one had it: when doing their jobs, it seemed that everyone lacked authority, or did not choose to use it; but when they were out for their private advantage, they had plenty of authority and were only too ready to use it. The complex of "connections" among the cadres was based on an interlocking, hopelessly tangled maze of utter balderdash.

Lu Yong-cun sat off to one side, helpless with anxiety. Seeing that there was really nothing he could do, the manager had no choice but to wave his hands and put a stop to the battle of tongues.

"All right, enough of this baloney. We'll look into the problem of responsibility later. First let's decide what to do about the foundation."

Lu Yong-cun winced inwardly, knowing that the manager had given in. He would not get to the bottom of a mistake even this big.

Big Taker Lin lay back on the sofa.

"Deciding what to do about the foundation doesn't involve my department," he remarked casually.

"What do you say we should do?" the manager enquired of Iron Mouth Yu.

"Beats me," said Yu nonchalantly.

Lu Yong-cun could no longer restrain himself.

"Somebody's going to have to go back to work, hack the bad foundation apart, and put in a new one!"

"Who?" asked Iron Mouth.

"Your people, of course. It was your job in the first place, and you were the ones who botched it."

The supervisor of construction glowered.

"Who cares what you think? The problem hasn't been analyzed yet. Responsibility hasn't been determined. The manager hasn't even ruled on the case. So what right does somebody like you have to jump in?"

"Well—"

The question alone was enough to fluster Lu Yong-cun. His philosophy of life was that honesty would always win out over dishonesty. But others held exactly the opposite philosophy—that dishonesty overcomes honesty. When these two philosophies crossed blades, old Lu always lost. All he could say was:

"If you don't do it, who will? Maybe you can afford the delay, but the rest of us can't. And in the long run the country will suffer."

The supervisor of the Construction Section answered him sarcastically.

"You think you're the only one worried about our country's modernization? I'm even more wrought up than you. It's just dandy to say we should do it, but right now I don't have any men free. If I'm going to hack apart the foundation, I'll have to stop work on the residence hall."

"Impossible!" interrupted the manager, worried by this threat.

"I have an idea," Iron Mouth Yu said with a laugh. "Old Lu, aren't the people in your shop standing around all day with nothing to do? Maybe you should hack it apart yourselves."

So the burden, having been shunted everywhere, was finally shunted onto the forging shop.

"That isn't our job," spluttered an outraged Lu Yong-cun. "We are iron-workers. We can't do this work!"

"What's all this 'you' and 'us' stuff? It's all for the sake of our country's Four Modernizations!" Iron Mouth Yu lay back on the sofa, pulled a filter cigarette from the factory manager's pack, and held it between his lips. "Hey, don't think only of yourself!" he said, holding out his hand.

Big Taker Lin pulled out another cigarette and tossed it to Iron Mouth.

"Look at you," he chuckled. "So stingy you ought to be called Iron Rooster instead of Iron Mouth.\fn{A note reads: The feathers of an iron rooster cannot, of course, be plucked; thus it can pluck things from others with impunity.} Whenever there's a meeting, you smoke nothing but Extended Hand brand cigarettes."

Iron Mouth Yu, never one to let someone get the better of him, returned the compliment.

"I hear from your men that you can teach an honest man to cheat his father in only three months!"

The two men lit their cigarettes and burst out laughing. The fierceness of their argument a moment ago had been bogus. The mock antagonism would be forgotten immediately after the meeting and would have no effect on their personal relationship.

Old Lu simply was not in the same league as these two supervisors. Feeling greatly pained, he suddenly recalled the question Kang Tong-yan had raised not long before. Who did this mining machine plant belong to? Among the manager and supervisors sitting before him, there was not one man who regarded the factory as his own. A serious problem had arisen, and they were not even worried!

"Don't tell me this plant has become mine by default!" old Lu mused.

No, the plant belonged to the Party. But where was the Party? Was the Party a real thing or an illusion? The Party had been deceived. These people were taking advantage of the Party! Not one of them viewed the Party as more important than himself. It was the Party that had entrusted them with their positions, but they had played games with the Party and had ruined the foundation. They had turned into out-and-out liars. Oh, Xiao-qing, weren't these the very answers you were looking for?

Lu Yong-cun had always lacked the ability to make quick, penetrating judgments, but today he suddenly understood many things he had not dared to confront in the past. He realized that when the social environment calls for certain characteristics in people, those characteristics will naturally develop. If there were no need for buck-passing and wrangling, society would not produce slick characters. But when the need is there, people naturally learn the ropes. Just look at his own son, Lu Jie, who was right in there learning to be like Big Taker Lin.

The factory manager thought things over for a moment, then settled the matter.

"It's probably best if your shop goes ahead and tears up the bad foundation," he said to Lu Yong-cun. "You can send your men over to the Construction Section to learn how it's done."

*

Lu Yong-cun returned to his shop, called the workers together in front of the 500-ton rapid press, and assigned duties for demolishing the foundation. The workers were indignant, not only because tearing apart the foundation was dirty, tiring, and extremely difficult work, but also because it was so absurd that they were the ones to do it.

The Construction Section had committed an error so grave that their supervisor should have been dismissed and their bonuses withheld to compensate the forging shop for its losses. But look how things had turned out! Not only had the Construction Section evaded all responsibility; they had even ended up being bailed out by the forging shop. First the forging shop's bonuses had been withheld, and then this highly undesirable job had been assigned to them. Were the shopworkers supposed to accept this gleefully?

Lu Yong-cun understood the workers' dissatisfaction but had no power to change anything. The basic problem had been developing over the past ten or even twenty years, and now it all seemed to become old Lu's personal burden. The workers were complaining angrily when someone suddenly noticed that Director Lu was sitting white-faced and crumpled over inside the foundation pit.

"Director Lu!"

The workers rushed to his side. Lu Yong-cun himself did not know what had happened. At first there had been only a feeling of distress, then difficulty in breathing, then a series of wringing chest pains that gradually overcame him. Xi Xiao-qing and a number of young workers hastened to prop him up. His blood pressure and heart had never shown any signs of abnormality, but today he was suddenly being stricken by a heart attack. A frightening shadow passed across his face. Spasm after spasm contorted his facial muscles as he forced himself to bear the intense pain.

Old Lu urged everyone back to work, saying that he would be all right. But Xi Xiao-qing, who wanted to stay and take care of him, refused to go. Suddenly thinking of his son's marriage, old Lu felt he had to draw the girl aside.

"My boy Lu Jie is an ass," he whispered. "He's not good enough for you—"

Old Lu wanted to go on, but when he saw the color rush to Xiao-qing's face and the tears well in her eyes, he could not.

A moment later old Lu, obviously fighting pain, spoke to Xiao-qing as firmly as he could manage.

"I want you to organize a Youth League rush squad who will set themselves a goal of hacking this ruined foundation apart within one month."

As he spoke he pulled a roll of bills from his pocket and pressed it into Xiaoqing's hand.

"Use this money for bonuses. If it's not enough, I'll give you more on my next payday—"

Xiao-qing felt a lump in her throat and could not hold back her tears. She handed the roll of bills back to old Lu.

"Don't worry, Director Lu," she sobbed. "I promise we'll finish the job on time without a cent of bonus money."

"No, take it. This is tough work. And it's all my fault. I didn't do my job well, and everybody else has to suffer for it!" Old Lu insistently stuffed the money into Xiao-qing's hand.

When the ironworkers heard about this, they flocked around old Lu in consternation. They spoke in quavering voices.

"You still don't really know what makes us tick, Director Lu. What we say is just a lot of talk, but when there's work to do, we do it. We were shooting our mouths off just now but not because of you. What we can't stand is this crazy business where right and wrong is for the birds and all that matters is somebody's goddamn mouth. Please don't take it personally! If it'll help get production going, we'll do the job even though the Construction Section won't. And when we finish we'll drag them to the authorities and get justice! All of us'll join the rush squad, and we'll hack in shifts around the clock! We'll do just fine without bonuses. We don't work just for money, you know!"

Lu Yong-cun laughed in delight and kept laughing until teardrops rolled down his face. Then another terrible burst of pain nearly made him pass out. For the workers, the sight of great beads of sweat on their director's drawn face was as painful as a whiplashing. The workers were starting to lift him up to take him to the hospital when Director Lu struggled to raise his head and fixed them with a wide-eyed angry stare.

"Put me down, you numbskulls!" he roared. "I'm not sick. It's our shop and our factory that are really sick—sick at their very foundation!"

A flurry of voices rushed to comfort him.

"Take it easy. We'll tear apart the bad foundation, Mr. Director!"

Someone brought a canvas-backed chair, and they helped him to sit down in it.

"Watch us start in right now; we'll take care of this foundation!"

A ray of hope swept across Lu Yong-cun's face.

"The factory is our country's foundation; we can't go on mismanaging it this way."

He was pronouncing each word slowly and solemnly.

"We must not plant the seeds of future disaster for our country. The foundation—the foundation—"

When the workers said they would work, they meant it. The forging shop leaped instantly into feverish activity. Strange though it seems, on that day the ironworkers were doing construction work more efficiently than experienced construction workers. Xi Xiao-qing rounded up young workers from the Youth League, who looked like little tigers as they busily carried heavy loads on shoulder poles. When Kang Tong-yan came along carrying his briefcase, he could not believe the bustle before his eyes. He glanced sheepishly at the director. Old Lu pointed to a crowbar on the floor.

"What are you waiting for?" he shouted rousingly. "See that crowbar?"

With a quizzical squint of his small eyes, Kang Tong-yan separated his thin lips just enough to pronounce the words:

"OK, OK."

Then he threw down his briefcase, picked up the crowbar, and without a backward glance strode toward the people who were attacking the bad foundation.

81.130 1,230 Spots\fn{by Show Foong aka Chang Show-foong (1941-)} Tongshan, Kiangsu Province, China (F) 3

It was agreed that he should wait for Wang Cheng-fu by this pond.

The pond, with some geese on it, is located at the entrance to the hospital. In the last ten years, Tang Ta-sheng has come in and out of this hospital at least fifty times—if not a hundred. Strange to say, he has never thought of sitting by this pond. Now that he is doing so, he truly feels it is a nice pond. New Year's is approaching, yet the weather is surprisingly warm. By the pond stands a boy feeding golden carps, while his father is taking pictures nearby. A pregnant woman is strolling. A thin and frail patient on a wheel-chair pushed by someone gawks at the noisy sparrows in a banyan tree. The patient is rather amicable for he smiles at everyone he sees and, with his cheeks so emaciated, he seems to grin from ear to ear. Somehow, however, he looks the picture of pity.

Tang takes another look at the woman, the pregnant woman, and wonders if she will give birth before or after New Year's Day. If before, the baby will have been born in the year of the pig; if after, in the year of the rat. Man's fate is preordained. It's unfortunate that his own mother died early, for not only is he unsure of the exact hour of his birth, but there are two versions of the date: Father said it was the day before Mid-autumn, but Third Aunt said it was after. He used to hate it when some serious matter came up: had he known the hour and date of his birth, he could have at least consulted a fortune-teller. In recent years, however, as his life has become uneventful, his feelings have been unmoved. Rather like a familiar opera whose ending one already knows, the scenario of his fate can be ignored.

It is said that an exceptionally able fortune-teller can trace back an event and, on the basis of your life to date, determine the exact time of your birth. But now there is really no need for this. Half a year ago, in fact, one thing was awaiting his decision; today, however, the moment he stepped out of the doctor's office, his mind was almost made up. And once this matter is settled, nothing serious can happen the rest of his life.

Wang Cheng-fu has not come yet. He is quite annoying. He is actually a little hard of hearing; nothing serious in a sixty-eight-year-old man. But he is so dumb that one has to mind him all the time, or he will even forget to eat. There are more Chinese characters on Wang's body; so, on this first day of treatment, he will have to receive at least five hundred laser spots. Tang himself got five hundred and forty-eight the first time. The nurse had a sweet way of cajoling, calling him "Uncle" all the time.

"Uncle," she said, "you're in luck! All these five hundred and forty-eight spots were paid for by the VACRS [Vocational Assistance Commission for Retired Servicemen]. If you had to pay for them, each spot being worth one hundred and twelve NT dollars, it would cost you sixty grand and more for today's treatment alone!"

He forced a smile. The nurse was so young there was no use explaining to her: who needs this kind of luck? It all happened in 1953. Maybe even her mother was not born yet, let alone herself. What did she know?

Five hundred and forty-eight laser spots, and every one of them hurt. The doctor compared it to the sting from a snapping rubber band. All right, so it's like being snapped by a rubber band; to be snapped five hundred and forty-eight times at a stretch is sure to hurt. The doctor was also a youngster, all smiles:

"It hurt when you got your tattoos. To have them removed should be no great deal."

Strangely—maybe because he was young then—the tattooing didn't seem to hurt much. Three pins, bunched together, were dipped into dye and pricked the skin.

"Kill Zhu and Weed out Mao" on the left arm. "Anti-Communist; Anti-Russia" on the right arm. On the chest was a map and a large flag; on the back, “Succeed or Die.”

The afternoon sun is warm. The white geese glide leisurely. He counts nine of them, but there are several others under the azalea trees by the pond, so he isn’t sure about their number. Somehow, a lonely mallard dashes and roams among them—a bizarre picture.

A breeze blows, and some leaves fall from the banyan tree. He remembers his advice to Wang Cheng-fu yesterday:

“It doesn’t hurt, and it’s not ugly. Laser, Ruby Laser. Scientific invention of the Americans! Remarkable! One machine costs over four million NT dollars! What a great opportunity! It’s free, and it doesn’t hurt. After the treatment, you rub on some medication, and in three days you can take a shower. Wang Cheng-fu, don’t be stubborn. If this weren’t something good, would I urge it on you? I myself have been through eleven treatments. Tomorrow I’ll go for the twelfth, then it’ll be all over. Even the appointment I’ve made for you. Be good and go for the treatment, and when you return to your native land next year, nobody’ll give you any trouble. Doesn’t hurt—I’ll be damned if I lie. After the treatment, it looks like a few plum-shaped white dots have fallen on you. It really doesn’t hurt.”

In fact, it hurts, of course, and much more on the breast and the back than on the arms. But Wang Cheng-fu is the stubborn type. While everyone else has revisited the mainland, he dares not go. Sometimes, when homesick enough, he would cry over the letter:

“But no, I can’t. Communists are ever so treacherous. I have on me seven national flags, plus ‘Persist in Anti-Communist Conviction; Determined to Revenge and Recover Lost Country,’ plus ‘Ba-ge-tu-tai-wan.’ How can they forgive me?”

Wang appears to be confused now, but little did Tang think that he would have some English tattooed at the time: Wang cannot even read the alphabet, and he was tattooed with some English words! Ai! this Wang Cheng-fu-he is the butt of many jokes. One time, from each of his trouser legs was pulled some white stuff, which, upon examination, turned out to be long-legged tight cotton underwear. He said he was quite sure that in the morning he had put on the underwear before he put on his trousers, but obviously that was not the case. And it was already noon when he discovered the slip. Early that morning, Tang went to send two hundred US dollars to his grandson, who was getting married. Upon his return, he found Wang in a very embarrassing strait. He was irritated, but he did not know what to do with this man.

That such a man should, years ago, have been fashionable enough to be tattooed with English words! “Ba-ge-tu-tai-wan,” they say, means “Return to Taiwan.” Tang cannot help laughing when he thinks of this. Wang Cheng-fu has the gift to turn every language—including English and irreverent Taiwanese—into Szechwanese. How does one say “Ba-ge-tu-tai-wan” in English, Tang wonders?

Wang is still not here. Tang is curious to know how many laser spots he’s got today. As Wang dreads pain, Tang took it upon himself to tell the doctor to take care of his two arms only today, leaving the chest and the back for next time. It’s close to New Year; let him have a nice holiday.

Tang’s own first treatment was on the arms too. Five hundred and forty-eight spots. A month later, during the second treatment on the chest and back, he received six hundred and eighty-two spots. After that, he has come once a month, treating in turn the chest or the back. He kept it firmly in mind: he had altogether one thousand two hundred and thirty little holes. Translated into money, it comes to one hundred and thirty-seven thousand seven hundred and sixty NT dollars. With each hole treated six times, the cost amounts to eight hundred and twenty-six thousand five hundred and sixty dollars.

“I am thus a man of wealth. The ‘nothingness’ of my body is worth close to a million dollars—at the rate of the Veterans General Hospital. In a beauty parlor, they charge five hundred per spot, which means four million in total!”

Occasionally there is news about kidnapping in the paper. The kidnappers often demand three to five million dollars or even tens of millions. He has never understood how a person can be worth that much.

At the age of sixty-nine—wow! He has never in all his life been so valuable! The tattooing itself did not enhance his worth, but its removal costs a million dollars. Ha! Everything in life is preordained. He’s heard of a chap who had the “Song of Righteousness” tattooed all over his body and who also went for its removal. He wonders how many prickings that man had to endure. The fair skin he got in return must be worth at least three million dollars. What he cannot understand is why should the “Song of Righteousness” be removed. How could its author Wen Tien-hsiang [1236- 1282 A.D.] have offended the communists?

Forty-odd years ago, when they courageously endured the pain of piercing pins, who would have expected this ill luck in old age? Ai, there is no reasoning out this life. There’s providence in everything.

The Korean War broke out on the 25th of June, 1950. Tang went in October with a rifle made by Han-yang Arsenal—junk from the Nationalist Army days. He had not yet had the chance to fire a shot when the American shells boomed and he was captured.

The two sides exchanged POWs. What puzzled him was that five Chinese POWs would be exchanged for one U.S. POW. For the first time it occurred to him that Americans were worth more: they were five to one against the Chinese.

Lives of the Chinese were worthless! In the battlefields of the Korean War, soldiers in their twenties and thirties died one on top of the other. The youngest were only fifteen or sixteen. After three months' training and barely able to manage the bayonet, they were driven to the battlegrounds. God only knew that hand-to-hand combat drills were of no avail, since the Americans only fought from a distance. They never sent people over for hand-to-hand combat. Thrust!-Hey!-Thrust!-Hey!-Hey-Hey-Hey!-Thrust!-Hey, who's going to use the bayonet?

Shrapnel flew his way and pierced his back. It was taken out, leaving a scar the size of a rice bowl. For him, that was all the Korean War-memories the size of a rice bowl. How much is a person worth, after all?

How can some people be worth a hundred million dollars? But that's the price some kidnappers ask.

They say some people's dress is worth ten million. He also has something on him that's worth eight hundred thousand. Unfortunately, that eight hundred thousand was spent so that people cannot see the thing on him, not so that they can see it. Eight hundred thousand dollars for something not to be seen—he cannot begin to explain it.

They say that it is after the Korean War that Lin Biao fell afoul of Mao Tse-tung. Many people died in the War—perhaps two million. Very few survived. In his company, all of the 180 but him died. After the war, Mao incredibly got mad at Lin:

"Why bring people back? I fought the Korean War in order to annihilate the Chinese population. Why not fight until everyone has died?"

To have his left arm tattooed "Kill Zhu and Weed out Mao" was his wish.

"Why, no longer Anti-Communist?" The young doctor joked with him lightly, perhaps to make his patient relax a bit, Tang thought.

"There's no need for me to fight against them," he said with confidence. "They're fighting against each other now!"

"And no more Kill Zhu and Weed out Mao, either? Well, Mao means Mao Tse-tung, but who's this Zhu?"

"Zhu means Zhu De, then their Commander-in-Chief," he said. "There's no need for me to kill them now. They've both reported to Yama.\fn{The Chinese god of Hell.} Saved me the trouble."

The doctor wore a pair of gold-rimmed glasses. He had a baby face, looked just over twenty. What does this little brat know?

Tang would never say anything to disgrace his tattoos. Unlike Cheng Chia-hsiao.

One day, Cheng was watching people fly kites on the grounds of Sun Yat-sen Memorial Hall when he came across a member of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP). The latter stopped him and asked:

"Hey you, you the 'Anti-Communist and Anti-Russia,' what are you doing in Taiwan? Go, go and recover your Mainland! Why do you stand here and eat Taiwan's rice?"

Pulling away, Cheng shouted back: "I didn't do it of my own free will, they forced it on me! They forced me to be tattooed."

Tang is somewhat angry at Cheng. That good-for-nothing. What could the damned DPP member have done to you anyway? Besides, he had no tattoo on his face; how could you know he was a DPP member? And even if he was, so what? What was it to the DPP if you wanted to pierce your own skin? Moreover, if we had not fought the Communists in those years, we would have all ended up as subjects of Chairman Mao. Would you sons of bitches then be able to talk such nonsense with your stomachs full?

In the days gone by, fourteen thousand of us had a title "Anti-Communist Freedom Seekers." A movie was made of our story, entitled Fourteen Thousand Witnesses. On the day of our arrival in Taiwan, we were decorated with colorful silk stripes and paraded. There was a large turnout everywhere we went. Now, as soon as Ku Cheng-kang died, the 1-23 Freedom Day goes unobserved.\fn{A note reads: Ku Cheng-kang was in his lifetime a staunch anti-Communist who presided over many a ceremony in celebration of Freedom Day, which falls on January 23rd (1-23 for short).} Speeches are no longer given. Moreover, in front of the memorial hall of our nation's founding father\fn{Chiang Kai-shek (1887-1975) is meant, the man who re-established the government of the Republic of China on Taiwan after the Communists expelled it from the Chinese mainland in 1949.} should turn up in broad daylight that mother-fucking whoreson! Damned disgusting! Even more disgusting is the incredible fact that the good-for-nothing Cheng Chia-hsiao should say that he was forced. This is the greatest of scandals! Cheng

Chia-hsiao, fuck your shameless ancestors!

"Were you willing then, or were you coerced?"

Tang was surprised that the doctor should ask such a question. That was the second time he went for the laser treatment. His chest was being torn and heated by the national flag. He could smell a slight burning, and all of a sudden he found the smell familiar. Recovering himself, he realized that it was the smell of the battlefield in the past; flesh scorched by fire—that was the smell.

So the Korean War had continued to this day for its finale; the epilogue was taking place forty-four years later.

"I wouldn't say I was forced," he replied, his chest hurting more and more. "Fourteen thousand have been tattooed, wouldn't it have been a shame not to go along?"

"Ah," said the doctor, adjusting the blue eye-shield he wore to protect himself from the laser beams while operating—rather like Batman or something on TV. "So it's peer pressure."

"What beer?" he didn't understand. "We had no beer then."

"Peer. People of the same group. They form a binding force among themselves."

The doctor seemed to have some learning. What he said Tang could only half-comprehend and he had no intention to delve into the subject. It hurt a lot on the chest, but you're not supposed to scream—that would be too womanish. But from the corner of his eyes seeped some tears, after all.

The previous occasion he shed tears was five years ago, the first time he returned to his native home. When his wife learned that he had not remarried in Taiwan, she walked twenty kilometers to meet him. No sooner had she entered the door than she dropped upon her knees:

"I have not remained your wife, I have let you down."

Unable to make her stand up, he had to kneel down also:

"Leave off such talk. I'm more than grateful to you—our son and daughter are both grown up—and there's even a grandson. I'm indebted to you for shouldering the responsibility alone."

He gave his wife a heart-shaped necklace. She neither accepted nor declined it, but simply said:

"It's inconvenient for me. If I wear it the other side might be suspicious. Rather give it to Xiao-hong. To see Xiao-hong wear it is like wearing it myself. I was also eighteen when I married you."

Xiao-hong is their granddaughter, the exact picture of his wife when she was young.

After that he had not shed tears.

It was late spring. It was not too hot to wear long-sleeved shirt, and in this way he was able to cover up the characters on his arms. In the evening, he went to the kitchen to take a bath. His third younger brother poured water for him. The dim light in the kitchen was only about five watts.

"Oh my!" his brother exclaimed. "Second Elder Brother, whatever happened to your back—such a messy color?"

Tang didn't expect his brother to be so sharp-eyed, and he had to tell the truth. Third Brother is a low-ranking cadre. When he heard it he looked troubled:

"This thing is not serious—but then it can be somewhat serious. It's all right for family members to see it, but if it is seen by others, there will be trouble. I think we ought to be careful. 'Communists are like the moon'—you've heard the expression?—'they are different on the first day and on the fifteenth of the month.'"

Since then, he has not returned to his Mainland home.

What the hell is with Wang Cheng-fu? Is he not finished with the treatment?

Tang's son wrote him a letter, asking him to go home for good. Having given it serious consideration for a year, he decided to have the tattoo removed by laser first.

Wang Cheng-fu is a little on the dumb side. Luckily, he is also somewhat timid and has caused no big trouble, unlike Li Chih-hsin who almost got himself killed. That was eight or nine years ago. On someone's advice he went to the proprietor of a beauty parlor and got hold of material used for perms. With it he corroded his own skin. As a result, the characters still remained, but his skin was all burns and welts. It was a terrible sight. Li was severely reprimanded by the medical officer.

And then there is Lao Chiu-chung, another person of fantastical notions. It happened also about ten years ago. He missed his native home so much he almost went crazy, but back then there was no such thing as laser treatment. So he went to a tattoo shop to turn the Chinese characters into green dragons. Having to fit in with the original characters, however, the dragons did not look good. Mischievous tongues played on his name, nicknaming him "Lao Chiu-chung," which means "Lao the Dragons," punning on "Lousy Dragons." Tang has seen Lao's dragons, but because they are all contorted and mixed up, he does not know how many there are. But at least Lao has returned home; his son has even come and visited him in Taiwan! After a while Lao received laser treatment, but it required a bit of persuasion. The VACRS has been subsidizing the removal of such tattoos as "Loyalty to Party and Country" and "Liberate the Mainland," but it has never seen tattooed dragons. It was only with much explanation and even the personal testimony of Lao's former commanding officer that the origin of the his dragons was clarified. Since the number of his punctures had increased, he now had to endure more laser spots which hurt him so much that he clenched his teeth tightly. After the treatment, the dark chest looked as if covered with a protective plate.

"Mr. Lao," the doctor said jokingly, "with these dragons all over your body, you look like a gangster. Are you a member of the Ching Pang or the Hung Pang?"

"Doctor, the gang we joined in those days had very strict rules," replied Lao. You know, Lao had had middle school education, and possessed a quick mind. "We had to be tattooed in order to join. And our gang is neither the Ching Pang nor the Hung Pang, but is called the KMT."

When Lao returned from the treatment, he told the story to everyone.

Wang Cheng-fu is still not here. Tang Ta-sheng, tired of sitting, stands up and moves around. He dares not go far, however, and soon finds himself singing a song on a Szechwan tune:

The old don't have to care,
The young don't have to care,
It's the in-between alone
Who are given the scare.

At the end of his song, he laughs—to have remembered the conscription song of more than forty years ago! "The old" refers to those aged from forty to fifty, and "the young" refers to those aged thirteen and fourteen. He was twenty-three then, exactly one of the "in-betweens" and scared to death. He was of course conscripted.

The old don't have to care,
The young don't have to care,
It's the in-between alone
Who are given the scare.

Maybe because he feels good, he sings the song again. At this moment, a slender middle-aged man comes along and gives him a set of leaflets:

"Sir, Lin and Hau for President and VP; New Party for the National Assembly, please. Thank you."

Tang is taken by surprise. What? This is the Veterans General Hospital, the stronghold of the KMT. How come this New Party member turns up here?

He is still wondering when he sees Wang Cheng-fu looking around timidly.

"I'm here!" he shouted.

Wang Cheng-fu is a short guy. When he hears Tang's voice he turns all smiles, and waddles on his two short legs toward Tang.

"It didn't hurt much, but it hurt some!" How rare for Wang to utter a clear sentence.

"The doctor says you're OK now, you've graduated, you don't have to come any more. Next month you'll have new delicate skin on you! But I'm undone, my, suffering is only just beginning!"

The two of them make for the gate, to take the bus to San-hsia, where they will transfer to Pai-chi.

Tang has a feeling of hollowness. Something like an empty stomach or dizzy head. But it's neither. Everything's gone, he suddenly realizes. Gone is "Kill Zhu and Weed out Mao," gone is "Anti-Communist and Anti-Russia," gone is the map, gone is the national flag, gone is "Succeed or Die." From now on everything is wiped out, as if a ring worn for forty years were suddenly removed, leaving nothing but a circle of whiteness.

Whiteness of complete emptiness.

Whiteness of complete nothingness.

Where are those blood-dripping oaths? The doctor says they are calcified, absorbed. But where do they go after absorption? Into the blood, or the marrow?

Subconsciously, he touches the bowl-size scar. It's still there, knotted like the bark of a tree. He feels a little more secure.

"The doctor tells me to come in two months," says Wang Cheng-fu. Somehow he has become a chatterbox today and would not cease talking. Maybe one is less dumb when hurting. "By then you'll probably be gone to the mainland for good. But I've got everything memorized—how to make the transfer next time, I've got everything memorized."

He speaks like a good boy. They get on the bus at the stop. Before the bus starts, Tang gets closer to Wang and shouts in his ear:

"Next time—I'll come with you again!"

"What?" Wang shouts back. "Didn't you say you would go home and stay with your grandson for good?"

"We'll talk about 'staying for good' later. I know what to do now. Next month I'll go visit them, and give them my family support allowance. I'll return in ten days. I've thought it all out. The rest of my life I'll just stay in San-hsia—over there it's called San-xia, and here it's also San-hsia. Oh, yes, you must remember clearly that San-hsia is the last stop, from there you transfer to Pai-chi. Get off at Pai-chi and walk—to Home of the Honored Citizens. Don't forget!"

"Don't worry, I won't forget—San-hsia is the last stop."

The bus moves. Both men are tired, and both feel a strange pain. The "Ba-ge-tu-tai-wan" on Wang Cheng-fu's right arm leans against the completely erased "Kill Zhu and Weed out Mao" on Tang Ta-sheng's left arm. To the rhythmical rocking of the bus, the two arms rub against each other all the way. Finally, their heads resting on each other, the two men fall asleep.

183.179 Excerpt from Building Bridges: The Life & Times Of Richard Charles Lee\fn{by Vivienne Poy (1941-)} Hong Kong, China (F) 10

Hong Kong, at the turn of the century, was a city of palaces and more magnificent than the hillside Italian city of Genoa. Above the city of Victoria was a suburb hanging in the clouds of the Peak where the wealthy British lived.

This was how American Eliza Ruhamah Scidmore described Hong Kong in her book China: Long-lived Empire, published in 1900. A new hospital for Europeans had just opened on the Peak, and a newspaper, the South China Morning Post, had been launched. Only Europeans were permitted to live on the Peak, with the exception of Sir Robert Hotung's family.

At the foot of the hill, the first trams were put into service in 1904, all single-deckers, open to the elements. The carriages that used to fill the streets had vanished, and the coach houses of great mansions stood empty. Everyone went about by rickshaw or sedan chair, and carts were pulled by oxen or water buffalo. One could hear the sighs of coolies as they made their way along the streets, shoulders straining under their heavy loads on bamboo poles. The motor car had yet to reach Hong Kong.

The population of the Colony had reached over 325,000, the majority being Chinese. Water shortages were a perennial problem and new and bigger reservoirs were being planned. In 1901, the drought was so severe that water had to be shipped from the New Territories to Victoria.

The port of Hong Kong was expanding, and huge warehouses, known as godowns, lined the Kowloon waterfront. The number of ships entering the harbour increased 60 per cent from the previous ten years. Industries such as sugar refineries, flour mills, cotton mills and cement works had sprung up. Hong Kong Land was progressing with its land reclamation in Central (commercial section of Victoria), and the area was dotted with new four or five-storey buildings. Businesses were controlled by the hongs, such as Jardine Matheson and Butterfield & Swire in shipping, the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank in banking, and John Swire's Taikoo in sugar refin[ing].

While the hongs were investing their opium fortunes in legitimate businesses, the government derived an annual revenue of about $2 million from the sale of the opium monopoly to the highest bidders, despite the strong opposition to the drug in Britain. Opium smoking was so popular among the Chinese that it was estimated that one in ten men was an opium smoker. Even though there was a gradual reduction of divans (establishments where Chinese men gathered to smoke opium) and no new licences were sold by the Hong Kong government after 1910, the sale of opium remained legal until 1945, and licences continued to be sold to the highest bidder by the Portuguese government in Macao.\fn{A Portuguese colony just across an intervening bay from Hong Kong:H}

The population of Hong Kong lived in two separate communities, the Chinese and the non-Chinese, each having very little to do with the other except at work. The Chinese men wore their hair in queues (pigtails) in Manchu style, and few dressed in Western clothes. Most of them wore mandarin jackets and pants or long gowns, with soft black shoes. They did not take part in foreign sport and none went swimming. The vast majority of them had no contact with Europeans at all. The old men spent time taking their caged birds for an airing outdoors, and the youngsters liked to kick a shuttlecock or fly a kite. In the evening, one could hear the clatter of mah jong, the favourite game of the Chinese.

As for the Chinese women, with the exception of petty hawkers, sampan women, scavengers and seamstresses, none went out onto the streets. The upper-class women had bound feet and never left their family compounds. The poorer classes wore cotton clothes like pyjamas, while the upper-class ladies wore beautifully embroidered pants, skirts and mandarin jackets.

Despite the description of Hong Kong as a city of palaces, it was, for the Chinese population, a very unhygenic place in which to live. Plague was endemic and malaria was widespread. Officers of the sanitary teams charged with rat-proofing houses and spraying mosquito breeding grounds were discovered, by an enquiry in 1907, to have made small fortunes by evading the law, in collusion with property owners and building contractors. Sanitary problems magnified racial prejudice, and demands were made for separate residential areas to be set aside for Westerners and Chinese. Following the creation of the Peak reservation, an ordinance in 1902 set aside an area in Kowloon for the Europeans, since the government believed the Chinese could not be trusted to keep the mosquito population down. However, exceptions were made by Foreign Secretary Joseph Chamberlain, who, on approval of a separate area for "people of clean habits," added that Chinese of good standing should be permitted residence there.

The Chinese population had come a long way since Hong Kong became a British colony in 1841. Many of its enterprising members had become wealthy. This new merchant class was recognized by the colonial government as leaders in their community due to their commercial success and their leadership in organizations such as the Tung Wah Hospital, a charitable organization which became the centre of Chinese power in the Colony. Despite the segregation in most schools, Queen's College encouraged the enrollment of boys of different nationalities. Chinese students from this school had the advantage of learning Western culture and the Western way of doing business.

This was the Hong Kong into which Father was born.

*

On March 7, 1905, concubine Cheung Mun Hee (Second Lady) of Grandfather Lee Hysan, gave birth to a son, Ming Chak, my father. He was not only the eldest son, but also the first surviving child in the family, as an older sister born to Grandfather's wife (Grandmother) died soon after birth. When Second Lady became pregnant, there was great excitement because Grandfather had been married for seven years and still did not have a child. A European midwife was arranged for the delivery, since Grandfather didn't feel that he could take any more chances after the death of his first child. It was believed that European midwives were cleaner and more knowledgeable than their Chinese counterparts.

When Father was born, Grandfather was delighted that he finally had an heir. Father's birth was also regarded as a lucky omen for the family, for from then on, Grandfather's import-export business flourished. His company, Nam Hung Shipping Co., carried goods from China to Hong Kong, Singapore, Malaya and Rangoon. He became a well-known and respected merchant of the Nam Pak Hong Business Association in Hong Kong, an association of merchants who traded between China and Southeast Asia.

According to Chinese custom, when a concubine has a son and the wife does not, the son is taken from his birth mother to live with the wife, in order to bring her luck and fertility. This was the case with Father, who grew up in Grandmother's household. He did indeed bring her luck, for after the birth of a second son by Second Lady, Grandmother gave birth to two sons and two daughters.

Father had a very special relationship with Grandmother because he grew up in her household, and she came to treat him as her own. She respected his judgment and that became important for the entire family after Grandfather died.

Father was a healthy child, alert and sturdy, with a narrow face and a small stature like his mother, Second Lady. He had strong, square hands, and his skin was as dark and shiny as Grandfather's. He probably wore his hair in a queue when he was very young, as Grandfather did, since it wasn't until the Revolution of 1911 that Chinese men abandoned this custom.\fn{They were required by the Manchu Dynasty as a sign of their subserviancy to the Ruling House:H}

As a small child, Father lived in Hong Kong and sometimes visited his grandparents, my great-grandparents, in China. At the time, Great-grandparents lived in our ancestral village, Garlieu, in the south of Guangdong province. Father once told me that Great-grandparents used to have only two meals a day, one early in the morning and the other between four or five in the afternoon. It seemed very strange to me, but that was the habit of the Chinese people who lived in the countryside. I'm sure it was also because food was scarce. As Grandfather became more prosperous, it was rumoured that bandits intended to kidnap his parents, so he built a house for them in Sunwui city, not far from Garlieu.

Being the eldest son, Father was not only important to Grandfather, he was doted on by Great-grandparents. As a show of affection, Great- grandfather used to feed Father all the time when they were together, and even stuffed chicken legs in his mouth when he was asleep! He also told Father about the dreadful trip in a sailing ship across the Pacific to the Golden Mountain (San Francisco) during the gold rush, and the life of Chinese people in America. Even though Grandfather was the second son of Great-grandparents, Father's position in the family was considered so important that, when Great-grandfather died, and his body travelled in a boat along the river that ran past Garlieu village, Father sat in the front of the boat and Grandfather sat at the back, with the coffin in the middle. This was how the body was transported to the burial place according to our village custom.

Because of repeated outbreaks of plague in Hong Kong, Grandfather moved his family to Macao\fn{At that time, a Portuguese colony near Hong Kong} when Father was five years old. Most of the family remained there until 1918, although Grandfather continued to work in Hong Kong. As a well-educated man, he was concerned about the education of his children, both sons and daughters, so he hired a well-known Chinese teacher, Chen Zibao, to teach them.

As time went on, Grandfather invested in many successful businesses, and became one of the wealthiest men in the Colony. He took a second and later on a third concubine (Third Lady and Fourth Lady). According to Chinese custom in those days, it was considered a sign of wealth to have many concubines and children. The number of children in the family increased, and Grandfather was good to them all. Realizing the importance of an English education for his children in the British Colony, Grandfather brought Father back to Hong Kong from Macao, and enrolled him in Queen's College, one of the best-known colonial schools at that time, regarded as the Harrow or Eton of the Far East.

Grandfather had learned English in San Francisco as a child, during the years he lived there with his father. After they returned to China, Great-grandfather had the foresight to enroll Grandfather in Queen's College in Hong Kong in order to continue his English education, where he was able to make friends who became important to him in later life. He wanted the same advantages for his children.

*

Since he was well acquainted with the English educational system, Grandfather thought it best for his children to send them to school in England so that they could be totally immersed in the English tradition. At the same time, they would have the opportunity to make friends who could help them later on in life. In 1917, at the age of twelve, Father and his third brother were sent to study in England with a governess. They lived at the home of a Mr. Churchill, and were tutored there in preparation for university entrance. It was then that they acquired their English names: Father became Richard Charles and Third Uncle became Harold. Several years later, two younger sisters were also sent to England for schooling.

Once the children went to England, they were expected to stay until they finished their education. The boys were told before they left that if they married non-Chinese while they were away, they would be automatically disinherited.

Father was fond of Mr. Churchill, whom he referred to as "Old Man Churchill" to us, and with whom he continued to correspond until Mr. Churchill died. Even when Mr. Churchill began to lose his sight, he continued to write to Father, with some help, I am sure. I remember seeing his scribbles.

By the 1920s, it was fashionable for the more adventurous and wealthy Chinese parents to send their children abroad to school—to France, Germany, England and japan. These students were usually of university age. Most of the Chinese students from Hong Kong went to England. The only mode of travel was by ship via the Suez Canal, and the long trip took weeks.

In a letter to his old friend and neighbour in Macao, Father wrote about the Chinese he met:

> Since my arrival in England, I have been well. Generally, the climate and life here are quite suitable to the Chinese … In the town of Oxford, there were less than ten Chinese students including myself … There are two Chinese in town, by the names of Zhou and Chen, from the village of Hoiping,\fn{A village in South China} who are to be admired. They arrived here, by mistake, eleven years ago. They wanted to go to London, Ontario, Canada, to make a living. However, the tickets that were bought for them were incorrect, and neither knew that there were two Londons in the world.
>
> When they arrived in London, England, no relatives came to meet their boat, and they knew something was wrong. Not knowing whether to laugh or to cry, they realized they had arrived in a different part of the world, with no friends and with very little money.
>
> A few days later, they made their way to Oxford, and opened a laundry establishment. They worked hard and had become very well known for the best laundry service. Almost all the students in Oxford send their laundry to them.
>
> It shows that, for those who are abroad, with hard work, they will succeed. Being very busy, I am sorry I don't see them as often as I would like, and have forgotten their first names. These two can put many present-day overseas Chinese students to shame.

He went on to say that despite the importance the parents put on education, many of the Chinese students in England were not really interested in studying:

> The majority of the present-day overseas Chinese students have no idea how difficult it is to make a living. They are generally lazy, and are constantly complaining how difficult the subjects are, so they often skip the examinations. But, fearing rebukes from their parents, they enroll into colleges that do not have examinations and anyone can be accepted. There are many such colleges in both towns of Oxford and Cambridge. These students will write home to say that they have entered Oxford or Cambridge Universities, and their parents would not know any better. Their parents will send them money which they will spend lavishly. In three years' time, they will buy a degree to return to China. There is usually a lot of fanfare when these students return home, but if they are ever asked, by someone who knows, which university they graduated from, Oxford or Cambridge, they would be in trouble …
>
> China is so weak among so many strong nations, if the younger generation has no ability, how can we save China? These students are not capable of thinking. There are so many in China who want to study, but their families cannot afford to send them abroad. Those who have the chance to go abroad and not study hard are to be pitied.

And he concluded on a personal note:

> Oxfordshire has the climate that makes people tired. Many go to the seaside during the summer to avoid illness. I will be going away and will return to Oxford at the end of the summer.

We can tell from this letter that Father's lifelong wish to help China and the Chinese people was already emerging.

In 1923, Father entered Pembroke College, Oxford, to study Civil Engineering, where he was known to the other undergraduates as Dickie Lee. Percy O'Brien, who entered Pembroke in 1924 to read Chemistry,\fn{I.e., to study for a degree in Chemistry} remembers Father as a sprightly individual who was always happy and smiling. He walked quickly, was always in a hurry, and very punctual. He was well dressed and carried a watch chain across his waistcoat.

Father studied excessively hard and spent hours reading in the Radcliffe Science Library. At times he showed O'Brien some of his studies on the mathematics of engineering which O'Brien found very obtuse and difficult to understand.

By the time he entered Pembroke, Father was already used to life in England, but life in the colleges was a different experience. Undergraduate behaviour was still controlled by the statute de Moribus Conformandis of 1636, even though rules had been modified. Colleges exacted small gate fines from those who were not back in college by a certain hour in the evening. Although tobacco could be purchased (its sale having been banned in 1636), no undergraduate was allowed to smoke in academic dress. A rule prohibiting students from keeping motor cars had been rescinded, and so Father was able to own one. Students were not allowed to play billiards before one o'clock in the afternoon or after ten o'clock at night, and they were forbidden to loiter at stage doors, attend public race meetings or take part in shooting and other sports. Their opportunities for dancing, drinking and dining were carefully regulated. A male undergraduate was not allowed to enter the room of a female undergraduate, but a female student was allowed to enter the room of a male with a chaperone, with special leave from the head of her college.

Pembroke had some well-established customs that no longer exist. Undergraduates were obliged to attend college chapel daily at eight o'clock in the morning under the threat of a fine of two shillings and sixpence. Less onerous was the penalty for talking "shop" in the hall. The perpetrator could be challenged to drink one or more pints of beer without pause from a tankard marked by pegs within, to bring the ego down a peg or two.

Father was privileged to have lodgings in the Old Quadrangle, regarded as superior by the students. His rooms were on the ground floor, with a bedroom, a small pantry and a fairly large sitting/dining/study room with a fireplace. The communal rooms were in the back of the Quadrangle, and the undergraduates sometimes had to trudge through snow and ice in the winter to reach them. There was no college nurse or doctor in those days; the undergraduates were supposed to be tough. In the evening, the gates were closed at nine o'clock when the Old Town clock chimed. Latecomers were fined, so the students found ways of climbing into the residences without being caught.

The residences were taken care of by "scouts," who were essential to college life. Each scout was in charge of a "staircase," meaning a set of rooms that branched off from a staircase. In some respects, a scout was like a servant, but in many ways, he was more like a “wife and parent” to his men. He cared for their general welfare, looked after them when they were ill, advised them, got them out of trouble and put them to bed when they were drunk.

Father was very fortunate to have a fine scout named Fred. Fred would light Father’s fire, clean his room, make his bed and do his laundry. It was also Fred’s duty to make Father’s breakfast and lunch and look after his parties.

The Master of Pembroke during Father’s time was Dr. Holmes Dudden, a man of great distinction and ability, a very good administrator and an author of some note. To be invited to dine at Pembroke was much sought after in the 1920s, because of its fine table and excellent wines.

*

During his university days, Father made some very good friends with whom he kept in touch all his life. Many became prominent in their own countries. One was Percy O’Brien, who later became a tutor and Fellow of Pembroke. Until he retired in 1974, he was Director of the Nuffield Department of Clinical Biochemistry in the Oxford Medical School.

Another was Qian Changzhao, who became an important official in China under the Nationalist leader Chiang Kaishek. Both Qian and Father subsequently devoted themselves to the betterment of the lives of the Chinese. While Father spent most of his life in Hong Kong, Qian remained in China. After the Nationalist government was ousted, Qian served the government of the People’s Republic of China. Qian was persecuted during the Cultural Revolution. In the early 1960s, the two men were able to resume a friendship that had been interrupted during the Chinese civil war (1945-1949) and the subsequent restrictions on its population imposed by the Chinese government.

Other schoolmates were Liu Jia, later Chiang Kaishek’s representative at the United Nations in the 1950s, and Konosuke Koike, a graduate of Tokyo University, who later became chairman of Yamaichi Securities. Although Father lost contact with Koike because of the Pacific War, the two men were able to pick up where they left off in the late 1960s.

The one friend Father made who was not a student at Oxford was Ley On, whom we came to call Uncle. Ley On was adopted by a family without a son, in our ancestral village. He was badly treated, so he sold himself as an indentured labourer to North America when he was in his teens. When his contract was over, he stowed away on an ocean liner, not knowing where it was going. He arrived in France and found himself unable to communicate with anyone, so he boarded a boat to an English-speaking country, again as a stowaway, and arrived in London. This was around the same time Father and Third Uncle were in England. Ley On was an enterprising young man who started a small Chinese restaurant in London, catering mainly to overseas Chinese students.

Father and his young friends would go to Ley On’s restaurant whenever they were in London. Father used to tell me that Ley On made his tofu with an ingredient that gave his patrons diarrhea! Despite that, the two young men became good friends. I am sure Father admired Ley On for his diligence and entrepreneurial spirit. Ley On went on to become a successful restaurateur in London and the owner of many racehorses. His restaurant was frequented by famous movie stars who befriended him. Probably because he had a classic Chinese face—with high cheekbones and slanted eyes—and was tall and dark-skinned, he was asked to act in small parts in Hollywood movies. I first met him when he stayed with us in Hong Kong in the early 1950s, by which time he had become an alcoholic. I remember Father telling him,

“It’s a custom in Hong Kong not to drink before sundown!”

All Oxford undergraduates boarded in the colleges, and they were required to have dinner with the Master and the fellows in the hall. In fact, although undergraduates were free to choose whether they wanted to attend the lectures, they were strictly advised to attend the dinners. If an undergraduate’s annual attendance at the dinners was not sufficient, he would lose the right to sit for examinations.

At each table, ten to twelve undergraduates who had joined the college in the same year would sit together. In spite of the fact that the subjects they took were different, they usually became good friends, bonded by the habit of eating meals at the same table.

Konosuke Koike entered Pembroke College in 1923. Since he and Father both entered in the same year, they sat at the same table for dinners. They played sports together and became close friends. In winter, when the British students played rugby, Father and Koike would go to the gymnasium to box. Boxing was a favourite sport of many Pembroke men. Father loved the sport even though he broke his nose doing it.

Father had high ideals and was a leader among men. He became President of the Chinese Students’ Union of Europe in 1925. He already knew then that he would spend his life helping his countrymen. He kept all the menus of the Union dinners on which he and his fellow students sketched their plans for a brave new China.

While Father was in England, Grandfather's businesses continued to prosper. He became one of the wealthiest men in Hong Kong and a well-respected citizen in the community. Real-estate development became his main business, and he purchased land and built row-houses, mainly for the Chinese middle class in Hong Kong. He also invested in many companies in Hong Kong, such as the China Sugar Refinery, Hong Kong Electric, the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank, and the Dairy Farm Ice and Cold Storage Co., and he became a major shareholder and a member of the consulting team of China Light & Power Company, which supplied electricity to south China and Hong Kong.

Unfortunately, he also invested in the Yue Sing firm, which held the opium monopoly from 1924 from the Portuguese government of Macao, and this caused his misfortune later.

*

Around the time of the First World War, while Father was in England, Grandfather purchased a large piece of land on the side of a hill on Kennedy Road with the intention of building a home for his family. Because of the war and labour problems, the house was not built until 1920. It was designed and constructed by Palmer and Turner, the same firm that designed the head office of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank on the Bund in Shanghai. The designs of the two buildings were rather similar. The family home, called Dai Uk, meaning the Big House, was one of the grandest homes in Hong Kong. Father did not see the Big House until he returned to Hong Kong in 1927.

The Big House commanded a magnificent view of Hong Kong Harbour. The beautiful gardens with their fountains, pagodas, artificial hills and caves, bamboo groves, chicken coops and vegetable plots were surrounded by high walls. At the main gate stood a guard house where a tall Sikh kept watch with a shotgun. Sikhs were traditionally hired as guards in Hong Kong because the Chinese regarded them as fierce-looking. Our guard's family lived in their own compound beside the garden of the fountain of the Goddess of Mercy.

The Big House consisted of three floors. The second and the third floors were living quarters for the family, with large balconies and a kitchen on each floor. For family meals, the men were served on the second floor, and the women and children on the third floor.

The ground floor was reserved for entertaining. It consisted of an enormous front hall, the library, the bamboo room and other entertaining rooms and the main kitchen in the back. From the front hall, one walked out onto the terrace to a panoramic view of the Hong Kong harbour. The house was filled with objets d'art from all over the world.

Besides being grand, the Big House was also a home away from home for all the Lee relatives or visitors from our ancestral village. There were many guest rooms behind the entertainment rooms on the ground floor, and anyone who needed a place to stay or a good meal was welcomed. Grandfather was known for his generosity which extended to distant relatives. Throughout his life, he made sure that his siblings were financially secure, and that all his nieces and nephews were in good schools or were given good jobs. His sons carried on this tradition after his death.

The land where the Big House stood was so large that Grandfather decided to erect another building at the other end of the property higher up on the hill. It was a three-storey apartment built in the same style as the Big House, with a wide central staircase, and large balconies for each apartment. This was called Lee Hong, meaning Lee Building, and was rented to tenants during Grandfather's lifetime. I wonder whether at the time Grandfather could foresee that, as his family expanded, the Lee Building would be used by them as well. My family lived in both the Big House and the Lee Building until the beginning of the 1950s.

In 1920, experts from England went to Hong Kong to investigate land development around the harbour. In their opinion, the development in the west had reached its limits, and the Colony's future lay in the east around Kowloon Bay. Grandfather then looked into buying land in that area for housing development. Hong Kong island was difficult to build on because of the hilly terrain. In order to build row-housing, hills had to be levelled and the soil used for landfill to create more flat land.

In January 1924, Grandfather made the most high-profile purchase of his life. He bought East Point Hill from John William Buchanan Jardine for the sum of $3,850,960.35. East Point Hill was the original homestead, offices and godowns\fn{Warehouses} of the Jardine taipans.\fn{Great merchants} The property also included the homes of the number one and number two taipans, with a riding stable in between.

The original agreement with the government was to use the soil on East Point Hill for land reclamation in North Point, but the government reneged on the agreement, so development was stalled. In the meantime, in order to earn income from the property, Grandfather turned it into a garden and amusement park for the Chinese, called

The Lee Gardens. The Chinese population needed recreation areas, since parks built by the government were restrictive. The Lee Gardens became the year-round pleasure ground for the Chinese and was financially very successful. The taipans' houses became restaurants.

Grandfather planned ahead for his family. In 1925, he established the Lee Hysan Estate Company, which owned East Point Hill and a number of other properties. He then continued to develop the areas in the vicinity of The Lee Gardens, clearing slums and building wide streets and well-constructed houses.

As an entrepreneur, Grandfather was always looking into new businesses. He loved Chinese opera, and felt that there was a need for a new type of staging that would make changing scenery in a Chinese opera easier. In 1926, he built the Lee Theatre on Percival Street and equipped it with a revolving stage which allowed the realistic touch of scenery changes as the actors walked along. Chinese opera in the Cantonese vernacular was the most popular type of entertainment, and the theatre became hugely successful. The theatre had a beautiful high dome, decorated with dragon designs and lights, and a movie screen was subsequently added. Many Chinese opera stars started their careers at the Lee Theatre.

*

Upon graduation from Oxford University in 1927, Father returned to Hong Kong at the age of twenty-two, after having been away for ten years.

His plan was to go back to England to do his practical training. Grandfather was delighted to have his eldest son back, and this time, he wanted to see his son get married before leaving again. The word was out, and many girls were brought to Grandmother for her approval.

The Hong Kong Father returned to was a society that he did not remember. He had been treated as an equal in England, and now he was back in a colony where the British still believed that they were the master race of Asia. There was segregation in every facet of life in the Colony. In hospitals and the Hong Kong civil service, segregation persisted until the Second World War. An example was the Matilda Hospital on the Peak, which in 1940 refused to admit an American woman because she was married to a Chinese. It was not until 1942 that the civil service dropped the demand that all candidates for positions should be of pure European descent. As late as 1992, all senior posts in the civil service were held by British officers. It was the policy of the Hong Kong and Shanghai Bank not to have Chinese on the board, and many British firms forbade employees to marry non-British women.

Father was a diligent student who benefited from the British liberal education that taught the equality of men. Therefore, when he returned to Hong Kong, he could not accept the stigma of being a second-class citizen. Having been used to riding in England, Father wanted to join the Hong Kong Jockey Club, but was refused entry because he was Chinese. Grandfather immediately said,

"We don't need them. We will start a Chinese Jockey Club."

On hearing that, Father was immediately allowed to ride there, because the Hong Kong Jockey Club depended on the income from bets placed by the Chinese population.

Hong Kong's colonial snobbery was described by Ely Kadoorie, a successful merchant in Shanghai as well as in Hong Kong, as small "shopkeeper's mentality." He was comparing international Shanghai to a very British Hong Kong. However, at least the racial chasm in business was narrowing, for the Chinese were not excluded from any commercial activities. Father realized that Hong Kong was a place to do business, but, as someone who believed in the brotherhood of men, it was not a society he would choose to live in.

*

As a sociable young man, Father was always seen with a group of friends. One day that summer, not long after he returned from England, he was with his friends on a beach when two girls dropped by on their way home from a tennis game. As one of them caught his eye, he asked a girl he knew, Julia Wong, to introduce him. Julia said,

"Don't bother with her, she's just my younger sister!"

Father persisted, and thereby met Esther, my mother. They ended up spending the rest of the afternoon together.

Mother was only seventeen, a student at the Diocesan Girls' School, when she met Father. It was a whirlwind courtship and they fell in love. But Mother was not ready to get married; she wanted to finish school first.

Father's parents were delighted that their son had found someone so suitable. When Father proposed, they went to see Mother's parents to ask for consent, but Mother stated she was just not ready. Grandfather then came up with a brilliant idea: he would send Mother to study at Oxford, where Father was to finish his practical training. Mother could study Portuguese to help in the Lee family business. Grandfather also promised to take her parents on a trip around the world to visit the young couple the following year. That did it, and Mother agreed to get married.

All this happened so quickly that my parents didn't really have time to get to know each other well. Theirs was a relationship that grew with the years together, establishing mutual trust, understanding and respect that lasted throughout their lives.

The Wongs, Mother's family, were modern and progressive. Grandfather Wong, one of the elite in the Chinese society in Hong Kong, was good friends with Hong Kong notables Sir Robert Hotung and Sir Shou Son Chau. The Wongs lived a luxurious life on Prince Edward Road. When Mother and her siblings were growing up, they not only had a large household staff and gardeners, but also four cars so that the growing children could drive themselves around.

Mother always prided herself that her father was the first person in Hong Kong to own a motor car when cars were first imported into the Colony in 1912, despite the fact that the Chinese community described cars as "coughing, spluttering, honking demons." Mother's parents, Joseph and Jeannie, had eleven children of whom eight were girls. Mother was the number-five daughter. Mother and her siblings lived a free and easy life, driving everywhere, swimming, playing tennis and dancing. Mother used to get caught by the police for speeding, probably on her way to buy sweets, of which chocolates were her favourite. Mother also took flying lessons but never got her licence.

Mother was fond and proud of her family. Her grandfather, Great-grandfather Wong, had gone to the West Indies as a young man to work as a labourer. He returned to China with a sizable fortune when he was in his early thirties and moved to Hong Kong to work as a court interpreter because of his knowledge of English. He chose a wife from a convent school run by German nuns, a girl whose father and brother were both ministers of the church. She spoke not only English and Chinese, but also German, and she wore only European clothes. That was unusual for a Chinese girl at that time.

The two did not know each other well when they got married. Great-grandmother Wong later told her grandchildren she wondered on her wedding day why her wealthy husband had such rough hands.

As a court interpreter, Great-grandfather Wong was well paid. The Wongs lived on a large estate near Boundary Street in Kowloon. (The land was subsequently repossessed by the Hong Kong government, and they were relocated to present-day Prince Edward Road.)

Mother and her siblings were full of stories of the fun they had as children when they visited their grandparents. The person who was held in highest esteem by the grandchildren was the matriarch of the Wong clan, Great-grandmother Wong. She loved having them around and used to teach them to sing German songs. She was religious and encouraged the grandchildren to sing hymns to her by rewarding them each time. She spent her time doing charitable work, which continued after she was confined to a wheelchair.

Her grandchildren were impressed by the fact that she chose a concubine for her husband when she was tired of bearing children. But the real reason for finding a concubine was to have someone willing to stay in the village in China to look after her in-laws, since Great-grandfather was the only son, and Great-grandmother certainly didn't want the job. There were a total of sixteen children, of which eleven were her own.

In his home village Great-grandfather Wong was regarded as the son who made good. When he returned to Dong Guan (Guangdong Province) from abroad, he built a house with gun towers for the family in his ancestral village, Ho Pak Kiu. The Wongs were Hakka, (guests), who were later settlers on the land, and therefore got poorer land than the Punti (locals). They had to fight with their neighbours to protect the water supply needed for their fields.

The Wongs owned rice fields, leichee orchards and a peanut oil factory. Whenever Great-grandfather Wong or any of his sons returned from Hong Kong to check on the business, they were met at the train station by an armed brigade for protection! Due to the deterioration of law and order in China, rural militarization became the norm, and armed guards were standard for the landlords, especially absentee landlords.

Traditionally, the Punti and the Hakka did not intermarry. Father, being a Punti, used to tease Mother that Hakka women had big feet, considered ugly to the traditional Chinese. The fact was that Hakka women never bound their feet because they did a large share of the work in the fields, and besides, they were needed to help in the fighting and had to be able to run fast.

It was Great-grandfather Wong's wish that his descendants would one day return to the ancestral village, so at the entrance of the house he placed a large picture entitled "Hundred Birds Returning to the Nest." However, only the eighth son, who was the first-born of the concubine, actually lived and remained in the village, looking after the rice fields and the business. The rest of the children chose to live in Hong Kong, and with the political unrest that existed over the years in China, it was at times impossible for them to return even for a visit. The only time a number of them went back was during the Second World War, after the surrender of Hong Kong. Food was scarce in Hong Kong, and there was always enough to eat in the village because of the rice fields that the family owned.

Great-grandfather Wong was well known and respected in Hong Kong. When he died, many people came to pay their respects by kowtowing all the way in from the entrance to the altar of their red house on Prince Edward Road. He had a grand funeral, with four white horses drawing the carriage that carried his coffin. The family was sent so many flowers that the colony's shops were said to have run out of flowers!

Mother's father, Joseph, was the second son. He was a prosperous and well-respected member of Hong Kong society, a chartered accountant and the first president of the Chinese Association of Chartered Accountants. During the First World War, he was in the police reserve in Hong Kong, when many of the British went to fight in Europe, and the gap had to be filled. His daughters Josephine and Jennie remember him looking very handsome in his white uniform.

Whenever there was a shortage of personnel, Grandfather Wong would fill in as interpreter in the law courts. He became a Justice of the Peace in 1923, and subsequently was decorated by both King George VI and Dr. Sun Yatsen.\fn{First President of the Republic of China} After his first wife died childless, he married Jeannie Maxwell, my grandmother. Jeannie's nickname was "Beauty", because she was a beautiful Eurasian girl. Great-grandmother Wong encouraged her sons to marry Eurasians because she wanted beautiful grandchildren, and she had many.

Grandmother Jeannie Maxwell Wong was one of four children and the only daughter of John Maxwell and a Chinese lady whose name we don't know, because she was always referred to as Grandmother by Mother and her siblings. John Maxwell went to Hong Kong from Scotland in the nineteenth century, stayed on to work and to get married. He chose a Chinese girl from an orphanage which was the precursor of the Po Leung Kuk, an institution established in 1878 by a group of wealthy and influential Chinese gentlemen to protect destitute women and children. That was really his only option, since there were very few European women of marriageable age of his own class, and no Chinese girl from a good family would consider him eligible. Great-grandfather Maxwell worked as a policeman in Hong Kong, and by all accounts, he was a fine father to his children.

In those days, Eurasians did not belong to either the Chinese or the European communities, so they had to try very hard to be one or the other. Grandmother Jeannie Maxwell Wong became more Chinese than the Chinese. She could understand and speak English, but she could read only Chinese. She was the authority on Chinese customs, and everyone in the Wong family always consulted her. I remember her in her later years looking very serene in a Chinese cheongsam, wearing her hair in a bun.

*

My parents' wedding took place on February 28, 1928, at St. John's Cathedral. Mother always said that she wished the fashion for wedding dresses that year had been long gowns instead of short, but, having to be fashionable, she had a short wedding dress of silver lace trimmed with pearls, and she carried white roses. Mother was a beautiful girl, tall for a Chinese and rather big-boned. She had to wear low-heeled shoes so that she would not look taller than Father. In fact, she kept growing after they were married and became quite a bit taller than Father. She was as fair-skinned as Father was dark, with brown hair covered by her wedding head-piece that came down to her eyebrows, according to the fashion of the day.

She had a large wedding party, with her sisters and cousins in dresses of different pastel colours and decorated with rosettes. They were beautiful young women and girls, and all Great-grandmother Wong's grandchildren.

The Cathedral was filled to the brim with Chinese and European guests, and many people had to stand outside because they couldn't get in. The wedding was performed by the Very Rev. A. Swann, Dean of Hong Kong, who broke tradition by officiating at a Chinese wedding for the first time. Hong Kong society was so divided between the Chinese and the Europeans that it was only on occasions like these that the two groups were brought together.

The reception was held at The Lee Gardens where a huge matshed (a structure of bamboo and straw) was erected, because the taipans' houses were not large enough to accommodate the two thousand guests. Hong Kong Hotel, which was one of Father's favourite hotels, catered the affair. A dais was erected to support a six-tier wedding cake. Sir Robert Hotung toasted my parents and speeches were made by Sir Robert, Dr. Robert H. Kotewall and Father.

After the wedding, my parents went on their honeymoon by boat to Europe. They sailed through the Suez Canal and did what most tourists do in Egypt, riding camels and visiting the Sphinx. Their first stop in Europe was Switzerland, where Mother met Third Uncle for the first time. He was attending school there. Subsequently, they went to England, where Mother met Father's sisters Doris and Ansie (Second and Third Aunts), who were in a boarding school for girls.

*

During Father's visit to Hong Kong, Grandfather got embroiled in what became a court case over the Yue Sing firm's opium licence with the government of Macao.

The Yue Sing firm had had the opium monopoly since 1924. A third of the company was owned by the Lee family, and Grandfather was the general manager. In March 1927, the Portuguese government announced in the Boletim Oficial that the monopoly system under which opium had been imported, prepared, sold and distributed would come to an end; therefore its contract with the Yue Sing firm would be terminated, to be replaced by a government monopoly under the superintendence of the Inspector of Consumption Taxes. It established an Opium Administration and Pedro Jose Lobo was appointed as Administrator.

By 1927, a quarter of the original investment of $3 million had been returned to the subscribers of Yue Sing, but the winding-up proceedings in the courts in Macao would mean that the rest of the investment would be lost. This was something the subscribers to the firm had to accept.

Then Grandfather discovered that the Macao government had not taken back the licence, but had given it to another company, the Yau Sing Company, for a payment of $120,000.

The company opened an account at a branch of the Mercantile Bank of India in Hong Kong, and the comprador of the bank confirmed that the opium monopoly had been obtained by the Yau Sing Company by tender from the government of Macao. The Company was opened for subscription. A friend of Grandfather's was approached to buy shares, and he came to Grandfather for advice.

Grandfather believed that since the contract with Yue Sing had been terminated by the Macao government, no other firm should legally be given a new contract by the same government. He sent a petition to the governor of Macao, requesting fair treatment for his firm and for an enquiry into the matter, as well as the return, in due course, of the original deposit by Yue Sing to the Portuguese government. The petition was also sent to the Legislative Councillors, sixteen lawyers and the Consul-General of Macao.

In his petition, the name of Pedro Jose Lobo was implicated.

In the spring of 1928, during the preparation of my parents' wedding, Pedro Jose Lobo sued Grandfather for libel and asked the Hong Kong court for an injunction to prevent him from sending further petitions to the governor of Macao. During the period leading up to the trial, Grandfather received letters threatening his life, saying also that bombs would be thrown at my parents' wedding. These letters were ignored by Grandfather even though friends and relatives advised him to be careful and change his routine.

The wedding went smoothly, my parents left for Europe, and the threats were forgotten. On April 17, Chief Justice Gollan of the Supreme Court in Hong Kong gave judgment in Grandfather's favour. And Grandfather believed that it was all over.

On April 30, at one o'clock in the afternoon, as Grandfather was entering the Chinese Yue Kee Club on Wellington Street for tiffin,\fn{Lunch} which was his routine, he was shot in the corridor. He called out a couple of times, "Gau meng!" meaning save my life, and members at the Club heard the shots and his cries. When a foki (waiter), Law Lau, reached the corridor, he saw Grandfather injured, holding on to the wall, and looking very pale. Instead of stopping to help, he followed a man in white trousers and a short jacket who darted through the passage from the Club.

By the time the members of the club reached Grandfather, he was already dead. He was forty-seven years old.

The family offered a reward of $10,000 for information leading to the arrest of the assassin, but despite the police having many leads and some arrests, the murderer was never caught.

The entire family was in shock. Grandfather left behind a wife, three concubines, seven sons and six surviving daughters, with daughter number-eight on the way.

My parents and three of Father's siblings were in England when the news reached them. They immediately began their return journey, but travel by boat through the Suez Canal was so slow, they missed the Buddhist funeral service. On May 25, Grandfather was buried in a beautiful site overlooking the ocean in the Permanent Cemetery in Aberdeen.

Later, at Lady Clara Hotung's suggestion, a matshed was specially built in The Lee Gardens. Buddhist services were held for seven days to pacify Grandfather's ghost and to raise his soul from suffering in the next world.

*

At the age of twenty-three, Father became the head of the family. Mother, at eighteen, was no longer a student, but his partner. …

1942

21.32 & 151.17 1. Black Walls 2. Excerpt from Overpass\fn{by Liu Xinwu [Xin-wu] (1942-)} Chengdu, Sichuan Province, China (M) 8

1

Summertime. Sunday. A courtyard in an alley. Three fruit trees, five or six households. Early morning. 7:30 a.m.

The room at the eastern end of the courtyard is the Zhou's. Actually there is just one certain Mr Zhou, about thirty years old, who lives there on his own. One might assume that he has never been married, though he uses a basin with a large, red double happiness design. One might also assume that he had been married and divorced but then why does he lower his head, study the ground and walk off in the other direction when he sees an unmarried woman in the courtyard? He only recently moved in and his work unit has a long and complicated name so his neighbors have not been able to work out exactly what he does for a living. By reckoning on their fingers they can work out that at his age, having been sent to the countryside for eight years, he can only have been working for about seven years at the most. Consequently, the amount of money in his monthly wage packet is not interesting enough to keep them guessing for long. Since he moved in he has never caused any trouble. He never drops in on anyone, nor does he receive any guests. When he meets neighbors in the courtyard they may first ask him: "How are you?" He will reply neither shyly nor arrogantly: "I'm very well, thank you;" or he may first ask the neighbour: "Finished for the day?", and the neighbour will reply: "Lord no! I'm just sitting in the cool breeze awhile."

But he will not stop and chat. Sometimes when he goes to the communal tap in the courtyard to fetch water, wash his clothes, or wash some rice and he bumps into a neighbor, of course they have to say something to each other. He only speaks when forced to reply to a question. If he answers, he will not follow it with another question. The other families who have lived in the courtyard a long time cannot say that they like him, nor that they dislike him.

He was busy very early one morning. First he moved everything out of his room, then he mixed some sort of liquid in a large wash basin. He must have borrowed a foot operated spray gun yesterday. Clearly, he was going to paint his room.

This began as nothing out of the ordinary. When the neighbors bumped into him at the communal tap, they asked him: "Are you painting your room today?"

"Yes, yes I am."

Then they asked him politely, "Do you need some help?"

He thanked them: "I've got a spray gun so it should be an easy job! Thank you anyway."

After collecting the water he calmly walked away. A calling cicada was hiding in the umbrella-like crown of a scholar tree whose trunk was only as wide as the mouth of a bowl. The noise was getting louder, but they had all grown accustomed to it and so did not find it annoying anymore.

7:46 a.m.

Chi—chi—chi … It was a new sound but it was clear what it was. Zhou had started spraying his room.

7:55 a.m.

Several of the young people from the courtyard had the day off and went out one by one. Naturally they were all dressed up in the latest fashions, each one different from the next. One girl, a meat cutter during the week, was wearing imitation jewel earrings and cream coloured high-heels. As she left the courtyard, she opened a blue-flowered, nylon, automatic umbrella. There was also a young man who worked in the foundry's workshop. On his upper half, he was wearing an Indiana State University T-shirt, printed in English. On his legs, he wore grey corduroy hunting trousers originally made for export. He put on a pair of large-framed, purple sunglasses as he walked out, pushing a small-wheeled bicycle. A second girl hurried out of the courtyard. She studied business management at the local branch of the university. She was wearing a pale green dress, loose at the waist, which she had made herself, and was carrying a round, rattan hand-bag. The events which followed may have occurred because they all went out, but it is hard to say if things would have been different if they had not done so, as there was still one young person who remained behind the entire time. This young man sold glassware in the local market and was enjoying a day off. After breakfast, he lay on his bed, reading The Lamp Without Light. When his mother called him to join in the following events, he smiled, lay back down and continued to read his book.

8:15 a.m.

The atmosphere in the courtyard was heating up. It is not quite correct to say "in the courtyard;" it would be better to say "in the room." It was not in every room, but it was in the north room in the middle of the courtyard. That was where the Zhao family lived. Mr. Zhao was fifty-six years old. He had retired early so his second daughter could take over his job. Soon after his retirement, he went to another work unit to "fill in" for a time. Recently, that unit began making cutbacks, leaving Mr. Zhao out of work. Currently, he was trying to arrange another job in a different work unit.

Several of the neighbours gathered at his house. They told Mr. Zhao the news: Mr. Zhou was not spraying his walls white but black! He was actually spraying his walls black! They did not know what kind of paint he was using but it was black as ink! Pitch black!

Mr. Zhao was both astounded and strangely pleased at the same time. Ten years before, he had been the deputy-in-charge of the Workers' Propaganda Team in a song and dance troupe. At that time when some "activists" came to inform him about some "new trends," his manner and tone were just as they were now.

Mrs Zhao felt much as her husband did. Eight years before she had been the head of a "socialist neighbourhood committee." Once when some people told her about the remains of a reactionary slogan written at the base of the wall behind the date tree, the atmosphere was much as it was now. Who could guess that something would happen to bring the dead issues of a decade or so ago back to life again?

"That's just not right," Mr. Zhao proclaimed.

"How dreadful," said Mrs Zhao indignantly.

8:25 a.m.

Ch—chi—chi … Mr. Zhou was still spraying his room. Newsflash: He had sprayed the ceiling black, too! Mr. Zhao asked them all to sit down, giving the room the feeling of a meeting hall. Meetings can take on all forms: at some, everyone is bored; at others, only you are interested; at still others, it is you who is bored. Mr. Zhao enjoyed the present meeting. He put forward the motion:

"In this sort of situation we should inform the police as soon as possible."

If this were eight or ten years ago, this would not have been a mere proposal but a conclusive decision; not just a man giving his own opinion, but a leader's directive.

But, this was the present, not the past. Tall, thin Mr. Qian went so far as to immediately oppose him, saying, "As I see it, we shouldn't go to the authorities—that is, we have no basis. What can we tell the police?"

Mr. and Mrs. Zhao both stared hard at him. They were both thinking: Damn tailor! Years ago when he was an entrepreneur he never dared to open his mouth, much less oppose our suggestions, but now he does some private business at home, buys a color television and his whole tone of voice changes.

Mr. Qian sat up straight and began fervently expressing his opinion:

"Brother Zhou may be suffering from a recurring illness. There are such diseases; I've read about them in the paper. Sufferers have been known to behave strangely under stressful conditions.Young Zhou was airing his quilt outside his front door last Sunday. Perhaps no one noticed but the quilt cover was made of bright red silk while the underside was duller red. Really, very odd! So I say we should not go to the police but fetch a doctor instead. Although I have heard that traditional medicines don't work on these kinds of illnesses, it would not hurt to consult him."

Not many people responded to Mr Qian's words because as he talked they could not help gazing out of the window, through the shade of the scholar tree, to where they could see "Brother Zhou." Perfectly calm and collected, he continued to spray his walls. Faintly, they could hear him humming a song. Was this the manner of a sick person?

Mr Sun, who was sitting by the door, passed his little finger through his thinning hair and suggested: "Shouldn't we just go and ask him why he is spraying his walls black? If he can't give a good reason, we can just forbid him—no, advise him not to—yes, advise him not to do it any more."

Another neighbor, Mrs. Li, who was sitting in the middle of the crowd, took the opportunity to say, "Why don't you go and ask him for us?"

Everyone agreed to this suggestion.

8:36 a.m.

When Mr. Sun made his suggestion he thought it would naturally be Mr. and Mrs. Zhao who would confront Mr. Zhou. He never imagined it would be he who would be sent to ask. He regretted sitting by the door. For the past thirty years, he had worked in a primary school in charge of general affairs. He had not taught a class in his life. Consequently, he had picked up many of the mannerisms of a teacher but, now faced with a situation where he had to straighten his back and go to investigate a "strange phenomenon," he felt as though he had been forced to the front of a podium to deliver a speech. His hands and knees shook uncontrollably and he was completely tongue tied.

8:37 a.m.

Chi—chi—chi … The spraying continued. "Bzzzzzzz …" Inside the room, they continued talking in hushed voices.

Mr. Sun flicked the long nail of the little fmger on his left hand and stared at the tips of his shoes. He was not willing to go to question "Brother Zhou." How could he ever face them again if he received a brash refusal? How could he explain such a failure? What if the idiot said something incriminating? Should he report it directly and be responsible for the unknown consequences, or should he keep the information to himself and risk being accused of protecting Mr. Zhou? And what if some evidence came to light in the future …

He gave it tremendous thought. Beads of sweat broke out on his forehead as he said,

"Maybe … maybe Mr. Zhao could go and ask instead?"

As no one else wanted the job, everyone agreed and said in chorus,

"Yes! Let Mr. Zhao go!"

Mr. Zhao did not make any immediate move, but waited for them to stop urging and start pleading with him. Only then did he abruptly stand up and declare, "I'll go and ask!"

He turned and left the room.

Everyone gazed out the window and watched the receding figure of Mr. Zhao walking straight towards Mr. Zhou's front door. They all listened attentively, hoping to catch a part of the conversation. All they could hear was the incessant call of the cicadas, high in the scholar tree.

8:41 a.m.

Ashen-faced, Mr. Zhao returned to the room and reported, "That rascal says he will come and explain to me when he has finished. I knew he would pull some trick. He doesn't respect us, his neighbors."

Mrs. Zhao pointed out of the window and said, "That's the man come to read the water meter, isn't it? He'll go and look in Mr Zhou's room! He'll probably spread all kinds of rumors about black paint and our courtyard, and give us all a bad name!"

Mrs. Li, whose job was fluffmg cotton into quilts, had a very placid nature and so put forward an explanation to make them all feel better. "Perhaps the black paint is just the undercoat. When it's dry he'll spray a top coat of white paint."

8:43 a.m.

Chi—chi—chi … The noise from the spray gun continued. Looking towards the room all they could see was blackness. No one really believed Mrs. Li's explanation. The more Mrs. Li looked, the more she could not help despairing.

What could one say? Black walls! In this very courtyard! Mr. Zhou is not afraid of doing evil things himself, but he should not get others involved.

8:45 a.m.

Everyone in the room agreed about one thing: he should not spray his walls black! How could anyone spray his walls and ceiling black? Most people would not dare even think of such a thing. He did not just think about it, he actually did it! Extraordinary! Weird! Half-mad! Reactionary!

Mr. Zhao still thought the police should be informed. Just as he was about to go and do so, he had second thoughts: The police station is not the same as it was eight or ten years ago. (At that time there was not a police station but a "group to smash the leaders of the judicial and public security institutions." It was in the same courtyard as the present-day police station). Today the police are not as extreme nor do they think themselves as important as in the past. They always talk about "going by the book" but once you start doing things "by the book" then problems like the black wall dilemma will drag on and possibly never be resolved.

Mr. Zhao hesitated. He felt strongly about it and really did want to report it. It was a responsibility he could not shirk, a duty he had to take quick action to deal with. Could he be doing it for his own good? But what possible benefit could come of reporting it?

Mrs. Zhao realized what her husband must be feeling and felt very bitter. How different it was eight or ten years ago! Her husband was actually suffering now because he lacked any real skills, and could only work as an assistant or warehouse watchman. Was it because he had not tried to learn a trade? Certainly not. For the past thirty odd years he had been transferred to work in various campaigns. The campaigns had come and gone, so now he had no way of earning a living. Formerly all his pride had come from his political sensitivity. Now he had a chance to display this talent, but his eyes, wrinkled face and the corners of his mouth showed hesitancy. Why was it? What was all this exertion for today? Could it be just for the good of his own family?

More and more, Mr. Zhao believed that “Brother Zhou” was suffering from a recurring illness. He admitted that what he had just been thinking was wrong. Traditional doctors were unable to treat this sort of illness. Could he not just let the doctor take his pulse? Not really. He would still have to get a Western doctor. But doctors didn’t make house calls nowadays. It would be extremely difficult. Who could persuade him to go to the out-patient’s department?

Mrs. Li wanted to go home and get her lump of a son to stop reading his novels and think of what to do. Perhaps he could bring Mr. Zhou to his senses, and even help spray the walls white again. White is so nice! Why should anyone want anything different?

Mr. Sun wanted to go home but was too embarrassed to make the move. In this sort of situation a person ought to make clear his position on the matter, so in the future he could not be accused of “sitting on the fence.” Of course a person should not leave it so that in any future situation he could not be accused of having played a part in a “misjudged case.” Ideally one would avoid any sort of criticism in the past, present or future. He had already shown enough “intention” to go to Mr. Zhou’s, so he should now make an early retreat. But it would be hard to slip out without being noticed …

8:48 a.m.

Mr. Zhao had a grandson affectionately known as “Little Button,” who was not much more than ten years old. At the start of all this he had been painting in the back room. At length, he came and leaned on the doorway between the two rooms, curiously listening to the adults’ discussion. He thought the room crowded, muggy, hot and disordered. Why did adults have to torment themselves like this?

Once again they began to discuss the matter and once again the atmosphere heated up. Little Button stood before his grandfather, turned his head and asked: “Grandpa, what are you all doing?”

Mr. Zhao said to him fmnly, “Off with you! Go and play! There’s nothing for you here!”

Little Button was not convinced and thought to himself: Are you angry with Uncle Zhou for spraying his walls? Uncle Zhou is a very nice man. He’s such fun. Once he called me to his room. He took some pieces of card from a drawer. The pieces were of every colour under the sun and were as big as the Evening News. He kept changing them and pressed them up to my eyes so that all I could see was that color. Then he asked: “Do you like it or not? Does it feel hot or cold? Dry or wet? Pleasant or nasty to smell? Does it make you want to go to sleep or go out and play? What does it make you think of? Or does it make you think nothing at all? Does it make you feel frightened or calm? Does it make you thirsty or not? Do you want to go on looking at it or not? He jotted down every reply that I made. See how much fun he is! If you don’t believe me, go over to his place and see for yourselves!

Little Button thought this far, then raised his head and said loudly, “Grandpa, you still haven't finished your discussion. You must be awfully tired. Can I say something now?”

There was nothing for it but for everyone to stop talking. They all looked at him.

Mr. Zhao waved his hands as if he had been wronged and said, “Right, right! Go ahead!”

Little Button asked: “When Uncle Zhou has finished his room, will we go from door to door spraying everyone else’s rooms as well?”

8:49 a.m.

Everyone went blank.

8:50 a.m.

Mr Zhao blurted out: “I’m sure he’d dare.” Mrs. Zhao echoed, “He’ll try!” Mrs. Li and Mr. Sun said at once, “He wouldn’t, he’d never …” Mr. Qian thought carefully before saying, “He doesn’t look like a trouble-maker. His illness only seems to recur in his own home …”

8:51.30 a.m.

Little Button turned round, blinked his round, black eyes, blacker even than the walls, shining black. He smiled innocently and said in a shrill voice: “So that’s settled! Uncle Zhou is spraying the walls of his own room, and it has nothing to do with us, so what are you all going on about?”

8:52 a.m.

Everyone went silent.

The chi—chi—chi of the wall spraying drifted over, mingling with the sound of the cicadas, becoming even more pronounced.

Summer 1982

Is there anything new? Every time he returned from the outskirts of the city and got off the bus to walk up to the crossroads at Dongdan, Hou Rui\fn{Like the English author Charles Dickens (1812-1870), Chinese writers often choose names to reinforce character. Rui means "acute."} looked eagerly for some sign that work was about to begin on the overpass.

However, he was always disappointed. As ever, the old barn-like structure of Dongdan Restaurant, standing at the northwest corner of the crossroads, hit the eye. As usual, there were people lined up to one side of this ever-crowded restaurant, waiting to buy youtiao.\fn{Fried dough rolls popular mainly for breakfast in Peking.} It had been thirty years! This ugly old restaurant had been whitewashed again and again but never torn down. How long would it linger on?

Hou Rui walked up to the iron railings at the junction, lit a cigarette, and turned to look across at the southwest corner of the crossroads. There, behind the pedestrian crossing, in the shape of an L, stood a never-ending line of billboards. He quickly noticed the latest change in the advertisements. One at the corner was now replaced by an advertisement for the Japanese electronics firm National Panasonic: a gigantic Monkey King was leaping out of the screen of a color television. The background was made up of millions of little metal discs that fluttered in the air currents. When they caught the sun at dusk, they produced an optical effect of golden ripples. Looking at these colorful advertisements that had such an air of the artisan, Hou Rui exhaled a puff of smoke. He thought: Life does, after all, bring changes. Things long longed for—even if not to be had immediately—had, after all, come within the realm of possibility.

Hou Rui had graduated from Beijing Normal College in 1964. After graduation, he was assigned to a commune middle school in the distant outskirts of Beijing to teach Chinese language. This autumn of 1980, he was exactly thirty-nine years old. At college he had been widely acclaimed as dashingly handsome … but Hou Rui, now standing at the intersection by the pedestrian crossing, puffing on his cigarette, seemed old before his time. He was gray at the temples, and though the crows' feet at the corners of his eyes were not very noticeable, his tear glands had already become greyish and were clearly discernable. The skin that had been tight and ruddy was now brown and rough. But seen from a distance, he still looked to be an attractive, middle-aged man.

It was with a confused mass of emotions that Hou Rui leaned against the railing and gazed at the bustle of Dongdan Intersection. Changan Boulevard, running in the east-west direction was good and wide, but all the streets running across it—especially those north of Dongdan—were narrow out of all proportion, compared with Changan Boulevard. Obviously, an overpass should be built as soon as possible, and yet …

Hou Rui threw away his cigarette butt and propped himself up with his hands on the railings. Gazing at the heavy traffic rolling by, he let threads of despair and hope weave within his heart a net of all feelings.

Just then he was startled by a slap on the shoulder.

*

Hou Rui turned, and recognized the fat man standing before him as his classmate from college days: Ge Youhan.

Ge Youhan had taken the college entrance exams as a salaried cadre\fn{A Party, or government official.} and was five years older than Hou Rui. He had hoped to get into a famous college from which he would go to some research institution to "play the role of a dignitary." He never imagined he would end up in a mere normal college,\fn{I.e., a teacher's college. The term is American, and goes back to the desire of the desire of the Father of Modern Chaina (Sun Yat-sen) to reform Chinese educational methods by instituting a system of Normal Schools throughout the country on the American plan, the purpose of which was to graducate teachers.} to be assigned, upon graduation, to teach in a most unremarkable middle school in the back streets. This was Ge Youhan's lifelong regret. To this very day, he was filled with nostalgia for his old organization, and the time when he was a clerk in an office. He would often say, "If only I hadn't been so intoxicated with the notion of going to college. I'd have wangled myself a position of department head long ago!"

He despised everyone at the middle school, and they in turn practically all despised him, for he was useless at teaching. Later he became librarian and would frequently take sick leave on account of half-genuine, half-imagined kidney trouble. How had he got by all these years? Political movements, the Ten Years of Calamities —\fn{This refers to the decade (1966-1976) of the Cultural Revolution.} while they had not left him unaffected-could hardly be used as clues to summing up his life. For many years now he had not read papers or listened to the radio, had not taken an interest in any gossip of a political nature, and, aside from furniture design manuals and cookbooks, had hardly read any books.

And he a librarian! For five years he went from one Housing Exchange Office to another, making the acquaintance of countless housing department officials. Seizing on other peoples' crises—such as family disputes, or the fear following a death in the family, or hardship attendant upon the political fall of a family member—through all kinds of similar situations, by legal means, he exchanged his apartment for ever bigger ones. His family now occupied a most ideal three-bedroom apartment on the third floor of a new housing estate, and there were only three in his family—he and his wife and a son still in primary school. His apartment was impeccably furnished—the result of long years of going to and fro between all the second-hand furniture shops in the city, whereby, through meticulous study, comparison, selection, exchange, selling off, and then buying back, he had completed his collection, item by item.

He now stood placidly before his old classmate, his stomach bulging out. His round face, his eyelids, his nose, his mouth, were all heavy laden with flesh—evidence of richness of diet and peace of mind. On one arm he carried an ample basket stuffed full of fresh goods just bought at Dongdan market. Hou Rui peeped at the basket and caught a glimpse of two moist fat fish tails sticking out.

"Hey! I recognized you from behind at a glance!" Ge Youhan said in a loud voice, his face beaming. "Well, what's up? Getting a charge out of watching cars go by?"

"I'm just back from school—only got off the bus a moment ago. Haven't even been home yet," Hou Rui said lazily. He had no wish to linger with his erstwhile classmate.

"So! You still haven't moved?" Ge Youhan countinued at the top of his voice.

Where could he move to? Hou Rui felt a stab. He was especially reluctant to discuss this matter with Ge Youhan. He was well aware what his classmate's present apartment was like, and he sensed the satisfaction and feeling of superiority oozing from Ge Youhan's very bones. From the expression in his eyes, Hou Rui could tell that, at this very moment, Ge Youhan probably had a vision of the one-room abode of their family of three generations.

"Don't worry. Just wait for the relocation—it won't be long now!"

Ge Youhan indicated the intersection with his free hand.

"They say work will begin in the next year or two—an overpass, a contract with the Japanese. Their money, their design. We do the work. Just you wait and see. Your folks will come into their own …"

Not allowing Hou Rui to get a word in, Ge Youhan suddenly took a step forward. Gently prodding Hou Rui's chest with one stubby finger, in a low and extremely chummy voice, he cautioned,

"When the time comes, don't let yourself be swindled by the Relocation Office. They're sure to offer to move you to Chuiyangliu,\fn{The Weeping Willows—a place in Peking.} but you mustn't go there! It's too close to the paper mill. If you drink the water there, it'll give you cancer. And don't go to the south side of Tuanjie Lake. The land there is low-lying. When it rains, it's just one great big "toad pond" all around … No, you must hold firm: it's got to be Tuanjie Lake, north side, and it's got to be third floor with a wide entrance hall, and two built-in closets! I tell you, 'Where there's a will, there's a way … Fight to the last and be victorious.' These two dicta are well attested!"\fn{The first old and literary, the second from Mao and the Cultural Revolution.}

"How reliable is your information? There's not the beginning of a sign of an overpass!" Hou Rui continued lazily, "And anyway, I'm not smart like you—so good at trading apartments!"

Hou Rui had thought that, hearing these last few words, some sign of displeasure would appear on Ge Youhan's face. But not at all. He just looked even more sincere. Nodding several times in succession, he said,

"True, true, you're not like me—reckless and shameless, running around, begging, and pleading. Besides, you're out of town most days, don't get back till Saturday, and first thing Monday morning you have to be off again."

Hou Rui had already turned, and was gazing at the dimming evening sun and the dust falling on Chang an Boulevard, continuing his thoughts. But Ge Youhan good naturedly babbled on a little more before taking his leave.

*

Hou Rui's home was on a hutong,\fn{A sidestreet in a neighborhood of compounds.} not far from the intersection. If an overpass were indeed to be built at Dongdan, the compound where they lived would certainly be demolished.

Hou Rui ambled along toward the hutong. The hutong was a mass of grey: grey walls, grey tile roofs, grey road surface. As always, the moment Hou Rui turned into the hutong, he felt grey.

For some years now, Hou Rui had gone home every week without exception. Sometimes he would even go twice in a week. Actually, to go home from school, Hou Rui had to walk a couple of li, catch the suburban bus, then change to a city bus—the whole trip involving a great expenditure of time and energy. But he still preferred to go home whenever he had the time.

There had been a time when Hou Rui's head had been filled with rosy pictures, and he had vowed to "sink roots" in the countryside and dedicate himself to the cause of secondary education among the peasants' children. When this spirit had been at its peak, he had once stayed away from home for six months. However, a mass of worldly events had, like so many pairs of scissors, cut to pieces the threads of ideals that had bound his heart. These past two years, more than ten teachers from the three commune middle schools had already been transferred back to the city—transferred, it was said, on account of family hardship, or poor health, et cetera. Actually, it was a well-known fact—and they themselves made no attempt to hide it—that, in actuality, they had almost all accomplished the transfer by plaguing officials, pulling strings, and going through the back door. Once back in the city, they enjoyed to the full all the material and intellectual comforts of city life. Few, if any, truly "took better care of aging parents," or seriously tried to "rest and recuperate."

In the streets of the commune town, Hou Rui often came across his ex-students. They had become, for the most part, commune people who were well-informed, who "saw through it all." They would invariably come right out with

"Sir! Have you still not got yourself transferred back to the city?"

From their faces and eyes, Hou Rui could clearly discern a feeling of contempt or pity. Things had come to such a pass that a willingness to work for the people in a place of hardship was looked upon with suspicion or pity. Have you got yourself transferred to a cushier place? You are useless, you're a real jerk! Hou Rui could not bear this sort of treatment. Once he retorted,

"No, I haven't been transferred back; I haven't got the pull. So don't just stand there and laugh at me. Help me! Do something on my behalf!"

The ex-student had grinned and said loudly, without compunction—in fact with a gleam of satisfaction mixed with teasing and contempt—

"Fine! But what can you do for me?"

Hou Rui had turned and walked away. He hated himself, he despised himself. He had nothing—no money, no power, no connections. All he could do was beg help from others, and he had nothing to offer in return. In this modern age, he felt himself to be simply useless.

"Useless jerk!" he cursed himself, to vent his spleen.

He was coming up to the compound gate when, owing to some complex feeling, he paused. He stood beneath a power-line pole and lit a cigarette. He stood there watching the ancient gateway. It was said that a few decades ago the compound had been an inn, which is why it was crowded with several rows of rooms. Light now shone through the tiny window set in the back wall of Hou Rui's room. It shone through the pretty pink curtain with the blue flowers on it. This curtain stirred in him a feeling of profound gentleness: this was, after alL the only place that merited the name "home!"

But at the same time, there arose in him a pain, a sense of injustice, for, on entering the gate, one saw on the left his home, but on the right was the men's toilet. The visitors from other parts of the country and foreigners who walked to and fro along Chang an Boulevard would probably never have suspected that less than a couple of hundred yards away, there existed toilets so primitive, so filthy. It has been said somewhere that the most reliable sign of the level of civilization in a place is the state of the toilets.

Actually, the toilet in their compound was by no means impossible to clean. But strange to say, though in recent years the families residing in the compound had become more and more particular about furnishings in the home, they had become more and more careless of the public utilities there, such as the street light in the compound, the faucet and this toilet.

The toilet was now forever strewn with pieces of used toilet paper, so that one had nowhere to set one's foot. Hou Rui had once made a supreme effort and cleaned the place himself, but this had immediately aroused the displeasure of some people in the compound, because the very act itself seemed to suggest a contempt for the long-term residents there; this they found insufferable. The next time Hou Rui returned home, the toilet was still in the same state, and he relinquished his great ambition to transform it.

Standing outside the compound gate, he actually pondered over this toilet for quite a while. How droll! Or perhaps this was just another sign of what a useless jerk he was. Hou Rui laughed bitterly.

Most unwillingly, Hou Rui recalled the chance meeting in the street a few moments before. Unwillingly—yet the fat face of Ge Youhan persisted in appearing in his mind's eye, proof that man is indeed unable to control his thoughts.

Hou Rui had once been to Ge Youhan's place: every detail in the three-bedroom apartment had excited his greatest envy. It was not that Hou Rui was a boor—he had visited the army compounds outside Fuxing Gate, and they were far superior to that of Ge Youhan. But then they were the high and mighty. And Ge Youhan—what had he to rely upon?

Hou Rui often compared Ge Youhan's situation with that of Cai Bodu. The more he compared the two, the more indignant he felt.

Cai Bodu had been a classmate of his and Ge Youhan's. He was now the resident playwright at a theatrical company. For two years past, two of his plays had been highly successful: they were shown in theaters, made into films, published in book form, reviewed in export journals.\fn{Journals meant for foreign readers in China and abroad.} The newspapers printed more than one commentary; he was even invited to be on television. In Ge Youhan's words, Cai Bodu had become an "Immortal."\fn{Which in Chinese folk religion referred to one so illustrious as to be no longer an ordinary mortal.} But what of Cai's accommodation? It was only two months ago that, in accordance with the policy of giving preferential treatment to artists who had made significant contributions, he had been assigned a small two-room apartment. This apartment was on the south side of Tuanjie Lake—precisely the location Ge Youhan had scoffed at. Furthermore, it was on the top floor. Of course, this was very much better than the four of them, from all three generations, crowding together in a single room on the ground floor. But once Cai Bodu had moved in, it did not seem in the least spacious.

The state of Ge Youhan's and Cai Bodu's housing often aroused a great indignation in Hou Rui. It just seemed too difficult to remold society in such a way as to reflect distribution truly according to work. Cai Bodu could already count himself lucky to be assigned such an apartment, because all he had to rely upon was "the organization"; he was even less adept than Hou Rui at seeking out and utilizing "extra-organizational" personalities, which in fact had more actual distribution power.

For this top-floor apartment to materialize, it had taken the repeated deliberation of many a leading comrade: many a circle had been drawn before Cai got the apartment.\fn{A reference to the practice of the named recipients of documents sent to various departments—"RE: Comrade John Smith."—drawing a circle around their names to indicate they had read them.} And what of the larger apartments on the second and third floors? Were they occupied by people even more brilliant and outstanding? No, strangely enough many of them were Ge Youhan types.

Don't keep going on about cadres enjoying special privileges—it's time the Ge Youhan type of wheeler-dealer was exposed. Corrupt cadres and cunning wheeler-dealers exist in symbiotic union, like rotten wood and poisonous fungus.

Hou Rui threw away the extinguished half of a cigarette, yet he still just stood there beneath the power-line pole. The street lights lit up, burning the greys to a kind of dark silver. Somehow this added a touch of poetry to the hutong that had been so drab. …

21.36 The Tall Woman And Her Short Husband\fn{by Feng Ji-cai (1942-)} Tianjin, Hebei Province, China (M) 4

Say you have a small tree in your yard and are used to its smooth trunk. If one day it turns twisted and gnarled it strikes you as awkward. As time goes by, however, you grow to like it, as if that was how this tree should always have been. Were it suddenly to straighten out again you would feel indescribably put out. A trunk as dull and boring as a stick! In fact it would simply have reverted to its original form, so why should you worry?

Is this force of habit? Well, don't underestimate "habit." It runs through everything done under the sun. It is not a law to be strictly observed, yet flouting it is simply asking for trouble. Don't complain though if it proves so binding that sometimes, unconsciously, you conform to it. For instance, do you presume to throw your weight about before your superiors? Do you air your views recklessly in front of your seniors? When a group photograph is taken, can you shove celebrities aside to stand swaggering and chortling in the middle? You can't, of course you can't. Or again, would you choose a wife ten years older than you, heftier than you or a head taller than you? Don't be in a rush to answer. Here's an instance of such a couple.

*

She was seventeen centimetres taller than he. One point seven five metres in height, she towered above most of her sex like a crane over chickens. Her husband, a bare 1.58 metres, had been nicknamed Shorty at college. He came up to her earlobes but actually looked two heads shorter.

And take their appearances. She seemed dried up and scrawny with a face like an unvarnished ping-pong bat. Her features would pass, but they were small and insignificant as if carved in shallow relief. She was flat-chested, had a ramrod back and buttocks as scraggy as a scrubbing board. Her husband on the other hand seemed a rubber rolypoly: well-fleshed, solid and radiant. Everything about him—his calves, insteps, lips, nose and fingers—were like pudgy little meatballs. He had soft skin and a fine complexion shining with excess fat and ruddy because of all the red blood in his veins. His eyes were like two high-voltage little light bulbs, while his wife's were like glazed marbles. The two of them just did not match, and formed a marked contrast. But they were inseparable.

One day some of their neighbors were having a family reunion. After drinking his fill the grandfather put a tall, thin empty wine bottle on the table next to a squat tin of pork

"Who do these remind you of?" he asked. Before anyone could guess he gave the answer. "That tall woman downstairs and that short husband of hers."

Everyone burst out laughing and went on laughing through the meal.

What had brought such a pair together? This was a mystery to the dozens of households living in Unity Mansions. Ever since this couple moved in, the old residents had eyed them curiously. Some registered a question mark in their minds, while others put their curiosity into words. Tongues started wagging, especially in wet weather when the two of them went out and it was always Mrs. Tall who held the umbrella. If anything dropped to the ground, though, it was simpler for Mr. Short to pick it up. Some old ladies at a loose end would gesticulate, finding this comic, and splutter with laughter. This set a bad example for the children who would burst out laughing at sight of the pair and hoot, "Long carrying-pole; big, low stool!" The husband and wife pretended not to hear and kept their tempers, paying no attention. Maybe for this reason their relations with their neighbors remained rather cool. The few less officious ones simply nodded a greeting when they met. This made it hard for those really intrigued by them to find out more about them. For instance, how did they hit it off Why had they married? Which gave way to the other? They could only speculate.

This was an old-fashioned block of flats with large sunny rooms and wide, dark corridors. It stood in a big courtyard with a small gatehouse. The man who lived there was a tailor, a decent fellow. His wife, who brimmed over with energy, liked to call on her neighbours and gossip. Most of all she liked to ferret out their secrets. She knew exactly how husbands and wives got on, why sisters-in-law quarrelled, who was lazy, who hard-working, and how much everyone earned. If she was unclear about anything she would leave no stone unturned to get at the truth.

The thirst for knowledge makes even the ignorant wise. In this respect she was outstanding. She analyzed conversations, watched expressions, and could even tell what people were secretly thinking. Simply by using her nose, she knew which household was eating meat or fish, and from that could deduce their income. For some reason or other, ever since the sixties each housing estate had chosen someone like this as a "neighborhood activist," giving legal status to these nosey-parkers so that their officiousness could have full play. It seems the Creator will never waste any talent.

Though the tailor's wife was indefatigable she failed to discover how this incongruous couple who passed daily before her eyes had come to marry. She found this most frustrating; it posed a formidable challenge. On the basis of her experience, however, and by racking her brains she fmally came up with a plausible explanation: either husband or wife must have some physiological deficiency. Otherwise no one would marry someone a whole head taller or shorter. Her grounds for this reasoning were that after three years of marriage they still had no children. The residents of Unity Mansions were all convinced by this brilliant hypothesis.

But facts are merciless. The tailor's wife was debunked and lost face when Mrs. Tall appeared in the family way. Her womb could be seen swelling from day to day, for being relatively far from the ground it was all too evident. Regardless of their amazement, misgivings or embarrassment, she gave birth to a fine baby. When the sun was hot or it rained and the couple went out, Mrs. Tall would carry the baby while Mr. Short held the umbrella. He plodded along comically on his plump legs, the umbrella held high, keeping just behind his wife. And the neighbors remained as intrigued as at the start of this ill-assorted, inseparable couple. They went on making plausible conjectures, but could find no confirmation for any of them.

The tailor's wife said, "They must have something to hide, those two. Why else should they keep to themselves? Well, it's bound to come to light some day, just wait and see."

One evening, sure enough, she heard the sound of breaking glass in their flat. On the pretext of collecting money for sweeping the yard she rushed to knock on their door, sure that their long hidden feud had come to a head and avid to watch the confrontation between them.

The door opened. Mrs. Tall asked her in with a smile. Mr. Short was smiling too at a smashed plate on the floor —that was all the tailor's wife saw. She hastily collected the money and left to puzzle over what had happened. A plate had been smashed, yet instead of quarrelling they had treated it as a joke. How very strange!

*

Later the tailor's wife beame the residents' representative for Unity Mansions. When she helped the police check up on living permits, she at last found the answer to this puzzle. A reliable and irrefutable answer. The tall woman and her short husband both worked in the Research Institute of the Ministry of Chemical Industry. He was chief engineer, with a salary of over 180 yuan! She was an ordinary laboratory technician earning less than sixty yuan, and her father was a hard-working low-paid postman. So that explained why she had married a man so much shorter. For status, money and an easy life. Right!

The tailor's wife lost no time in passing on this priceless information to all the bored old ladies in Unity Mansions. Judging others by themselves, they believed her. At last this riddle was solved. They saw the light. Rich Mr. Short was congenitally deficient while poor Mrs. Tall was a money-grabber on the make. When they discussed the good luck of this tall woman who looked like a horse, they often voiced resentment—especially the tailor's wife.

*

Sometimes good luck turns into bad. In 1966, disaster struck China. Great changes came into the lives of all the residents in Unity Mansions, which was like a microcosm of the whole country. Mr. Short as chief engineer was the first to suffer. His flat was raided, his furniture moved out, he was struggled against and confined in his Institute. And worse was to come. He was accused of smuggling out the results of his research to write up at home in the evenings, with a view to fleeing the country to join a wealthy relative abroad. This preposterous charge of passing on scientific secrets to foreign capitalists was widely believed. In that period of lunacy people took leave of their senses and cruelly made up groundless accusations in order to find some Hitler in their midst. The Institute kept a stranglehold on its chief engineer. He was threatened, beaten up, put under all kinds of pressure; his wife was ordered to hand over that manuscript which no one had ever seen. But all was to no effect. Someone proposed holding a struggle meeting against them both in the courtyard of Unity Mansions. As everyone dreads losing face in front of relatives and friends, this would put more pressure on them. Since all else had failed, it was at least worth trying. Never before had Unity Mansions been the scene of such excitement.

In the afternoon the institute sent people to fix up ropes between two trees in the yard, on which to hang a poster with the name of Mr. Short on it—crossed out. Inside and outside the yard they pasted up threatening slogans, and on the wall put eighteen more posters listing the engineer's "crimes." As the meeting was to be held after supper, an electrician was sent to fix up four big SOD-watt bulbs. By now the tailor's wife, promoted to be the chairman of the neighborhood's Public Security Committee, was a powerful person, full of self-importance, and much fatter than before. She had been busy all day bossing the other women about, helping to put up slogans and make tea for the revolutionaries from the Institute. The wiring for the lights had been fixed up from her gatehouse as if she were celebrating a wedding!

After supper the tailor's wife assembled all the residents in the yard, lit up as brilliantly as a sportsground at night. Their shadows, magnified ten-fold, were thrown on the wall of the building. These shadows stayed stock-still, not even the children daring to play about. The tailor's wife led a group also wearing red armbands, in those days most awe-inspiring, to guard the gate and keep outsiders out. Presently a crowd from the Institute, wearing armbands and shouting slogans, marched in the tall woman and her short husband. He had a placard hung round his neck, she had none. The two of them were marched in front of the platform, and stood there side by side with lowered heads.

The tailor's wife darted forward. "This wretch is too short for the revolutionary masses at the back to see," she cried. "I'll soon fix that." She dashed into the gatehouse, her fat shoulders heaving, to fetch a soapbox which she turned upside down. Mr. Short standing on this was the same height as his wife. But at this point little attention was paid to the relative heights of this couple facing disaster.

The meeting followed the customary procedure. After slogans had been shouted, passionate accusations were made, punctuated by more slogans. The pressure built up. First Mrs. Tall was ordered to come clean, to produce that "manuscript." Questions and denunciations were fired at her, hysterical screams, angry shouts and threatening growls. But she simply shook her head gravely and sincerely. What use was sincerity? To believe in her would have made the whole business a farce.

No matter what bullies sprang forward to shake their fists at her, or what tricky questions were asked to try to trap her, she simply shook her head. The members of the Institute were at a loss, afraid that if this went on the struggle meeting would fizzle out and end up a fiasco.

The tailor's wife had listened with mounting exasperation. Being illiterate she took no interest in the "manuscript" they wanted, and felt these research workers were too soft-spoken. All of a sudden she ran to the platform. Raising her right arm with its red armband she pointed accusingly at Mrs. Tall.

"Say!" she screeched. "Why did you marry him?"

The members of the Institute were staggered by this unexpected question. What connection had it with their investigation?

Mrs. Tall was staggered too. This wasn't the sort of question asked these days. She looked up with surprise on her thin face which showed the ravages of the last few months.

"So you don't dare answer, eh?" The tailor's wife raised her voice. "I'll answer for you! You married this scoundrel, didn't you, for his money? If he hadn't had money who'd want such a short fellow!"

She sounded rather smug, as if she alone had seen through Mrs. Tall.

Mrs Tall neither nodded nor shook her head. She had seen through the tailor's wife too. Her eyes glinted with derision and contempt.

"All right, you won't admit it. This wretch is done for now, he's a broken reed. Oh, I know what you're thinking!" The tailor's wife slapped her chest and brandished one hand gloatingly. Some other women chimed in.

The members of the Institute were flummoxed. A question like this was best ignored. But though these women had strayed far from the subject, they had also livened up the meeting. So the Institute members let them take the field. The women yelled:

"How much has he paid you? What has he bought you? What has he bought you? Own up!"

"Two hundred a month isn't enough for you, is it? You have to go abroad!"

"Is Deng Tuo behind you?\fn{A note reads: Deng Tuo (1912-1966), historian, poet and essayist, was the Party secretary of Beijing in charge of cultural and educational work, who was considered a counter-revolutionary after the start of the "cultural revolution" in 1966.} That day you made a long-distance call to Beijing, were you ringing up the Three Family Village?\fn{A note reads: In 1961 Deng Tuo, Wu Han (a historian) and Liao Mosha (a writer) started a magazine colunm 'Notes From the Three Family Village' and published many essays which were well received. During the 'cultural revolution' the three writers were falsely charged as "The Three Family Village."}

The success of a meeting depends on the enthusiasm worked up. The Institute members who had convened this meeting saw that the time was ripe now to shout a few more slogans and conclude it. They then searched Mrs. Tall's flat, prizing up floorboards and stripping off wallpaper. When they discovered nothing, they marched her husband away, leaving her behind.

Mrs. Tall stayed in all the next day but went out alone after dark, unaware that though the light in the gatehouse was out the tailor's wife was watching her from the window. She trailed her out of the gate and past two crossroads till Mrs Tall stopped to knock softly on a gate. The tailor's wife ducked behind a telegraph pole and waited, holding her breath, as if to pounce on a rabbit when it popped out of its burrow.

The gate creaked open. An old woman led out a child.

"All over, is it?" she asked.

Mrs. Tall's answer was inaudible.

"He's had his supper and a sleep," the old woman said. "Take him home quickly now."

The tailor's wife realized that this was the woman who minded their little boy. Her excitement died down as Mrs. Tall turned back to lead her son home. All was silence apart from the sound of their footsteps. The tailor's wife stood motionless behind the telegraph pole till they had gone, then scurried home herself.

*

The next morning when Mrs. Tall led her son out, her eyes were red. No one would speak to her, but they all saw her red, swollen eyes. Those who had denounced her the previous day had a strange-feeling of guilt. They turned away so as not to meet her eyes.

*

After the struggle meeting Mr. Short was not allowed home again. The tailor's wife, who was in the know, said he had been imprisoned as an active counter-revolutionary. That made Mrs. Tall the lowest of the low, naturally unfit to live in a roomy flat. She was forced to change places with the tailor's wife and moved into the little gatehouse. This didn't worry her, as it meant she could avoid the other residents who snubbed her. But they could look through her window and see her all alone there. Where she had sent her son, they didn't know, for he only came home for a few days at a time. Ostracized by all, she looked older than a woman in her thirties.

"Mark my words," the tailor's wife said, "she can only keep this up for at most a year. Then if Shorty doesn't get out she'll have to remarry. If I were her I'd get a divorce and remarry. Even if he's let out his name will be mud, and he won't have any money."

*

A year went by. Mr. Short still didn't come back and Mrs. Tall kept to herself. In silence she went to work, came back, lit her stove and went out with a big shabby shopping basket. Day after day she did this, the whole year round.

But one day in autumn Mr. Short reappeared—thinly clad, his head shaved, and his whole appearance changed. He seemed to have shrunk and his skin no longer gleamed with health. He went straight to his old flat. Its new master, the honest tailor, directed him to the gatehouse. Mrs. Tall was squatting in the doorway chopping firewood. At the sound of his voice she sprang up to stare at him. After two years' separation both were appalled by the change in the other. One was wrinkled, the other haggard; one looked taller than before, the other shorter. After gazing at each other they hastily turned away, and Mrs. Tall ran inside. When finally she came out again he had picked up the axe and squatted down to chop firewood, until two big boxes of wood had been chopped into kindling, as if he feared some new disaster might befall them at any moment. After that they were inseparable again, going to work together and coming back together just as before. The neighbors, finding them unchanged, gradually lost interest in them and ignored them.

One morning Mrs. Tall had an accident. Her husband rushed frantically out and came back with an ambulance to fetch her. For days the gatehouse was empty and dark at night. After three weeks Mr. Short returned with a stranger. They were carrying her on a stretcher. She was confined to her room. He went to work as usual, hurrying back at dusk to light the stove and go out with the shopping basket. This was the same basket she had used every day. In his hand it looked even bigger and nearly reached the ground.

When the weather turned warmer Mrs. Tall came out. After so long in bed her face was deathly white, and she swayed from side to side. She held a cane in her right hand and kept her elbow bent in front of her. Her half-paralyzed left leg made walking difficult. She had obviously had a stroke. Every morning and every evening Mr. Short helped her twice round the yard, painfully and slowly. By hunching up his shoulders he was able to grip her crooked arm in both hands. It was hard for him, but he smiled to encourage her. As she couldn't raise her left foot, he tied a rope round it and pulled this up when she wanted to take a step forward. This was a pathetic yet impressive sight, and the neighbors were touched by it. Now when they met the couple they nodded cordially to them.

Mrs. Tall's luck had run out: she was not to linger long by the side of the short husband who had loved her so dearly. Death and life were equally cruel to her. Life had struck her down and now death carried her off. Mr. Short was left all alone.

But after her death fortune smiled on him again. He was rehabilitated, his confiscated possessions were returned, and he received all his back pay. Only his flat, occupied by the tailor's wife, was not given back to him. The neighbors watched to see what he would do. It was said that some of his colleagues had proposed finding him another wife, but he had declined their offers.

"I know the kind of woman he wants," said the tailor's wife. "Just leave it to me!"

Having passed her zenith she had become more subdued. Stripped of her power she had to wear a smile. With a photograph of a pretty girl in her pocket she went to the gatehouse to find Mr. Short. The girl in the picture was her niece.

She sat in the gatehouse sizing up its furnishing as she proposed this match to rich Mr. Short. Smiling all over her face she held forth with gusto until suddenly she realized that he had not said a word, his face was black, and behind him hung a picture of him and Mrs. Tall on their wedding day. Then she beat a retreat without venturing to produce the photograph of her niece.

*

Since then several years have passed. Mr. Short is still a widower, but on Sundays he fetches his son home to keep him company. At the sight of his squat, lonely figure, his neighbours recall all that he has been through and have come to understand why he goes on living alone. When it rains and he takes an umbrella to go to work, out of force of habit perhaps he still holds it high. Then they have the strange sensation that there is a big empty space under that umbrella, a vacuum that nothing on earth can fill.

78.29 & 82.135 1. Vestiges 2. Thoughts In Privacy: Two Short Stories\fn{by Liang-Hsüan aka Ma Kuo-kuang (1942-)}
Szechuan Province, China (M) 4

1

Turning on the desk lamp, I saw the clutter before me. I had reluctantly left my warm quilt to come to my cold, desolate desk in the middle of the frigid winter night, faced with the task of turning out the work I had promised. Yet, that elusive spirit, inspiration sulked inside me, unwilling to come out. I looked about in panic, hoping to seize upon something and make my early rising worthwhile. I got up and paced about the room, warming myself in the process.

The chairs in the living room were scattered about the small round glass table covered with shells from watermelon seeds, ash trays, and tea cups with residual tea. A pair of sunglasses left by someone was half-buried in paper wrappings from sour plum preserves. It hadn't been so long ago, not more than five or six hours, when laughter and uproar filled the room. An old classmate, out of the country for over ten years, had returned home. On the spur of the moment, I had invited several other classmates over to talk over old times. As we got high on the liquor, we began to forget we had already entered middle-age. Slapping palms and patting shoulders, we threw off all restraints. Our eyes squinted in laughter, faces creased by crow's feet, we traced back the splendor of our youth. We fanned the fire of every fleeting fragment called to mind, making each scintilla blaze redder than blood, hotter than liquor. We were younger than youth.

But now the scene was chilly and bleak. The people in the chairs were already translucent, their forms, faces, voices, sorrows and anguish, kindnesses and grudges once entangled, so hard to part with, like crystal drops steaming in the air, circling through the littered plates and glasses, causing one disquietude at the truth of. their message.

Everything was on the desk that should be there: the "four treasures"\fn{A note reads: Writing brush, ink, ink stone, and paper.} of the study, plus books and the telephone. I sat dumbly staring at these things in front of me, my head heavier and heavier, when an empty yogurt container and an unfinished drawing of King Kong Battles Three Supermen caught my attention. I lost count of how many times my two mischievous sons had come into my study during the day to pester me. I had sternly warned them two or three times to no avail. If it weren't for them, why else would I be up in the middle of the night, wandering around and sighing? But now, at this moment, that empty yogurt container and half-finished pencil drawing unexpectedly became the most effective stimulant. Their clamoring, quarreling and endless questions had forced me to play deaf in order to give my ears a rest. But now all this became sublimated into a gentle rainbow, soaring around the flickering constellations in the three foot space above my head.

I couldn't help going over to their bunk beds, one stacked on top of the other. The younger one in the lower bunk had a gray smudge across his cheek, his right hand still grasping his "Little Brownie," a velvet cloth Pekinese dog. They had rough-housed until late last night. When his older brother finished his bath and told him to hurry up, it was his turn, he hadn't answered. He had already fallen asleep in front of the TV, so we just let him carry that smudge with him until morning. His older brother's plump round face was pressed upon part of his book, Ting-tong, unfinished from last night as he sank back onto his pillow. Was he finishing the story now in his dreams? In the other room, she was sound asleep, lying there alone in the double bed. She would always announce, "I'm going to bed now," and within a minute be fast asleep. The smile of an angel was nowhere to be found on her face now, though there might have been one before. Now she was unquestionably just an exhausted wife and mother.

The clock ticking away on the wall began to chime, clanging tong-tong-tong as it waved its hands in passing, churning up one's heart as it treaded across, time speeding by and time yet to come. I forced myself to sit down at the desk facing the wall, and spread out the clean surface of the draft paper. I tightly gripped the ballpoint pen and waited, hoping to be able to nail down that varmint time with one flick of the wrist, but that obstinate tick-tock continued on as before, like steady laughter, ha-ha, ha-ha, mocking me as it marched on by. I stared straight ahead at the portrait of Chung K'uei\fn{A note reads: A deity who is supposed to protect people from evil spirits.} on the wall. He turned and strode over, his sword raised and ready to strike, eyes wide open, hair on end, one glance enough to cut one to the quick. He seemed to come alive on that light brown silk scroll, the sleeves of his jacket fluttering, his magic showing through the ink sketch. For how many centuries had he been crushed by the superficial world into an insignificant tiny figure, colored by the artist's brush to bring out his brilliance, only to be buried in scrolls threatened by fire and flood for two hundred years. But finally, he was able to burst out of the scratches and cracks and appear on that wall before me. But once the wall appears, Chung K'uei disappears. He needn't turn around, nor wave good-by, but just indifferently take his leave.

The hand that had held the pen now clutched a glass of cold tea, still sweet and fragrant, but having passed from hand to mouth, a bitter aftertaste lingered. The image of the desk lamp was reflected on the glass desk top, piercing coldly into my pupils. I first covered the spot with my paper, but the eery white wearied my eyes. I could only turn my eyes away, letting them roam around the room. Books lined the walls of the study, books I had read and ones yet to be read. The ones read were fewer than those unread. But strangely, many of the ones I had read at this instant stared back at me as if they had once only seemed to have made my acquaintance. But those yet to be read didn't seem like strangers at all, as they were forever lined up there in front of me, letting me savor their simple resumes on the binding. The souls of these books soared throughout the room, jeering this would-be writer for being so nosy. On a winter night such as this, such a blow could almost turn one's thoughts to dust.

I threw down my pen and strolled over to my books, wishing to clear up this quarrel right here and now, and see that meddlesome justice be done. I leafed through a book I had read before, thick and yellowed, each leaf loose and brittle. Ten years—no, twenty years more likely—of scrawlings in the margins filled every page. I put on my glasses to decifer what I had written. The strokes were crisp and clear, the markings familiar, but the thought, or perhaps what one could only call the ideas, were unexpectedly vague and distant, more strange to me than the work of any other person. Indecision and grief flooded my mind. I didn't know whether to continue walking on ahead or return, retracing my steps, though they too had gone without a trace.

The night wind moaned outside, whirling something away with it, depositing something else in its place. The wind was always fair whether one liked it or not. I put on my overcoat and quietly opened the front door. Out on the balcony, I discovered several early rising confreres, their dim lights scattered throughout the uneven buildings near and far. But they were too far away for me to converse with. Why exactly were they up? A child sick so they hadn't slept? Or awakened in fright from dreams of their old homeland and past reveries?

The outline of the mountains loomed in the distance under the foggy moonlight.. That red light in the sky on the radio transmission tower winked at me indifferently. I seemed to see a shooting star out of the corner of my eye. I jerked around but confronted only a desolate emptiness.

The wind blew stronger. I felt I would be carried off with the wind at that moment, so scurried back to pounce on the pen hidden under the draft paper blown askew by the wind. I lifted one page after another and with a sudden rattle, my pen rolled across the surface of the desk.

2

In the middle of the night, around one o'clock, I was preparing an evening meal for myself which consisted of a dish of spinach, a pork-rib, and a fish. As I fried the fish, I suddenly heard a voice, quite a loud one, "I just like it this way." I sobered up immediately when I realized that the voice was my own.

I guess I must have been alone for a long time. It's natural for a person alone—or even one not alone—to talk to himself nor is it unusual for a person to fix himself a meal. Besides that bottle of milk I had in the morning, all I had eaten that day was some fruit; and it was only around midnight that I got around to preparing a real meal for myself. For that reason I had spoken aloud unconsciously, "I just like it this way." I think that being steeped in solitude had apparently affected some change in my nature.

I'm not even sure what day it is today, nor can I recall what day they had left. We had set a day to meet again one month later; certainly it could not have passed yet. "Well, it's only one short month," she had said softly in my ear as we embraced and kissed good-bye. We had said good-bye at home. She was taking the children abroad for a vacation, but she had to see me off, because I had class in the morning. When I got home the topsy-turvy commotion of their baggage was gone. The house seemed much larger. I wasn't sad, on the contrary, I experienced a feeling of satisfaction. Ten years ago I had told her I hoped I could enjoy a solitary life even if for only a month.

A poor scholar like myself started to squander his own spatial, temporal and physical solitude without restraint. The manner of squandering is too complicated to describe. The gigantic house, including the tables, beds, books, records as well as the plants, the air conditioner, the electric fans and every square of parquet floor belonged to me. I walked around and laughed happily. Sneaking around, I touched this and that; and even though there wasn't the slightest chance of being discovered, I still sneaked over to open one of her drawers. At first I didn't touch anything, I just looked at the things I ought to have been so familiar with. Then I buried my hands in her things and a wicked heat rose in my heart.

Every table piled high with things related to books, which wasn't like what they were originally intended to be: one table to be used for writing articles, one for writing with a Chinese brush, one for studying and writing notes, and one table specially for treatise materials. But when one table became a mess, I dumped everything on another table. Some people are able to manage a huge piece of land, but I am so incapable that I can't even manage a few tables. I'm always in need of one more table.

In a rage, I cleared off all the tables in the house, including the dining table so that not even a speck of dust remained. I let all the tables face the ceiling with nothing more on them than the light. In the air floated a sharp, bitter atmosphere, what could be called an atmosphere of "reality." I walked around feeling quite comfortable. Unfortunately, I discovered an ant by the kitchen sink, then two ants, then three, four, five. After I killed them all, my heart was stained with many spots. The feeling of smashing their small bodies between my thumb and forefinger stayed with me through the night.

I could stay awake or sleep, or stay between wakefulness and sleep. The lights could be kept on all night, the curtains closed all day; thus playing as one wish with time. If only the telephone could be disconnected, then the solitary person could easily drift away from this mundane world—that is if time did not adhere to experience, Life would then be as free as the soul. When I fed Einstein—my dog—I carefully observed the small, absolutely average, yellow and white mutt. He is now the only creature that shares the same world of experience with me. I mean this world in which time and space can be grasped. If I were to seize a portion of time that absolutely belonged to me, what would I do then? Einstein's dark, innocent eyes looked at me. The answer was frightfully close.

I said I wanted to spend it prodigally, but how does one spend time? Later I understood that in solitude it makes no difference whether one does something or does nothing.

Reading for eighteen hours or sitting blankly all day long can not be measured in terms of gain or loss. There is no standard of measure there. If we are not enslaved by time, we are spent by it until the day we die. I'll never laugh at you again, Time.

Sometimes I quietly went out and joined the crowd. Of course I went out alone and came back alone. Before going out you couldn't yell at someone for your socks, nor was there anybody there to hasten you along. A couple of times, I had the desire to turn back and look at the house one more time, but I deliberately walked away without doing so. Did I turn my head back before? The answer was vague.

"To Chung-hsiao East Road," I told the cab driver.

"A plate of Kwangchou fried rice," I said to the waiter.

"Excuse me, I have a proposal I would like to put before everyone," I spoke, raising my hand at the meeting. Secretly I was really horrified by my voice; I felt the impurity of existence. However, I forgot about it immediately, for I melted away in the impurity without leaving a trace and was transformed into a myriad of dancing particles which suddenly solidified into a single sphere, transparent and without any substance.

That night, after the meeting, I got half-drunk. On the way home I cut through a small park and for no apparent reason, the full moon made me think of a description of Wang Chao-chun, a famous beauty in Han Dynasty: "the girdle ornaments tinkling on the moonlit grave." The tinkling sounds were actually made by the keys at my waist. Therefore, when I opened the door, I was especially attentive. I knew quite well that it was pure fiction, but on account of my slight drunkenness, and in spite of the fact that I knew there was not a living soul inside, I still deliberately entered as if I were a thief.

I'm not sure if it is solitude that transforms life or if non-solitude has already transformed life at some earlier point. In one of my dreams, I felt my hand—apparently quite naturally—touching my wife's soft, warm body. Then I work up to find my hand beneath the pillow; in my hand was an ancient Tuan-hsi ink-stone. It's almost as if any object can produce a sensation which is completely out of the ordinary—even when one is not dreaming. One time I refused to eat peanuts because I didn't want the noise of chewing peanuts to disturb the tranquillity of drinking Quemoy Kaoliang. If I hadn't been alone, I never would have discovered that the noise of chewing peanuts could be so very vulgar. In human society we regularly pass information through odors and sounds.

I slowly came to believe the story which a friend told about the time he was in jail. One of his fellow prisoners, sitting peacefully in the jail, could predict without error whether the next meal would be noodles, rice or buns. He was told his nose was very sensitive; he answered that his hearing was the key. This prisoner knew that his death was near and that he was on the final stretch of his life. He regularly recited French verbs from memory, studied complicated French grammar and entertained himself by telling his cell mates the contents of the next meal. The most you can do for such a solitary sort of individual is to let him die.

When one is alone and face to face with oneself, the unexpected is the norm, because there is no one to bother you, you can look into the mirror free from anxiety; I suppose it would be better to say relatively free from anxiety when talking about looking into the mirror. I discovered that the person in the mirror was different each time I looked and what's more, always different from what I imagined. I don't know how he can be recognized.

The first time I was curious about probing myself it was around midnight. I don't know why I got up, perhaps the light was still on. Anyway, I was frightened by the person in the mirror; it couldn't have been for more than a couple of seconds, but I hadn't recognized him. Since then, I have paid closer attention when looking in the mirror, I even decided to play a joke on him. First I turned my back on him, then I suddenly whirled around trying to catch him, unprepared. I know that playing the role of a human being is a complicated cooperative process and the person in the mirror has rid himself of complete solitude, showing complexities beyond past understanding.

Perhaps all this is absurd. The mirror is a medium which allows a person to really come in contact with true absurdity. Anyway, the absurd is very abstract. Are all mirrors absurd? Or just mirrors in solitude? There is one person who can give you an answer: his name is Van Gogh.\fn{Vincent Willem van Gogh (1853-1890), Dutch painter.} He painted his own self-portrait more than ten times and later went mad and shot himself. Did solitude kill him or did he kill solitude? I wanted to open the album of paintings and pull out Van Gogh, eliciting an answer. That artist who cut off his own ear\fn{1888.) basically already had a persecution complex. As I was considering this, the person in the mirror narrowed his eyes and twisted his lips into an insidious grin. That was another face I had never seen before.

They should be home soon, those who are called my wife and children. Once in a while we talked on the phone on an overseas line. We discussed airplane tickets, hotels, schedules, checks, departure forms, ID's and so on, all sorts of important things which indicate that we are mature and serious and that once again we believe in the dignity of living together.

The telephone is a thing completely devoid of sex appeal, unlike photographs which have the light and shadows of flesh and blood. But it was then that I realized that all important events in life are decisively connected with the telephone. I don't like telephones, even if they're thousands of miles away. I prefer to calmly ponder in solitude, intuitively realizing that there is not the least bit of difference between reality and illusion. Then one day when I come home, open the door, and see them safe and sound in the house, it will be as if nothing had ever happened.

79.56 The Ivied Cabin\fn{by Gu Hua aka Luo Hongyu (1942-)} Jiahe County, Hunan Province, China (M) 13

For many years now, the story of naogelao Yulang has been circulating in the Misty Border Mountain District. Naogelao Yulang, in Yao dialect,\fn{A note reads: Yao: a minority people mainly distributed in Guangxi and other southern provinces.} means "the young woman of Yao." The story goes that in Green Feather Hollow, in the heart of these ancient and secluded hills, lived a young Yao woman named Pan Qingqing, whose job it was to guard the forests. She was born, raised, and married in the hills. She seldom left her abode and had been to the Forest Department only once—granted. That was not quite far away. No wonder the young men of the department had never had a glimpse of her, however much they had heard that she was some sort of a mountain fairy.

Her ancestors lived in Green Feather Hollow in the ivied cabins which were built with trunks of fir so strong that no axe could ever break them and they could stand up to any attack by the wild boar. Layer upon layer of white fan-shaped fungus had grown on the trunks, which now looked black just above the ground. Behind the cabin, was a clear mountain stream which flowed quietly all year long.

The cabin's only contact with the outside world, apart from a narrow foot-path, was a telephone line put up before the "cultural revolution" for reporting fires. One winter, however, the snowfall was particularly heavy and the line snapped. During the turbulent times of the "cultural revolution" the leaders of the forest district were replaced whenever those contending for power moved up and down on the political seesaw; naturally no one had been sent to fix the fallen telephone line. And so this steel thread, the symbol of modern civilization, never did make its way back to the secluded forest hollow. In the midst of these thousands of acres of forest, the day alternated with the night and nothing much happened. But for the occasional crowing of a cock, the barking of a dog, the cry of a child coming from the cabin, or the pale blue thread of smoke rising from the chimney, the valley of Green Feather Hollow would have appeared, still and quiet, as if it had been sleeping. Neither the chirping of birds nor the blossoming of flowers and the falling of their petals could ever have waked it up.

Pan Qingqing's parents had passed away early. Her husband, Wang Mutong, was a tall and strong Han.\fn{A note reads: Han: the majority nationality of China [about 92% of the population].} He was so powerfully built that he looked as though he could kill a tiger with his bare hands. Both husband and wife were employed as forest guards. Before every meal it was Wang Mutong's habit, to drink a glass or two of the corn liquor which Pan Qingqing brewed. Except for an occasional drunken fury, when he would beat Qingqing till she was bruised in places with marks of purple and blue, he was not a bad husband after all. Generally, he took good care of his wife. He never made her climb the hills herself to gather firewood, which was always stacked neatly in piles beside the cabin door. He never sent Qingqing out to clear the fire lanes as there had not been a fire at Green Feather Hollow for over ten years. He never made Qingqing tend the garden or grow vegetables, yet all the year round the large plot beside the bank of the stream was always loaded with onions, fresh melons and vegetables, more than they could eat. All Pen Qingqing had to do was to feed the pigs, nurse the baby, wash and mend the clothes, and attend to the other household chores, so that at the age of 26 or 27 she still maintained the look of freshness and tenderness of a young girl not yet married. Though completely illiterate, Wang Mutong believed that he knew all he needed to know. He felt that he was really the lord of Green Feather Hollow: the woman was, his; the children, the cabin and the mounains were all his.

Of course, the leaders in the Forest Center had sent him here to guard the forest and he was, in truth, merely their subordinate.

Before Pan Qingqing had given birth to the children, she asked him several times for permission to travel the 90 kilometers out to the Forest Department to have a good look around. That permission was each time denied. Instead, she was severely beaten and forced to kneel as punishment for asking. Wang was afraid once his pretty and charming wife had got to that worldly and exciting place she would be attracted by a new kind of life. More than that, he feared she might be lured away by the flashy, smooth-talking youth there.

Not until Pan Qingqing had given birth to a son and then later a daughter did he. begin to rest assured about her. It was as if Qingqing had now become tied fast to his belt, and had truly become his woman. He maintained his rule in the family with beatings and forced kneelings and rigidly arranged the daily schedule. Father, wife, children: everyone in Green Feather Hollow knew his or her place. Theirs was a small society with its hierarchy all right.

Wang Mutong and Pan Qingqing were cut off from the world as they spent their days. Although husband and wife were not always in agreement on everything, they were accustomed to their life in the forest and things generally went fairly smoothly.

Wang Mutong went to the Forest Department once a month to pick up his and his wife's salary and came back with the family's ration of rice, oil, and salt. Each time he returned, he would tell Pan Qingqing everything that had happened and all the gossip he had heard in the department. Pan Qingqing would sit in wonder with her big black eyes wide open listening as if her husband had brought home tales of distant lands. These past few years he had been telling her mainly of students outside rebelling and making trouble, of old, bespectacled intellectuals being paraded like monkeys through the countryside with labels hanging from their necks, or of forestry technicians who, after half a lifetime studying, now attempted suicide by drowning in buffalo wallows which were so shallow that he was dragged out with his back still dry. Later on, came the criticism of a certain kind of "deer," which of course was not the ordinary sort of wild swift-running animal that could be hunted with a gun. That term was used to denigrate the learned scholars.

"Ah, we are much better off here in Green Feather Hollow you know. The soil is so rich almost anything you put in it will grow. We've had no schooling, true; but no one will ever come here to bother us."

Pan Qingqing understood only some of her husband's accounts; some of it of course made no sense to her at all. With childlike innocence she shared the fears of those learned men out there. Surely, she felt, it was a calamity to be able to read and write! She could not help secretly rejoicing for herself and her husband. "It is better to live in Green Feather Hollow." She had heard this said often enough and truly believed it. She did not want even to think of the Forest Department, that place filled with open strife and invisible intrigue. She did not expect too much of her husband; she wished only that he would not strike her too hard when he was angry. Every night as soon as it grew dark they would go to bed. A mere half liter of kerosene was enough to last them through half a year to keep the lamp lit, themselves warm. Only the moon and the stars peeping through their window saw what was going on during the night.

"Qingqing, we should have some more babies!"

"We've already got Little Tong and Little Qing. Haven't you said the leaders nowadays forbid everyone to have too many kids and that all the women should go and get themselves fixed?"

"No matter, we could have another five and it wouldn't be too many!"

"You enjoy making me suffer, don't you?"

Wang confused two words which sound similar: scholar and deer.

"Suffer? What suffering is there when a woman raises children?"

"There's nothing to be afraid of! At most they won't issue grain rations for the kids. We've soil and water here at Green Feather Hollow. Look at my hands. They're as thick as oak planks. Do you really think we couldn't raise a few more children? After winter I'll have the soil ready for cotton-plants. Next year you bring the spinning wheel and loom your mother left you, and scrub them clean."

"Oh, look at you! You treat me like a hen that you can just keep well fed and penned up in the hills."

"You are mine!"

Pan Qingqing said nothing as he hugged her tightly and his armpits were giving out a strong smell. She was meek and docile. She was her man's woman and fully accepted that it was her lot to be reprimanded and beaten. She felt that in the full blossom of her youth, to give birth to more children was as natural as a tree bearing fruit.

When she nursed her baby the white milk from her breasts flowed as endlessly as the sap of the trees. Her man was virile; he was not afraid of tigers or wild boar. He embraced her with arms as strong as iron, and then they did what other couples outside the forest most likely also do. But he did it with the strength of someone who felt as if his energy could not have been directed into another channel.

*

In the summer of 1975 Ace Hand came to Green Feather Hollow.

Don't get me. wrong. This Ace Hand doesn't mean some "high-level" cadre. He was a city youth who had come to settle down in the Forest District in 1964. His real name was Li Xingfu, meaning happiness and referring to the fact that he was born in the year of Liberation. He was a tall and lanky youth, almost elegant in appearance, and revealed an engaging wit when speaking with the local workers and cadres. During the "cultural revolution," when the Red Guards put out the call to "establish ties" with the masses, he was swept along by the current of revolutionary fervor. He tried to hop on a train, but fell instead on the track and lost his arm as a result. From that time on, one shirt sleeve hung empty by his side. He stayed in the city for a few years, and then returned to the Forest District where the local workers gave him the nickname Ace Hand.

The leaders there didn't know what to do with him. They telephoned every logging camp, and every tree-farming brigade in the district but no one was willing to take him. They all said that not only was Ace Hand unable to perform physical labor but worse, he was a "Little Revolutionary General." His efforts to "establish ties" with the workers ended up somewhat like dropping ashes on bean curd: you could not blow them off or brush it clean and there was no way to get rid of that kind of contamination.

One day while collecting his family's ration of rice, Wang Mutong happened to run into the chairman of the District's Political Affairs Section. Chairman Wang put his hand on his forehead and said to himself:

"Right! Why not send Li Xingfu to Green Feather Hollow to help Wang Mutong and his wife in guarding the forest? This isn't just a convenient arrangement; it is perfect! It will add another guard to a post where besides the hard-working Wang and his wife there isn't another soul for 100 kilometers around. In a place like this Li Xingfu, if he is to establish ties at all, he will have to do it with the monkeys and pheasants."

When Wang Mutong heard another hand was to be added to Green Feather Hollow, he was very happy, but when he heard Li Xingfu had only one hand he expressed reluctance.

"Lao Wang, haven't you been asking to join the Party for years? This is nothing more than a test which has been arranged for you," said Chairman Wang as he slapped him on the arm. "Just because Li Xingfu has only one arm, he's easy to deal with. It doesn't mean he won't be able to do what you want him to do. I'll talk to him personally about his duties working under you. I'll make it clear that while he's at Green Feather Hollow he's to follow your orders in all matters, report to you on everything, and ask for permission whenever he wants to leave the hollow. But what about you? You should widen your horizon, as it were. Take this young intellectual who has been somewhat misguided. Educate him and reform him, if you can."

Nodding his head, Wang Mutong decided to accept this trial, this weighty responsibility of educating and reforming a young man.

So Ace Hand came to Green Feather Hollow and the community headed by Wang Mutong now had an important new member. Wang Mutong and Pan Qingqing built a hut for Li Xingfu only twenty or thirty steps from their own cabin right beside the clear green mountain stream. They used tree trunks to erect the walls and fir planks for the roof. Thus the two cabins, one big one small, one old one new, formed a pristine neighborhood.

In the beginning Wang Mutong had no hard feelings for Ace Hand. On the contrary he rather enjoyed hearing Li Xingfu calling him "Brother Wang." Li Xingfu was soon enraptured by the beautiful scenery and peaceful atmosphere of Green Feather Hollow. Wang sent him, out on fire patrol every day. Each morning he climbed the narrow path that looped and twisted its way like a snake up the mountain and into the forest fog. It was like walking into a dream world. The thick milk-white fog which filled the valley gave him the feeling that it might take him away from this world. At about 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning, when the sun first broke through the dispersing mist, he would sit in the doorway of his lookout post as the trees above burst forth in emerald green while the boundless sea of fog remained below. Then all he could see was one towering cluster of hemlock and pine floating above the billowing mist. At a time like this, he almost believed that this was fairyland, like the jade forest of Peng Lai,\fn{A note reads: The fabled abode of immortals.} beyond the reach of human beings.

Of course, Li Xingfu did not believe he was living in this forest fairyland. Even though Wang Mutong and Pan Qingqing were also young, he knew that he must behave properly and maintain an appropriate distance from lovely "Sister Qingqing," whose big black eyes seemed to be full of songs. But young people could not do without company. Would he really be able to make friends only with the golden-haired monkeys, thrushes and grouse of this green valley?

Wang had two children, a seven-year-old boy named Tong and.a girl named Qing, who was five. At first the two children were a little afraid of Ace Hand; but Ace Hand caught a couple of red sparrows for Little Tong, and picked a bunch of wild flowers for Little Qing to wear in her hair and then let her see her reflection in a small round mirror. That changed everything! The brother and sister began to call him “Uncle Li” or “Elder Brother Li.” After a few days Tong began to stay the night at his hut. Pan Qingqing had to come to call him home but he refused to leave.

These children of the hills were lovable in their wild way. One day a snake slithered into the hut scaring Ace Hand, who was shaking all over. Tong calmly informed him, “Snakes won’t bite unless you step on them first.” Then he went on speaking with an air of authority:

“There are mainly three kinds of snakes in Green Hollow. The green bamboo snake is the laziest. Usually he just lies coiled up on a bamboo stalk and doesn’t move at all.” Little Tong looked up, closed his eyes, puckered up his cheeks and said, “Like this, fu, fu, fu, he spurts out his venom to catch the birds. When a bird is near, he strikes at it with lightning speed and then holds it in his mouth. After this he lazily coils back up around the bamboo stalk again and eats it slowly. Now the howler snake is not like that at all. His scales are mud colored but he’s fierce looking that when he crawls along the ground even the grass parts to make way for him. He can grow to half the length of a man. He looks like this.”Little Tong opened his mouth and stared without blinking, stretching his neck out so that his head stuck out as far as it could.

“Hoo, hoo, hoo—oh it’s frightening! Then there’s the snake that’s as thick as an axe handle and as long as a shoulder pole. Father calls him ‘Forty-eight Lengths.’ When he moves he sways his head so far back and forth you’d think he’s crazy!”

Ace Hand immediately took hold of Little Tong’s head so he wouldn’t get carried away imitating this too. He asked:

“How do you know all this?”

“I’ve seen the green bamboo snake myself. Father told me about the howler snake and forty-eight pieces although I’ve never seen them. He catches snakes and sells them in the Forest Department.”

Ace Hand looked at the boy, who, he thought, ought to be in school rather than studying the ways of snakes. Then he thought of that frightful snake which had already slithered away from his hut and he could not help shivering again.

As he observed the children, the children observed him too. Every morning Ace Hand brushed his teeth and rinsed his mouth by the stream bank. Little Qing would always stick her head half way through the cabin door to stare at him, out of curiosity. One morning Little Qing timidly approached him and asked, “Uncle, is your mouth dirty?”

Ace Hand looked at her not quite understanding what she meant. His mouth was filled with tooth-paste.

“If your mouth isn’t dirty then why do you rinse it every day?”

Ace Hand burst out laughing. He rinsed his mouth, wiped his face, and then said to Little Qing, “Later I’ll ask your mother to buy you and Little Tong each a brush. Then every morning when you wake up you can brush your teeth, too, and your teeth will be as white as snow and very pretty.”

Little Qing remained unconvinced. “Mum never uses a brush and her teeth are snow white.”

To convince her, Ace Hand asked, “But does your mother’s mouth smell?”

“When she kisses me her mouth always smells sweet. If you don’t believe me, kiss her yourself.”

“Little Qing, you devil, what are you doing out there? You come right back here!” her mother yelled from the cabin.

“Ace Hand” blushed. His heart pounded as though he’d been caught doing something he should not have done. He went back to his cabin at once.

It was only a trivial matter, but Wang Mutong heard about it. He made Little Qing kneel as punishment just outside the cabin door. Obviously, this was for Ace Hand’s eyes! Though no other warning signs were given, Ace Hand knew he had to be more cautious. Though there was no cause for suspicion he felt that he had to keep his eyes on things.

*

Life for the inhabitants of Green Feather Hollow flowed on as smoothly as the clear green stream which ran behind the cabins. At its deepest, the water reached one’s calf; in the shallow areas it came only to the top of one’s feet. Yet the shallow stream, reflected the dancing trees, the clear blue sky, the freely drifting white clouds. And now it reflected one more thing, too.

Ace Hand had erected a tall slender pole beside his cabin to support a radio antenna.

This was bound to stir up trouble. The small black box in Ace Hand's cabin talked and sang, breaking the hitherto silence of the night in the forest. At first only Little Tong and Little Qing dared come into his cabin, once evening fell, to listen to it. Gradually, armed with the excuse that she had to call the kids home, Pan Qingqing would go in herself to listen for a while. Naturally, this resulted in Wang Mutong's going over to bring his wife and children back to their cabin when it was time for bed. Sometimes, when Wang's voice was too gruff, Pan Qingqing would answer somewhat in the tone of a spoiled child:

"It's early! When it's all dark we'll go to bed. It's such an awfully long time till it's light again!" Then she would go on, "When it's all dark we'll go to bed." The woman now thought the night was "awfully long."

Wang Mutong was perturbed. This big forest guard who could eat an entire jin of rice at a single meal never went to listen to the magical songs and voices which came out of that bewitched black box. He maintained the dignity of a man who would not tolerate offence, while he solemnly observed how the situation develop.

Not long after, Ace Hand helped Pan Qingqing and the two children clear away the refuse from the vacant plot between the two cabins. They neatly stacked the firewood by the doorway, leveled the ground and removed the pig and dog manure. Soon the whole place was looking neat and tidy. Ace Hand said they should grow some flowers on the lot. He also promised to teach Pan Qingqing and the children how to read and how to do exercises following the radio programmes. This made Qingqing so happy that she was all smiles. After that the children tagged along behind Ace Hand from morning to night. They talked incessantly of what "Uncle Li says" and what "Uncle Li forbids." They had grown closer to him than to their own father.

This made Wang Mutong all the more uncomfortable and irritable. Although Li Xingfu had only one hand, he had unwittingly altered the life at Green Feather Hollow as completely as earthworms had silently turned over the whole fields.

"Woman, he's come to this hollow just to show that he's a cultured type and to show up your old man!" said Wang Mutong to his wife.

Sure enough, Ace Hand eventually put forward four proposals. One was that they should ask the District Headquarters to send someone immediately to repair the telephone line which had lain broken for many years, and that a wired-broadcasting system should be installed on the plot between the two cabins. Secondly, he proposed they post painted wooden signs at every mountain pass around Green Feather Hollow displaying all ordinances concerning forest preservation. The third proposal was that they set up a fire-watch patrol schedule. He and Wang would carry on two shifts between them: a morning shift and an afternoon shift, each one eight hours long. While on duty it would be impermissible to gather firewood, dig for valuable roots or attend to any private matters. The fourth proposal was that they set up a small study group to discuss politics and culture in which Little Tong and Little Qing could also take part. When Pan Qingqing heard the proposals her face lit up. She gave Wang a sidelong glance which expressed what she wanted to say without using words:

"You see, this young man has culture; he doesn't think as we do and he speaks so beautifully!"

Wang had expected something like this for quite a while. His face stretched taut, his mouth clamped tight as an iron vice, and his eyes were full of fire as he stared at his woman ferociously.

"A newly-built outhouse smells great the first few days. Watch yourself!" Then he said brusquely, to Ace Hand:

"We've got a saying around here something like this; 'when city boys come to the country they ought to act as the locals do.' In other words, the guest ought to follow the host's lead. Of course, you're not a guest here, but you don't rate as the host either. There hasn't been a forest fire at Green Feather Hollow for twenty years. Is there a leader in this whole district who wouldn't find that commendable? Has there ever been a time when I didn't act as a model guard? I've never had to rely on a telephone line, or wooden signs, or two shifts of patrol or any study group. You'd be better off keeping your axe sharp and your body strong. The district put me in charge of what goes on in this hollow a long time ago. Don't forget those three conditions given you by Chairman Wang from the political section."

With a severe look, Wang Mutong crossed his arms behind his back, his eyes flashing.

Ace Hand stared blankly, his mouth agape, his face pale. Pan Qingqing looked apologetic, but she dared not utter a word of reproach to her husband for his rude and unreasonable behavior. She said to Ace Hand, "Brother Li, he's not a cultured person and these are only the words of a …" But when she saw herhusband was on the verge of flaring up again, she said no more. Wang Mutong laughed coldly and then said:

"Yes, I'm just a hick and he is cultured, but these are times when the cultured are led by the hicks. We hicks are in charge now! Don't you forget, Li Xingfu, that the leaders sent you here to Green Feather Hollow to be educated! To be reformed!”

Having said that, he swung his massive body around and left. His footsteps were ringing with a booming sound that made one think he was leaving craters in the ground at each step.

Ace Hand’s proposals were up against the stone wall of Wang Mutong’s stubbornness, and there was not going to be any break-through. His heart sank. What Wang said was true, though. He had been sent out to this hollow to be educated and reformed. Indeed, nowadays it was a matter of hick educating the educated. This was the fashion. So be it. He could not help fearing Wang Mutong, somehow. He knew as well that he could not change the present unfortunate situation himself. Still, he was energetic and full of vigor. He did not let himself fall into idleness, for when he was idle he would feel lonely. Then he would ponder the meaning of life and even wonder if throwing himself off a cliff might not make more sense. He had brought with him two books printed before the “cultural revolution.” One was A Survey Of Tree Species and the other, Common Facts About Forest Fires. Every day as he patrolled the mountains he would bring along A Survey Of Tree Species. By studying the illustrations he learned to distinguish the several hundred different kinds of broadleaf evergreens in that area. He planned to carry out his own study of the natural resources in Green Feather Hollow, both to prepare the first data of that sort for later logging operations and to ensure that his stay here was not completely fruitless. He thought Pan Qingqing might understand so he told her of his plans. Sure enough, she advised him as kindly and gently as she would, be advising her own brother:

“Silly! Go ahead and do what you want. You don’t need anyone’s permission.”

“You don’t think Brother Wang will mind?”

“Is there anything wrong with what you want to do? Oh you …” As Qingqing said this her voice lingered on the last word. Her shining black eyes pierced him as she spoke directly to his heart.. Without knowing why, Ace Hand was afraid to look into those eyes. Qingqing’s admonition sounded like music, and like a mountain stream it turned and twisted its way and found into his heart.

Autumn had arrived. Ace Hand collected the seeds of cliff fir, golden forest lotus and ginger trees. He kept the seeds in an old envelope. He thought he would set up a small nursery in which to plant the seedlings so that later he could take the saplings down to the Forest Department, where he could hand them over to the technicians for proper care. In order to prepare the nursery he had to burn out a clearing in the wild shrub first. He knew Wang Mutong had not the slightest interest in this kind of endeavor, so he asked Qingqing to lend him a hand.

That day Wang was gathering firewood up on the mountain slope. As it turned out, the patch beside the garden which Ace Hand and Qingqing chose to clear, happened to be just the spot on which Wang had decided to plant his cotton. They set the plot ablaze. As a brisk wind was blowing, in no time thick smoke was billowing from a roaring fire. The two of them, were just like brother and sister talking and laughing, happy and cheerful.

Suddenly, Wang came racing down from the mountainside. With cold glare he snatched his axe from behind his back and leveled a pine sapling. Then wielding the young tree with both hands he beat out the fire. Ace Hand explained the situation at once. Enraged, Wang shouted back:

“Don’t ever do anything like this without my permission. I’ve got other plans for this spot! Li Xingfu, you should have asked me first, instead of torching down this patch on your own. Tonight I want you to write an account of self-criticism!”

“Whom should I give it to?”

“Whom should you give it to? Do you think I’m not in charge around here just because I can’t read? Let’s get one thing straight as long as you’re working under me. We’ll stick to the rules.”

Qingqing looked at her husband and wanted to cry. Wang ferociously instructed her:

“You go back and feed the pigs! Then get some water over here for the ashes.”

Ace Hand stole a cowering glance at Qingqing. Not daring to answer back to her husband, she turned around and walked away. She wiped the tears from her eyes with the back of her hand.

*

Everybody had a certain degree of self-confidence, and self-respect. But if a small rip in it was left unattended it could become a hole, too wide to be papered over. Even the earth was rent in places. Wang felt the challenge from Ace Hand. At the same time he thought his own woman had turned wild; she was no longer as obedient or as docile.

When Wang went on his next trip to District Headquarters to pick up his family’s ration of grain, he felt an unexplainable anxiousness as he left the cabin early in the morning. There was something bothering him which he could not put aside. He was a rugged man with plenty of stamina. Though it was a 180-kilometre round trip on mountain paths, as night approached he started his journey back, carrying 125 jin of grain! By the time he got back to his home he was reeking with sweat. The door to his cabin was unlocked and the light was shining bright within.

"Strange," he thought, "the woman had not yet gone to bed."

He walked into the room. No one was there: Then he heard laughter and music coming from Ace Hand's cabin. He felt the oven and the stove; they were both cold. He rushed out and ran to Ace Hand's cabin. There he could see everything clearly. His wife was sitting, her chin cupped in her hands. Little Tong was leaning against her knee, listening to the sound of a woman singing enticingly. Ace Hand was holding Little Qing on his lap, his cheek pressed tight against hers! Wang Mutong recognized the song coming from the black box. It was a love song of the Yao people, Boyfriend and Girlfriend with Lovers' Hearts.

"Oh how pretty, when my Mum was alive she loved to sing these songs," she said. Wang watched as his wife looked at Ace Hand with disturbing intimacy.

"The Yao people have always loved to sing and dance." Ace Hand too was returning his look with improper familiarity.

Wang Mutong could bear no more. He repressed the rage in his heart enough not to let out a torrent of filthy language and merely said:

"Little Tong! Little Qing! Are you two little devils planning to listen to love songs, all night? Do you see any light up in that sky?"

When Qingqing realized her husband had returned, she hastily grabbed Little Qing in one hand and Little Tong in the other and hurried, them outside. She said:

"Ai ya! You devil, why didn't you stay the night in the headquarters? Look how tired and sweaty you are!"

Wang Mutong didn't answer. He was grinning his teeth and then muttered uneasily, "I was afraid if I spent the night away, you'd spend it at his place."

When they got back to their cabin, Qingqing lit a fire at once to boil some water and warm up some food. She did not prepare any liquor though, afraid her husband might use it as an excuse to beat her. That night Wang showed an unusual coolness, a reticence that made Qingqing shudder. The atmosphere within the shack was tense. He used the hot water to wipe his body and wash his feet. Then paying no attention to the supper his wife had laid out upon the table, he solemnly and silently got into bed. Qingqing massaged his feet and back several times in a conciliatory way knowing the anger that was bottled up inside of him. But he lay as frighteningly still as, a heavy powder keg.

Wang Mutong was not just a powerful man, he was also calculating and self-centered. He felt his status in Green Feather Hollow was at stake. It seemed to him now that not just Qingqing but Little Tong and Little Qing might also forsake him. He was a simple, honest, exemplary forest guard suffering from the acts of others. Was he supposed to sit back and watch Ace Hand step by step steal his wife and children away from him? Could he let himself be defeated by an amputee, a care-free intellectual youth sent out to the countryside? Hell, no! To begin with he would have to re-establish his standing within his own household. Early the next day with a lively expression and eyes opened round he announced with a voice that boomed like muffled thunder:

"Little Tong, Little Qing, kneel for me! Kneel! Now listen! Starting from today both of you and your mother are forbidden to enter Ace Hand's hut. If any of you go in there, your old man will gouge out your eyes and break your feet!"

Qingqing turned pale as she listened to all this. Little Tong and Little Qing kneeled behind her, their teeth rattling in fear, trembling like two slender saplings in a winter storm.

Then, since Ace Hand had not yet left for work, Wang went over to his cabin to ask for the self-criticism he had assigned a few days before.

Ace Hand confessed that he had not written it yet.

"You haven't written it? So you think I was talking only for my own good? Listen, Li Xingfu, the district leaders have put you under me. From now on you're not allowed to do or say whatever you please. You must behave yourself properly. I'll give you one more day. Hand in your self-criticism tomorrow morning."

Glaring at him and with fists swinging like iron hammers, Wang Mutong laid down three more rules:

"From now on, every night you are to give me a report on your whole day's activities. We'll do it right here in this cabin. If you ever want to take time off you have to ask me first. You are not to come to my cabin unless you have a damned good reason! And one last thing, if you ever use that radio of yours to lure my family over again, you'd better watch out for these hands! One of my fingers could pull down that fir pole with all its wires and throw it right back beyond the mountains where it came from!"

In order to increase the effectiveness of his prohibition, Wang Mutong took one concrete measure too. Normally, when he left his cabin to go east by the narrow foot-path to the Forest Department, or west by crossing the stream to head for the hills on fire patrol, he had to walk past Ace Hand's cabin. Brandishing a shovel and rake Wang cleared out another foot-path for himself and his family, a roundabout route of an extra hundred steps or so. Clearly this was the way things were going to be; Ace Hand had no choice but to accept it. Wang's status in Green Feather Hollow had now become unassailable, somewhat like that of an intrepid forest warlord of ancient times and he was equally intolerant of disobedience. Formerly Wang had seldom gone to Ace Hand's cabin, but now that his wife and two children dared not go there, he went every night to listen to Ace Hand's report on his day's activities. Obviously, he enjoyed the taste of power in making Ace Hand as submissive as one of the "Five Bad Elements."\fn{A note reads: Landlords, rich peasants, reactionaries, bad elements, and rightists.}

The inhabitant of the small cabin now resembled a snail drawn into its shell. Even the music which the black box played was now just barely heard. Ace Hand bowed the neck to this new grim reality and admitted defeat. Life at Green Feather Hollow returned to its previous sleepy, lonely existence.

*

The weather that winter was unusual. While there was heavy frost, it never snowed. The old people of the region said that this kind of dry winter would mean a dry spring. Every morning the innumerable acres of forest surrounding Green Feather Hollow were coated in frost. The broad-leafed evergreens looked as though they had silver strands draped over them. It was a white, snowy world before it dissolved each day with the noon-day sun. In the valley of the hollow the two cabins, one tall, one short, wore a crown of white jade every morning. The stream behind the cabins was lying frozen and gone was its past babbling sound.

On these dry, cold, frost-laden days, Qingqing would feed the pigs twice a day and cook two meals for the family. But as there were no chores for her to do outside, she got the old clothes out and did the mending work. Nowadays, it was her husband instead who took the children to the hills to play. Qingqing often sat at home beside the fireplace with a strip of cloth in her hand, sometimes as though in a trance for half the morning. Everyday Wang brought back a wild rabbit or badger. He would skin it first and nail it on the cabin wall. The meat dripping with fat would then be stewed in a large pot and its lovely smell would go for miles. Strangely, like a pregnant woman, Qingqing took only a tiny portion of the stewing meat and turned her head, nauseated. She felt as though a boulder had been weighing her down and below that rock were all the things of her life. Her husband beat her more often now. Her body was bruised black and purple. At night she would study her husband's expressions, watch his eyes, afraid even to breathe too loudly. During the beatings she would look on as his hands delivered their blows on her legs and her back, wherever the bruises would not show. Her eyes would change from moist to dry, dry to moist, and she wept at the bitterness of her life. She hated her husband's viciousness. She believed Ace Hand was the only one in the world who respected her, the only one who treated her like a human being. Her heavy-handed man treated her as if she were a criminal. Ace Hand and she were equally pitiful, she felt. But sometimes, too, she hated all that had happened. Why had he not gone anywhere else except Green Feather Hollow, only to disrupt her family life?

Oingqing was terrified every night when she crawled into bed and smelled the odor of her husband's sweat. Often she wept to herself silently in the pitch-dark, but little by little her despair turned to a desire to resist. Night after night when she came to bed she would stubbornly press her face against the wall as though it had been glued there. Even if her husband pulled and tugged she would not budge. Wang ground his teeth with hate and curse, as he said,

"I'd like to see you dead."

"Then let me die."

"Don't count on your luck. All you're thinking of is that young man."

"If you beat me, I'll shout. I'll shout."

"You slut!"

Unlike before, Oingqing now dared to fight back. She did not know why, but she realized somehow that he was very afraid Ace Hand would find out about her nightly abuse.

Life is lopsided; emotions defy logic. Oingqing knew she was changing though she was not sure whether it was for better or worse. One thing that was different this dry cold winter was that she now enjoyed dressing up. She loved to wear the silver Venetian head scarf and the rose colored felt jacket which in the past was lying on the bottom of the wooden chest. She kept her clothes fresh and clean, as though ready at any time to leave the hills for some visit. She also enjoyed filling the brass washbasin, which her mother had left her with clear stream water so that she could admire the reflection of her face. Several years ago she had asked her husband to buy her a mirror while he was on one of his trips to the Forest Department. Yet every time he came back empty handed, and merely said that he had forgotten. It occurred to her now that he had done this on purpose, afraid that she would see how her face shone like moonlight, how her eyes sparkled, how her lips glistened like red lotus petals freshly laden with dew, how lovely her dimples were when she laughed, and how lovely they disappeared when she did not. Who would not be attracted to such beauty? Was Ace Hand attracted to her?

Oh! How scandalous! Her heart was beating fast and her mind reeling. She pressed her hands to her burning cheeks and bowed her head. It was as though she had done something so horrible and shameful that she felt she could no longer face another soul. Actually, of late she had often found herself gazing out towards Ace Hand's radio, soap, and cream for the skin still seemed as miraculous as anything in the world. It seemed in fact as if a completely new world were enticing her … Li Xingfu! Ah what a lovely name, "Xingfu" (means happiness). But was that pale lanky young man really happy? Each day he used his only hand to chop firewood, wash his clothes, cook his food, afraid even to look at me. When he meets Wang Mutong he acts as if he were confronted with a tiger. How pitiful! Though she acted with the charming shyness of young Yao women, she did feel a gentle and soft compassion for Ace Hand.

At one time, Ace Hand came back from a trip to the Forest Department and brought with him two sweets wrapped in gold and silver foil for Little Tong and Little Qing. Little Qing thoughtfully broke off a piece and stuck it in her mother's mouth. Qingqing hugged the little girl tightly and kissed her on the lips again and again. She asked crazily, "Little Qing, does Mum's mouth smell funny?"

"No! No!"

"Does it smell sweet?"

"Sweet. Mum, your breath is always sweet!"

How silly! Just listen to what you were asking your daughter. She thought back to half a year ago when Ace Hand had just come to Green Feather Hollow, and his talk with Little Qing as he brushed his teeth early that one morning. Her face flushed. The sweet slowly melting in her mouth seemed to drip down straight into her heart, She looked again at her daughter's pink delicate face and saw her own sweet lips reflected there, This was something his powerful husband could not control or even notice, for if he could, surely he would beat her for it too.

One day while Wang was in the hills collecting firewood Qingqing took a bucket to the stream to fetch some water, Ace Hand was there washing his clothes in the bone-chilling water. His hands were frozen stiff and red. She put down her bucket, rolled up her sleeves, walked up to him, took the clothes from him and began to wash them herself. Flustered, he straightened up and then stepped back.

"Qingqing, you shouldn't have done this! If Wang Mutong saw—"

Qingqing replied without raising her head, "What's the matter? We're not doing anything wrong."

"I know that, but Wang might beat you."

Her hands stopped. She said nothing.

"Look, your arms are all bruised."

"Be quiet! Stupid, my hands are bruised from the pigs. running up against them in the pen." Her eyes were now filled with tears, but she stoically held them back. There was nowhere she could go to cry out loud, to feel better afterwards. She dunked the clothes two or three times, scrubbed them, and then got them out of the water, wrung them and dropped them into his galvanized steel pail. Without turning back her head she scooped up her own bucket and walked away, forgetting to fetch her water.

Back in the cabin, she fell against the back of the door. Her hands and feet were like jelly and her whole body seemed to be sapped of energy. Her heart, however, was thumping wildly as though it wanted to leap from her breast. She did not cry; in fact she almost felt like laughing. This was the first time in her life she had ever done anything with a young man behind her husband's back. Qingqing felt pleased long after her racing heart had subsided. When her husband came back from the mountains he was not suspicious. She had won her first battle.

*

The frost-laden drought continued into the new year. Many of the broad-leafed evergreens around Green Feather Hollow stood bare-limbed like starving old men with thin bony arms stretched towards heaven. A thick blanket of dry leaves lay on the mountain slope. Each time the frosty winds blew, fallen leaves of every shape and hue, like scraps of gold foil and jade pieces, filled the air with a rasping sound. Then they scattered pell-mell in their beautiful colors.

The long drought prevented Ace Hand from staying in his shell. Every morning he got out of bed before daybreak. Then with a hatchet hanging from his hip and the book Common Facts About Forest Fires tucked under his arm, he would go off to the hills on patrol. Several times he worked up enough courage to suggest to Wang Mutong that they ought to rake the dry leaves from the fire lanes. Wang paid no attention, of course, because he disliked him and so ignored all his proposals. He said that only he, Wang Mutong, was in charge of Green Feather Hollow, and so everyone else could just keep his suggestions to himself. But this time Ace Hand showed a certain stubbornness. As though he had had a premonition, he adopted a rigorous schedule of fire-watch patrols. He persuaded Qingqing to take Little Tong and Little Qing out to clear the dry scrub from around the cabins. He also read Common Facts About Forest Fires over and over again to Little Tong and Little Qing, actually, he read it to Qingqing and Wang Mutong.

One morning Wang Mutong heard Little Tong ask:

"Uncle Li, what does it mean to run into the headwind?"

"That means if a forest fire is coming, you must head for where it has already burned and run to that place for safety."

"Uncle Li, what if our cabins burn up too?"

"Then we'll run to the stream and stay in the water near the bank where there're no tall trees around."

"Bullshit! Such talk of nonsense!"

Wang Mutong refused to listen to any more of this. He cursed viciously, scaring away Little Tong, and then asked Ace Hand:

"Li Xingfu, what are you up to anyway? Are you planning to set a forest fire here at Green Feather Hollow? Why else are you plotting how to escape from one?"

Ace Hand was left speechless by the question.

"Lao Wang, floods and fires show mercy to no one," he replied.

"Are you telling me then we are going to have a forest fire here this winter?" Wang disdainfully snatched Common Facts About Forest Fires from out of his hand. Although he could not read a single word, he flipped through it as if he were doing something beneath his dignity. Then he flung it back to Ace Hand and said:

"This is probably one of the books by those fortune tellers who try to predict the future."

"Lao Wang, this drought has lasted an awfully long time. The whole mountain is covered with dry leaves now, and every night the radio broadcasts …"

He didn't know why but Ace Hand always felt ashamed when he stood in front of Wang Mutong, looking like a pale weakling.

On hearing him mention the radio broadcast, Wang began to chuckle coldly. He interrupted to ask:

"Has that black box of yours been singing any more of those moaning love songs lately?"

Ace Hand did not know how to take his remark. But he kept a straight face and said:

"Lao Wang, I have a suggestion. I'd like you to report to the District Headquarters for me. Ask hem to send someone out to repair the telephone line immediately. If by any chance something did happen, some sort of emergency, we need a way of contacting the outside world."

"If you want to make a report, just go to headquarters yourself and do it there. I'll give you two days leave! While you're there why don't you find out if they can send a whole brigade to stay up here too!"

Wang Mutong gave Ace Hand a deriding sidelong glance and casually yawned.

"I'm bragging, but I've been living at Green Feather Hollow over twenty years. I guess I know something about forest fires!"

That night, as usual, Wang Mutong went to Ace Hand's cabin after dinner. What was surprising was that while in the past Wang always assumed a chiding manner as though he were lecturing one of the "Five Bad Elements," tonight he acted differently. He was unusually amiable.

"Comrade Li, when you're at the headquarters, will you do me a favor?" He took out a piece of white paper which he had brought along and asked Ace Hands to write for him a request to join the Party. Ace Hand was astonished. Wang Mutong put one of his fingers between his teeth and bit it till it began to bleed. Then he held his finger as though it were the pole of a banner. It was dripping with blood.

"Quick write this out for me: 'Esteemed and beloved Forest District Leader, I am writing you in my own blood this request to join the Party. I'm not educated. I am a country hick, but my heart is red. I will always do whatever the Party says.'"

Ace Hand was terribly frightened. He quickly found a writing brush and dipped it in the blood on Wang's finger as he wrote. He finished the request as fast as he could. Oh dear! He dared not look at that blood, and his whole body trembled, his clothes soaked through with sweat. Once the blood letter was written, Wang carefully folded it and stuck it into a pocket in the inner layer of his clothes. He did not trust Ace Hand after all. He would not let this politically unreliable person submit his sacred request to the District Headquarters.

The next morning, without even having bandaged his finger, Wang set fire to a new patch of land beside his garden because he wanted to clear another section of his private plot. He was a hard worker, and had already cleared about two thirds of an acre of land for vegetables. The district required only that he raise three pigs, cure the meat at the end of the year and turn it in. Whatever else he raised beyond that belonged to him. He paid no attention to any philosophy or "ism;" his belief in the Party was a belief in himself. He thought the Party should be composed of people just like him. He raked the dead branches and fallen leaves into big piles and then set them ablaze. Every year after winter he burned the area in this way to fertilize the fields; even though there was a drought this winter he would not think of breaking with tradition.

Ace Hand was petrified of Wang Mutong's burning of the brush during such a dry spell, yet he dared not say anything against his doing it. He could not sleep well at night, and he often had nightmares of a monstrous and bright conflagration, as magnificent as the clouds at sunset, racing along as swiftly as a river. For two nights he secretly climbed the mountain to cut a branch of a fir sapling. Then he stood on watch beside the heaps of ashes left by Wang Mutong's daytime burnings. He would stand there for most of the night. The winter wind assaulted his hands, feet and face and they were stinging with pain. Why did he guard these ashes? He had not written a blood letter requesting to join the Party. Even if he had, no one would believe what he was going to say about what he had seen. In the ashes he could see flames and sparks. All that was needed to start a forest fire was a few such small sparks falling on the leaf-covered mountain slope. Once started it would spread, consuming everything in its path. He should go back to the headquarters to make a report. First, ask them to send someone to repair the telephone line; second, request they send someone here to check up on the work being done at Green Feather Hollow and convince Wang Mutong that he had to change his ways. He told his plans secretly to Pan Qingqing. These past few days her eyes were swollen and filled with tears, and she faced him with a bent head. She felt tender love, resentment and hate towards this pitiful young man. She always felt as if she had a world of things to say to him.

That afternoon as Ace Hand stood hunched over his oven preparing some food for his journey, Qingqing suddenly dashed into his small cabin! This was an open violation of her husband's severe month-old prohibition. Ace Hand bewildered, stood up. Qingqing appeared to have just come back from work outside. She was wearing only a flimsy blouse, which was too tight. The button beneath her collar had come open, half revealing a portion of her enticingly full, well-rounded breasts.

"Qingqing, what are you …" Ace Hand lowered his head. He was so alarmed he could not even finish his question.

"Idiot. Sometimes you're smart but sometimes you're so stupid. I'm not a mountain demon!" she said, because Ace Hand indeed looked utterly scared, as though he had just seen a ghost. Pan Qingqing felt more than ever a mother's tenderness towards him.

"Qingqing … you … you …"

"I've come to ask you to do me a favor when you go down to the headquarters."

Ace Hand pulled himself together, raised his head, and looked at Pan Qingqing.

"Here's 100 yuan. Please buy a radio just like yours for my family. Buy a mirror too, some soap and some of that skin cream. Also buy Little Tong and Little Qing those brushes that you brush your teeth with every morning. We'll set up a pole, at our place too, to put up an antenna."

Ace Hand gazed at Qingqing in amazement. This forest woman was really like a goddess of beauty. Her breasts were full, her limbs were well proportioned, and her body were healthy and strong. She was gentle and sweet, her body radiating an irrepressible youthful energy.

"Hey, what are you looking at me like that for? I'm as miserable as you are." Pan Qingqing piquedly turned sideways, her face blushing and her eyes lowered.

"Oh, yes, yes, Qingqing, I was ah … I ah …" Ace Hand temporarily lost his train of thought, as though he had discovered something glowing from Qingqing's body. In no time he awoke from his trance and said with a blushing face:

"If you spend all this money at once, aren't you afraid that Wang Mutong—"

Qingqing had been looking at him with an expression filled with joy. But when she heard him ask if she was "afraid of Wang Mutong," she felt as though he had sprinkled salt on the honeyed sugar in her heart.

"Afraid? I've been afraid for over ten years now. Every winter he catches animals, every spring he sells the skins, and all that money is added to a salary which neither one of us ever spends. Our cashbox is filled with ten yuan notes. He can't bring himself to spend it. He doesn't even know what to spend it on. No! I'm not afraid! The worst thing that could happen to me is that I might die."

As Pan Qingqing said this, her eyes were filled with tears.

"Qingqing, give me the money. I'll buy these things for you," said Ace Hand, his eyes now brimming with tears too. Don't cry. You've been wronged. I am worthless. I hate myself! Qingqing, please don't cry. If Wang Mutong came down from the mountain, and saw us now he'd beat you and curse me."

"Oh you, you are not a human being. The ivy which clings to my cabin has more strength than you!"

Qingqing glared at Ace Hand with resentment and hate. She turned and left.

"Qingqing, Qingqing!" Ace Hand ran to the doorway; he meant, unconsciously, to lift his arms to embrace what he desired, but his left empty shirt sleeve remained dangling at his side.

*

When Ace Hand reached the Forest Department, he found that people everywhere were writing slogans in large characters:

Oppose the Rightist Deviationists!

Criticize the Capitalist Elements Within the Party!

The cadres and workers in the tall office building of the headquarters were all shouting in confusion, running in and out of their offices. Ace Hand thought it would be most appropriate to make his report to Chairman Wang of the Political Section. After all, it was Wang who had sent him to Green Feather Hollow in the first place. He waited almost all morning beside the office door. When it was almost time for lunch he leaned in through the doorway.

"Eh? Li Xingfu? What are you doing back here?"

Chairman Wang, who had been preparing to leave, was standing before his desk. He patted his forehead and then placed his hands on his hips, but his attitude seemed pleasant enough. As best he could, Ace Hand hurriedly reported his suggestion that someone be sent to repair the telephone line.

"Fix the line that's been down these last 10 years!" Wang exclaimed, astonished at the very suggestion. "Is this Wang Mutong's proposal? Ah, so it is yours, after all! Li Xingfu, we rely on Wang Mutong to take care of things at Green Feather Hollow. Although he's not educated he is very reliable politically. He's been an exemplary forest guard for over ten years. It's not like we can just snap our fingers and have that telephone line fixed. That sort of thing requires money and materials, you know. Very soon now another political campaign will be underway. We've got to call on everyone in the country to oppose the Rightist deviationists. This is our most important task at the moment. Do you understand?"

Ace Hand then proposed that the headquarters send someone to Green Feather Hollow to investigate the fire prevention work there. He reported, too, how Wang Mutong had been burning fields during the dry season. He began to fear that Wang was impatient because he wanted to go to lunch.

"Hmmm, Li Xingfu, it seems you've made some improvement since I saw you last."

Again, Wang appeared to be surprised, but as he went on his expression turned severe.

"However, let me make this clear: we here at the headquarters have complete trust in Wang Mutong! While you are stationed at Green Feather Hollow, you are to follow his orders, learn from him and be reformed by him. Don't try any more of these tricks. I understand that Wang's wife is young and pretty; don't do anything you shouldn't or you might lose your other arm, too. You're still young, and you've got a future ahead of you. Behave accordingly!"

So that was that. Not only was Ace Hand unable to make a full report, but he was also given a stern reprimand. Obviously, the leaders did not trust him. He felt as though all that talk had gone for naught. He was like a sore-ridden mongrel, driven from place to place, kicked and beaten by everyone along the way. He spent the next two days walking by himself along the main street between the supplies cooperative and the plant nursery. He hated his parents for having urged him to be schooled; he hated the fact that he could not be transformed back into an illiterate, foolish hick so he might join the ranks of Wang Mutong and that sort. These days no one felt that education was worth it; on the contrary, nowadays wherever you went people believed that knowledge was the cause of reactionary tendencies, and that only people like Wang Mutong could carry on the revolution.

Eventually, he thought of Green Feather Hollow, of Qingqing, Little Tong and Little Qing. At least there, in that little secluded place, cut off from all the world, were three people who did not look down on him, who believed in him. At the thought of this, Ace Hand seemed to come back to his senses. He bought two months supply of oil, salt and rice at the grain store. Then he went to the cooperative and bought Qingqing a transistor radio, soap, skin cream, toothbrushes and a big round mirror with a loop on the back. Finally, he went to the grocery store and bought two jin of steamed buns. Early the next morning, carrying the load with a bamboo pole slung across his shoulder, he started off for Green Feather Hollow.

When he got to Black Mountain Valley, the sun was already setting in the west. Just one more ridge and he would be at the hollow. He would be safe and sound in his cabin before it was completely dark. Then he saw some black smoke wafted over from the hollow by the breeze. Was Wang Mutong still burning clear some fields? Why was there so much smoke? He was already exhausted but he did not stop to rest. He wanted to get to the mountain pass quickly to have a clear view. As he became more anxious his legs became heavier. A horrifying thought was creeping into his mind. Just before he reached the pass, he could smell the smoke carried over from the other side of the mountain and hear the cracking and roaring sounds of fire!

Good heavens, Green Feather Hollow was not burning, was it? But where else could this smoke and roaring sound have been from? The sky, slowly darkening now, glowed red above the mountains; was it the setting sun? The evening clouds? Or was it the raging flames of a forest fire?

He raced up the mountain, his entire body dripping with hot sweat. Beads of perspiration the size of finger tips clung to his forehead. It was as if some spirit had been pulling him towards the mountain pass. Soon a raging fire which filled the valley with its incarnating light dazzled his eyes. He nearly fainted. Green Feather Hollow! Heavens! Green Feather Hollow was a sea of flames! The mountain winds stoked the fire, whose tongues of flames resembled thousands of giant centipedes stretching out and up along the mountain ridge, cruelly, wantonly leaping upward. The valley was filled with wave after wave of billowing smoke; the roaring fire surged ahead. Trees centuries old were burned entirely, their trunks looking like giant torches. The scorched cliff crumbled with booms like land mines. From out of the clouds of smoke shot flaming red arrowheads, which flew like dancing crimson snakes in the scorching blasts of air.

"Qingqing! Little Tong, Little Qing!"

Ace Hand dropped his bamboo pole at the pass. Shouting, he ran down into the flame-engulfed valley. Though faced with imminent danger he could not leave behind Qingqing, nor the children. They were the only three friends he had. He ran ahead recklessly. Amazingly he did not stumble. Soon he ran into the clouds of chokingly thick smoke, where he saw a raggedly dressed woman with disheveled hair and dirty face climbing towards him.

"Qingqing! What's happened! Are you all right?"

Ace Hand called to her ecstatically when he realized it was Pan Qingqing. When she saw him her two hands reached out in a plea for help before she collapsed to the ground. He dashed to her side. Half kneeling, half squatting he embraced her.

"Qingqing, Qingqing. It's me, Li Xingfu."

Ace Hand's throat was dry, his voice hoarse; he cried as he spoke to her. It took almost ten minutes before she regained consciousness. When she opened her eyes she murmured:

"You, you. I always thought I'd see you …"

Then she laid her head on his chest and sobbed.

"Oingqing, don't cry, don't cry. Tell me how the fire started."

"Let's go. Help me up," Pan Oingqing said as she struggled to her feet, and then tried to stagger up the mountain slope. Ace Hand jumped to help her, only to hear her say:

"That damned heartless bastard! That same day you left for the headquarters he discovered our cashbox was 100 yuan short. He accused me of stealing the money to give it to you. No matter what I said he wouldn't believe me. He beat me about the head and chest. He beat me till there wasn't a part of me that wasn't black and blue. Damn him. Then he locked me up in your little cabin. For three days and nights he gave me not so much as a sip of water. I spent all last night using my fingers to scratch and twist free one of the boards. Then I ran to the stream to drink and saw the forest was burning … those fires he started … burning … burning all the wild things of the mountain."

"And Little Qing, Little Tong?"

"That bastard! After the fire started, he took the cashbox and led Little Qing and Little Tong along the stream and out of the valley. That is the way you told him."

Pan Oingqing's body sank weakly against his shoulder, but she did not cry any more. Instead, she began to comb her hair, and even reached out to brush back a sweat-drenched lock of hair from his forehead.

Ace Hand was terribly frightened by this immense disaster. They climbed up to the pass to find the bamboo pole he had dropped earlier. Once there; he remembered that he still had two jin of buns in his pocket and a flask of cold water. He quickly brought them out and gave them to Oingqing to eat.

Qingqing was starving. She devoured each bun in only three or four bites. After consuming four of them, Ace Hand gave her some water. Qingqing leaned against his chest again and rested. Ace Hand hugged her tight as he stared blankly into the raging fire below. He suddenly remembered that behind the mountain opposite was Lovers' Hollow. There in that hollow was a beautiful stand of cliff fir and golden forest lotus. He had heard the nursery specialists talk of it. The age of these two kinds of trees dated back to the time of the ice ages. They were living fossils that existed on the brink of extinction. His heart brightened, he said to her:

"Qingqing, the fire has only burned part way up the mountain slope. Let's circle around to the opposite side, to the fire lane that protects that mountain ridge. If we can save the trees at Lovers' Hollow, someday, if we're ever able to make our way back to the headquarters, we'll have something to say for ourselves." Yet having said this, Ace Hand looked back upon the narrow foot-path that led to the headquarters with eyes that clearly said this was his final farewell.

"I'll go with you. No matter where you go, I'll follow." The food and short nap had revived this strong young Yao woman.

*

The forest fire at Green Feather Hollow was spotted by a P.L.A. radar post 100 kilometers away. The post immediately telephoned the Misty Border Mountain District Headquarters. The Forest Department leaders ordered a brigade of men with horses to go into the mountains to fight the fire. Unfortunately most of the valley's evergreens had already burned, leaving behind naked black charred trees which looked like gangs of demon prisoners who had managed to escape from Hell.

Seven days later Wang Mutong returned to the headquarters with his two children and carrying a wooden box. No one knew where or how they had survived the catastrophe. He did not know what had happened to Pan Qingqing or Li Xingfu. With tears streaming down his face, he confirmed that "the fire" had been set by Pan Qingqing and her adulterous lover, Ace Hand. It had nothing to do with the fires he had set to clear the fields. For over ten years he had been a model forest guard. To vindicate himself further he presented to the Headquarters Party Committee his blood written request to join the Party.

Naturally the district leaders believed his sobbing report. They sent some civilian militia to Green Feather Hollow to track down and arrest the two lovers. During their few days in the ash-covered mountain spot the militia found only the charred remains of some wild animals. No one knew if Pan Qingqing and Li Xingfu were still alive.

Meanwhile the district, as everywhere else, was caught up in a class struggle that was to decide the fate of the nation. In order not to impede the progress of the "Oppose the Rightist Deviationists" movement the civilian militia filed a report according to the custom of that time which announced:

"The fire started by class enemies was extinguished in time by the revolutionary cadres and masses …"

And that was that.

Wang Mutong refused to go back to Green Feather Hollow under any circumstances. Fortunately, the headquarters had just received an urgent message from Heaven's Gate Cave, a forest area on the border of Guangdong and Guangxi provinces, that an old forest guard had died of illness. The district leaders sent Wang Mutong and his two children there to take up the post and continue his difficult, wild, self-reliant way of life. It is said that that year Wang Mutong married a Guangxi widow. He resumed his old habits of going to bed at sundown, and working arduously. As luck would have it, she also had two children, one boy and one girl. Both of them hoped that they would make perfect future partners for Little Qing and Little Tong. So a new generation was reared at the old cabin of Heaven's Gate Cave.

After the fall of the treacherous Gang of Four, many people in the District Headquarters maintained that Pan Qingqing and Li Xingfu might still be alive somewhere deep in the forest, leading a very different sort of life. Other people surmised that once the nation had redressed all the wrongs suffered by those who had been unfairly treated, perhaps Pan Qingqing and Li Xingfu might suddenly walk hand in hand into the headquarters to ask for their just pardons.

Impossible? Even the naked black-charred trees which were not completely burned that year in the fire of Green Feather Hollow, have now put forth buds these past two years and their branches have been covered with new leaves.

82.57 The Twilight Years\fn{by Ching Chi aka Chu Li-li (1942-)} Hupei Province, China (F) 6

That winter afternoon when Mr. Ch'en moved into the Garden of Peace, the place was a bedlam. First, we were trying to find the reading glasses of forgetful Mrs. Niu; then we had to pacify Mrs. Li who was clamoring to go home with her family. We also found a large pile of underpants in the drawers of Mrs. Wu who was addicted to stealing. At a time like this, Mr. Ch'en walked in with his son. He held his head up high, his lips pouting, and refused to say a word. Later, even when his son said goodbye to him, he ignored him. It was then that Mama Wu, who had been working here for years, made a prediction:

Just wait and see—this is a trouble-maker!\fn{The text has: trouble-marker.}

Located in Southern California, Garden of Peace was a retirement home specifically designed for Chinese people. The old folks living there must be mobile, able to go to the bathroom by themselves, and not be bedridden so as to require care twenty-four hours a day. The place provided Chinese food; all those on the staff were also Chinese. There were several middle-aged women from mainland China without work permits. The director was a registered nurse. She was the nominal director, though, and rarely came. The actual administration was handled by me. I had been working there for over a year; but the staff did not take me too seriously because they were all my senior in age.

Mr. Ch'en's son said to us apologetically: "If there were any other way, who would send his father to a retirement home? My father has always had a hot temper and since my mother passed away, we simply don't know what to do with him. Both my wife and I work during the day, our kids are teenagers and don't speak Chinese, and there aren't many Chinese where we live. He's by himself all day long and must feel very lonely. His hearing is poor, but he does not want to wear a hearing aid, which has caused many misunderstandings between him and my wife. She says he is playing dumb just to slight her. His eyes aren't very good either, and he is also forgetful. Sometimes he leaves something on the stove and then forgets about it. Last time, he almost got the house burned down. It was the neighbor who saw the smoke and pulled him out of the house. It's just not safe for him to be home alone …"

Mr. Ch'en was eighty-five years old, with deep wrinkles like tire tracks all over his square face. I told him about the establishment as I helped him put his belongings away in his room. He sighed and, with a heavy Shantung accent, declared loudly:

"It's meaningless when you're old. Even your own son doesn't want you any more. You've spent your whole life rearing him, and this is what you get!"

Although hoary, his voice was sonorous. Coming from the dried, bent torso, it gave me a strange feeling, as if he had been a big tall man to begin with, but somehow had been shrunk and only his voice was left intact.

Early next morning, there was some hub-bub in the dining hall. I went inside and found Mr. Ch'en arguing loudly with Mama Wu. When I finally managed to calm everyone down, I inquired about the cause of the argument. It turned out that Mr. Ch'en thought the scrambled eggs were too salty, so Mama Wu said she would get him something else. But Mr. Ch'en did not hear her, so the brawl broke out and grew louder and louder. At this moment, Mrs. Wang walked over, limping as she dragged her severely arthritic feet, and handed Mr. Ch'en a dish of eggs, saying:

"Try my scrambled eggs. See if you like them!"

Keeping his hands off the dish, Mr. Ch'en goggled at Mrs. Wang: "Why would anybody hire a cook as old as you?"

Unoffended, Mrs. Wang smiled: "I'm not a cook. I'm a resident too. Sometimes I help out in the kitchen. It's fun!"

Then Mr. Ch'en thanked her and dug into the eggs.

Seeing that the situation was under control, I decided to chat a bit with Mr. Ch'en: "If your hearing is poor, why don't you wear a hearing aid?"

"Those of you who have good ears don't understand. People are funny; when I wear the hearing aid, they all shout at me at the top of their lungs, for fear that I can't hear them. It almost explodes my head. But if I don't wear the hearing aid, everybody whispers like a mosquito."

"That's easy. You can wear it but don't turn it on." I thought I had come up with a brilliant idea.

"But 'm advanced in years. Often I can't remember whether I have it on or not, even when I do have it on. This foreign gadget, I just can't figure it out!"

We all burst out laughing. Mr. Ch'en then added: "Actually, being deaf has one advantage. Whenever I don't want to hear something, I just pretend I can't hear it. Nobody can do anything about that."

As he spoke, there was a gleam of playfulness in his eyes. He was no longer an eighty-five year old man. I thought this gentleman from North China was outspoken and likable; his presence added a touch of life to the Garden of Peace.

During the time I worked here, sometimes I felt really depressed. Most of the old people were glum and gloomy; besides eating and sleeping, all they did everyday was stare blankly at the television screen. They had no interest in anything else, as if they had one foot in the coffin already. But this kind of resident was ideal for the staff; those who were lively were considered troublesome. There did not seem to me to be a hard and fast line between life and death. Death is constantly near us, a conspiracy that we inherited the minute we were born. Every minute it erodes us without our knowing it. Long before we lie down in the casket, we die bit by bit, our life evaporating, little by little, like water. Working among those old folks, I was acutely aware of the silent procession of death. I could not understand why their families were so stingy with their visits. Why didn't they come more often to share those few moments while the old people were still conscious? Why did they only make a grand show of mourning after their deaths? If we spent more happy times together while they were still alive, there was really no need to mourn when death came.

At their ripe age, the old folks' personalities were fossilized and each stood out distinctly.

For instance, the eighty-year-old Mrs. Chao was fastidious about everything. She felt that if she did not watch out, people would take advantage of her. From the steamed buns for breakfast to toilet paper in her bathroom, her first words were always: "How come I have less?"

And then there was Miss Ch'en. This old maid's favorite word was "no." In private, we joked about it, saying when men courted her in her youth, she must have said "no" too many times: "no" to those who asked her out on a date, "no" to those who wanted to kiss her, and "no" to those who proposed to her. That's why she remained single all her life.

Seventy-two-year-old Mrs. Niu was relatively young, but her memory was virtually gone. She spent all day looking for her glasses or handkerchief. One day she couldn't find her dentures. The entire staff searched the place inside and out then finally they found them in her toilet. As to how the dentures got into the toilet, whether Mrs. Niu mistook it for the wash sink, we would never know, and we only regarded it as one of the many puzzles in the Garden of Peace. Sometimes, Mrs. Niu did not even remember her own name or where she was. Her language skills were regressing too. She probably had Alzheimer's Disease. If it got any worse, we would not be able to take care of her since she would have to go to a retirement home that provided twenty-four-hour's care.

And then there was Mrs. Ch'ien who complained about this ache or that all day long. If you asked her how she was doing, she would pour out to you all her aches and pains. Although she sighed as she talked about those symptoms that changed with each conversation, there was a touch of show-off, as if she alone had an especially pampered body to be inflicted with illnesses that ordinary people were immune to.

Mrs. Wu, on the other hand, was a cold, quiet, mouse-like woman. She liked to steal little things like steamed buns, soy sauce, peanuts, even other people's clothes, and stack them in her room. Every time Mrs. Niu lost something, we would sneak into Mrs. Wu's room when she was not there to search around. Usually, we discovered a large number of stolen goods. It was a good thing that Mrs. Wu only stole but did not keep track in putting them together. She never noticed that things were taken away from her.

Here, the women made up the majority of the population. Obviously, women live longer than men. There were only two couples. So it seems that when newly weds pledge "till death do we part," the probability ratio is quite low. As to the two couples, one of them never spoke. to each other; though they slept in the same room, they were like total strangers. The other couple were just the opposite. They argued all day long; not only did they bicker endlessly, they also dragged in a third-party to be the judge. It seems "till death do we part" is not necessarily desirable either.

The eighty-year-old Mrs. Wang was my favorite. Her hair was so sparse that it looked like cotton lint that would blow away in the wind any time. She was soft-spoken, with a feminine Soochow accent. She had severe arthritis; her fingers were swollen, her back bent over, her movement slow. She had to take several pain-killers each day; sometimes the pain got so bad that she could not get out of her bed. But she seldom complained and always treated people kindly. When we were busy, she would come and help, such as setting the table or washing up in the kitchen. Although some staff members thought she got in the way and complained to me in private, I always felt that work was therapeutic too. When a person ceased working, he or she became useless and grew old fast. So I hesitated to stop her.

Mr. Ch'en was the only bachelor in those days. His health was robust, his spirit pretty good too. Soon he got used to the life here. I think his speedy adjustment to the Garden of Peace had much to do with Mrs. Wang. Since that "Scrambled Eggs Incident," they became good friends. Each morning, Mr. Ch'en would wait for Mrs. Wang in the dining hall to have breakfast together. They went everywhere together, watched TV together, took a walk together. Each evening, Mr. Ch'en would see Mrs. Wang back to her room like a gentleman. Nobody understood how they could have so much to talk about. They chatted softly all day long, his Shan-tung accent intermixed with her Soochow accent, attracting much attention.

The staff made fun of them, saying:

"Mr. Ch'en, you got a girlfriend!"

"How loving a couple you are!"

Mrs. Wang only smiled shyly, while Mr. Ch'en would laugh heartily. He could hear everything now as he wore the hearing aid every day, never once forgetting it.

Behind their backs, Mama Chang and Mama Wu said: "Look at Mr. Ch'en. An old man with a young man's heart. Who knows what he's up to!"

When spring came, evergreen Southern California was adorned with flowers everywhere. The garden in our establishment was blooming gloriously. Each morning Mr. Ch'en got up early and practiced T'ai-chi before breakfast. He said he had not done it for years and couldn't remember it very well. Some of the early-risers who saw him making the shaky moves would join him. With a bent back, Mrs. Wang followed stiffly but diligently at his side. From the beginning, she was his most loyal student. On a whim, Mr. Ch'en called his son for his writing brush and ink stand and started practicing calligraphy in the dining hall. His handwriting was shaky too, just like his T'ai-chi.

"It's meaningless when you are old," had become his catch-phrase. "When I was younger, I was known for the slender Gold style. Now my hands no longer take orders from me."

Then he guffawed:

"All my life, I don't know how to write English. Look at my calligraphy; these curves and twists, don't they look like English?"

Like a child, he got his face and clothes all dirty. Once he even knocked over the ink stand and spilled all the ink on the floor. Sister Liu who was in charge of house cleaning was displeased and almost threatened to quit. So I had to forbid him from practicing calligraphy.

Without calligraphy, Mr. Ch'en spent the whole day with Mrs. Wang, taking a walk hand in hand and chatting, or sitting close together on the sofa and watching TV. For quite a while, Mrs. Wang had not had a fit of arthritis, her bent back also seemed straightened. Mr. Ch'en was all smiles; no longer did he complain about being abandoned by his son and waiting to die. I was happy, too, for that rare feeling of spring in the Garden of Peace.

Little did I expect the reactions of Mr. Ch'en and Mrs. Wang's families.

It was a Saturday morning when Mrs. Wang's daughter came. Mr. Ch'en and Mrs. Wang were taking a walk hand in hand in the backyard. Mrs. Wang's daughter was shocked by the sight and her face changed color. Without greeting Mr. Ch'en, she took her mother out. When they came back in the afternoon, both were wordless, with ice-cold faces. Mrs. Wang's daughter sought me out to talk to me alone.

"Who's that old man?" She was a middle-aged career woman working in real estate, with a very sharp face.

"What old man?" Sensing her anger, I played dumb.

"That—that man who held my mother's hand," she spit those words out with difficulty, as if saying them made her lose face.

"Ah! You mean Mr. Ch'en! He's been here for three months. He used to be a military man, has taught in Taiwan, he's a nice old man."

"I think he's up to something, who knows what." So saying, she grew angrier: "You make it clear to him he can't take advantage of my mother. My mother is old, she can't think and can be easily fooled. As her daughter, I can't let her be taken advantage of—"

"What advantage are you thinking of? Two old people make friends, keep each other company—"

I was interrupted before I could finish: "Which room does he stay in? How far is it from my mother's room? Your rooms have no locks. I think this old guy is no good. Let me tell you, I put my mother in your care. If something happens, you'll be held responsible."

She stormed out in anger. She obviously meant it, for the next day I got a phone call from the director, saying that we must not allow men to enter women's rooms, that Mrs. Wang's daughter threatened to get her lawyer on our case, and that we must be very careful.

Two weeks later, Mr. Ch'en's son came to visit him; it so happened that Mr. Ch'en and Mrs. Wang were nestled on the sofa watching TV. Later, Mr. Ch'en spoke alone with his son, but both raised their voices so high that everybody could hear them. His son accused him of losing his head and shamelessly falling for another woman. Mr. Ch'en said,

"I am your father, not your son. You abandon me here. With no kin, no friends, why can't I make new friends?" The son rebutted:

"I'm doing it for your own good. I want you to live a quiet, relaxed life here. But you've only been here a little while and already you've picked up a woman. How shameful of you! How could you face Mother in the underworld?"

"In what way am I wronging your mother? If she knew I had someone to keep me company, she would be relieved in her grave."

"You have totally lost your head!"

They broke up in bitterness.

For days Mr. Ch'en stayed solitary, practicing T'ai-chi with a straight face and not minding anybody. Finally, he probably could not stand it himself, so he came to me to talk.

"It's meaningless when you are old! You're not yet dead, but you are not treated like someone alive any more. My children wanted me to emigrate to the United States, so I sold my real estate in Taiwan, cut off all contact with my friends and relatives there, and moved here. I can't speak English, so I'm mute. I can't drive, so I can't go anywhere. Furthermore, my sight has gotten blurry and my hearing poor. Living in a retirement home, I'm not even treated like a human being. Why don't I just sit here and wait for death to come? This way, I won't make my children lose face."

Mr. Ch'en was crestfallen for a long time and was not seen with Mrs. Wang. All by himself, he stopped wearing the hearing aid. Those staff members who were keen on following the story predicted that Mr. Ch'eng was finally settling down.

He came to talk to me again:

"It's meaningless when you are old! I just don't get it. I don't have many days left; why can't I do the things I want to do? Why can't I spend my last days happily? Abandoned here by my children, why do I still have to listen to them?"

Not knowing how to comfort him, I kept quiet and listened.

"Miss Lin, you young people don't understand how we feel. Each night when I lie in bed, I watch the night and count the minutes. I know I am getting closer and closer to the end, but I can't stop myself from sliding into the bottomless darkness. How I'd like to lean on a warm body, a live human being, listening to a voice speaking. I want to know I'm still alive. Miss Lin, don't take me for a dirty old man. I'm eighty-five years old, I'm not interested in those things …"

Suddenly I was reminded of the director's instructions and became alert:

"Mr. Ch'en, you must never enter someone else's room at night. Do you understand that? Can you hear me? Otherwise, I'll lose my job. There is a regulation here that says only a married couple can sleep in the same bed."

"I was just saying that. I won't go into Mrs. Wang's room," he acknowledged having heard my words.

Lost in thought for quite some time, Mr. Ch'en suddenly raised his voice:

"Actually, what's wrong with my marrying Mrs. Wang? Once we are married, nobody would say anything about our holding hands or living together. Isn't that right?"

I was taken aback. An eighty-five-year-old man marrying an eighty-year-old woman. What a sensational headline! But then I thought, as long as they were willing and able, what was wrong with that?

"Yes! If you two want to get married, it will be wonderful to spend the last of life]'s journey together!"

Mr. Ch'en was all excited; he put on the hearing aid and went looking for Mrs. Wang. He talked loquaciously trying to persuade Mrs. Wang, but she was hesitant and kept declining gently. It was not until that summer when wisteria blossomed vivaciously that she said yes.

It became the biggest news in our establishment. In private, the staff treated it as a joke; even in front of the couple, they could not help making some cheeky remarks. Things like Mr. Ch'en's "old sword" was still sharp, or Mrs. Wang's "second spring" was here! Miss Liu from mainland China commented:

"I've never heard of anything like this! They are getting married at their age!"

I asked her if old people were cared for and respected by their children on the mainland.

"It depends. There are no retirement homes on the mainland, so children have to care for their parents. If the old folks can baby-sit or do house work, their children are willing to support them. Usually if the old people have a house or some savings, they live with their children. But some don't have anything and are too old to work. I have heard of many stories about old people being thrown out of the house by their children."

"Don't other people say anything?"

"Sure they do, but what does that do? If the children have the heart to abandon their parents, they won't care about what other people say."

"So it seems the mainland is no paradise for old people either."

"There is no paradise for old people anywhere. That's why I'm trying to save as much money as I can. If I have money, my children will be nice to me. There will be more problems for the future generations. With only one child per family, the child will have to support two parents; for a married couple, there are four to take care of."

When they heard about Mr. Ch'en's and Mrs. Wang's plan to get married, Mrs. Wang's daughter and son-in-law hurried over first. They took her out for a talk and brought her back. Mrs. Wang told me later that her daughter and son-in-law accused Mr. Ch'en of going after the family wealth and thought Mrs. Wang was muddle-headed and had fallen into his trap. They had already consulted their lawyer; if Mrs. Wang insisted on marrying Mr. Ch'en, there was nothing they could do. But they would take legal actions to cut off all financial ties with Mrs. Wang and would no longer be responsible for supporting her.

In less than two weeks, Mr. Ch'en's son and daughter-in- law, as well as his daughter and son-in-law living in the east, came too. His son-in-law was Caucasian. I wonder why Mr. Ch'en had never mentioned that. They sat in the living room and talked. Their voices were. so loud that everybody could hear them. Mr. Ch'en's son said that his father was too old and had lost his mind, and that he made them lose face; people laughed when they heard he was going to get married. He also said that his father was unfaithful to their deceased mother. To consider just one thing, did Mr. Ch'en still plan to be buried next to her in the future?

Mr. Ch'en got angry and said: "With your new education, how could you be so old fashioned? I did not think of it in the early days. Otherwise, I would have written a joint will with your mother, saying if I went first, your mother should look for happiness and remarry. If she went first, your mother would surely insist that I do the same."

Then the Caucasian son-in-law mumbled something in English before Mr. Ch'en's daughter turned around and said:

"Walter says both of you are old and your health is not very good. If one of you has any problem, you will have to move to a retirement home that provides all-day care. So even if you are married, you won't necessarily be together. Besides, now you receive social welfare for yourself and Mother. Once you get married, you will lose Mother's share. The cost here is exorbitant; with your own social welfare, it won't be enough. Mrs. Wang's situation is probably the same."

Afterwards, Mr. Ch'en confided in me:

"I thought since they left me here, they paid for the expenses. I didn't know it is the American government that's paying for me. I want to get married; not only are my children against it, even the American government is against it. What can I do? Really, it's meaningless when you are old."

So the marriage was called off. Peace returned to the establishment as in the past. Although Mr. Ch'en and Mrs. Wang still spent much time together, they had much less to say to each other and were not as close as before.

When fall arrived, the temperature rose and dropped capriciously. Many residents came down with a cold. For the average person, a cold is an ordinary thing; but for the old it is a big deal. The staff were busy like mad. In addition to routine duties, we had to attend to the patients so that their cold would not turn into pneumonia. Both Mr. Ch'en and Mrs. Wang fell ill.

By the time everybody got over the cold, Mrs. Wang was still sick. Everyday we took food into her room and fed her and helped her with going to the bathroom. I couldn't bear the sight of Mr. Ch'en waiting outside the door, so I called him in, had him wear a muffler, and let him keep her company. Since she came down with the cold, Mrs. Wang had begun to lose weight; she was petite to begin with, now she was all bones. Mr. Ch'en was saddened by the sight. Also out of thoughtfulness to the staff, he volunteered to feed Mrs. Wang, help her go to the bathroom, and do other chores. When I saw a gray-haired man feeding a gray-haired woman with a wobbly hand, I was deeply moved.

"I'm so sorry to let a man like you take care of me like this," her Soochow accent was also feeble.

"Why do you say that? I enjoy waiting on you. I've only come to realize it at my age. Men and women are equal; it's not that women should wait on men or men should wait on women. Serving someone comes from love within your heart. My wife waited on me all her life and I took it for granted; I even picked on her now and then. After a life of hard work, she left me and then I realized she did not owe me anything; it's me who owed her too much. I enjoy waiting on you; it's like waiting on my wife. Heaven is giving me this chance to repay her before I go."

Mrs. Wang never recovered. Though I hated to break up the couple and kept stalling, I had to notify Mrs. Wang's daughter in the end and have Mrs. Wang transferred out. Since he found out about the arrangement, Mr. Ch'en sat in her room all day long; they had nothing to say but only gazed at each other.

The day Mrs. Wang was to move out, Mama Wu came running to me early in the morning and said something was wrong. I rushed to Mrs. Wang's room and found Mr. Ch'en, in his daytime outfit, lying on the side of the bed, holding Mrs. Wang in his arms. I called the doctor right away. Dr. Michaelson arrived shortly and examined them. Then he said:

"They died of natural causes; there's no suspicion of homicide or suicide. The result of my initial examination is that the woman died of heart fatigue and the man died of a heart attack. She probably died earlier than he by a couple of hours. When he found her dead, it brought on the heart attack."

He asked me the names of the deceased and started filling out the death certificates: "Were they husband and wife?"

"No. They met each other here and fell in love. They were going to get married, but their children opposed it strongly, so they called it off."

Dr. Michaelson who had seen many deaths was apparently touched. As he looked at the bodies on the bed, he said slowly: "They are the modern day Romeo and Juliet! We have no control over our birth; to put death in our own hands is a rare blessing too."

As soon as the doctor left, the director came running in. When she heard that they had died of natural causes, she felt a little relieved. Then she turned to me and said:

"I remember I had told you not to let any man go into a woman's room. I need to talk to you later."

I knew this day would come; I would probably lose my job. But the funny thing was I really didn't care and felt no regret.

The director hurried us to move Mr. Ch'en's body into his own room so as to avoid trouble. We did not expect an old man to be so heavy; even three of us could not lift him. Finally we had to put him in a wheelchair which two of us pushed. Mama Wu was making sarcastic remarks like "To die under a flower is well worth it." Before she could finish it, though, I stopped her with a stern look in my eyes. Once in Mr. Ch'en's room, we had a hard time moving him onto the bed. Then we pulled up the blanket over him and smoothed it out. There was not a wrinkle on the blanket, so that when the filial children came, everything looked the way it was supposed to look and they could start mourning.

83.47 The Legend Of Koxinga\fn{by Wang Hsüan aka Wang Hsiao-lien (1942-)} Shantung Province, China (M) 3

The ship sailed farther and farther out to sea, and although the light fog blurred his vision somewhat, he could still see the red hankie that his wife was waving to him from the shore. It had all seemed like a dream, he suddenly felt, and today he was finally emerging from that dream, step by step.\fn{Koxinga [Cheng Ch'eng-kung is his Chinese name (1624-1662); the name "Koxinga" is a Dutch linguistic bastardization derived from his popular Chinese title (Kuo-hsing-yeh, "Lord of the Imperial Surname," recalling the Act conferring the Ming imperial surname on him in honor of his allegiance to their cause)] was a general of the Ming dynasty (though born in Hirado, Japan), who fought the Manchu from a base in Fukien Province throughout the 1650's, drove the Dutch from Taiwan in 1661 and occupied the island's southwestern portion. He established a formal Chinese government with his capital at T'ainan, and ruled his territory as a Ming enclave, but died on June 23, 1662, apparently a suicide. (T'ainan remained the capital of Taiwan until 1885, when the Japanese removed it to Taipei.) This story, however, is concerned with his father, Cheng Chih-lung, who gained a vast fortune through commerce and piracy.}

The ocean surrounding Hirado Isle was as calm as ever, and even the waves produced by the winds rose in undulating swells. This calm expanse of ocean reminded him of his wife, who was still standing on the shore waving a red hankie at him. She too was forever calm: calmly she kept her seaside vigil here at Senri Beach on Hirado Isle, and calmly she waited for his ship to return. Never in their eight years together had she pressed him to talk about what he did, and whenever he placed the loot from his pillages at her feet, never once had a look of happiness crossed her face. Every evening at dusk she walked down to the shore, bamboo basket and small shovel in hand, to dig for shellfish. Even on that recent occasion when he had led his comrades in a raid on Nagasaki and had been wounded in the left shoulder by a samurai guarding the city, he could detect no sign of alarm or concern in his wife's eyes, when he had returned all bloodied to Hirado. She didn't even ask him how he had been hurt, but had merely cleansed the wound calmly with a piece of white silk. After daubing on a healing ointment, she had simply picked up her bamboo basket and gone down to dig for shellfish, returning after a while with her catch, which she soaked in clear water, preparing the miso soup for the following day's breakfast.

It seemed to him that his understanding of everything had come to him in a flash, that the red hanky his wife was waving at him was none other than the piece of white silk that had been stained by his own blood. For a fleeting moment a flicker of true understanding came to him, but it was quickly lost amidst his confused thoughts.

He was surprised to realize that the images of two pregnant women filled his heart at that moment; the wombs of his wife, who was standing there on the shore, and Yukiko, who lived in Nagasaki; both carried his offspring, and although he did not know when he would be able to set eyes upon his own children, he believed that it would be soon. He knew that he would be leading his warship back to Hirado Isle to fetch his son. He hoped that both of his children would be sons, imagining that they would someday grow up to be fine samurai, and that one would become the ruler of China, while the other would rule Japan. His reason for leading his followers in a raid on Nagasaki was to acquire a gift to celebrate the impending birth of his son—he wanted to present the city of Nagasaki as a gift to his son, so that he could become its ruler, and even though he failed on his first attempt, he was not disheartened-he knew that he would return to Nagasaki when next the winds rose.

"I do not want Nagasaki, nor do I want our son to be its ruler. I would prefer that he be a lowly fisherman, and not a samurai who battles his way across the land. A fisherman goes out to sea to fish at daybreak and returns at dusk; he can live a peaceful life with his woman, while a samurai must accept as his fate the need to kill and be killed. There has never been a samurai sword left unstained by the blood of men. All a samurai knows are his ambitions and his hatreds, and he is incapable of understanding the miseries and anxieties that are his legacy to the woman who loves him."

He thought back to that snowy morning when Yukiko had knelt in the genkan, holding his two swords in her uplifted hands as she saw him off; Yukiko—her name was Snow—with that red, bean-sized mole on her chest, standing in the snow dressed in a garment as white as snow.

He stood at the prow of the ship, unmoving, as he quietly listened to the gentle sound of his sleeves flapping in the wind; Senri Beach on Hirado Isle was now so far off in the distance that all he could see were the indistinct shapes of trees. From the sleeve of his kimono he took out a broken comb made from the bone of an ox. The scar from the break was as new. He did not know why his wife had chosen to give him this half of a comb that been broken in two. She had handed it to him under the lamplight on the previous night, without saying a word, and he had casually taken it from her and tucked it into the sleeve of his kimono.

The moonlight on the previous night had blanketed the ground like a layer of frost, and in that moonlight, his wife's pale face, framed by cascades of long black hair, had appeared more pale than usual. She had been sitting by the window quietly combing her long hair with this very comb. As he sat nearby drinking wine and gazing at the high cypress trees outside the window, he had said to her:

"Let us call our son Cheng Sen after the grove of trees, with the hope that he will grow into a pillar of a man as straight and powerful as the tall bamboo and the cypress, that he will become a pillar among pillars, a samurai among samurai."

His wife had quietly nodded her head, without missing a stroke as she combed her long hair. He had taken a dagger from his waistband and placed it beside his wife.

"Take this dagger and go pay a call on the feudal lord, the Hanshu of Hirado. He agreed to train our son to become a worthy samurai. You are to tell our son that he must never forget that he is the sole descendant of the 'Double Sword' Cheng clan from Ch'tianchou."

He had felt a sudden chill, as he watched his wife remove the dagger from its scabbard, then wipe the blade with a square piece of material she had taken from the bodice of her kimono. When she had finished, she had returned the dagger to its scabbard, then carefully knotted the cord attached to the handle. Once this was taken care of, she had picked up the comb and recommenced combing her long hair.

"And another thing: when the child is a month old, I want you to take some money to Nagasaki, where you are to give it to a geisha named Yukiko at the Cloud Skirt Geisha House. She too is carrying my child. If that child is a boy, he is to be called Tagawa Shichizaemon, so that he can carry on the line of Tagawa samurai."

The stillness had been broken by a crisp snap. He had seen that his wife was tightly grasping the broken half of a comb in her slightly trembling hand. Her face, pale in the moonlight, had seemed paler than it had ever been before. After his wife had wordlessly handed him the broken comb, she had picked the other half up off the tatami and slowly tucked it into her bodice.

*

Dusk, the sky turned to fire by the setting sun, the fire in the water, the water in the fire, the fog merging with the water and fire growing thicker and thicker, the fog-bound Hirado now more than a hundred li in the distance. A solitary wild goose flew past the ship's sail, its mournful cry lingering in the air behind it. He raised the broken comb in his hand and casually combed his hair, which had been blown loose by the wind, then tucked it back into the sleeve of his kimono. He recalled the day in that year long past when he had first set foot on the shore of Hirado Isle, a renegade who had stolen his way across the vast waters; it also had been at dusk on a foggy day. Now eight years had passed with the rising and falling tides. The memories of many past events suddenly filled his mind like the white fog that slowly covered the vast ocean.

After sailing across the stormy seas of the eastern coast of China, he had drifted to this tiny isle, where he had been plucked from the ocean by patrolling samurai and taken to the Hanshu. He had then realized that he was now no longer in China, that he had left Ch'üanchou behind him, and had arrived in a strange land. If he had not uttered the word "Deus"\fn{A note reads: Portuguese for "God."} just as they were about to execute him, he would long ago have become a ghost victimized by the Hanshu of Hirado. He had been spared by the Hanshu because he knew a foreign language and because he had been a Catholic; he was then ordered to be an interpreter during contacts with Westerners. A true friendship between him and the Hanshu had not developed until the second year after his arrival on Hirado Isle, when samurai from Setsuma had come to Hirado to do battle, and the defending samurai had been cut down one after the other. In order to repay the Hanshu for sparing his life, he had stood up to the enemy and, employing the "Double Sword" artistry of a member of the Ch'üanchou Cheng clan, single-handedly dispatched the Setsuma samurai. His martial skills had enhanced his position and reputation to the extent that he had become the sword-master of the 700 samurai under the control of the Hanshu, who had also become his matchmaker by securing his marriage to Tagawa Matsu, the daughter of the Tagawa elder Yokuo, in hopes that he would become a loyal follower.

Over the eight years that followed, his reputation as "the man from Tang whose 'Double Swords' know no peers" had been established via the spilt blood and sacrificed lives of countless wandering samurai from all quarters, but he and his wife knew what no one else knew, that for him those had been eight years of contradictions and inner struggle. Each time he had returned with his band of renegades from a raid on the southeast coast of China, bringing with him the spoils of his pillage, he had gone immediately to Nagasaki, where he had gone on a binge of several days. Meanwhile, his wife had never so much as glanced at the riches he had brought back; causing him a painful loss of self-respect. Although he considered himself to be a samurai of great renown, at the same time he felt that he was little more than an obedient puppy that had pledged its loyalty to its master, and in the service of this master preyed on its own kind. Never in all these years had he forgotten the words spoken to him by Yen Szu-ch'i during their first encounter on the open sea:

"Cheng Chih-lung, how can you call yourself a real man when you rob your own home with the help of Japanese pirates? If you have any guts, you'll come back to your own waters and make your way in the world."

Blackness had settled all around him, waves were crashing on the surface of the water, occasionally splashing their foam on him as he stood like a statue at the prow of the ship. He knew that he had sailed beyond the ever-placid waters of the bay surrounding Hirado Isle and had reached the coastal waters of China near his hometown of Ch'üanchou. He knew too that Yen Szu-ch'i was in nearby waters waiting for him, that his own countrymen were on Yen Szu-chi's ship waiting for him. He even knew that unlimited storms and an unlimited future were waiting for him not so very far away.

"I know that there is one thing that has caused you regret all these years, and that is that you have led my samurai to the shores of your homeland to rob and pillage your Chinese brethren. But did you know, Chili-lung, that something has caused me regret all these years too?"

The white-haired Hanshu of Hirado had looked straight at him with a threatening glare in his radiant eyes. Years of service had forced the other man into the habit of not looking directly into the Hanshu's radiant eyes. He had backed up slightly as he knelt before his lord and, with head bowed and eyes downcast, had quietly listened to what the Hanshu had to say.

"I regret not putting you to death. Truth to tell, I should have had you killed eight years ago when my samurai fished you out of the ocean."

"You can still order me to commit harakiri."\fn{Ritual disembowlment.}

"Ah, it is too late now. You are already full-fledged, and are no longer one of the creatures in my pond. I have grown old, and in my pond I can raise fish and shrimp, but not a dragon. A dragon belongs in the sea. But I hope you will remember that when you rule the waves you will not lead your samurai to my fiefdom to exact revenge. After you are gone, I will order my samurai to never again disrupt the peace of your homeland, so that an eternal bond of friendship can exist between us. I will keep your wife and child here with me for the time being. Since you lived in my fiefdom for eight years, I promise to match over them for eight more years. I will train your son to become a splendid samurai, and in eight years you may return to fetch your family and take them back to China with you. It is the destiny of all Chinese to someday return to the land of their birth."

He had raised his head to look at the white-haired Hanshu, suddenly feeling that the man kneeling ramrod-straight in front of him was no longer a ferocious lord, but an accomodating old man. The old man had reached out and taken down his own sword from the rack behind him, which he had then held out in front of him with both hands as he said:

"I have used this sword for sixty years. Once you leave, my samurai days will come to an end. All 1 will need is a dagger with which I can commit harakiri. Take this and open up your own world!"

As his thoughts reached this point, he stretched out his hand and held firmly onto the handle of the sword.

*

His eyes were completely bloodshot, his hair blew crazily in the wind as he stood like a fossil. He stood at the prow of the ship, unmoving, throughout the night.

A light fog covered the ocean as dawn broke. A flock of seagulls flew by looking for food. The sun began its skyward climb off on the horizon. He spotted a warship sailing toward him through the first rays of the morning sun; at the top of the mast flew a large banner with the single word Yen.

As soon as they made their rendezvous, Yen Szu-ch'i told him that the Manchu armies had already poured through the Great Wall at Shanhai Pass, and the situation was critical in the Eastern Ocean. He didn't know where he should sail his great warship. He responded by unsheathing his sword and pointing it southward:

"To Taiwan!"

At the very moment that he shouted the word Taiwan it seemed to him that he could hear the cries of a newborn child floating across the surface of the ocean from a great distance away. He instinctively thought of the shores of his Senri Beach on Hirado Isle. His son had been born, he thought to himself.

"What relationship does destiny hold for this child of mine and Taiwan?"

*

In the year 1624, Cheng Chili-lung led his warships to Taiwan; in that same year, his son Koxinga was born in Japan beneath an overhanging rock on the beach at Hirado Isle off the tip of the Matsuura Peninsula north of Nagasaki Prefecture.

The child born to Yukiko was also reared by Tagawa Matsu, and he was none other than Koxinga's brother, Tagawa Shichizaemon, whose descendants have remained in Nagasaki to the present day.

151.28 Trust\fn{by Chen Zhongshi (1942-)} "in a village near Sian," Shanxi Province, China (M) 5

A serious incident—a fight—had stirred every nook and cranny of Luocun\fn{Luo Village.} Brigade. The victim was Dashun, a member of the Youth League branch organization committee and son of Luo Mengtian, chairman of the Poor Peasant Association. The offender was Luo Hu, third son of Luo Kun, who had been branded a landlord in the Four Cleanups Campaign.\fn{The Four Cleanups Campaigns (1963-1966), also known as the Socialist Education Movement, was a national movement to clean things up in politics, the economy, organizations, and ideology.} Early this year he had been rehabilitated and reappointed brigade party secretary.

According to eyewitnesses at the scene—the well-drilling site—the whole thing was the result of sheer provocation on the part of Luo Hu. For some days past, Luo Hu and a few of the offspring of cadres who had been the targets of criticism during the Four Cleanups Campaign had gone about railing against those who had been active in the movement. Dashun, who had participated in the campaign, was quite aware of what they were driving at with their gibes. However, he just let them rail on, didn't say a word, and carried on with his work. Later in the day, during a break at the well-drilling site, Lou Hu and his gang got more worked up. They came out with the vilest, most unbearable language. Dashun, his face red with chagrin, couldn't stand it any longer and blurted out:

"Who are you cursing?" Luo Hu stood up:

"We're cursing whatever harmed people in the Four Cleanups Campaign."

Dashun, breathing heavily with anger, could not say a thing. Luo Hu strode up to him. He pointed at Dashun's red face and said even more brazenly,

"I'm cursing the one with the feverish face!"

"It's too uncivilized!" Dashun said, "Barbaric—"

Before he could finish his sentence, Lou Hu's fist had struck him heavily on the forehead. Dashun fell back a few steps, then steadied himself and came back at him. The two went at it. The other youths who had been behind Luo Hu all went up to them, pretending they were trying to break up the fight, but actually helping one side. Si

Long, the son of the brigade leader, took a firm grip of Dashun's right arm and someone else held back his left, allowing Luo Hu to punch and kick freely until a stream of blood shot from Dashun's face, and he fell to the ground, unconscious. That it had been a premeditated incident was only too obvious to eyewitnesses.

All at once, this affair became the chief topic of discussion all over the village. Relations between those that had participated in the Four Cleanups Campaign and those who had suffered in it became more tense than ever. A feeling of unease pervaded the streets of Luocun …

*

In the evening, after the spring rains, the mountains looked green, the water was pure, and the air was fresh. Patches of cloud floated at leisure; the ears of wheat were filling out, and the ripe pods were forming; the snow-white blossoms of the honey locusts on South Hillside exuded wafts of fragrance. At the bottom of the hill, by the mouth of the ravine, the party secretary Luo Kun and five or six commune members, whips in hand, were plowing the soft earth of the sweet potato field. Suddenly, Luo Kun's wife stumbled up the slope to the field in disarray, shouting in an unsteady voice:

"Quickly, it's terrible! …"

Luo Kun whoa'd the oxen, stuck the plow in the field, and rushed over.

"Something dreadful has happened!"

Luo Kun, greatly alarmed, asked, "What is it? Speak up!"

"Our third child and Dashun had a fight. Dashun … finished …"

"How is he now?"

"Carted off to hospital … no saying."

"Oh! …"

It was as though Luo Kun had been struck a blow on the head; his ears hummed. He stuck his whip in the earth and went down the slope, heading for the well-drilling site by the riverbed. As he walked, the tails of his shirt brushed the waist-high wheat and made a rustling noise.

At the work site, wooden staves, leather cord, picks, and shovels were strewn all about. A patch of young wheat nearby had been trampled. These were signs of the fight. Not a soul was to be seen; only the drilling frame loomed in the air.

From the temporary shelter made of rice straw where the tools were guarded at night, reckless words could be heard. Luo Kun turned to see: his third son Luo Hu was sitting there on a bed board with a few of his friends, playing cards. Luo Kun fixed his gaze on him and said:

"You had a fight with Dashun?"

His son answered, "Yeah."

"Had he insulted you?"

His son was unconcerned: "No."

"Then why did you fight?"

His son gave a full account of what had happened, without hiding his acts of provocation. He was quite willing to own up to what he had done. Luo Kun heard his son out with a stony face. Then he said with a sardonic smile,

"It was sheer provocation on your part. You sought to vent your rage on Dashun!"

His son rolled his head and blinked in silent acknowledgement. His air proclaimed to all—he wasn't scared. Luo Kun asked,

"Have you forgotten what I said to you at home?"

"Not at all!" his son replied. "During the Four Cleanups Campaign his father did us in good and proper. Now I'm no longer afraid of him! He—"

Luo Kun could bear it no longer. Hearing this, he raised one calloused hand and slapped it across his son's slightly flushed white face. His son ducked from the waist and turned his head to one side. Luo Kun turned and strode from the well-drilling site along the machine-plowed main road to the village in the dusk.

What a terrible business! It couldn't have come at a worse time. Luo Kun, with hands clasped behind his back, walked along the road laced with green grass. He just couldn't calm his feeling of frustration. During the Four Cleanups Campaign the old fellow, Poor Peasant Association Chairman Luo Mengtian, was someone the work team relied on. In the matter of branding Luo Kun a landlord, they had had the old man's seal of approval. During the ten years when he was an object of dictatorship, Luo Kun had hated Old Man Mengtian, thinking: You and I played together as kids; together we ran away from the press gang; we worked together in the land-reform and set up cooperatives. Don't you know me, Luo Kun, well enough? How could you put your seal to all that fabricated "evidence?" Feeling this way, he just didn't want to even speak to the old man.

But then, sometimes, he would think: When the high and mighty Four Cleanups Campaign work team showed up, how many could resist them?

Whereupon he would forgive him. But whether he hated him or forgave him had not mattered, for while he was an object of dictatorship, he had had no dealings with the old man. Then, this spring, his case had been cleared: he was taken back into the party. In elections in the party branch, he had been unanimously elected by party members to the highest position of leadership in Luocun Brigade. He had wept.

He had wanted to seek out Old Man Mengtian and have a talk with him, but he never succeeded. The exceptionally stubborn old man just would not talk with him. Not long before, Luo Kun had gone over to the old man's place, but his wife had claimed he was out, and had turned Luo Kun away. Not only was the old Poor Peasant Association on guard against him, but all those who during the Four Cleanups Campaign, under the "guidance" of the work teams, had criticized the cadres were now feeling guarded toward those who had resumed power.

And this is what troubled this party branch secretary, Luo Kun, most. After all, he thought, people are not of the same mind—and if everyone is on guard against everyone else, how can we promote production? How can we achieve mechanization? And precisely at the time when he was disturbed by the complexity of human relations in Luocun, his son had to go and get him into this terrible mess.

*

Luo Kun headed straight for Old Man Mengtian's place. As he stepped over the threshold, he braced himself for the worst; he was prepared to look upon the very worst face the old man could make and listen to the worst things he could say.

In the courtyard there was a bicycle, its carrier laden with a sack of rice, bread, tlothing, and the like, probably destined for the sick man. From the central room, a hubbub could be heard.

"Obviously trying to get his own back …"

"And his father had promised he'd 'forgive and forget!' What a lot of hot air!"

"Sue him! Take him to court. We can't go on like this …"

The voices were familiar: some of them belonged to a few who had been active in the Four Cleanups Campaign; the others were those of relatives of Mengtian.

Luo Kun paused. To go straight in would embarrass everyone. He stood in the yard and shouted,

"Brother Mengtian!"

The talking in the room stopped. Old Man Mengtian came out and stood on the steps, but did not come down. Luo Kun walked up to him and asked,

"How is Shunwa\fn{A dimunitive for Dashun.} doing?"

"Let him die and have done!" the old man countered angrily.

"But Brother, the child must be seen to at once!" Luo Kun continued, "Just so long as Shunwa is okay, the matter can be settled by the authorities right away—"

"Come off it!" Old Man Mengtian waved one arm. "First you strike with a hammer, then you stroke with your hand! Why bother pretending!"

So saying, he went down the steps, took his bike, and went out the gate.

Luo Kun stood there in the yard, feeling numb. The blood rushed to his face. He felt acutely uncomfortable, for he was a man of over sixty, an age that should be treated with a little dignity and respect! As he walked out the gate, he actually bumped into it.

He walked in his own door. The room was filled with people, men and women. Luo Kun swept his eye over the crowd and saw at a glance that those standing there were for the most part cadres like himself who had suffered "rectification" during the Four Cleanups Campaign—or their families. They were trying to allay his timid wife's fears:

"Don't be afraid! What if he did beat him up!"

"His father shouldn't have gone about doing people in in the Four Cleanups Campaign."

"To be honest, Old Man Mengtian has become a stinker!"

Call this patching things up? More like adding fuel to the flames! Luo Kun got quite fed up with their talk. Then he looked around and saw the brigade leader Luo Qingfa sitting there listening to all this kind of talk and feeling good about it! He tried talking to the brigade leader, but Luo Qingfa just poked fun at him, saying,

"So you went to make up with Old Man Mengtian, eh? I bet he just threw it straight back at you! My dear older brother, you are too timid! What a softie!"

Luo Kun sat on a wooden stump before the stove and would not so much as look at him. Recently, he had found quite a lot to resent in the brigade leader. As soon as he was appointed, he acquired for himself a nice plot of land in his own Third Team.\fn{A team is a collective unit of land and people.} This team had planned to build an electrically powered flour mill there, and so had turned down applications from several commune members. But when the brigade leader applied, the team leader was at a loss, and finally gave in. The kindhearted commune members felt that since the bridage leader had suffered wrongfully for several years, he ought to be given special consideration. And so it was passed. Soon afterward, the commune factory asked for a worker from the team, and it was the brigade leader's daughter who went. The commune members for the most part didn't object. This was also out of special consideration for him. Surely this was enough? But no, his son had to team up with Shunwa to beat people up and create a scene! After which, instead of sorting things out, he had rushed over to support and bolster Luo Kun's wife! Took him for a gold leaf, but find he's a copper shard, he thought to himself.

Luo Kun put a scowl on his face to show his coolness to the well-intentioned morale-boosters. Paying them no attention, he said to his wife:

"I want to take out fifty yuan."

"What for?" the wife asked.

"I'm going to the hospital."

The brigade leader was taken aback, stared, and then understood. Snorting in contempt, he jumped off the kang and left. The others in the room, sensing something was amiss, went off sheepishly. Luo Kun said to his young daughter cowering by the table,

"Go and get the party security representative and the Youth League secretary. Tell them to come right away!" His wife got money and grain coupons out of the chest and handed them to her husband.

"Look after yourself on the road." Luo Kun comforted his wife saying:

"Don't worry! You've nothing to fear either. No use worrying, anyway. You must carry on as usual: sleep when it's time to sleep; eat when it's time to eat."

The security representative and Youth League secretary hurried in. Luo Kun said,

"You two look into this business of today's fight and make a report of it to the local police station." The security representative said:

"Let's keep this matter in the brigrade. We can deal with it!"

"No! This must be left to the police! This is no ordinary brawl!" The Youth League secretary was about to say something, but Luo Kun turned to her and continued:

"You know your uncle\fn{The security representative.} is no good at writing! You'll give him a hand, won't you?"

So saying, he stood up, picked up the sack of bread his wife had got ready for him, pushed off on his bike, and left without even a look back. In the faint moonlight he rode off along the main road.

*

For a full five days the old party secretary sat by the sick bed, feeding Dashun and emptying his bed pan. The young man was so moved he shed tears. Old Man Mengtian sneered at all this:

"You're just putting on a show! Your son goes and practically beats someone to death, then you put on an act—all kindly and concerned, how two-faced!"

If Luo Kun ever sat down to chat with him, he would stiffly walk out of the sick ward. Later, when he saw his son act chummy with Luo Kun, showing no sign of the anger of the beaten, in his heart he cursed his son as a "spineless wretch." Spurred by anger, he got on his bike and simply went home.

With sadness, Dashun told Luo Kun how his father had been used by the Four Cleanups Campaign work team, which was out to get people. After the campaign, people in the village cursed him, and his father felt terrible. But he had an obstinate streak in him—he had made his bed and he would lie in it. On the matter of the Four Cleanups Campaign, if you discussed it with him calmly and nicely, he would admit he'd wronged some people. But if you cursed him, he would bristle,

"Why blame me? I didn't make anything up! I didn't organize the Four Cleanups Campaign! You say my seal was on it? Well, my head was not mine to shake! If anyone's been wronged, go to the work team!"

Luo Kun explained to the youth how Old Man Mengtian had suffered greatly during the old regime, was filled with love for socialism and for the party; if he had not withstood the pressure, it was not entirely his fault. Besides, the old man had always been a good worker, a pillar of the collective. . . .

On the seventh day, Dashun had his stitches out and was discharged from the hospital with a bandage around his head. Luo Kun insisted that the young man ride on the carrier of his bike, and the latter kept refusing. But Luo Kun said:

"Your wound won't stand any strain. The doctor said to rest!" So he carried him off.

"Uncle!" Dashun murmured from the back of the bike, a quiver in his voice: "When you get home, don't be hard on Huer.\fn{A pet name for Luo Hu.}

Luo Kun did not answer.

"All those years when you were being wronged, Huer also suffered. If any child got angry at him, they called him 'landlord' and made him feel inferior. I can see why he's angry …"

Luo Kun felt a sudden pang, and a lump constricted his throat. During the ten or more years when he had been branded a landlord element, all the hardship and humiliation that he and his family suffered—it didn't bear thinking about. The youth continued from behind his back,

"I've heard that my Dad and you, as well as Brigade Leader Uncle Qingfa, were all poor kids in the old society. After liberation, you carried out land reform together, organized cooperatives together, and were so close you were like one man. It is only with the turmoil of the past few years that things have come to such a wretched state. Even the children have become enemies!"

Luo Kun couldn't contain himself any longer. He felt two warm streams flow down either side of his nose and a salty taste in his mouth. How well put! Wasn't this precisely what he felt deep down? He just wanted to hug this darling youth and kiss him! He jumped off the bike and grabbed Dashun by the hand.

"My child, you're right!"

"I want to see Huer as soon as I get back. He may avoid me, but I'll seek him out!" the young man said. "We must put an end to this hatred!"

The two mounted the bicycle once more and, along the highway thickly lined with poplars, as though he'd been injected with some spiritual hormone, this man who was over sixty flew along on his bicycle, carrying a young man at his back.

The houses and trees of Luocun came into view.

*

When, pushing his bicycle, Luo Kun walked into the village side by side with Dashun, clusters of people deep in discussion were scattered here and there on the streets, and there was an unusual air about the place. A large crowd had gathered outside the brigade office. As they were passing the office, someone called him in.

In the office were seated the chief cadres of the brigade committee, as well as Old Jiang, the local police chief, and two policemen. The air was tense. Brigade Leader Qingfa, his hair bristling, was expressing his views:

"As for my view, I'm firmly against it! It would be too harsh a blow for the comrade recently reinstated! His father suffered wrongly for ten years!"

Luo Kun understood. He glanced at Qingfa and said,

"Comrade, the law is the law! It knows no one, takes no account of people's feelings!"

Luo Qingfa angrily broke off and turned his head to one side. Luo Kun said to Police Chief Jiang,

"Do it according to the book! That's not attacking me, it's supporting me in my work!"

Police Chief Jiang told Luo Kun that, with the approval of the security authorities, Luo Hu would be dealt with according to law: dentention for fifteen days. He had come to inform the brigade cadres and Brigade Leader Qingfa had staunchly opposed the sentence.

"Go on, put it into effect! There's nothing to say. The law knows no one!" Luo Kun said.

Some militia brought Luo Hu into the office. The young man stood with haughty visage, planted in front of the masses, quite fearless. Even when the police chief showed him the warrant for his arrest, he was still bolstered by a certain feeling, and was not at all afraid.

Qingfa let fall a great smack on his thigh and turned his head to the other side. The veins showed blue in his neck; they throbbed.

Luo Kun glanced at his son, turned away, and got out his pipe with slightly trembling hands.

At the precise moment when the militia pushed Huer out the door, the Poor Peasant Association Chairman, Old Man Mengtian, who had been sitting in the comer, eyes staring and mouth pouting, suddenly stood up, threw himself down on his knees in front of Luo Kun, and said weepingly:

"Brother, I have wronged you!"

Luo Kun quickly helped the old man up and settled him down on a bench. Then Old Man Mengtian threw himself in front of Police Chief Jiang and said tearfully,

"Please, Chief! Let Huer go. I … oh!"

At this, Dashun, standing by the door, began to weep, his arm around Huer's neck. Huer, looking at the white bandage on Dashun's head, let his eyelids droop; his nostrils pulsed quickly.

Huer broke away from Dashun's arm, turned back in the door, and stood in front of his father. Two shining tears rolled out,

"Dad, now I know why the people of Luocun support you."

So saying, he went out. The cadres of Luocun sat down once again in the office, smoking. No one said a word, yet no one would leave. The commune members gathered from the streets in front of the doors and windows of the office. They strained to gape at party Secretary Luo Kun—his dark, square face; the hair and stubble streaked with white; his sunken eye sockets. They gazed as though they had just come to know him.

Luo Kun sat there, looking at the brigade leader who had subsided and seemed slightly ashamed, and at the other cadres. He said,

"Comrades! The party rehabilitated me. Why? The commune members brought us back to power. Why? Think about it! What were relations like between cadres and commune members in Luocun during the cooperative movement? Or even during the three hard years?\fn{The Three Hard Years (1959-1961), right after the Great Leap orward, so-called because there was widespread famine.} When life was hard, how were relations then between cadres and masses in Luocun? You all know!

"These last ten years or more, Luocun has been torn asunder. Among cadres, among commune members, between cadres and commune members, it was here a clique, there a clique, here a faction, there a faction. How many trenches have been dug? If this matter is not cleared up, no one can sort out the mess in Luocun. You want to promote production? Achieve mechanization? Impossible when people's minds are not set on the task at hand and their energy is not focused on promoting production but on intrigue, on being suspicious, and on guarding against one another.

"Comrades! Our Luocun has suffered a serious internal injury. I believe that those who have made mistakes will gradually learn from them. We who have suffered 'rectification' should be big-hearted, and not pass this enmity on to the next generation.

"It hasn't been easy for Luocun to come this far. It hasn't been easy for us to come this far. I am over sixty. When it's time to hand things over to the next generation, we should not only hand over to them a prosperous Luocun, but also a united Luocun …"

Inside and outside the office, all was silent. Many, many people—cadres and commune members, men and women—had tears in their eyes. Through the glistening tears shone hope, trust.

188.38 Excerpt from The Chopsticks-Fork Principle: A Memoir And Manual\fn{by Cathy Bao Bean (1942-)}
Ningpo, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 10

I know the sun was shining that day in June, 1951, though I can only suppose how the four of us got to Teaneck, NJ—probably in the old '47 dark blue Chevy. The other clear memory I have was hearing the doorbell ring and, then, my mother calling me. Stepping aside, she pointed outside. There might have been a moving van parked by the curb, but I can't picture it now. Maybe it was still at the apartment in Elmwood Park, loading up the furniture that I also can't recollect. What I can bring back, standing against the background of our very own front lawn, were two big girls. Now more shy than when they mistakenly asked my mother if she could come out and play, they were waiting to see what size I would be. When seeing didn't help, one asked what grade I was in. I said the magic word,

"Fourth."

It couldn't have been better. Claire lived across the street from our first house, a compact split-level, with brick front and shutters, each flap decorated with a cutout in the shape of a shamrock. And Jan lived behind Claire, so their yards touctled cater-corner. I'm sure Jan had a front door, but it was the back one I got to know. During the warmer days, we'd careen in and out of the screened entryway. If it got too cool, we'd take a little longer to turn the handle of the solid inner door. By the end of that first summer, if someone had locked either, I would have landed in the hospital with a dislocated shoulder.

In Jan's house, we sprawled all over. We did what wasn't an option at mine—move chairs to build forts, cover the dining room table with paper dolls, dress up in curtains. Her parents, now Aunt Dorie and Uncle Herb to me, seemed to accept this sort of behavior as an inevitable consequence of having children. Except for my sister's and my rooms, our house was always neat, ready for guests. On the other hand, there was at Jan's house something that didn't exist at mine: places that were off-limits.

"See that?"

"What?"

“The box.” Looking on the floor of her father’s closet, I saw too many.
“Which one?”
“That one.”
“I see. What about it?”
“IT’s in there.” she whispered. Cued, I lowered my voice and body to match hers, “Really?”
“Yeah.”
“Wow.”

This was important. Used to playing hide-and-seek throughout her house, we generally stayed out of Uncle Herb and Aunt Dorie’s room. So being there at all demanded a respectful pause. But I could tell from my friend’s manner that she expected more. So, in silent reverence, we knelt before the shoe box.

As great as my awe was, I soon needed more of a reason to spend my time in an otherwise ordinary closet.
“Jan?”
“Yeah?”
“What’s in the box?”

The tips of her fingers reached out and carefully lifted the lid. Looking inside, I saw a gun. In this house-of-no-locks, in a town of no violence, in a country where If I Knew You Were Comin’ Id’ve Baked A Cake was a popular song, we watched the gun as we would observe creatures in the snake house at the zoo. The thing itself kept us from reaching out. The shoe box was more inviolate than the thick glass, the weapon even less susceptible to tampering than the giant python.

“Jan, why does your father have a gun?”
“He works for the F.B.I.”

That capped it. Not only did I have the best friend in the world but her father had fought Al Capone single-handed. Or close to.

*

Once again we crouched in silence, enveloping the revelation in an aura of quiet. That done, we tiptoed out of the room. Then hid our trail by thundering down the stairs and crashing out the door.

In the backyard, we flopped down on a patch of grass—evidence that it must have been a windy day when her neighbor sowed his seeds. If I was to take my turn, it had to be soon. A lot of being Best Friends is in the timing.

“Guess what?” I began.
“What, Cath?”
“I’ve got a sister.”
“Yeah, I know.” Too polite to say, “Big deal, so do I,” I knew Jan was thinking just that.
“I don’t mean Bette. I have another one.” More interested, Jan looked up.
“You mean a baby?”

How else could she have missed seeing another Bao? Had it been the walking variety, we would have used it by now—to divert her younger brother, Chuckie, from tagging along after us all the time.

“No, not a baby. At least not any more, I don’t think.”

“Whaddaya mean, ‘You don’t think’? Don’t you know?” Her look told me she might be having second thoughts about being best friends with an idiot.

“I mean she’s not a baby. But the last time I saw her, she was.”

Jan sat up. I’d gotten her. I rose too, and we sat, facing each other, in the cross-legged position of a serious conversation.

“Where is she? Why haven’t you seen her? What’s her name?”
“Jean. But we call her SanSan. That means ‘three-three,’ because she’s the third daughter. She’s in China.”
“What’s she doing there? You didn’t forget her, did you?”

Jan knew I had been born in China. And she knew from her own experience that, in the excitement of going on a trip, it’s possible to leave something important behind and not realize until you’ve been in the car an hour. But it’s not so easy to leave a baby

And so I told her my secret. As we idly pulled up the remaining patch of lawn, I told her that, when we came to America in 1946, we were only supposed to stay a year, so SanSan was left in the care of my Aunt.

“Uh?”

My “explanation” was making less sense to her with every word. Normal people get baby-sitters. But for a year?! I could see her wondering if her best friend’s whole family didn’t have a problem with reality. I started to panic. I had to make her understand.

“SanSan was only fifteen months. My mother would’ve had trouble taking care of three kids all by herself in a strange country. I wasn’t supposed to come either. But I packed my doll suitcase, stood by the front door with it, and threw a tantrum. She gave in. I guess she figured, at four, I might be old enough to learn a little something from the trip.”

“Trip?! Cath, it’s 1951.” Stopping to calculate on her fingers. “You’ve been here five years!”

Letting up a little, Jan must have realized that her interrogation was too insistent. Her new neighbors might be forgetful, maybe crazy, possibly criminal, but that was no excuse for being impolite. On the other hand, five years was an awful long time to leave a kid just ’cause you didn’t want to change a few diapers. And what about the poor aunt? Family is family, yet Jan’s most favorite relative had a limit of about two weeks for the three of them. It could go to a month if there was only one.

My “secret” was unraveling. I hadn’t meant for her to pull out this much. Actually, it wasn’t a secret. But it was “family business.” And there were rules about family business. I wasn’t always clear exactly what those rules were. I knew age didn;’t matter that much. Bette and I heard Grownup Talk all the time. And I knew it wasn’t limited to blood relatives. Or maybe it was just that we had to make do with family friends, since most of the Baos and Fangs were still in China. I knew that if there was a “lesson” to the story, just about anybody could hear it. On the other hand, if the gossip revealed an abiding character flaw or gross failing that could reflect badly on the whole family, it was hardly ever discussed. In some cases, like this one, the silence had to do with the Communists and the Nationalists.

“Jan, she lives in Red China.”

“Ooooh.” Now we were getting somewhere. All Americans, even fourth-graders, knew that it was better to be dead than Red.

“After we arrived here, there was a Civil War back home.”

“Yeaaah.” This, too, made sense. Jan never went to the Deep South on vacation.

“And the Communists fought the Nationalists, the Kuomintang.”

“The Who?” Oops. I was losing her again.

“The good guys.”

“Got it.”

“So when the Communists took over The Mainland—”

“What’s that?”

“It’s China. Sort of. It’s where the Chinese live. But it’s not ‘China.’ That’s on Taiwan.”

“Where’s that?”

“Near the Mainland. It’s an island. Some call it Formosa.”

“For—who?”

“Never mind. The point is: the Communists won’t let my sister out. That’s why she’s not here with us.”

“Oh, Cath. How sad. What a bunch of meanies.”

Finally. She said what I wanted to hear.

*

But it wasn’t the truth. Not really. How could I explain that it’s hard to be sad about someone I didn’t know? Or even admit that I’d never seen my parents cry over their loss? Yet for the sake of everyone’s future, we lived as part, apart. Bonded by something more immediate than feeling, more urgent than tears, we lived like so many Chinese before us: with separation but not distance. We were each with many selves—mothers, fathers, sons, and daughters—who daily, yearly, lived without spouses, siblings, and parents.

Long before “broken home” became a household word, trying to describe to the average American how good and real people could, for reasons other than military or religious duty, be “married” without seeing each other, or “loving” without helping their child take a first step, was too difficult to attempt. Without a lot of explaining and so little comparable experience, it’s no wonder people on this side of the ocean thought of Chinese as “heartless,” “emotionless,” “inscrutable.”

And without a lot of realities to compare and appreciate, it’s no wonder people from across the ocean can think of Americans as “soft,” “undisciplined,” “without subtlety.” Sitting in Jan’s backyard, between Cranford and Werner Place, the idea that a Mainland bureaucrat might read my parents’ letters before they arrived in my aunt’s hands, or plot to kidnap my father in order to boast his “happy repatriation,” was a fact of my life but had little to do with it. Although everything about it.

Aunt Dorie called. I was saved from having to give more details. It was five o’clock and time to help get dinner ready. With a handshake, we signaled our confidence in each other and our agreement to return to the world of ordinary mortals. Jan never asked more about SanSan. Nor did I ask if Uncle Herb ever took the gun out of the box.

*

Back at my house, I knew that if I hurried, I could finish up my chores in time to be on Teaneck Road when my father stepped off the bus. I loved to watch when he did, looking so dapper in his suit and hat. Giving me a smile, he would keep hold of the newspaper, but let me carry his briefcase. That was the same as holding hands—which is what Jan did with her father.

I always askled if he had a good day at the office. He always did. I hardly ever told him how I had spent the day, unless it had to do with Mommy, in which case I would get another smile and maybe a light thwack with the newspaper to show how much he appreciated having such a dutiful daughter.

We spoke English. He was very good at it—better than most Americans. He enjoyed making conversations and being the Master of Ceremonies.

The walk from the bus stop was a short one, up the tree-lined street of one-family houses. Every few steps, we would pass a grassy lawn, sometimes greeting a neighbor working on a flower bed or removing a tricycle from the driveway. Whatever the condition of the back yard, the front view was a presentation of the house, not at all like the pictures I’d seen in books of Chinese homes where high walls made it impossible for insiders and outsiders to exchange casual glances.

As much as I loved walking with my father, I was glad we lived in the middle of the block and not further up Cranford Place. I never seemed to have enough things to say—important stuff that would capture his interest. I could always get his attention. But that wasn’t the same.

When we stepped into the house, my mother would be waiting. She too would ask if he had a good day at the office. Now speaking mostly Chinese—which I sort of understood—his response sometimes took all of dinnertime, even the rest of the evening. They never pecked cheeks like Jan’s parents, or even hugged. In our house, the public gesture would have been redundant; in our universe, a red flag to gods who tended to look at close proximity as only chemical, never magical. The difference was what I expected—the same as if Jan and I each brought home extra homework to be done over a weekend. Aunt Dorie would, likely as not, express some sympathy, even help ease the burden by reading a story with her, whereas my mother would look at an armload of books as a natural extension of my student’s body. As to chancing a discussion with me about some girl osculating a slimy Frog-Prince, let alone a young man kissing an unchaperoned Beauty sleeping with a bunch of wild animals in the woods? No way.

As my father, Bette and I took our places at the kitchen table, my mother would be at the stove nearby, a bowl in hand, asking how much rice we each wanted. I never asked for more than half. Too many times, American mothers would look at my short, skinny body and serve me a fully loaded plate to “fatten me up” or “put meat on my bones.” These Fork Dinners meant I had “to clean my plate” or be considered rude or forgetful of “the starving Armenians.” With not enough time to grow between the salad and dessert, I learned to swallow very hard, so my esophagus could act as a compressor, jamming out all extraneous air from the food. The result was a mass of incredible density and weight. And a very strong stomach.

At home, however, I could choose how much to take. But once received, I had to eat every grain or dishonor the farmer whose labor produced it. We thought it odd that Americans seemed to plan a meal so that every diner got equal portions, no matter what size or how hungry they were. Afterward, helping to clear the table, it killed us to see the uneaten portions thrown out.

On the other hand, our American guests would look at what my mother cooked for them and wonder if an army was going to join us for dinner. They didn’t understand that we were honoring them (and making sure the gods only associated our house with plenitude). Oddly, they also were uncomfortable about wrapping the leftovers for another day (or for live burials if we didn’t get to them before something else did). In those days, because “doggy bags” were only available in Chinese restaurants, we tried to clear the table as quickly as possible and forestall their wondering where our nonexistent pet was.

*

Absorbing the two styles of dining eventually evolved into my Chopsticks-Fork Principle: a way to get a handle on our cultural differences and similarities. The Chopsticks table is round with a lazy Susan in the middle to deliver the various dishes within reach of every diner. At an extra large table, standing is permitted as when the hostess searches for a special morsel to give an honored guest. There is no other centerpiece so everyone present, including children of all ages, can make eye contact—which is all one requires to start, interrupt, continue, override, or repeat and repeat and repeat the thought, report, description, gossip, judgment, event, etc. that will become part of the oral-aural history of the speaker, listener, group. A "quiet Chinese dinner" is an oxymoron. Being part of the group partaking of the meal is primary; all forms follow this binary function.

Hot tea is served before, during and after the meal to aid digestion. Cold water is a Western invention. While special sauces are served alongside certain dishes, having salt, pepper, soy and mustard sauce on the table to cater to individual preferences is another Western invention. To make these available as a matter of course is to announce that the chef doesn't know how to complete the recipe or the diner doesn't know when to leave well enough alone.

Weapons are inappropriate when dining with family and friends, so knives aren't part of the usual place setting. It is therefore the chef's job to prepare most ingredients in bite-size pieces. Exceptions—like a whole fish or shrimp, beef stew, noodles—must be so "done" that chopsticks, sometimes with the help of lips, teeth and tongue, are sufficient to rip, stab, probe, bone, or shell. That is, to achieve whatever remains to be done to the item before swallowing can take place.

While more proactive, there are rules. I hadn't thought of them until I first saw Bennett, my future (Caucasian) husband, eat with chopsticks. Pleased that his skill with utensils was already as multicultural as mine, I couldn't believe what he did with them. First, he picked up his rice bowl to his lips. Okay. Then he proceeded to shovel nonstop until the bowl was practically empty. Not okay. Horrified, I suggested to the barbarian that two delicate sweeps was the limit. Somewhat sheepishly, he allowed as how he acquired his technique by watching Toshiro Mifune and Blind Samurai movies.

At a Chopsticks table, I automatically put both arms on the table and lean in toward the center to signal my joining in. Then, like a spider, our conversations weave a web by crisscrossing in tangents, diameters and radii. Periodically, one person or topic attracts everyone's attention and the unity is strengthened. At family gatherings, rarely was I the one—neither my Chinese nor my opinions were to be trusted. Though the last time I did manage both to the delight of all, including my parents, was when I initiated a discussion on the designs of bathrooms around the world.

In contrast, the Fork table is usually rectangular with one or more centerpieces bifurcating it longitudinally. The effect of having flowers, candles, and/or sculptural objects is to emphasize the aesthetics, not just the function of the dining experience. When tall, the display can also discourage talking across the table. While this means extra care must be taken to create a good seating plan (by alternating gender, volubility, common interests, etc.), it does tend to keep the noise level down. (So does the practice of feeding young children earlier or elsewhere.) Apropos to a democracy, the more that is individualized, the more splendidly formal the occasion. In the extreme, this means each diner is allocated salt cellars and pepper shakers, different forks and (sets of) plates for each course, knives for each texture, glasses shaped for each type of liquid.

At a Fork table, I right away place the hand that's not in use in my lap. It doesn't matter that I like wontons better than filet mignon, or think it's inefficient to put the fork first in the left hand for cutting and then in the right for delivering. Preference is irrelevant, being proficient in both ways means I can chew with confidence, without making anybody feel ill at ease—including me—about which of the four forks, three knives, and one spoon to use for which course (not counting the utensils which come with and after dessert). Maintaining a little distance, physically and conversationally, the Americans know I'm both respectable and respectful because I can sit, unpropped, juggle silverware without violating my neighbors' air space, and pace myself so I don't begin before everybody else is served or end after others are sated. With the exception of folks who have dementia or imbibed too many cocktails, one isn't supposed to repeat the same story over and over, but is expected to be a good enough talker and listener that reruns are kept to a minimum.

While both Chopsticks and Fork people hope it's all delicious, the former say so by not making too many recommendations on how it could have been better (based on their experience tasting some renowned cook's version) while the latter pay their compliments to the chef by saying it was the best they ever tasted.

When eating with forks, we wait for everyone to be seated. At a Chopsticks Dinner, the hostess might spend more than half the evening cooking so each dish is piping hot when first tasted. This was one reason we used to linger after every meal, picking at this or that morsel, to keep my mother company as she ate. Even when she started to work outside the house and there were many dinners we couldn't share, our self-image was of a family that did.

*

Similarly, I continued to feel like a daughter who meets her father at the bus stop even when I didn't because school had started and there were so many friends to distract my filial heart. But when I did meet him, I had more to say. Mostly about arithmetic. Never about the twins next door. Jan used to kid me that if I married one of them, my name would be Cathy Cathie. That would have been fun, but I didn't think it was worth the uncertainty of not knowing who was my husband, Ricky or Walter. Besides, chitchatting to one's father about boyfriends was not appropriate for college kids, let alone a fourth-grader.

I told my father about the play I was producing, but not about the fights I had. They never resulted in any visible wounds except the time I retaliated by putting chewing gum in Stephen Miceli's hair after he pelted us with popcorn at the movies. That was scary. His mother had to cut it out. That meant he had to come to school with an almost bald spot. For days, I expected her to show up at my doorstep, towing her evidence by the hand, pleading her case before my mother. At the time I didn't know most American parents indulgently wrote off this sort of thing as an example of how "boys will be boys."

As for my mother, one look at his head, and she'd have ruled against me, however much popcorn he'd thrown. Having incited the disorderly conduct of Stephen's hair, I had forced his family into a terrible choice: either they endanger his educational viability by keeping him home from school or they lose face by sending out a son who couldn't appear "normal" in public.

Sometimes I was tempted to tell my father about the fights. I wanted him to know that Daughter #2 might be a bit undergrown, but she was no pushover. If a boy went after my pencil or scarf, I didn't run away. By the end of November, I had Scheduled Bouts before and after school, two or three times a week. (Maybe they did know. For years, I thought their Chinese nickname for me referred to the "Little Fatty" I was when a baby. It turns out that Shao Tüfëi means "Little Bandit.")

The flirting—for that's what my friends called it—had to stop. I was running out of pencils and my mother was starting to wonder how I could lose so much of my wardrobe just walking to school.

After the chewing gum incident, I made a deal with Stephen (he was still growing back his hair and ready to negotiate). For a couple of pieces of candy, he would get his best friend, Fred, to be my official body guard. It worked out great. Fred was monstrously big and almost as tough as I was. .

None of the other girls fought the way I did. Part of it was because I was the new kid in school; part of it was the fun in proving that looks can be deceiving—like at that first recess. Biding my time, I stood around while the captains picked everybody else before me. For half the game, I sat against the fence until the rules demanded that they give me a turn regardless of the two outs and a man on base. Making my way to the bats, I saw the outfield closing in, and the infield taking the opportunity to tie a shoelace or start a conversation. Selecting the heavier bat, I heard the snickering. Then, top-heavy, I assumed my Jackie Robinson stance. Since most girls—and some guys—would wait for the pitch with the bat resting on their shoulders, this cued a couple of the kids to back up to their former positions. Willing the ball into my range, I smashed the sucker over all their heads.

Daddy would have enjoyed it had he been there. Too bad I couldn't just tell him. That would have been bragging, and that was more than "impolite." When I credited my homer to good fortune or took full blame for striking out, it was because the gods might be listening in. Capable of anger, even jealousy, they might be provoked into teaching me a lesson. Or worse, taking my lack of humility out on my father. If all they heard from a household were disclaimers like, "My wife? Pretty? Her toenails are ingrown and her ankles are too fat," then they wouldn't think the family was getting too proud. On the other hand, to tell my father (and the gods) after something good happened might suggest that success wasn't routine. People and gods are supposed to bring about the best possible under the circumstances. That's a given.

If the effort yields better results than they or we anticipated, the astonishment is a bonus (but no excuse to rest on one's laurels). This is how we behaved, not how we "believed." We acted as if the gods existed but we didn't worship them. What we knew about their attitudes came through stories, not "commandments."

Still, I would have liked my father to have been a witness to my victory, to have him invisibly at my side. Just once. Expecting or needing more would have been too much for both of us. To secure my future and his senior years, no one could afford immoderate or immodest demands on the other's time. This was assumed, never discussed. If he preferred playing tennis to commuting, or wondered how a bat and ball would get me from the sandlot to Istanbul, I never heard it.

Nor did I hear talk about "following in his footsteps" or "leaving the nest," or "having a better life." My parents never said, "Why can't you be like so-and-so?" or "Remember, we're counting on you," as if I needed the reminder or could fail to grow up, go to college, have a career, and be available to them in their old age as they were to me in my childhood. What they did do was tell me stories about far-fetched people—like the one about the filial daughter who chopped off a piece of her arm to feed her starving parent. Talk about intense! Intents?

*

How and what they taught us contrasted with another game we used to play at recess, Mother May I?.

I remember the first time I was the Leader. Confronting my classmates, I said,

"Take two giant steps forward." Almost as one, they asked,

"Mother, May I?" Magnanimous, I responded,

"Yes, you may."

They did. Except one, who took three. I spotted him. In this game, as in others, the strategy is to end up ahead of the pack, but not to stand out too much—being too different raises fear and attracts suspicion. Pointing, I named him and his offense, then ordered him back to the starting line. My look could do that. He obeyed. What power!

Meanwhile, the rest weren't so neatly lined up. Those with long legs or the ability to make a great leap forward from a standing start were now in front. I decided to face the other way and lure the daring ones with false security. Many would stay put, taking a step only with permission, but others would take the dare and chance a quick run before I could whip around and catch them in the act. Calculating that none were close enough to make a dash and tag me while my back was turned, I waited an extra second, turned quickly, and caught several on the move.

Satisfied, I repeated the ploy. But the rest were closing in. I got anxious:

"Take one baby step forward."

"Mother, May I?"

"No, you may not."

With that unexpected call, a few were tricked. I was sure there were others, but they got away with it because they hid behind the ones in front—who were now too close for me to look at all at once. I could sense their growing impatience, their impending rush. No matter how clever I was, my gambits could only change the end game, not the outcome. I got panicky. And decided this wasn't fun anymore.

I also decided it was a lousy way to raise kids.

Not that I stood on the playground, as prescient about my future as I was wise to Little Steve using Big Fred as a blind. Rather, I was beginning to detect the patterns: about the hierarchy in May I?, the competition in "Scrimmage," the strategy in "Stealing Second Base," the grit in "Facing Off," the safety in numbers, the risk in being ahead. In the process, I was becoming more bicultural, more like everybody else. A lot of people don't think of themselves that way, but they are—it comes with the territory of spending half the time at home or with memories, the other half elsewhere, like tourists.

But immigrants do it more. It can be exhausting—which is why there are those who prefer to stay in Little Italy or Soho, Little Tokyo or Germantown, to eat at the same table or live in the same dorm, where they can relax, and just twirl or slurp the noodles with no thought about whether to ladle or stab them instead. My great fortune was having parents who balanced the fascination of touring with the desire to return home, the excitement of emigrating with the comfort of nesting. They encouraged me to "get along" in Teaneck. And I did.

*

I absorbed the differences between our not holding hands and my friends not holding hands, between my not telling my parents, and their not telling theirs, between saying it and meaning it, between their asking for permission and my hardly ever doing so. I thought I knew how my parents felt from what they told me people, real and imagined, should feel.

For a long time, it didn't occur to me that there was much discrepancy. Or maybe it was the asking about feelings that was of no use—like standing in the sunshine during a picnic and saying,

"Aren't you glad it didn't rain after all?"

Or maybe it was just the times. In those days, Movietone and televised news might show people hugging or weeping but reporters didn't bother interviewing the lone survivor of a family crash with a "How do you feel?" Anyway, we didn't ask the question in public or private. If I felt some inexpressible confusion, then I probably hadn't paid good attention; if I needed my parents' permission, then I probably shouldn't be doing it; if we needed "to talk it over," it was probably out of the question. What my parents acknowledged of my conduct was what was supposed to be. The rest went into limbo. Some emerged when shared with friends who also didn't tell their parents everything, but most remained incognito. Maybe that's why it took as long as it did to find the words to express the different patterns.

As a suburban American, I could have a First and Second Childhood, a Subconscious, Love, Individuality, Justice and Rights.

As a Confucian Chinese, I could expand into an ever larger web of Human Relationships made proper by degrees of obedience, authority, trust, labor, modesty and, sometimes, affection.

As a Bao and Fang living in New Jersey, I was to accomplish the "all" of the All-American, but weave only with the larger Chinese web in mind.

It seemed to be that simple—until the day I wrote the letter to the Readers Digest and showed it to my father.

"Cathy, I know you've spent a lot of time on it. But I don't think you need to mail it."

"But Daddy, it's so unfair. Kids aren't like that. We're not a bunch of hoodlums."

"They know that."

"Then why don't they say so?"

"It's a magazine."

"That everybody reads."

"Yes."

"People should know the truth."

"Yes, but what truth will they get from reading your letter?"

"That we're not all bad."

"Maybe what they'll think is only that you are praising yourself."

"Oh."

At the time, writing it was extraordinary. The letter was an indictment, a public airing of a private grievance, an outright criticism of people who had nothing to do with me, who weren't related to me, but who had somehow injured me. It was my first collision with an institution and my experience with riding a "high horse."

And it was boastful. In the Confucian and Buddhist scheme of things, each individual is responsible for strengthening the moral fiber of the universe while simultaneously obliterating the ego. Thus everything depends on everyone. Since the "they's of the world had not yet crystallized in my mind as "the media," "the government," "the police," "the church," "the system," for me to redress one journalist's error by publicizing my (self) righteousness wouldn't tilt the balance for the better. And so the letter remained unstamped.

*

What was ordinary then, and since then, was my father asking me how I spent the day, and my thinking ahead so as to prioritize the list and call attention to the exemplary deeds: "playing ball with Jan," "reading," "collecting dead bumblebees," "polishing shoes." I liked to put in a little something from each category to assure him, Chopsticks-Forks style, that I was developing the range of skills needed to harmonize my life with the family's as well as an assortment of people. I included nothing that might disturb our domestic tranquility or the human world as Confucius would have it.

If I had been playing with dolls, I avoided saying so, or stressed the "who with" rather than the "what." Pretending a "thing" could talk like a human was difficult. I did it. Not to would have been unsociable, even snotty. But I found the make-believe part hard to do and report. Chit-chatting about what hasn't really happened when there is no moral lesson involved or no spinning needed to explain what a god might have overheard and misinterpreted was not much more acceptable than talking about boyfriends and kissing.

So I learned to knit and sew for my doll, concentrating on the creation of tiny outfits rather than fantasies. They had the added advantage of being something I could actually display to my parents. I didn't know how much they impressed my father until, one weekend, he took out some wire cutters and pliers, and made a set of miniature hangers.

That was the closest he ever came to entering my child's world. We did a lot of stuff together, but it was "real" stuff like cleaning out the garage or washing the car. He never joined in a board game or asked about characters that didn't exist, the way Aunt Dorie or Uncle Herb might. Once, he had to take my doll to the hospital, but that wasn't "playing." It happened because one of his associates from the office had to do some weekend work at our house. The man brought his daughter along. Closer to my age than Bette's, she became my responsibility. If she had a reason for hurting me, I can't remember it. All I can recall is how she maliciously tore out the doll's hair—aa Victorian coiffure of honey-colored elegance. I didn't stop her because that would have embarrassed the father who couldn't stop her without mentioning the unmentionable: his daughter's (and, therefore, his) failure to be a Good Guest. Had we both not ignored her vandalism, it would have caused a whole chain of events and admissions that shouldn't happen if my father and he had to work in the same office together, if we had to live in the world we created.

After they left, my father took out the telephone book, made a call, handed me the hairless doll, and drove me for many miles. The trip was his paternal recognition that I'd done my filial duty by not altering that girl's face on the spot. And by not crying my heart out until after their car turned the corner. In doing this, he taught me that hearts can break, but that there are remedies.

I'd never heard of such a place as a Doll Hospital. It smelled of musty wood and had no furniture except a long counter. There were no walls, just shelves, filled with cubbyholes and boxes. A man, wearing an apron, came out of the back room. He looked exactly the way I imagined Master Cherry did when he tried to make Pinocchio into a table leg. My father told me to explain what I wanted—which wasn't easy since I wasn't sure what we were doing in this strange shop. Running out of words, I carefully laid my doll before him, letting him see for himself. Except for its hard rosy surface reflecting the light from the bare bulb overhead, it looked quite dead, its eyes wide open.

"Mmm, I see."

Not saying more, he went to a shelf and took down a box. It was covered with dust and not very awe-inspiring. But inside! Wigs. All colors and styles. One by one, Master Cherry took them out and held each type on my doll for me to see. None were Victorian; my doll would never be the same. Swallowing my disappointment, I looked at the array on the counter and got caught up in the old man's patter. He lured me with his discussion of each wig's virtues, real qualities—color, length, hairstyle. I had never heard a grown person talk about a doll as if it mattered. On the other hand, he wasn't pretending. He wasn't trying to make my doll into a "person," just a better doll.

"Now these. These you can comb. If you do it carefully."

That did it. I examined this last batch, combing each with my mind—Victorian, Chinese, whatever my fingers could manage. Finally, I pointed at a lump of gleaming auburn redness, nodding my decision.

My father didn;'t ask "Are you sure?" or "Don't you think it's awfully bright?" He simply added his nod to mine, and stood by me as Master Cherry disappeared into the back with my doll and wig.

The minutes passed and I got worried. What was he doing back there? I had picked out what I wanted. Why weren't we in the car by now? Taking my cue from my father, who didn't seem impatient, I kept my questions to myself, and waited.

When the old man finally emerged, holding forth my doll, I remained speechless. The ringlets didn't slide off! My doll had "hair," not just a wig.

I didn't thank my father. We often said "please," but rarely a "thank you." Some words are more for guests than family. Family members are supposed to be a certain way. Thanking each other for it could insinuate that either might have done otherwise, and that meant we didn't understand our respective roles or could really be "free" not to fulfill them. However, the longer we stayed in this country, the harder it got for me to figure out which "thank you" ritual was operative: the one that is right for the universe governed by Confucius' Five Relationships or the one that is suitable under The Bill of Rights.

In the car, I nevertheless felt the need to say something.

"Daddy, I picked this color because it's like Maureen O'Hara's."

My father nodded his acceptance of my gratitude and, thereby, gave his approval. I had chosen well.

*

I don't know who started it or when but, for as long as I can remember, Daddy was Humphrey Bogart and Mommy was Maureen O'Hara. I guess it was my father's mouth, the assured way he carried himself, his newspaper, that led people to see the similarity in the jaunty hat, the manner that all good gangsters or adventurers should have. And my mother was the sparkling O'Hara. We would stand on Fifth Avenue, watching the Easter Day Parade—she never wore a fancy hat, she didn't need one—and photographers would stop to take a picture of her open, perfectly shaped smile on an utterly beautiful face. But they always asked permission before raising their cameras. Instinctively, they knew not to take any liberties with my mother.

At home, my father must have told my mother because, after the initial cursory glance, she returned to my room for a better second look. I then reinforced their interest in my doll by making clothes as glamorous as her hair—a bright yellow taffeta skirt bordered in black velvet, a sweeping cape with red accents, and a fitted, slitted, Chinese dress just like the ones my mother wore. It had been Daddy's "business" to buy the wig. Making the hangers was for me alone, for my pleasure alone; a reward for and worth my waiting.

When they were done, each exactly contoured, he came up to my room and amazed me more by drilling holes in my perfectly smooth closet door just to attach a tiny pole. He stayed to watch me arrange the doll clothing on the hangers, and then hook them over the newly installed rod. As we stood back to admire the effect of the miniature wardrobe within the regulation-sized one, we were commending each other on the fine job we had both done, on the patience. It was hard to keep a matter-of-fact tone in my voice when there was so much pride and love trying to escape the pressure of being in so insignificant a body.

I showed the hangers to all my friends. They were impressed, but not overwhelmed. Used to parents who helped with a drawing or sipped "tea" out of "play" cups, they couldn't seem to appreciate the magnitude of the hangers and the esteem my father bestowed on me in making them.

I didn't know I needed Chinese friends, ones who lived up the block or went to the same school. Most of my parents' friends lived in New York. Of those who had children, most kids weren't my age, or were back in China. Visits with the few who could have filled the void were so infrequent that we hardly recognized each other for having grown so much in-between them. Unable to see them in action on a daily basis, I got the impression that they probably didn't dress up and go trick-or-treating on Halloween. Or if they did, their parents wouldn't have tolerated them playing touch football in the street with the Cathie twins.

Sometimes what I gathered about their lives was pretty unimaginable—like when one girl who was already in high school asked her mother, in as formal Chinese as I'd ever heard, if she could buy a blue umbrella. I mean, really! I could understand needing permission to buy something that expensive but getting an okay on the color?! I started to giggle, like "This is a good joke, eh?" when her mother said she'd go to the shop herself and check out if the shade was really dark enough because she didn't want people to get the wrong idea about her daughter.

Realizing she was serious, my jaw dropped too far from my upper teeth to finish the laugh. Detecting a tiny shake of the head from my mother, I eased my mouth back in time to have it nailed in place with a look from her mother that was designed to keep it shut until I was old enough to have kids of my own. That done, she proceeded to tell my mother some story about some other girl. I didn't catch the details, but the gist of it was that kids get hurt or go wild if they speak too much English and walk around in bright colors.

My mother stiffened. Making a quick decision, I interrupted, and asked, in Chinese, if either wanted another cup of tea.

They both said "No." She as if the word was a piece of dry ice, my mother as if to the youngest bride of the youngest son whose zero status makes her one hundred percent subject to the whim of just about everybody except the dog. Accepting the instant transition to Old China, I followed up by asking, again in Chinese, for permission to go outside and play. Dismissing me, my mother quickly returned my conspiratorial grin before facing her critic with a "Now, what were you saying, my Dear?" kind of look.

This was definitely not a Chopsticks-Fork family. I'm sure they thought that setting the table with sharp instruments was barbaric.

Later, my parents said there were too many Overseas Chinese who tried to raise their children as if they were still in the China of their grandparents. Although we didn't yet know any who went to the other extreme—total Americanization—I knew my parents would have disapproved of that too. Part of Bao lore was the tradition, but it also included stories of my parents' rebellion, of whatever it took to venture so far from home. Our motto was

"Have the courage and know how to take the best from East and West."

The Umbrella Woman must have had the same gumption once. So how could she be unafraid to cross an ocean and yet be so afraid of a medium blue? How could she want something new for herself but perpetuate the old in and on her daughter?

"Hrumph, no more shuai."

"What's that?"

My mother demonstrated. With her feet firmly planted, she rotated her upper torso several times. Her arms, hanging loose, followed her shoulders and did wrap-arounds about her body.

"Swing."

Thereafter, about once every year or two, she would swing for me. She wanted me to know about versatility and flexibility, about how being well placed meant being able to move in any direction at a moment's notice. Each time she did it, she enjoyed her ingenuity more and the delight made her a little girl, arms swirling, as pleased with the feel of it as the lesson being performed. I thought it was a tradition. I grew up believing every Chinese child learned how to swing.

Now I think she made it up. Maybe just for me. When I asked her, so I could explain the concept to my son, she couldn't understand my sloppy pronunciation. When I demonstrated, she shook her head and told me shuai is a to-and-fro or forward-and-back motion. When I insisted on the version she taught me and repeated the word, she mimicked my intonation and said,

"Shuai? Like fall down? Lose one's balance?"

"No, Mommy. Shuai. Like this." And once again twisted gaily.

"Never heard of it."

Oh well. This, like so much that was important in our household, had a MaMa-HuHu quality about it. Literally, "HorseHorse-TigerTiger," it connotes "neither one way nor the other," or "either way." But there's also an element of comme çi comme ça, or "so-so" in the phrase. The MaMa-HuHu meant my parents were casual, but never careless. Their ideas were weather balloons to my mind's eye, fascinating me with their staying power amidst the crosswinds, then astonishing me with their deft mobility in a breeze.

They ruled by proclamation of simple rules but governed with complex examples. Sixteen years after we arrived in the U.S., they did the same with SanSan? Reminiscent of what happened with Bette and me, on the next available school day after my little sister arrived, my parents sent her to Teaneck High to watch kids learn about Huckleberry Finn. Nearly two decades after that, when my uncle arrived in America, he was enrolled at City University of New York. At a time when "multiculturalism" had no meaning, good or bad, my parents invented the concept for us. When my mother saw my uncle doing his early morning taijiquan exercises by the front door, she pulled him inside, remonstrating,

"Not in the front. This isn't China. Do you see anybody else on the block doing that? In America, the front is where you put out the garbage and pick up the newspaper. Do it in the backyard, like barbecues."

When her "don't stick out like a sore thumb" and "look/see" lessons weren't enough, my father patiently compared cultures to explain how the differences were reflected in the everyday jargon that never appeared in grammar books. And throughout, we watched them make forays into the world and return with a variety of imports: the virtues of laughing at oneself, permanents, American breakfasts, Halloween and Christmas. Sometimes the timing got mixed up as when we wore costumes to decorate the tree, but our enthusiasm more than made up for any confusion this may have caused our friends.

Once my mother came back from the store with four pairs of mukluks, each exactly the same as the other. Unaware of their Eskimo origins, she appreciated their comfort and warmth. I asked her,

"Why four?"

She shrugged. Without pointy toes and slim high heels, not one of the Bao females ever wore them. And since they were our size, my father couldn't (for which he was very thankful). These occasional flops didn't matter. We still got the idea.

Though they sometimes forgot what they said, or lamented where my ideas took me, they were, nonetheless, the instigators. If their grandchild grew up in a world where the extraordinary and ordinary were made into each other, it was because I could say to the clerk,

"Please, I would like to buy an umbrella. No, not that one. The red one." …

268.152 1. The Story Of The Lotus-Picking Boat 2. Father, A Stranger 3. Grandpa And His Canary\fn{by Shen Aiping (1942-)} Wei County, Hebei Province, China (F) 4

1

Morning breeze with its breath of sweet lotus drifts
Over the pond encircled by traces of heavy footmarks
As the lotus blossoms display their poetic charm,
Their stately leaves, a swath of fresh green.

*

What a splendid cradle of jade!
Sound of a new-born baby crying comes Wafting through the years. When was it?
A baby had no right to cry then …

*

I wept
My tears like a gushing stream
Clouded with dense smoke of gunpowder
Now trace the story of a small lotus-picking boat.

*

It was a late autumn evening, hazy with rain,
As Father went out to meet the guerilla forces,

Mother rowed a small boat for gathering lotus root
To wait for a woman guerilla under the old willow tree.
*
Suddenly from the opposite bank came a round of gunshots,
The small boat ducked under the lotus leaves;
At this life-and-death moment
Mother went into labor and I came howling into the world.
*
The small boat with its mat of lotus leaves
Was as my delivery room,
And a woman warrior acting the midwife
While the boat rocked in fear.
*
Mother stuffed my tiny mouth with Lotus petals
For cries would bring the attackers
Deliberately she uncovered my tiny black beanlike eyes,
And whispered in my ear:
*
“Quickly look upon your father, my child,
The guerillas are about to launch an attack
Your father has finished tightening his leggings
And has put on his grAy uniform …”
*
With a soldier’s decisiveness,
My father said to me, gravely and lovingly:
“My dear son,
I bequeath this lotus pond to you!”
*
Suddenly a bullet tore through his shoulder,
With a quick leap into the pond, he plunged into battle,
Leaving behind a small life in the small boat,
Leaving behind a streak of bright red along the boat.
*
Father is gone,
But the small boat still floats in my memories,
Lotus flowers still gleam with hopes, still Lifting high the torch Father had set ablaze.

2

i

A silhouette fades away into the distance—
Carefully surveying the lotus lake
He looks so familiar and strange
Bewildered, I chase after him
As if asking in silence:
Are you my father
Why don’t you call me daughter
*
I don’t know how you will reply
But I’m sure
You will burst into bitter tears
Because of my convulsions

My hoarse voice
For you can understand
A child may also become hysterical
With longing for its father
*
Together we are tramping over this land
That has been irrigated with blood
The coursing blue water
Is carrying away my dank associations …

ii

Mother often used to talk about your going—
Early on that snowy dawn
Chains pulling your flesh and blood,
The snow enveloping the gasping earth
The villagers in their silence
Prolonging the tragedy
Your eyes wide
You searched for my mother
You saw her—
Standing on a high slope
Holding a thin small child in her arms
You smiled
Blood trickling from the corners of your mouth
But with the chains wound around your arms like poisonous snakes
*
You could not reach me
I stared innocently
Not knowing what had happened
The villagers' tears
Were like icicles suspended from eaves
Snowflakes fell like scarlet maple leaves
The clanking chains
Struck the still fields
In the east, a glimpse of a tall, straight silhouette
The road, a river of blood

iii

Let me see your hands
Your hands have rejected yesterday's shadows
Let me feel your legs
They have left that blood-stained history far behind
Only your bronzed neck
Is engraved, with scars left by the chains
Is engraved with the wounded truth
I cannot be wrong
You are my father

iv

Yesterday
Mother told me again what you looked like:

A swarthy, robust man
With hair like dense bushes
The stature of an unbending tree
Let me lean on your shoulders
Against your warm chest
You turn your face to smile at me
I raise my head to speak while we are walking
Even though you may grow old
You will never be lonely
Our home is just ahead
Look—
The woman with loose wisps of gray hair
Gazing out at us
Is my mother

v

Papa, why are you crying?
Let mc wipe away your tears
Why, your forehead is burning
Is it because seeing mother
Has rekindled the flames of memories of youth
Mother is walking towards you—
Holding aloft a bunch of white lotus flowers
She is smiling, smiling at you
And you, standing still
Are like a solid memorial—
A statue that will never topple

3

My silver-bearded Grandpa
Chuckles like an old locust tree shaking loose its blooms.
Early every morning
He hangs his finely woven birdcage on a branch
And closely scrutinizes the little canary,
Still a baby, all golden and downy.
How Grandpa grins with glee.
*
Up, up
He lifts my stocky body up
For me to feed the bird a few grains
And coax it into sweet song.
*
Crack goes the branch,
The cage is broken,
The bird is flown,
Shattering Grandpa's perpetual delight.
He raises his cane as if wanting to hit me
But I can't tell him where the bird has gone.
*
Grandpa, clutching the mended cage,
Sets out with me to scour the woods.
A peep of clear crisp trilling notes

Leads us to our joyous find—
Upon a leafy branch
Perches our golden canary
It twitters:
I'm not going back with you,
I've built myself a fine sturdy nest.
*
Looking upward at the nest,
Frosty beard quivering and Dropping little sweatbeads.
Is Grandpa crying or laughing?
Tapping my shoulder he wildly gestures:
Fly, oh fly away …

21.27 The Loudspeaker\fn{by Bao Chu-an (1942/48-)} Nanxi County, Sichuan Province, China (F) 5

We live in one of those square courtyards that are quite common in our town. There are five families altogether and we have been neighbors for over fifteen years. We moved there in 1954. At that time, we were a friendly community. If someone was away on business, the neighbors would keep an eye on the children. If one of us became ill, there was always a neighbor to lend a hand with getting the herbal medicine and stewing it. If one household made some special treat, like sticky rice dumplings, not only would the smell pervade the courtyard but every family would get a taste. Even we guys who were in our teens at the time rarely quarreled, much less got into fistfights.

But today, fifteen or so years later, everything is changed. I don't know what happened. Is it something in the metabolism? Or a genetic deviation? Or has human nature entered into a new stage of evolution? Whatever it is, neighborly relationships have sadly deteriorated. Actually, we see more of each other, now that all normal work is stopped with this ongoing Cultural Revolution. In the space of the little courtyard, we stumble into each other whichever way we move. But we don't so much as bat an eyelid when we meet face-to-face; we might as well be staring into thin air. The fact is, to spit, or cough, or even sigh in the presence of another might be construed as provocation. It might easily be the spark that sets off a blazing fire. We keep our voices down even when speaking behind doors.

One morning, I sat on a stool on the step outside our front door (all the rooms open directly into the common courtyard) and stared listlessly at the loudspeaker jutting out from the top of the Economic Committee building. I was bored and wished for some kind of distraction, anything to break the silence. Even the loudspeaker with its deafening roar and abusive screeches. Anything.

Bang! Something hit hard against the wall in the room next to ours. Was a battle about to begin? Every nerve in my body tensed in expectation.

Boom! Boom! Boom! Whatever it was that hit the wall now bumped over the floor. Following the sound, Little Ming, our neighbor's teenage son, shot out into the yard. He stood in the middle of the yard, his neck stiff, his head lifted at an angle. He glared at the door to his family's rooms and cursed under his breath. His eyes were slits and his chin pointed, like a mouse's. I'm not prejudiced, even though his elder brother and his gang of Red Guards did beat me up three years ago at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution—just because I was a member of the Workers' Vigilance, a different faction. No, I'm not prejudiced. The fact is he does look like a mouse. He's even nicknamed Mouse.

His father, the blacksmith Guo Shun, appeared at the door, naked from the waist up.

"So your wings are strong, are they?" His broad bronze face was twitching and the muscles on his shoulders rippled as he waved his arms angrily. "Get out of here. Go and rot in jail. Go get stuck by a knife. Get hit by a bullet! I don't give a damn!"

Little Ming rolled his eyes and shouted back.

"I'm telling you, it's my turn at sentinel duty, headquarters' orders. It's to defend Chairman Mao's revolutionary line. How dare you interfere!"

Blacksmith Guo Shun snorted, but for the moment he was silenced. Then he stuck his head out of the door and broke out again.

"Right! Then you needn't come back to eat!"

"Want to get rid of me?" Little Ming now spoke slowly and deliberately, shaking his head from left to right. "Not so easy."

"Why not? I support your revolutionary acts!" Guo Shun also changed tactics. "Just pretend you never had a father—"

"You want to have it all your way, do you?" Little Ming squinted. "I'm not eighteen yet. Not for another year and nine months. Have you forgotten?"

"So what?" The blacksmith was, after all, just a lump of iron and couldn't follow his son's arguments. "Do you mean you can go crooked just because you're not eighteen?"

"Ha!" Little Ming laughed dryly. "And do you mean you can just go and breed children and not do your duty?"

"Oh, you've got me, have you?"

The blacksmith was furious. His nostrils quivered and he shouted at the top of his voice.

"Okay, I've made a mistake. I shouldn't have spawned you in the first place! Then I give up being your father! Let's settle accounts at once and sever relations. I'll publish a statement in the papers." There were steps behind him. He wavered for a moment and diminished his tirade. "Two hundred yuan yearly for your keep. Sixteen years altogether. How much does that add up to? Make it out yourself."

"Are you saying that you kept me all these years?" Unlike his father, Little Ming raised his voice as he saw his mother approaching. His mother doted on him, the youngest. Besides, mother and son were attached to the same faction—the Battalion. He drew out his chest and curled his lips in a smile.

"You kept me! By what right do you say that?"

"Didn't I feed you? Didn't I clothe you? Didn't I pay your school fees?"

Little Ming threw back his head and laughed, drowning out his father's words. Then he pursed his mouth and started to deliver a lecture.

"Well, let me tell you I don't mind settling accounts, but don't think you are getting any credits! I am indebted to Chairman Mao! If it weren't for the chairman, where would you be yourself? Probably a starving corpse on some street corner. Think again. Who should get the credit? Don't forget what you owe to Chairman Mao!"

Little Ming had really outdone himself. I didn't know what to think—whether to cheer or to spit. I ended up saving my saliva.

The middle-school teacher Zhong Kaiwen was squatting outside his own door cleaning his bike. He, too, was shocked. He raised his head and stared at Little Ming, open-mouthed.

"You!"

The blacksmith was no match for his son at argument. He wasn't a debater, but he knew how to use his fists. He made a lunge at his son.

Mother Guo was alarmed. She held back her husband with both hands while her stare penetrated the schoolteacher until he lowered his gaze. Then she pointed to the loudspeaker towering above us all. "Day in and day out," she said, dragging out each word significantly, "it reminds us to be on the alert, to beware of class enemies making rifts among ourselves. Have you forgotten?" She put on her best manner, trying to sound amiable, but her words were enough to draw a little crowd, some from our own courtyard, some from our neighbors next door who stood in the entrance. They smacked their lips in happy anticipation.

Mother Guo was well-known for her piercing voice. She was a saleswoman at a vegetable stand. She hawked stale vegetables all the year round. In spring it was "Tender shoots, ten fen for a pile;" in summer it was "Red tomatoes, ten jin for one yuan;" in the fall it was "Cabbages, twenty fen for a bunch, your money back if they are rotten;" in winter it was "Celery cabbages, eight fen for one jin, buy one get one free!" When Mother Guo sold her vegetables at the main crossroad, her voice could be heard down the streets in all four directions. It was certainly not a musical voice, but the bargains it offered somewhat neutralized its unpleasantness. The true demonstration of Mother Guo's talents occurred during the contest of the two factions seeking supremacy at the inauguration of the so-called Committee of United Workers of the Fresh Produce Department. On that occasion, Mother Guo, loudspeaker in hand, represented the Battalion and entered into a shouting contest with the representative of the Red City faction. She drowned out the bleatings of the other woman in less than half an hour. Later, when the Battalion got the upper hand, Mother Guo was honored with the title of Loudspeaker. At the inauguration of the Provincial Revolutionary Committee, Mother Guo was invited to stand in the stadium with a plastic red badge over her breast.

Mother Guo now made sure that the insinuation of her words was not lost on the schoolteacher. Zhong Kaiwen kept his eyes studiously lowered. Mother Guo rubbed her chin complacently, making the pockmarks stand out one by one under the pressure of her fingers. She drew herself to her full height and strode over to her son, who was still in the yard.

"Go back home. Quarrels between people mustn't allow cousins to get hurt. Conflict only makes classes and conserves happy."

I knew, of course, that she was trying to quote from Chairman Mao about peaceably resolving contradictions between the people. She was also trying to use a set phrase about refraining from internecine fights that hurt loved ones and gratify the enemy.

I was not the only one who got the message. A woman who had been scrubbing clothes in a tub outside her door caught the thrust of Mother Guo's words and took personal offense. She was Wang Lei, cashier at the Sechuan Cotton Mill. The word conserve stung her, as she had joined the Industrial Army faction, which was labeled conservative. She had ample experience of Mother Guo's verbal darts and was always on the alert. Now she flung the soppy clothes into the tub with a splash and shouted in the direction of her own room, though raising her voice for our benefit.

"Hey, you, cursed with a short life, get me another tub. Stuffing yourself and doing nothing all day long! Want me to leave a mark on your face?"

She gave Mother Guo a hard look.

Mother Guo bridled and smiled contemptuously. She clapped her son on the shoulder.

"Well, the mother's not much to look at, but the son's not bad," she exclaimed. "Get a pretty wife for yourself, my son, anytime you like."

The people standing at the entrance to our courtyard burst out laughing. Little Ming was embarrassed. He growled something at his mother and pushed her away, nearly tipping her off balance.

"Your mother followed the correct line," Mother Guo announced to no one in particular. "I've stood in the stadium, shaken hands with officials big and small."

She glowered and gave Little Ming another clap on the back.

"A warning, though, my son. Don't get involved with shameless hussies. Remember, your uncle spent a pot of money and got smeared and slandered into the bargain."

"Slander yourself!"

Wang Lei's face was crimson, and for a moment she was at a loss for words. More than ten years ago, Mother Guo had introduced Wang Lei to her own brother. They met several times, but nothing lasting came of it. Both parties married elsewhere and the matter was forgotten. But later, during the anti-rightist movement, Mother Guo's brother was implicated, and officers on his case interrogated Wang Lei. Wang Lei never said anything untrue, but even so, whatever she revealed was used to build up the case against Mother Guo's brother. Since then the two women had been deadly enemies.

Wang Lei protested her innocence throughout. Now she again pointed upward with her finger.

"By the heavens above and the earth below, whoever made a false statement will die an instant death, and that goes for those who make unjust accusations, too!"

"Has anybody been naming names? Well, if the cap fits … Instant death indeed! Go kill yourself, you shameless slut!"

"Slut yourself," Wang Lei retorted. "Put yourself on sale like your rotten tomatoes!"

The people watching by the entrance now joined in the fun. A young fellow sporting a military uniform with a broad belt across his waist snapped his fingers.

"Go at her," he cried. "Go at herl"

The crowd roared with laughter.

"So what if I sell rotten tomatoes! You sell your rotten—a pity my brother wouldn't buy!"

"You're disgusting. You're beneath me!"

Wang Lei, unnerved by the laughter of the crowd, lost control. And anyway, how could her voice hold out against Mother Guo's loudspeaker? As always, she turned lamely to the defensive.

"Oh, well, what can one say to the likes of you? Demons and monsters …"

Schoolteacher Zhong's wife had been in the backyard all this time. The minute she heard Loudspeaker, she picked up a stool and swiftly took up position at her own front door, as if answering a battle cry. Her husband signaled to her with his eyes to keep away, but she ignored him, stoutly maintaining her position on the stool, a glass of water in her hands. She worked behind the registration desk at the local clinic. It meant daily confrontations with angry patients. On top of that, she was tempered by faction wars, which she joined with zest and fervor. Taken altogether, Mrs. Zhong was a seasoned verbal combatant; a tiff in this little backyard was just child's play to her. She and her husband subscribed to the rebel August 26 faction. During the February suppression of the year before, they had seen some hard times while Wang Lei and her conservative faction had had the upper hand. Thank goodness, they had managed to reverse the situation, but not before verbal bricks had been flung about and hard knocks exchanged.

Now she pricked up her ears at the words demons and monsters, terms usually applied to class enemies singled out during the Cultural Revolution. Having missed the prelude, she thought Wang Lei's words were directed at her. So she remarked: "Why give up like a whining dog? If you are in the right, why don't you go and eat the sesame-seed cakes that Li Jingquan has thrown to you?"

Now Li was the toppled provincial party chief and it was the accepted thing to taunt the so-called conservative faction with their connections to him, as if they were in his pay.

The minute Mrs. Zhong opened her mouth, I knew that a sparring melee involving many combatants had begun. I sneaked back into my room, leaving a gap in the door to keep track of developments.

Just as I had foreseen, the term sesame-seed cake (ma-bing) had struck a chord. The term shared one ideogram with the term pockmark (ma-zi) and the pockmarked Mother Guo took up the challenge. She assumed that Mrs. Zhong was retaliating on her for alluding to her husband as the class enemy. She put Wang Lei aside for the moment and trained her guns on Mrs. Zhong, directing her words ostensibly at her own husband:

"What are you standing there for like a lamppost? Take care you don't fart, or someone will make a case of it and report you!" This was a thrust at the Zhong couple: at the beginning of the Cultural Revolution, schoolteacher Zhong had created a poster accusing the blacksmith of holding a private job for extra gain.

"Hmmm," Mother Guo continued, "we eat by the sweat of our labor. What is it to you? Did it snuff out the joss sticks at your ancestors' graves?"

Mrs. Zhong had originally directed her attack at Wang Lei of the hated conservative faction, but since Mother Guo picked up the gauntlet, she was just as ready.

"So what! Tit for tat! Worthless trash! As if I had eaten chicken over her ancestors' graves!" This was an allusion to an earlier grudge dating back to 1964, when Mother Guo herself had accused Mrs. Zhong of pocketing the registration fees to treat herself to chicken. There had been an investigation, but nothing came of it except damaged relationships.

"Serves you right! Come full circle! You evil thug! Spy! Can't change your nature!"

Mother Guo reverted to her favorite tactic: shout down your enemy; never mind whether the words are relevant or not, so long as they hurt.

Schoolteacher Zhong reacted as if he had been hit, and the container of bicycle grease that he was holding spilled over. He raised his tired eyes and signaled his wife to stop. He was afraid to rake up that painful episode in his past. But with the word spy that raw nerve was touched and the memories came flooding back. Those memories harkened back to 1947, when he was graduated from high school and spent a whole year looking for a job. Finally he became a traffic policeman. He was on the job a mere three months, when in an accident involving a private rickshaw owner who had hit a beggar, he gave an honest account—and got a slap in the face and the sack. Little did he dream that this humiliation would be a blemish on his file and a blight on his whole career. It was raked up during every campaign of the last thirty years—the campaign to suppress counter-revolutionaries, the anti-rightist campaign, the socialist education campaign—all the way down to this so-called unprecedented great Cultural Revolution. There were endless interrogations and unending confessions. Even to this day, he had to be prepared against anything and everything—to have his home ransacked, to have a black carbon board hung over his neck advertising his crime, to be paraded down the streets with a piece of straw between his lips. Now he tried to explain for the nth time.

"Traffic p-police directing traffic," he stammered, "is n-not the s-same as spies."

In spite of all his explanations, however, isn't it true that his sons were barred from senior high school, excluded from jobs in state-owned enterprises? For a moment he was overcome. His legs shook. His head throbbed. He began to sway where he stood.

Mrs. Zhong was alarmed. She smashed the glass in her hand onto the ground and rushed to her husband. She helped him to a stool.

"Come, come, old man," she said. "Don't bother about the bike. Here! I've got ten yuan in my purse. Go to the teahouse and enjoy yourself. The little singsong harlot will sing on order, and you can even hold her hand for an extra yuan!"

"Oh, you!"

Zhong stamped his feet in exasperation. He gave a deep sigh and sat down speechless.

Mother Guo had lost her mother when still a child. Her father was blind, and father and daughter had once been reduced to singing in a teahouse for a living. It was a dark moment in Mother Guo's life. Life is not an easy thing after all, we all have a page or two that we would rather not turn back to. Nobody with a sense of decency would probe these wounds. But Mrs. Zhong had forgotten herself in her anger.

Mother Guo was deeply wounded, wounded to her innermost being. Her eyes bloodshot, her face pale, she became demented.

"Okay," she screamed, placing her hands on her hips. "I'm selling, right here. Come and get me if you have the guts! Why one yuan? Ten fen will do! Like turnips and cabbages!" She twisted her body frantically and headed in the Zhongs' direction.

"Gutless creatures! Here, I'm delivering myself!"

The crowd at the entrance to the courtyard laughed mirthlessly. Some made sounds of disapproval or cried "Shame." The chap in the military outfit said to his companion,

"Come on, let's go. We don't want to be splattered with blood."

Meanwhile schoolteacher Zhong had shrunk into his own room, his knees still shaking. Fortunately, blacksmith Guo picked up his wife by the waist and shoved her back into their quarters, thus concluding—for the moment—this phase of the battle. Each side had used the most degrading language possible, and each had paid the price in the utmost measure of personal pain.

As a final stab, Mother Guo screamed at the top of her voice:

"Spy! Secret agent! Low-life creep!" The strain of her effort produced a fit of coughing.

The schoolteacher, provoked beyond endurance, took advantage of her coughing and poked his head from behind his door. Quivering with anger, he raised his index finger.

"You, you, you square low-life creep!"

Square? What is this newfangled term that the bookworm has cooked up? The contending parties and the onookers were silenced for a moment, savoring the flavor of the term. Even the returning section head, Mr. Zhu, stopped in his tracks, with one foot across the threshold.

"You! Square yourself!" Mother Guo was the first to regain lier wits and gave him as good as she got. A smile stole across the tired face of Mr. Zhu, which he converted into a dry cough as soon as he saw Mother Guo catch him in the act.

"Smile, do you?" Mother Guo thought she had somehow lost out in the exchange of squares and moved to surer ground.

"Smile on your mother's fucking feet, you capitalist roader. You deserve a thousand cuts!"

At that time capitalist roader was the extreme form of opprobrium. The section head being denominated in this manner was too stunned to reply. Wasn't he made to clean the latrines every day at his workplace? He gave Mother Guo a look of contempt and dived into his room. Immediately the blaring of Dragon River Eulogy (one of the eight model operas) from his radio effectively drowned out all the sounds of battle in the little courtyard. When the section head had first rigged up an amplifier, I had been mystified by his sudden interest in the radio programs. Only now did I begin to understand.

The sounds were drowned out, but the faces were still there before my eyes—livid faces, tearful, furious, vicious, pained, desperate, heartrending.

I shut the door and leaned against it in anguish. My deaf old mother came in from the backdoor. How lucky she is, I thought. She is above and beyond all this sordidness. She can dismiss everything. But now she cocked her ears and tried to catch what was going on. She crept up to me on tiptoe and shouted into my ears.

"Now, who is it who started the row?"

I gave her a look of disapproval. Then I was struck by the question. Who indeed!

Suddenly the loudspeaker at the top of the Economic Committee building was turned on full blast, drowning out the radio, literally enveloping us with its sound. The air around me seemed to quiver with the vibration. My nerves could not stand it anymore. My head began to swim. A humming assaulted my ears.

I knew that in a minute the racking pain would return. I lay down quickly and put my fingers to my ears.

Heavens, when will all this end?

1943

16.38 A Dream Of Good Fortune\fn{by Hwang Sogyong (1943-)} Manchuria, China (M) 18

A roof-tile factory with an evil-looking smokestack stood alone on a sprawling, denuded hillside, looming above the housing sites spread about the reddish-brown earth. The sun was setting, and the sparks soaring from the smokestack gradually began to glitter in the murky sky. Simple frame houses and squat huts were clustered here and there amid the undeveloped land at the foot of the hill.

Nearby, Kang pulled his can past a depression beside the back wall of a chemical factory. Great heaps of rubbish were reflected in the grayish waste water that always collected there. Kang wore only a sleeveless T-shirt, tattered corduroy jodhpurs, and a perforated straw hat pulled down over his forehead. These clothes must have been picked from rags, and even the looks of their owner were worn and faded, like streamside pebbles parched by a drought. Kang looked like someone who had popped out of an ancient, yellowing photograph. He had the grizzled hair of a fifty-year-old, but his gait was dignified and his shoulders were solid from years of shouldering weight on a pole.

Kang hauled his can through a tangle of rusty galvanized-iron lean-tos built by the Reconstruction Corps—that was what they called the ragpickers these days. Half a dozen men were busy soning through the rubbish heaps, separating the jumble of paper, bottles, broken glass, wooden boxes, and tin cans into piles. Those who had just returned from their scavenging had unfastened bamboo baskets from their shoulders and were pouring the contents onto the heaps.

Boss, an older rag-picker who headed this branch of the Reconstruction Corp, was directing the work. He wore a field jacket whose pockets hung to the sides like ears; a reservist's cap was thrust down almost to his nose.

"Hey—get anything?" Kang greeted the man.

"Just get back?" Boss replied offhandedly.

"Get anything? Shit—I might as well try to find a middle leg on a woman," wisecracked a younger rag-picker next to him.

Boss looked askance at the other.

"Tell that to your old man, asshole, and see what he thinks."

He wiped his nose with one of the cotton gloves he was wearing.

Kang merely coughed instead of joining the banter.

"Unless I swipe something, the best I can come up with is stuff like this," Boss replied to Kang.

Kang somehow looked quite content, Boss felt. Judging from his greeting, he must not have made out too badly that day.

"How about buying me a drink? You look like you made some money."

"Not enough for all the legwork I do." But then Kang opened up.

"I got some wire."

"How much?"

"Fifteen pounds or so."

Kang made three or four hundred won a day at most. Sometimes the neighborhood kids sneaked him useful items from home, and there were days when petty thieves who had hit the jackpot but lost the services of their fence would sell to him. In such cases Kang would inspect the surroundings, quickly exchange taffy or cash, and make his getaway. Nothing was more certain than a trip to the slammer if he were unlucky enough to be caught. Today he had worked a good deal on some electric wire from a suspicious character, then resold it.

And that wasn't all.

"Take a look inside, pal." Kang pushed aside a wooden taffy tray and a plastic bag of popcorn.

Wondering what treasure was there, Boss craned his head into the cart, then jerked it back.

"That's an animal, isn't it?"

The gray legs of a dog protruded from a sack.

"You bet! Big as a calf."

"A shepherd! Yeah, he's no runt, is he? What did you do, cozy up and knock it over the head?"

"Come on—I got it from the owner. Everything's aboveboard."

The dog had a fine coat. Boss gave the tail a tug, but couldn't budge the heavy animal. He was about to touch its ears when Kang subtly deflected his hand with the taffy board. Boss clicked his tongue, reluctant to withdraw.

"Just what the doctor ordered. The Dog Day before this, we ended up with squat."

"But you'll have to chip in," said Kang.

"What a great guy! All right, I'm good for some booze. But only if it's safe to eat—I don't want to croak, you know."

Kang surveyed Boss from head to foot as if he had said all he was going to say, then gave his cart a push.

"Okay, I get the message," Boss said fretfully. "It won't kill us. I can roast the hair off it, so be sure to give me a holler."

"You'll bring a bucket of makkolli?"

"I just said I would. Quit your worrying."

Kang nodded deliberately. "Good enough." Every time Kang thought about what was under the taffy tray, his heart throbbed like that of a young woman at her first marriage interview. Plump and heavy as a man in the prime of life, the dog was almost too handsome to eat.

Boss still couldn't believe it.

"What a find! It's not easy to see a dog during Dog Days."

"Still wondering how I got it? Well, I'm coming down in front of Kangnam School and this woman gives me a shout. I figure she has some scrap iron or something, so I follow her."

They had gone to a veterinarian's. The dog had been run over by a car. Its injuries weren't fatal, but both its hind legs were broken and there was no doubt it would be lame. The woman asked the vet to give the dog a shot to put it out of its misery, and within a short time it had spread its legs wide and was gone. The problem was how to get rid of the bulky beast. The vet wanted it disposed of immediately, but the woman had decided to bury it in some sunny place. It wasn't quite right to put it in her garden, she said, but then she couldn't just throw it in the garbage can either. What's more, she'd have to travel some distance to find a hill or an empty lot suitable for burial. Meanwhile, the woman's daughter was whining over the animal.

It was then that they heard the clanging shears heralding the approach of a junk dealer. The woman had all she could do to soothe her daughter while asking Kang to take the dog and bury it.

"Man, I'm telling you, with its tongue hanging out and its legs spreadeagled it looked just like a tiger. I was drooling the whole time, but they probably never dreamed I might have other plans for the dog."

Suppressing a feeling of triumph, Kang had loaded the dog into his cart. And as if that weren't enough, the woman had given him a full three hundred won for his trouble. It wasn't just a stroke of luck but a veritable windfall. While the daughter cried and the woman breathed a sigh of relief, Kang had to grit his molars to contain his excitement, which was causing his nose to twitch. Once out of their sight, he had looked inside the cart to see just how big the dog was.

"I don't get any meat these days, so my psoriasis is acting up," Kang continued. "Every day, skin flakes off like bits of rice. You know, I'd been thinking a stray mutt would be just the thing to eat to build up the old constitution."

Boss listened with a look of wonder and admiration.

"Sounds like the gentleman who ran it over deserves all the credit, and not the lady."

"That's a fact. It wasn't rat poison and it wasn't a fit; it was a gentleman in a car hitting a big fat dog. He did right by us."

The two men were of one mind, and their laughter came easily. Kang had received not only a healthy day's earnings but the three hundred won as well. He had then thrown down a couple of shots of rotgut at a bar, indulging himself in his achievement. It was on his way home from the bar that he had met Boss.

"Okay, see you in a bit."

Kang exultantly pushed his cart into a neighborhood whose rows of dwellings could hardly be distinguished from the garbage heaps along the cement embankment about a foot and a half high that bordered a broad open sewer. Almost anyone who saw him could have guessed how his day had turned out. His dignified gait, his head held erect, his cart rolling lightly along, the jaunty angle of his hat, and the first question he asked anyone he met —"How'd you make out today?"—left no doubt that his day had been the best.

An old man who lent money at daily interest emerged from the public toilet The head of the neighborhood association had raised black goats there until the previous year, but he'd never made any money at it. His goat-pen was now a hut used as the neighborhood toilet.

"You're going to be a grandfather."

The moneylender stood with both hands stuck inside the dirty pajama bottoms he was wearing.

"What are you talking about?" Kang asked.

"Misun's back."

"That little tramp!"

"Hard to recognize her. She's with child, you know."

Kang could only click his tongue in irritation. A few days earlier, his wife had been sobbing over a letter from Misun. He knew what this moneylender was like, and was not unaware of his habit of toying with people. Even so, this news galled him to no end. He was about to say, "She's not my girl anymore." But this was too hardhearted, and his face prickled with shame.

"What a pain in the ass! As far as your money's concerned, you'll get it whether the bitch is dead or alive. Talk to my old lady about it."

The old man was somewhat agreeable today. He had given up trying to find out if Kang intended to pay him back, but now there seemed to be hope.

"Misun's the one who started it all. Now that she's back, no problem."

"I agree," said Kang. "I'll leave the whole thing up to you."

"Listen to what she says. You'll see I've been telling you the truth. And the parents have to take some of the responsibility."

"But I had nothing to do with it."

Not satisfied with this, the old man shot a piercing look at Kang and his cart.

"Her stomach's just like a watermelon," he chuckled. "I'll bet it's twin boys."

"Damned slut!"

Kang gave the cart a shove and entered an alley lined with low piles of bricks. The houses sat low enough to reveal their tarpaper roofs held down by rocks, and the slanting sheets of light green plastic that served as vents and windows. Beyond the other end of the alley was the neighborhood's single water pump and—an old custom reflecting the residents" rural origins—plots of vegetables being cultivated in the undeveloped land: scallions, cabbage, com, and such. Most of the other workingmen had returned home, washed up and changed, and found a spot among the empty lots to squat and take in the breeze. Kang exchanged cursory greetings with a few of them.

Kang's boy saw him, left his playmates, and dashed over.

"Dad—Uncle's back. And he brought Misun."

Kang removed the taffy and popcorn from the can, then hoisted the dog. The children gathered, and there was a stir among the scattering of grownups. Kang, noticing his boy clinging to the taffy tray, punched him in the back.

"Little bastard!"

Kang turned toward his house, which was already dark. There was usually a response to his arrival, but today all was quiet.

Stamping in vexation, the boy heaped abuse at his father's back:

"Dad's a sonofabitch! Dad's a fucker, a fucker!"

Ignoring this, Kang toted the dog into his kitchen and set it on a shelf. The wooden plank bent under the weight.

One fellow, perhaps designated by the neighbors, stuck his head in.

"How about if we get a fire going?"

"Okay," Kang readily replied.

Kang entered the family room and just missed stepping on his wife's stomach. She was lying on the floor with a thin sheet pulled over the top of her head. Kang turned on the light and stared at his wife's body in its white shroud.

"What's eating you so early in the evening? How do you think I feel after pounding the pavement all day long?"

"Spare me—I'm not in the mood."

"Great! Just lying there like you've gone nuts."

Not wanting to aggravate his wife, Kang swallowed an urge to bark at her some more. But just then his boy, sitting astride the doorsill, started whining.

"Little son of a whore! You want to die?" Kang shouted.

The boy burst into tears.

"Well done," Kang's wife murmured from beneath the sheet. "What a way for a father and son to behave. The simpleton—is he whining because he can't shove anything more down his gullet?"

"That's right, bitch. And your two kids are real charmers too."

Kang's wife peeled off the sheet and lurched upright.

"If you had a thousand mouths you still wouldn't have anything worth saying. When have you ever tried to be a father to them? When? Have you ever? I'm so ashamed in front of others I could die. A man of your age still going after sex … I know, why bring it up now, but who knocked me up so I had to get married again? How old was I when I had that kid? How many others did I get rid of? Tell me."

"Woman, you really are something! Like mother, like daughter. So, Misun's back?"

"Why did I ever get myself into this? What a silly broad I was."

The sliding door to the back room rattled.

"Damn family," Kang growled, "I ought to burn this mother down."

At last the door slid open. Sure enough, there was Kang's brother-in-law in a dandy suit and a neat tie. He rose and emerged, hunched over.

"Hello, Brother-in-Law. Please calm down. The others will hear."

"Oh, the whole neighborhood knows."

Losing his temper, Kang punched his knee over and over. "It's natural for kids to make their parents worry," he said to his wife, "but there has to be a limit. Why did that slut make up a story, borrow money at daily interest, and then take off! That's what gets me, We've gotten used to the moneylender bugging us, but if I say one word about Misun coming back home with her belly sticking out, you get bent out of shape. I'm a father, with a reputation like anyone else—a father!"

"Good grief. Well, how admirable. Father who can't bring any money home, if you were the outside of a cabbage, at least I could boil you and make soup."

"Sister, you stop too," said her brother. "As the Bible says …"

Here we go again, Kang thought indignantly. His boy turned pale and was about to run off when Kang grabbed his wrist and said in an overly plaintive tone:

"Let's go outside. Father'll give you some taffy."

Kang's wife gave a deep sigh that became a trembling sob, then threw herself down again. Her brother, seating himself squarely, began praying in a deep, encouraging voice.

"Almighty Jehovah, we in this family beseech you to cleanse us of the worry and suffering that dwell among us. May we sin no more in your presence, Father. Although she who went away has just returned and our family has come together again, we know not how to thank you. Instead, we feud and forget your kindness, Heavenly Father, though we struggle in poverty and anguish on this earth and know not heaven, show us the way; include us in your ranks on judgment day. We who are about to stand in the presence of heaven, we sinners …"

"Cut it out! 'Sinner, sinner'—it makes me sick. These days the King of Kings is getting on my nerves."

Kang's brother-in-law flinched at this outcry but didn't stop.

" … we sinners, every one of us, will repent and become faithful; we will praise the glory of the Lord. We know that our unhappiness comes from our sins. We ask of you, bestow perpetual grace on Kunho, who is working the night shift at the factory, and on the head of this household, and bless the life Misun is bearing …"

A choking sound came from the other side of the sliding door.

Kang's wife became still. The prayer continued.

" … Oh God, make us all your children. We beseech you once more, save us from the burning brimstone of hell, and allow us to live, with the Lord's favor, in truth and hope. We unworthy sinners, lacking any merit, pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen."

This talk of sinners, heaven, and hell seemed to have suddenly filled the room with a sweet, languid sorrow and expectation. Behind the sliding door Misun felt the tension drain from her chest. But her mother couldn't avoid feeling she herself had somehow been treated unfairly. Her uncle, still sitting piously, leafed through his Bible, its pages marked through and through with a colored pencil, and read to himself.

The old clock on the wall struck eight. Next to it, mounted in a frame, were several photographs fading with age. And beside them was a calendar, brought home by Kunho, advertising a cosmetics company. The current month showed a woman in sheer underwear with her legs coyly spread. On a low desk stood such books as a Japanese primer, a dog-eared economics text, a Chinese historical romance, Andrew Carnegie's autobiography, and a volume titled The Secret of Success.\fn{Andrew Carnegie (1835-1919) was an American industrialist and philahthropist, responsible, among other charities, for endowing over 1,700 libraries—called, after him, "Carnegie Libraries"—all across the United States. His autobiography was edited By J. C. Van Dyke in 1920.} On top of the worn-out, old-fashioned bureau was a portable hi-fi that Kang's wife turned all the way up whenever she was in the mood. The songs from the old days, performed on an electric organ, sounded to her like rice gruel boiling in a pot. It was something Kang had given her as a present rather than turning over to a second-hand shop.

But now Kang's wife was in no mood for music. She hated Misun to death, yet pitied her, realizing in retrospect that as her mother she was entirely to blame. The evening breeze felt chilly, so she pulled the cord from the vented window in the ceiling and it banged shut. She heaved another sigh. Her expression was much more composed now; by nature she was hot-tempered but cooled off easily. Though she was almost fifty, the skin on her face was taut and she had kept her figure.

"It's all my fault. I lost my head and got married again—to an old halfwit," she said to herself with a sigh of grief.

It was in the city of Ch'onan that she met Kang. Her first husband had been lost in heavy seas off Taebu Island—her previous home—and she had settled in Ch'onan shortly thereafter. Finding it difficult to raise Misun and Kunho as a single mother, she had taken to selling rice cakes filled with bean jam on the trains, using a nook at the station to avoid the security men. Kang, still brawny, handled freight at the station. Before they knew it, this rice-cake vendor and freight hand had caught each other's eye. Having been two-timed once, Kang had lost heart with women. But even though he was not your usual bachelor, he couldn't help falling for this widow who had kept her charms. It was long before their child was born that they had moved to Seoul. Though arriving empty-handed, Kang knew how to provide, and the family had quickly adapted to their new life.

Absorbed in these thoughts, Kang's wife called her daughter as mildly as she could.

"Misun, come over here."

Misun, barely replying in a voice that seemed to retreat rather than project from her throat, squatted hesitantly at the threshold of the back room, her head sunk squarely on her chest.

"What's the plan? Have the baby just like that?"

Misun fingered the hem of her skirt without answering.

Her mother repeated the question, lifting Misun's chin, but the girl's head drooped again as soon as she let go.

"It's not going to work. Let's talk with your brother, and then tomorrow we'll go to the hospital."

Looking at her daughter's slender face and swollen abdomen, she wiped away tears with her fingers.

"It's not six months yet—there has to be a way out."

Misun's head snapped up.

"I don't want to."

"Then what are we supposed to do with a kid and no dad?"

"It's got one."

"So where is he? He ought to be right here explaining the situation and asking permission to get married, or if the timing isn't good, then asking us to wait awhile. Fat chance we have when you come crawling in with a big belly like a mangy dog. When Kunho sees that, he'll blow his stack—he'll kill you."

Her brother, still looking through his Bible, broke in.

"Sister, how could you kill a healthy, living baby?"

"Don't you butt in. The things that come out of that mouth of yours … you know what it's like for us to make ends meet."

Her brother tried to change the subject.

"Was I ever surprised when Misun showed up. I couldn't get her to tell me anything—all she did was cry. But I did get the impression that they lived together before they split up."

"Did you split up with the guy? What happened?"

"He went in the army. He said he was going to learn how to drive, and we could get married when he got out."

"What if it was somebody besides him?" her mother asked.

"Oh, I don't know," Misun said, brazenly ignoring her mother's feelings. "He's got a good personality, but he's lazy."

Her mother gave her a rap on the head and heaved a deep sigh.

"There's no other way. We've got to settle this. If you don't want an abortion, then write this creep and make him own up."

"Mom, he's not some knight in shining armor."

Her mother spoke half to herself:

"Before we do anything else, we're going to get you out of this mess."

"All right, if you can find someone who'll accept the baby, then I'll marry him."

Kang's brother-in-law slapped his knee. "Terrific! Thank you, Lord."

"Oh, be quiet!" said Kang's wife. "My guts are so torn up I could die." Misun was now completely philosophical: whatever happened was fine. A few tears dribbled out, and that was all. In truth she looked less dejected than her mother.

"I'll do it your way."

"Oh, how wonderful. Crazy bitch!"

Her mother tried to make a rough estimate. It looked as if the wedding would come to thirty or forty thousand won, no matter how she worked it. And there was the twenty thousand Misun had borrowed at daily interest when she ran away. To make good on the debt and then pay for a wedding would easily require fifty thousand won. In addition, someone had to provide for Misun until she was able to go back to work at the wig factory. But the immediate question was, who would want this young thing for a wife? As soon as one cause for concern disappeared, a new one cropped up.

"This is going to be quite a project. What happened to that money you borrowed, anyway?" she asked Misun.

"I took out a room. And the ten thousand that was left—I blew it the month after he went in the army."

"You should've gone to hell instead. Then I'd feel better."

They needed money—that was the bottom line.

Kang's wife tried again to calculate how much Kunho would bring home that month. Since he'd put in a lot of time on the night shift, he'd probably make at least fourteen thousand. What if they could get by on barley and wheat flour on the money Kang brought home? And they'd have to rent out the back room. But there was no guarantee that events would tally with this scenario. As for blood relatives, there was just her brother. If he could help out with ten thousand for the ceremony, how proud of him she would be! She picked up her brother's Bible and shook it in front of his nose.

"Eating comes first, then Jesus and all the rest. You think you can save the world by locking yourself up in that mountain chapel for the rest of your days? I wish you'd make a clean break with them, so you could get your hands on some money."

"Sister … now what's wrong with my being there? It's the least I could do after God helped me get over my mental problems. And starting next month I'll be in charge of the chapel and get thirty thousand a month to live on."

"That's what I like to hear! I'll lend it out at high interest And how about ten thousand for the wedding?"

"I'll bring that up with the evangelist."

"Good luck! And I suppose the next thing you'll tell me is that it's your turn to get some of the money those people donate who go there to bow and pray—those sinners with heavy hearts and the ones who have such a tough life."

"You'd be surprised. The financial situation at the chapel really is better these days."

As soon as Kang's wife had made up her mind about her daughter, her worries seemed to ease. Although the family was pinched from day to day and occasionally in danger of breaking up because of its poverty, the five of them managed to survive. There's always a way … things will work out somehow. She had made a vague decision to go through with a wedding, but that child inside Misun was more worrisome than anything else. A baby without a dad? No way.

"I've never had money to live on—only deception," she mumbled to herself as she stepped down into the kitchen.

*

A bonfire blazed in the field across the sewer ditch, fed by apple boxes split by Kang's neighbors. In the pitch darkness where one day a factory would stand, the flames shot up to reveal weeds head-high among piles of rubbish. Humming and chuckling could be heard amid the stir of the men gathered about the fire. As soon as the flames had come to life and the fire had stopped smoking, they had strung up the dog and begun singeing off its hair. When you have fire, liquor, and meat, it's only natural that you'll give fresh life to a gathering. And these men chuckled and swapped jokes like a bunch of mischievous country boys who had just stolen some chickens. The womenfolk watched this cheerful group with satisfaction, for their men were usually irritable and dispirited in the evening. The women remained on the far side of the ditch, but the impetuous little ones had crossed over and were hanging around in clusters among the grownups. Their faces and naked chests flickered crimson, and the smell of scorched fur filled the fireside air.

In groups of half a dozen or more, the men made a point of thanking Kang. Since they had all contributed toward the bucket of makkolli, no one felt like a deadbeat waiting for the meat. Water was boiling in the iron kettle brought by Boss. The dry wood crackled, and fat ran from the skin of the dog, now stripped of its fur and black as coal. The men talked about the neighbohood that had sat until this day below the roof-tile factory, occasionally looking apprehensively at the flat expanse where not a dot of light could be seen.

"We're pretty lucky, aren't we?" said the gray-haired, bespectacled head of the neighborhood association. "The people at the district office say that since our neighborhood's been here more than ten years, they'll compensate us. Anyway, there shouldn't be any problem before next year."

"I sure hope not," said one of the other men. "After all, most of us came here to put in the foundation of that factory. That's how this neighbomood got started."

"So when they do tear down our neighborhood," the headman continued, "they'll pay fifty thousand won per household.”

“Damn—that’s not too bad,” the other replied.

“Come on, pal, don’t let the booze go to your head. You think fifty thousand is enough for that imperial palace of yours?”

“Well, I guess not … yeah, it’s an imperial palace to us, all right!”

The loud jangle of a bicycle bell sounded behind them. A tall, well-built man with several wooden tubs piled on the carrying rack of his bicycle came alongside.

“Looks like you boys planned on counting me out of this one.”

“Tokpae—you’re just in time. How about the liquor peddler treating us to some drinks, huh?”

“Yeah, take the night off from that booze stand of yours and get some nourishment into you.”

Tokpae propped the bicycle against the inside of his thigh.

“How’d it turn out?” he asked the headman. “Did someone say each household gets fifty thousand?”

“I’m not sure when they’ll tear the houses down, but I think we’re safe for this year. Just remember—I’ve been busting my ass on this.”

The headman patted himself on the chest.

Tokpae thought for a moment as he whisked away the sweat streaming down his forehead with the back of his hand.

“What about a case like this: I’m thinking of renting out one of our rooms. When it’s time for us to get out, would the tenants get fifty thousand too?”

“You’ll have to work that out in advance and get it down in writing.”

“Could you help me out? They’re coming tomorrow, and you’re the only one I can count on.”

“You need a witness? Okay—but you’ll have to treat me.”

“No problem.”

“Hey, Tokpae, we’ve got an empty room too, you know,” said Kang, who had been thinking of every possible way to pay off Misun’s loan. Despite wrangling with his wife, he felt remorse over Misun’s predicament. It was a fact that he had never shown any affection to Misun and Kunho.

“You meet a lot of people on the street. Why don’t you fmd someone for us, too?”

“Let’s wait and see,” Tokpae replied. “The people who’re coming tomorrow might know someone.”

“What kind of work do you suppose these guys are going to do?”

“What do you think? Anyone who’s looking for a place around here is up from the countryside putting in for factory work—remember?”

“Yeah, I suppose so.”

“Considering the room, I ought to be able to get twenty thousand from those hicks,” said Tokpae.

“Listen to this guy! I suppose you're not a hick?”

“Cut it out. I’ve been drinking city water for six years now.”

“And you still don’t know your way around town. You think this here isn’t the sticks? Let me tell you something, buddy—this is the boondocks.”

Tokpae turned away from the boisterous joking, pushed off on his bicycle, and passed by the field. The traces of furrows made the road bumpy. Every time the wheels caught on something Tokpae cursed to himself:

“Scummy, idiot bitch!”

He couldn’t help being in a foul mood, for his wife had told him to go home and cook more noodles for the liquor stall. This meant business was good these days, but wasn’t it a fact that the goddamned broad didn’t have an ounce of foresight? They’d taken a beating on that tub of sea cucumbers she’d bought: the things had turned bad and she’d had to toss them. Ditto with half the sausage. She knew that the people on the night shift always ordered noodles, but just the same she’d come up short.

Tokpae crossed the sewer ditch on a plank bridge connecting the cement embankments and walked his bicycle onto a broad asphalt street that stretched right and left. In both directions were bright streetlights and a row of factories. The solitary sound of machines filled the empty street. The liquor stall was at the edge of the ditch where the factory buildings and an abbreviated commercial area came to an end. Inside the stall were seats fashioned from logs and boards.

“Where the hell have you been?”

While Tokpae was parking his bicycle behind the stall his wife began ticking off a litany of grievances.

“We just lost a couple of parties, you know … did the big one go home?”

“I didn’t see him.”

"What did I tell you! I'll bet he's got his eyes glued to the TV in the comic book shop again. Just wait till that little bastard shows up."

Innocently clicking his tongue, Tokpae set down the tubs of noodles with a thud and went inside the stall. A man who had been swilling makkolli held up his glass in greeting. He was a peddler of transistor radios who stopped by every evening for a drink.

Tokpae responded with a nod.

"Well, look who's here," he said uneasily.

"That old lady of mine is getting carried away."

"Life has a way of doing that to people."

"I couldn't have put it better myself. Making a living is one big headache."

"I'll bet I walked thirty miles today, and that's no lie," the peddler said with a sigh. He stroked his sparse beard. His face was always melancholy. Though his expression was less somber now than several months before, it was still a bit gloomy. That spring he had been released from prison. It was no big deal, he had said, but according to the gossip of the people across the ditch, he had been jailed for sticking a knife in his deranged wife.

Tokpae hoped the peddler wouldn't drink too much that evening. He was quite familiar with the lethargy and insecurity that dwelled in the faces of the men who had lost their jobs, and he knew that when the peddler grew excited he would sometimes crow about his days as a clerk. Realizing the peddler lived in the neighborhood that had been leveled that day, Tokpae became completely ill at ease. And today of all days the snack plate was empty except for a couple of deep-fried morsels. He chopped up some baby octopus and set it on the plate.

"You must be tired," Tokpae said to the peddler. "Maybe you ought to hustle on home."

"Well, I guess I could … but it's so godawful hot I think I'll take it easy here."

"Was there some trouble in our neighborhood today, honey?" Tokpae's wife asked.

Tokpae elbowed her, at the same time nonchalantly offering the peddler a cigarette.

"Trouble?" the peddler asked laconically.

"Umm … let's see … oh yeah, everybody had to line up for water-boy, it's been dry," said Tokpae.

As if she had just remembered something, Tokpae's wife untied her apron, grumbling all the while.

"Damn brats … you mind the place, okay?"

"Just forget about them, huh?"

"They don't study like I tell them to. Every day it's the TV or the comics—I'm sick and tired of it. And they're always getting into the money box."

Tokpae sighed.

"Educating the kids takes a lot of effort," he told the peddler, who was calculating some of his customers' monthly payments. "I'm trying every way I can to get the big one through school so he can get a desk job … I only went to middle school, and look at me."

The peddler smiled.

Tokpae's wife rushed out shouting, "When the factory kids come, check the account book and get what they owe for last month's rice cakes. I'll be right back."

"Hey, woman!"

Just as Tokpae was going out after her, an old man entered the stall and ordered a bowl of noodles and broth. Tokpae had no choice but to return. The man toted a folding chair and a whetstone worked by a crank. Probably sharpens knives and scissors, Tokpae thought. While Tokpae was preparing the noodles, the old man looked over the various rice cakes. After a while he took out some coins and counted them several times.

"How much for one of those sticky ones?"

"Ten won. A couple will fill you up more than plain rice. Sticky rice is the best thing if you can't get a square meal."

"Okay, I'll take one."

"Excuse me, mister," said a young man of about twenty in a thick, husky voice. He had bushy hair and wore a gaudy shirt.

"Hey, it's Kunho. What's up?" Tokpae said casually.

"Oh, not much—just out for a snort. Can you get me a drink?"

"Looks like you've done some snorting already," Tokpae said disapprovingly. Only then did he discover that Kunho's left hand was completely bandaged.

"What's wrong with your hand? Aha, been in a scrap."

"Huh? Oh, this. Yeah, I went a couple of rounds with somebody."

"Nice boys who think about their mothers avoid that sort of thing. Looks like your sister came back, young fella."

Kunho hesitated as he was reaching for the kettle of makkolli.

"Who?"

"You know who: Misun."

Kunho scowled, then shook his head roughly. For a moment he looked down vacantly toward his feet. Then, regaining his composure, he drank a glass of makkolli.

Tokpae served the old man his noodles and turned to the peddler.

"How much do you make in a day?"

"Oh, maybe a thousand won."

"Hey, that's not bad."

"That's on a good day. It's a different story during the rainy season and when it gets hot."

"I know, I used to be a salesman myself. This time of year, why don't you try parasols or something? You know, if you sell them on credit, the housewives get jealous of each other and snap them up one after the next."

"Parasols! They went out with straw shoes. Different things are in fashion now."

"Yeah, I guess times have changed. Would you believe I made two million won selling them?"

"You must have felt pretty flush."

Tokpae couldn't help tossing down a glass of makkolli. "Fuck it. Who the hell would've thought I'd end up like this?" Tokpae spoke over Kunho's head, which was still bowed as if the young man were mulling something over. "Two million, honest to God … I'm telling you, once I started making money I couldn't think arout anything else."

In a tone of exaggerated wonder, the peddler chimed in:

"It's shit luck—that's all it is. Grab it, and you make so much money it's scary." He spoke like someone who had also made millions in the past.

"You made two million—in cash?" the old man asked Tokpae.

"One fell swoop, hot off the press."

"How long did it take?" asked the peddler.

"Just one summer." Tokpae grew animated. "At first I was hustling by myself. Then I gave my cousin and my brother-in-law in Taegu a piece of the action. If only I'd quit while I was ahead and set up a nice safe business."

Tokpae struck himself on the forehead.

"I just wish I'd known about the tastes of Seoul people. I come up here to Seoul, and you know what? I really did try to think things out. In business you've got to use your head. I had the capital, I had energy to burn, and when I stopped to think about it I realized that practically every house in Seoul has some old folks in it. Now if a gentleman wants to go out for a walk he needs a walking stick, right? So I sank all my money into walking sticks. I figured I could sell them in front of the temples and playgrounds. I had more than a hundred of them carved every day—even hired some kids and sent them out. Ah, what an idiot I was. I can't figure this friggin' city out. The old folks didn't show up, and so the damn walking sticks were no better than kindling—that's the story."

"It sounds to me like you didn't use your head," said the old knife sharpener, who had been drinking his noodle broth. "If you want to know what an overnight fortune feels like, you'd better think like a thief. But for hicks it's the land that comes first. Walking sticks—that's what somebody from the countryside would dream up. I've got two kids, and if I don't work like a dog I can't get by in a big city like this."

All this talk had made Tokpae expansive. He was cranked up and felt like drinking his fill. Already he had fmished half a kettle of makkolli.

The long hair of a young woman swept inside the canvas curtains of the liquor stall and then withdrew. Voices chattered outside.

"There's a lot of guys in there."

"So what? Is eating something to be ashamed of""

Tokpae quickly followed the voices outside. Some factory girls on their way to work had stopped by for a snack. They all looked about the same age.

Well, well, thought Tokpae. Look at the little clams. He ushered in a cute, demure-looking one in pigtails.

"Come on in, girls. I'll whip up enough noodles to feed the whole bunch of you."

"You got rice cakes too, right?"

"You bet—all kinds. And I know how to make 'em tasty."

"Gee, those hands of yours are filthy."

"Knock it off. I'm always dipping them in water."
"Mister, when's the last time you took a leak?"
"Come on, I do my business with my hands behind my back."
While the banter continued, Tokpae went in through the canvas curtain behind the girls, a smile of satisfaction filling his reddish face. As the girls stepped inside, the cramped liquor stall swelled like a distended ball.
First the girls threw down a bowl of noodles apiece. Then they had some rice cakes and began to jabber.
"Hey, I've got a problem. I'm short on money again this month."
"Are we ever going to fmish being apprentices and get to be regulars? I think I'm going to quit."
"We can't go back home now. You girls think you can?"
"If we stick it out for a couple of years, we'll at least pick up some job skills."
"Are you kidding? If that kind of work is a skill, then so is cooking rice and making love."
"Well, they are … if you can sink your teeth into a rich one."
"I could go work in a bar, or else latch onto some guy who doesn't know better."
"A factory boy?"
"No way. Even after ten years the best they can do is foreman."
The knife sharpener put his tools in place over his shoulder and went out grumbling: "God. What in the world is it with these crude bitches? Don't they know how to keep their place with men? Ought to be ashamed going around at night cussing like that. If it was my girl I'd break her …"
The girls cried out in alarm.
Tokpae, putting a finger to his lips and gesturing with the other hand for the girls to relax, kept an eye on the old man as he left,
"Elderly men are all like that. They just think about the old days, or else they think they're back in the countryside going out for a good time."
"The old man might have been right," said Kunho, who had stopped drinking and become lost in thought.
"What?" said one of the girls.
"Don't get me wrong. I'm not saying you ladies did just like he said, but … frankly speaking … in this screwed-up area anyway, all someone has to do is sweet-talk the ladies and they put out. Isn't that right? I mean-"
"Look here, who do you think you're—"
"I'm serious!"
"Put out? Put out what?"
"Fix me up with a boyfriend, will you, mister?" one of the other factory girls said to Tokpae.
"How about me?" Tokpae replied. He looked around bleary-eyed at the girls, who were becoming more and more flippant.
A girl who was spitting out particularly trashy remarks answered coquettishly, as if she had been waiting for just that moment:
"You're too old—I don't think you'll do."
"Anyone here who can pay our rent for us?"
"I'd rather have someone pick up our tab here," Kunho interrupted in a voice just high enough with liquor: "Fuck! Now listen to me—I've got some money. So how about a date? I heard the Na Huna show's in this part of town."
The factory girls looked put off, as if their pride had somehow been injured.
"What time is it getting to be?" asked the demure one with the braided hair, who looked the oldest.
"Low-life bitches, you're ruining the mood," growled Kunho.
Tokpae made a flamboyant gesture and looked at his watch.
"Ten to nine."
"Those of us who're off work tomorrow let's go see Na Huna," said KUnho.
The girls grew sullen at this.
"Why don't you move on?" the cheeky one spat.
Someone outside called for Tokpae, and there was a glimpse of a policeman's cap and uniform. Tokpae's face suddenly tensed and he went out.
The girls started jabbering again.
"Hey, last night that short little guard who gives us a body search every day tried to get me to go play badminton with him. I wonder what he thinks he can see at night."
"You know Myongja, the one who started working in Manufacturing the month before last? These days she's short on money, so she takes business trips to an inn. Then she comes to work and makes like she's so prim and proper. Well, one of the girls tells her she saw her coming out of an inn, and then she gives her a poke, like she knows what's going on, so Myongja takes her into the bathroom and starts bawling and begging her not to say anything."

"Kim, the engineer, says he's going to Japan pretty soon for technical training."

"That's the first thing he says to every good-looking girl in the office—it's the way he gets women."

"I wish I could learn some Japanese too and go to the main office."

"The likes of us can't even get near people from the main office. That Miss Pak who works for Inspection—the skinny one, you know? I hear she's shacking up with the big wheel himself—Watanabe, or Waribashi, or whatever you call him."

"Toyota-no, Honda-no, skoshi, Tokyo-no, sayonara," said Kunho, who was feeling cocky among all the cackling girls. And then without warning he broke into a boisterous song:

Ŏlsshigusshigu, here we go!
Chŏlsshigusshigu, here we go!
Where are we going to bury the wretch
Who never, ever saw Seoul?
In front of Seoul Station we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever saw Seoul.
Factory boy, beggar boy, here we go!

The girls covered their ears, but Kŭnho, brandishing his bandaged hand, raised his voice to a howl as if he were the neighborhood tough guy:

In front of a college we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever studied.
In front of Myong-dong we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever spent money.
In front of a hotel we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever went dancing.
In front of a comic shop we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever read books.
In front of some yodelers we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever went hiking.
In the red-light district of Chongno we"ll bury the wretch
Who never, ever got married.
In Mugyo-dong we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever went drinking.
In front of a chapel we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever had a day off.
In front of a Western-style house we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever rode in a car.
In Vietnam we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever had chocolate.
In a rice pot we'll bury the wretch
Who never, ever had rice.
Factory boy, beggar boy, here we go!

Then, playing the part of a listener, he exclaimed, "God, it's noisy! Hey, beggar boy, I'll give you acoin. Now get lost!"

As Kunho began to repeat the song, Tokpae's head poked into the stall.

"Hey! Will you be quiet? Don't you have any sense, boy!"

The girls stampeded outside to see what was happening. Tokpae, his hand on the back of his neck, was nodding continuously while the policeman admonished him in a low voice. Tokpae's wife approached as she was herding home their kids, faces puffy with sulky expressions. Having become the focus of so many eyes, the policeman lost interest in what he was doing. He gave Tokpae a couple of pats on the back and then crossed the street at a snail's pace.

"How much did he shake you down for?" Tokpae's wife asked, scowling at the policeman's back.

"Two thousand," Tokpae said dispiritedly, his shoulders sagging.

“God, there goes three days’ business.”

As if all of this were the children’s fault, Tokpae’s wife roughly jabbed them in the chops. They began to scream as if they were dying. Tokpae hurled his apron to the ground.

“Maybe I should feed ’em rat poison … or sell the whole goddamn bunch to the Chinaman,” he muttered. “See, bitch? The cop knew I was looking after the place, so he came around and stuck out his hand.”

While Tokpae and his wife were thus preoccupied, the girls slipped away one or two at a time. After arguing some more, Tokpae fmally realized they were gone. He looked inside the stall and out, then set off down the street toward the factory, but he lost the girls at an intersection. He paused and caught his breath.

“What a shitty day! That woman always has to be bitching about something.”

There was a flash of red beneath a utility pole on the other side of the street at the entrance to a dim alley lit up by a streetlight. Gotcha, thought Tokpae, his temper flaring. He ran straight over, and as he entered the alley he heard soft footsteps ahead of him. He drew nearer and nearer to the sound.

“Hey! You think you can run away from me?” he roared.

The girl stopped running but continued slowly down the alley. Then she came to a halt and looked back apprehensively. As Tokpae came up beside her she cringed.

It was the demure one. Tokpae grabbed her hand before she could say anything.

“Damn girls! If you don’t pay you’ve got to leave something behind … come on, we’re going to the police station right now!”

The girl squirmed backward, trying to huddle in a ball.

“You’ve got it all wrong, mister,” she pleaded. “One of the other girls said she’d pay, but she ran away on us.”

“No excuses. Pay up!”

“I’m telling you the truth. I’ll give you the money for sure on payday. Have a heart, just this once. I have to get to work.”

As he yanked her toward him Tokpae had a fleeting urge to let her go—it’s only a lousy hundred won, he told himself. But then this kind of thing had happened all the time in the early days of his neighborhood: the one who was fleeced was always the one who had shown others a good heart.

“If you don’t have any money, you’ll have to leave me something. You’ve got a watch, don’t you?”

“No. I pawned it a few months ago, and I haven’t gone back for it yet.”

“Where do you live?”

“Over in those prefabs—building three.”

“Let’s get over there.”

The girl’s tone and gestures of supplication stopped. Shaking off Tokpae’s hand, she set out ahead of him. The road to the factory ended and they passed through a market. Tokpae relaxed, knowing he could see the girl’s red T-shirt ten yards away, and the girl, apparently deciding that one attempt to escape was humiliating enough, didn’t look back once. They zigzagged down a narrow, muddy alley among the prefabs, which looked much more attractive than Tokpae's neighborhood, and entered the girl’s building. Twenty families appeared to be living under that one roof. Both sides of the long hallway were lined with sliding doors, and from the rooms came the sounds of drunken rowdiness and the racket of men and women singing. The girl unlocked a door, stepped inside, and turned on the light. Tokpae couldn’t quite bring himself to follow her in; his chest began throbbing.

“Come on in. This is all I have,” the girl said, kicking aside a synthetic quilt lying in a heap on the floor. Two pots, two bowls, and some toiletries were lying on an overturned box that had once contained packets of instant noodles. Hanging on the wall were some shabby clothes, a photo of the singer Nam Chin with his shirt open at the chest, and a mirror; there was an ashtray on the floor. Feeling somewhat awkward, Tokpae sat down across the doorsill and lit a cigarette.

“You know, I didn’t plan things this way, but that was pretty cheeky what you did.”

The girl pouted and then with a knowing smile looked hard at Tokpae, but without making eye contact.

“Now that you’ve stopped me from getting to work on time, why don’t you take the quilt and go.”

“Well … maybe that’s not necessary.” Tokpae's eyes traveled to a small piece of paper tacked to the wall.

Existence
Though life deceives you, my beloved,
Don’t be sad or angry.
If days of sorrow are patiently endured,
Then days of joy are soon to come.
The present may be sad,

But if the mind dwells in the future,
Then all is momentary.
And what has passed is what is yearned for.

Sea gulls and clouds appeared below the poem.

Not bad, thought Tokpae; these kids must know something. Somehow he was reminded of the times he had wandered around by himself, and without really thinking about it he moved well inside the room.

"I'll … just … talk some and then go."

The girl sat uneasily with her back against the wall, singing a song about bygone days and an uncertain future.

"There's a saying that the hardships of youth are more precious than gold," said Tokpae. "But if you learn some job skills and eventually get married, then what's there to worry about?"

"Marriage? Oh, come on …"

Tokpae liked the way she scowled.

The girl stretched her legs comfortably and punched down her short skirt, which she had gathered retween them.

Tokpae anxiously tried to keep his eyes from straying to her white thighs.

"So you're going to get old and die all by yourself! You're in the prime of life—"

"Mister, as long as you're going to give me a break, could you do something else?"

"What's that?"

"Take care of our rent? I'll pay you back next month—promise. I've been sick this month and had to miss a whole week of work, so you can see I'm in the hole."

"You think I'm not playing with a full deck, or something?"

Tokpae was sitting so that the two of them faced each other. The girl undid her braids, and with fingers spread, pushed her hair back again and again. She looked much more feminine and mature now.

Tokpae wiped his sweaty palms on his knees and gulped.

"Good lord, how can a man's smell be so strong in a girl's room?"

The girl glanced up at the men's clothes hanging on the wall.

"Three of my friends live here too."

"This room's a coffm. I'll bet it's like cordwood when the four of you lie down."

"We'll always be friends and nothing else—we made a pledge."

The girl raised her wrist to display two ink dots made with a needle to seal the promise.

Tokpae nodded. "Looks like you could switch off with each other when you lie down—you know, man, woman, man, woman."

"Okay, mister, now I get it. You didn't come here to get the price of those noodles. At any rate, you got something up your sleeve." The girl lifted her arms and stretched.

Tokpae began inching his way toward her.

"You know, as far as family life is concerned … I haven't had any luck either."

The girl groaned.

"Your heart won't stand it. Will you take the quilt and go right now?"

She subtly drew up one of her legs and piled her hair against the side of her head.

Until now Tokpae had been sobering up, but all at once he felt flushed with liquor.

"All I know is I lost money today—dammit!"

With the tip of his foot he jerked the door shut.

*

Awk-awk-awk, byoo-tee-pool Sun-day,
Awk-awk-awk, byoo-tee-pool Sun-day.

Staggering along much like the peddler, Kunho kept repeating these few bars of a Western pop song that had caught his ear. He cared not that he knew only the one stanza. Every forceful, staccato "Awk!" lifted his spirits.

"It's the moment," he told the peddler. "We have to live for the moment."

"You bet! My place for another drink."

The peddler hoisted his load of radios higher on his shoulder, made a fist, and shook it resolutely in front of Kunho.

Kunho waved him off.

"Un-uh," he said, rapping his chest with the palm of his good hand. "I got some money today. Money … as much as a guy could want. There's a place called the Ch'ongju House down an alley near the neighborhood market. What do you say we drop by and give the girls a squeeze? Awk-awk-awk, byoo-tee-pool Sun-day …"

The two of them stumbled past a tangle of barbed wire outside a row of warehouses that belonged to an appliance factory. Some muscular men clad only in shorts were loading boxes onto trucks. The women reporting for the night shift stood in line having their work cards validated. A siren sounded from the factory, and a pair of girls who looked like sisters ran by, gripping each other's hand. There were no streetlights beyond the path to the warehouses, and Kunho and the peddler could scarcely make out their feet in the darkness.

"How much do you make, anyway?" the peddler asked.

"Me? Shit … three hundred twenty a day."

"You talk pretty big for that kind of pay. I thought—"

Bristling, Kunho stopped, produced a thick envelope from his shirt pocket, and shook it in front of the peddler's nose.

"We're not talking about pay. Take a look at this."

Like a boxer, Kunho proudly raised the hand with the huge bandage.

"It's a mess, isn't it? But it's a godsend, I tell you."

"What's this? … You been in a fight?"

"Fuck! You think I go around beating up on people? I had an accident. So I got pissed off and had a few drinks, and now I can't tell if I'm in a good mood or a bad mood."

"So they gave you money to get it treated."

"But I don't know whether it's too much or too little. Anyway, I lost three fingers, right in a row."

"Three?"

"Yeah. Thumb, index, middle. Three in a row, bye-bye. So, don't I have a reason to treat?"

"I can't drink on that kind of money. Let's go to my place," said the peddler in a soft voice. He placed his arm under Kunho's.

Kunho briefly held his ground.

"Let's go to my place instead. I've got my own room."

"But didn't Tokpae say that runaway sister of yours came back?"

"Ah, that bitch! I could kick the shit out of her and it wouldn't satisfy me. I might just throw her out—no problem. You watch me—the minute I see her I'm going to grab her by the scruff and give her a thrashing."

A gurgling sound interrupted this furious outburst, and Kunho hunched over and vomited at his feet. The peddler patted him on the back. Kunho, squatting in a heap, stuck the fingers of his good hand in his mouth and continued to throw up.

"Listen, fella—a woman's life can be hell if she hooks up with the wrong man."

Kunho hawked and spat, shook his head, and stood up with a sigh. "Come again?"

"I said we ought to have a little sympathy for women."

"Yeah, I know. I heard you served time on account of a woman."

"No, I got mixed up in a labor dispute. Actually, I was one of the guys who stuck with management."

"Doesn't matter what side you're on. If you get caught up in that stuff you get hurt."

"I acted like a peacemaker, but what I really wanted was to finagle some money from both sides so I could start my own business." The peddler clicked his tongue. Bit by bit his voice softened, as if it were retreating inside him. "It was a shitty thing to do."

"What's wrong with trying to make some money?"

"You live a little longer … and you'll find out. Are you happy you got yourself a pile of money for your hand?"

Kunho stared at his bandaged hand as if for the first time. It's only a bit of bad luck, he thought. And it's better than no money at all.

"Supposing I wasn't, what could I do about it? It was my fault."

"How much did you get, anyway?"

"Ten thousand apiece, so thirty thousand won."

Kunho was told he would also be treated at no cost at the factory infirmary and receive an extra month's pay. It wasn't as if the higher-ups had been completely cold and calculating, Kunho was thinking. At any rate, he wanted to show the peddler that his spirits weren't that low.

"The doctor said drinking would do me in, but he was just trying to scare me. It's hard without booze when you're feeling as weird as I am."

The two of them arrived at the embankment along the sewer ditch. The peddler walked silently in front, head bent forward. Kunho did something extravagant: he bought two packs of Milky Way cigarettes and gave one to the peddler. They stepped onto the embankment.

"You ought to call it quits and get some sleep," said the peddler. "Uh-oh, what's this? Backing out on me?"

"It's not that."

The peddler quickened his pace.

"I'm just saying go home and get some rest. Hell, we'll have another chance."

"What a bummer."

Kunho shot forth a long belch.

Transferring his load to the other shoulder, the peddler gazed across the sewer to the dark expanse where his neighborhood should have been.

"Strange," he murmured to himself. "Is the power out?"

"I want to tell you I'm glad I got to know you. I mean it. Let's get together once in a while for a snort. Awk-awk-awk, byoo-tee- pool Sun-day …"

"I'll see you at Tokpae's place. Where you headed?"

"Our house—over there at the foot of the embankment."

"Looks like they've got power."

"What a bummer. No shit."

"Okay. See you later."

The peddler crossed the sewer ditch.

Kunho continued along the embankment. The insects grew still at every "Byoo-tee-pool Sun-day."

Kunho worked for a Japanese company in the woodworking shop of a factory that produced radio and television cabinets. All day long he cut plywood, veneer, or synthetic resins to a standard size, using an electric saw. That day he had started work at six in the evening. After he had cut about two hundred pieces of six-by-twelve plywood, word had come from Quality Control that the standard was off by a fraction of an inch. With a tape measure Kunho had laid out the new dimensions on a piece of stock. Next he had set this piece on the saw blade, preparing to make a new model. As usual, he had then stepped on the starter switch. "Ow!" Blood sprayed over his work clothes. A co-worker pulled him back. It wasn't the pain but rather the tingling chill in his left forearm, as if it had been struck by a sledgehammer, that he couldn't stand.

"Is that you, Kiinho?"

It was his mother. She was sitting next to her brother on a straw mat spread out on the embankment. The two of them were enjoying the evening breeze.

Kunho remained standing.

"Hi, Uncle," he said bluntly. Then, addressing his mother defiantly: "I heard Misun came back."

His mother nodded.

"Don't say anything," his uncle told him.

"That bitch—I'm going to …"

Kunho brushed past them and was about to step down from the embankment when his mother grabbed his forearm.

"Pretend you don't know. Things are working out okay now. So, you've been drinking again."

"What's working out okay?"

"This fellow who might marry Misun was just here talking with us. He said he'd go over and see her."

"Ow-God, that hurts! Hands off, huh?"

Only then did Kunho's mother discover his bandaged hand.

"Well, isn't this nice. First you go out drinking, and then you get into a brawl, and now look at you …"

"What kind of guy is this would-be bridegroom?"

Kunho's uncle rose and dusted off the seat of his pants. Well aware that his nephew always regarded him with displeasure, he spoke in a slightly self-conscious tone.

"Uh, what's his name … the one who heads up the Reconstruction Corps."

"You mean that old fart Yi, the one who's always acting like a big shot?"

"You'd never know it from looking at him," said Kunho's mother, "but I understand he makes an awful lot of money from second-hand stuff."

"Are you kidding? He's nothing but a fucking rag-picker. Mother, we were brought up in a decent farming family. Did you raise Misun to give her to some son of a bitch who's no better than the dirt under my feet? She's not like you, Mother. She's pure—pure!" Kiinho said, indirectly criticizing his mother for remarrying. The liquor had loosened his tongue.

"Now you be quiet, boy. Pure? I wish. But she's not—she's …"

Clutching his forearm, Kunho squatted on the embankment and sighed through pursed lips.

"This throbbing is driving me crazy."

"Are you hurt bad?"

Kunho lit a cigarette and sank into thought: at this point, beating up his sister would only make him feel worse rather than less disappointed. He felt more and more resentful toward his mother.

"What does Misun have to say about all this?"

"Who knows? They're probably talking to each other right now."

Kunho shook his head and spat. He was quivering with emotion.

"Shit, what a low-life family."

"Something's gotten into you."

"Starting tomorrow, I'm not working."

"Now don't tell me you got fired. Wasn't it a fight?"

"I had an accident. I'll get my pay, same as always, so don't worry. And …"

Kunho produced the thick envelope and thrust it toward his mother.

"Take this and hold onto it. Don't let the old man know. And don't spend it unless you know what you're doing."

His mother took the money out of the envelope and glanced about uneasily.

"What's all this money for?"

"It's thirty thousand won."

"Thirty … thirty thousand … where'd you get it?"

"From the company—I had an accident at work."

"My oh my—bless us. Thirty thousand won at a time like this! You know, I didn't worry all that much—I knew there'd be a way out. This is wonderful!"

"And this throbbing is killing me. Maybe I need another drink."

While Kunho was rubbing his wrist, which had started to swell, his mother counted the money, holding the bills in front of her nose and folding them over one at a time. Murmuring could be heard from across the sewer ditch, and the bonfire was visible.

"What's going on over there? An ancestral ceremony?"

His mother remained absorbed in counting.

"Drinking," his uncle said, clicking his tongue.

"Say, there's only twenty-eight thousand."

"Oh yeah—subtract two thousand for the drinks."

"Two thousand! What have you been swilling? If you'd come right home you could've drunk for free and had your fill of dogmeat."

"Dogmeat? Where'd they get their hands on a dog?"

"Your father got one as big as an ox. There's enough for a dozen big men to gnaw on all evening, and then some."

"Instead of bringing home money—he ought to be ashamed."

"It's no skin off my back if you don't want to eat."

Kunho was about to express further dissatisfaction with Kang, but gave up. As people say, even a worthless husband is better than a filial son.

"So Misun and that guy are the only ones at home now?"

His mother pleaded with him to understand.

"Yeah. Go on over and say hello. See how things are going, and try to keep the ball rolling."

Kunho became noticeably less testy. He clicked his tongue.

"As far as I'm concerned," he muttered, "if Misun turns out okay, I'll be happy. But I'm not going to butt in. This is the bitch who was screwing around and ran away, and she's not going to listen to anyone this time either. Nothing left to save for her husband. She's just a pain in the ass. Are you really serious about this marriage?"

"Why not?" said his mother as she stuck the money in her waist-band. "Since he mentioned it first and he's already following up, I'd just as soon be done with it. If they want to get married in the next few days, fine."

“There’s going to be gossip. Selling off a pregnant girl—that’s what they’ll say.”

“Now look you—are we supposed to take you seriously when you run off at the yap like that?”

“I can guess what you’ll use that thirty thousand for.”

“So, you’re going to feel sorry for yourself if we put that money toward the wedding? Isn’t she your only sister?”

“Sister, I don’t think that’s what Kunho meant. He said it because he’s proud to be helping out.”Uncomfortable with this flareup, Kunho’s Uncle gently prodded his sister.

“Dammit!” Kunho shouted as he picked his way down the embankment. “That money cost me three fingers, that’s what!”

“Well, well, a brat who couldn’t care less about his sister. So you got hurt—you can get it treated. When the family’s threatened like this, we all have to make some adjustments and get through it the best we can. Now look—if you’re going to act like the servant who became chauffeur, then who needs your help?”

Kunho scuttled across the sewer ditch toward the field where the dogmeat was supposed to be.

His mother poured out more invectives, but then tears of remorse began to trickle from her eyes. Before long she was unburdening herself to her brother, telling of her years selling rice cakes to support the two children.

“Well, like I said, you’ll find peace if you believe in the Lord,” said her brother as he patted her rhythmically on the back.

“I guess I’d better visit one of those Jesus temples before I get any older.”

“Now that’s more like it.”

They rolled up the straw mat and headed home. The men and children had long since departed for the field, and the neighborhood was perfectly still. The women were sleeping here and there on mats along the paths.

The two of them stopped in front of the kitchen and peeked inside the house. They heard the gravelly voice of Boss as he made his case before Misun.

“Even wild geese fly off together, so why can’t two lonely people like us try to make a go of it? In my thirty-five years I’ve been through every hardship you could imagine, and I haven’t blinked once. But I haven’t met a woman who suits my fancy. Heh-heh. Now I don’t look at life in terms of black and white. When I heard you came back, that opened up some old wounds and I got angry. But I made up my mind. It’s forbidden fruit all right, but who cares whose baby it is? I’ll be the dad and we’ll bring it up together.”

Boss seemed intoxicated by his own glibness.

“I may not look like much, but I’ve got an Eagle hi-fi and thirty LPs\fn{Long-playing records.} worth of tunes from the old days. I’ve got a cinder-block house that I built with my own hands, and we’ll lay in a little old TV and a mother-of-pearl wardrobe.”

Kang’s wife prodded her brother firmly and nodded.

“Look at that. Now if Misun will just answer him, the wedding’ll be in the bag. Goodness, I’ve never seen a man propose that fast—like lightning!”

Misun said something in a low voice, and then Boss could be heard chuckling.

“Fine and dandy. I’ve got a big announcement to make to the neighbors, and then I’ll be back.”

The door rattled open as if it were about to fall from its hinges, and Boss’s broad, smiling face, flushed with satisfaction, popped out.

Kang’s wife, standing nearby, grabbed his wrist.

“What’d she say?” She now addressed him less formally and politely.

“Mother-in-law, I may not be much to look at, but I want you to know, back in the old days I was quite the man. Now you can just rest easy. I made her melt like taffy in the summer sun. It’s not easy for a godforsaken old bachelor to find a wife.”

But from inside came a distressful sniffling. It was impossible to tell whether Misun was crying with joy, or with relief that there was a way out.

“Now hush up!” shouted her mother. “Just sit tight and count your blessings.”

“Well—I’m in the mood for a drink. I’ll be back.”

Breaking into another meaningless chuckle, Boss hurried off toward the field.

The drinking party was winding down, and most of the men were pleasantly drunk. Some were dancing in nimble leaps, others reeled off songs. Sparks shot from beneath the nearly empty stewpot. Kang was about to finish a second heaping bowl of dog soup. Kunho lay snoring on the bare ground where he had sprawled out after shouting one last chorus of “Byoo-tee-pool Sun-day.” Buckets and aluminum bowls were tumbled about the stewpot—it was a lavish scene, resembling a family ancestral cereony.

Boss made a deep bow and prostrated himself before Kang.

"Please accept this greeting from your son-in-law," he said gallantly.

The revelers simultaneously came to a halt and gaped at the two of them.

"What's this all about, pal?"

Boss uttered his meaningless chuckle, rose, and offered Kang half a bowl of slightly stagnant makkolli from the bottom of the bucket.

"Sorry to surprise you like this. Misun and I decided to get married. Father-in-Law, I offer you this drink."

"Well, looks like we'll be drinking every day for a while."

"In any event, we've got something to celebrate tonight," said another, slapping his knee.

The head of the neighborhood association came forward:

"Let's not forget who saved our neighborhood. Remember, I've got what it takes to make a case to the authorities."

"We've had dogmeat, booze, a good time all around."

"So—Misun's going to have a husband, and you there—you don't have to sleep by yourself anymore."

You could feel an extraordinary vitality everywhere in the field. The men sang, danced, and squabbled dnmkenly until the fire went out and the iron stewpot grew cold. At last, weary and exhausted, they found their way back in ones and twos to their cramped rooms, which had cooled in the night air. Those passed out were dragged away or led off with a supporting arm by family members. Kunho remained face up on the ground. The embers lingering in the fire glowed near his feet.

Misun, dressed in her slip, crossed the sewer ditch. Her stomach protruded, but she looked like a little girl as she skipped smartly from one stepping stone to the next. She reached her suffering brother, who was moaning listlessly, and gently shook him. A fellow drunk to the gills passed by on the embankment singing a song.

40.15 The Legend Of The Sun Brigade\fn{by Zhang Lang-lang (1943-)} Yan'an, China (M) 4

Duo Duo and other famous poets of today suddenly remembered a group of not so famous poets of yesterday. In a number of sincere essays they said, yes, there was, there was a "Sun Brigade." And, according to them, I was a member of it.

I was taken aback. Was there? Still, Zhang Ming-ming once called me "young poet" with much admiration. She was remembering the old days, over twenty years ago.

Guo Lu-sheng (also known as "Index Finger") had come looking for me to ask me to take part in the "Survivors Poetry Festival," and pointing at me with that index finger of his, he said:

"No need to be polite about it, the title of my poem Believe in the Future came from you."

I had heard about that famous poem while I was in prison. In the seventies, it had created quite a stir underground. All the lads in Baiyang Lake knew about it, and had read it. It was said, it's like a transmission of fire.

A few words of the title were first spoken by me, but what does that say about anything? The real force of the words lay in his poem, in his sinceriry, his sensitivity, his passion. At the time I heard him reading a poem about fish, about fish floating in ice. And today, he is still like he was back then. He is a fish of that particular period.

We were the ovenure to the emergence of a certain kind of fish.

*

Bei Dao said very matter-of-factly:

"Think back, think back, and write it down."

And what can I remember? A "Sun Brigade" that had never been an organized body, only a group of poets that had left no poetry behind, merely some hazy images in the background.

The faded sepia photograph that was yesterday was already hazy. That was today in ancient times, that was Western culture winding its way across the Great Wall of Steel, inciting a group of restless young people to commotion.

I just gently open up the source of memory, and cool clear pictures come floating out …

*

1958 and, as Mao pronounced:

"Everyone in China is a sage."

Everyone was also a poet, and I was no exception. Everyone had a time limit to hand in his one hundred poems and fifty paintings. I handed over my share as well, never thinking I was dishing out mistakes. At the time, most of the poems were of the kind: “Dare to let the earth produce more” or “Only when you have spread muck can you know the fragrance of dung” etc., etc. Mine was:

Like snow breaking away,
flooding down the mountain,
vigorously, forcefully, rapidly,
the great wheel of history rolling.
Who is it?
Us!
Symbols of youth,
pioneers of revolution.

The headmaster’s face dropped: the poem showed erroneous thinking—it was “youthism.” It did not mention the party or the Chairman, nor did it mention the “three red banners” policy.

I cried floods of tears as I threw back my answers: hadn’t Lenin approved of Mayakovsky?\fn{Vladimir Vladimirovich Mayakovsky (1893-1930), Russian poet.} Loads of his poems hadn’t mentioned those things. Mine was hardly an editorial piece.

At the time what we liked to read most of all were old Maya’s My Love and Clouds in Trousers. Zhang Jiu-xing, Gan Lu-lin and I used to go walking in the little pine wood every morning, obsessively learning Mayakovsky’s poems by heart. We had our heads shaved bald as melons—just like Maya, and wore padded army trousers, tied at the waist with a length of old flex.

I kept it a secret that I wrote poetry, and wrote long and short stanzas that those above wouldn’t like. Because it was a secret it was stimulating. We also had secret plans to publish satirical papers to paste up on the walls.

The headmaster, thundered with rage. He said:

“If you were in the final years of secondary school you’d have done enough to be labelled Rightists.”

He huffed and snorted as he tore down one of our cartoons:

“Why are you satirizing Communist Youth League members? Why have you drawn dogs fighting? Too noxious and poisonous. You’ve even written ‘Wolf, wolf!’ Who are you trying to get at?”

We all shriveled up. And only fourteen.

For the first time it was clear: it was a forbidden game.

*

In 1959 I went to the 101 Secondary School. Just like in the army schools we had brass buttons on our uniforms, and wore caps. I put some effort into keeping to the regulations, and didn’t dare mention my own poems. In assembly before the whole school I read Mayakovsky’s poetry.

When I shouted out another’s poetry I was taking the opportunity to vent my own frustrations, and this also took courage. My bravery had its source in the secret love I harbored for a supremely elegant girl—Zhang Mei-jun. The two of us directed the play, New Year’s Sacrifice, in commemoration of Lu Xun,\fn{Or Lu Hsun (1881-1936), Chinese author.} and had enjoyed working together. Backstage we would chat with Guo Shi-ying, who played the lead role, “the traveler.” I had never been able to stand his father—old revolutionary poet, Guo Mo-ruo. But his son was all right: quite open, easy going, intelligent. Nothing like his rabbit of a father. I had a lot of respect for him, and he also wrote poetry.

Two or three years later, I heard Guo Shi-ying had been arrested. They had a little literary group, underground of course. In the Cultural Revolution, I heard he took his own life. I couldn’t believe it, but he was dead. Just because he wanted to use his brain to think about things. Only later did I hear what really happened: he had been beaten to death.

Humans are truly fragile animals.

*

In 1960 Zhang Wen-xing was at the secondary school attached to the Foreign Languages Institute, reading French, playing the guitar, singing, reading poetry, writing poetry, painting.

He was stubborn yet warm-hearted, had a thick brow and large eyes, lips drawn into a line. He was short, but he exercised his body until he had muscles of steel. He had never lost at anything, and he was known as “Little Napoleon.” His poetry was just like him, it lashed out.

We transferred to the secondary school attached to the Foreign Languages Institute, very near to Liulichang, the secondhand book market. After school we used to linger in the old bookshops. Mayakovsky’s poetry could no longer satisfy our hunger. We found Pushkin,\fn{Aleksandr Sergeyevich Pushkin (1799-1837), Russian poet.}

Lermontov,\fn{Mikhail Yuryevich Lermontov (1814-1841), Russian poet and novelist.} and later Longfellow,\fn{Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807-1882), American poet.} Whitman.\fn{Walt Whitman (1819-1892), American poet.} What excited us most of all was discovering that a girl in our class, Dai Yong-xu, was the daughter of a famous poet, Dai Wang-shu. We ran over to borrow collections of his poems. But she brought out her father's translations of Selected Poems of Lorca.\fn{Federico García Lorca (1898-1936), Spanish poet and playwright.} I flicked it open at the foreword, and one line shook us:

The black night made black by the night

Perhaps it is because I liked to paint, that lines like "Little black horse, great big moon" made me so happy. I used to read these translated poems, my teeth stuck into a bun made with sweet potato. In times of hardship people look for things to eat. And out of our hunger for art we formed a group. Apart from Zhang Wen-xing, there was:

Zhang Xinhua. Crazy about art. Didn't have enough to feed himself but painted in oils. Ready to risk his life for his friends.

Yu Zhi-xin. Sentimental. Spoke beautiful French. His constant frown was famous. Feet a little off the ground.

Zhang Zhen-zhou. A plumpish, tall beauty with a very kind heart. Wrote prose poetry.

Yang Xiao-min. A scholarly type of girl. Wrote prose. Sensitive, seemed slightly nervous.

Dong Sha-bei. Very dark and very thin, lean and tough. Attached to the College of Fine Art while at secondary school. Painted modernist oil paintings. Interested in religion and mysticism.

Zhang Run-feng. The youngest of us. Quick thinking, very good mimic, outstanding memory.

We often organized poetry evenings, usually at my home, though sometimes at other people's. Gan Lu-lin and Chen Nai-yun who I'd known at secondary school would often join in too.

*

In 1962, there was a group of poetry lovers at the Central College of Applied Arts. Zhang Ji-man, the chairman of our Student's Association, and I discussed the two groups coming together to hold a large scale recital.

We were very excited about it, and everyone was busy preparing his weapon. I polished up a long poem Burning Heart. Yang Xiao-min invited another girl along, Jiang Ding-yue—the daughter of Jiang Guang-ding, famous general from the War against Japan. Her eyebrows were straight as swords, truly "a tiger of a daughter from a general's home." People said she looked Spanish.

About a hundred and ten people turned up that day, there weren't enough seats, and the back of the room was filled with people standing. We secondary school students were full of valiant spirit, and "shook" that group of university students. When everyone had left, the university students Huang Wei, Zhang Hong-bin and Zhang Ming-ming (daughter of the celebrated romantic writer, Zhang Hen-shui) showered us with praise. My poem's concluding line was:

We—the Sun Brigade!

"Let's start right now!" shouted Sha-bei, excited. Everyone was talking all at once, volunteering to get on with the printing, and so on, a whole run of plans. Half of us spent the whole night walking up and down the streets, and the other half talked the night away at my house.

At the time, it was no more than our love for poetry, and our love for art. Excitement and feedback. Hadn't given a thought to the threatening shadow of politics. What had that to do with poetry?

*

Oai Qing, who was studying then at the Harbin College of Military Engineering, took us out to the Summer Palace. They had heard that I liked to recite poetry. In the evening, in the long open corridors I started reciting Mayakovsky, then Eluard's\fn{Paul Éluard (1895-1952), French poet.} Freedom … and they were all amazed. Oai Qing told me she too loved literature. But it seemed perhaps we were a little too "modern." I reckoned she had never even heard of this French poet before.

We were moved by the interest and generosiry of these university students. Yet I had not let them hear my strange "inappropriate-for-the-time" poems. I guessed there'd be trouble if I did.

We had to serve two masters, one was society and the other was our own pleasure.

*

In 1963 I entered the Central College of Fine Art. The College had a poetry society, "Reed Swords," named for

Qu Yu-an's life story. The name of this society had been written in the calligraphy of Mr. Wen Huaisha. The first leader was Fan Zeng, followed by me and Bai Rubo. At the poetry readings of the society Fan Zeng chanted Zheng Banqiao's lament:

The old fisherman, a single rod. . .

The secretary of the Communist Youth League, believed Fan Zeng was reviving the ancient, and frowned at it. He wanted me to read something modern. All I could offer was old Maya. The secretary frowned even more.

When we came out, I saw Fan Zeng in the corridor; we shook hands and laughed. We were neither of us good children in the eyes of authority.

*

"The Sun Brigade" had really held its first big meeting. That was in the Xiao-zhuang Building of the old Peking Normal University. Taking part were: Zhang Wen-xing, Zhang Xin-hua, Dong Sha-bei, Yu Zhi-xin, Zhang Zhen-zhou, Zhang Run-feng and myself. I draft a constitution for the organisation. Its aim was none other than to encourage the national cultures of China to flourish. We planned to hold a salon once a month. We would hang paintings on the walls and read poetry. Only as a formed strong group would we be able to break into society.

At about this time I wrote the one act play Dialogue, the film script, Turquoise, and a collection of short poems.

However, after only a few days the "Brigade" disbanded. Guo Shi-ying (at the time in the Philosophy Department at Peking University) and their salon wanted to sneak out to France. They were caught and all of them were arrested—grasses scattered in the piercing winter wind. We immediately ceased all the organisation's activities, and scattered to bide our time.

*

During 1964-65 the pressure on the underground salons grew ever greater. The artist Yuan Yun-sheng's graduation piece Memory of the Water Country was seen as a product of the Western capitalist artistic view. Fine Art magazine printed the painting. In the schools knives were out and bowstrings taut. This enormous oil painting was removed from the gallery, and placed in the table tennis room, ready for criticism.

The three artists, Yuan Yun-sheng, Ding Shao-guang and Zhang Shi-yan, were firm friends of ours. By then Yuan Yun-sheng had already gone to Jilin, and still didn't realize he was heading for disaster.

Wu Er-lu, Yu Zhi-xin, Jiang Ding-yue and I split up to think over how we could save our friend. I had a brainwave: steal the painting! If the target had disappeared there would be nothing to criticize. At the time I really liked that painting.

I decided to do it on my own. During a Youth League meeting, when there was no one in the grounds, I slipped into the gym, and cut the painting out of its frame, rolled it up and sneaked out of the school.

When the painting was laid out on the floor in my sitting room, Wu Er-lu came over to enjoy it. I was sweating all over, on the one hand happy for Old Yuan and on the other pleased with myself for this heroic success.

The Public Security came bursting into the College, to sort out the political case. The atmosphere was tense.

My mates all came to look at the painting and do homage to my courage. With true feminine pragmatism Jiang Ding-yue warned me that when the authorities found out about this, I'd go to jail.

I couldn't give a toss, not a damn. I believed we were all brothers.

*

The meetings become more and more secret, and the members were changing.

At the time Wu Hong was closest to me. We had both been to 101 Secondary, and were now in the same class. We shared the same interests and ambitions and were both in love with Jiang's daughters; I was wooing Jiang Ding-yue, he was courting Jiang Ding-hui. Their brother Jiang Zhi-qiao wrote classical poetry. Their home hosted the salon during this period.

Another salon was at Zhou Qiyue's. We had been friends since we were little. They had the latest Western records at his house. We began to be fans of modern music.

One day we were having lunch at his house, playing modern German opera. His father came in, looking dreadful. I didn't even notice. I should really have switched to a classical opera when the first side had finished, but I put on the other side. Oh, hell. I was really letting my friends in for it.

The old couple wanted a word with me, then showed me the yellow card. At the time I thought they were over-cautious. Now when I think back, they had a long, deeply cutting memory of political cruelty.

*

Mou Dun-bai was the youngest person involved in Guo Shi-ying's "French Connection," and was let out first. He came running to find me.

There was a salon at his house too, including: Wang Dong-bai, Gan Hui-li, Guo Da-dong, and later I also saw Guo Lu-sheng. We used to meet quite often, and play secret poetry writing games, and drink wine. We had no money, and could only drink the crudest liquor. Very often we had some pickled or salted vegetables to go with it. There was one time when Dong Sha-bei brought along a dark beet, and we used a pencil sharpener to peel it, and everyone found it really delicious. Zhang Shi-yan was an old friend, and already had a job. Every time he came to see us he would bring a bottle of "Chinese Red." Everyone was happy.

*

I also tried sending in manuscripts to Peoples Literature, and didn't have any success because the editor in chief lost his position for political reasons.

We decided to publish our own hand-written magazine, which we did on a small scale at my house. My parents also joined in. There was Geng Jun, Wu Feng, Jiang Ding-yue, Zhang Da-wei, Zhang Liao-liao, and so on. The cover of the issue I edited had an iron bars, behind which you could see two red characters for: Freedom.
Perhaps it was because I didn't feel confident in freedom.

1966. Yuan Yun-sheng's painting, "The Sun Brigade," the secret meetings, the French students here, my political jokes—all kinds of. reasons, I was arrested, I fled … In the hurried parting from my friends I wrote on the inside cover of Wang Chenbai's notebook:

"Believe in the future."

When I escaped to the South, Gan Hui-li wrote a sad farewell poem I don't believe: you have already left (I'm not sure of the title anymore).

I was arrested again. First in the school, then in the cells of the Public Security Bureau, I was questioned countless times. Again and again I was asked about that "counter-revolutionary organization, the "Sun Brigade." All of my work was investigated. Maybe to this day it is still in the archives of the Peking Public Security Bureau, maybe it was cremated long ago.

I am a "poet with no works."

*

I've heard that people are already beginning to research the histoty of the underground literature from this period; that they are actively collecting and editing compilations of the scraps of work that survive from this time.

At the end of the day was there ever an underground literary organization called the "Sun Brigade"? That is just hearsay.

75.141 An Offering Gathered From That Cherished Homeland\fn{by Jia Baoquan (1943-   )} Handan, Hebei Province, China (M) 4

Retuming from a visit to his hometown, a traveling bag in his left hand, and in his right hand a half-filled glass water bottle with a bunch of green, tender willow twigs stuck in it, he suppressed a strong yearning for a reunion with his family. He halted at the iron railing gate of a photo studio in this bustling North China city.

Upon his knocking, an elderly man, rubbing his halfopen, drowsy eyes, came out to open the gate. He hurried toward to old man, took out a photo from his pocket, and courteously handed it to him.

"Excuse me. Could you make a negative out of this picture and then make an enlarged print?"

The man took it, examined it carefully, and finally shook his head hopelessly.

"The picture is so worn that you cannot even tell whether the person is a man or woman. Why not take another picture?"

"Well … but …"

He had to take back the photo. Why can't he see it? It's clear obviously—the slightly long, graceful neck, the rather colorless, thin face that flushes scarlet when she smiles, the moderately high forehead, the dark-brown, short braids stopping under her ears, the gleaming eyes occasionally covered by her long lashes, and a scar the size of a soy bean above the corner of the right eye.

He walked slowly along the street in a cool drizzling rain, his face stroked by a gentle breeze. Through the pale white light of the street lamps in the summer night, the rain looked like dense fine silk threads, gleaming, so tough and pliable, yet they could not be separated or cut by the wind, as an ancient poet wrote when he lost his country and parted from his people.

Such a scene brought him sorrow, grief, and memories of the past. He remembered the year when Father and Mother went deep-ploughing in the fields. They were told that when the earth was ploughed five feet deep, the grain yield per mu would reach ten thousand jin. Simply digging one foot down would amount to two thousand jin of grain! Busy with such a highly profitable, significant job, they could come back home only once in more than ten days. The task of taking care of him thus tell upon the small shoulders of his fourteen-year-old sister. What else could they do? It was the times that imposed this duty. Sometimes Mother returned at midnight to see them and urged the sister repeatedly to feed her brother well.

A long silence. Sister drooped her head, and she loosened her braids and then rebraided them repeatedly Holding both of them in her arms, Mother touched the sister on her shoulder and said:

"We're being hard on you, my little girl." She patted the brother's head "And you'll do what your sister says, won't you?" Then she dried her tears and soon disappeared quietly into the darkness again.

His stomach was aching as if catching fire; he rolled back and forth on the kang crying out loud, "I'm so hungry I can't sleep!"

His sister who lay beside him sat up at once. Resting him on her legs, she sang to him softly:

Little Brother, good baby,
Little Brother, sleep well.
Now eat your dream cake
And eat one for me, too.

Her crystal voice, with the tone of Henan opera, sounded sad but sweet. So beautiful! However, indifferent to the singing, he continued crying and kicking his legs. Gradually, his voice became so weak that it could barely be heard, though he still tried to cry with his mouth open. Soothed by the soft persuasion and motherly care of his sister as well as by her melancholy singing, he fell asleep on her gently rocking legs. .

At broad daylight the birds, knowing no sadness, woke him up. Alone on the matless kang, he screamed with fear:

"Mum! Sister—"

"Little Brother, I am here. Come over here quickly!" Following the voice of his sister, he ran out of the room, with his feet and bottom all bare. Under the big willow tree in the middle of the courtyard, he found his sister standing on her toes on the top end of a door-propping stick leaning against the tree. Her left hand seized hold of a branch while her right hand was stretching for a cluster of twigs rich with buds. But she was too small to reach them. Then she suddenly jumped up in an attempt to get them. Before he realized what had happened, she fell on the ground, but with a firm grip of those twigs in her hand.

"Sister!"

He threw himself upon her. Slowly she opened her eyes and smiled at him, and he spotted a bleeding cut above the right corner of her eye, with embedded broken glass the size of a soy bean. He held her head still and picked out the glass. Following the way of his mother, he swiftly collected a pinch of very fine dust from the foot of the wall and sprinkled it on the cut. It stopped bleeding. Sister propped herself up with both hands. She carefully stripped all the buds of the willow twigs and put the buds in an earthen pot filled with clean water. Then she kept squashing and rubbing them between her fingers; soon the water was dyed a thick emerald green. She replaced it With another pot of clean water and repeated her action until the water no longer chged its color. Scooping up the buds and kneading them into a balll no bigger than a fist, she handed it to him.

"Ha, ha, my good brother. Now eat it and your stomach will not make any noise again."

Her laughing, coming from the bottom of her heart with sincerity and pride, was as crisp as the clashing of broken ice in the stream in early spring, as sweet as the sound of growing sorghum after a heavy ram. He grabbed the ball and stuffed half of it into his mouth. It even tasted somewhat sweet mingled with a light bitterness.

"Is it tasty?" Her eyes fixed on him, she did not eat.

"Yes, it is almost as tasty as your tears."

"Nonsense." The sister pretended that she wanted to hit him.

"What do you mean by 'Nonsense'?" Afraid that she would take away his food, he gobbled it up quickly. "When I lay on your legs during the night, your tears dropped into my mouth."

Hearing this, Sister cried, the tears streaming without shame down her face.

"Drip."

"Drip."

He feels a rumbling sound gradually close in on him, shaking his eardrums and his heart. But all around him is complete quietness. The night is so still that everything seems to be frozen: the cloudy sky, the light, the Chinese parasol trees, the falling lines of the rain, the breeze passing like the hem of a woman's light green skirt. Only the tender willow buds in the vase he carries, shining with gleaming tears and an emerald glow, gaze at him with affection.

Oh, Sister, are you shedding happy tears, rejoicing over the blessing of spring rain? Or is the illness of those years still forcing tears from your pure, innocent eyes? Thus the willow buds before him become the colorless, thin face of a young maiden.

The pig-iron furnace of their production brigade was still smoking and the deep-ploughing battle was still on when Sister fell ill. Initially, she felt a pain in her, neck; then reddish thick veins popped out along her neck, with ulcers oozing thick yellow mucus. Soon she couldn't even carry her small basket, and when she smiled the swirling dimples on her cheeks could no longer be seen. A yellowish-gray color replaced her formerly somewhat redish hue.

Though he was persuaded by sister not to tell Mother, Mother finally found it out and told Father about it. .

"We must send her to a big hospital!" Father blurted out after a long silence, his head raised resolutely.

"Won't that take a lot of money?" Mother, who had been watching Father all that time, dropped her head. Probably she had been expecting nothing but these words, but once he spoke them, she was struck by the fear. Uncles and aunts in the neighborhood all came to see her and urged them to go to a hospital.

"Even if she cannot be treated in the hospital, it'll be good to know what her illness is," they said. "We'll help if you need money." In no time, a pile of coins, still retaining the warmth of the bodies of these dear folks, appeared on the end of Sister's bed. Sister watched silently, looking at one face and then another as if she wanted to imprint these faces in her memory.

The next moming saw an ancient one-wheeled pushcart, with both his sister and him sitting on it, rolling along the yolk-yellow winding path stretching away ftom the end of the village. When Father gave him the small cloth bag of coins, he suddenly grew tall. On the way, he felt the wheel clicked a melody as beautiful as the swishing of Mother's weaving machine, as rhythmical as the chirruping of Sister's shoulder pole when she carried buckets of water. From time to time he jumped down ftom the cart and picked some flowers ftom the ridges around the fields. Then he jumped back onto the cart without waiting for Father to stop, and, sitting between her legs, he put the flowers on Sister's dark-brown braids.

At noon time, they arrived at the biggest hospital in the county. Who would have thought that all the doctors were away to participate in the central tasks\fn{A note reads: Tasks characteristic of the political climate of the time but unrelated to medicine.} of the time. The young nurse on duty had never seen such a case before. The cart rolled, back following the same route it came in the moming. Father, his lean buttocks moving with each step, pushed the cart, leaving a long, deep rut and a string of footprints on the road. The bending road was like a weak man taken by rickets newly-marked with a long whip scar and countless bruises. The wheel no longer sang melodies; instead ftom time to time it sobbed oppressively with long tremors. Sitting no longer between Sister's legs, Brother now held Sister on his legs.

Then some local medical men were called in. They performed an operation on Sister's neck with a dazzling knife without using an anesthetic. She refused to cry, only uttering a groan at the most unbearable moment, her hand clutching his arm, her forehead and her body glistening with perspiration which soaked her white blouse woven and sewn by herself. Her teeth bit into her lip; her nails dug into his flesh. The medical men left after a big feast, but they did not take away Sister's disease.

Again the brother and sister were left alone at home. He stayed close by to look after her, bringing in drinking water and carrying away the bedpan. Nevertheless, she was getting weaker and weaker, so feeble that she even had to stop several times to gasp for breath when drinking a small bowl of water. She wanted to sleep, but the pain in her neck was too gnawing to let her close her eyes.

That day, when he used an earthen pot to boil some hot water, the smoke from the damp straw choked him and he coughed continuously. Feeling sorry for her brother, Sister tried to come down to help; but hardly had she moved an inch when she made a loud cry and her arm hung down limply from the bedside, her eyes closed.

"Sister," he cried, shaking her head.

The sharp pain awakened her; she opened her eyes trying to smile, but she could not.

"Little Brother," she whispered. She tried to raise her hand several times to stroke his head, but she had not the strength. "When hungry, climb the tree. Put on your pants. Don't get scratched. May plant trees, the willow grows fast." She panted after each few words, and he was terrified.

A moment later, she motioned him to come over. Quivering with fear, he moved to her bed, and she finally held his hand.

"When … people die, do … they … eat?" she asked half consciously—it was hard to tell whether she was asking him or herself.

He did not nod, nor did he shake his head, his eyes wide open staring around vacantly.

Suddenly, her spirit seemed to come back to her: her eyes shone, her cheeks .flushed, and she no longer panted when she spoke. She's getting better now, he thought.

" … what to eat …"

He was still motionless, but upon hearing the word "eat," he answered:

"Eat willow buds. I'll pick up a lot of willow buds for you."

Her brows smoothed and, with a smile that could hardly be detected, she slowly loosened her hand. Her eyes still watched him, but lacked their usual luster.

She was gone; she left forever satisfied with a word of comfort uttered unintentionally by her little brother.

*

People say it is the children who stay beside their parents when they die. But when Sister died, it was the innocent Little Brother who stayed with her.

A 47-year-old man in the East Village had died a bachelor several years ago. To arrange a marriage for him in the nether world, his brother sent a matchniaker to her family with 30 yuan as a betrothal gift.

"This man is too old for her," Mother said, somewhat worried. Hearing this, the matchmaker offered another 10 yuan. "I didn't mean that," Mother retorted. Soon some senior villagers came in his stead. "A young girl dead without being married will be troubled by the drifting spirits and foxes in the wild," they said.

Hence the fumily accepted the offer. Of the 30 yuan, most was spent on the bridal outfit of clothing, and the left-over money—over two yuan—was given to Little Brother.

A burying ceremony became a wedding ceremony, and Mother and Father put on smiles with tears welling up in their eyes.

A little coffin was made out of Sister's bed and some wood scrap, including the door-propping stick she had used to climb the tree. Sister appeared as if she were sleeping as usual in her bed, except that the bed had a wooden enclosure around it. She was in stylish winter clothes which she wouldn't have dared to imagine wearing when she was alive, and they were matched by a light red woollen scarf on her neck and a pair of black leather shoes on her feet. Her two soft dark brown plaits along her shoulders, she lay there pale-faced, with an expression that seemed to convey to her little brother unspeakable deep love and tenderness for him.

Though he was young at the time, he did not forget his promise. He put a few withered willow leaves on Sister's lips—it was already winter, but in the Central Plains the trees had not shed all their leaves yet. Of course, he did not forget his sister's words. When he climbed the tree, he put on his split pants.

One day, Mother wept when she looked at him. She hugged him tightly, perhaps afraid that she would lose him, too. Stroking his bare head, she said:

"Good boy, listen to me. When your hair grows, braid it."

Doubtlessly, she was missing her little girl.

As time advanced, he was oid enough to be able to carry a bucket and to use a shovel. He planted a small willow tree on his sister's grave and came almost every day to see it and to take care of it. A Chinese saying goes, "A willow twig accidentally planted can grow into shade," let alone what happens to a carefully planted tree. The tree not only survived but flourished.

Before long, with the two yuan left ftom Sister's marriage settlement, his father bought a textbook, a slate, and a foot of colored cloth out of which Mother made a school bag for him. He went to school. Whenever he played truant or had a fight with other boys, he dared not come to Sister's grave. Didn't the little willow look like the slender figure of Sister when, waving in the cool air, it became a. dark green haze? Didn't those slim willow leaves resemble Sister's beautiful eyes and brows?

Gazing upon the willow twigs in the bottle, he pours out his heart silently to his sister:

"My dear sister, your dearly beloved little brother, into whose rearing you put all your heart, is now a P.L.A.\fn{People's Liberation Army.} regimental officer. I went to your grave again when I returned to our village recently to see our parents. The young willow tree at your grave is now tall. and branches out with the blessing of the spring breeze and rain. This is a bunch of branches I picked from it. I am taking it as your picture, as your statue, and placing it as an offering to you on my desk.

"Dear Sister, our parents are now over seventy, in fairly good health for their age. Father is taking care of the irrigation of land and Mother is at home raising chickens. They are most afraid of other people mentioning you, as they did over twenty years ago, but they themselves always like to talk about you. Mother once said to me, ‘If your sister were alive, your nephew might have graduated from middle school by now and have become an accountant at the mill of our production brigade. It’s a pity that she didn’t drag through those hard years.’ See what we eat today? We even feed the chickens with golden corn flour, not to mention willow buds. These years we’ve had good weather and people have been contented. And we’ve had a bumper crop of wheat every year. Although it rained continuously this year during harvesting time, not a grain of wheat grew moldy.

“Mother said, ‘My daughter has become a wind and blown the sky clear.’ Father said that was superstition. But Mother replied, ‘I’m not superstitious, but when I see that willow tree, I hear the willow twigs calling me Mother. If you don’t believe me, go listen.’ Then she would be in tears. Sometimes Father also mourned with her.”

… Ahead of him is his house. After he walks down the winding road, he turns into a lane, dark and impenetrable as a cavern. As his feet carefully probe the uneven surface of the road, his mind keeps pondering on that recent part of history, a tortuous path they have traveled. He cannot help feeling grief, even with an awareness that history never follows a straightforward course …

1944

77.42 The Sun In The Pit\fn{by Chiang Ling (c.1944?-)} Fukien Province, China (F) 8

The moment we left the crowd of people behind, I told him that I'd like to have some mango ice cream: a ball of solid tender yellow in a high stemmed glass of fine crystal, with the freshest and tenderest aroma. He knew where to take me. There was only one place in the whole world that would have such delicious ice cream.

“Want to take a cab?” he asked.\fn{I have restored the quotation marks to this story, in the interests of machine analysis.}

I shook my head.

Then he took hold of my hand and walked me across the street. Grasped by his wonderfully cool hand, my hand did not seem as boisterously hot as it usually was. A very comfortable feeling crept up from my palm. If only the street were a little bit longer! What if the crossing were never to end! I purposely walked very slowly hoping all the time that the traffic light would suddenly turn red on us. A stream of cars flew through the square where the shiny tracks lay. Four traffic lights stood at the busy intersection diligently blinking their iron-clad Erh-lang eyes,\fn{A note reads: A legendary figure with three eyes able to transform himself at will.} while the policeman paced back and forth in the middle of the square with a whistle implanted between his lips. Herds of people rushing out from all corners and coming to a halt at the curbs, impatiently raised their heads waiting for the lights to turn green. I earnestly wished the iron-clad eyes facing my direction would suddenly permit themselves to turn crimson red so that I’d heartily enjoy another 30 seconds of an evening that was so unlike any of its kind. I’d like to enjoy more of the cool comforting feeling that was creeping up from my palm. The green light was still gleaming. A deep breath rushed out from the bottom of my heart. He suddenly turned to look at me with a very gentle smile:

“What’s the matter? Are you tired?”

“Oh no!” I said.

When the red light finally came on, we were already on the other side of the street, and he of course had let go of my hand. I looked back, the light was then translucently red and showed very little sign of ever darkening. I’d like so very much to tell him: “Let’s go back from where we came!” Perhaps he would hold my hand again and carefully wait for the red light to die away, and then once more escort me through the zebra lines. Perhaps he would simply measure me with a very curious look: “What a weird girl you are!”

Why weird? Wasn't life just as much a foolishly monotonous routine as coming and going, waiting for the red light and walking on the green light—that sort of thing? It was only considered mad when one conscientiously hoped to do the same simple thing over and over. “What fun is there walking back and forth across the same street?” they would say. It never occurred to them that human beings lived their lives in the same way. Strictly speaking, the only difference lay in one fact: that people did not necessarily wander back and forth across the same street. But still, they crossed, all the same.

No use thinking about that. No one would listen to me anyway. They are all so pathetically stubborn and conceited. At best, they’d say (with a very tolerant smile), “Is that so?” More often, one encountered the kind of people who would wrinkle up their noses and sniff out their contempt. Sis used to confront me, too: “Why don’t you think of something bright and sunny?” Wearing a smile bright as the spring, she would then try to make herself clearer: “Think about the bright side of life, will you? Stop being such a bore.”

Sis never had anything to worry about. Whatever thought she did have was very matter of fact: attending school, studying for quizzes, making it through with high grades, dressing up nicely and gracefully, wearing cosmetics, dating dozens of boys. Sis never had any trouble, never had any worry. Even the boys that she associated with were pretty much like her. Their feelings and wisdom could both be fathomed at first sight.

There never was a need for them to probe into anything very deeply, so they themselves never needed to be probed. In fact, there wasn't much depth to them to begin with. They understood everything so very well—everything was what it appeared to be. Sunshine was just sunshine, a necessity of life according to the authorities. Flowers were of course flowers; their mere purpose was to decorate one's parlor. When they withered, well, they should be disposed of right away. No regrets. After all, the world was full of flowers. Everything was so conveniently and neatly arranged to one's satisfaction; why should one ever have to worry about anything?

Sis had chosen the road that every girl was supposed to tread and most would take without questioning. She accepted everything at face value with a nonchalant attitude as if she herself were a dyed-in-the-wool fatalist.

Not me. No. I would fight against all that. I would never accept the nonsense of life. Why should one obligingly accept what others have chosen for her? I did not see what good it would do me to be a good girl like Sis. I would never be satisfied with sharing the glory bestowed upon me through my father, my husband, my son—let alone having to achieve that by denying my own existence. Of course, girls like Sis would never have to suffer the way I did, nor would they experience the kind of pain and pleasure that I experienced. They took the conventional and least risky road while I still wandered in a maze where pain coexisted with pleasure. It was really very difficult to explain the fact that I thrived on pleasure which came to exist only because of the pain that my peculiar ideas, which were termed my weirdness, caused me. The truth was, if I once ceased to realize the possibility that everything was not what it seemed to be, if I stopped questioning, if I began to accept things as they were, I would not feel the pain that I now felt, nor would I feel the piercing pleasure that arose from my own awareness. When I ceased to be puzzled, I would cease to exist, that was certain. So I had to find something to do constantly. Life was the stuff that drifted away piece by piece, though summer vacation seemed never to end. I murmured.

A streetful of tuxedo shops drifted by. Outside, cars were like flowing water. Still, there were endless lines of people waiting at the bus stops.

I am glad that I don't have to wait at the tail end of a line trying to crowd into the bus which never seems to have any space for us but constantly demands a price hike.

"You really don't need to torture yourself so," he said.

I looked up at him, not knowing what he meant. I never torment myself. Didn't I just celebrate the fact that I did not have to join the crowd? Of course, school days were exceptions. I just couldn't be late every day to be scolded by our military instructor. Besides, that would have upset her terribly. She was a pious Christian—very anxious to make good little girls out of us. By the way, have you ever heard of a person in the military being a pious Christian? I mean, how can one be a Christian and at the same time kill other human beings? It is almost as unthinkable as holding the Qur'an in one hand and a sword in the other, trying to make disciples out of non-believers by having them choose between the Qur'an or having their heads chopped off! Of course our military instructor wasn't that awful. She was really a jolly old fat lady who couldn't help laughing even when she was bawling us out! She was the one who told us about the head-hunting Moslems to show how barbaric some religions could be. I didn't really agree with her. Barbarism is only a matter of degree. Under certain circumstances, I'd rather be the powerful disciple than the tortured one. I must confess, though, I do not believe in anything. Christians and Moslems are all ardent believers in a senseless Nil. As far as belief is concerned, she was only wasting time on me. When she thought I was listening attentively, I was really wondering what happened to the heads that were chopped off! I was told that they would roll on until they found somebody to bite into and hold fast.

"Really?" He smiled and puffed out a mouthful of good smelling smoke rings.

"I think what they told me may be true. That kind of death is certainly not peaceful. I suppose biting somebody would be a conceivable act of revenge. Still, it's not worth it. I wouldn't want to die so foolishly."

"What would you have done under such circumstances?" he asked absentmindedly.

"I'd accept the Qur'an, then turn around and throw it away afterwards."

He laughed softly, somewhat condescendingly. "Is that all? Nothing great, right?"

"But it's being flexible. One shouldn't have to die for something as vague as a questionable God. One should only sacrifice oneself for a higher cause. And for the sake of seeing that cause come true, any means can be used. What's wrong with being flexible if one gets things done and never has to sell out his ideal or give up his final goal?"

"You know what?" A smile spread across his face as he looked at me again, making me feel deeply trapped. "For a true believer, God is all. He is all goodness, representing all the highest ideals."

"But," I stared at him in great amazement, "for a nation like ours that is in want of everything, God is too great and distant a luxury. Perhaps it is true that we desire protection and crave for comfort the most during difficult times. But I feel that it is exactly then that we are not qualified to seek divine shelter. We can afford to sleep in a holy peaceful shade and have sorrow purged away only when we enjoy internal peace. When a nation suffers, when it is constantly under the invasion of other countries, politically, economically and religiously, its people have no right to dream of a peaceful afterlife, but must be self-sufficient and fight for its existence on this earth."

Little twinkling sparks flashed up in a stream of light from his smoothly curved pipe. I could denote a kind of discomfort under his pretentious sense of superiority. People looked at me from the corner of their eyes as they walked by. I stared back at them with arrogance. Inside the drugstore, a Japanese figurehead toasted to us with his rejuvenating drug. Rows of foreign letters filled up the open space. I was suffocated by the sight.

"We Chinese are so hopelessly forgetful. We never remember things of the past. Do not do unto your enemies what you would not have your enemies do unto you."

"My foot! We advocate pacifism and generosity so much that we do not see what the 'narrow-minded' nationalism of others has done to us. Our streets are always full of neon lights brassily advocating the products of 'other people.' The higher class Chinese have to use American products; the middle class, Japanese products, while only the poorest use our own products. While countries great and small limit foreign imports to protect their own economic growth and profit, we still dream of a world in which all men are brothers. More and more, I feel that the ideal world in which all men are brothers as Confucius dreamed of, is only the beautiful flowers in the mirror or the shiny moon under the sea. Since our country is not as strong as others, we are not qualified to advocate brotherhood, let alone convince others of practicing it. Who will listen to the whining cry of a powerless country even though its concern is the dire need of all humanity? Who will believe us? While others remain ignorant of the welfare of our country, and continue to be narrow-minded racists, there will never be such a world that will belong to all. How can we first ignore the profit of our own country, and the welfare of our own people and hope to create a world that will take into account the benefit of all countries alike, the welfare of all people alike?"

All the foreign drugs on the drug counter made faces at me. The Japanese figurehead raised its arm wanting to knock me down. At the corner, the TV commercial bellowed with Japanese, "Yuvela! Yuvela!"\fn{A note reads: A Japanese drug which supposedly has rejuvenating quality.} And the Japanese tourists looked around with amazement:

"Why, Taiwan is full of everything made in Japan!"

He drew on the shiny black pipe and puffed out rings of smoke. From his otherwise gentle profile, his straight nose stood out. His eyes were very bright and frighteningly black. But what was he thinking? From his silence I had obtained the security to pour out whatever I felt inside, but after I really opened my heart. his silence made me uneasy. Why didn't he say something? Why didn't he tell me whether I was right or wrong? Could one become so sophisticated that one also became too timid to make a move? He shouldn't be such a person, nor should I be only sixteen. I wished that I could grow up a lot every time the wind blew: it would be great to become old and powerful. One could certainly be stronger and do what one felt to be right and good. One would have no need to feel young and helpless, nor to be led around by the nose by the older folks. Why was it, though, that one always became so prudent when one was old enough to act on his own accord? Why does he suddenly withdraw from the eternal battles of life once he has the power to act and make changes?

It was then that we saw two young couples walk into the Pastorale. When the glass door was pushed open, I heard the distant cry of G minor falling softly in the rain of black and white keys. And then the door swung back licking up the shadows. Imagine, ten young people crouched in a dark corner making love in hide-and-seek style while the stereo wept with Chopin-like clarity. Perhaps there were even candles dripping tears for romances in the dark.

"Is love so unsightly?" I asked. "I thought it was something splendid that didn't need to be hidden away from others."

He said he did not know. Perhaps love was self-sufficient, needing absolutely nothing.

"Not even sunshine or fresh air?" I walked through the iron gate that led to the city park. "Didn't you say that you'd like some mango ice cream? Let's walk a bit in the park, o.k.?"

He did not object and trod along leisurely, puffing away on his ebony pipe. The tobacco was first rolled into half of a ball and then gingerly stuffed into the pipe. Once it was lit, sparks of flame coiled around the silk threads of the tobacco, fuming into a thin film of smoke that rose above the pipe, high into the air, gathering there for a moment, long and parallel to the smoke coming from the distant smokestack.

When smoke shoots straight into the air, you know the weather will be fine the next day, I thought all of a sudden. "It will probably be a fine day tomorrow!" I declared. On the horizon, evening clouds heaped up on top of one another. A gorgeous sight. Love had to be finer than a fine day! No sunshine, no fresh air, nothing but the dark corner, what kind of love could that be? Can't one love with blazing courage?

He knitted his brows tightly.

"What are you thinking?"

"The Pastorale."

He hesitated. I could almost tell that he was lying. "Have you been there too?"

"What?" He was evidently disturbed.

"The Pastorale."

"Oh no, only a long time ago, I went to another Pastorale." I waited quietly. Was he finally going to tell me something But nothing came afterwards, he only shuffled his fee through the fallen leaves.

"It's strange. It's still summer and the trees have already started to shed their leaves."

"What about America?"

"The leaves are shed only in the fall," he said, "just like home. Is that why you now consider America your home?"

I glanced at the fallen leaves.

"I don't have any home," he said hurriedly. It doesn't matter where I stay."

"Why don't you get married? Once you're married, you'll settle down again." I quoted what mother had said about him

He took down his pipe and cleaned it with great tenderness. Without the pipe, his lips curved into sarcasm:

"Is man's marital status the chief concern of all women?"

"I don't know," I shrugged that off. "I used to think that going into service and being married were the necessary initiation rites into manhood."

"That does not apply to every man. For some, love alone is enough to make them grow up, make them grow old."

I lifted my head to look at him straight in the face.

"You won't understand." His forehead was furrowed with deep horizontal lines.

"Why, is it a very complicated matter?"

"Oh no. Nothing is simpler than my story."

"Is it a matter of loving or being loved?"

"What difference does it make?" He raised his eyebrows.

"I believe being loved makes one young, while loving, ages."

"Will you please stop talking?" He stared at me from below tightly knit eyebrows. I stood under the tree not knowing what I had said wrong.

"If you don't want to talk about it, then don't!"

At the end, I had to console him with that. Then he really cut off every possible means of communication, leaving me alone in a cocoon of wonder and regret.

"You wouldn't understand," he said. "You wouldn't understand."

The thing inside me called dignity ached treacherously. My age humiliated me so. If only I were not sixteen, would that make him feel like I might understand him more? Would I then understand the world more? Would I then have the power to persuade others to give up their tightly grasped stubbornness? Would I then be able to act instead of simply worrying myself sick over the repulsiveness of the world?

"Would I?" I pulled at his sleeve.

He gave me a very blank look. His black irises reflected the smoke from the distant smokestack. The sun, a huge orange ball sat behind the stack. Underneath waited a pitch-black pit.

Our sky was always full of neon lights promoting sales for imported goods. Peace-loving Chinese still loved to decorate themselves with imports. The generation that preceded us loved being generous to those who came to destroy us completely, and advocated generosity and pacifism to hide their own incompetency: our generation was happily lost along with Hemingway; and the coming generation wondered what they would be. And the overseas students, the essence of our culture, our race, caring for nothing but promoting their own welfare even to the degree of prostituting their own ancestry. The peace-loving Chinese; the generous Chinese. Home was nowhere and home was everywhere. The middle aged Chinese who readily settled their future for mediocrity. The sophisticated Chinese that were never young, and the youth that confined all freedom and beauty in the darkest corner of the night.

The smoke that shot straight into the air flared into a thin film. The sun that wavered at the point of setting was distant and blurred. Beneath the horizon, the deep pitch-black pit was forever waiting.

I've got to grow up soon. I made up my mind, as if that I would settle anything.

I've got to. I was not only wanting to convince him but to convince myself. Then I felt tears crawling down my cheeks. Who would've cared what I had to say? Who would've cared how I was suffocated by the simple fact that we would never be able to conquer either our own cowardice or our ignorance; that we might never break through the despair we were in? Why didn't I possess the power to make changes when I wanted so badly to raise the whole world upon my shoulders? Why did those who had the might always tell me that I did not understand, when it was they who would not try to act?

"I am really confused," I said, "but I am not going to accuse anybody."

All of a sudden, he drew me close to him and looked at me with deep anxiety.

"You deserve something better."

He embraced me.

"I only wish," he said after a while, "that I were as proudly young as you are, my brave little girl."

I burst out in laughter. I had to be crazy or he had gone mad. I had been so envious of his age, his experience and the power that came with them all, and he just now admitted he was only a defeatist. What made him an escapist? Did that simple ageing love affair do it or did this disheartening world that we were raised in? Perhaps even I myself had been running in circles thinking that I was searching for truth while I was really running away from reality? I did not know for sure if I regretted coming to understand him—and myself—to such a degree. We did not try to hide anything from each other, but we were also very accustomed to wearing masks to face the crowd. And when we bared our hearts, we had nothing to say to each other.

"Good-bye," he finally forced out these two words, his face filled with painful resolution. When he said I deserved something better, he probably had already made up his mind.

"Good-bye." I replied nonchalantly, knowing at the same time something inside me was dying, piece by piece. I had wanted to ask him to wait until I grew up.

The sun then fell into the pit beneath the horizon.

What had we been searching for? Or maybe we were only trying to run away from something? I thought he was the sun—at least I had always been in search of that sun—while he thought I was.

39.124 Clock\fn{by Zheng Wan-long (1944-)} "rural Heilongjiang Province," China (M) 5

He escaped. The fog churned around him, wave upon wave surging against his face. Eyes opened to their widest though nothing could be seen, he had groped his way out of the paddock on memory alone. When Mother let go of him she had stuffed something into his pocket, the red medicine of healing or perhaps bear's grease, but by the time he slid down the river bank it was nowhere to be found. The rushes down there grew so deep they seemed bottomless.

The wind was bitter, the fog dank. His wounds began to ache as if they were soaking in brine. Yesterday afternoon Father had hung him from a hitching post and thrashed him till even the whip fell apart, savagely enough to have killed him in one breath. But he had inherited Father's spine; he took it all, made not a sound. The shaman said he was possessed, that devils lurked in his body and witches flitted across his face; the shaman claimed to have seen all this even before setting foot in their bark tent. Mother could only weep. She could not bear the sight of Father—his deerskin coat stripped off, his chest all bare—whipping their son. Hiding in the tent she stabbed her palms with a knife and watched as blood flowed from the wounds.

Every family in the village was burning incense and praying amidst the shaman's drums and bells. Old women knelt before the fire chanting:

"Ha-la-la, give us your blessing, Bahuriya!"

All winter long the villagers had caught next to nothing on their hunts, but he had not understood how this calamity could have been all his doing. Then Father made him understand. It was only yesterday that Father had found out about him and Baidanjia of Ogda. With the whip Father told him:

"If you're my son then go die in the widow's bark tent!"

Father said Baidanjia's mother was a jinx, an unclean woman who had jinxed her husband's parents, then jinxed her husband too. That Baidanjia was born after the man died—she with the milk-white skin and twinkling blue eyes, she was not of Ogda stock. Wherever mother and daughter went the fires would die; wherever they lived creatures would flee. May they burn to death in heaven's fire so we may prosper again!

"You bastard, if your eyes weren't growing out of your crotch, how could Baidanjia have seduced you? And you still have the gall to be our ulilun's marksman?! If it wasn't because of you, you lowlife, how come I have not been able to kill any bears all winter or catch a single marten? Look at your mother and the other women in the ulilun—not one of them pregnant. Even our sacrificial kawawa plant doesn't smell sweet anymore!"

In the end, tired at last from flogging him, tired too of berating him, Father dropped onto the ground and tossed a knife at his feet, saying:

"If you don't die in that little widow's tent, then never let me see you again."

Actually Father was not such a devout believer in the shaman, he just could not stand the shame of not capturing a bear or a marten the whole winter. Mother came and cut the rope from which he hung, buried her face in his chest and said:

"Run away, Molitu, quickly! Your father really means to kill you. He has already sharpened his knife. At daybreak, in front of everyone in the ulilun, he wants to offer your blood as a sacrifice to Bainacha."

Could it be that god of the mountains Bainacha would gag him just as Father did? Would He not even listen to his explanation? Molitu wanted to tell Bainacha, wanted to tell everyone in the ulilun: Baidanjia was the most beautiful girl he had ever seen, the loveliest doe in the Tardaji mountains. Father talked that way but he had never seen her, nor had anyone else in the ulilun. Her mother had been sick all along, and Baidanjia spent the whole day at her mother's side, coming out only at night. It was at night that they had met. Night drew everything close to each other, moon and stars were right in their laps. But where are you, Bainacha?

He ran and ran, blood oozing from every wound. He pounded along dappled trails, splashed through soggy marshes, running, running all the while. Still darkness enveloped him, just as it had swallowed the valley. On he ran, through the stretch of wind-felled timber, past the grove of camphor trees, over the ridge and down the hill—till he tumbled headlong into the inky black bushes near the fork in the river.

Above the treetops on the crest of the hill, a layer of rich dark red appeared. Molitu was startled awake by the insistent screeching of a snow owl. It was right there in the grove of camphors, calling to something. Baidanjia had once told him that she liked this bird, because whenever she heard its cries her thoughts would wander far and wide—but she had never seen one. Molitu had. It looked sinister to him, though he had heard from the old folks that the cries of the snow owl always meant the woods were empty. As empty as his heart at this moment, with nothing left to await and nothing to hope for, a heart light and empty as a leaf fluttering to the ground. Just now, however, while he was still running, he had felt as though his heart were weighed down by a rock, plunging him deeper into the darkness with every step.

Then he came to hear the wind in the woods and the river flowing between its banks, smelled the delicate fragrance of grasses beginning to yellow. Thus it was that he followed the river and walked toward Ogda, heading for that familiar white shack hidden behind the dense wooden pickets.

He was no longer thinking about anything. Keep going, Mother had told him, go try your luck. But where? He shook his head. Now twenty-four, he had never gone beyond the valley at the edge of the Tardaji mountains, had never thought of doing so. He remembered seeing a group of people a few years ago who had come from beyond the mountains. They were carrying bags and red-and-white poles and some objects that looked like living things. Instruments, that's what they called those things. But they had no horses, no guns, no dogs. This forest doesn't belong to them! So saying, Father stuffed a bullet into his Bilatanka rifle and flattened himself on the grass, silently taking aim at the outsiders, his teeth clenched tight. Son of a bitch, if they chop one tree within my sights I'll mow them down right there! A life for a life! Do you hear me, you bastard?! I don't care how much they pay, you'd better not be their guide! They are they! No matter what Father was saying he always seemed ready to take a bite out of you. By the time the outsiders disappeared from his gunsight, though, Father had fallen asleep and was snoring loudly. But not Molitu. A feeling of bleakness came over him, as if the mountains had shrunk, as if a piece was missing from the hills, from the sun, from himself.

The snow owl began to cry again. These birds guarded the moon for mountain folk. He wondered what the mountains were like at night when there was no moon. What if there were no snow owls? His thoughts drifted off, his heart—from which a piece was missing—awash with uncertainty.

As he drew near the wooden picket fence and the gate that was tightly shut, he wondered if he should call out to Baidanjia. But no sooner did his hand touch the door than it opened, and Baidanjia appeared before him as if sprung from the earth.

"You escaped?"

"Will you run away with me?"
Baidanjia nestled against his chest and began to weep, her sobs like a fawn butting softly against his heart.
"Molitu, take Baidanjia with you, she's carrying your little lamb."
Inside the bark tent Baidanjia's mother was speaking. In a voice like ripping bark, this lonely and ill-fated woman cried out:
"Let him come to life, Molitu, he is Ogda's heir! Now Ogda will have an heir! O heavens, may the Lord protect you both!"
Molitu began to tremble all over. Putting his hands on Baidanjia's quivering shoulders, he asked:
"Is this true, my lamb?"
"No, no, he's not yours! Run away, go!"
Abruptly Baidanjia pushed him away and started to run toward the house.
But with a bang the cabin door slammed shut and was barricaded from within. Baidanjia was locked out.
"Go, child! Never mind me, go, and let Ogda's seed sprout wherever you may go!"
Something in that voice told Molitu she would never open the door again, no matter how Baidanjia cried and pleaded. Ogda women never turned back.
A sudden energy surged through Molitu. He swept Baidanjia up in his arms and, after a few faltering steps, strode away from the wooden pickets.
Like ebbing waters the fog in the valley subsided. In its wake the sodden birches on the slopes seemed to be waiting quietly for something. Molitu's fur boots kept sliding on the wet grass. Suddenly, from within his arms Baidanjia's hand shot out and grabbed his ear:
"Listen, the snow owl is calling again."
"Where? Where?" Molitu turned a full circle where he stood, but still he heard nothing.
"Silly, it's right here in my belly!.Listen to those tiny legs thumping, thumping—he's calling for you!"
Molitu blushed. Grinning foolishly, he held Baidanjia all the more tightly as he ran straight into the woods. Like so many hands the branches tugged at his clothes and slapped at his cheeks, but it was his heart that tickled. He liked running through the woods like this, grass, rocks, trees and wind all young like him, all full of energy and life.
He found a flat open space and laid Baidanjia down. Kneeling by her side, he pressed his ears close to her belly.
"Can you hear it?"
"Hush."
It was very quiet, so quiet that their hearts began to throb and tighten. Then gradually and from far away Molitu heard something, and all of a sudden he burst out laughing.
"Ahhhh—thunder, I hear muffled thunder!"
"It's the drumbeat of the Thunder God, you silly fool!"
"Ohhhh!" Molitu straightened up, raised his arms up to the sky and began to shout:
"I hear it, I hear it! It's going dong, dong, dong!"
His shouts shook the leaves and made them rustle, while overhead the clouds scuttled across the sky. Watching him, Baidanjia laughed through clenched teeth as tears streamed down her cheeks.
Then suddenly a gunshot roared through the woods. Molitu turned around to look, and was shocked. They were surrounded! Father stood at the head of the crowd. In the valley far below, the bark hut that had been Baidanjia's home stood burning, flames drifting like clouds in midair.
A bluish spark shimmered among the black depths of the gun barrel, but not a glimmer brightened the old man's face. All at once Baidanjia jumped up and stood in front of the muzzle, shielding Molitu behind her.
Then a shot rang out. Slumping to the ground was someone who had just rushed up to them from the crowd.
"Mother!"
But Molitu was held back by Baidanjia.
"Run, child …" whispered the voice from the ground.
Another shot rang out.
Baidanjia fell, Molitu also. He did not know where he was wounded, only that blood covered his body.
Suddenly Baidanjia pushed Molitu aside and stood up once more, shrieking at the top of her voice as she staggered towards the muzzle:
"Run, Molitu, run quickly! My horse is in the meadow beyond the ridge!"
The icy brilliance of a steel blade flashed unmistakably before Molitu's eyes. Then a heavy blow landed on his leg. He fell, got up, fell again. No longer could he see Baidanjia, nothing but a blur of flashing steel. Finally, at the muffled blast of a gun, he somehow jumped onto his feet, then wove through the woods and ran down the hill.

He found the little brown pony. As he clambered onto its back, he realized that he had a bullet in his shoulder and a wound in one leg—a grave wound, his leg feeling heavy as a wet log, his foot completely numb in the stirrup.

The crowd milled around shouting and firing their guns, but no one gave chase. Amid the clattering of his horse's hooves the pitch-black hills and birch forests faded like a nightmare. Yet the rumbling of the Thunder God followed him like moonlight and wind, up one valley and down the next. There was absolutely nothing wrong with his mind, for beyond a doubt he could hear—ever so clearly—that transparent yet mystical drumbeat resonating in the night-blue sky.

But eventually even the drumming faded away. Everything became a dizzying blur in his sight, hills and trees rushing at him like wild beasts. He fell off the horse.

Some days later he awoke to find himself in the home of a Han,\fn{A note reads: The largest ethnic group in China, comprising over 93 percent of the population.}covered with a colorful quilt and lying on top of a well-heated kang.\fn{A note reads: A heated brick bed.} On the kang across from his sat a man smoking a tobacco so aromatic it made every pore in Molitu's body puff up.

"Awake, eh? Been sleeping seven days."

It was the voice of an old man, so smoky it could have been coming from the flue of the kang. His words were followed by a string of rasping coughs.

Molitu tried to speak but could not. As if through a mist, he felt the old man's hand stroking his forehead and saw the long whiskers drifting back and forth like a white cloud before his eyes. The old man seemed wiry and alert.

"Fever in the blood, also in the liver and the lungs. And a chill too. But two more doses of my medicine and you'll be good as new."

Sitting on the edge of the kang, the old man relit his long-stemmed pipe and puffed away evenly. "Your horse I've also taken care of, it's in the barn out back. It was wounded too …"

What else the old man said he did not hear clearly. He felt as if his spirit were dangling idly from the rafters, swaying, fluttering, ready to take flight at any moment. In his ears there was nothing but a constant droning—the cries of the snow owl and the sounds of the distant thunder had melded together until he could no longer tell them apart.

Several days later—he didn't know how many—Molitu was still lying on the kang. But this time his eyes were wide open, and he was staring through the double glass windows at skies that seemed somewhat sloping and somewhat level, skies that looked rather lowering yet rather bright. His senses told him it was snowing, the first snow of the season. His senses also told him he was not far from Tardaji.

All of a sudden an unusual sound pierced him—a ponderous, tidy and clear-cut sound that penetrated all the way into his heart.

"Tick-tock, tick-tock."

His whole body began to shiver involuntarily to its beat. What sound was this—a as mysterious as the bells and drums of the shaman's demon dance, as enchanting as the cries of the snow owl and the muffled thunder in Baidanjia's belly? Where did it come from? How long would it go on?

He sat up with a start and stared blankly, as though in a trance.

Hanging on the wall was a big wooden box (how close it seemed!), behind its shiny glass cover was a round plate (like a moon made of bronze!), on the moon's face some strange markings (just like those made by the shaman on birch bark!), around the moon two needlelike things whirling and twirling (like two goblins chasing each other!), and underneath it a bright golden thing swinging from side to side. A Living Thing! The sound was coming from right in there.

"Tick-tock, tick-tock, tick-tock …"

"That's a clock. A wall clock."

It was the old man again, pointing at the clock in the ebony case and saying: "I've had it for many, many years. Bought it from a Russian."

"It's alive." Molitu stared fixedly at the clock.

"It follows the sun, moon, stars."

"The sun, the moon, the stars—they're all in there?"

"That's time."

"Time? What is time?"

“Time is day and night, sunup and sundown.”

“Who needs a clock to tell all that?”

Molitu fell back onto the kang, in his eyes a glare cold as ice. Silently he cursed:

“To hell with you, lying as usual!”

“How to explain this to you? Well, we watch it to tell the passing days.” The old man seemed not to mind Molitu’s look at all, and with a little shake of his head, walked away chuckling.

Han folk watch it to tell the passing days? Molitu turned his gaze upon the clock again. But even as he listened in a daze to its sonorous and steady tones, he could feel his spirit gradually leaving his body and being snatched away by the clock.

To hell with them! Lies, all lies! The Hans must have a more important reason for keeping this Living Thing. Molitu never believed a word they said. When he used to trade his pelts, deer embryos and bear glands with the Hans for salt, rice, cloth and gunpowder, he had learned for himself how those mongers would blink their snakelike eyes while robbing him blind.

Through the window he looked out on the bustling little town, at the narrow and filthy street cramped by row upon row of tile-roofed houses and filled with a constant hubbub, at the tavern streamers and shop banners fluttering above the crowds. At the other end of the street stood several large chimneys, their thick dark smoke staining the sky the same shade of metallic gray.

Night came, but sleep did not come to Moliru at all as he lay on the kang, his heart brimming with desolation and with fear.

The clock on the wall continued to go “tick-tock, tick-tock,” filling the whole house with its mysterious sound, while around him the four walls shut out one and all, leaving Moliru alone with this Living Thing. At times, this “tick-tock, tick-tock” seemed to be dashing against him, powerfully, persistently, just like the clip-clop of hoofbeats, or the gurgling of leaves—or perhaps it was like the cries of the snow owl and the thunderclaps in Baidanjia’s belly. Other times, it was like a savage beast that had been crouching in the dark, then creeping up murderously, now pouncing on him in one fell swoop!

Then suddenly in the darkness he saw the clock’s shimmering light, a light that shone right into his heart. This Living Thing, so mysterious, so menacing—it must be a treasure of some sort, he thought, probably even more precious than the sun, moon and stars. Why else would the Hans keep it alive?

The snow fell more and more thickly, the night turned white. The clock on the wall grew louder as well, like the rumbling of a caravan as one by one the wagons lumber out of the valley, or like the crashing of timber as tree after tree is felled. He could not understand how this Being came to have such power that heaven and earth trembled at its strokes, such force that it had even shattered his heart.

“Tick-tock, tick-tock.”

The clangor filled his ears. Every wound on his body began to throb with pain again, as if they were still oozing blood. His head too felt like it had been split open.

No more, no more of this awful sound! Like a frightened roe deer Moliru scampered off the kang, took off one of his gold-inlaid armlets and left it on the supper table to pay for his meals, then slipped out of the house, went to the backyard, got his horse, and ran off without looking back. As he went through the door he saw the old man standing in the dark, eyes ablaze like torches and shining right on Molitu. Neither said a word. There did not seem to be anything that could be said.

This time, though, Molitu’s flight was not so carefree as the time he ran away from home, because not a day passed but the sound of the clock pursued him, now behind him, now before him; now on his body, now in his dreams; now falling from the sky, now rising from the earth; now like his shadow, or like his specter, constantly haunting him.

Clip-clop, clip-clop. Tick-tock, tick-tock.

Eight months passed. Whatever the place, whatever the hour, Molitu could not shake off that hellish din. Alone he wandered through the woods and across the marshes, eyes sunken, his once iron-hard body now a withered stump, and on his face a clouded look—as if his eyes saw nothing and his mind were blank. His life seemed to be throbbing away right there in the fluttering of his harness straps; then again, it seemed to be dissipating under the horse's hooves and blowing away on the wind.

Finally came a day when he found himself with no road left to travel, so he returned to the Tardaji mountains. By this time their Thunder God would have already come on earth if Baidanjia were still living in Ogda. But when Molitu returned he found the wooden pickets and the shack all gone, the weeds growing tall and thick, no trace of a fire anywhere. The valley was so quiet it was as terrifying as the exodus from mother’s womb into this world.

Standing there in a daze, he once again heard the cries of the snow owl and the thunder in Baidanjia's belly—but this time he heard them in the midst of the noise that had been pursuing him relentlessly. For the first time he felt a tenderness in the sound of the clock.

Then suddenly he noticed some smoke—like that from a cooking fire—appearing above the woods on the hill. It rose all the way into the sky before finally breaking up into little brown puffs.

When he went up the hill, then through the birch grove, and came at last upon that once-familiar cluster of bark tents, he was stunned. The first things he laid eyes on were the two corpses hanging from the willows on the river bank. Swaying and twisting in the wind, they were wrapped only in reeds, not even the ritual birch bark—so pitiless were their executioners—and hung not from a scaffold but only a few skimpy poles. From their head ornaments Molitu knew they were Baidanjia and her mother. On their bodies were strung the entrails of various animals, curses for one thing or another. Green and goldenly glistening flies swarmed around the willows like a fog. Even at a distance he could smell the odor coming from the flies.

The next things he saw were the men on the sandbank beneath the willows, humming "Zhe-wei Zhe-hui leng" as they skinned bears with their knives. They had certainly done well with bears after he left. Father, his face and body all splattered with blood, was working on one at least a head taller than a man. The women were tending kettles over the fire. Huge tongues of green and golden flames leapt up into midair, turning every one of those flat, blank faces a bright red.

All those red blank faces filled Molitu with disappointment—the disappointment of someone who finally found what he had been looking for, only to discover it was not at all what he had expected. Those people seemed so near to him, so familiar; yet so far away, so very alien.

The air above the river bank gradually became a universe of flies. Perhaps those green and golden flecks were not flies after all, but a horde of spirits on the sacrificial altar. Why else did their droning sound so much like wailing? In the cool clear world beneath that green and golden fog the people began to feed. Their sweat-drenched faces remained expressionless.

"Ding-ding dong-dong" they clanged their wine bowls, "ba-ji ba-ji" they chomped their meat, "shi-lu shi-lu" they slurped up the broth. All energy seemed concentrated in their mouths; they seemed to neither see nor think at all. Over hill and dale the only sound was the chorus of gulping throats.

The guttural sounds, and the droning, and the "tick-tock, tick-tock" of the clock jangled together. In the midst of this cacophony the people on the riverbank all turned into stone—except for their mouths, which continued to move. These rocks, too, gave off a green and golden glow.

Molitu sank to the ground. But even there he found no trace of himself, or anything else. Nothing but the splintering sounds of the Chaos.

79.106 A Saleswoman\fn{by Hang Ying (1944-)} Tianjin, Hebei Province, China (F) 8

The result of the week-long opinion poll, so unexpected, it put me in a very awkward position. She came in first with 1,899 votes, far ahead of the next two on the list. I was flabbergasted. To ask the customers to vote for the best shop assistant had been the idea of our new manager and Party secretary, Guo.

"The customers know who's best," he said. "Their participation in running our store will help us improve our work."

He had us put at the store entrance a big ballot box to which he assigned a special man to collect the votes every day. So that customers could identify the shop assistants for the contest he had each of them wear a badge with a number on it. I was put in a spot by this novel idea of Guo's because as the secretary of the Youth League I had always been sure of the outcome of any vote before people raised their hands.

Taking my cues from the Party secretary I did a lot of spade-work by finding a likely candidate and recommending him or her at Party or League meetings. People then would take my lead and know who to choose. But now it was different. Guo had dropped me no hints. All he said was:

"Let the customers decide."

And now they had singled out a girl who was neither a Communist nor a Youth Leaguer, not even a prospective one!

I thought for sure people would vote for Wang Xianshu, No. 59, who had been played up by the store management during the previous six months. On the suggestion of Gao, the former Party secretary, she was being groomed to be a second Wang Shuxian, which was me. Our names were almost the same. I was in my thirties. I had no boyfriend, but I had lots of titles: Secretary of the Store Youth League Committee, Member of the Store Party Committee, Veteran Advanced Worker, Member of the City Youth League Committee, Member of the District Women's Association, Woman Pacesetter, Model of Late Marriage … I wanted Wang Xianshu to shine like me. She stood at my old counter and succeeded me as group leader. Arriving before dawn, staying on late, mopping the floor, cleaning the toilets, filing regular ideological reports to the League branch, she followed my example in every way. Like me, she wore her hair back without bangs, her short pigtails tied with dark rubber bands. She also wore a plain blouse under a work jacket the color of which had faded with washing. Indeed, she was the very image of a model worker.

But she got only half the votes. The winner was Tin Lu, or Golden Deer, the girl at the candy counter. Her number was 163, but the young men who often breezed in from the steel rolling mill nearby called her "No.1." I didn't know what they meant until I found out that they were grading our girls on the looks. This alone made her unqualified to be honored with the title of model worker.

But now this pretty face was challenging me!

*

The awards were to be presented the following week at a meeting attended by our leaders, press and radio journalists, colleagues from other stores and customers' representatives. I sought Guo out and suggested that we postpone announcing the results until we had discussed the problem first so that things would not turn out badly for us. Guo agreed and called an enlarged Party committee meeting for that evening.

At the meeting, staff members of the Political Work Section and I raised three points against Jin. First, she was frivolous and too preoccupied with clothes. She had been chosen as the beauty queen of our store by some customers. Her votes might have been fixed by people with other motives. Second, she didn't like her job, but was more enthusiastic about appearing before the footlights at the Cultural Center. Third, she was a flirt. Several times she had invited boys to her room to eat sweets.

The trade union official and men of the Propaganda Section disagreed. They said her votes showed that she sold the most and that she was popular, quick and capable, and devoted to her work. Socialist competition means to compete well in work, they said. Since the customers had chosen her, they argued, we should announce the result of the poll honestly. Guo, all smiles, wound up by saying:

"We should see that the poll is conducted in a democratic way and with Party guidance. Before we call the meeting to give out the awards, we'll ask Wang Shuxian to find out more about Jin Lu, and the trade union and Propaganda Section the views of our customers."

That evening, I tossed and turned in bed. I was at once happy and worried—happy because I would be able to prove my point, worried because, though new to our store, Guo knew quite a lot about it and may have drawn his own conclusions. Jin may have wormed her way into his favor. I would need unrefutable arguments to convince him.

At the first glimmer of dawn cycled to the store to check the account books of the candy counter, hoping to hit Jin where I thought she was weakest. As I got off my bike, I saw a bright red one already in the parking shed. Only she dared ride such a flashy bike, with various gadgets attached—a reflectors, a transistor horn, a down tube wrapped in red velvet, a "Deer" brand electroplated Jock, an unusual taillight, topped off with a galloping metal deer at the head of the front fender. The bike was just like her.

What annoyed me more was that she had come so early. Why? To tamper with her account books? I hurried to the candy counter. I saw no one, and the account books were under lock and key. I stopped by to look into the changing room, the table-tennis room and the library. No sign of her. The store was not open yet. The corridors were empty. Where could she have gone?

Then I heard a faint sound of singing floating down from the fifth floor. I ran up to the auditorium. No one was there. The singing was coming from higher up. Out of curiosity, I went up two flights of iron stairs to the roof, where I saw her singing. As she sang, she twisted her body as if dancing. I'd never been to a dance, and I'd seen few foreign films. She was probably doing the strange disco dance that people were so crazy about these days. I hid myself behind the chimney. She was absorbed in her performance, unaware of being watched.

The sky was now rosy with the rising sun, throwing into relief the sexy curves of her body. Blushing to the tips of my ears, I closed my eyes.

Yes, she was beautiful, young and vivacious, but being prejudiced, I found her disgusting. Her rosy cheeks and lips looked as if she wore make-up. Her eyes were large and bright and her long eyelashes were seductive. Even more repugnant was the wild expression in her eyes, eyes that always looked people square in the face. And her fashionable clothes and that flashy bike of hers! She really had no sense of what was proper. So she had come here early in the morning when no one was around to indulge in such an indecent act. How could a person like her be a model worker?

I was fuming when she suddenly stopped singing and staggered towards the railing as if intending to throw herself over. My heart jumped to my throat. I was wondering whether I should rush over to stop her, when she suddenly turned round. Leaning against the railing she sighed, brushed back her long hair, and said:

“I feel empty and oppressed. Time hangs heavy on my hands. Very soon, my face will be covered with wrinkles and my hair will turn gray …” She broke down and began sobbing.

Without realizing what I was doing, I passed my fingers over my face and felt a nostalgia for my lost youth. I tried hard to control my feelings—I couldn’t miss this fine opportunity to probe into her innermost thoughts.

Suddenly she stopped crying and stretched her arms towards the sky, sighing, “Let me pass my time in music and dancing …”Again she twisted her body crazily, waltzmg round and round, her disheveled hair covering her face.

I became worried. What had happened to her? Why was she so distressed? Perhaps she had gone mad? But then I contradicted myself: no, this was her true rotten self.

My investigation was more successful than I had expected. I stole down the stairs with a contented smile.

*

The head of the candy counter and I looked through the account books the whole morning but found nothing wrong with them. When I asked him if Jin had ever been found stealing sweets, his answer was negative. So I let him return to his counter.

My head swam after tackling figures for hours and, finding nothing suspicious. The matter didn't seem so simple as I had thought. I decided to go back to the candy counter to see why she was so popular.

The store was crowded, the candy counter even more so. People visiting the city on business or pleasure, those about to get married or calling on friends and relatives, parents shopping with their children—all wanted to buy sweets. Being short I could not see clearly who was at the counter behind the throng of customers. Then I caught a glimpse of a head of rich curly hair fastened by a golden clip characteristic of the Dai girls of Xishuangbanna in Yunnan, complete with a little chain which swung as her head moved. This deliberate showiness got my back up.

As I stood there trying to find fault with her, I had to admit that she worked efficiently. Smiling, she asked the first customer in line what he wanted. As she measured it for him, she asked the second what he needed and told the third to make up his mind. At the same time she figured out how much the first customer should pay, checked it skilfully on the abacus, and gave each customer an account of what his change was. Her skill earned her much praise.With my professional eye I noticed that she did not keep her head bent over the scale but looked up now and again to smile at customers when she talked to them. All shop assistants were required to be friendly. It had taken me a long time to learn this before I was commended as a model worker. She must have taken great pains, too.

318

But my favorable impression was soon gone when I recalled her indecent performance on the roof. She was an entirely different person then. If I had not seen it with my own eyes, I would never have believed it. One should be judged not only by her work but, more important, by her ideology. However well she acted, there was still something which threw a revealing light on her true character—the dazzling hairpin. And that golden chain behind her ear that drew men’s attention to her snow-white neck! What a shameless coquette!

Perhaps out of admiration or curiosity, onlookers who had not intended to buy anything queued up too. This increased business, of course, but wasn’t her way of attracting customers disgusting?

I snapped out of my musings when, impatient for his sweets, a child in his mother’s arms at the end of the line began crying. When her efforts to soothe him failed, the mother slapped him, which made him howl like mad. Jin asked the other customers:

“Comrades, how about letting this lady be the first in line? It’s not good for this little boy to cry so much.”

When they agreed, she thanked them and asked the grateful mother to come to the front. But the boy still wailed. Jin gave him two sweets to stop him.

My heart sank. It was necessary to maintain order in the store, but she should not give away sweets like that. I wondered—did she do it often? The woman protested. Meanwhile, as Jin finished measuring the sweets, she took two back and asked the woman:

“Isn’t that only fair?”

After wrapping a few pieces of candy in a small piece of paper, she put the rest into a bag which she neatly tied before helping the woman put it into her satchel. She slipped the smaller bag into the mother’s pocket, saying,

"This is for your little boy to eat on the way home, so you won't have to open the big bag."
"That's very thoughtful of you," the woman said, thanking her.
I had to yield my plan to her.
A soldier carrying a suitcase entered the store. He took his place at the end of the queue, looking at his watch again and again. After serving two more customers, Jin noticed he was about to leave.
"Are you in a hurry?" she called out to him.
"Yes. I've got to rush to catch a train back to camp. I want to take some sweets to my friends."
With the consent of the other customers, she let the soldier jump to the front of the line. He saluted her and left smiling with his sweets.
To think that such a decadent person was so efficient and I enthusiastic about her work! Who was the real Jin, the one on the roof or the one behind the counter? Could there be beautiful jade inside a crude stone? The doubts born out of my prejudice were being dispelled as the satisfied customers streamed past her.

*

Just after the soldier left, a gang of youths from the steel rolling mill crowded forward demanding, "We're in a hurry too! We want to be taken care of first." The enraged customers shouted, "Come on—get to the back of the queue!"
A tall, dark young man in steel worker's overalls dragged their brown-haired leader out and said in an authoritative voice:
"Shape up and stand in line."
Brown Hair and his gang quieted down but continued to hang around. Jin seemed to know the young man.
"On your day off, Mr. Dai?" she asked to ease the tension.
Brown Hair laughed at this.
"He isn't Mr. Dai. He's called Daiyu," he said, pointing at the young man.\fn{A note says: Daiyu is the heroine of the classical Chinese novel A Dream of The Red Mansions, [more popularly known in the West as The Dream of The Red Chamber] a girl who is noted for her beauty and delicate health.}
The customers laughed. The young man's dark face turned red with anger. He stared at Tin, then darted towards Brown Hair who retreated crying, "Daiyu in classical Chinese means 'black shining jade.'" Jin giggled while the young man cast her another angry glance and ran after Brown Hair. Brown Hair dodged behind a pillar.
"Since you've come to the rescue of No. I, if you propose now, she'll accept you for sure," he said, taunting the young man.
"Shut up or I'll lift your hide off!"
Brown Hair whispered something to him.
"Dare you do it?" he asked the young man.
The two young men went back to stand at the end of the queue, each holding a ten-yuan note in his hand and a crafty grin on his mouth.
Somehow, I felt worried for Tin. I had been a salesgirl myself. I would have got cold feet in such circumstances. But she threw them a casual glance as if she had not sensed anything unusual.
"Can I help you?" she asked politely when the young man's turn came.
He blushed. Brown Hair poked him in the back.
"Which are the best sweets? Please tell me the speciality of each variety so that I can make a choice," he asked.
She nodded. Speaking to him as well as to all her customers she began,
"It all depends on your taste. Generally speaking, sweets from the north are sweeter than those from the south. The ones from the northeast are the sweetest. If you have a sweet tooth, buy those from Peking or the northeast. In the south where sugar cane grows, people care more about better ingredients and flavor than sweetness. Peking is famous for its crisps, butter balls, and fruit drops. Tianjin is, known for its coffee-flavored sweets and wine-flavored chocolates from the Qishiling Confectionery. Shanghai is famous for its toffees. Chongqing has good sweets too, while fruit drops from Guangdong are the best in the country. We have more than twenty varieties of toffees alone. So which do you want?"
It was as if she was reciting a poem with her perfect Peking pronunciation in her musical voice. The customers were impressed by her detailed presentation. The young man stood transfixed until his companion gave him challenging looks.
"One ounce of each please," he said.

"All in one bag?"
"No. In separate bags."
A murmur ran through the crowd.
"Is that the way you buy things? You're just out to make trouble," one old man said.
"Don't serve him," others shouted,

The young man looked embarrassed, but Brown Hair put his hand on the scale and replied, "It's none of your business. Why can't we buy things that way?"

A man went up to reason with him, and the gang crowded forward. It looked like a fight. I elbowed my way to the counter to intervene. At the sight of me, Jin smiled and calmly addressed her customers:

"Don't worry. This will only take a minute." When the commotion subsided, she asked the rest of the gang, "What about you?"

"The same. We want to taste every kind." they said.
"One ounce each?"
"Two ounces each. Four ounces in a bag," Brown Hair cried.
"Three ounces each. Nine ounces in a bag."
"Four ounces each. One pound two ounces in a bag."

Goodness! That would mean her mesuring the sweets many times and tying many bags. And how could she work out the prices and give out the change quickly? Quietly she asked the fifth member of the gang:

"And you? Half a pound each? There are more than twenty varieties. Please have thirty yuan ready."
The man felt in his pocket and made a face.
"I don't have a sweet tooth. Please give me 1.3 ounces each."

What impudence! These scoundrels jostled the young man in admiration, while making faces and urging Tin, "Please hurry!"

"OK," she answered, adjusting the scale. The customers watched her movements, some curious, some anxious, some fuming. In a jiffy, [a] miracle seemed to happen. She put a bunch of small bags on the counter with her left hand, while with her right hand she took a handful of sweets and put it on the scale. It was always just right. Then with her left hand she picked up a bag, filled it with sweets and tied it up neatly in a second. The customers held their breath, while I wondered when she had learned this skill. Her movements were so deft and elegant she was more like a dancer than a salesgirl.

But something even more amazing was yet to come. She called out the unit price of each variety of candy and its weight as she tied the bags up, announcing the total cost while checking the figure on her abacus with her fingers flying over the rattling beads. Her calculations were always accurate. Taking the money, she told each how much change he would get. She was still cool as a cucumber as she finished serving all those rascals.

The customers, gaping all the while, broke into applause as if they had just seen a superb performance in a theater. She fixed her eyes on the dark young man till he blushed.

His companions were stunned.

"Do you need something else?" she asked with a smile, seeing the gang rooted to the spot. "We have chocolate bars, boxed sweets, assorted toffees, jelly drops, sesame sweets, mint drops …"

Then she solemnly produced five lollipops for children.

The customers split their sides while Brown Hair and his gang ran away. In a polite way, she had called them silly boys, smart girl! I was sure they would never dare bother her again.
Before I knew what I was doing, I was giving her a friendly smile.

*

Back in my office, I sent for Jin's roommate, Ren Xiaomei, and asked her whether Jin had often invited boys to eat sweets in her room. I didn't know why I was so keen on clearing up the question, but the answer pleased me. Ren said that Jin had invited young friends to sing and play music. She had treated them to more than two hundred kinds of sweets she had bought, asking them to sample them and write down their comments in a notebook. Ren also told me that many nights she had practiced wrapping up stones and weighing them …

The scales fell from my eyes. I was ready to blame the head of the candy counter for not having told me about her exemplary behavior. But then I remembered he had recommended her for a demonstration of her skill. I had struck out her name because …

I was conscience-striken.

At a store cadres meeting that evening, I came out with a report on the results of my investigation to the approval of Party secretary Guo. It was decided that the outcome of the poll would be announced the following morning, and the meeting to give out awards held as planned. I volunteered to help Jin draft her speech so that I could have a chance to talk to her frankly.

The following morning, photographs of those chosen by the customers were put up on the "board of honor" at the store entrance. Jin, as the winner, attracted much attention, but she worked as usual, unaffected by her fame. She also was dressed as smartly as ever. Didn't she realize that a model worker should play down her dress? I felt I must talk to her as soon as possible and incidentally tell her to get her speech ready. The moment the store closed I went straight to her room. She had put on an even more beautiful dress and was polishing her shoes.

"You're going out?" I asked.

She laughed and made me sit down on her bed. She was nonchalant when I offered my congratulations. I told her that she was to speak at the meeting and asked her what she was going to say.

"No, no! I am a poor speaker," she said, blushing and shaking her head.

"You spoke very well at the counter the other day," I, said. "You came out first in the poll. You must speak. It's our leaders' decision."

She looked at me helplessly. "I must speak?"

I nodded.

"All right then." When I offered to help her with her speech, she asked, "You mean I have to prepare something ahead of time?"

"Write it out or at least make an outline, so that you won't go astray," I said.

"I'll just say what's on my mind."

"That won't do." I decided to write it for her, but I had to know her thoughts. I couldn't tell her I'd seen her dance on the roof, so I asked her tentatively:

"Has anything been weighing on your mind lately?"

"Why, no," she said, puzzled.

"Yesterday morning …" I hedged.

"Yes?" Her eyes opened wide.

I was pondering how to put it mildly when someone knocked at the door.

"Come in," she said.

The door remained closed. She got up and called, "Who is it? Why don't you come in?" When she opened the door, she was amazed. There stood the dark young man, his face crimson. He bowed his big body and muttered:

"Sorry, No. 163, Comrade Jin Lu. I learned your name from the board of honor."

Her shocked expression turned into a sardonic one as she asked him in politely.

His face a deep red, he backed away protesting.

"No, no! I don't want to disturb you. I've only come to express …"

My spinster's heart pounded. What did he want to express? Jin smiled and looked at him steadily. Embarrassed, he showed his white teeth in a grin and shoved a package into her hand. Only then did I notice he had shaved and had his hair cut, looking very handsome in a woollen jacket. She didn't open the package but held it in her hand, as if measuring its weight.

"Is it a bomb?" she asked with a gleam in her eyes.

"Yes. Dare you open it," he asked.

She opened it right away. It was the sweets he had bought.

"A small gift. My name's on it," he pointed at the wrapping paper and went away.

"Hey, come back …" she ran after him, but he was already down the stairs.

Jin spread out her hands in a helpless gesture. I opened the wrapper: it was a certificate given by the steel rolling mill to outstanding workers. His name was Shi Yongli.

"It never occurred to me he did his work so well," she said as she smoothed it out.

I agreed, then added, "But he shouldn't hold the paper so cheap."

My solemn expression made her laugh.

"Yes. The great Youth League Secretary can't bear to see that," she said, "but I like people who make light of fame and honor."

My mouth dropped when she used the word "like" so casually. As if reading my thoughts, she added with a smile, "I meant it in the broadest sense of the word."

I was about to offer more advice when she said:

"Well, humans are complicated. Some very outstanding people have glaring faults." She stopped abruptly, blushing, and ran out the door.

I was still in the dark about what she was going to say at the meeting.

*

Although the meeting was going to be held the following day, Jin still hadn't written out her speech. According to the usual practice. I decided to get the speakers together to go over their speeches with them that evening. I had to see that their speeches were politically sound.

Jin sought me out and told me apologetically that she had an appointment and could not come.

"What? Are you asking leave of absence from such an important meeting?" I asked.

"I'm taking part in a dress rehearsal for a play at the Cultural Center, so I can't come to your dress rehearsal," she said.

Dress rehearsal? How could she put it like that?

"No. You must come," I said firmly.

She became impatient. "I can tell you right now what I'm going to say, but since I'm in the leading role in the play, I must go," she said.

"What kind of a role?" I persisted.

"A girl who has lost sight of her aim in life and kills her time sprucing herself up and dancing."

The situation dawned on me as recalled her bizarre dancing on the roof. "'Very soon, my face will be covered with wrinkles and my hair will turn gray,'" I recited.

She grabbed my hand, her eyes bright.

"You've seen us rehearsing?"

"I … heard about it," I said, hesitating. So she was only reciting her lines that morning!" I stroked her hand and told her:

"OK. Go to your rehearsal."

She hugged me and wheeled me round in a quick waltz, making my head reel. I stopped her.

"Stay away from these activities in future," I said. She gave a start:

"Why?"

I couldn't understand her disturbance.

"You are a model worker now and must be strict with yourself in everything. You must not only work well, but also behave well." I gave a meaningful look at her dress. She paid no attention and replied:

"Can't a model worker have a hobby?"

"Certainly you can. But your prestige is more important. You must work hard to keep it, otherwise you will be a flash in the pan."

"I hate people who put up a front to seek prestige," she said. "It never occurred to me that I would become a model worker. And I don't think it should be a lifelong title. Of course I'll work hard to keep it, but if I have to choose between being a model worker or an actress, I'll choose the latter."

"What?" I couldn't believe my ears. Yet I couldn't lose my temper, so I tried to appease her. "That's not what I mean."

She brightened up. Sitting down beside me, she asked in a respectful tone, "What else do our leaders expect of me?"

Her submissiveness pleased me. Removing her golden hair clip, I told her like a big sister, "Many leaders and guests will come to our meeting, better not wear this …"

"Why?"

"Why must you wear it?" I countered with a smile.

"Because it makes me pretty. It also reminds me not to lower my head when I serve my customers. I tend to forget when I am busy. When I lower my head, the chain touches my ear to remind me."

So that's how it was! She had many good ideas to tell her audience.

"All right, just tell your listeners how this golden chain reminds you to look at your customers when you serve them. But don't mention that it's pretty."

"But that's my main reason for wearing it," she insisted.

I gave her a tap on the forehead. "Silly girl! Keep it secret from others. How can you say it in a meeting?"

"Why not?" she said, chuckling. "I want to tell everybody. I like to be pretty. Only those who love life care about their looks."

Perhaps all amateur actresses are like that, I thought.

"Tell me what you're going to talk about." Seeing her pondering over the question, I added, "Just say how you came to love your work."

"Well, it is a long story."”After a sigh she went on. "I wanted to be an actress, but I lost the chance. Now I'm too old to be one."

"But you have worked well," I said.

"I realized not everyone can do what he wants even in developed countries, not to mention in a country like ours."

"So how did you come to love your work?" Her answer again surprised me.

"You grow to like anything you're familiar with. No matter what kind of work you do, when you get the hang of it you come to love it."

"Not all young people are like that," I said, shaking my head. "You must say why you are so kind to the customers."

She thought for a moment.

"Well, I'd better tell you first how they helped me," she said.

"The customers helped you?"

"Take my regular customers," she said, "one middle-aged woman teacher, her face always pale as a sheet, came to buy a few sweets on pay day every month. But once she failed to turn up. Instead, her little daughter came together with her mother-in-law. The old lady told me through her tears, 'She is always busy, preparing her lessons late every night in her eight-square-meter room. Her pay is low. She buys sweets only for me and the children. Because she is now hospitalized for hypoglycemia, I've come to buy her some candy. She needs them for her ailment.' One old worker often comes with her grandson who only wants chocolates. His grandfather told him, 'You are born under a lucky star. I never tasted sweets until my twenties, not to mention chocolates!' There were several young men who came to buy sweets to celebrate their being admitted to universities. Those who failed said, 'It'll be our treat next year.' Two more were admitted this year, still the last one said, 'Come and eat my sweets next year.'"

Her eyes were moist.

"They taught me many things about life.I am only too happy to serve ordinary people like them," she said. She spoke as if to herself. She turned her gaze outside the window, the tears in her eyes glistening in the glow of the setting sun.

I knew what she would talk about at the meeting—her love for people, life and beauty. I had misunderstood her. I blushed when I realized my rigid thinking.

"You have spoken yery well, Thank you." I felt a lump in my throat. Embarrassed, she scribbled on a piece of paper on the desk. I urged her to go to her dress rehearsal.

She flashed me a grateful smile.

"Can I come to see your play?" I asked.

Surprised and overjoyed she gave me two tickets. "The premiere is tomorrow. I hope you'll tell me what you think of it."

"Thank you." I saw her to the door. There seemed to be something more I wanted to say to her, but instead I asked, "Why are you always so happy?"

She was silent for a moment, then laughed.

"I don't know. I just find life sweet," she said.

She left. I heard her laughed again when she met someone in the corrider. I picked up the piece of paper and saw a deer, its horns crowned with a rose. I repeated to myself:

"Life is sweet."

Golden Deer, her heart brimming with roses, will plunge into the world with firm steps.

41.163 Trial By PROLEDIC\fn{by Xu Wenli (1944-)} Peking?, China (M) 3

1: Challenging the Judge

Before the hearing started, two clerks came to explain the relevant regulations to me once again, though I told them I already knew them.

They had learned a lesson from Wei Jing-sheng's case, during which there had been too many people in the court. My case had been limited to a selected audience, yet the big room was still crowded with people. The case was heard in the foyer of the court, which had been decorated especially for the event. It was all very solemn and awe-inspiring: two cameras were set up with magnesium lights and spotlights; there were three big tape recorders lined up and a dozen or so electric fans. There were about fifty people in the audience, mostly petty officials of the court and some others who looked like journalists; admission was by ticket only. I recognized two “routine” interrogators who entered with a young man.

First, Ding, the presiding judge, asked me:

“Is there any member of the court whom you wish to challenge?” (He clearly assumed that my answer would be no.)

“Yes!” I replied.

Ding was taken aback. Before he could recover his composure I hit him with a question myself.

“Your Honor, I would like to ask whether or not you came to talk to me several times before this hearing?”

“Yes, I did,” he answered. (I dare say he was wondering what I was up to.)

I didn’t give him a second to think and pressed on.

“Your Honor, did you or did you not tell me each time we met that it would be in my own best interests to confess my crimes, and that I would be treated leniently if I did so?”

Now I was interrogating him.

“I did,” he answered, lowering his guard spmewhat—perhaps he thought I was trying to play up to him by praising his professional skill in front of all these important people. I didn't explain the legal basis of this line of questioning straightaway. I knew I had to press on while his defences were down, so I continued clearly and precisely:

“So, the person I would like to challenge is you, Your Honor!”

I stared at him.

He went pale, his dull gaze moved over to the “puppeteer” sitting in the first row behind me on the right. From now on the “puppet judge’s” eyes were fixed nervously in that direction.

Obviously he received some sort of a signal, and declared in a flurry:

“Clear the court!”

The audience had been sitting bolt upright in their seats. Suddenly they relaxed and the camera lights went out with a “poof!”—like the air going out of a balloon.

Furious voices rose from the court.

“He’s making a mockery of the court. Challenging the judge! Who ever heard of such a thing? Who can carry out the interrogation if the judge is forced to withdraw? What utter nonsense! They should throw the book at him and give him a really heavy sentence.”

But the more sensible members of the audience must surely have realized that a toady like this judge was incapable of presiding over a proper trial. The Standing Committee of the People’s Congress announced long ago that in China a person is considered innocent until tried. If you tell someone that he is guilty, then why bother to try him at all? In my case the judge had convicted me and passed sentence before the trial had even started. The trial was just a sham. And as for my sentence, I stood no chance at all of being justly treated.

Some people may say that I’m stating the obvious. They may think it pointless to go on like this. I disagree. I believe that what I am saying is of some significance. It may be obvious to everyone, but the point is, by speaking out, I can draw people’s attention to the fact that a law enforcement officer has no right to break the law. If he does, then he should be exposed. The law can cut both ways. The educated people of the present generation understand the law, and they won’t allow themselves to be manipulated any more! Although law enforcement officers may be able to get away with illegal conduct in the short run, this situation will not last long. No one may speak up now, but it will be recorded in the chronicles of Chinese judicial practice for future generations. They will study and consider it, when they come to rationalize our legal system. My actions today are based on this conviction about their value in the future.

2: Faking the Evidence

The hearing resumed after a ten-minute recess. My request to have the judge replaced had, of course, been refused. I tried briefly to explain in legal terms why I had made my challenge, but Ding interrupted me and I had to give up. The audience could ponder the question themselves. I would be content if just a few people gave the matter some thought. You can’t change everyone's way of thinking at once.

The moment the examination commenced. Ding dealt his knock-out blow. They knew perfectly well that according to the letter of the law they would have to prove counter-revolutionary motivation before they could convict me as a counter-revolutionary. Although they sifted through all of the prima facie evidence they had, including the material recorded by their "electronic earwigs," they still lacked a single piece of evidence to prove my counter-revolutionary intent. This should; have been enough to call a halt to the proceedings, but they continued, for reasons best known only to themselves.

The procurator seized on a passage in Xu Shui-liang's article which they had cleverly edited, claiming that I was its author. The argument was flimsy and easily disposed of, so Ding came up with another trick. He used a "secret weapon" that hadn't been mentioned till now.

Ding: "Is there any reactionary content in the publications you edited?"

Xu: "No, definitely not."

Ding: "Did you edit this?" A court assistant showed me a copy of the second issue of the Journal of Studies.

Xu: "Yes, I was editor of the magazine, but this particular issue was edited by Wang Xizhe, because it was carrying an article by him."

Ding: "Did you read it?"

Xu: "I did. If there is any problem in the contents, I accept my share of the responsibility."

Ding: "In this article it says that the dictatorship of the proletariat is a bloody dictatorship. Is that so?"

Xu: "Definitely not. I certainly don't recall that. Could Your Honor please read the original?"

Ding read the relevant passage out loud.

Xu: "Very well. Could you now read the paragraphs immediately before and after this passage?"

Again Ding read.

Xu: "That should make it clear. What Wang Xizhe is saying is that some comrades have an erroneous idea that since land-owners and capitalists once treated the proletariat in a bloody fashion, the proletariat, after seizing political power, has the right to treat them in an equally bloody fashion. He states that this does not conform with the principles of Marxism and is inhumane. It should be criticized and brought to an end. The article says, moreover, that years of practice have proved that the existence of many so-called 'enemies' is quite illusory. In writing this Wang was upholding Marxism and criticizing the fanatics of the extreme left. Surely this is not the same as saying that PROLEDIC is a bloody dictatorship? I could just as well accuse you of being a counter-revolutionary, and charge you with calling PROLEDIC fascistic, just because at some time or other you have used the words PROLEDIC and fascistic. It is almost six years since the fall of the Gang of Four; how can you still use their methods and trump up charges by quoting out of context?"

Ding was at his wit's end. He quickly changed the subject at a sign from his "puppeteer."

3: The Sweating Prosecutor

Various clues alerted me .to the possibility that the statement I had originally prepared in my defence might be photocopied, so I abandoned it and wrote an entirely new one, making a new draft on rough toilet paper. I put it in my pocket and kept it with me day and night, taking care not to let even my cell-mate notice it (though I told him everything later). This hurried redrafting naturally weakened the structure and strength of my defence considerably, so in court I had to rely to a large extent on the inspiration of the moment and on my own self-confidence. I was still able to conduct my self-defence successfully and to deal with the ensuing cross-examination.

On the other hand, my change of defence threw the prosecutor into complete confusion. They were aware that I knew about my statement being surreptitiously copied, but they had not reckoned on my being able to write a new one in the short amount of time left to me. There were about thirty papers piled on the prosecutor's desk in readiness for the cross-examination, which began immediately after my statement. It was the prosecutor's task to refute my statement on the basis of the notes he had taken while I had been speaking. But he was in a hopeless muddle. As I had completely reorganized my original defence, he couldn't locate his refutations of the points I had raised, since he had arranged them in the order of my original statement. He became increasingly flustered and frantic, as he sifted through the pile of papers on his desk. He broke out in a muck sweat. Such is the fate of petty thieves.

When it was my turn to speak again I pointed out to the audience, not without a touch of sarcasm, that it seemed odd to me that the prosecutor should have been privy to the contents of my defence and should have made preparations accordingly. I asked pointedly why he had been thrown into such a state of confusion at the last minute?

The prosecutor blushed in embarrassment. He attempted neither to deny my implied accusation, nor to defend himself in any way.

94.191 & 150.291 1. The Amateur Cameraman 2. Earth\fn{by Chang Hsi-Kuo aka, S. K. Chang, Shi-kuo Chang (1944-)} Chungking, Szechwan Province, China (M) 41

1

Wu Ziqiao had secretly been thinking about killing his wife for at least four or five years. The first time he had gotten the idea, she had just been promoted to a managerial position within the company and was entertaining guests at their home. There was no placer for Wu Ziqiao to hide—he had had no alternative but to get dressed up and mingle with all the Americans who would be coming. He thought he'd been the perfect host; who would have thought that as soon as the guests had left, his wife would start berating him from the bathroom?

"Wu Ziqiao, what's wrong with you tonight? You were a lousy host. What did you think you were doing, anyway?"

"What do you mean, I was a lousy host?"

Wu Ziqiao looked on as his tall, heavyset wife took off her clothing item by item, and, like a big white walrus, delicately slid into the bathtub. He just stared at her stupidly, and only after a while did he open his mouth to say, "The whole time I was in the living room chatting with our boss, I didn't try to sneak off, even for a second."

"Sure, but you completely forgot who you were talking to. Why were you talking to Bill about photography? I thought you were going to bore hi to death. Plus, you backed him into a corner, where he couldn't escape. The reason they're called cocktail parties is because everybody needs to be moving around nonstop like a cock's tail; it's the only way they can get the full social benefit of mingling with everybody at the party. After you trapped him in the corner, I wouldn't be surprised if he thinks you're a homo\fn{Homosexual.} trying to hit on him."

She didn't pull any punches, Wu Ziqiao thought to himself. He looked at his wife through the clouds of steam, as if from afar. The pure white pile of flesh in the bathtub looked like a show-covered mountain. What kind of a person would lie in her bathtub and call her own husband a homo? Only his wife. Looking at that great Mount Fuji, Wu Ziqiao suddenly had an idea. This idea was so bizarre that it shocked him. He promptly turned and left the bathroom, a plume of steam and his wife's voice following him as he left. "Wu Ziqiao, where do you thing you're going?

"I'm going to take out the garbage."

"Don't forget to put a big rock on the garbage-can lid, or a raccoon is going to come along in the middle of the night, pry it open, and make a rotten mess."

In the middle of the night, the raccoon came as predicted and was banging around outside the kitchen. Wu Ziqiao's wife forcefully shook him awake.

"Wu Ziqiao, go out and scare away the raccoon."

"Scare what away? The lid's on tight and the raccoon won't be able to get in. Even if I go out to scare it off, it'll just come back."

"What, and let it start  riot out there? Out! Go scare it away."

There was nothing he could do. Wu Ziqiao went barefoot into the kitchen and turned on the outside light. There were two glossy black-furred creatures, one large and one small, standing motionless for the moment in the light, fixing Wu Ziqiao with their bright eyes. After a while, the two raccoons started to jostle the trash cans again. Wu Ziqiao knew that the raccoons really weren't afraid of him and thought, "It'd be easy with a gun. Fire it once, and even if they weren't dead they'd be scared off."

Thinking of the gun, his idea from earlier in the evening mysteriously came back to him, as if it were put back in his head by some supernatural being. Wu Ziqiao scared himself with his own thoughts and just stood by the kitchen window, at an impasse with the raccoons outside. The two raccoons were unable to pry open the garbage can and, fortunately for him, decided to leave. Just as it was about to go, the bigger raccoon looked back at the house; Wu Ziqiao could have sworn that the damned beast gave him a contemptuous wink before it left.

*

Wu Ziqiao wasn't really planning to kill his wife, but he definitely liked thinking about it. He wasn't the kind of person who liked to argue with his wife; if he were really pressed, he would simply state, "A gentleman doesn't fight with a lady." But this wasn't a point he could afford to bring up often; if he did, Helen would argue all the more.

"What do you mean, a gentleman doesn't fight with women? You're living in American society now. You can't not fight. If you don't fight, how will you be able to persuade anyone of anything? If you don't fight, how will people know what your strong points are? If your opponent's a man, you have to fight with a man. If your opponent's a woman, you have to fight with a woman. 'Gentlemen don't fight with women' is only an excuse, that's all; besides, have you ever even fought with another man? If you don't fight you'll be an accountant for your whole life—is that really all you want?"

What Wu Ziqiao said was that he didn't care. Of course, in his heart he did, but he couldn't change one of his lifelong philosophies. He'd been fairly unmotivated for as longas he could remember; probably the only time that he had ever been really stirred up had been when he courted Helen. But it had been so long ago. At that time, Helen Hu was a college basketball star. Wu Ziqiao's hobby was photography, and he followed the team around everywhere they went, taking pictures of the girls and doing odd jobs for them. Originally, he didn't much care which one of them he ended up going out with, but since Helen was the captain, he did a little more for her than for the others. Gradually, everyone began to think of them as a couple. Even now, when she got angry, Helen would bring up those days.

"That was when you trapped me, when you spoiled all my other chances. All I could do was marry you. I guess it's just my luck. What happened to all the vitality and persistence you had in those days? Why don't you wake up and try to act like you did back then?"

Helen hardly needed to bring it up even Wu Ziqiao found it kind of strange. The only explanation he could think of was that Helen had completely exhausted all that energy. The same Helen who with her powerful build shook the basketball court and slam-dunked her way to fame now applied that same spirit and stamina to her work. No wonder all the Americans were amazed by her. Helen had advanced to assistant manager; Wu Ziqiao was still a mere accountant. Except for a slight increase in salary, his position was exactly the same as when he had entered the company ten years ago. His wife's salary was already twice as much as his. The thing that really annoyed him was that it was through his introduction that she had gotten the job in the first place. He'd juste meant to get her a small job to while away the time; who would have thought that in just six years she would become an assistant manager? She didn't even have a master's degree!

Wu Ziqiao definitely wasn't planning to kill his wife, but starting from that night when the damned raccoon had given him that look, it was as if her were possessed. Thinking back on it, he realized that the moonlight had definitely been a bit odd that evening. Americans said that there was always something eerie about the full moon. The raccoon's intentions in coming to his house hadn't been good; for all he knew, it might have been a devil in disguise. Wu Ziqiao's downfall started on that night of the full moon.

*

On another night with a full moon Wu Ziqiao resolved to start writing a diary.

When he was young, Wu Ziqiao hadn't snored. Or maybe he had but hadn't been aware of it. Snoring is really quite a strange physiological phenomenon; usually, the thinner one is, the louder one snores, as if the volume of the snores were in reverse ratio to one's body size. Wu Ziqiao was getting thinner and thinner as his snoring was getting louder and louder. Chinese people who live in America for an extended period of time, eating an American died, usually find that they put on weight, and begin to look more like their American counterparts. Not Wu Ziqiao. Helen, though, had gained at least forty pounds. She had been large to start with, so she gained weight especially quickly. She was fortunate in that she had put it on in the right places, so she was voluptuous rather than fat. She resembled a beauty of the early Tang dynasty—large, fair, and plump, with the grace and carriage of nobility. In comparison, Wu Ziqiao seemed like a shrunken Stan Laurel or like one of the commoners from the ink paints of Feng Zikai.\fn{A note reads: An accomplished artist in the modern period. Born in 1898, he was a proponent of the new cultural movement and of things modern. Besides being a painter, he was also a music teacher, the author of more than 150 books, and a translator of both Japanese and Russian works into Chinese.} Even an accomplished flatterer would be hard-pressed to come up with an appropriate way to say that they looked good together.

Of course, after they had been married, there had been a certain honeymoon period. Even now, Helen really wasn't all that bad to Wu Ziqiao. The fact that she, a former basketball center, yelled at Wu Ziqiao about this or that wasn't really anything unusual. And even though she asked a lot of him, Helen did most of the household chores herself. Strictly speaking, Helen couldn't really be considered a shrew. There was, however, one thing that she truly couldn't stand, and that was Wu Ziqiao's snoring. At first, when he snored too loudly, Helen would shake him awake. Later, she found that when Wu Ziqiao slept in a sitting position, he didn't snore. Although here undergraduate degree had been in international trade, her thinking was still more scientific than Wu Ziqiao's. She demanded that he sleep sitting up to avoid disturbing here sleep, and with science behind her Wu Ziqiao had no way to say no.

Sleeping sitting up became natural for Wu Ziqiao; he often sat on the bed propped up with a pillow and passed the drawn-out night in a dreamy half-asleep, half-awake state. He didn't have a very high-pressure job, so he could usually pass the day in a half-asleep, half-awake state as well. Day and night gradually became indistinguishable to him, but he discovered an advantage to sleeping while sitting up—you could rest up and think about things at the same time. At first, his thoughts and dreams got muddled together, but later he had it perfected to the point where he could sleep for a few minutes wake up, think, sleep again, wake up, think again, and still maintain consistency in his thoughts. Helen didn't believe that he could really do this at first, but slowly came to admire him for it.

Of course, if Helen had known what Wu Ziqiao was thinking about, she probably wouldn't have admired him for it at all. Sometimes he thought about work; sometimes he thought about photography tricks; but most of the time he thought about ways to kill her. At first, thinking about killing Helen had made him feel like he was transgressing some moral code, but he gradually overcame his guilt and handled it purely as a matter of photographic technique. His musings on how to kill her were like reflections on the layout of a photograph. He pictured Helen lying in the bathtub, that pure white pile of flesh like a snow-covered mountain. Anthony Perkins rushes in and with a virgin dagger stabs the snowy mountain;\fn{An allusion to one of the most shocking scenes ever filmed (1960) for a general audience—the killing of a beautiful naked girl in a shower by stabbing her with a large kitchen knife through a shower curtain by a figure dressed in a skirt—in the motion picture Psycho.} the snowy mountain collapses and slides to the bottom of the tub. Ah, but when to release the shutter button and take the picture? As the wicked knife pierces her white, white flesh? Click-click. As the snow-covered mountain collapses into the tub? Click-click. Or when the blood comes oozing out? Click-click, click-click, click-click.

In his half-asleep, half-awake state, Wu Ziaqiao came up with one after another ingenious plan for killing his wife. He sat on his bed, three pillows behind his back propping him up, with Helen beside him in deep sleep, the sound of her breath rising and falling evenly. Sometimes, the sound of her breathing would suddenly stop, and Wu Ziqiao would get nervous and uncomfortable. Only when she murmured something in her sleep and moved around a little, and the sound of her even breathing reappeared, would Wu Ziqiao be able to relax again and continue pondering yet another way to kill her.

One night, when the moon was full, Wu Ziqiao's creativity soared, and he thought up five different ways in a row to kill his wife. He couldn't sit still on the bed and decided he might as well take his pillow and go sleep in the living room—he knew Helen had an important meeting early in the morning, and he didn't want to disturb her pleasant dreams. The living room was a bit cold. He lay down on the sofa and looked through the window at the moon. The full, bright moon reminded him of an old children's song, and he began to hum it softly.

Spring's flowers,
How fragrant they are!
Autumn's moon,
How bright it is!
I in my youth,
How happy I am!
Beautiful she,
What's happened to her?

He remembered Helen at the Armed Services Arena during the finals of the women's basketball championship. With twelve seconds left to go in the game, she made a jump shot from outside the key. He had released the shutter and had captured the instant of the ball just leaving her hand. It was a fantastic shot, click-click.

"If only I had been holding a shotgun, it would have been like hunting pheasant; an even better shot!"

The cool, majestic moon looked down upon him and suddenly appeared to make a bobbing motion, as if nodding approval of his marksmanship. Even though he was in a half-asleep, half-awake state, Wu Ziqiao still caught sight of its movement. From that time on, he resolved to start writing a diary and to carefully record all the methods he thought of for killing his wife, one by one.

*

"Wu Ziqiao! Wu Ziqiao!"

Wu Ziqiao heard the muffled sound of someone calling him and quickly took off his earphones. His wife, all dressed up, was standing in front of him.

"You idiot. You listen to music all day long. Aren't you bored with it by now?"

Wu Ziqiao chuckled and was about to put his earphones back on, but Helen knocked them out of his hands.

"Hell, Zhou Xuan would kill herself if she knew how much you were listening t her tape. Let's go."

"I'm not going."

"You're not going? It's the general manager's party and you're not going?"

"No."

His wife stood with her arms akimbo. She looked particularly elegant this evening, wearing a low-cut black evening dress with a double chain of pearls around her neck; it served all the more to bring out her fair skin and the fullness of her breasts. Wu Ziqiao mumbled and quietly applauded her beauty.

"What?"

"Nothing."

"You really aren't going to go?"

"No." Wu Ziqiao pointed to a stack of tales of knight-errantry\fn{A note reads: Tales of knight-errantry, Wu Xia Xiao Shue are a form of popular literature originating in the Han dyansty (206BC-221AD) and continuing to this day. They involved a central figure who acts outside of the law to help those unable to help themselves, similar to the Lone Ranger, or Robin Hood without the band of Merry Men. The Lone Ranger was an American invention, running as a radio show from 1933-1955 and as a TV show from 1949-1957; Robin Hood is the hero of a group of English ballads of the late 14th or early 15th century.} on the table beside him. "Practicing martial arts at home is a lot more interesting than yakking with all those whiteys."

"You loser. You never go to any social functions; how will you ever make it in American society?"

"I've never said I wanted to make it in American society. You did."

"You'll never get anywhere, you recluse." His wife walked downstairs and, as she went out the door, yelled back, "Don't forget to take the trash out, and cover the lid with a rock. You really have no future. Marrying you would be anybody's downfall."

Wu Ziaiao put his earphones back on and picked up the small green notebook hidden under the kung fu novels. Nature in her mercy nurtures man, and man is powerless to recompense, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!\fn{A note reads: Nature in Her Mercy Nurtures Man, and Man is Powerless to Recompense, Kill, Kill, Kill, Kill, Kill, Kill, Kill! is a famous poem written by Zhang Xian-chong, c.1605-1647, a powerful and cruel robber baron who made himself king of Szechuan Province for two years during the close of the Quing dynasty. This poem was carved on a stone monument (near Chengdu?) called the Seven Kills Monument to commemorate his many massacres.} The green notebook was densely packed with characters the size of a fly's head; when Helen was reprimanding him, he had thought of yet another ingenious plan for killing her. Helen's car must be on the highway by now; at the first big loop before the bridge, she steps on the brakes and suddenly discovers that they aren't reacting at all. She screams, and the car, speeding like an arrow, smashed through the guardrail of the bridge. Click-click, the BMW is suspended in midair; the photo is laid out so that the bridge is in the left corner, and the lower right corner is a stand of small trees; the composition is perfect. Click-click, the front end of the car, falling vertically, enters the water, which sprays out in every direction. Click-click, click-click, click-click, click-click.

Wu Ziqiao had written yet another plan in his green notebook. In a seductive voice, Zhou Xuan sang a song about flowers to him alone.

"KILL!" Wu Ziqiao yelled. "Beautiful flowers are short-lived, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!"

The Little Dragon Girl, the heroine of the novel he was reading,\fn{A note reads: The Little Dragon Girl, Xiao Longnü, is the heroine of a tale of knight-errantry, Shen Diao Xia Lü by Jin Yong.} turned to him and smiled. Wu Ziqiao laughed aloud, "Love is never having to say you're sorry, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!"

He took the garbage outside by the kitchen, found a rock in the bushes, and put it on top of the lid. It looked as if there were a pair of green eyes secretly peering at him from inside the grass pile. Damned raccoons, just waiting for a chance to raise hell. If only he had a gun. He'd shoot them on the spot. They wouldn't give him much trouble then. He took a hoe out of the toolshed and in the last rays of the setting sun dug out the weeds growing next to the sidewalk.

As the round red sun sank weakly beyond the horizon, Wu Ziqiao's shadow stretched across the lawn. Helen should have made it to the party by now; he could picture her thrusting forward her ample bosom and charging right into the midst of everything. Someone asks her why T.C. didn't come, and she just laughs and shrugs her shoulders. No, that's not right, nobody would ask why T.C. didn't come. Who would care whether T.C. came or not? Wu Ziqiao looked out over his long long shadow extending across the lawn, and at his side, Zhou Xuan sang, "After tonight's parting, when will you come back tome?"

"After tonight's parting, kill, kill, kill, kill, kill!"

He swung his hoe toward the skinny shadow, and the blade hit something hard—dong!

"Kill!"

Helen is at the party. She lifts her glass and finishes the drink in one gulp; suddenly, her blossomlike face pales, and the wineglass falls to the floor, click-click. She falls into the embrace of her American boss, Bill. Clickclick, click-click. Close-up: her hand clasping at her throat, her lips going into a spasm, her face turning from white to purple, click-click, click-click, click-click.

"When will you come back tome? Kiill, kill, kill, kill, kill!" Helen's head drops to one side, and life leaves her. The fragrance disperses, the jade falls. Her soul returns to the Heaven of Painful Separation. Click-click.

*

"You've gone mad."

"No, I haven't."

"After writing something like this, you still say you haven't gone mad?"

"Give me back my notebook. You have no right to look through my private stuff."

"I would never have thought you were this kind of person. You hated me like this all along. I'm really hurt.

"Give me back my notebook."

"Closet sadist. You need to see a psychiatrist."

"Who needs to see a shrink? This is my creation, don't you get it? It's a novel. They're all fictitious stories."

"One hundred seven ways to kill your wife—that's a novel? Don't give yourself so much credit.\fn{A note reads: The expression used in the orignal, literally rendered, is, "Don't attach gold foil to your own face," a reference to a practice among Buddhists to show devotion by rubbing a sheet of gold foil onto the face of a statue of Buddha.} You don't have a single artistic cell in your body. All you can do is play with cameras, the simplest kind of toy, the most fitting for you."

Wu Ziqiao's gaze focused on his wife, and he thought to himself that it wasn't 107 ways anymore—now it was 108.\fn{A note reads: The number 108 has mystical significance; it is also the number of bandits who live on a hill in a tale of knight-errantry, The Water Margin.}

"Still, for you, it's pretty amazing," his wife laughed bitterly. "In the thirteen years we've been married, this is the first time I've seen you really work hard at something. It's obvious there's still hope for you. It's also obvious how much you hate me. Who would have imagined."

"Give me back my notebook."

"Fine, I'll give it back to you." Helen threw the diary back into his arms. "What have I done to make you hate me so much? Everything I've done has been for us, and still you hate me like this. Forget it, I've just been blind. Just leave. Get out."

Wu Ziqiao was silent. Years before, his mother had said the same kind of thing to him. Silence is golden; when facing a cruel wife, you should stay composed.

"Go. Leave. Make it a clean break. I can't tell you how disappointed I am in you."

Wu Ziqiao stayed silent.

"Really. I thought marrying a man would be the biggest event in my life. Who would have thought I'd end up married to a heartless beast? I'm truly disappointed."

Silence. Helen is walking on the sidewalk. Suddenly, from out of the sky comes an unexpected disaster—a block of concrete falls off the scaffolding of a tall building, click-click.

"What have I done wrong? Tell me! Other husbands do whatever their wives tell them to do. This one not only doesn't love his wife, but secretly plots to kill her and lies by saying he's only writing a novel."

His wife falls into a pool of blood, a big gash in her head, click-click, click-click.

"He can't fit into American society—all he does is listen to music and read knight-errantry tales, and he decides to kill his wife to vent his frustration. And you still have the nerve to just stand here? A divorce! I want a divorce! Get out of here! Go! The farther the better! Get out!"

His wife went into the bedroom and threw out Wu Ziqiao's pillow and blanket.

"Get out of here by tomorrow morning!"

She slammed the door shut but shortly opened it again and said, "Before you leave, take out the trash, and put a rock on the lid."

She slammed the door shut again. Wu Ziqiao waited for quite a while, until all was silent inside the room, then picked up his blanket and pillow.

Early the next morning, when the lawn was still covered with dew, and before the garbage truck came, he really did leave.

*

At the entrance to the toy store there was an oblong glass fish tank on display, with plastic, camouflage-colored frogmen swimming in it. Every time Wu Ziqiao passed the toy store, he saw the frogmen bumping their heads into the glass and paddling around without stopping. One time he couldn't help but fish one of them out of the water; the alert sales clerk quickly walked over.

"Why don't you buy one to take home for your kid?"
"What happened to this frogman—why isn't it moving anymore?"
the sales clerk, a fat, red-haired girl whose face was covered with pimples, snatched the dripping frogman out of his hand and put it back into the fish tank.
"The batteries died. All it needs are new ones."
The sales girl's intention wasn't to change the batteries, however, but instead to watch Wu Ziqiao, like a buzzard waiting for prey. How could she think she would make a sale with an attitude like that? He pretended he didn't care about it anymore, put his hands in his pockets, and walked away. After half an hour, he made it a point to walk by the entrance to the store again. The pimply-faced sales girl had already gone in, and the grass-green frogman was floating motionless in a rigid, bent position. An electric frog had been added to the tank, and it was swimming back and forth in a lively manner.
That evening, Wu Ziqiao called his sister. Bao Zhu wasn't home; her daughter Betty answered the phone.
"Mom took bobby out. Uncle, why don't you come over for dinner this weekend? We all miss you a lot."
"I can't. The company is sending me to Los Angeles to audit an account. Tell your mom that I'll be over the Sunday after next. I've bought a pair of Calvin Klein jeans for you, and some toys for bobby. I'm sure you'll like them."
"Thank you, uncle. Don't forget to bring the receipt, so I can return them if they don't fit." She then blurted, "Uncle, Debbie's mom is here to pick me up. I have to go now, bye-bye."
Wu Ziqiao hung up the phone, and dutifully started searching through everything for the receipt for the jeans. Last year Betty wasn't nearly as tall as Bao Zhu, but she had sprung up overnight and was now only half a head shorter than her mom. She'd become a young woman; she had Bao Zhu's people sills and even resembled her, too. Where had he put that receipt? Wu Ziqaizao searched wildly through his room and finally started taking all of bobby's toys out of the paper bag one by one. Wu Ziqiao took out the frogman hiding at the very bottom, and, As if in fear of punishment, its hands and feet suddenly started to shake. As might have been expected, the receipt was wedged under the final present.
He put the frogman in the sink. It made a few forced strokes until its head collided with the white porcelain, and then it stopped, floating motionless like a corpse.
"Damned clerk. It obviously wasn't a problem with the batteries," Wu Ziqiao swore as he looked at the grass-green plastic frogman floating bent over in the water. Tomorrow he'd go find that imply-faced sales clerk and return it; as Betty said, as long as you keep your sales receipts there are never any problems.
He put the toy and the jeans back into the paper bag and then put the bag away out of sight in his closet. Besides two chairs, a small round table, a TV set, and a single bed, his room was completely empty. The landlady said he could ask for more furniture anytime he wanted, but Wu Ziqiao didn't see the need. He hadn't brought in anything the entire two months he'd been here. He had spent most of his energy getting used to his new job. As soon as he got home, he just collapsed on his bed—he didn't even have the energy to watch TV. Fortunately, his sister lived on the east side as well and invited him over for a home-cooked meal on the weekends. Bao Zhu had been classmates with Helen; she'd known from the beginning that they wouldn't make a good couple. This time when Helen kicked him out, his sister didn't say anything and didn't try to patch things up for them. He was extremely thankful to he for this, and he spent most of his weekends at her home. Bao Zhu's husband, Zhou Zimin, was an engineer. He was kind and broad-minded, and he enjoyed recreational photography as well. Wu Ziqiao felt completely free to be himself their home. Occasionally Bao Zhu would mention Helen, but Wu Ziqiao would either pretend that he hadn't heard or change the subject.
Actually, on infrequent occasions Wu Ziqiao would talk to Helen over the phone, usually about the house. Sometimes if Helen couldn't find something, she called him. On the phone, they treated each other with great mutual respect. Helen had never asked about his new job, and he had never asked how things were for her either. In all their years of marriage they had never been so tacitly considerate. Sometimes Wu Ziqiao had doubts about whether his moving out had really been a wise decision, but never for mer than an instant. His departure had been a release for Helen. He could tell from her tone of voice that she didn't miss him or want him to come back. he knew she didn't think much of him, and he had moved out determined to make it on his own, earning back a little of her respect in the process. Go back with his tail between his legs and plead forgiveness? Why bother?
When Wu Ziqiao felt bored, he took out his diary and admired it. Since he'd moved out, though, he hadn't written another wife-killing entry. Unless he was in a particularly nasty mood, he didn't hate Helen anymore. Now that he had his freedom, what could he do? What did he want to do? This was something that couldn't be written in his diary.

*

Wu Ziqiao called Jin Lihe as soon as he got into Los Angeles. Jin Lihe wasn't home; it was Xiao Jiling who answered the phone. "Jin Lihe went to San Jose and won't be back until late," Xiao Jiling said. "Leave your number and I'll have him call you when he gets in tonight."

Wu Ziqiao left the hotel number. As expected, at half past ten Jin Lihe called and, without so much as a hello, bluntly asked him, "What are you doing in Los Angeles?"

"Auditing an account," Wu Ziqiao said. "Tomorrow's Saturday. Why don't we get our old classmates together and have a little reunion?"

"Of course. We'll see them all at the funeral."

Startled, Wu Ziquiao asked, "Funeral? What funeral?"

"Xiao Jiling didn't tell you? It's "Camel" Luo-tuo's funeral. All our classmates are going. Do you have a car? I'll give you the church's address. It's at nine o'clock, don't be late."

Jin Lihe had always been on the taciturn side; even after not seeing Wu Ziqiao for five years, he hung up after only a few sentences. Wu Ziqiao had no alternative but to take out his address book and look up Lao Chen's telephone number.

"It was lung cancer. You know that he smoked like a chimney. Even when his illness had reached the critical stage, he still wouldn't quit. It went on for more than a year. He just passed away last Monday. We told all our classmates who are living in California now. You say you just got in from New York? Want me to pick you up? In the morning, 'Monkey' Houzi and I are going to the flower shop; it wouldn't be any trouble to pick you up on the way."

Wu Ziqiao said that it wouldn't be necessary, that he had rented a car and it would be equally convenient for him to drive himself He hung up, and after a bit Jin Lihe called again.

"I've thought about it. It'd be best if I pick you up.,"

"Really, there's no need. I have a car."

"I'm not just being polite. On the road we'd have a chance to talk. Xiao Jilin probably already told you—we're moving to San Jose soon. I'm getting ready to go into business for myself, and I wouldn't mind hearing what you have to say about it."

Xiao Jiling hadn't mentioned it. He hadn't expected that Xiao Jiling would adopt Jin Lihe's philosophy of silence being golden. Fifteen years before, when Wu Ziqiao had just come to America to study, Jin Lihe and Xiao Jiling had been the first of their classmates to get married. Wu Ziqiao had ridden Greyhound three days and three nights to get from South Carolina to Los Angeles in time for the wedding. On the eve of the wedding, Xiao Jiling had still been in Jin Lihe's apartment chattering away like a happy sparrow, loud enough to give everyone a headache. After a while, Camel had been unable to take it anymore and had told her that there were only a few hours left to Jin Lihe's bachelor days; the fact that she was still thee was a little out of keeping with tradition. Xiao Jiling had said she didn't care what the American tradition was. Laughing, Camel had asked how, according to the Chinese tradition—in which an unwedded bride didn't leave her parent's home before marriage—one would devaluate the conduct of one who was staying at the bridegroom's house before their marriage? Angry and embarrassed, Xiao Jiling had ranted at camel and stormed out. …

"So does that settle it?" Jin Lihe said. "I'll come get you tomorrow morning at eight o'clock."

Wu Ziqiao turned off the light and lay down on the bed with all his clothes on. Camel. He almost couldn't remember what Camel looked like. The spirit of memory was like the spirit of Aladdin's lamp; you needed to polish industriously before it would appear. He thought about it over and over; all he could come up with were the faces of the annoying people in the office. "Camel," Wu Ziqiao, rubbing the lamp of his memory, quietly intoned, "Where are you?"

Camel's appearance gradually became clear, a silly grin exposing his two buck teeth. The four brothers in Camel's family were all crowded into a narrow wooded shack in a village for military dependents. Within his memory, Wu Ziqiao once again saw that rickety wooded shack with Camel inside, mouth wide open in a silly grin, and his three younger brothers, who looked as alike as peas in a pod. In the darkness, he couldn't help laughing, and recited from memory a poem by Ku Ling.\fn{A note reads: Ku Ling is a modern Chinese poet.}

*

"Did you sleep well last night?"

Wu Ziqiao climbed into Jin Lihe's Mercedes Benz. Jin Lihe was wearing dark sunglasses, and Wu Ziqiao noticed that her hair was graying at the temples.

"Where's Xiao Jilinjg?"

“She doesn’t feel like coming. We’ll be moving soon, and there are a lot of things that need taking care of.”

“Why are you moving to northern California all of a sudden?”

“Why not? Everyone who’s interested in starting a business should move to Silicon valley. You should come, too. We could go into business together.”

Wu Ziqiao mumbled an incoherent response. Jin Lihe added, “Lao Chen just quit, too, and started his own trading company.”

“Really? He didn’t mention it yesterday.”

“You didn’t ask.”

Wu Ziqaiao thought Jin Lihe would continue to discuss the prospects of their going into business together, but, surprisingly, he didn’t say anything the rest of the way. Only when they had nearly reached the cemetery did Jin Lihe say, “Just about all of our classmates have come today. In all the years since we graduated, this is the first time we’ve gathered together enough people to hold a class reunion.”

Jin Lihe was right. The tiny church was packed with their classmates. Wu Ziqiao stood by Du Jian’s side. Du Jian, with his protruding belly and glistening red face, lowered his voice and whispered to Wu Ziqiao, “Aren’t you living in New York?”

“I just happened to be here to audit an account. Aren’t you living in Taipei?”

“I just happened to be on the west coast for a meeting,” Du Jian continued, “Camel wanted us to come, and we all came.”

Wu Ziqiao knew that Du Jian wasn’t joking. Of all their classmates, Du Jian had been closest with Camel. Without having made arrangements before hand, when Camel’s coffin came out, they all spontaneously proceeded to the altar to act as pallbearers. Outside the church, the southern California sun was dazzling. With such\fn{The text has: soon.} wonderful sunshine, it didn’t seem like a day for sorrow. Camel had been a straightforward, upright person; it was only fitting that he depart on such a bright day as today. “Camel,” Wu Ziqiao said softly, “Camel, my brother, go in peace.”

His eyes became moist. Du Jian walked in front of him while on the other side of the coffin were Jin Lihe and Monkey with their heads lowered, Monkey making unusual blubbering sounds. Wu Ziqiao had never heard Monkey cry before; it actually made his own emotions settle down a bit. Such brilliant sunlight! He softly hummed John Denver’s\fn{1943-1997, American country-and-western performer.} old song.

Du Jian’s shoulders were really broad. He had never realized Du Jian’s shoulders were that broad. Du Jian walked forward stolidly. Perhaps it was the stance of one who had spent many years as a flag bearer in basic training. Wu Ziqiao wondered what he was thinking about. For a while camel and Du Jian had been at odds. Their political opinions were on opposite ends of the spectrum, and they had argued whenever they had seen each other. What would Camel thing if he knew that Du Jian had come all the way from Taiwan to send him off?

*

“Uncle Ziqiao is here, Uncle Ziqiao is here!”

Bobby charged forward to meet him. Wu Ziqiao hoisted him up; his two chubby legs were kicking so hard that Wu Ziqiao almost couldn’t hold him.

“Bobby don’t kick your uncle!” Bao Zhu scolded. Wu Ziqiao put him back down, pulled out the toy inside his paper bag, and gave it to him. Bobby took the transformer robot that Wu Ziqiao had bought him and immediately started to disassemble it on the living-room floor.

“Bobby,” Bao Zhu smiled, shaking her head. “He’s quite a mischief maker.”

‘That’s all right. where’s Betty?”

“She went with her dad to watch a ball game. Last week we made dumplings and waited for you, but you never came.”

“I went to Los Angeles to settle an account—didn’t Betty tell you?”

“She must have forgotten. She’s a lot of trouble for such a small kid. Ever since she’s had a boyfriend, she hasn’t taken anything seriously. It’s only a year until she starts college, and I haven’t seen her study yet. I’m really worried she won’t get into a good school, but I can’t even complain. As soon as I start yelling at her she leaves the house. We were never like that as kids!”

Wu Ziqiao had sunk into the soft sofa and was watching bobby roll around on the carpet. He was standing o his chubby arms in a handstand when he slipped, hit his head on the floor, and burst out subbing, all the while keeping an eye on his uncle. Wu Ziqiao took a lollipop out of his pocket.

“Don’t cry, Bobby. Boys as big as you shouldn’t cry—shame on you.”

When Bobby saw that he wouldn’t get any candy, his fake sobbing turned real. Bao Zhu shook her head.

"It's all your fault, Ziqiao. You have to stop spoiling him. every time you come, I have to spend three days straightening him out."

Wu Ziqiao smiled and nodded his head. He and Bao Zhu were only three years apart. When they were young, they were both skinny. After marriage, Bao Zhu had put on more than a little weight. In these last two years especially, she had begun to resemble a balloon.

"Ziqiao, have you been in touch with Helen recently?"

"I called her before I went away on business, but I haven't talked with her these last two weeks."

Bao Zhu looked as if she had something she wanted to say but the held herself back. Wu Ziqiao knew what she wanted to say and thought he might as well come out directly and say it first.

"I got the letter her layer sent me yesterday. She wants a divorce."

Bao Zhu looked at him. Wu Ziqiao shook his head.

"Obviously I'm not giving my consent. Divorce? Hah."

"Have you told Helen yet?"

"Not yet. Tomorrow's Monday; I'll find a lawyer to call her lawyer."

"Why get a lawyer? Why don't you just call her directly and talk it over? After being husband and wife for so many years what is there that you can't talk about face-to-face?"

"I wasn't the first one to get a lawyer!" Wu Ziqiao's anger boiled up inside him, and he struggled up out of the sofa. "I had just gotten back from Los Angeles, I was in a terrible mood, and then I saw her lawyer's letter. What do you thin, was I annoyed? I didn't move out, you know. She forced me out. In these past few months, I've sent her money to pay the monthly mortgage bills, just like before. When the pies were clogged, I rushed back to fix them. I've done everything I could to accommodate her. After all this, she's the one to strike the first blow!"

Wu Ziqiao was angry enough to get sharp pains in his stomach, and he paced back and forth in the living room. Even Bobby could sense his uncle's anger and took his robot and quietly sneaked off to the TV room

"She's picked up American bad habits, getting a lawyer at the drop of a hat like that. She thinks that American laws can rule me, but I won't stand for it. a divorce, oh, how she wishes. She's out screwing around with that American boss, and she still thinks I don't know." Wu Ziqiao turned to Bao Zhu and continued, "Before we came abroad, she wasn't like this, as you're well aware. Before, her temperament was bad, but at least she was reasonable; she's not a bit reasonable now. I really regret bringing her. Once abroad, women change entirely."

"We've all changed," Bao Zhu said. "Ziqiao, everyone grows up. Helen has talked it over with me quite a few times—it's not that she didn't want to save your marriage, but the things that you did hurt her too deeply."

"You two have discussed it? What did she say?" Wu Ziqiao's voice became rushed. "Whatever you do, don't believe any of her one-sided arguments."

"Are they one-sided? Helen says you've wanted to kill her for a long time and wrote a whole diary of ways to kill one's wife. It was only after you scared her that she forced you out."

"Why would I want to kill her?" Wu Ziqiao forced a laugh. "Kill my own wife because I have nothing to do after dinner? In the thirteen years we've been married, have I touched a hair on her head? She always considers Americans to be superior to Chinese. Sure, Americans' English is better than Chinese people's, but when an American beats his wife, he doesn't just stop when her face is bruised, he keeps going until he's beaten the living daylights out of her. Have I ever hit her? She didn't fulfill her duties as a wife, and I moved to the living room to sleep without even murmur of complaint. She wanted me to get lost, and the next day I moved out of the house. I even quite my job. Would I kill her?"

Bao Zhu sighed, pulled on his Arm, and pleaded with him, "Why, Ziqiao? You're both almost forty, and you've been through this many years, even if it has been a constant fight. If tomorrow you go to Helen and have a talk with her, quietly and calmly ask for her forgiveness. That'll fix it. Like you said you've suffered so much for her, why blow it by trying to act tough?"

"It's not an act," Wu Ziqiao replied. "She's really picked up 'Americans' bad habits finding a lawyer to intimidate me. Divorce? Never!"

*

After three days, Wu Ziqiao finally mustered enough courage to call Helen. Over the phone, Helen's voice was cold and distant. It made Wu Ziqiao wonder whether or not caving in and being the first to apologize was a wise move. Nevertheless, Helen didn't refuse to see him. He arranged for them to meet at half past five at a Western restaurant, but before three he lost his patience and left work early. When he arrived at the restaurant, there were hardly any customers there. he chose a seat in a corner and ordered a martini.

The restaurant had just turned on the lights which gave it an air of majesty. This was one of the classier restaurants in midtown. Helen would certainly appreciate it, but Wu Ziqiao regretted that it was so expensive. He had never had much of a liking for Western food, but Helen, following the native traditions, had suddenly developed a remarkable appetite for steak, eating it blood rare. The previous phase she had gone through was an infatuation for French cuisine, especially bouillabaise. Wu Ziqiao wouldn't touch it with a ten-foot pole. Helen made fun of him for not understanding how to enjoy life. She would always say that since he didn't have any kids, he ought to learn how to live it up a little; did he think he could take his money with him to the gave?

Wu Ziqiao gulped down half the contents of his glass. The icy liquid stopped in his esophagus and stayed there for a while before entering his stomach. He noticed he was starting to warm up, but his stomach hurt a bit, too. He liked to drink, but recently his liver had been acting up, so he rarely did anymore. Today, though, he needed the soothing effect of alcohol.

He couldn't say he didn't regret not having a child. If they had had children, maybe things would have been different. Of course, they might have been even worse. If they were going to separate now, at least no innocents would suffer. He thought of the three half-grown children Camel had left behind. It was fortunate that his wife was strong; after all, she had grown up in a military dependents' village as well. At the funeral, Du Jian had started a collection on the spot for camel's kids' tuition. Du Jian really had initiative, and his activities in the Taipei political arena in the last two years had proven successful.

"Sorry to have kept you so long."

Wu Ziqiao was startled; he couldn't believe that Helen could be so refined and polite. As soon as she sat down, though, the old Helen resurfaced.

"Drinking again? Are you trying to kill yourself? What a loser."

"I've only had one glass," said Wu Ziqiao, smiling amicably. "Is there a lot of traffic outside?"

"It's all right. I didn't drive, I called a cab." Helen had lost some weight, but her face was still glowing with well-being. "Yourself?"

"I took the subway. There's something wrong with the car's transmission, and I just took it to be fixed. I have the feeling we're going to be extorted for another lump of money."

"Speaking of the car …" Helen fished around in her purse and pulled out an envelope. "The car's insurance expires at the end of the month. Since we're living separately, the cars should be insured separately as well. will you call, or shall I?"

"Here, I'll take care of it." Wu Ziqiao took the envelope And took advantage of the situation to say, {I have something to give you, too."

"What?"

Wu Ziqiao took the green notebook out of his briefcases and handed it to Helen.

"What do you mean by giving this to me?" Helen looked as if she'd touched a poisonous snake. "I don't want it."

"You can have it if you like. Burn it. Keep it for evidence. Do whatever you want."

"Who would want to keep this for evidence?" Helen raised here voice in anger. "Wu Ziqiao, if you think that this wipes the slate clean, if you think that this is repenting for your mistakes, then you can go stick it!"

"That's not what I meant."

"then what did you mean? That dog-shit diary of yours. I get the shivers just looking at it. I can't believe you had the gall to bring it!"

Wu Ziqiao knew he'd messed up again. How was it that he didn't think to buy a dozen roses or something? He had never sent Helen flowers before; he would never be able to do so now.

"You've lost your senses! You don't have even the most basic sense of decency. If you had any sense, would you still continue to think of ways to kill your wife every night? How pathetic."

"Certainly it's pathetic," Wu Ziqiao told her. "They're all fake, vulgar, fictitious stories. Who would actually want to kill his wife?"

"You would!" Helen opened the green-covered book and read:

> Uxoricide method number 47: In Haiti there is voodoo magic, by which one can stab a little doll with sharp needles, causing one's wife to ache everywhere. Every day she'll have a headache, stomachache, a sore liver, a sore heart, a sore waist, sore shoulders; there won't be anywhere that doesn't hurt, until finally she dies of pain.

"You're truly cruel to think up this kind of torture. Have you any decency left?"

"Actually, I was thinking about myself when I wrote that. At night my liver often hurts. I wrote that entry because it hurts so bad I can't sleep."

"Is that because I used voodoo to get you? Because of this you want revenge and want to use voodoo to get me, too? Even the Khmer Rouge\fn{The name of the Communist movement that ruled Cambodia from 1975-1979, in which four year period they murdered, worked to death or starved to death cdlose to 1,700,000 people, or over 20% of the country's entire population.} aren't as cruel as you. I always hoped I could get you to give up drinking. I was afraid you would get cirrhosis of the liver, and here you are, biting the hand that feeds you!" Helen stood up and threw the green-covered book at him. "Wu Ziqiao, this is the knife that cuts us in two. I'm telling you, don't bother trying to save the situation, because there's nothing left to save. Anyone who could think of these venomous plans to kill his wife, feel no remorse, and think they're 'interesting' is someone with an abnormal psyche. Divorce! Believe me, we will be divorced!"

"Helen," Wu Ziqiao stood up as well and pleaded, "all the stories are fictitious."

"Fictitious stories can be acted out. I won't be giving you the opportunity." As she left, Helen had a final comment to make. "Hurry up and find a lawyer I want this strictly by the rules."

But Wu Ziqiao didn't look for a lawyer. The next day, just after he had reinsured the two cars, he was sent to the hospital in a state of confusion. He couldn't even remember how he got there. All he could remember was that as he came out of the bank, his sight grew dimmer and dimmer and his legs became weak and wobbly. After that he couldn't remember anything. Looking back on it, he thought it was interesting, like a gradual fadeout in a movie. It was surprising that in life one could have such a perfect montage. If he had passed away then, it would have been like the last curtain call. When he woke up, his stomach had been cut out; the success rate of American hospitals in saving people had always been admirable. He stayed in the hospital recovering for eight days and didn't call Bao Zhu or anyone. His sister thought he had gone off on business, and, surprisingly enough, Helen's lawyer hadn't come to bother him, either. These eight days should have been a good opportunity for Wu Ziqiao to repent for his misdeeds, but in the end he didn't repent and instead had another strange encounter.

*

Her English name was Wendy, and at first Wu Ziqiao thought she was Vietnamese. There weren't many Asian nurses in the hospital—most of them were ungainly old women with indeterminate ancestry. At first Wu Ziqiao, I his weakness, let them handle him. Every time they changed the sheets, he didn't know which way was up or down. Once he regained some strength, he did all he could to get off the bed himself. Every time the stout, black, head nurse saw him sitting primly in the chair at the head of the bed, she would laugh like a braying donkey and say, "Mr. Wu, have you come to visit yourself again? Sorry, he's gone to have an operation, try again tomorrow."

Wu Ziqiao detested the head nurse's jukes. He didn't think they were a bit funny. One time Wendy happened to be bringing his medicine, saw the expression on his face, and whispered to him, "Don't mind her, Barbara's just like that. She's the same with patients who have a terminal illness, cracking stupid jokes. That's her way of cheering them up."

Wu Ziqiao forced a smile and replied, "I know, but if the patient wee a lonely old person and has been made fun of like this, would he be able to stand it?"

Wendy gave him a wink, picked up the medicine tray, and left.

The next day, Wendy's shift came, and, as usual she took Wu Ziqiao's pulse and blood pressure, then left. It was only after she left that Wu Ziqiao noticed that a bottle of yellow flowers had been added to the room. It was a long while until Wendy came back, and Wu Ziqiao, all choked up, thanked her. Wendy chuckled and, switching to Chinese, said, "You'll be all right. In another two days you'll be out of here."

Wu Ziqiao, who had been counting the days until he could leave, now felt rather differently about the whole affair. He started to daydream about the story of the Girl with the Red Whisk and Li Jing.\fn{A note reads: These are characters from a Tang dynasty tale of knight-errantry, The Curly Bearded Hero. The girl with the red whisk packs her belongings and leaves her job to be with Li Jing, a historical future minister to the founder of the Tang (618-907AD) dynasty. See Cyril Birch, Anthology of Chinese Literature.} He was sorry that Wendy didn't come by again before the day he was released. After he finished the hospital check-out procedures, he dressed himself nicely. When the male nurse wanted him to get in the wheelchair to escort him to the front door. Wu Ziqiao signaled to him that it wouldn't be necessary. Now that he could get around by himself, thee was someone he wanted to find. Where was she?

"Wendy? Isn't she on leave?" said one nurse to another. "Didn't she go on vacation?"

"She took a week off. From what she said, her mother was coming from Taiwan, and she wanted to take her sightseeing."

Wu Ziqiao got a taxi and returned to his temporary residence. Everything was still the same: the same old bed, broken table, and two rickety chairs. Wu Ziqiao swept and cleaned the room, found himself in a sweat, and sat down on a chair to rest. Although it didn't seem that anything had changed in the room, he definitely sensed some slight, almost imperceptible differences. What had change? He remembered that when he had just moved in, he had felt a bit uncomfortable, but he always felt a little bit at odds with his surroundings. Later, the room slowly accepted him, like a woman accepting a man. There was always a mutual acclimatization process between room and tenant. He wondered, was it possible the room had been hopefully waiting for him to come back?

Wu Ziqiao slowly settled down. At least something was still waiting for him. He thought of Wendy. He had asked her what her Chinese name was, but he hadn't heard her answer clearly. It seemed to have been Fan something-qiao. Fan Xiaoqiao? Fan Wenqiao? Fan Aiqiao? He had mentioned how his name ended in –qiao, too. When he told Wendy this, she grinned, showing her teeth. Her teeth weren't straight; they tended to stick out in different directions. She was quite tall, almost as tall as Helen, and slender, a southern Chinese natural beauty. People who were that thin were usually Southerners. It was no surprise her mother had come from Taiwan to visit her. From the fact that she was willing to take her mother around, you could tell that she was a good filial daughter, and you could also tell that she hadn't married yet.

Sitting in the chair, Wu Ziqiao slipped into a befuddled state of consciousness. In his half-asleep, half-awake state, Helen pointed at his face and cursed him for being such a loser. He suddenly woke up, startled. The light inside the room had dimmed. It was dinnertime, but Wu Ziqiao didn't feel especially hungry and fell back asleep. He was standing at the entrance to the hospital, waiting for the long-legged Wendy to get off work. Finally she came out, and she grinned when she saw him. When he escorted her home, it was already getting dark. The apartment, having only a single female occupant, gave off a faint aura of sorrow. Like his room, it only had one old bed, a broken table, and two rickety chairs. What was she doing living in a place like this? Wendy smniled and shook her head. The next-door neighbor was making a racket, movin tables and chairs around for no reason, making a "bam bam" sound. Ah, Wendy, Wendy, beautiful Wendy, why do you live in such a place? Bam bam, the next-door neighbor was still making a racket. Wendy smiled and sat on the side of th ebed. Wu Ziqiao tried hard to recall her proper name Fan Xiaoqiao? Fan Wenqiao? Fan Aiqiao?

Bam, bam, bam.

Wu Ziqiao gave a start; someone was knocking on the door. he turned on the light and opened the door. two policemen were standing outside, and the landlady stood behind them, sneaking glances at him. the husky policeman who was in the front took out his identification.

"Mr. Wu? You're Mr. Wu?"

Wu Ziqiao nodded. He began to understand why there were some slight and almost imperceptible differences to the room.

"Ziqiao Wu," the policeman said to hi, "You're under arrest."\fn{A note reads: The policeman, not aware that Chinese surnames precede the given name, has reversed them.}

*

"Ziqiao, are you all right?"

Bao Zhu's face was slightly pudgier; Wu Ziqiao wasn't sure whether it was because she had put on weight again or because she had been crying. He was disinclined to pursue the question and instead said to her, "I didn't kill Helen—it's all a misunderstanding."

"I know you wouldn't do something like that," Bao Zhu comforted him. "We want to get a lawyer for your defense."

"I didn't kill her. Would I kill my wife just because I had nothing better to do after dinner? In any case, I had just left the hospital. Does someone who's just had half of his stomach removed have the strength to kill someone?"

"Why didn't you tell us you'd been hospitalized?" Ban Zhu was breathing in jerks and began to cry. "If only you'd told us sooner, it wouldn't have come to this."

"Come to what?" asked Wu Ziqiao in shock. "It's not like I killed anybody. I'd just come out of the hospital. Where would I get the time and energy to go kill someone? America has a good judicial system. They won't falsely convict me. Poor Helen, to have been butchered so cruelly by some burglar. Have they found … her head?"

Bao Zhu shook her head and started crying again, and then it was Ziqiao's turn to comfort here.

"Don't cry. I'm not in such bad shape."

"You really don't remember anything that happened?"

“Remember what?” Wu Ziqiao bellowed. “You still don’t believe me? Helen and I had our problems, but it wasn’t as bad as all that. As the Chinese say, for every night a husband and wife spend in wedlock, there come a hundred days of affection. How could I kill her?”

“But your diary …”

“They’re all fictional stories, the plots to novels! My god, how is it that none of you can tell fact from fiction?”

“Helen really died.” Bao Zhu swallowed slowly and said, “Ziqiao, listen carefully. Helen is really dead. She died in her own bedroom. She died a horrible death—the murderer cut off her head, and they still haven’t been able to find it.”

“Why talk tome like this? I’m no psycho. You think I’m nuts, don’t you?”

Bao Zhu didn’t answer. Wu Ziqiao sighed. He realized that the situation was serious; even his own sister didn’t believe him. How the hell had it come to this? He carefully recalled what had happened the day he left the hospital. In the morning, he completed the outpatient procedures at about ten, no, eleven o’clock. It must have been approaching eleven, because he saw the food cart in the corridor. He’d probably wasted another half hour looking for Wendy. Afterward, he took a cab home. By the time he got home, it was close to one. He cleaned the room and then sat on the chair and napped. By the time he got home, it was close to one. He cleaned the room and then sat on the chair and napped. By the time the police arrived, it was already dark. The police records said it ws eight o’clock. He had actually slept seven or eight hours sitting in the chair! But after an illness, with our body weakened, it’s easy to fall asleep. The judge should believe him.

Wu Ziqiao broke out in a cold sweat. He urgently needed evidence that he hadn’t been at the scene of the crime. Too bad nobody had seen him come home. Perhaps if he found the cab driver who had driven him home that day, he would testify for him? But, that probably wouldn’t be enough. He could have taken another cab to do the deed, rushed home after killing her, and still have made it on time.

“My thinking is still quite clear,” Wu Ziqiao announced, pondering and speaking aloud in a loud voice. “This will prove that I’m not crazy. If I’m not crazy, I couldn’t unknowingly run out and kill someone. I don’t sleepwalk, so I couldn’t have killed anyone in my sleep. Therefore, I didn’t kill anyone.”

Bao Zhu listened to his analysis and burst out laughing. Wu Ziqiao laughed, too. When they were little, they used to teasse each other. Wu Ziaqio liked to blurt out a big pile of nonsense to trick Bao Zhu, and every time, Bao Zhu was intimidated into believing him. She took out her handkerchief, wiped her tears, and said to him, “Ziqiao, all the evidence is against you. they’ve found your diary and are looking for someone to translate it right now. Helen had also told her boss that you wanted to kill her. He was furious; he said that it didn’t matter how much the company would have to pay in legal expenses, he wanted to see that you receive the punishment you deserve.

“It figures it would be her lover,” Wu Ziqiao explained. “Of course he’d love to get rid of me. “They’d be rid of a thorn in the eye; they would be free to do as they pleased.”

“But Helen was slaughtered. It’s only natural that her friends would want to avenge her.” Bao Zhu quickly added, “Sorry, I wasn’t accusing you.”

“I want to avenge Helen as well. Don’t think that I don’t hate her murderer. His method was too brutal, just too brutal.”

Hearing Wu Ziqiao say this caused Bao Zhu to get worked up and start crying again.

“How could this happen? I just don’t get it, such a good person butchered like that …. I really don’t get it.”

Wu Ziqiao couldn’t get it either. After Bao Zhu left, he was taken back to the detention center. This was the first time in his whole life that he’d been jailed, and, surprising enough, he stayed calm and cool. If he had moved directly from his old home into jail, he might have felt uncomfortable. But after having lived away from home for half a year, he found that the differences between his little room and the jail were not that great. The decoration was equally simple, and the meals were just as hard to swallow. Being in jail made Wu Ziqiao finally realize that, since he had been forced out by Helen (or, that is, decided to move out on his own), he had never been free. Why? Before, he hated how Helen yelled at him to do this and that and just wished that he could kill her. Now, he hadn’t even gotten to sample freedom’s pleasures. All the media hype about how single yuppies lived the high life seemed to have no bearing on him. Damned yuppies, Wu Ziqiao thought, they’re imprisoned, too—it’s just that some people know they’re in prison and some people don’t, that’s all.

Actually, he didn’t mind being in jail. No need to go to work, no need to deal with those boring nincompoops; it wasn’t bad at all. Wu Ziqiao just wanted to clarify that he didn’t kill his wife. Afterward, if they still wanted him to live here, he really wouldn’t object.

The whole thing was still a mystery to Wu Ziqiao. He didn't have a newspaper, but he could imagine the headlines

CORPSE OF VOLUPTUOUS ASIAN FOUND HEADLESS, SUSPECT HUSBAND UNDER ARREST.

Even the Taiwan newspapers would make this into a big story:

STUDY-ABROAD STUDENT KILLS WIFE

No, his student days were long over. They would say,

OVERSEAS CHINESE BUMPS OFF WIFE!
CHINESE KILLS WIFE!
TAIWANESE KILLS WIFE!
CHINESE AMERICAN KNOCKS OFF WIFE!
SCHOLAR SLAYS SPOUSE!

He liked the last one the best. After having suffered through all these years, he should be considered a scholar. Two years ago he was almost invited to attend the National Reconstruction Council.\fn{A note reads: The National Reconstruction Council, Guo Jian Hui, is a meeting of overseas Chinese intellectuals and professionals who return to Taiwan to counsel the government on domestic policy.} That's it. "Scholar Slays Spouse"—that should be the headline.

Pity that the news broadcasts had it all wrong. He hadn't done it. The fact that the police had taken away his diary left him defenseless. He wished he had burned it a long time ago, but burning it would necessarily have helped any. Helen must have told Bill early on that her husband had come up with 108 ways to kill her. Didn't she realize that if someone could come up with 108 ways to kill his wife, he must have some talent, so why would he bother to kill her?

He hadn't killed his wife, but still his wife had died because of him. Whoever set hi up must have read his diary or at least have known that they weren't getting along. Who would want to frame him? Wu Ziqiao thought it through over and over. He didn't have any enemies. Perhaps Bill wanted to get rid of him, but he wouldn't take it this far. In the company, he was a low-level employee; there were people who picked on him, but he certainly didn't get the opportunity to pick on anybody himself. Maybe the companies whose accounts he'd audited were unhappy with him, but that was business; they wouldn't take it out on his family.

Wu Ziqiao thought for a long time and couldn't help but admit to himself that there wasn't anyone who would kill Helen just to set him up. In that case, could it be that it was Helen's enemies who had killed her? Helen was blunt and outspoken. She was the only person in the company with enough nerve to yank the tiger's whiskers and yell at the bigwigs. The Westerners were all somewhat intimidated by her. But he didn't find it plausible that someone would kill just for this, either.

The most logical explanation was simply that burglars had killed her. But the police had taken him with them to comb her house, and nothing was missing., Besides, the corner's report said that she hadn't been raped, so neither greed nor lust could be established as motives.

So who could it be? Bill couldn't be completely eliminated as a suspect. Maybe he really had had something going with Helen, and they'd had a fight. He couldn't satisfy her demands, so why not kill her and frame Wu Ziqiao? If that was truly it, then this American was a real brute.

Of course, there was still the last potential killer, the possibility Wu Ziqiao least liked to consider, the unfortunate possibility that the real killer might in fact be who the police had determined it to be.

*

"Your case isn't hopeless. At the very least, there's still a possibility for defense. However, you have to trust me completely and cooperate with me."

Wu Ziqiao hadn't liked this lawyer all along. He was a typical Jew, big nose, wire-thin lips, the very picture of some louse who wanted both his life and his money. When Bao Zhu selected this lawyer, Wu Ziqiao argued with her, but Bao Zhu only said, “Your judgment is too subjective—you have biases against every kind of person. Here in New York, if you don’t get a Jewish lawyer, what kind of lawyer are you going to get? Would you rather get a Chinese lawyer?”

That one phrase was enough to shut him up; there was no way he was going to get a Chinese lawyer. At least this Mr. Cohen didn’t know who he was. As far as Cohen was concerned, Wu Ziqiao was just another yellow-skinned, slanty-eyed, slightly wacko Oriental. Even if Wu Ziqiao was sentenced to life imprisonment, he wouldn’t necessarily be interested. This Oriental would rather entrust his life to a Jew who was not willing to see him electrocuted, although he still might be a Jew who would nail him to a cross.

“You’ve got to cooperate with me. It isn’t a pretty situation—that diary …” Cohen wagged his head back and forth and clucked continuously. “Too bad. Too bad. I hate my wife, too, but I would never be stupid enough to write a diary about how to kill her. You know how I unwind?” Cohen lowered his voice and said, “Fishing! When I catch a big saltwater fish, I take the knife in mown hand, slice open its belly, and rip its guts. As I cut I say, ‘Paula, this knife is for you, did you hear me? Paula, this knife is for you!’ Ha ha!”

Cohen laughed aloud, and it caused Wu Ziqiao to think of that head nurse at the hospital with the weird sense of humor. These Westerners had all gone crazy, but instead, they thought he had gone crazy. What kind of world was he living in?

“I did not kill my wife. My diary cannot be used as evidence for homicide.”

“But it’s enough to explain your motives for doing so and your mood at the time.”

“I didn’t kill her!”

“The primary objective of our defense is to prove that on the afternoon of September 14, 1986, you went crazy for a short period of time—that is to say, had a temporary insanity—and so are unable to take responsibility for your actions.”

“I didn’t kill her!”

“I didn’t say you killed her. Although this is the crux of the matter, it is not the crux of our defense. The most important thing is to prove that sometime you can’t take responsibility for your actions.”

“I didn’t kill her, and I didn’t lose my sanity.” Wu Ziqiao continued, “How many times do I have to say it before you’ll believe me? On the afternoon of September 14, 1986, I went home, put my room in order, and then sat in my chair and fell fast asleep. I slept until evening.”

“Did anyone see you sleeping?”

“No.”

“In that case, how do you know you were sleeping?”

“Because … because when I woke up, it was already dark out. Besides, I remember the dreams I had.”

“What were they?”

Wu Ziqiao suddenly realized he’d slipped, but he couldn’t avoid going through with what he was saying. “My wife was calling me a loser. But this wasn’t the only dream, this was just the last dream. I’ve forgotten all the dreams I’d had before. You must have had the same experience, only remembering the last dream before you woke up.”

“Aha” Cohen said. “You dreamed of arguing with your wife, and when you woke up, it was already dark out. this doesn’t conflict with my defense at all. In fact, it perfectly supports my primary argument.”

“But I didn’t go crazy.”

“You don’t think you went crazy. But strictly according to what you said, you don’t even remember what dreams you had, so how could you remember what happened in your dreams?”

“I am not insane, and I did not kill my wife. Maybe I can’t present any strong evidence that I wasn’t there, but the opposition can’t present any evidence that I was there, either. Why don’t you make that the focus of your defense?”

Cohen fixed his gaze upon Wu Ziqiao like a hawk and after a while responded, “I considered it, but then decided that it wouldn’t work.”

“Why not?”

“Because although the opposition still can’t prove that you were there when your wife was killed, they can prove that you were at the scene of the crime on the day it occurred.”

“Nonsense! Of course I’ve been to my house before, but on the day it happened, I did not go to see Helen.”

“In that case, how do you explain the fact that the police found your diary at the scene of the crime?

How could that be?! Wu Ziqiao was dumbfounded. The green-covered diary had always been by his side. Hadn’t the police found the diary when they searched his room? Mr. Cohen seemed to sense his confusion, and he continued, “You thought the police found the diary when they searched your apartment, didn’t you? That’s just it—that’s what they hoped you would think. That way, during the cross-examination in court, they could take you by surprise and ruin my defense. But the advantage of having asked a brilliant lawyer like me to defend you is that no one can deceive me. Nor the prosecution and not even you, ha, ha.”

“That’s not possible. The diary was clear in my room.” Wu Ziqiao mumbled to himself. “I’ve never taken it out. How could it have gotten to my wife’s? It’s completely impossible.”

“In this world, nothing’s impossible.” Mr. Cohen closed his briefcase and stood up, saying, “The reason god is willing to forgive man is because man doesn’t know what he’s doing. Relax, I’m getting more and more confident about this case. I’ll come again to see you tomorrow. In the meantime, just get some rest.”

*

Of course, Wu Ziqiao wasn’t able to rest. He could not believe his diary had grown wings and flown home. He remembered things quite clearly. That day in the restaurant Helen threw the diary back at him. he took the diary home, hid it in his wardrobe, and the next day he passed out in the street and was sent to the hospital. Before ehe came out of he hospital, no one knew where the diary was hidden.

Who had sent the diary to Helen’s? He couldn’t have done it himself, could he? Cohen had repeatedly insinuated that he wanted Wu Ziqiao to confess that he had temporarily lost his sanity. It couldn’t be that he had really gone crazy? Wu Ziqiao began to worry. He distinctly recalled that he had dreamed of Helen. Perhaps he hadn’t been dreaming? Perhaps he really had taken the diary and rushed over to Helen’s house. He had apologized for his mistakes again, but Helen still wouldn’t accept his repentance, and he, in a fit of anger, had killed his wife.

Ever since he had been arrested, Wu Ziqiao had managed to keep his cool, but he suddenly felt extremely frightened. He wanted to scream but was unable to make a sound. It was as if he wee possessed by a demon and could only lie paralyzed on the bed. No matter how he struggled, he was unable to stand up. His face was covered with tears, and although he was unable to emit a sound, he still repeated to himself over and over, “I really killed her! I really killed her!”

Everything was clear! The 108 ways to kill one’s wife were just a rehearsal for the tragedy. The unseen supernatural force caused him first to record all the ways to kill one’s wife, and in the end one was destined to be carried out. He though that he had been daydreaming, that they were fictitious stories, but actually he had been fated to be his wife’s executioner.

Poor Helen. Since it had happened, he had been calling for justice to be served. Even though Helen’s head and body had been separated, he had felt no pain or contrition. Now, he suddenly was overcome with remorse towards her. Helen!

Suddenly he was able to move his hands and feet again, as if the demon had loosened his bonds. Wu Ziqiao struggled up, kneeled in front of the bed, and prayed for his soul. He didn’t know how to pray; he just intoned again and again, “Helen, please forgive me. Helen, please forgive me.”

“Helen! You died such a horrible death, please for give me.”

He kept up this attitude of prayer until he fell asleep from exhaustion.

*

By the time court opened session, Wu Ziqiao had already agonized to the point where he hardly looked human anymore. When Bao Zhu saw how Wu Ziqiao had to be slowly led into the courtroom by the bailiffs. She couldn’t restrain herself from bursting out sobbing. Wu Ziqiao’s hair was all dried out, and his eyes had sunk into his head. He had the look of one who saw death as a release.

The cross-examination went smoothly, with no great highs or lows. It was only when the prosecution interrogated the Chinese specialist who had translated Wu Ziqiao’s diary that the defense attorney stood up several times to protest. Wu Ziqiao listened to the entire testimony without any expression on his face, as if he had completely lost hope.

When it came time for Wu Ziqiao to testify. Bao Zhu’s sobbing became too excessive, and she was taken out of the courtroom by her husband. Wu Ziqiao looked all around. In the entire courtroom there was no one he knew. Was it these people who would judge his crimes?

But he didn’t care about these people anymore. He knew he was only the puppet executioner of an unseen power. As he could be used, so could these people be used; they were all fate’s straw dogs. Wu Ziqiao answered the prosecution’s questions according to Cohen’s instructions. He didn’t believe that Cohen’s ingenious plan could save hi, but this was no longer something he was concerned about. Even if the law didn’t punish hi, he still wouldn’t be able to absolve himself. Who had told him to go out and kill his wife?”

Wu Ziqiao thought of rugged Helen, who used to gallop around the basketball court. At that time she was something to see, able to sink baskets from midcourt with ease. She ran back and forth on the basketball court, and he took his camera and ran back and forth along the sidelines, the good husband following his wife wherever she performed.\fn{A note reads: This is a reversal of the usual expression, "The good wife following her husband wherever he performs."} Their golden years were when they had just been married and were living in Kaohsiung. She got up early to go running, and he followed behind on a bicycle, while she hollered, "Wu Ziqiao, hurry up! I'm running and you're riding, and still you can't catch up. What do you think you're doing?"

She had always liked to shout, but after leaving Taiwan, the quality of her yelling had gradually changed from an intimate tone to one of scorn. Was it she who had changed? Or was it he? If he had known it would turn out like this, he would never have come to America.

Wu Ziqiao looked around again. There were quite a few people in the court—who knew what rock they had all crawled out from under? Perhaps some were reporters, perhaps some had come purely to see the excitement. Helen's boss, Bill, sat primly and properly in the third row. In the last row there was a woman shrouded in a black veil; Wu Ziqiao couldn't see her face clearly. It was almost as if she were a close acquaintance of his, but it also seemed as is she were a stranger. He didn't think he had seen her earlier. Why had she suddenly appeared? Why was she wearing a veil? Why?

He mentally struggled with this question and almost didn't hear the prosecuting attorney's question.

"Mr. Wu, please pay attention. What is this notebook?"

In his hand, the lawyer held up the green-covered notebook that was the source of his misfortune. It really was strange. He had clearly hid it in his wardrobe—how had it gotten to Helen's room?

"My diary."

"Why do you keep a diary?"

"When I can't sleep at night or I'm feeling depressed, it's my custom to get up and write in my diary."

"You say that this is your custom. However, previously, you didn't have this custom, right?"

"right."

"When did you acquire this new habit?"

"About a year ago, on a night with a full moon."

"Mr. Wu, can you tell me what the contents of the diary are?"

Was it he who had brought over the "flying diary"?

"The contents of the diary are all fictitious stories."

"What kind of stories?"

"Stories about how to kill one's wife."

"Mr. Wu, when most people keep a diary they record actual events, but you say your diary is all fictitious stories. Is there such a thing as a fictitious diary?"

"Perhaps it shouldn't be called a diary. It's the scattered thoughts that I had every day and casually wrote down. You could call it a novel, a novel written for myself to read."

"Regardless of whether it was writing a diary or writing a novel, you certainly had an objective, didn't you? What was your objective?"

"I just answered that. If I couldn't sleep well at night or was in a bad mood, I wrote in my diary."

"Mr. Wu, please read this section of your diary." Wu Ziqiao read the selection the lawyer pointed out. He had never read Chinese in front of foreigners before, and it came out very awkwardly.

> March 15. Uxoricide method number 68. Put a leather bag on top of the wife's head to catch the blood, and in one swift move cut off the head.\fn{A note reads: This is another reference to the Curly Bearded Hero, in which one character carries the head of an adversary in a leather bag. In the story, the man whose head it was, was "unrivalled throughout the empire for mean ingratitude," according to his killer, who was a hero and a model of the Confucian virtue of yielding.} Afterward, splash on some hydrochloric acid, and in no time the head will have dissolved into a clear liquid. The leftover corpse won't bleed a drop.

"Mr. Wu, of course we don't understand with you reading in Chinese, but fortunately, just now Mr. Meier translated for us. Now, please explain for us, in your own words, what is the meaning of the passage you jest read?"

"It doesn't mean anything. As I've already said, the whole diary is only fictitious stories. This story comes from a Chines tale of knight-errantry …"

"Mr. Wu, I am not the least bit interested I Chinese tales of knight-errantry. I would just like you to explain in simple terms the sixty-eighth method you wrote for killing one's wife."

"It's just to cut off the head, and then to use a chemical to dissolve it. This is a tale of knight-errantry …"

"Your honor!" the prosecuting lawyer addressed the judge. "From this it can be seen that the accused had premeditation from early on, and this sixty-eighth method of killing one's wife is the evidence."

"Objection!" Wu Ziqiao's lawyer, Cohen, immediately stood up and shouted. "It remains to be proven that the defendant killed anyone. The prosecution is trying to distort the defendant's testimony."

"Objection sustained." The judge went on. "Continue the cross-examination."

"Mr. Wu, why did you want to cut off your wife's head?"

"Objection!" Wu Ziqiao's lawyer shouted again.

"All right, let me rephrase the question. In your diary, or novel, or god-damned-who-knows-whatever-the-hell-its-called, why did you want to cut off the wife's head?"

Why? Why would the killer use this cruel and heartless method? Why was it that the police had never found the head? Why?

"Mr. Wu, please pay attention and answer my question."

Why couldn't they find the head? Why?

"Ziqiao Wu," the judge said to him, "you have to answer this question honestly."

Who was that woman shrouded in the veil sitting in the back row? Unless …

"Ziqiao Wu!"

"I didn't kill my wife, I didn't kill anybody! The person who died wasn't my wife Helen Hu, and that's why you can't find her head. This is an old Chinese story—no, two stories. The old switcheroo—Using a Plum to Replace the Peach, and Switching a Cat for the Crown Prince.\fn{A note reads: These expressions, known in Chinese as Li Dai Tao Jiang and Li Mao Huan Tai Zi, are both representatives of stories in which one thing is replaced with another. Using a Plum to Replace the Peach is from a poem in the record of Music from the Sung Records, describing how a worm who was going to eat the roots of a peace tree ate the roots of a plum tree instead; it is a reference to the closeness that should exist between brothers. Switching a cat for the Crown Prince is a Yuan dynasty (1279-1368) Judge Bao detective story in which two rival queens in the Sung dynasty (960-1279) compete to have the first male heir, and one switches the other's boy with a cat to humiliate her and gain status.} If you don't understand, I'll explain it for you. The dead person isn't my wife at all. She's still alive and living well, and she may be enjoying this farce as we speak. She arranged the corpse. She arranged to have the diary placed right next to it as well. She's fooled you all."

Wu Ziqiao stood up excitedly. The prosecuting lawyer looked completely dumbfounded and helpless. Wu Ziqiao's lawyer, however, slowly sat down, and his mouth shifted into a satisfied smile.

"I didn't kill anyone! The deceased is not my wife!"

"Your honor," the prosecution attorney said to the judge, "what's going on today? Are we investigating a murder case or taking creative writing class?"

"Ziqiao Wu, I order you to sit down immediately!" the judge commanded. "If you lose control of yourself again, I'll have to instruct the bailiffs to restrain you."

"I've got it, I've got it all figured out! The person who died simply isn't her. This is called The Golden Cicada\fn{A note reads: Personified later by a character in The Journey to the West, the cicada is originally referred to in a poem by Guan Hanqing in the Yuan dynasty.} Sheds its Exoskeleton plan. If you don't understand, I can explain. …"

"Mr. Wu, we're not as dumb as you think," the prosecuting attorney said. "You say the dead person isn't your wife. In that case, who is she?"

"I don't know, but it's not Helen Hu."

"This is America, it's not China. Would it be that easy to find an Asian woman who was tall and built completely alike to take her place?"

"Perhaps some hospital just happened to have the corpse of an Oriental woman who died of an illness. You can buy corpses. …"

"Weaving stories again! We're sick of hearing your stories. Mr. Wu, the court deputies accompanied you to examine the corpse, and you didn't have any objections then. Wouldn't you notice any special marks on your wife's body? Mr. Wu, if you're telling the truth, can you tell us of any defining ark on your wife's body to prove that the corpse isn't her?"

Wu Ziqiao was speechless. .He thought carefully but couldn't come up with any type of mark on Helen's body. It had been too long since they had been together; all his recollections of her seemed hazy. He thought a good while, but without any result, and was left completely shamed. The prosecuting attorney looked at him scornfully.

The jury was listening, but there was nothing he could say. He noticed that the woman with the veiled face had already walked to the entrance. Although he couldn't see her face, he was still able to perceive the air of supreme desolation emanating from her eyes. The woman in the veil! Wu Ziqiao jumped up again.

"It's her! Don't let her get away—she's Helen Hu, my wife. Somebody stop her, don't let her get away!"

He wanted to leave the witness stand, but the bailiff immediately grabbed him from behind and held him fast. The judge pointed at him and started to bawl him out, the prosecuting attorney was yelling and his own lawyer stood up and shouted as well. By the time all the clamor had subsided, the woman was already gone.

*

"A brilliant performance, even better than I had expected," Cohen said smiling. "Who would have thought you'd comer up with a trick like that? Now no one can doubt that you're schizophrenic and have a tendency to lose your sanity temporarily on occasion."

Wu Ziqiao had no reply. His hands had been cuffed, and he was in despair. The woman with the veiled face … it must have been Helen, she looked too familiar.

"Don't be disappointed," said his lawyer, patting his shoulder. "We've won. They can't establish the murder charge against you. At most, you'll get fifteen years. Of course, you'll be sent to an asylum to be treated, but if everything goes well, in a few years you'll get parole and regain your freedom.

"I'm not crazy, and I don't want to go to an asylum."

"It's still a lot better than being put away for life," said Cohen. "Mr. Wu, it's been my honor to work with you."

She didn't die, Wu Ziqiao thought to himself. Not only didn't she die, she still had the gall to come back and attend her own murder trial. This was just like Helen. Whenever the women's basketball team made trouble, Helen was always in the lead. There had never been anyone who could control heer no-fear-of-heaven-no-fear-of-hell attitude. Even the coach gave her some free reign. Wu Ziqiao had spent a lot of his energy courting her; he'd labored despecially hard <to> scrape up enough money to buy a motorcycle. There were only a few in all of Kaohsiung at the time. Cruising around town, darting amid the safflower trees aflame with blooming red flowers, was like flying in heaven.

"Mr. Wu, you definitely have creative talent. Once you're out of the cuckoo's nest, you should give up your boring job as an accountant and take up a new profession."

She wasn't dead. Wu Ziqiao said to the lawyer, "I want to appeal to a higher court. I'm innocent."

"Save it," Eichmann answered him. "No one will believe you."

"You don't believe me?"

"I believe," he said, "I believe that you think you didn't kill your wife. As to what actually happened, only your wife knows."

Wu Ziqiao thought there was some truth to that and said, "We can summon her to appear in court to give testimony."

Eichmann looked at him with a surprised expression and waited a while before responding.

"I didn't want to admit it all along, but I can't avoid saying it anymore: you need to go to any asylum. You're not feigning insanity, you're really insane."

But Wu Ziqiao knew he wasn't insane. Sometimes he was still extremely worried that he might have actually killed his wife in a fit of insanity, and at these times he would kneel and pray with an inexpressible feeling of grief. Most of the time, though, he believed that Helen hadn't died, that this was al her plot, and that he was completely innocent. She was a woman who could never be killed by a man. Still, he didn't hold a grudge toward Helen. At the end of their life together as husband and wife, the one who wasn't crazy had been sent to an asylum, and the one who hadn't died had been forced to live incognito, and this was tragic enough in itself. He would often think of the air of despondency in the eyes of the veiled woman. He knew he would never see Helen again. It wasn't until that last glance in the courtroom that she really departed from the world of the living.

*

Upon entering the sanitarium, Wu Ziqiao's behavior was excellent, and he became the model patient for the entire clinic. Every two months, Bao Zhu would come to see him and bring canned food and beef jerky. She never brought the children, to spare them from knowing that they had a crazy uncle. On days when Bao Zhu came to visit hi, Wu Ziqiao was always waiting for her in one of the iron chairs out on the patio, playing with his camera and humming a tune. …

Spring's flowers,
How fragrant they are!

Autumn's moon,
How bright it is!
I in my youth,
How happy I am!
Beautiful she,
What's happened to her?

The moral of this story is,

The man who fears his wife is a real husband, the man who kills his wife is a barbarian.

Another moral of this story is,

If you're really set on killing your wife, don't keep a diary.

1945

83.71 Just Let Them Not Know\fn{by Hsiao Feng aka Chang Hsiao-feng (c.1945?-)} Kiangsu Province, China (F) 5

"Have patience, gentle friends; I must not read it:
It is not meet you know how Caesar loved you.
And, being men, hearing the will of Caesar,
It will inflame you, it will make you mad.
'Tis good you know not that you are his heirs;
For if you should, O what would come of it?"\fn{The author quotes, for the purposes of the short story, only the underscored words of the above complete speech by Marc Antony to a Roman crowd demanding to know the text of the last will and testament of Julius Caesar, of whose assassination in 44BC Antony was himself one of the leading conspirators. It occurs as part of the play Julius Caesar by William Shakespeare (Act III, scene ii).}

I went alone to the airport to meet my husband who was returning from visiting refugee camps in Thailand.

"I bought this for you." As soon as we had gotten into the car he took out a small package from his old canvas bag. "It's a silver piece made by the Miao people, somewhat tarnished, very inexpensive. The moment I saw it, I knew you would like it."

I have known him for twenty-two years, ever since my freshman year. He always talked a blue streak.

"The handicrafts of the Miao people are quite unique. There are a lot of them among the refugees. They are really pitiful. Not too long ago, they collectively rebelled against tyranny. When the communists could not subdue them they used poison gas. Tens of thousands died, all over the mountainside and in the fields …"

Suddenly this tarnished piece of old silver felt very cold in my hands. In my elementary school days I learned the names of the six peoples of our country, the Han, the Manchu, the Mongolian, the Muhammedan, the Tibetan, and the Miao, and I had always simply believed that the Miao were one of us. I had never met a Miao, but surely the books could not be wrong. I believed in them implicitly just as I believed in the songs which described our country with such words as "majestic mountains beautiful rivers, over-abundance of natural resources."\fn{A note reads: Lines from the National Flag Song. [It is important to realize that this story is written by a Chinese of Nationalist persuasion; according to Nationalist Chinese thinking, China includes only a single "Chung-hua nation" (Chung-hua min-tsu) subdivided into various "stocks" of common blood, such as Mongols and Tibetans. The Communists, on the other hand, have sought to apply a nationality policy based on soviet practice, based on the definition of a nation as "a historically evolved, stable community of language, territory, economic life, and psychological makeup manifested in a community of culture," and on this basis China is a state presently inhabited by 52 diverse nationalities, of which the Han constitute approximately 92% of the total. The Miao people (who numbered about 2.5 million in 1953) are concentrated in Kweichiow province, but were also to be found in Hunan, Kwangtung, Kwangsi, Yunnan and Szechwan provinces.]} The songs could not be wrong..

Why did it have to be just as we were speeding along the super highway in an air-conditioned car that my hands came into .contact for the first time with a piece of Miao silver handicraft which had brought with it such a heart-breaking story?

"There was a girl from Vietnam. She was an overseas Chinese, about twenty." He began to tell me the story. "She had been on the run for over ten years, probably ever since she learned to walk. Her only experience in life was that of a refugee on the run. I asked her a loaded question, 'Why do you people keep running? The worst that could happen would be death, and to be forever on the run is a miserable way to live. Why do you keep running?' She laughed and said, 'Death? Do you think that the communists would be so good as to let us die? Death in itself is not to be feared, but they lock you up, starve you, beat you, humiliate you, and they instill so much fear in you every minute of the day that you wish you were dead. At one time we were engaged in hard labor. If we failed to collect our daily quota of manure which was to be used as fertilizer, we would not be allowed to eat, and the girls would be subject to rape. You must be from Taiwan. People from Taiwan know the least about the communists.'

"There was this other girl," he continued, "She actually chanced upon her lost family in the refugee camp—"

"Then they were able to have a happy reunion." I finally got a word in.

"No, they went their separate ways. Half of them went to Canada, half to France. They said that in these troubled times a family mustn't stay together. For if something should happen they would all perish, and the family line would end there. Better to separate a family; as long as one member is alive, the family lives on "

I hastily turned my head aside. In the summer afternoon the colorful yellow of the flowering vines clambering over the sloping embankment along the side of the road flew past us like thousands of speeding arrows.

When we got home our little boy and little girl were searching in the refrigerator for cocoa ice. As soon as they saw their daddy they asked him for toys.

"Don't be ridiculous, how can there be toys for sale in refugee camps?"

"There are children in refugee camps too." The little girl was very righteous about it.

"No wonder that girl said that in all the world, the people in Taiwan know the least about communists." My husband heaved a big sigh.

I turned around and saw that the children were engaged in a joint venture of digging into the cocoa ice with spoons, smearing their faces until they looked like the painted faces in Chinese operas. Do I want to let them know that in the forests in the southwestern mountain region tens of thousands of dead bodies of the Miao people were rotting away and covered with maggots? Did I want to let them know that in one group of refugees a hapless mother finally had to submit helplessly to public demand and strangle her child so that his ceaseless crying would not bring retribution upon all of them? Tonight at bedtime would I have the heart to repeat the story about green mountains covered with tens of thousands of dead bodies killed by poison gas?

"Just let them not know about it!" I said mournfully to myself.

*

One night, in a big hall in Chicago, in Chinatown, we were presenting a show, over the smell of haddock and crabs, and over the sounds of Hwang Mei melodies and the music of Pi Pa instruments. Afterwards, a dried-up little middle-aged man came over and shook my hand and said, "It has been thirty years. I attended many such evening events on mainland China. They all had the smell of gunpowder. Yours is different, just listening to you I know there is love."

Just then my son walked by. I stopped him and told him, "Say hello to 'Uncle Chu.'" He did. Our homeland lies ten thousand li away, and it has been thirty years since we left. Life is like a vast misty sea, and that night two boats stopped for a while to exchange greetings. It did not matter if we came from the same province, it only mattered that we were of the same people. Addressing him as "Uncle Chu" was only an expression of kinship and compassion. I told my son, "Uncle Chu just came from Peking. This is his first day in Chicago." My son opened his eyes wide as bells. I smiled and waved him away to get us a cup of tea. In a lifetime's journey of one hundred years every stop is a way station. Thirty years of worries, and half a lifetime of suffering were clearly etched on his face, stroke by stroke, telling a story as true as the records of any history books. Did I want to read it to my children? No. Just call him Uncle Chu and let it go at that; tomorrow will find us at far ends of the world. As to the disastrous thirty years, let's just not let the children know too much about them!

*

One day as we were leaving the outskirts of New York City my friend Hsu suddenly said to me, pointing to a road off the highway:

"A friend of mine lives around there. He brought his mother out of China two years ago. To his surprise, the old lady sang the praises of Mao Tse-tung day in and day out. My friend was curious. Why was she keeping it up even in America? They argued a number of times and all to no avail. He had no choice but to leave her be. What was even stranger was that half a year later all of a sudden she started to curse Mao Tse-tung using the most awful language. My friend was stunned. She then explained, 'When I first came I of course did not dare to curse him. How was I to know if you were on his side or not? I tested you for half a year. Now I know you are not, therefore I now dare to curse him.'"

Here was a story of a mother who dared not trust her own son, and it concerned two people from a country which prided itself on five thousand years of filial traditions. To whom could I tell such a story? The young ears of today have only been exposed to the soft music of guitars. To whom could I tell such a story? On Wall Street the stocks plunge. How many millions of Lennon's gold records have been sold? Was Mrs. Ford's face-lift a success? On the day Vietnam fell, there was a picture of President Ford at an airport holding a young refugee who had been air-lifted over. The picture was very effective. Who would be interested in listening to a colossal tragedy that would continue on and on for one billion acts? They don't want to know, so just let them not know!

*

My friend Hsu later went back to China. On his way out of the country, as soon as he left Canton and reached Hong Kong, he became ill.

"How can anybody not become ill?" he said. "I have been traveling for a month. Wherever I went, whenever 1 met with old friends we talked about their sufferings and grievances of the last thirty years, and we cried. How can anyone not be ill from crying for a full month?"

Hsu later came across a friend whom he had helped in his moments of need. The friend was very poor, and he had no personal belongings of any kind, yet he wanted desperately to give my friend something as a token of his gratitude. Finally he found on old personal seal of his and handed it over to Hsu, with embarrassed hesitancy, saying,

"The stone is a good one. Rub my name off, and you can use it again. In any event I have no use for it."

Hsu could not bring himself to accept it, yet if he refused it would certainly hurt his friend's feelings.

"How can I ever rub my friend's name off?" in a seafood restaurant on Hsi-ning South Road, Hsu asked with great sadness in his voice.

Actually the name and the life of his friend had been rubbed off the record long ago. The lives and dignity of a billion people have all been erased, so what could this little piece of jade matter?

But, to whom could I tell a story like this? So just let the world not know about it!

*

The fact was that the people on that scorched land were not the only unlucky ones. Haven't we, who lived on this evergreen island, also had our share of grief? When I was in college I often visited an old professor. His so-called home was no more than half a room leaning against the side of a hill, and it served as his bedroom, living room, dining room and study. On the wall was a hand-painted photograph of his beautiful wife gazing sadly down at him in deep melancholy. It was as if she were frozen in time by the hand of magic, and year after year her gentle eyes always held a slightly startled look, and her thick black braid was always hanging down over her shoulder, lying against her breast.

"Well, she couldn't let go," said the professor with a sigh. "I told her to leave; I told her to. She said she would as soon as she sold the harvest of grain. The price of grain was falling, and she could not bring herself to sell. It was the harvest from our own land. She wrote that as soon as the price went back up, even a little, she would sell and leave. Then it was too late; she could not leave. Now …"

Close the Book of Changes. How can one figure out the success and failure of a life time? How can one predict the impending calamities of the world?

"It is said that women's hair can be classified into two types, the cottony type and the silky type. My wife's is the silky type …"

She, with her silky hair, looked down from the wall. How can one climb up to reach her? The low wall which was on the side of a hill was a sheer precipice. To whom can I tell this story? Who would want to hear the story of half of an old room leaning against the side of a hill, dark and damp and smelling of mildew? Let's not talk about it. Let the people who do not know about it remain unknowing.

*

"That year when we escaped to the city of Chengchiang and reached the Gold Mountain Temple," my friend Hwang Yi-kung told us, "both my brother and I became ill. My brother died. My mother held me against her bosom; waiting, not knowing whether or not I too would die."

I was very surprised to hear the story. Wasn't the Gold Mountain Temple the one in the opera White Snake? The Temple should be sitting majestically at a grand scenic spot, glittering in gold and resounding with the beat of drums and bells. And then, at the beat of a drum the monk Fa-hai in his red and gold Buddhist robe would walk out in all his priestly dignity. And when he waved his magic urn all the demons and goblins would be trapped, and there would be no escape for any of them …

But in that particular year at the Gold Mountain Temple there was a women refugee on the run, her hair tangled and disheveled, her face sad. At her feet lay the body of a dead child and in her arms that of one near death. At such a time and place, what would the Monk Fa-hai, known for his ability to subdue demons and goblins, say?

Did I want to tell this story? No. Let it be blown away quietly with the wind without leaving any trace. Let the people not know about it.

*

One winter, in the deep of the night, I was sitting under a lone light to write a lyric for my friend Chiang Cheng-tao in Paris. He was an impetuous and impatient man. He was likely to call from Paris in the middle of the night to press me.

I sat up straight in my chair. I had already thought of a topic: Lao Wang, the steamed-bread vendor, receives a letter.

It wasn't that I had nothing to say. On the contrary, wild waves of thoughts were surfacing, and I did not know how to control them. I did not know how to put them down on paper, line after line according to the prescribed rules of rhyme and rhythm. I did not know a bread vendor called Lao Wang, yet I felt as if I had known him for many decades. He often rode around on an old bicycle and announced his wares in a broken voice much like the sound made by his old bicycle.

"Paotze … Mantao … Tousha Pao …"\fn{A note reads: Paotze is steamed bread with meat filling. Mantou is plain steamed bread. Toushapao is filled with a sweet red bean paste.}

As a rule, they were northerners with dark complexions, strong and solidly built, but with unhappy eyes. They usually sold plain bread, but to cater to public taste they also sold bread with sweet fillings. In the twilight hours of the day, in the alleys, in the fading light of dusk, in every city big and small, their silhouettes from behind were like identical black papercuts.

Supposing, one day while he was kneading dough, a fellow provincial brought him a letter, dirty and faded from much handling. He opened the letter. The message was simple and devastating: Mother died in 1970 …

I did not know a Lao Wang, but I knew that the story was true. I shed copious tears for Lao Wang in the deep of the night. I felt his anger and his loss. How can this be the way of heaven? How can it be!

Then I saw him, Lao Wang, out there in the dusty mist in the evening hours, his face full of grief. I saw him clearly, lifting his hand, still covered with dough, to wipe the tears from his face … my thoughts started to fall in place; line after line I wrote:

Lao Wang the bread vendor received a letter
Eight thousand li away, ah! his old mother had passed away
He kneaded and kneaded. Ah! Kneaded and kneaded again
Placing the letter into his apron pocket
Been dead these ten years, ah!
No wonder she didn't answer his calls in his dreams
The freshly steamed bread, oh niang,\fn{A note reads: An appellation for mother in certain parts of China.} taste one while it's hot
How many have I sold these past years I've forgot
Why is it I cannot place one in your palm?

Early the next morning I called the children to me and read them my lyric.

"Do you know what was in the letter Lao Wang received?"

"We know," they answered in the same manner as they would a math question; their faces perfectly tranquil. "His mother died."

Then they hurried away in search of their skates. It was a rare crisp cold day. They wanted to go downstairs to the skating rink in the park.

Do I want to tell them that Lao Wang's mother had gone through thirty years of hell on earth? Do I want to describe to them how she felt as she stood by the village gate, waiting and hoping? Do I want to tell them that for a third of a century, tens of thousands of sons and daughters have been waiting for this shattering moment, waiting like criminals awaiting arrest? No, let their laughter ring like a bell; let them run down the stairs to join their friends in the park.

*

Wasn't I, too, as ignorant as they in my younger days? What was I doing when the whole country fell with a thud? I was reading Alice in Wonderland. I was ingratiating myself with my third uncle, fanning him, bringing him tea, begging him to tell me the story of the Monkey King. Chapter after chapter, over many mountains and across numerous rivers, endless numbers of goblins and demons and evil spirits were waiting to devour the priest. But he walked across those numerous mountains and endless numbers of rivers, step by step, with only one thought in mind, to get the Sutra …\fn{The holy scriptures; of Buddhism, in this case.}

It's been many years, and I have forgotten a lot, but one thing I remember, and that is on rainy days the rice fields would be full of brownish colored snails. I would take a container and go down to the fields to pick them up with enthusiasm. After gathering a certain number of them I would bring them to A-po, an old farmer next door. His wife would crack them and feed them to the ducks.

Last year my third uncle died of a heart attack. I went post haste to Keelung to pay my last respects before the coffin was nailed shut. I was still grateful for the many stories he told us on those summer nights long ago, stories about the priest, the Monkey King and the Pig. As the stories unfolded, tiny little me was able to visualize Priest Tang crossing the great desert, his eyes steadily fixed towards the west, while fire-flies danced around me.

A few books were placed on my third uncle's chest. The one on top was Tso Chuan, with a red pencil in its fold. They said he was reading it the day he died. I almost wanted to go over and shake him, asking him to sit up and tell me another episode from the book The Romance of the Eastern Chou.

In those days I was not aware of the tragedy hanging over all of us and was therefore able to enjoy a peaceful childhood. Those were the days when I stared at the waves created by the rice stalks in the fields, and those were the days when I wore potato leaves as earrings and when I dreamed that I was the Monkey King. Now thirty years had gone by. The soft breeze, the bright moon, can't they too bring us an understanding of tao, the truth? Isn't there magic in the fragrance of flowers and in the singing of the birds too? The book Journey to the West, the aroma of the steaming rice fields under the summer sun, and every other blessing of my childhood, each in its own way, can show me the way of the Chinese people. If I were unaware of the ten long years of nightmare, and the wide cataclysmic sweep of events which took place in the ghastly land, well, it was just as well that I was unaware of it at the time.

Let us also look upon this generation of children with indulgence and love. Let their laughter make up for their grandfathers' blood and tears and their fathers' sweat and toil. As to the thirty-two tragic years from the annals of five thousand years, and the great tragedy which took place on a huge stage measuring eleven million square kilometers, let us wait until they grow up before telling them about it! How I wish there were a Diviner of Dreams in this world, his body as large as a mountain and his ears as deep as the valleys. Only thus would he be able to absorb the innumerable, untold bone-chilling tales of the past thirty-two years. Only he can tell us why it is that this nightmare has bound and fettered us so tightly that even when it causes us to sweat with fear at midnights we still cannot fully awaken.

To the young children I want to give my blessings and my trust, always. In the Old Testament, King David fought to the east and to the west with only one thought in mind: to build a place for God. But God rejected him. Instead, He picked his son, Solomon, a child who grew up in peace and happiness. In the Chinese operas and in novels about knights-errant, in the end the ones who have final control of a situation are always the fair-faced scholars who are at peace with the world, not the muscle-flexing warriors with dark angry beards. Those who are able to reach perfection in the skill of martial arts are not the weary dust-covered travelers, but the heroic youths who are pure in heart.

Let them not know. Let them hold their guitars in their arms and sing their campus songs! Let them go climb the Tapachien Mountain. Let them lie under the sun on the grass in their jeans and count the floating clouds. Youth has no responsibility, just let happiness be their responsibility! How many among the world's surging population of forty-two hundred million are really lucky? One more lucky person in the world means one less unhappy being. Isn't this the blessing of this generation? As to politics, doctrines and tenets, we have the right not to understand them. We only need to understand one thing, that there must be a tomorrow for us and our children!
If, because they are too young, they do not comprehend the fact that the communists brought a great disaster to this world, and if their eyes do not see the great big gaping wound left in human history, worse than any caused by the collapse of mountains, or by the roaring of the angry seas, or by earthquakes, or drought, or famine, then let them be temporarily unaware of it. Did the young Liu Hsiu, first Emperor of the Later Han Dynasty, know that he was to shoulder such an awful load of responsibility? And before David killed Goliath he was merely a red-cheeked village boy who always carried a sling shot in his little hand.

The girl in the refugee camp was right when she laughed coldly and said, "You people! What do you know about communism?"

True, none of us really know. But one thing we do know. There will be a day when our children will know nothing about communism. There will be a day when a child will show his father the word "communism" in his book and want to know what the word means. The answer he gets will be, "I am not sure. Look it up in the dictionary yourself. I do know that it was a strange and horrible and ridiculous thing."

*

I put on the silver necklace, inlaid with blue porcelain, made by the Miao people, letting it hang near my heart. Suddenly this thing on my chest felt very heavy. It represented thousands of people whom I had never met, but whose voices seemed to be ringing in my ears. It represented what our geography books referred to as the beautiful mountain peaks in the southwest, and it also represented the thousands of bodies of the murdered Miao. All of a sudden I said to myself:

"Let me know! Tell me the sorrowful tales. Tell me more! I am an adult now, and I have a strong heart. I can listen to the saddest of tales. I have powerful shoulders; I can carry any burden of grief. I have salty tears to shed for all those who have run dry. Let me know! With the knowledge I gain today let me be allowed to earn a right of ignorance for future generations. Let's spare our children for millions of years to come the knowledge of this tragedy."

188.65 Not A Single Day Of Peace I\fn{by Yan Huili (c.1945-)} Shanghai?, China (F) 1

My husband, Zhang Xianliang, is a talented, upright, and honest man. Since 1978 he has suffered constant political and economic persecution. The first time he went to jail, in August 1983, he wasn't released undl1987.

My daughter, Zhang Bing, and I have suffered as well. When she grnduated from college in the early 1990s she couldn't get a decent job because of her father's political problems.

After my husband was released from prison in 1987, things were very difficult economically. He had no work unit and no regular work, so we had no economic security.

Life was also difficult for us socially. Of the eight families we share a doorway with, four of them were always there to watch us. For years now we have been fighting all the time. Recently one of them even cut my hand with a knife. Our phone is tapped 24 hours a day.

On June 3, 1993, my husband was taken into custody again and is currently at the Shanghai No.3 Re-education Through Labor Farm in Qingpu. He was denied water for the first three days of his detention while the guards maliciously ate watermelon in front of him. He went on a hunger strike in protest At that point, I didn't even know where he was.

Financially, things are worse than before. I only get 200 yuan a month from my work unit, but the long trip to see my husband, which I make once a month, costs a total of 100 yuan. I also must take medicine daily for my poor health.

On June 3, 1994, the police took me to Qingpu, claiming that they were taking me to see my husband at his prison there. Instead, they took me to the Qingpu Guesthouse. They were worried that I would cause trouble during the fifth anniversary of the June Fourth 1989 Massacre, so they kept me there until June 5. They treated me fine, but if I hadn't just happened to have enough medicine with me, it could have been very dangerous.

Personally, this has all been very difficult for me. I haven't had a peaceful day since 1978. I have spent all my energy on this. Many friends and relatives have cut off contact with us.

But I am not afraid I am very strong-willed and I don't care if I am arrested. I support my husband and I believe he is right. I've seen a lot of foreign reporters and have asked them to my home. I don't care. My husband, daughter and I have done nothing wrong.

191.99 Excerpt from Confessions: An Innocent Life In Communist China\fn{by Kang Zhengguo (c.1945-)}
Xi'an, Shanxi Province, China (M) 12

1

One day in the early summer of 1949 Nanny bundled up all her silver jewelry in a piece of blue homespun, grabbed me by the hand, and fled with me out of the Dongguo Gate of Xi'an.

Much later I learned that that had been the day of Xi'an's Liberation. "Liberation" was a brand-new word at the time, and I was only five years old, too young to grasp its full meaning. All I remember is that Nanny had been discussing the news with everybody for days: the Nationalist troops were retreating in defeat, and the Communist Eighth Route Army was coming. Nobody could explain exactly what this "army of bumpkins" was, but I could sense the worry in people's faces and tones of voice.

The idea of an army, any army, struck terror into Nanny's heart. Her nervousness led me to fear that they were going to sack the city as soon as they arrived. All she had in the world was this bundle of jewelry from her trousseau. Over and over again she took out her silver bracelets, hairpins, and necklaces and then wrapped them up again, as if this would protect them from the marauding hillbillies.

Outside the city gate there was a fork in the country road. One way led south, to Nanny's in-laws' house, and the other side led north, to her parents'. She had told me her story many times. Her firstborn daughter had died of umbilical tetanus in the year that I was born. Before her milk could dry up, she had hurried off into the city, where she had found a job as my wet nurse. She hated her simpleminded husband and never wanted to go back to her inlaws' house again.

She took me with her to visit her parents on holidays, so I could reel off the names of all the villages along the road as fluently as any bus conductor. I remembered where there was a cemetery or temple and where you could buy chilled tea. On past occasions there had been almost nobody on the road, and the rural scenery had been dull, but this time I saw something different: refugees streaming in both directions, in and out of the city, and bare-chested deserters from the retreating Nationalist Army with red welts on their shoulders from carrying stretchers. I heard the muffled booming of cannons in the distance, and the loud explosion of the great Chan River Bridge being destroyed by the retreating Nationalists. People were lugging all kinds of bundles in their hands, on their shoulders, on carrying poles, and in carts. They were afraid that their personal property would be seized by the passing troops. They feared the retreating army, but they feared the approaching one even more.

We didn't see any armies along the way. But we did see people looting a Nationalist Army base near the road. As soon as the troops evacuated the buildings, a mob surged in and tore them up, making off with wooden beams and sacks of flour, while a group of empty-handed onlookers egged one another on, shouting,

"Go for it! Let's get some loot while we can!"

That afternoon we arrived at Nanny's parents' house, a deep, dark earthen cave with a cracked, sooty ceiling, which I was afraid would collapse on us. As I stretched my tired legs on the kang I took a deep breath, enjoying the familiar smell of earth, mildewed straw, and chimney smoke. On the wall there was a shrine to the gods, lit by an oil lamp, with a table of offerings beneath it. Under the table there was a dark pit, which Nanny called a cellar. She climbed down into this cellar and hid her bundle, and then all the neighbors filed in and hid their bundles there too.

Finally, the terrifying day passed, and the troops were gone. By the next morning, when there still had not been any pillaging, the neighbors filed back in to retrieve their hidden bundles, and village life returned to normal.

*

When Nanny brought me back to our family home in the Dongguan section of Xi'an\fn{Near the East Gate of the city} about ten days later, the Communists had taken over.

The whole city was abuzz with the word "liberation," which was emblazoned on posters everywhere. Triumphant songs were popular, and I liked this one:

The sky is blue in the liberated areas,
The people are glad in the liberated areas,
The sun never sets in the liberated areas,
The singing never ends in the liberated areas.

People really did seem as jubilant as the song suggested, as if the mere incantation of this new word, "liberation" could instantly usher out the old and bring in the new. But some things did not change that quickly. Our inner courtyard was still quiet all day; the gray pigeons still cooed on the roof; the big old tree by our door was still half dead, with the same hollow halfway up its trunk; the road from the Dongguo Gate to our house was still pitted; and manure, garbage, and dead cats and dogs were still piled next to the earthen city wall with a sickening stench that reeked from far away.

Once the Communists were in power, there was endless fanfare. Whenever new policies were proclaimed in the streets, parades of teachers and students spilled out of the middle school next door to our house, beating drums and gongs, waving little red and green placards, and shouting slogans.

Nanny enjoyed all the festivities. She had always liked going to traditional New Year's parades with our cook, a tall man who would elbow his way through the crowds with me on his shoulders to see all the different costumed characters from various operas. Suspended high in the air from scaffolding cleverly hidden with stage props, they held still, like statues, as the parade marched slowly along. Nanny would point to them and identify them for me.

But this parade was different. Wearing octagonal caps and Lenin costumes or white-towel turbans, the marchers beat on waist drums and danced the yangge,\fn{A rural folk dance popularized by the Communists} twisting and turning, taking a few steps forward, then a few steps backward. From time to time they stopped and stood in a circle to sing and dance for the audience. This new show had nothing to do with the traditional opera, so Nanny could not tell me the names of the characters. The only thing that was the same was the earsplitting banging of the gongs and drums, which reverberated throughout the city so often that most days seemed like New Year's, an audible sign that times had changed.

Of course nobody used the derogatory term "bumpkin Eighth Route Army" anymore. Now it was called the People's Liberation Army. This was its official name, and all others were banned. One evening when a contingent of this army rolled into the Dongguo Gate, we heard someone at our door calling,

"Ma'am!"

Nanny, who had the typical civilian's ingrained fear of the military, went to answer the door. Later she told Grandmother that her hands had been trembling so hard that it had taken her forever to get the bolt open. That night the troops were quartered in our alley, and they cooked their meals in our kitchen the next day. But people's fears turned out to be groundless. The troops were well disciplined and congenial, and there was no trouble.

Nevertheless, the townspeople still called them bumpkins and circulated jokes about them. There was one about a soldier who tried to light his cigarette by holding it up to a lightbulb, and another about some troops who, quartered in a judge's house, dropped to the floor with their guns cocked when they heard a telephone ring.

Once the troops were gone, we were harassed constantly by our new neighborhood police officer, a man in a shabby uniform with a heavy northern Shaanxi accent. We always served him tea in the parlor, but he seemed unaccustomed to smooth cedar chairs, and after sitting for a while, he would shift to a squatting position right on his chair, without even taking off his shoes. The main reason he came was to interrogate Father about his vacuum-tube radio, apparently a forbidden item now. The police seemed to suspect that it was for sending wireless telegrams rather than for receiving broadcasts. Father was summoned repeatedly to the police station for questioning. Although they never managed to pin anything on him, he eventually surrendered the radio in exasperation.

Father had gotten his undergraduate degree in water conservancy engineering from the National Northwestern Agricultural Institute and done his graduate work in municipal drainage systems in Chongqing. Then he returned to Xi'an and was hired as head of the Preparatory Department for the new city waterworks. Before the Communist takeover, he had dressed in a suit and tie, parted his hair and styled it with a hair dryer, ridden a motorcycle to work, and entertained in his living room an American engineer from Tennessee, with whom he spoke English. He had also been fond of oatmeal and condensed milk, from boxes labeled in English. When the Communists nationalized all the industries, they retained him as a deputy chief engineer in the new waterworks. Once they sent him to Shanghai to sue the foreign contractors who had built the waterworks before the Communist takeover. After a lengthy stay there he recovered a large sum of money on behalf of the waterworks.

*

But while he was away, our family fell on hard times. The Land Reform campaign had begun, and Grandfather was classified as a landlord. According to the official policy, he was supposed to buy back some real estate that he had recently sold and donate it to the work team to be redistributed to the poor peasants and farmhands. To raise the cash for this, he had to sell our family home in Xi'an at a loss. My parents, who could never afford to buy a house again, rented a place downtown with me and my two younger sisters, Shuzhi and Shuci.

On weekends and holidays we went to visit my grandparents in their garden home next to the ruins of the earthen city wall, not far from the house we had sold. The local people called my grandparents' garden the Kang family cemetery because Grandfather's mother was buried under a stone stupa\fn{A Buddhist monument} there. She had been a devout Buddhist all her life, and Grandfather had taken her on a pilgrimage around the mountain temples of South China in the early 1920s, while he was living in Shanghai. Unfortunately, she passed away on the journey. He shipped her coffin back home to Xi'an and buried her by the city wall near our house.

His love for her ran especially deep because his father had died long before, and she had raised him and paid for his education single-handedly. At the time of her death he was a leader in local industry, but after her funeral he suddenly decided to set aside all his worldly affairs. After building a two-acre garden around her grave, he moved there to devote himself to the study of Buddhism. Inspired by the Buddhist term "perfect silence," used for the deaths of monks and nuns, he named it Silent Garden.

As far back as I can remember, Grandfather practiced Buddhism in this garden. He hired a craftsman to engrave plates for printing the scriptures,\fn{A meritorious act in Buddhism} built a guesthouse for visiting Buddhist priests, and organized Buddhist study groups. But he spent most of his time there alone, and family members rarely went to see him. Grandmother and his children and grandchildren lived in their own houses and went about their own business, visiting him only on holidays.

Inside the main gate of Silent Garden there was a round doorway framed by a couplet on a pair of hanging wooden tablets, which I liked to bang against the wall to scare the lizards into the cracks. Beyond the doorway there was a narrow mossy path through a bamboo grove, blocked by an old trellis of wisteria that had wrapped itself like a boa around a nearby tree. To the left of the trellis there was an artificial mountain and a goldfish pond, and to the right there were some tile-roofed buildings, in front of which a brick path led to the staircase into the main house. Once I passed the brick-floored entryway, I would lift the door curtain and enter Grandfather's inner sanctum, which always smelled of incense. I could usually find him meditating in lotus position, with his flowing white beard and blissful, kindly face, silently.counting his mala beads.\fn{A reference to the Buddhist rosary}

Father and my uncles always seemed a bit ill at ease in Grandfather's presence. They would hover at the edge of the room and wait for him to tell them to sit down, and then they would sit far away from him, speaking in hushed tones. They were not Buddhists, and I suspected that they were afraid to let Grandfather get a whiff of the meat, tobacco, and alcohol on their breaths since he strictly eschewed these substances. We grandchildren had no such fears of him, however. When I was little, I loved to march right up to him and stroke his beard. If Mother scolded me for it, he would always chuckle.

"It's all right; he and I are as close as brothers."

Then he would loudly intone the name of Amitabha Buddha,\fn{A deity associated with the Pure Land sect of Mahayana Buddhism, said to rule over the Western Paradise} which he had a habit of interjecting into his speech all the time, sometimes in praise, sometimes in regret or even in warning.

I have read Grandfather's autobiography, which he wrote when he was fifty-eight, and listened to parts of his life story. His turbulent era catapulted him to officialdom from humble rural origins. Before he turned to Buddhism, his politics were fairly radical. While still a young student at his home in Lintong\fn{In rural Shaanxi Province} during the Qing Dynasty,\fn{Also known as the Manchu Dynasty (1644-1911)} he launched a campaign against foot-binding: He founded an anti-foot-binding association, distributed a song titled Unbind Your Feet, and let his eldest daughter's feet grow to their natural full size.

After he had passed the county-level imperial examinations. for the selection of government officials, the Qing government abolished the examination system, and he enrolled at Capital University\fn{Later Peking University} as a student of politics and economics. There he joined Sun Yat-sen's revolutionary party, the Tongmenghui. During the Revolution of 1911, when the Qing dynasty was overthrown, he quit school and returned to Shaanxi, where he got an important post in the newly established provisional military government. That was when he bought our grand family house in Xi'an and the large tract of land that later became his garden.

But when Yuan Shikai, the first provisional president of the new republic, tried to declare himself emperor in 1915, his regime lost support, and many important officials, including Grandfather, were listed as wanted men. He hid out in the French Concession of Shanghai for years, writing articles and publishing a newspaper promoting industry as China's salvation. He was a leftist who worked with Chen Duxiu, one of the cofounders of the Chinese Communist Party, and even published a pamphlet in support of the Bolshevik Revolution. But after he moved into his Silent Garden in the early 1920s, he abandoned politics and public office, relying on his real estate as his sole source of income. He became a prominent local Buddhist, who led local charities, relief work, and education and collected donations to repair dilapidated Buddhist temples.

*

During the Land Reform campaign for the redistribution of rural property soon after the Communist takeover, the local authorities planned to attack him and confiscate his garden. Fortunately, the Living Buddha of Qinghai, a high-ranking Tibetan lama who was prominent in the Northwestern Military Government, shielded him with a special order, sparing him the brunt of the attack. Although his rural property was seized, he was allowed to keep the garden where he lived.

But deprived of his rental income, he had to sell his garden bit by bit just to pay his living expenses. First he sold the piece from the front gate to the wisteria trellis. Next it was a tract near the back gate, surrounding the shed he used for printing the scriptures. On one visit I discovered that the two ends of the garden had I been cut off by newly built walls, leaving only the essential central portion.

Grandmother had moved in with him when they sold their house following Liberation, and now she had to follow Grandfather's strict vegetarian diet. In addition, she had to do all the housework herself since they could no longer afford servants. Kitchen chores roughened her pampered hands, which had been accustomed only to playing mah-jongg or holding a water pipe. In the winter her hands cracked from doing the dishes and the laundry, and she covered them with adhesive bandages.

But Grandfather's fortunes improved after a few years. On one of my visits when I was in second or third grade, I noticed that the house had been spruced up in preparation for an important guest. The walls had been whitewashed, and Grandfather had hired a cook to make a vegetarian feast. Later I learned that the guest was an old friend of his, who had become a high-ranking cadre in Peking and was visiting Xi'an for a meeting. Soon afterward Grandfather was appointed the Buddhist representative on the Municipal Political Consultative Committee, a "united front" organization that included non-Communist Party members.

Now that he had a job he replaced the long Chinese gowns and man- darin jackets he had worn around the house with gray or blue Sun Yat-sen suits.\fn{Later called Mao suits} He started to attend meetings and to discuss Communist Party documents with his religious group. He brought home packs of documents and Marxist-Leninist materials to study in addition to his Buddhist texts. The word "study" had taken on a new meaning for him; now it meant changing his old ways and adopting new ones. This was accomplished through meetings, discussions, and poring over documents. It was his job as a committee member to rubber-stamp party policies, to spread propaganda, and to teach people the official lingo. In the political context of the times, to say that an old man from the old society was "studying diligently" meant that he supported the Party and the government. Grandfather and the other committee members may have felt constrained by their assignments, but men like him who had worked for the Nationalists must have been glad to serve nonetheless. It afforded them some prestige and was far better than being blacklisted or attacked.

He even got paid for studying. At the end of each month the committee sent someone over with more than a hundred yuan. They called it a transportation and living subsidy rather than a salary and considered it government support for members of the united front like Grandfather. Since most people earned less than forty or fifty yuan a month in those days, this was very generous treatment indeed. And now that Grandfather had been deprived of his land, this money seemed like manna from heaven.

In the early 1950s landlords all over China were persecuted mercilessly by the poor and lower-middle peasants. When my maternal grandfather and grandmother returned to his hometown in Chang'an County to take care of his aging parents, they were labeled landlords and suffered unspeakable torment at the hands of the villagers. And I shall never forget the anti-landlord struggle session I witnessed on one of my visits to Nanny's parents' village.

As soon as we got there, we saw a wrathful mob in front of the school, surrounding a tall, ruddy-faced, mean-looking landlord, whom they called a local tyrant. The villagers had stood two bricks on their sides on the brick pavement, and militiamen wielding red-tasseled spears were forcing him to balance on one foot on the edge of one of the bricks. As soon as he got a trembling foothold, a militiaman would kick the brick out from under him, and he would fall with a heavy thud onto the mossy pavement. The insatiable villagers subjected him to this process repeatedly, while they recited their angry tales of his oppression. His face turned black and blue, and dark red blood streamed from his temples.

Nobody knows how many rural property owners died in the unbridled mob violence of this period. Many of them were much less prosperous than Grandfather. It was only because he had an urban registration card and was chosen to be the Buddhist representative on the committee that he was able to avoid attack, keep his garden, and enjoy a position of respect. If he had still been registered as a resident of Lintong rather than of Xi'an, or if he had not been such a prominent Buddhist, he would have been crushed by the peasants. Thanks to the Buddha and the Bodhisattva Guanyin,\fn{The Goddess of Mercy, an assistant of Amitabha Buddha} the fragrance of his Indian sandalwood incense fillred his chamber again, and his spare rooms were cleared of tenants and restocked with Buddhist scriptures. Once again he could afford to hire servants to help Grandmother, and gardeners to restore the overgrown garden. Father, using his connections at work, installed running water for him, and he often let me help him plant vegetables and water the flowers. For the time being, Grandfather's ruined garden was back in bloom.

2

In the Fall of 1958 my parents sent me to live with my grandparents and attend Number Two Middle School, which was near Silent Garden and adjacent to the site of our former family house. I still have childhood memories from the yard of that house. Whenever the middle school students sang the national anthem and raised their flag on the playground next door, I used to run to our magnolia tree to hoist the tiny flag that Nanny had made for me. Later, when Grandfather had to sell the house shortly after the Communist takeover, the school converted it into ex:tra classrooms, dormitories, and offices.

In 1958, the year of the Great Leap Forward, the nation became caught up in a frenzy of smelting “backyard steel. It was our “glorious mission” to donate scrap iron to this cause, so our school playground, like most other work units, was heaped with it, along with piles of burned charcoal. Some enthusiasts had tossed in their pots and pans or drawer handles for good measure, even if they were made of copper or tin. The student cafeteria had been temporarily converted into a foundry, equipped with a mighty blower that shook the classrooms with its roar and filled the air with a sooty purplish haze.

Nobody seemed to have time for mundane pursuits like eating and sleeping. The upperclassmen manned the furnaces around the clock with holiday spirit, belting out all their new songs and cheering for the molten “steel” as it poured out of the furnaces. Once it congealed into hard black slag, we deemed it a success and swathed it in bright red silk. Then, banging on drums and gongs and carrying big red paper placards that read SURPASS ENGLAND AND CATCH UP TO AMERICA, we marched it triumphantly over to the district Party committee. Classes were canceled more often than not, and even we younger students had to help out at the foundry. When this happened, I began to resent school activities.

My parents had sent me to live with my grandparents because they were too busy with their jobs to take care of me and because they wanted to isolate me from the neighborhood children, whom they regarded as riffraff. Most adults had to work all day and attend mandatory political study sessions and meetings at night, and lacked the time to supervise their children after school. Moreover, few parents could afford to buy their children any toys, musical instruments, or sports gear. So once we had gotten our homework over with, we ran wild in the streets, climbing trees and walls, wrestling and sparring, and even recklessly scaling the city walls.

The city walls of Xi’an were grand and well preserved. The side that faced outward was surfaced with huge bricks, culminating in neat crenellations that loomed impregnably over the city moat, as in ancient times. On the side that faced inward, however, the rammed earth was exposed and weather-beaten. In order to prevent further erosion of the walls, huge brick downspouts had been installed at twenty- or thirty-yard intervals. Slanting along the imposing walls from top to bottom, the spouts protruded like giant skinny ladders. By the late I950s the municipal government had declared the walls obsolete and closed all the stairways to the top. The only way to get there was to shimmy painstakingly up the narrow spouts, choosing your finger- and toe-holds with the utmost of care and never glancing down lest you plummet to the ground below. The climb was nerve-racking and exhausting, and by the time we reached the top all of us were completely worn out. I otten returned home from these wild exploits smeared with dirt from head to toe or with torn clothes and bleeding arms and legs.

When I was not indulging in these death-defying pursuits, I loved to read classic swashbuckling fiction. Once I had gotten my first taste of this genre, with Father’s copy of The Water Margin,\fn{About a band of Robin Hood-type rebels of the Song period} I was hooked and proceeded to devour Journey to the West, Roster oj the Gods, Romance oj the Three Kingdoms, and Stories oj the Tang. At first I had my parents borrow books for me from their libraries at work; then I borrowed some more from our neighbors. Eventually I started going to bookstalls to rent martial arts tales that I could not fmd elsewhere.

Everything about these stories was fascinating to me, from the terminology for the “eighteen ancient weapons” to the nicknames of all the heroes and swordsmen and the descriptions of the immortals’ steeds and magic arts. I recited the battle stories to my playmates, adding gestures and reveling in the formulaic storytellers’ language and the marvelous vocabulary I had absorbed from the books. Sometimes I inserted myself and my friends into the stories, imagining myself a martial arts master who was leading the others on a heroic mission. Somewhere far from the city, I dreamed, we would encounter the wonders of ancient times.

When I was thirteen, some of my roughneck friends and I started to save our money for a trip to climb Mount Zhongnan,\fn{Located in the Zhongnan Mountains, a section of the Qinling mountain range, approximately twenty miles south of Xi’an} one of the sacred peaks of China, over summer vacation. Sitting in an abandoned pillbox on the city wall, we planned our expedition and established an explorers’ club with me as president. Our first escapade took place when we sneaked out of the mass parades on the May I Labor Day and went outside town, where we climbed the walls of a sanitarium for the party elite and got caught by the guards. They called our school, and we were suspended for a day of “introspection.”

Then we had a wall-climbing accident. One boy in our group slipped to the ground from a downspout, broke his leg, and had to spend several months wearing a cast in bed at home. This got us into deep trouble. Several sets of parents complained to the school that their offspring were being led astray by rabble-rousers. They exposed our plan to climb Mount Zhongnan and named me the ringleader of our group. Claiming that our establishment of the explorers’ club without official sanction was a major violation of the rules, the school political director issued a stern warning to our parents.

Father overreacted a bit, especially to the explorers' club, and he admonished me against winding up as a delinquent. Today it was wrestling and climbing walls, he and Mother chided me, but tomorrow I could find myself playing hooky, prowling the streets, and becoming a hooligan. He heartily disapproved of the neighborhood children, who knew they had to scurry out of our house as soon as they heard him coming through the main gate with his bike. That was why he decided to "exile" me to Silent Garden.

*

My grandparents put me in a room on the west side of the house that they had used as a guest room for visiting monks. It had whitewashed walls, a hardwood floor, and clumsy, old-fashioned furnishings. Tangled wisteria grew on the eaves outside the room, which faced a dense grove of cypress trees. At night the tiny metal bells on the corners of my great-grandmother's tombstone stupa tinkled in the wind, while mice scampered noisily on the floor. I was afraid of the dark, so Grandmother lit a stick of incense by my bed as a night-light and told me to gaze at it while I prayed to the Bodhisattva Guanyin. Grandmother's Bodhisattva Guanyin seemed much more approachable and down-to-earth than Grandfather's Amitabha, who had to do with the future and lived in the faraway Western Paradise, so I began praying to her regularly.

Later I found a rusty old sword in a junk pile upstairs, and I spent a few days sharpening and polishing it, along with its sharkskin scabbard, to a gleam. I hung the sword at the head of my bed for reassurance until I had gotten used to being alone in the cavernous room. This find aroused my interest in ransacking the dusty piles of stuff upstairs and downstairs. I was looking for novels to read, but Grandfather did not have any. Instead, I found ancient, unfamiliar classics, such as the Confucian canon collected in The Four Books and The Five Classics, the works of the Daoist philosophers Laozi and Zhuangzi, and numerous other compilations of classical philosophy, poetry, and essays. All were antique, large-type woodblock-printed editions, bound in silk thread and written in Classical Chinese, without modern punctuation.

I became fascinated with these musty old books, especially on rainy days when the high humidity kept their dust under control. Sitting on the brick floor in the hall with a stack of them, I wiped them off and pored over them to my heart's content. I read at random, devouring everything I got my hands on. I remember a fantasy novel Grandfather had written, describing a vision of a Buddhist revival, titled Half a Joss Stick of Reveries, as well as poetry by the "Eight-Fingered Mendicant," a Buddhist monk who burned off two of his fingers in an avowal of faith. I also enjoyed more Confucian classics in an oversize edition of The Annotated Thirteen Classics and A Shaanxi Miscellany, a compendium of two thousand years' worth of local literature and history.

I discovered documents pressed between the pages of these volumes, such as a letter to Grandfather about Buddhism from the Kuomintang leader Dai Jitao and an old newspaper clipping describing a visit to Xi'an by Grandfather's guru, the renowned Buddhist evangelist known as the Master of the Void. Through all this browsing and sorting, my reading skills in Classical Chinese improved as if by osmosis, and by the time I dusted off the entire library, I had plowed through—with varying degrees of understanding—most of the ancient classics.

Those were the most idyllic days of my life. Every day, once my homework was done, I turned to my reading program. I was full of youthful intellectual curiosity and drive and still open-minded and impressionable. Although I often understood my reading only dimly, I found it stimulating and memorable. Later I was deprived of the chance to study for years on end. Even today, more than forty years later, I believe that the reading I did long ago at Silent Garden was the foundation of my intellectual identity and that I have benefited from it all my life. Youth is a golden opportunity to read widely, and people who are denied that opportunity may never get around to making up for it later.

After a while I started to design my own ambitious survey courses in literature and philosophy. When Grandfather's library could no longer satisfy me, I began to frequent bookstores, buying the books I needed with the pocket money my grandparents gave me. Grandmother often let me keep the change when she sent me on errands, and Grandfather liked to reward me with money for good behavior. He was always delighted when I memorized a sacred text, like the Heart Sutra, or performed a random act of kindness, such as the time I donated my New Year's money to help a poor classmate pay his tuition. Grandfather rewarded me for my donation with more money than I had given to my classmate. Thanks to their generosity, I usually had enough money for books.

I loved to go to the only secondhand bookstore downtown, where I spent all my savings buying the classics on my reading list. Some of them were for immediate consumption, but I was also avidly building a collection, just as I had accumulated such things as stamps and cigarette-cases in my young childhood. My appetite for books was insatiable, and regular bookstore forays became my favorite leisure activity.

Then I discovered that the bookstore also purchased used books, and it dawned on me that I could sell some of Grandfather's useless books on the sly and use the cash to buy the books I needed. I would just be trading one old book for another, I rationalized, and actually renovating the book collection, so nobody could really accuse me of siphoning off family property to line my own pockets.

Eventually I managed to quiet my misgivings and try this scheme. Whenever I was short on money, I would choose some of Grandfather's books that I considered worthless, like popular Buddhist reading material and collected works by local authors, and exchange them at the bookstore for the books I wanted. The first time I did this I was conscience-stricken, fearig that Grandfather would suddenly decide to look up something in one of the books I had sold, discover that it was missing, and identify me as the culprit. But it never happened. Actually, except for some rare editions of the Buddhist scriptures and a few big sets of books that Grandfather kept at hand, he did not really know exactly what was on his shelves. I was the only person who was interested in the dusty old tomes, and it had not occurred to anyone that they could be exchanged for money.

Over the course of a few years I replaced all the expendable books in Grandfather's library with a basic Chinese humanities curriculum, including all the major texts of classical Confucianism, history, philosophy, and belles-lettres. The library at Silent Garden had been fully remade in secret.

My independent study plan consumed all my attention in my teen years. I did not even want to go to school in the mornings, not because I wanted to loaf around the house but because I vastly preferred my own curriculum. School-sponsored activities, both inside and outside the classroom, were becoming increasingly politicized. The highly regimented educational system allowed us very little in the way of course selection, and my teacher's strict enforcement of discipline seemed more appropriate to a correctional institution. I wished that school would provide an environment truly conducive to learning, with more interesting classes. Most of all, I wished that we students would be permitted to relate to one another freely, without being subjected to constant surveillance. In order to prevent my schoolwork from encroaching on my personal study program, I tried to finish all my homework while I was still at school and was satisfied with grades that were average or slightly above.

Grandfather had a friend named Mr. Wang, who often stopped by Silent Garden to borrow books. Knowing that he was an excellent calligrapher, I asked him to make me a copy of a poem that I loved titled "The Year-Round Joy of Reading," written in the heptasyllabic ancient style by the thirteenth-century poet Weng Yipiao. I hung Mr. Wang's artwork on my wall and recited the poem every morning and evening. Grandfather, whose political antennae were more sensitive than mine, was alarmed by my behavior and criticized the message of the poem.

The new government had deliberately gathered a group of Consultative Committee members from all walks of life, Grandfather included, and indoctrinated them until they learned to practice self-censorship and echo the Party line. Even though I was young enough to have grown up under the red flag, he was more in tune with the latest political trends than I was. He often told me that I would have been considered an excellent student in the old society. But his praise of my studiousness was tinged with worry that my reading program, which kept drifting farther and farther from the prescribed school curriculum, might accentuate my nonconformist leanings. This was soon after the Antirightist campaign, during which our family was spared direct persecution. Still, Grandfather's constant circumspection made me aware of the insidious political pressure all around me. Even one's choice of pnvate reading material had become a barometer of one's political stance.

Grandfather had begun to sprinkle his speech with newly learned Marxist jargon. For example, since Buddhist doctrine held that the world was created by a chain of cause and effect rather than by an external force, Grandfather seized upon this as proof that Buddhism was "not superstitious" and that it was "compatible with materialism." Unlike other religions, he maintained, Buddhism was basically atheistic.

In 1959, the tenth anniversary of the People's Republic of China, Grandfather toured the Yangzi River Bridge at Wuhan and the construction site of the Sanmen Xia Reservoir with the Consultative Committee. When he came back, he spoke glowingly at committee meetings of what he had seen and even wrote some laudatory poetry. For this he was deemed a truly "red" old person, a glorious appellation in those days. Socialism seemed off to a good start in China, and Grandfather, like many other people, had fallen for Communist propaganda. The promise of the new society, embodied by the major engineering projects he had witnessed on his tour, aroused his sincere patriotic fervor.\fn{Later on, the dam behind which the reservoir was formed was found to contribute to alternating droughts and floods, and it was eventually torn down}

Those were the heady days of revolutionary romanticism, and the walls along the alley in front of our school were blazoned with murals and poems exaggerating industrial and agricultural production. There were pictures of cornstalks tall enough to scrape the clouds, mountains of cot-ton, elephantine pigs, and hens that laid ostrich-size eggs, as well as bold exhortations from Chairman Mao to "conquer heaven and earth." The city authorities had even deemed it a kind of “production mission” to compose doggerel extolling new achievements, and anyone who penned a few usable lines was hailed as a “poet” overnight.

The walls of Silent Garden created a sanctuary for me from the world outside. I ransacked the house for the accoutrements of an elegant scholarly study and used them to decorate my room. I had an inkstone, a brush washer made of shell, a jade paperweight, a bronze incense censer, calligraphy and paintings, and porcelain vases, with my wall hanging of the poem “The Year-Round Joy of Reading” as the finishing touch.

But Grandfather, determined to bring me back to earth, wrote a takeoff on this poem tided “The Year-Round Joy of Work and Study” and hung it on my wall. The latest Party call was for intellectuals to be both “red and expert.” If intellectuals devoted themselves single-mindedly to their professions and book learning, at the expense of political study and manual labor, they were denounced as “white experts.” Grandfather’s poem, which emphasized that work was as important as study, was a response to this Party directive.

But I ignored his admonitions, and his poem hung on my wall in vain. In my opinion, its political slogans were just eyesores.

My love of literature was habit-forming, and the more comfortable I was with it, the more I craved it, regardless of the consequences. I had tried my hand at more practical activities, such as playing musical instruments, assembling crystal-receiver sets, building model airplanes, and all kinds of athletic endeavors, trying to demonstrate that I could do these things too. But I was clumsy, so I had given up and retreated into my piles of books.

Tasks such as drawing circles or triangles seemed like a nuisance to me, because they demanded the accurate use of a pencil, compass, and ruler. The simple act of choosing my words in writing, however, satisfied me emotionally and intellectually, while requiring only reason and imagination. For me, curling up with a book was the ultimate in relaxation.

Father had achieved his goal; I had lost interest forever in the neighborhood children. I was so deeply immersed in my books that I was loath to tear myself away long enough to go visit my parents on weekends. I resisted anything that interfered with my daily study time.

*

This attitude set me at loggerheads with my school.

In those days a “bad student” was one who cut school, brawled, insulted the teachers, and got bad grades. I was not one of them, since I earned decent grades and followed the rules, but I was still never considered a “well-behaved” student. In the politicized language of post-I949 China, the word “behavior,” like many others, had added connotations beyond its dictionary definition.

“Behaving” meant putting on a deliberate show of allegiance to the authorities. When the teachers and school leadership evaluated your “behaviorm” they were referring to your politics, and you had to play the game right if you wanted a rating of “well behaved.” Behavior ratings were as important as tests and grades since they affected one’s class rank, admission to select groups, and future prospects in general. Elementary school students needed good behavior ratings to join the Young Pioneers; middle school students needed them for entrance into the Communist Youth League; and adults needed them too, for Party admission.

Good behavior seemed to come naturally to some students, but making a favorable impression on the teachers was not easy for those of us who were not inclined to show off. For example, cleaning up the classroom was a daily chore that we rotated among us. But in that era there was more to the matter than simply maintaining a clean study environment. We actually had cleaning competitions, in which each class competed with all the others in front of the inspection team. So all the students whose turn it was to clean were dragged into the battle, and all vied to demonstrate their good behavior. Compared with the others, I was aimless, clumsy, and anti-social, and the faculty found my recalcitrance irritating.

A corollary of the Red and Expert campaign of 1959 was the Work-Study campaign, which introduced manual labor into the nationwide school curriculum. We middle school students had to take part in several hours a week of productive labor classes, supervised by the head of our school’s maintenance and housekeeping department. At the height of the campaign we would be sent to a nearby commune to help with the turnip harvest or to do odd jobs at a small neighborhood factory. If our supervisors could not find any place that needed our help, they assigned us chores on campus that should have been taken care of by the professional maintenance and housekeeping staf£

At home I always helped Grandfather in the garden. In the spring I plowed the ground and planted vegetables, in the summer I carried buckets of water for the flowers, and in the fall I dug up the medicinal knotweed tubers that grew near the wall. I also helped Grandmother gather half-opened honeysuckle blossoms and ripe fruit from the trees. I liked this type of manual labor because it had a clear purpose, and I did it of my own volition.

But the manual labor at school was just busywork, designed for the sole purpose of training us to follow orders with feigned enthusiasm. The more the other students showed oft the more I balked, and the time passed with agonizing slowness. I started to dawdle on the job and even to sneak away on my own. My teacher and the cadres filled my record with black marks for these unexcused early departures and absences. Although I was too young to understand politics fully, I was already beginning to develop a dubious political reputation. …

3

One day in the spring of 1960 Grandmother sent me to buy matches and soap, but all the shops in our neighborhood were sold out. This was a harbinger of a series of shortages, a new experience for me. Next, the street vendors disappeared, and all the restaurants, whether state-operated or partly privatized, ran out of food. During that unusually frigid winter Grandfather was the only one who had a coal-burning stove in his room, and my wing of the house was so cold that my toes froze through my cotton-padded shoes while I was studying at night.

My politics teacher told us that serious natural disasters had brought "hard times" on our country.\fn{ The Great Leap Forward was followed by a deadly three-year famine, which the Communist Party blamed on severe bad weather, although it was mostly created by the misguided agricultural policies of the Great Leap itself. While no exact figures are available, there is a general consensus that this famine led to at least twenty million deaths, most of them in rural areas} "Hard times" was the buzzword of the day. Food was rationed, and general belt-tightening began. City dwellers were confronted with the unprecedented prospect of hunger, although it was actually more psychological than physical. All urban households were still guaranteed adequate, if minimal, monthly rations, and no one's cupboard was ever completely bare. The people who were really threatened with starvation were the peasants, who, after all, produced the food for the cities. With no guarantees or periodic government distributions to fall back upon, their only option was to flee certain death in the countryside and roam the city streets as beggars.

In a charitable spirit, Grandfather hired one of these refugees, a man from Henan named Mr. Su, to cultivate our vegetable patch and do odd jobs around Silent Garden. Before Grandfather gave him work, he had been alternating between begging and hiring himself out occasionally in the marketplace, but with the money he earned at our house he could fill up on steamed cornbread every day and could even save enough to buy a few ration tickets to send home to his family.

Mr. Su was a taciturn, hardworking man, who told us only the bare minimum about the conditions back where he had come from. He said that there had been an excessively zealous campaign to make everyone eat in mess halls and plant high-yield crops and that the cadres had over-reported production, eradicating the savings of all the commune members.\fn{Because the State's tithe was based on the cadres' reports of production} His whole village had run out of grain, and people had begun to drop like flies, so he had fled while he could.

I was appalled by his story. Our teacher had told us that the Great Leap Forward had been a big success and had blamed the current grain shortages completely on the "natural disasters" and the Soviet Union's extraction of full repayment of China's old debts. Now I was faced with substantial evidence that he was not telling the whole truth, and I began to agree with the critics of the Three Red Banners\fn{I.e., the General Line for Socialist Construction; the Great Leap Forward; and the People's Communes} policy. No one ever discussed these matters with me, and even Grandfather had no ready answers for my questions. Confused, I recorded Mr. Su's troubles in my diary and wrote a poem depicting him as a trusty, exploited ox that shrank to a mere heap of skin and bones and eventually dropped dead of starvation while tilling a field.

As the food shortages worsened, even cornbread was rationed, and life became tougher for migrant workers like Mr. Su, who was not entitled to an allotment of ration tickets. In the winter malnutrition was rampant. The first symptom was edema, which you could check for by pressing on your forehead or inner calf with your finger each morning to see whether an indentation remained. This finger test became a widespread form of greeting. At first edema sufferers could get doctors' notes to tap into special reserves of soybeans and sugar, but eventually the demand outgrew the supply.

Then the Party had to call for "combining work and leisure," one of the strange new expressions coined to keep up with the bizarre new developments. This was a policy of reducing people's workloads and proclaiming it everyone's political obligation to minimize calorie expenditure. Since the schools slowed down too, I had much more time to study on my own and write in my diary.

*

My diary dates back to an evening, during my fifth-grade summer vacation, when I was studying in Father's office as he sipped liquor in a chair opposite mine. On a drunken whim, he staggered over to his desk drawer and pulled out a thick new blank book with a hard blue cover, glossy paper, and color illustrations. Laying it before me in the lamplight, he suggested that I begin keeping a regular diary. This practice, he assured me, would develop both my writing skills and my self-discipline. Eagerly, I flipped the book open to the first page and got started right away.

Father had not told me how to go about keeping a diary, but I was no stranger to the idea. Grandfather had been doing it for decades and had a hundred slender volumes, each labeled according to the year, stacked in the bookcase by his bed. Like old-fashioned account ledgers, they contained running records of mundane affairs, such as the places he went and the people he met or visitors who stopped by and what they said. He also kept track of correspondence with other Buddhists, Party lectures and meetings, daily expenses, and seasonal changes in the weather, flora, and fauna. Jotting a few lines in his diary each night, like going upstairs every morning to pray to the Buddha or taking a constitutional around Great-grandmother's grave after every meal, had been Grandfather's habit for many years. His current diary usually lay open on the table for all to see.

But young people like me had a different notion of diaries. My cousin Shuren, who also kept one, maintained that they should be completely private and that it was as unethical to peek at other people's diaries as it was to open their personal letters. Her words impressed me so deeply that I always kept my diary carefully squirreled away.

I admired Grandfather's diaries for their sheer number rather than their content. Remembering Father's injunction to hone my writing skills, I polished my entries every day as if they were personal essays and made sure that my descriptions of events were detailed and comprehensive. I also included a reading journal, consisting of notes on my readings, passages that had caught my attention, and my reactions to books I had read. I lavished more care on my diary every night than I did on my homework, but I was nevertheless embarrassed by my bombastic prose. No doubt many novice writers would have shared my sentiment that one's scribblings should be kept as private as certain parts of one's anatomy. My diary was a burdensome secret, and I worried constantly that someone might discover its immature contents.

The austerity measures created social chaos, which was exhilarating for me. With parents to shield me from the food shortages, I was enjoying the quasi-vacation from school. The cities had been released from the stranglehold of politics, and long-banned merchandise of every description was available again. Free markets, like the one at the renowned Daoist Temple of the Eight Immortals, -were bustling. State-run restaurants and grocery stores were deserted, but movie theaters were packed at all hours of the day and night. Billboards announcing new movies were constantly appearing, and we had one foreign film festival after another, featuring the latest from the Soviet Union, Eastern Europe, and even the capitalist West.

That winter I saw huge numbers of foreign films, sometimes sitting through double and triple features. When the lights came on, however, and I got up from my seat and elbowed my way through the crowds, I realized that I was woozy with hunger. Trudging feebly along on the bleak wintry city streets, I was loath to jerk myself back to reality from the dreamworld of the movie screen. I was smitten with the glamour of Europe—cathedrals, palaces, aristocratic manors, high-society balls, prosperous modern cities, and exotic scenery—and couldn't help making invidious comparisons with my own drab surroundings. As soon as I got home, I poured my heart into my diary while my favorite scenes were still fresh in my mind and, too excited to sleep, often kept scribbling until late at night. As my diaries started to pile up, I eyed Grandfather's, aspiring to the day when my stacks would be as tall as, or taller than, his.

Worried about the secrets revealed in my growing stack of diaries, I put a lock on my drawer to protect them from Father and Grandfather, who often visited my room. Since the key was in a nearby unlocked drawer, my lock was actually just for show, but it nonetheless displeased Grandfather and Father. One Sunday, when Father was sneaking a few drinks in my room, he went snooping around, found my diaries, and read them. Infuriated by my private revelations, he gave me a severe tongue-lashing. Maybe he was just grouchy that day from the cheap sweet potato liquor he had been swilling all afternoon, or maybe his frustration with me had been mounting for a long time, and this was the final straw.

*

Father was an alcoholic, whose daily habit kept him constantly in debt. He was flush on payday, but he frittered away his entire monthly salary within the first week on fancy packaged brands of mao-tai and whiskey.

Mother redeemed armloads of empty bottles for a pittance whenever she heard the call of the recycling men outside our gate. After his initial splurge, all Father could afford was rotgut until his next paycheck arrived.

"I'm never rich for more than three days or broke for more than a month;" was his own wry comment.

He kept sending me out to buy liquor for him even when his money was gone, and I had to stand there and watch him rummage through his pockets for change. Sometimes he even scrounged some from our neighbor Mrs. Li. After he had managed to scrape together a fistful of coins for me, I marched out to the shops with his empty bottle, looking for a refill. If the cheap stuff that he needed was out of stock nearby, I had to keep looking farther and farther afield, and I did so grudgingly, especially since there was rarely a penny left over for me. I have no memories of Father's ever giving us children any spending money, and I was always too embarrassed to ask him for any, even if it was for tuition or school supplies. For that, I always went to Mother.

Father craved the burn of fiery spirits and didn't care for much in the way of food to go with them. He usually sat by himself at a bare table with his glass and bottle, drowning his sorrows in silence. Once in a while he bought a few scarce delicacies, such as peanuts or canned anchovies, and offered me or my sisters a nibble, but he preferred not to seek our company. Far from cheering him up, the liquor plunged him into an ill humor, and he often lost his temper. When his breath reeked of alcohol, I knew enough to stay out of his way. I cannot remember when all this began, but it started to make an impression on me as soon as I was old enough to go out to buy his liquor for him. Instead of eating dinner, he tended to nurse his drink until it killed his appetite. Eventually he made a show of toying with a few bites of food, just so he could say that he had eaten.

Father's wasteful habit was a serious bone of contention between my parents. Our family was considered well off in those days, since he was a highly paid senior engineer and Mother was a middle school teacher. People imagined that we lived extremely well. It was difficult for Mother to tell outsiders how hard up we were because they would not have believed it. When Father got his pay, he gave her a meager allowance for household expenses, reserving the rest to pay back his debts from the previous month and to keep himself supplied with liquor in the coming one. He even asked for her allowance back bit by bit when he had exhausted all his other avenues at the end of the month. Naturally, it infuriated her to see him sitting around the house guzzling liquor.

Mother would serve Father stoically at the beginning of one of his drinking binges, but she lost her patience when he kept postponing dinner. She would snap at him to finish up and try to snatch away his bottle, but he would clutch it tightly, insisting that he needed just one more drink. Eventually she would reheat the evening meal, grumbling under her breath. Then she would erupt at him, dragging out all her old grudges, reciting her grievances against his drinking buddies, and berating him for bringing poverty on the family.

At first Father would just sit and drink, letting her accusations roll off his back, as if he had heard everything before and could not be bothered to argue with her. Sometimes, especially if he was drunk, something she said would push him over the edge, and his face would suddenly darken. He would hurl his bottle to the floor, and the sound of its shattering would set him on a rampage. After recklessly smashing everything on the table, he would stagger out the door with his Bluebell brand bicycle to spend the night at the company dormitory.

The cathartic sound of china shattering on the floor snapped Mother out of her bad mood. Some females make a manipulative show of self- pitying tears at the end of a marital tif£ but not Mother. The climax of the fight had provided her with release, and she was ready to turn her full attention to cleaning up the debris. She was the victor for now, having interrupted Father's drinking session and caused him to smash his own bottle and shot glass, and she had recovered her domestic turf. Pleased to have driven him out, she would carefully sweep up the broken shards with her whisk broom and wash the remaining dishes. When all traces of the scuffle had beeh erased, she would place a couple of teacups, now minus their handles, back onto their tray, as if lining up the last remaining chessmen on a chessboard.

During my years at Silent Garden, Father often visited us on Sunday afternoons. When he was low on cash, he would mooch from Grandmother, who loved to indulge her sons and grandsons. Like a good fairy, she would send her cook out for liquor and some stewed pork wrapped in a lotus leaf and invite Father to enjoy these treats in my room. Once he was safely inside, she would close the door and the door curtain over it and then keep watch in the foyer, puffing on cigarettes and sipping tea. If Grandfather asked her where Father was, she would point at my closed door and whisper,

"He's sleeping in there."

Grandfather, who never doubted anything Grandmother said, would tiptoe away, clearing his throat and thankfully intoning prayers to the Buddha as he went. Father spent many a peaceful Sunday afternoon this way in Silent Garden.

But he flew into a drunken rage on the Sunday he discovered my diary. He had torn out the two pages that he found particularly objectionable and gave me a severe dressing-down for their contents. The first was the one describing Mr. Su's plight, with its poem comparing him to a trusty old ox. Father warned that I would be criticized for attacking the Three Red Banners if anyone ever found out I had written such a thing. The second was my critique of The Diary of Lei Feng,\fn{Lei Feng was an altrustic young soldier who died in an accident in 1962, leaving behind a famous diary that all Chinese were made to study when Mao proclaimed the Learn From Lei Feng campaign in 1963}in which I contrasted my diary with his. Mine was a private record, I said, kept solely for the pleasure inherent in the writing process and in reliving my memories in the future. I did not want anyone else to read my diary, I insisted, since it revealed too many of my scandalous secrets. The Diary of Lei Feng, on the other hand, seemed to have been written entirely for show, as if Lei Feng had already arranged for its posthumous publication while he was writing it. I thought it a shame that this young soldier had not written a single word about his love life. Had he ever had a romantic relationship? How could he omit it? That's what diaries were for!

Father was beside himself. He scolded me and ripped the offending pages into shreds, then tossed them into my face. In the heat of the moment I protested insolently that he had no right to look at my diary and that it was an illegal "invasion of privacy" to read other people's diaries and letters. This incensed him further, and he slapped me. I raised my arm in self-defense, but this was tantamount to pouring oil on a fire, and he went berserk. Accusing me of trying to strike him, he pulled out his bicycle pump and chased me all around Silent Garden with it, like a policeman brandishing his nightstick.

I darted into Grandfather's room, interrupting his meditation and begging for his protection, and in response he rushed out barefoot and whacked Father with his cloth shoe. Father strode away in a huff, muttering about packing me off to a strict boarding school. Grandfather later managed to convince him that it would not look good on my transcript if I switched high schools when I was almost ready to graduate.

Father and I were not on speaking terms for a long time, alth.ough we eventually managed to paper over our differences to some extent. I don't know whether he was sorry he had acted on his whim to give me the blank diary in the first place or if he remembered encouraging me to read traditional fiction when he had had a bit too much to drink. I had seen Father get starry-eyed under the influence of liquor, and it was a revelation to me that he could also see through the fog well enough to be a clearheaded, strict censor. From then on he seemed to regret having sent me to Silent Garden to live with my grandparents. His decision that it would be best to isolate me from the delinquent children on our block had backfired unexpectedly. He blamed Grandfather's influence for my habit of indiscriminate reading and writing and thought that I might not have turned out this way if he had not sent me to Silent Garden.

I knew that Father was wrong. Grandfather was such a devout Buddhist that he spent much more time on meditation and prayer than he did on scholarship and seldom read anything other than Buddhist scriptures. He had never been enthusiastic about my grandiose reading plan and in fact had often tried to discourage me from it. Whenever I asked him a random question about some ancient text, he would respond with a gentle put-down, such as "Mere factual knowledge cannot make you a sage." He also loved to repeat the old chestnut,

"Take action first, and use your leftover energy for book learning."

My love of reading and writing was my own natural inclination. Grandfather was not responsible for it, and Father's vehemence could not dissuade me from it. Something snapped in him on the day of that fight. He seemed to have decided that I was a hopelessly disobedient son and that he should get ready to wash his hands of me. He began this process with the dire prediction that I would have hell to ay in the future unless I eeded his and Mother's advice. …

21.40 Jingjing Is Born\fn{by Gu Ying (1945-)} Yunnan Province, China (F) 11

It was a snowy day in winter. Two men and a woman were sitting in a warm restaurant near the railway station. On the table before them were dishes of sliced ham sausage and smoked fish. There was also a small platter of dried fruits and tri-colored nuts, as well as a kettle of the strong erguodou, just heated in a pot. The men's collars were loosened and their faces flushed. The glass in front of the woman was empty. She did not drink, but merely nibbled at the apricot kernels in the platter.

The tall, thin man with a square forehead and a straight nose seemed to be the host. And the woman, clear-skinned and lively in her general demeanor, was evidently his wife.

The two of them kept plying the other man with food and wine. The guest looked travel-stained, with two bags behind his seat. More likely an old friend who had suddenly turned up.

"Take your time," said the woman. "The steamed dumplings will take at least half an hour to arrive. We have two hours and ten minutes. It's a shame you are so rushed. We can't even leave the railway station."

"What can I do? This is a business trip. But I see you two, that's something. Though I'll have to miss your precious Jingjing. She must be grown?"

"Thirteen already," the man answered proudly.

"No, four more days to her thirteenth birthday," the woman corrected him. Her face took on that expression peculiar to mothers when they talk about their children. "She's nearly as tall as I am. A big girl altogether. She has Lao Xu's nose and forehead, but her skin is like mine. And her temperament as well. With that combination, she is better than either of us. A couple of years ago, a teacher from the ballet school pestered me to allow her to learn dancing, but I resisted." The woman stopped, and then added earnestly:

"If I had a choice, I would rather Jingjing grow up to be an obstetrician."

"Obstetrician?" the guest asked. "Why?"

The couple exchanged glances and told the following story.

As expected, the woman begins the tale.

Lao Xu and I were married nine years, and we still didn't have a child. Injections, pills, medicine made from secret prescriptions—I'd tried everything. But no matter how hard I tried, I did not conceive. We finally decided to adopt a child. And just as we were about to take steps, I became pregnant. We were up in the clouds, as you can imagine. But there was one drawback. The timing was bad. I became pregnant in the middle of March in 1967. That meant my delivery would be in late December—a winter birth. But worse, Jingjing decided to enter the world on December 16. Later, I often wondered how Jingjing could have made such a bad choice. If I had the choice of my birthday, I would never have chosen that wretched day. You see, December 16 was the beginning of the great faction war in our city.

On the morning of December 15, Lao Xu was in a hurry to get to his plant. Zhang, our upstairs neighbor, and Wang, our downstairs neighbor, both masters at their craft, were staying home with their flowers and their goldfish. Why, I asked him, should you give a damn for the plant? But he had an important conference and had to attend, even if the skies were raining knives and daggers. But supposing I must go to the hospital today, I asked him. He laughed and said, "It's still ten days to the projected date. My precious baby would not play nasty tricks with its daddy."

Unfortunately, the precious baby had a mind of its own. Lao Xu was barely out the door before I started feeling ill. I thought: it's far too early, it can't be the baby coming. So I ate a bowl of noodles and took a little nap. When it grew dark, I felt bad again. Our neighbor old Mrs. Wei came over for a chat. She was immediately alarmed. "With all this faction war and commotion around us, how can you wait for Lao Xu? If he is not back by now, it means he has decided to stay through the night. That is their style, the rebels, as they call themselves. They strike at night. I'd say that you needn't wait for your husband. Anyway the municipal hospital is just at the corner of the alley. I'll take you there and we can call your husband afterward."

Old Mother Wei wrapped some food for me and helped me down the stairs. Our alley is straight as an arrow. We can see the main road where the alley intersects, people and bicycles and cars going back and forth, and the little shoe shop guarding the mouth of the alley.

It was a long time since I had been outdoors. Lao Xu would not let me go to the neighborhood dressmaking co-operative where I work, and he never mentions what's going on outside. So when I first stepped outdoors, I had a real shock. I was not prepared for the change. All the little stores were tightly shut and locked up. What's more, they were all plastered with big-character posters and slogans, right up to the chimney. And then to see the men and women rushing about, as if there was a fire. Others advanced in columns, carrying guns and clubs across their shoulders. They all looked so grim, as if out for blood. I had always been timid. I clutched Mother Wei's arms.

"Good heavens, what are they doing?" I asked.

"Out for a fight," Mother Wei said casually. Evidently she had encountered scenes like these.

"Who's fighting whom?"

"It's United Headquarters against the Battalion. The two sides had a go at it yesterday. The Battalion surrounded one of the fortifications of the United. The United sent reinforcements. See there! Look eastward! That's where it happened."

Old Mother Wei pointed to a building about ten stories high. The top of the building was swarming with people, like so many ants.

"What are they fighting for?"

"Heaven knows. They all call themselves the revolutionary rebels. All claim to be upholding this and defending that. All to the death, too."

I tried to calm my anxieties. Let them do their worst, the hospital was right at the corner from the alley. Nobody could stop me going to the hospital to have my baby.

Who would have thought that the minute we were out of the alley, we couldn't move. The crowd was so dense. Someone at the back shouted, "Give way, give way!" A stretcher borne by two young men surged forward from behind and nearly knocked me down. Then another stretcher. Followed by pushcarts. People were piled pell-mell on the carts with bandages around their heads. I trembled all over and just wanted to go home. Mother Wei clutched me tightly and steered through the crowd, pushing, cursing, begging her way through. Finally we made it to the door of the hospital. We were just about to step in when two figures with red armbands leveled a wooden pole across the door.

"What's your business?"

"Please, please make way, we must get into the hospital." Mother Wei pointed to me with great assuredness.

The two revolutionary rebels stood their ground.

"The hospital has an emergency revolutionary task. No patients whatever will be admitted."

They were so cocksure of themselves.

"There is nothing so urgent as a woman giving birth!"

Mother Wei had worked for the neighborhood committee. She was ready with words.

"Please, please make way for us. Babies are the future of the Revolution, you know!"

"Nothing doing. All the patients at this hospital have been sent back."

"We are going to the obstetrics unit. Do you hear me? Obstetrics!"

"Obstetrics no exception. All patients sent back. Those that have had their babies, and those that didn't get around to having them yet, all sent back."

"Oh, no, you must be joking. She is assigned to this hospital. She's always had her examinations here. Look, here are her records." And Mother Wei handed over my prenatal examination files. "She's thirty-three, and this is her first baby. Where can she go?"

"That's your own concern. Now move on. It's dangerous here. If you get hurt, you've yourselves to blame."

Mother Wei and I were paralyzed. I felt my head spinning. I couldn't think at all. Luckily Mother Wei regained her presence of mind and led me to Aunty Zhao, who runs the shoe store.

"Don't worry," Mother Wei said. "I'll ask Lao Xu to take you on his bike to Pingan Hospital. It's a specialized maternity hospital in a quiet area. They can't drive out all their patients. I'm going to phone Lao Xu right away."

So I sat in the shoe store and listened to the howling of the crowd outside. The sky was murky, as if it was going to snow. My tears dropped as I cursed Lao Xu in my heart.

"You son of a bitch, why don't you show up?"

Why the hell didn't he show up?

The man continues the narrative.

While Gui Zhi was sitting in that shoe store in an agony of waiting, I was at my plant, listening to our chief relaying orders from headquarters. Headquarters announced that very same night that the decisive battle between the two lines was launched and that every soldier of the United Headquarters had to be ready to fight and to fall for the glorious cause.

Many comrades formed ranks immediately and made ready for battle. I was a member of the Red Pen Brigade and our task was to print two thousand campaign leaflets and draw a large-scale poster. Everything had to be finished before dawn.

My job was to do the poster. I had already drawn up a sketch. It was a huge caricature of all the leaders of the Battalion faction. I pictured them as a convoluted mass of crawling creatures with human heads and reptile bodies. The next step was to pick out the outlines in white against a pitch-black background. When Mother Wei's call came through, I was just halfway through with the background. I put down my brush immediately and requested to leave.

The chief was disgusted.

"Perfect timing, isn't it? Don't you know that this is the crucial hour? A matter of life or death? We may all have to reinforce the front lines any minute. Go and be damned. There's no relying on the likes of you."

I felt as if I had swallowed a fly. I, Xu Guoliang, have always stuck to the revolutionary left. I had borne the whiplashes of the conservatives without a flinch. I never whispered a word of it to my wife, in case she might hold me back from fighting for the cause. Can anyone say that I am a coward? But my wife was going to give birth. What could I do? I put on my cotton-padded overcoat and made my way out. I hunched my back, keeping my head low as I got on my bike, looking furtively around, as if I were a deserter.

As I made my way back I felt more and more justified. Was it my fault? Here I was nine years married, and still childless. I was thirty-four, my wife thirty-three. Who would have thought that she was going to be pregnant at such an unprecedented moment in history? And who could have seen that she was going to give birth just at the moment of the decisive battle between the two lines? If we had had a child eight years earlier, my son would be in primary school right now, and a little revolutionary rebel, too, like his father!

The shoe store was easy to locate and I quickly put Gui Zhi on the backseat of my bike.

"Be careful," Mother Wei reminded me. "The streets are so unsafe. Don't worry about things back home. I'll put the chickens in the pot when she is ready to come back."

Pingan Hospital was about eight li away. Not far. All we had to do was to cross three streets and two alleys. But luck was against us that wretched night. We were barely out of the first alley before the snowflakes came floating down around us. The ground slipped under my feet and I could only move inch by inch. I was soaking in sweat.

Then, as soon as we emerged into the second street, we saw a huge black shape in the distance lumbering toward us. I was petrified. There were no street lamps, of course. In the darkness, the gigantic shape appeared to have tentacles shooting out of its forehead, like some mythological creature. How did such a thing ever get here, into our town center, in the middle of civilization? I watched it with dread as it approached. Finally, the rim of tires showing underneath gave away its secret and I saw through the mystery.

It was a homemade tank! A truck covered with plates of iron welded together, with a few holes drilled in front for firing, and there you have the basics of a tank. It crawled forward slowly and ponderously, like a giant snail, totally oblivious to my anxiety. At last, it moved out of sight.

I quickly steered my bike through the next alley and emerged into the last street. But bad luck stuck to me, it seemed. As we passed a building a few bricks fell out from the wall above and scraped the tip of my nose before they crashed to the ground in front of me. I looked up and saw gun barrels poking out of holes made in the wall. In the darkness, they cast a menacing, cold reflection on the snow beneath. I am as brave as the next man, but who likes to walk under the barrel of a gun? I took a look at Gui Zhi and hastened my step. By the light of a passing car, I could see that she was deadly pale and her eyes were full of fright.

"Don't mind it," I assured her. "We are getting there."

Gui Zhi began to groan. "It hurts," she cried. Her hands trembled as they grasped the seat of my bike.

Good heavens, suppose she delivers the baby now—in this cruel and deadly street!

I began to curse under my breath. I cursed the unlighted streets. The columns of people rushing about madly. The homemade tank. The holes in the wall. The gathering snow. They were all in my way. All working against me. Why won't they let us have our baby in peace? These reflections, of course, were not worthy of a leftist revolutionary rebel. They smacked of betrayal. But I couldn't help it. They keep cropping up in my head. After all, my wife was sitting at the back of my bike and going to deliver our baby!

I finally let out a sigh of relief. We were at Pingan Hospital.

The walls of the hospital were very high. All the buildings were hidden behind trees. Not a flicker of light anywhere. I began to panic. In the momentous hour of the decisive battle between the two factions, work units would be likely to close down and disperse its members. And even if the work units didn't close down, people were likely to stay home. Who would have the heart to work, anyway? If Pingan Hospital were really closed down, my poor wife would be left in the streets, in the snow! The blood rushed to my head, and I pounded the gates with my fists, shouting desperately.

"Open! Open!"

The sound of footsteps! Footsteps actually approaching! A woman's voice, shrill with impatience, came from the other side of the gate.

"What do you want?"

"My wife is going into labor! Please open! Quick! I beg you!"

The gates opened a crack. A hand stretched out.

"I must inspect the medical files."

I handed over my wife's booklet of medical records. It was shown on her records that she was assigned to the municipal hospital. I hoped that the person on the other side of the gate would not notice.

But that was exactly what she was checking on.

"This is not her assigned hospital. Go to the municipal hospital."

"That's where we come from! They have an emergency task, and the doors are closed to patients!"

"Then go and talk to whoever is responsible. What right do they have to saddle us with their patients?"

"Doctor, please …" Through the gap between the gates, I saw that she wore her front hair in a frill beneath her white cap. A typical trainee from the nursing school, I decided. I called her doctor, hoping that this promotion would put her in a good humor. "The streets are so unsafe, we had such a hard time getting here. Please stretch a point. Do us a favor, please."

"A favor! A favor! You all want a favor! But who's going to do us a favor? The two of us have been here over fifty hours! No heating! No hot water! No food! And no one to take over the shift! Nothing! Who cares if we die of fatigue! Let me tell you, it's no. You can shout yourself hoarse, but let me tell you, it's no!"

"Please, have some pity, doctor."

"And who's going to pity us?" She started to shut the gates.

"No, no. Don't, don't!" I edged my body between the gates.

"Doctor, can you stand by and watch her die?"

For a minute she stood irresolute. Perhaps my plea struck a chord. But when I tried to pry open the gates, her anger erupted.

"Hey! What, what are you doing?!"

"My wife must go in! She must!"

"She must. Is that it!"

"Yes, she must. That's it!"

I tried to force my way in. She was no match for me.

"Your grand-aunt has said no!" she screamed. "Go in if you dare!"

I threw caution to the winds and screamed back.

"We will! And right under your nose!"

Thus we started this shouting match, our voices getting higher, our tempers getting hotter. All this time, Gui Zhi stood by helplessly, drenched in her own tears. I don't know how this would have ended if a voice had not intervened.

"Let them in!"

It is strange, the effect of a soft voice in the middle of loud and angry shouting. I calmed down immediately. The voice was indeed unusual. Perhaps it was because the voice came from behind a gauze mask. It was not what you would call a sweet voice. But it was soothing. Like the rays of the sun in winter.

"You always let them in," the nurse complained. "There's six of them already who are not from our beat."

"They can't help it," the voice replied. "They have gone through a lot of suffering. Don't make it worse for them."

"And we, don't we suffer, too?" the nurse complained, though her anger had abated. "One after another, they all come here. As if we were the Temple of the Goddess of Birth."

"Come in," the voice behind the mask directed us. The door opened halfway.

"Thank you, doctor! Thank you, doctor!" I mumbled as I hustled Gui Zhi through the threshold, afraid that somehow the gates might close before we got through. Before they could change their minds, I dragged Gui Zhi toward the main building.

"Don't rush her like that," the voice behind me warned. "She's about to give birth. Support her properly. She is stiff with cold."

"Oh, thank you."

We stopped in front of the building, brushing off the snow from our clothes. Only then did we have a chance to see the person who had let us in.

She was a slightly plump woman of medium height, the kind of plumpness that bespeaks a heart condition. A white cap covered her head down to the forehead. The big gauze mask hid the lower half of her face. Only a pair of narrow eyes was visible between the edge of the cap and the top of the mask. Mind you, they were not what you would describe as beautifully chiseled shapes or of burning brightness. They were quite plain, but they were black and clear. Coupled with eyebrows that were lightly sketched in a straight line, they conveyed a sense of gentleness. One would imagine that the contours of her nose and mouth beneath the mask would also be soft. She was no longer young, judging from the little wrinkles creeping beneath her eyes and on her forehead. And her slightly puffed eyelids and bloodshot eyes certainly denoted fatigue.

She made me register in the lounge and then led Gui Zhi into a door on the right. I noticed that she dragged her left leg as she walked.

I finished registering and had time to look around. The little cubbyholes with REGISTRATION, PRESCRIPTIONS, and CASHIER printed on the glass panes were all shut. A door leading to the right carried many signs: DELIVERY ROOM, NURSERY, WAITING ROOM, NO ADMITTANCE. The door leading to the left carried the signs: WARDS, VISITING HOURS EVERY DAY 5:00-7:00 P.M. and SILENCE. The whole corridor was deserted. There was a hole in the door of the building, and the wind crept through, bringing flakes of snow.

After a little while Gui Zhi appeared. She had changed into the hospital's baggy striped pyjamas. She came over and stood close to me. I knew something was wrong, so I took her hand.

"Gui Zhi, do you need some food?"

She shook her head and sniffed.

"Is something the matter?"

"Doctor says that the water is out. And the position of the baby is not right …"

"But wasn't the position all right before?"

"The stupid municipal hospital! All the doctors are chased away and made to clean the latrines. That wretched girl who examined me got everything wrong. She took the baby's bottom for the head! I wanted to reassure her but didn't know what to say. Her eyes were swimming with tears.

"The doctor says that after the water is out, I mustn't walk about. I must go in." She looked at me piteously, like a hurt little lamb, with no one to protect her.

"Gui Zhi," I exclaimed after her, my voice quavering, "Courage! Don't panic! Take those cakes with you."

Suddenly a moan drifted through the freezing atmosphere. It was contagious. Immediately, more moans, some loud some soft, coming from behind the door on the right, seemed to fill the air.

We stood petrified. Gui Zhi's lips were white. She leaned against me as if she was going to fall.

"I'm scared, I'm scared," she cried.

The woman adds a word.

I was really scared to death. I daresay all women in labor for the first time must have the same feeling of dread, so hard to define. And on top of that, the pain. I could neither sleep nor eat for the pain. It was horrible. There were four of us in the waiting room and we were all moaning, sometimes singly, sometimes in chorus. We just couldn' bear up any longer. The room was so cold. Our towels were frozen into stiff icy sheets. The blankets and bed paddings felt cold and slimy to the touch. And the light bulbs in the room were all broken. Outside, through the windows, the snow on the ground was reflected in an unearthly bluish gleam. It seemed the whole place was haunted. How could we help moaning?

Our moanings finally managed to wake up the nurse, who was dozing at the table with her head on her arms. She got up to her feet and scolded us.

"Stop it! Have some control! Women bear children all the time, but I've never seen the likes of you! Just listen to this grunting! Do you all have pigs for your zodiac animal?"

She went out for a moment, then came back and said, "You three, your numbers are ten, eleven, and twelve. Your babies aren't due before midnight. Now you, number two"—she turned to a short young woman with freckles on her face—"follow me to the delivery room for observation!"

She banged the door behind her and left.

Number two followed meekly.

The man takes up the narrative.

I can hear the trio in the waiting room. Gui Zhi was the alto. The words she sang were "Oh, oh, oh …" What a tune it was! It made my hair stand on end. I am thirty-four years old, but I had never imagined that women giving birth had to go through such a hell.

"Go into the corridor, there are benches inside." The doctor was pushing a flatbed wheeler from the right door into the left. She added:

"It's warmer in there. There's no wind."

I suppose I must have been a sight, wretched with anxiety and shivering in the cold, because she smiled at me, a kindly smile.

"Don't be so tense, young fellow. Relax. I'll let you know when the time comes."

Behind the door on the right was a long corridor. The delivery room, the nursery, and the waiting room were all in there. Benches lined one wall along the corridor. I sat down on a bench.

Not far from me, on another bench, was a young fellow. He was wrapped in an army overcoat, very fashionable at the time, and was fast asleep and snoring.

I looked at my watch: 11:40.

I lay down, but I couldn’t sleep. Once I was just about to doze off when the sound of an infant’s yowl pulled me up. The wail came from the direction of the delivery room. The sleeping young fellow shot up as if he had been pricked by a needle. He glared at me.

“The baby has come?” he asked.

“Whose baby?”

“Mine! My wife is number two. Short and plump, with freckles on her face.”

“Someone like that was wheeled in a little while ago.”

“Oh, is that so?” He cocked his ears and listened.

Piercing cries of pain arose from the delivery room. Then the doctor’s voice: “Try to be quiet, you are taking too long. You mustn’t exhaust yourself. Give her the drip. Continue observation.”

“No, the baby has not come, after all.”

The young fellow held his head in his hands dejectedly. I looked at him. He looked like a bull. Low forehead, protruding eyes, short neck. All he needed was a pair of horns.

We sat next to each other on the bench, each lost in thought. From the sound of the cries, the newborn was being transferred to the nursery. Evidently its cries were catching, for very soon there was a chorus of infants’ cnes.

“Have a smoke.”

The young fellow tossed over a Battle brand cigarette. As he held his lighter I glanced at the red armband on his sleeve: Battalion of Mao TSE-TUng Thought! The Battalion! So this bull is from the detested Battalion! Suddenly I was consumed by faction loyalty and cursed under my breath:

“Wretched conservative.”

“Say that again!” He turned toward me menacingly. A livid scar under one eyebrow began twitching. His eyes shot out like a pair of bronze bell ringers. He was ready to pounce on me—just like a bull. Of course he had seen my armband, too.

It was absolutely ridiculous. The only explanation was that we were bewitched. There we were, two grown men, by pure accident passing the time in the same room, exchanging a word now and then. And suddenly we discovered we belong to different factions—warring factions, actually. And lo! We are gripped by the deadliest hate for each other, as if caught in a vendetta.

The bull and I eyed each other. The screech of loudspeakers far and near, with their mutual denunciations, seemed to egg us on. Just at that moment, however, his wife’s cries from the delivery room joined my wife’s cries from the waiting room.

“Oh! Oh! Oh!”

“Ah! Ah! Ah!”

Those cries brought us back to reality. Our militancy was completely deflated. The bull and I sighed in the same breath. We would not fight. But we did not have anything to say to each other, either. We just sat there—smoking, waiting, and miserable.

It was 4:55 in the morning. The door to the delivery room opened and a woman was wheeled out. The same flatbed wheeler. The woman’s hair was all disheveled; she looked utterly exhausted, but at peace. She had done her job.

Bull threw down his cigarette and stood in the middle of the corridor, blocking the way of the doctor who was pushing the flatbed wheeler.

“My wife has agonized for two days and two nights. Why can’t she deliver?" His voice was harsh and belligerent.

The doctor answered quietly under her mask. “Her contractions are very weak.”

“This won’t do! Two days and two nights running. This won’t do!”

The fellow stopped. Then, as if catching hold of an idea, he struck his arms akimbo.

“Mind you,” he spluttered, “me and my wife, we are workers, third-generation true-blue workers. You stuck-up city doctors, you better take care how you treat our proletarian offspring!”

The doctor’s eyes registered a bitter smile of helplessness. She tried to control her voice as she replied.

“The facilities here are very poor. But we do our best for all mothers and infants with no exception. Let us observe your wife for another two hours. If she still cannot deliver, we will use forceps.”

“Forceps?”

The young fellow lowered his head as he looked hard at the doctor. If he had horns growing over his forehead, he would have gored her with pleasure.

"If anything goes wrong, you must answer! We are true-blue workers."

A soft sigh was emitted from under the mask. The doctor closed her eyes without saying anything.

I pulled bull out of the doctor's path.

"She is so tired. Can't you be polite?" I said to him softly.

"Polite! The old hag is probably from an evil background."\fn{I.e., her family belonged to an exploitative class, one which made its living by exploiting the pesants and workers of China.}

"Why do you say that? Did you investigate?"

"Why bother? She's a doctor, isn't she? She's been to a university. Now you tell me: before the Liberation, could you attend a university and not be from an evil background?"

"You can't make sweeping statements like that. Besides, she's staying at her post to help your wife. You should be grateful to her."

"Grateful! Two days and two nights!"

"If you don't like her, why don't you take your wife someplace else?"

"Go stuff yourself!"

I did not respond because the doctor now emerged from the waiting room with Gui Zhi on the flatbed wheeler.

"The baby's coming?" My heart pounded wildly.

"Soon." The doctor's eyes twinkled at me kindly. Her smile penetrated me like a ray of sunshine. And from the bottom of my heart, the words sang out. Soon! Soon you'll be a father!

The screams coming out of the delivery room rang loud and clear. It was Gui Zhi's voice. It was unbearable. "Oh, oh, I'm dying!" she screamed.

The screaming was like a whip lashing at me as I walked up and down the corridor. Finally I couldn't bear it anymore and turned into the courtyard, leaving the bull in the corridor, smoking away.

Outside, snow covered everything—the ground underfoot and the roofs of buildings overhead—bringing a measure of charm even to the dirty courtyard. The trees, which had hitherto gone, unnoticed, now stood out in snow-clad elegance, the flakes lingering on their branches looking like so many blossoming white flowers.

Sounds of commotion were still coming from the streets outside, but they seemed to come from another world, totally irrelevant, totally incompatible with this courtyard shimmering in silvery light.

The woman interrupts.

The delivery room was just as cold as the waiting room. The delivery packet was icy to the touch. The pains were getting worse by the minute. And the two loudspeakers outside gave us no peace. One screeched:

"You worms of the Battalion, surrender! Stand behind the revolutionary line! Surrender, or death!" The other loudspeaker droned on the two lines of a battle song:

"Upright stands the everlasting pine! Stalwart stands the invincible Battalion!"

Both factions kept it up through the night. If I had died that night, believe me, it would have been that loudspeaker that was responsible.

"Some people are just more fussy than others," the nurse complained, meaning me evidently, but perhaps also including number two in her condemnation. "Eh, what's your name?" she asked me.

"Gui Zhi."

"Family name Gui?"

"Yes."

"Where do you work?"

"The Chestnut Lane Neighborhood Dressmaking Co-operative—oh!"

"Stop whining! Don't tell me that dressmakers are more sensitive than others. Your husband's name."

"Xu Guoliang."

"Work unit?"

"Weaving and Dyeing Factory—oh, I'm freezing."

"What do you expect me to do about the weather?"

The doctor came over to check the baby's heartbeat: 124.

"A bit slow," she murmured. "Give her oxygen, and calamin injections." She patted my arm, then shook her head as she sighed. "It's hopeless. The normal temperature of a delivery room is twenty-four-point-six-degrees Celsius. You walk around in a shirt. But here"—she glanced at the barometer on the wall—"it's five degrees below zero!"

The doctor mused to herself for a moment, then resumed with spirit.

“You should all be honored with the title of Heroic Mother—to deliver your babies under such conditions. Yes, Heroic Mothers.” Evidently she was just trying to cheer us up, but the words were warming to my heart. “You must deliver your baby properly, to deserve that title!” she added.

I looked at her and nodded weakly. Her eyes were kind and warm, but also tired. My heart trembled. Suddenly I felt I had seen those eyes before. Yes, it was when I was small and had pneumonia. Under an oil lamp my mother sat by me through the night and she had looked at me just that way.

“The conditions are not too good, but that’s no reason to lose confidence. And now”—she inserted the oxygen tube into my nostrils—“you must cooperate.” She smoothed my hair as if I were a child. “Now you are all set to become a mother!”

The doctor washed and disinfected her hands and put on a sterile gown. The nurse put a platter of delivery instruments near where I lay.

There was a knocking at the door, a timid soft knocking. The nurse went out for a moment.

“It’s little Wei,” she told the doctor when she returned.

“What does he want?”

“Something happened at home, it seems.”

“Oh!” The light suddenly went out of the doctor’s eyes. She fixed her eyes on the rubber gloves over her hands and remained silent. But she did not go away. She walked over to me. Her arm was pressed against my leg. I felt a warmth where she touched me, as if she instilled some strength into me.

“Very good, very good.” The sound came from behind her mask, soft and steady.

I had no idea how the baby was born, but born it was. I heard it crying.

“A chubby daughter,” the doctor announced happily. “What a pretty girl, just born and already you can make out her features. Here, have a look.”

She lifted the baby and I saw a pink little bundle of flesh, and next to it the tired and loving eyes of the doctor.

“Thank you, doctor,” I managed to say as I felt an ice-cold drop of water trickle from my jaw into my hair.

The man takes up the story and ends it.

The minute I heard the baby’s cries, I rushed into the corridor, sat plump next to the bull, and gave him a nudge with my shoulder.

“Hey, can you hear the cries? Such a strong voice!”

The bull’s face was clouded with anger.

“What number is your wife?”

“Twelve.”

“Fuck!” he spat. "”f my baby doesn’t get here soon, I’ll bash that hag!”

The doctor poked her head out of the delivery room and called out: “Family member of Gui Zhi.” I hastened to respond.

“Your wife is all right. She just gave birth to a girl—seven jin and two liang.”

“Thank you, thank you!”

She was about to say something else when a boy rushed up to her. I had seen that boy before, when I was walking in the yard. Actually I had opened the door to him.

“Mommy!” He tried to grasp her hands.

“Don’t touch my hands. They are disinfected!”

The boy lifted himself on tiptoe and said something in his mother’s ear. The doctor had her back to me, but from the way she swayed in shock and held on to the door frame to support herself, I could tell that some calamity had occurred. So I dashed forward and prevented her from falling. She opened her eyes slowly. Her eyes were so red, so dry and dull.

“Let’s go, Mommy.” The boy tugged at her clothes.

She pushed me aside and passed by the waiting room as if sleepwalking. The groans coming from inside the room held her like a magnet. She leaned against the door of the waiting room weakly, her two hands crossed together. What could be seen of her face was as white as her gauze mask and the cap on her head. Her eyes were downcast.

“Doctor! Doctor!”

“Oh, coming.” The doctor answered in a quavering voice and walked mechanically into the waiting room.

The boy slid into a corner and wiped his tears.

Bull went over and punched the boy in the shoulder.

“Hey, little fellow, why the tears?”

"My daddy … beaten … wounded."
"Why?"
"He wouldn't let the Fight to the Death Brigade take away his books."
"What does your father do?"
"He teaches history at the Duofu Road Middle School."
"Where do you live?"
"Duofu Lane number seven."

There was a strange expression in bull's eyes. I asked him in a low voice, "Have you been to ransack their home?"

"Not I personally. But someone in our battalion had mentioned that house number, someone whose brother is a student in that school."

There was a nasty taste in my mouth. I myself had taken part in those ransack-and-search parties. Sometimes on the trail of an incriminating letter, a notebook. Sometimes just for the sense of power that they confer. We never thought of the pain that these searches caused to the victims, the parents, the spouses, the children.

I hung down my head. I did not know how to pursue the subject, but was overcome by a deep sense of guilt. How I wish I had never taken part in those lawless searches.

Who knows what bull was thinking. He also hung his head dejectedly. "Oh," he groaned as he shook back his matted hair. "Another forty minutes observation period—it is hard." He looked at his watch helplessly. Compared with that bully who threatened the doctor a while ago, he was a changed man.

The doctor appeared, helping another expectant mother from the waiting room to the delivery room. Both bull and I stood up and walked over to the doctor as if propelled by a hand from behind us.

"Doctor, about my wife—number two …" Bull said ingratiatingly.

"I'm afraid we have to use forceps."

"Mommy!" The child stood up from the corner and cried out.

"Wait a little while—there're only three more," the doctor said to the child softly, and then turned back to bull, anticipating his protests.

"It is as you say, doctor," bull said humbly. "Is there … is there any danger?"

"Of course there is danger. The child's heartbeat is too fast, while the mother's contractions are so weak. This is a case for a caesarean birth, but that is out of the question now. I'll do my best."

"Yes, yes. Whatever you say, doctor. Thank you so much for the trouble, doctor." Bull was very tense but tried to put a brave face to the situation.

"Don't mention it," the doctor said lightly, and turned to me.

"Your wife is leaving the delivery room soon, young fellow. Go and get her some breakfast. There is nothing here—no hot water, no milk. You have to get everything yourself."

"Mommy …" the child called to her again.

"Little Wei." She was on the point of saying something, looked at the child, and held back the words. Finally she just said: "You go back first." And she continued on her way to the delivery room with the expectant mother.

"Doctor!" I cried in spite of myself. "Please go back and have a look."

"Thank you." She nodded to me gratefully and added softly, "There are just three more."

As I came back carrying millet porridge in brown sugar and boiled eggs the doctor was just wheeling Gui Zhi from the delivery room into the ward.

Generally speaking, hospital wards conveyed a vision of whitewashed neatness, especially maternity wards, which also carried associations of mystery and joyful celebration. But the ward that Gui Zhi was wheeled into was more like a refugee center. The bloodstained bedclothes, the greasy pillows, and the people occupying all the space between the sickbeds, some lying, some sitting, some moving about—a perfect picture of a refugee center.

All these people were in the suite of the women who had just given birth. Among them were male and female, old and young. The floor was covered, here with dry hay, there with furry blankets. Old women squatted on the floor and gossiped. Bored old men, tucked away in a corner of the room, smoked and played cards. The children drew squares with pieces of chalk in the free space on the floor—whatever there was of it—and played hopscotch. Chicken bones and fish bones were piled behind the door, while crumpled sheets of wrapping paper were scattered allover. The whole place gave out a strange smell.

Gui Zhi was barely installed in bed by the window when the doctor who came with her was besieged by the relatives from the various suites.

"About the mother of our child, could her stitches be taken out tonight?"

"Doctor, my daughter seems to be running a fever."

"Doctor, my aunt has no appetite, why?"

The doctor looked at everybody by turn, giving one an injection, feeding some medicine to a second, and giving advice to a third. She often had to stop to clear her voice.

"Doctor, when is your next shift?"

What a stupid question! Of the one thousand and more work units in this city, could you find one that was operating normally?

So I butted in.

"Doctor, try to get a moment to yourself and get some sleep." I then realized that my advice was equally stupid. The doctor barely had time to sit. But I wanted to say something, so I asked: "And your child, doctor, where is he?"

"He is gone," she answered shortly, evidently reluctant to pursue the subject. "You should also get some sleep, young fellow." And with that she left the room.

Gui Zhi ate some breakfast and slept. She slept so soundly a cannon would not wake her. My poor little wife was completely exhausted.

For the next four days, my job was clear-cut and simple. Mother Wei cooked and all I had to do was bring food to the hospital on my bike.

Back at the hospital the next night, I spread two sheets of newspapers on the floor next to Gui Zhi's bed and spread a rug over that. And that was my bed. After tucking everything into place, I curled up and tried—unsuccessfully—to get some sleep.

I suddenly thought of bull. Why had he still not turned up? As I couldn't sleep anyway, I got up to look for him.

Two women were sitting on the bench in the corridor, probably family members of numbers ten and eleven. But there was no sign of bull.

It turned out that he was in the yard, by the wall. He was pacing restlessly backward and forward with his head in his hands. As he saw me he cried out in agony:

"My wife! She's still in there, and she hasn't delivered yet!"

There were tears in his eyes. Poor bull. The doctor's son was also in the yard. His head was bare and his ears raw with the cold. He rubbed his hands and stamped his feet. He was not crying anymore. He kept his eyes on one window of the building, the window of the delivery room. The blue curtains could be seen through the windowpanes glazed with ice.

"Why are you still here?"

"Waiting for my mommy. When the aunty in there has her baby, my mommy will go home to look after daddy."

I devoutly wished that number two would deliver her baby quickly. For the sake of bull. And for the sake of the doctor's child.

It was not until noon of the next day when I came back with Gui Zhi's lunch that I heard bull's shout of joy. "Born! Born! Eight jin, three liang! A big fat son!"

When he saw me he grabbed me and wheeled me around in a circle.

"Ah, a big fat son. Eight jin, three liang!"

I could hardly breathe in his delirious grip. I could understand how he was feeling, though. We faced each other with smiles, smiling from our hearts. If our comrades from the United Headquarters and the Battalion could have seen us, no doubt they would discipline us for betraying the cause. Surprisingly, at that moment, I didn't give a damn. I had changed overnight. I had become a stranger to the cause. The cries of my comrades leaping into the fray held no appeal for me. All I felt now was that they interfered with my child's birth, interfered with my wif's sleep and meals, as well as the peaceful daily lives of many families like mine. I'd had enough. And I suspect bull felt the same.

"Has the doctor gone back home?"

"Not yet, but soon," said bull confidently. "There is nobody else in the waiting room. She should go home."

"It would be indecent to keep her away from home anymore," I answered.

Half an hour later, number two was shifted to the ward. Bull fussed around her clumsily.

"How scary! The umbilical cord was wrapped in a double knot around our son's neck. Both of you nearly lost your lives. We owe everything to her."

I knew who he meant by her and I asked again: "Has she gone home now?"

“Probably.” But just as he spoke, there was a noisy disturbance from the direction of the yard. From the window, we could see two men both pushing their bikes, and on the two bikes were two women both wrapped up in huge blanket rolls. The two men were in loud argument with the nurse. Their voices were drowned out by the loudspeakers, which were still blaring. But from their gestures and facial expressions, I determined that—like me on the night before—these men had brought their expectant wives. And, as before, the nurse refused to admit them. And the women all wrapped in blanket rolls were suffering the same fright and pain as Gui Zhi had been suffering.

The two couples had my full sympathy. I had gone through it all. But now the nurse also had my sympathy.

The argument rose in a crescendo. Everybody in the ward gathered at the windows out of curiosity. Even the mothers who had just given birth tried to sit up in bed to have a look. Just as the argument was at its height, somebody said softly:

“Look! The doctor!”

Then we all saw the doctor emerge from the building. She had put on a dark blue padded overcoat with a gray scarf wrapped around her neck. She still had her mask on. The little boy was walking beside her. Evidently she was headed for home.

From the window we could see that when she was five or six feet from the group, she stopped in her tracks. She looked silently at the two women in blanket rolls and her eyes were full of sorrow. She went to the nurse and spoke to her. The nurse looked up in shocked surprise. I guessed what it meant, of course. The nurse could not believe that the doctor had again decided to accept the newcomers. The doctor did not explain. She just waved the two men in. The two men were all grateful smiles as they helped their wives into the building. The nurse followed slowly.

Only the doctor and her son were left in the yard. The boy’s clear-cut features were all twisted as he fought back his tears. The doctor drew him to her side, and with her delicate soft white hands, a doctor’s hands, she smoothed his hair. Her eyes looked far away. The child kept his head against his mother’s breast, waiting, hoping. They stood like that for half a minute. The doctor lifted the boy’s face slowly and forced a smile out of her puffy eyes. That smile carried apology, sorrow, and a deep love. I knew that it was precisely that kind of love that made her stretch out to others when in deep distress herself. She took out a carefully folded white handkerchief and wiped away the dirt on the child’s chin. She could not remove the stain on his forehead. That was not dirt, but the mark of a blow. She said something to the boy, who then bit his lips and nodded. She gave one last lingering look at the child, then turned and walked swiftly into the building.

As soon as the doors of the building were shut the boy leaned against a tree and burst into tears. His thin shoulders shook so that the snowflakes dropped from the branches of the tree he was leaning against and settled on his head and shoulders.

Suddenly the sound of shots rang out from the east end of town. With the shots, all the loudspeakers and shouts fell dead, so that the shots rang clearer than ever. Soon the shooting swallowed all other sounds and filled the air.

The bull and I exchanged glances. We both knew that the decisive battle between the two factions had started. Our feelings were mixed. If not for the birth of our babies, the two of us would be on opposite sides at the front lines. But now we were both standing shoulder to shoulder at the window of the ward looking at the weeping boy. In the far distance, a column of brown smoke rose. Bright flames broke out from the smoke.

*

The three of them ate and drank and talked. The guest seemed lost in thought. Suddenly he remembered himself and looked at his wristwatch. It was twenty minutes before his departure time. He turned to pick up his bags, then suddenly asked, “What was the name of that doctor?”

"We are ashamed to say that we found our conscience very late,” the husband replied. “When we finally realized we should seek her out and thank her, we couldn’t find her. The hospital was disbanded. The doctors were sent down to the country.”

“But she had an address in town, Duofu Lane number seven.”

“We went,” said the wife, “but somebody else was living there.”

“Wherever she goes, a doctor like that will always be respected.”

The married couple nodded in agreement.

“We are very sad that we neglected her,” said the husband. “She was a good woman.”

The guest was borne away by his thoughts, but he didn’t know how to form them into words. With another glance at his watch, he bade goodbye to his hosts and fled—toward the track where his train awaited.

21.61 Excerpt (untitled) from Beijing Opera\fn{by David Su Li-qun (1945-   )} Chungking, Szechwan Province, China (M) 4

… Jane was particularly excited today. She received a letter from her father saying that her brother Steven had just been posted to China to work for the British Embassy. The whole family was in London celebrating his twenty-fifth birthday, which doubled as a farewell party.

Before leaving London, Steven was first to attend a course in Chinese Culture and History, arriving in Beijing in just over a month, in October.

Jane hadn't seen him for more than two years. Like his sister, Steven had spent most of his childhood in China and only returned to England for the last two years of his secondary education. He was a pupil at the famous St Paul's School for Boys, going on to Oxford University to read Philosophy, Politics and Economics. On graduation he had spent a year and a half doing a Masters degree on Chinese History. As a student, Steven was a great squash player, representing both his school and his university at County level. After Oxford, he went through a political phase and even stood for Parliament. Around the same time he was working for a bank as their Chinese political consultant, earning a considerable salary. Steven was therefore generally regarded by his contemporaries as a high flyer. Later, he had grown increasingly fond of Oriental culture and decided to become a diplomat. His first assignment was an eighteen-month stint in Japan.

The transfer to China was a promotion—to become the second in command at the British Embassy in Beijing. He had never been an opera fan like his sister, but Steven had always loved, and was becoming quite an expert, on other aspects of Oriental art—in particular, he had spent time studying Chinese literature, antiques, painting and calligraphy.

He wrote a post-script in the letter to Jane:

> It was wonderful to get your letter, and to hear that you are thinking of studying Chinese opera, perhaps even becoming a professional! I was surprised, of course, but I do admire your determination. My ignorance of the subject is almost complete, but I did accompany Father to a few per-formances when I was little. You must forgive me for not understanding why it was considered so special! In comparison to what we have in the West, Beijing opera seemed childish and vulgar. As you know, we used to do Shakespeare at school and to me that will always remain the highest form of theatrical art. Still, I will always support you in whatever you choose to do—if this is your passion, then why not pursue it?
>
> Your brother who loves you,
>
> Steven

Jane had always known that Father would respect her opinion but she never expected Steven to give his support, so this was a wonderful surprise. Unfortunately, she also had to get the approval of her guardian before proceeding any further.

At first he shook his head, saying: "There is a lot of difference between Chinese and English culture. However skilled you might become in time, I don't think that a local audience would ever tolerate a 'foreign devil' in the midst of their traditional theatre." But Jane was not to be put off and he finally had to give in, at least to the extent of allowing her to write to her parents to solicit their opinion.

Before Jane had even begun the letter she knew that Father would not object. He was, after all, an opera fan himself. Mother, however, was extremely unlikely to say yes. Jane's mother was a member of the English aristocracy, and had always valued status above everything else. Entering the theater was not what she had planned for her daughter. Fortunately, there was a tradition of democratic decision-making in their household, where majority opinion always held sway. Steven's support was crucial and now that she had it, Jane knew that half the battle was won.

One other person was to be instrumental in shaping Jane's destiny—the owner of Lan Ling Guan, Zai Chao.
But before going to him Jane decided to confide in the poet Lin Wenqiao. She told him that she had already secured her parents' approval.

Lin's reply was straightforward: "This is the dream of a lunatic and the whole thing is utterly out of the question."

Jane asked: "Is it because I am not good?"

Lin shook his head: "If you are not good you can always work to improve. You can get a top class teacher. No, that is not the problem."

"Is it because you think I am too stupid to learn?"

Lin shook his head again: “How could that be true? You are more hardworking and intelligent than almost anybody I know.”

Now Jane smiled: “It’s because I don’t look right, isn’t it? Because I have pale skin and blue eyes, and my nose is a little higher than yours.”

Lin was exasperated.

“If you know then why do you ask?”

“This is only your prejudice speaking,” Jane replied, a little less polite than she should have been. “Who doesn’t know that opera is for the ears and not the eyes! Those who stare at the stage with their eyes wide open are not the real opera-lovers. Even if someone came to look rather than to listen, do you really think that they could tell the colour of my skin under all that wig and make-up?”

Lin was silent.

“Look at this photograph.” Jane produced a picture of herself in full costume in the role of Huang Bao Chuen.

Lin took it from her hand and examined the photograph with close attention. She was right. It was impossible to tell this was a foreigner. He turned towards Jane and took a good look at her profile. Her nose was in fact not much higher than that of an average Chinese girl. With the help of make-up this could easily be disguised.

Still, the matter was beyond contemplation. He could not agree to such folly.

Jane would not take no for an answer. She insisted on being taken to Zai Chao for a second opinion. Eventually Lin reluctantly agreed.

When they arrived at Lan Ling Guan, two guests in court attire were already seated. They had come to ask for a piece of Master Zai’s calligraphy. When they saw Lin enter with a blonde woman, the gentlemen were at a loss whether to stand up and greet her or to discreetly retreat from her presence.

Zai laughed.

“Honoured guests, please do not be alarmed. This lady is a close friend of Master Lin’s. She is also a regular amateur performer here at Lan Ling. You should see her in The Exile of Su San. Miss Jane is every bit as good as Master Lu Rain!”

The two officials marveled. Jane quickly added, “Please do not listen to our host, he is too gracious! I have less than one per cent of Master Lu’s talent.”

When the two men heard Jane speaking such excellent Chinese, they looked at each other and said in unison: “This lady is truly a magical creature!”

Lin asked: “What kind of scroll would the gentlemen like today?”

The fatter of the two replied: “To tell you the truth we have not come for our own pleasure today. We are here on behalf of the Ambassador to England. Apparently the British Museum has requested a sample of Master Zai’s calligraphy, to be hung above the entrance to the Oriental Wing.”

Zai added: “Ah, this was the suggestion of Master Hang Yau Wei and Master Chiang Dzi Yuen. The Ambassador wants to raise money for the new railway. As you know I am still half a monk, and earn my living selling opera tickets, so politics is hardly my milieu, but if my unworthy efforts could be of help to the country, then I am more than happy to oblige. What should I write? Master Lin, you are the scholar here, perhaps you would like to make a suggestion?”

Lin thought for a moment and said, “To present the word ‘Luck’ would seem somewhat commonplace. If we are looking for something to suit the occasion, emphasis ought to be on the relationship between the two countries. Why not make a gift of the character ‘Eternity’?”

The two officials and Zai all applauded the suggestion.

“Excellent! Master Lin, you never fail to live up to your distinguished reputation! This is exactly what I shall do! Housekeeper, please bring two pieces of paper in the largest size.”

The housekeeper disappeared.

Zai walked over to the corner of the room and took down his biggest brush which was hanging on the wall. He turned to Jane and said, “Miss Jane, it is for your country and mine. The task of grinding the ink must fall on your shoulders today!”

Jane had never seen such a large brush before. She found this all very amusing and happily agreed. With the help of Lin she began to grind the ink

The housekeeper now reappeared with two sheets of paper, each measuring about a metre square. Zai took one look and said, “This is not nearly big enough, bring another two!”

When the housekeeper returned with more sheets the two officials were given the task of pasting them together. Now the paper covered the entire floor of the living room.

Zai tucked away the tail of his long robe, rolled up his sleeves, shook off his shoes, and stood silent at the center of this vast expanse of white.

Jane did not understand what was gomg on, so Lin explained:

"Before one puts ink to paper the mind must merge into a single point. Without this focus the strokes will appear diffused. Once the brush makes contact with the paper there must not be any breaks until it lifts off the page at the end. The number of characters is irrelevant, the important thing is for the energy to flow from first to last in a single breath."

Jane now turned her gaze towards the two court officials. They were standing reverently with arms hanging by their sides, so still they appeared not to be breathing.

Lin whispered in her ear:

"Observe carefully later how the brush makes contact with the paper, how it travels, pauses and comes to a halt. The energy flows from deep within the artist. I haven't made a scroll this big in years, let alone attempted a single character! It is common knowledge that the fewer strokes there are the more difficult the task. In this way calligraphy is comparable to building a house - the less material at one's fmgertips, the harder it is to construct a frame. Without a solid structure, all the skill of execution is in the spirit!"

The ink was almost ready.

Suddenly, Zai awoke as if from a deep sleep and said: "Good, let us have another sip of tea." His whole demeanour once more relaxed. Approaching Jane's side, he dipped his forefinger into the ink to test its consistency: "A little bit longer, if you please, it is difficult to wring energy out of a dry brush."

Jane was once more perplexed. Again Lin came to the rescue:

"Master Zai would like the ink to be thicker." Then lowering his voice he said, "He was unable to locate his spirit. He will drink some tea then try again in a little while."

The tea was brought, everybody sat down again.

Zai said: "Master Lin, did you know that contained within the character for 'Eternity' is every facet of Chinese calligraphy? Let me entertain you with a little story—there are, of course, eight different strokes in the character."

He gestured to Jane to come to his side.

Zai dipped his finger into his tea and drew on the side table:

"The first stroke is a dot. The brushwork here resembles a boulder bouncing off the face of a cliff, plunging down without pause or hesitation; the second stroke from left to right is a thousand miles of flowing clouds, light in substance yet full in form; the third stroke through the center is as an ancient bark, alive with moisture without a hint of dryness; the hook aspiring skywards unleashes a hundred arrows, focused in aim, explosive in power; to the left the brush across is as waves smashing against a steady rock; the next stroke down must hold the strength to tame a wild beast in water; the seventh from right to left is shallow in appearance but searches deep towards its roots; the eighth and final stroke is as the ocean swelling up to chase the thunder."

Suddenly Zai felt his spirit rising and said:

"Quick, fetch the brush, I'll do it right now!"

The fat official presented the huge brush. Zai seized it out of his hands, ran towards the ink stone, and plunged the sable into the black, viscous liquid.Lifting his hand a little, Zai let the ink seep down so that it sank to the tip but without dripping. He collected himself for a brief moment then immediately began. Zai was holding the giant brush with both hands—first it looked as if he was rowing, turning his oar this way and that, negotiating the currents; now he was a warrior brandishing a long staff, riding the wind. Wrist, shoulders, waist, focus all moved together as a rhythmic whole, suffused with energy …

Zai finally came to a stop and everyone shouted "Hao!" in unison.

Jane was stunned into silence. The ink seemed to have expanded to fill up every corner of the room. Jane felt sure it was going to burst through the walls and reach out into infinite space …

Examining the brushwork, Jane could see how each stroke was perfectly balanced, in lightness and intensity, moisture and dryness. Where the ink was heavy it resembled the concentrated blackness of unmilled lead; where light, a cloud shimmering in the reflection of a new moon; where dry, the bottom of a disused well; where moist, like dew on the tip of a new spring branch. The frame of the character was lean as steel, the intricate corners delicate as carved jade. Within its power reposed a deep sense of calm, out of its strength a careless grace emerged. Here was a gaze direct yet mysterious, a beauty conscious of itself yet unimpressed by the attention it drew.

The two officials were overjoyed. The minute the ink was dry they picked up their treasure and left with overwhelming gratitude.

It was only now that Lin brought up the subject of Jane's intention to become an opera singer.
Zai thought for a moment and said:
"Female liberation is in the air. Even the Health Department has just issued an edict for women to unbind their feet. In Shanghai there is already an opera company featuring women only. These are changing times and perhaps Miss Jane's ambitions are not totally out of reach. What I worry about is whether or not she could put up with the hardship of an actor's life. This young lady has been raised like a beautiful flower in comfortable surroundings. How is she to endure such tough regimes?
"Miss Jane, first you must realize that most actors come from ordinary families, and usually end up on stage because their parents cannot feed them. Secondly, historically speaking, actors are not unlike prostitutes in one respect—once you have entered the profession it is almost impossible ever to extricate yourself. All day long you will be in the company of actors—not only are your parents likely to object, you yourself might find it limiting after a while and begin to regret your decision."
"Master Zai, I love the opera. I want nothing else from life and I am willing to take the consequences. If you would only give me some guidance I would be grateful to you forever. Please indulge my sincere request."
At these words Jane dropped to her knees and bowed low to the floor.
Zai helped her up at once and sighed.
"I can see that your mind is made up. In that case we must think carefully where best to send you."
Zai allowed himself a moment's thought: "How about the Shiao Yang Troupe? The director of the company, Yang Tien, is a good friend of mine. He is a reliable man and I would not be so worried if I knew that he was looking after Miss Jane."
"The actor from Shanghai?" Lin asked. "I hear he is as famous as can be in the south, but that this is the fIrst time he has come to Beijing. Perhaps he means to conquer the capital as well!"
"That is indeed the man I refer to. He is the prized and only pupil of the actor Hong Fang To. His martial arts skills are quite incomparable. Unusually he is also blessed with an excellent singing voice. Yang is one of those rare actors who can tackle both disciplines with equal accomplishment."
Zai continued, "When I was in Shanghai I saw some dozen operas in his repertoire and I said to him at the time, 'To be the best in Shanghai is not enough. You must have the courage to conquer Beijing. Beijing is like a dragon, Tientsin, a tiger. Until you can ride the dragon and subdue the tiger you have not reached the pinnacle of the opera profession.' In fact he was here last year to 'steal' from us. He must have seen more than eighty operas and stayed here with me for four months. He loved to talk late into the night. Yang thinks that midnight is the witching hour when all the spirits of heaven and earth congregate. Everything becomes clear to him at midnight. He wrote to me recently, asking me to draw up a plan for his visit."
"That's perfect," said Lin. "I wonder when he is thinking of making his debut?"
Zai replied, "It is not yet decided. Yang is not only hugely talented but also very ambitious. He is not like the average actor. All this time he has been quietly putting a company together. It would appear that he is not concerned with making a big splash overnight. He would rather start small, learn slowly and establish his reputation in time. This way he can build a solid foundation. Here is a man who has thought carefully about how to shape his career. If Miss Jane were to train under his auspices, her future will be assured."
Jane found it hard to contain her excitement. She knelt down again and bowing her head all the way to the floor she said:
"Thank you, Master Zai, Master Lin!" She did not know what more to say, so the young English girl kow-towed to the two Chinese masters three more times …

76.18 A Broken Promise\fn{by Zhang Zhilu (1945-)} Peking, China (M) 1

"Where did that antelope go?" Mom suddenly asked me. The antelope Mom was talking about was a piece carved from black hardwood. It was given to me by Dad when he came back from Africa. It was always on the corner of my desk. But now my heart started thumping faster because I had already given it to my best friend, Wan Fang, yesterday.
"Didn't Dad say he gave it to me as a present?" I said quietly.
"I know he gave it to you, but where is it now?" Mom's eyes were riveted on me. I discovered that things weren't as simple as I had thought.
"I put it away."
"Where'd you put it? Get it for me to look at." Mom apparently could tell I was lying, because I stood there motionless with my head lowered, not daring to look at her.

"Now tell the truth. Did you take it out and sell it?" Mom got very stern.

"I didn't sell it, I gave it away." I could feel my voice wavering.

"Who did you give it to? Out with it." Mom rested her hand on my shoulder.

"I gave it to Wan Fang. She's my best friend."

"Go now and ask for it back!" Mom said firmly. "How can you just give someone something as valuable as that? Or else, I'll go with you."

"No!" I shouted in tears. Dad walked in, and after hearing Mom explain what had happened, he quietly lit a cigarette, and slowly said to me:

"It's not that children can't give things to each other, but it depends on what it is. This kind of valuable object is not like a little cake or a piece of candy. How can you take it upon yourself?" Dad's tone of voice was very even, but with a force that you couldn't defy.

"But you gave it to me."

"Yes, I gave it to you, but I didn't give you permission to give it to somebody else!"

I had no argument. When I realized that they were going to make me go right away and ask for the antelope back from Wan Fang, I felt very sad. They didn't know what a good friend Wan Fang was and how much she believed in principles.

We'd been together since nursery school. She's a good student, and not at all selfish. The two of us are so inseparable that our language arts teacher calls us a "dialectical synthesis of two into one."

Last week at a physical education class, we were all wearing newly-bought gym clothes. After playing "leap the goat," we chased each other around a small tree. I accidentally caught my pants on a branch, ripping a big hole in them. I sat under the tree furtively wiping away my tears and bemoaning my pants, scared to go back home where I would be scolded. Wan Fang also stopped playing, sat down next to me and sighed long sighs. Sud- denly, she jumped up and slapped her thigh and exclaimed:

"Let's first switch pants. My mom is a first-class seamstress, she can sew up the pants so that you won't even be able to tell from the outside."

Then I felt that I'd been saved, and switched pants with Wan Fang. Later I learned that because of this, her mother made her stand facing the wall for an hour.

"Why didn't you say that the pants were mine?"

She laughed. "My mom is a gossip. If she knew, sooner or later she'd let your mom know too."

Then I wanted to switch back our pants. But she said differently, "Forget it. In any case I've already stood for an hour. If we switch again, you'll just be punished by having to stand another two hours."

Even now I'm still wearing her gym pants. Whenever we have physical education class and I see that big scar on her pants, I feel sorry for what I did to her.

Yesterday, Wan Fang came to my house to play. When I saw her admiring the antelope on my desk, I picked it up and put it in her hands.

"I'll give it to you. We are good friends forever—forever." She was very excited to have the gift, and in return she took out of her pocket a curved retractable knife and gave it to me.

I don't know for how long, but Granny had been standing in my door. She certainly wanted to say something, but didn't. Mom took a tin of candied fruit from the drawer.

"It's not that I don't understand what's called for. I know you wanted to give something to your good friend. Give her this tin of candy. Your father and I just can't bear to give away that antelope." I could tell from Mom's eyes how much that antelope was worth to her. She and Dad were watching me, as if they were waiting for something. I knew the situation was hopeless. Tears streamed down my cheeks. It was very quiet in the room.

"That's enough!" Granny suddenly said. "This isn't any good."

Mom stood up and pushed the tin of candy toward me.

"You don't know how precious that wood carving is!"

I couldn't stand it anymore. Pushing away Mom's candy, I flew out of the room.

Clutching the little knife that Wan Fang had given me I thought as I walked. What would I say? Would she remain on good terms with me as before? I doubted it. I knocked lightly on her door. The door opened and Wan Fang stuck her head out and pulled me inside:

"Wan Fang …" I stood in the entrance hall, not wanting to go further.

"What's the matter with you? And no umbrella. Did you get a whipping?" Wan Fang looked at me quizzically.

"No." I slowly took the little knife from my pocket. "Can you give the antelope back to me …?" I could barely hear my own voice.

Wan Fang was silent for a while, not taking back the little knife. She just bit her lips and looked at me. I lowered my eyes, not daring to look back at her.

"Didn't we agree on it yesterday? How come you're acting like this today?"

I was struggling not to cry. Just then her mother carne out of the room. Seeing the little knife in my hand and our appearance, she immediately understood.

"Wan Fang, do you have something of hers?"

Wan Fang glanced at me and ran into the room. After a while she emerged with the antelope. Her mother took it from her.

"Ai-ya! How could you take something so valuable from someone?" She handed me the antelope. "Take it and be careful with it, don't be sad. I'll be giving her a lick or two!"

I handed the knife over to her.

"Auntie! I gave her the antelope. It's all my fault." When I raised up my head, Wan Fang was already gone. She wasn't going to be my friend any more.

I slowly walked down the street alone. The moon came out. In the cold, I gave an involuntary shiver. There was no sound at all on the street. Suddenly I heard someone calling my name. I turned around to see Wan Fang running. up. She pressed the little knife into my hand.

"Take it. We're still good friends."

I stared at her blankly, unable to keep from crying. I felt I was the saddest person in the world! I had broken my promise to a friend. I had done such a shameful thing!

Yet, was I completely to blame?

78.74 Locks\fn{by Cao Guanlong (1945-)} "rural Zhejiang," China (M) 5

"According to our reports, Master Numbskull has been buying quite a few locks recently and seems to be spending a lot of time in his room fiddling around with them in a very suspicious fashion. No one knows what in the world he's up to!"

One of the investigation case workers was flipping through the folder of materials gathered from informers as he conscientiously presented his report. The Special Investigation Team attached to a certain university was right in the middle of the regular meeting it held each week to exchange intelligence. But his report seemed to disappear into the hum of murmuring voices, failing somehow to attract any attention from the others who were sitting around the office in small clusters, some cracking watermelon seeds between their teeth, others absorbed in paring their fingernails. Nor was this lack of response surprising, considering that this particular Special Investigation Team had already made quite a name for itself throughout the city. Having become accustomed to handling the really big stuff, who could expect them to show any interest in this kind of small potatoes?

"Are you trying to tell us that that old duffer is attempting to pull something off? You must be kidding," somebody finally responded after a long while.

"Oh, I guess you probably haven't ever heard the story about him, quite a funny story, too. It seems that a few years back, a burglar jimmied the door to his room and made off with his radio. Master Numbskull was, in fact, wide awake at the time, but he was so scared he couldn't even croak out a sound. Well, the burglar was long gone, vanished into the night by the time the old boy had climbed out of his bed and crept over to close the door, trembling every step of the way. That's when he began scampering around the room yelling 'Stop! Thief!'"

A burst of raucous laughter engulfed the room. The chief investigator of the Special Investigation Team sat back comfortably in his handsome swivel chair of glossy walnut, taking in his staff's reports with complete aplomb. The old saying, "you can't play with ink without staining your hands" certainly has something in it. This intrepid and battle-tested "pebble," having been immersed in the slimy mire of intellectuals for quite some time, was actually becoming a little refined in his gestures and choice of words. A dangerous sign. From among a big heap of "the spoils of war" stacked up beside him, the chief investigator casually plucked out a faded brown copy of the earliest extant edition of the Zhoubisuanjing, a Zhou Dynasty treatise on astronomy and trigonometry printed under the Southern Song Dynasty.\fn{1127-1179AD.} After absentmindedly flipping through its ancient pages, he took this work, written before the Qin Dynasty,\fn{221-210BC.} the first Chinese work on mathematics, and blithely, even jauntily, tossed it into the fireplace. Truly it may be said that heavenly justice is all-encompassing, and though its millstone may grind slowly, it grinds exceedingly fine. This classic work on mathematics somehow escaped the large-scale book-burning by the dictatorial First Emperor, Qinshi-huang—but have no fear, for after two thousand years, it had in the end been brought to bay and exterminated by the iron hand of "total dictatorship." The chief investigator, having served as the executioner privileged to carry out final justice, watched appreciatively as the pages of that irreplaceable book writhed painfully in the flames. At the same time, he demonstrated his command of that bureaucratic jargon, an amalgam of Shanghainese and Mandarin favored by Party officials, unctuously summing up the discussion by delivering this drawled-out pronouncement:

"Master Numbskull, ahh, fancies himself the proponent of some theory of; umm, what was it, uhhh, oh, yes, I've got it, he concocted some theory of probability. Let's see now, didn't he propound some universal, ahh, some universal law?"

His female secretary immediately picked up this thread.

"Yes, he once propounded A Series of Most Refined Mathematical Formulae Governing All Changes in the Universe from the Movement of Galaxies to the Propagation of Mosquitoes, from the Ebb and Flow of Oceanic Tides to the Rise and Fall of Continents; or something along those lines."

"Um-hmm." The chief investigator nodded approvingly and continued,

"During the past several years, he has been in no position to do any teaching or to carry out any research, since he spends all day in custodial work. Naturally he can't help being a little bit out of it. I would imagine that, quite possibly, he's now taken a wild notion that there is some great mathematical law to be derived from studying the inner workings of locks!"

Another big outburst of sycophantic and scornful laughter.

"However, there's another aspect to this, and that is that recently the old boy has been toeing the line and behaving himself a lot more the way these people ought to." Adopting a magnanimous tone, as if graced with that certain generosity of spirit and tolerance politicians ought to have, the chief went on to amplify his remarks: "He now seems to be quite well disposed toward all of us here in the Special Investigation Team office. Why, this week alone he's come round six times already to report to me on his ideological progress. That's not to say that the old muddle-head doesn't run off at the mouth and spew out a lot of jumbled nonsense, but still and all, there's no denying that this kind of attitude is pretty good, isn't it?"

*

Master Numbskull was, in fact, surnamed Dai. But during the time when all intellectuals were subjected to relentless attack for being "unable to tote a rifle, plow a field, or swing a hammer," people started intentionally mispronouncing his name as Dai.\fn{Slow-witted.} It was thus that he became "Professor Numbskull." Then with the campaign in which Master Kong\fn{Confucius.} and Master Laozi]fn{Lao Tzu.} were selected for a flood of public invective, "Professor Numbskull" became "Master Numbskull."

Master Numbskull actually was a bit numbskulled when you come right down to it. Take that incident last year, for instance. The Special Investigation Team had just received glowing commendations from the city's revolutionary committee and from senior officials in the central government for having broken up an enemy intelligence network in which several hundred intellectuals working in more than a dozen institutions of higher learning and research had been implicated and arrested. The entire Special Investigation Team, along with various big shots and lower officials of the university, had organized a celebration banquet. Professor Dai, now known to everyone as Master Numbskull and still under detention for further interrogation at the school, was pressed into temporary service as a waiter. After three rounds of toasts, all of the brave "gestapo," well-renowned for their derring-do, were already muddled with drink. According to the customary order of things at such banquets, a course of fresh fruit was supposed to have been served at this point to help the revelers sober up.

"Hey, Master Numbskull, run out and buy us a few pounds of tangerines!"

An hour or more went by, but Master Numbskull was still nowhere to be seen. Eventually the sleuths, now sprawled and lolling here and there throughout the banquet room, suddenly recalled having sent him out for tangerines. They leapt to their feet in consternation. Almost sober, they grabbed their long lances and charged out through the door, each one screaming curses and dire threats against the old scoundrel for having proved himself unworthy of the trust they had placed in him. Just who did he think he was, trying to evade his well-deserved punishment?

In hot pursuit, the revelers got no farther than the main gate of the university when they were greeted by the sight of a large crowd of people gesticulating and laughing in front of the night-time shop across the street. Master Numbskull's pursuers dashed across to see for themselves what was going on. The crowd, catching sight of glinting spears rushing their way, supposed this to be yet another bout of armed struggle. They scattered shrieking in all directions, thereby revealing the singular object that had been the center of their attention. A man was sitting underneath the shop window, all scrunched over, tangerines strewn and rolling on the ground around him. As the advancing spear carriers drew near, they could see it was none other than Master Numbskull!

The paper bag in which the tangerines had been sold to him was spread on his lap. He was bent over it, availing himself of illumination from the shop's electric light-bulb, totally absorbed in the tiny symbols and words that covered its every inch. His bald head bent down so close to that old paper bag that he was the very image of a round-shelled snail obliviously devouring a leaf, bite by bite, greedily munching away on it, savoring it, digesting it. His ears did not register any of those vicious curses, much less did his eyes observe the welter of shoes surrounding him. It was not until a hand suddenly cuffed him a good one on the back of his head that Master Numbskull blankly looked up. The cold metallic gleam of a spear tip flashing right in front of his nose abruptly reminded him of the errand on which he had come. In a panic, he frantically tried to gather up all the loose tangerines. One of the spear carriers rudely snatched the paper bag away, and holding it up to the light for a look, flew completely off the handle, screaming with rage:

"It's that same fiendish obsession of his!"

It just so happened that the paper out of which this particular bag had been fashioned was a page from some unknown mathematician's handwritten manuscript, its title running straight and true across the top: Applying Optimization to the Refining of Pharmaceuticals.

Back in his room, our friend Numbskull was now writing out this week's seventh report on his ideology. This man, who could frolic freely and dive to spectacular depths in the ocean of numbers, found it an altogether different matter when faced with stunts such as "carrying out revolution in the depths of one's soul." Trying to cope with this type of thing, he was just like a carp who has flipped out of the water into an ash heap; the more he thrashed around, the more flummoxed he became. Nonetheless he kept at it, slowly and laboriously filling up the paper with words.

He wrote, first of all, that his being confined in isolation and undergoing investigation completely proved the concern and care shown him by the Party organization; then he wrote some more, saying that the instruction he had received from the chief of the Special Investigation Team far outweighed the ten lean years he had spent as a poor student struggling to become educated; and he went further, writing that now there really and truly was a gratifying spring-like warmth and gentleness in the office of the Special Investigation Team, and so on and so forth. Resorting to characters almost as large as the standard script of Liu Gongquan,\fn{A note reads: Famous calligrapher, 778-865AD.} he finally managed to fill up five or six pages of this latest report on his thinking.

Quickly scanning it once, he folded it up and slipped it into his pocket. Then he pulled open the drawer of his desk and took out six separate bunches of steel wires of various lengths and shapes, each with a hook or twist on one end. His hand reached out to turn off his desk lamp. This left him sitting in the dark, just like a Buddhist monk meditating as he counts his beads. Reciting words and numerals under his breath, the professor concentrated on carefully feeling each wire with his fingertips. This done, he slipped each packet cautiously into an inside pocket and then patted them to be sure they were in place. He sat there in the silence of his room, his accelerated respiration rasping extraordinarily loud and distinct in his ears. All of a sudden the table clock struck nine. The professor jumped to his feet and was gone out the door.

His pallid face was illuminated by the street lamps, and the corners of his lips tightened into frequent spasmodic grimaces. A cold chill ran down his spine, while his forehead exuded drops of sweat as large as beans. Stealthily ducking into a line of stumpy trees and scrambling through a hole in the fence around the university campus, the professor then crept silently along a wall until he could slip inside a small French-style building. He brushed off his clothes and began to climb the stairs to the second floor. Although he stopped time and again to take in deep breaths in an effort to calm his nerves, his legs simply refused to stop their wild trembling as he climbed the staircase. There was no light upstairs and the whole corridor was pitch-black. Starting from the head of the stairs, the professor counted out five paces, then reached out and groped around in the dark. Sure enough his hand soon came into contact with the labyrinthine keyhole of the "Empress" brand lock with which the door to the Special Investigation Team's office had been specially fitted.

With the latest installment of his "thought report" in his left hand, he rapped lightly several times with the knuckle of his right index finger, pressing his ear against the door. No sound came from within. Then he beat several times on the door with the open palm of his hand and still there was no response. Without further delay, the professor wadded up his "thought report" and stuffed it into his pants pocket. Quickly fishing out those packets of wires, and softly repeating a six-digit number to himself, he pulled out a specific hooked wire from each of the packets according to a predetermined sequence. Next he combined these into a certain configuration and inserted them by feel into the keyhole. Holding their ends tightly between his thumb and forefinger, he twisted and jimmied these springy wires rhythmically back and forth, in and out, but the mechanism of the lock simply would not budge. Thereupon he recited another sequence of numbers and tried a different set of six steel wires, again to no avail.

Time slid by in perfect silence, nothing to mark its passing, as the professor stuck to his sequence and methodically tried one configuration after another. As he worked, he gradually entered a different state of mind, akin to euphoria or dementia. Cowardice, anxiety, trembling, giddiness had all vanished into the night, leaving him fully concentrated on the job of picking the lock. It seemed his other senses and every part of his nervous system not employed in this task had ceased to function for the duration.

Had the professor's skull turned into a transparent glass dome right then, we could most assuredly have seen a miraculous sight: the bulging surface of the professor's brain would have appeared to us as the fluorescent screen of an oscilloscope with a single point of light glowing and sparkling on it there in the dark. That nodule of light would be the supreme center of stimulation among the many functional areas of his brain. The "fuel' supplied to the brain calls to stoke its cogitational activities—those high-energy phosphotidic acids—would have nearly all converged at this hot point and be intensely metabolizing, reacting, combusting, emitting a dazzling glow. But the tens of billions of nerve cells surrounding this one center of stimulation were all inactive, temporarily held in check; they would have shown up as nothing but an inert gray mass on the fluorescent screen.

That glowing point of light would be the quintessential nature of the professor and would represent the crucial characteristic of many, many other scientists who lose themselves so completely in their work. It is this temperament that has accomplished so many great discoveries and inventions. But in this particular environment, with danger lurking all around, what would this special temperament bring to the professor?

Everything was proceeding according to his pre-established plan of attack. The professor himself was calm and collected, his movements sure and deft. He was totally oblivious to the fact that he was in the middle of a very dangerous and tricky piece of business. He was like a superbly skilled surgeon performing a delicate operation to set the stirrup bone in the middle ear.

The eighth configuration of wires finally did the trick, turning the mechanism of the lock around twice with the faint sound of metal springing into place. The professor turned the door handle and the door slowly opened to him. He nipped in through the door, immediately closing it behind him, then leaned back against it to catch his breath before setting off through the darkness.

"Three steps forward," he muttered. "Now three to the left, now two to the right, here we are!" He reached out to touch the chief investigator's office desk. It was right where it was supposed to be. Detouring round the chief's chair, he brushed up against a pile of books stacked in the corner. He then squatted down and felt around with his hands until he found what he was groping for—a square bundle of papers tied up with four crisscrossing pieces of twine.

"Right, this is it!"

Everything had gone off without a hitch and the object he was after was now in his hands. After a few seconds, a sudden thought struck Professor Dai just as he was about to clear out of this frightening place. "Could I have gotten the wrong one?" So he put the bundle of papers down on the desk and, bending over it with the window at his back, struck a match, which clearly illuminated the title on its wrapper: An Inquiry into the Criteria for Uniqueness in the Q Process.

"That's it! That's it!"

A tremor of delirious joy swept through his body; his legs went weak at the knees and then gave way as he sank backward into the chief investigator's upholstered swivel chair. The flame from the match quavered, calling forth dim shapes of desks looming all around, ever so like wild beasts lurking in a mountain cave, peering malevolently at this uninvited guest who dared to trespass within their lair. The match burned down and began to singe his fingertips, but the professor was unmindful even of this.

"I wonder how he begins his argument," mused the professor. "The opening argument generally determines the whole exposition. Just a quick glance. I'll just take a peek at the first page and then get out of here."

With two final quavers, the match flame went out. Incredibly, the professor's hand now inched through the darkness toward the switch on the desk lamp.

Click!

The room was suddenly filled with eye-piercing light. Please don't blame the professor too harshly for his foolhardy self-indulgence. If we could comprehend the far-reaching and decisive significance that the content behind that abstract and peculiar title had for the future of ballistic accuracy, earthquake prediction, meteorological forecasts, plant and animal genetics, and so on, or if we had any conception of the history of probability studies during this past half century, in which so many experts have expended so much effort on this very topic, about which to this day they are unfortunately still groping in the fog, perhaps we would then be able to appreciate the nearly magical allure of this manuscript for the professor.

Just as the pearl diver who has gone through great hardship finally to get his hands on a large and promising oyster shell, and who needs only to pry that shell gently open in order, perhaps, for a pearl of breathtaking luster to come into view, likewise the professor could not resist the hope that out of that bundle of papers would emerge a pearl of wisdom to rise up into the limitless starry firmament of knowledge, there to radiate its light and guide mankind's eternal voyage in search of truth. When one thinks of it this way, even if you were risking your neck in a wildly pitching sampan, do you think you could have withstood the intense desire to take one little peek?

The first page had long been turned over; the professor had not kept his promise to himself. The second page had followed, and the third …

It was just like the good old days when he used to sit beneath that pale yellowish light, so warm and cheerful, back at the faculty room correcting graduate students' papers in the dead of night. He ran his eyes rapidly through pages filled with line after line of abstruse and monotonous numbers, signs, equivalences, equations. He resembled the conductor of an orchestra silently poring over the score of a colossally complex symphony; merely from notes, dots, and lines on paper, the maestro can hear in his mind's ear the forceful, surging resonance of the piano, the dolorous tremolo of the violin, the soaring clarion call of the trumpet, the heart-stopping barrage of the kettledrum's roll …

The professor was intoxicated, his whole body and soul intoxicated. He couldn't help slapping the table in delight at the incisiveness and boldness of the thesis, he whistled to himself and exhaled repeatedly in admiration of the finely honed and tightly argued proofs. Again like a conductor, who detects a few faint discordant tones present somewhere in the orchestra's harmonious chords, the professor also had to shake his head and sigh at the occasional oversight or mistake in the thesis. He reached out to take an old-fashioned steel pen from the penholder on the desk, the very same pen that had split countless good and innocent couples asunder, that had separated children from parents, destroyed homes, sent good people to their deaths. Dipping the nib into the inkwell, he painstakingly set to work refining the manuscript with a mark here and stroke there …

Those amazing spies in thrillers and detective stories are often depicted as possessing a sixth sense. In tight spots, they are always able to maintain all six senses in a state of heightened alertness so that they absorb and process the slightest bit of data captured from their surroundings and thus prevail over their opponents and protect themselves. Although our good professor had mastered the art of picking locks to a degree that probably would have left Sherlock Holmes wide-eyed and gape-jawed, what happened to him next further demonstrates, unfortunately, that he really was not in the same league as the great detectives and spies.

The sky in the east was beginning to turn fish-belly pale, but he did not notice. The early morning sun began to shine in through the iron bars on the window, but he was completely unaware of it. Nor did he perceive the peal of voices as people did their collective morning exercises on the playground outside. He didn't even know what to make of the earsplitting cry of surprise from the woman secretary as she opened up the office that morning.

Several items of incriminating evidence were collected when they searched the professor's room:

First, there were all those disassembled, shiny metal parts of door locks found in his desk drawer.

Second, there was a small notebook chock-full of numbers, plus a great many sketches and diagrams of hooks that looked like steel wires. Third, there was a blurry letter written on coarse straw paper. It read:

> To my esteemed teacher, Professor Dai:
>
> I'm afraid I haven't much longer to live. They want me to confess to being an enemy intelligence agent and several shifts of them are interrogating me around the clock; they persist in smashing my head—very hard—against the concrete wall in the air raid tunnel. This happens every day!
>
> My capacity for logical thinking has been ruined. There was a time when you used to praise my memory, but now I can't even recite the multiplication tables! When you're a mathematician and you have your cerebrum destroyed, then what's the use of living, anyway?
>
> Since I'm an orphan and you were my teacher, I have to be counted as one of your children. Permit me to unburden myself and leave my last words to you as to a loving father.
>
> Some years ago I wrote "An Inquiry Into the Criteria for Uniqueness in the Q Process." But even though I completed the manuscript, I didn't publish it because there were still certain places that needed further consideration. Who would have imagined that the manuscript and I would come to grief simultaneously?
>
> The last time I was taken into the Special Investigation Team's office for interrogation, I noticed that my manuscript had been thrown into a corner near the chief investigator's desk where all kinds of books lay in a big pile.
>
> This body of mine is now nothing but a worthless piece of junk waiting to be discarded; whether it is buried or cremated doesn't matter. But what I've written could conceivably offer some useful leads that would contribute to the eventual solution of this major mathematical proposition. Just the thought that those pages might wind up being used as kindling or burnt as waste paper makes my head whirl and throb in the most horrible way. . .

"Goddamn! The creep was about to die and he still tried to pull a fast one right under my nose!"

The chief investigator, feeling that he had been duped, finally dropped all pretense of refined civility and vented his ire in loud cursing.

"I know this handwriting! This letter was written by that bastard who killed himself last month by slitting open his carotid artery. That's it, no mistaking it!"

Those several sets of steel hooks, the miscellaneous contents of the professor's desk drawer and the indecipherable notebook were all sent to the responsible unit for analysis. After a long time, they came out with their formal appraisal:

> The pieces of metal found in the drawer are all parts of "Empress" brand door locks. Furthermore, each metal part bears clear traces of having been sawed, filed, chiseled, hammered or otherwise manipulated in the process of being taken apart and broken down for analysis.
>
> The numbers recorded in the notebooks represent the nearly ten thousand possible states of the cylinder of said lock as constituted by the permutations of the sequence and lengths of its six tumblers; and, the general formula for opening the lock as derived from the above. The hook diagrams are the simplest key components derivable from the formula.
>
> Following the sequences prescribed for each set of six-digit numbers in the notebook, we have grouped the six sets of steel wire hooks into all possible combinations and then experimented with them on all the "Empress" locks we have in storage. The results have yielded success in opening every lock without exception.
>
> The "Empress" door lock is a new type of lock reserved for official use in China after the incorporation during the last few years of comprehensive improvements over its model, the 1940 German product called the "Swastika Brand" security lock.

79.114 A Soldier In The Tianshan Mountains\fn{by Li Binkui (1945-)} Heyang County, Shanxi Province, China (M) 12

Plucking up courage, I hitch-hiked all by myself and arrived at Dry Gully. I headed straight for the troops' quarters, but to my great disappointment I found the barracks deserted, for the soldiers had all gone to the worksite in the depth of the Tianshan Mountains.

In the whole hostel, which was merely a few rows of prefabs, there was only one other guest. She was a rather attractive woman of about thirty, with an oval face and fine features. She had a little white flower pinned on her black woollen jacket. What puzzled me, however, was that her eyes were swollen with tears. She was mumbling to herself:

"Haizhou, I shouldn't have left you. I've let you down."

The fierce wind was roaring over the vast Gobi Desert in the sandstorm and dust was swirling everywhere. I pushed the table and the spare bed board against the window and the door to give them proper support. Then I put on a gauze mask, and lay on the bed fully clothed. I stared blankly at the ceiling.

I had asked my factory management for permission to come and attend the conference on the improvement of shears in Xinjiang, because Zhitong had written to me several times, saying:

"Please come, Qian. It's a good chance to see for yourself how we soldiers live and work in the Tianshan Mountains. I'm sure you'll be able to understand me better after this."

The evening I set off, his mother came to see me with a large bag of toffees and asked me to give it to him personally.

It was bad enough, this sandstorm raging outside the troops' headquarters. What the devil would it be like up in the mountains? It so happened that Han, the Fifth Company Commander had just come down to the hostel to see the young woman. So I began wondering whether I should ask him to give the sweets to Zhitong. Then I decided that I shouldn't as he had phoned Zhitong shortly after my arrival, shouting merrily into the receiver:

"Deputy Battalion Commander, your girl-friend is here to see you. All the way from Peking! She has brought with her a bag of wedding sweets!"

Oh, my gracious! For three months, I had not written him even a short note. I came here simply because I wanted to put an end to our whole affair. There was a good deal of truth in what my friend Xiao Tian had said. He pointed out that it would be another year before Zhitong, now thirty-one, came to see his relatives in Peking and that if I were to wait till then to let him know how I felt, it would mean another year's debt of emotion, so to speak. But what could I possibly say when I saw him again, here? Better write him a letter instead. That was a good idea! I threw off my quilt and got out of bed.

"Comrade Zheng Zhitong," I began. But what an awkward address! And my words sounded cold and heartless. No, I should have written "Dear Zhitong." Every time I began my letter with his name, he would appear in my mind: a stalwart young man with a pair of penetrating eyes. His exploding merry laughter would also ring in my ears. At this moment I seemed to see him standing beside me, fondling my black hair and saying to me, "Qian, it is awfully heartless of you! I've made up my mind to go back to Peking with you. I'll never leave you again."

"Impossible," I said to myself. Then I changed my mind as I pursued my thoughts. "Why be so pessimistic when you are coming to meet him in the mountains?" I argued within myself. Many a time had I argued thus and now I went over the arguments all over again.

Suddenly, I hurled down my pen, crumbled the paper and flung myself onto the bed. I began weeping. Inside, the lamp cast its dim, pale light on the young woman who looked like a bronze statue lying down; outside, the wind howled all night long vehemently shaking the low hut.

Early the next morning, a leading comrade from the worksite arrived in a jeep and went away with the woman guest I was feeling so miserable and began pacing the room, when Company Commander Han rushed in, his weather-beaten face lit up with a mysterious smile. He handed me a flattened matchbox, on which were these words:

Qian, sorry to have kept you waiting. Something has cropped up and needed immediate attention. See you tomorrow.
Zhitong

The scratchy handwriting obviously was a sign of the great hurry he must have been in. I felt uneasy.

"What could have happened?" I wondered.

"Apparently, there hasn't been any transport service for the past couple of days," said Han. His hasty explanation and the white flower on the young woman's jacket increased my anxiety. I could not wait a minute longer. I wished I could see him right away.

"Let's go at once!" I said and hurried out.

Without the slightest hesitation, I climbed into the cabin of a lorry, which was loaded with food supplies.

*

The lorry was racing into the mountains. The asphalt road, wider than I had expected, took a serpentine course along the mountainside. All around were dense woods of firs which blotted out the sun; at the bottom of the valley flowed a river carrying with it chunks of ice. Because the road was not yet open to traffic, there were only a few trucks passing by. The gloomy ravine was quiet and chilly.

So this was the road built by Zhitong! This was the road which many a time his letters had made me visualize in my excited imagination! A new feeling came over me, as if I had entered the world of poetry or some dreamland. Indeed, our romance was like a dream …

In 1971, there was a great stir in our school. At the meeting convened with a view to urging the school-graduates to go to the countryside, someone suddenly expressed his doubts.

"We school-graduates should certainly receive re-education from the poor and lower-middle peasants," he remarked. "But what about the problem of unemployment in China?"

The whole school was stunned and Zhitong's name spread around the campus. A meeting was then called to criticize him. Everyone was curious to see what that bold, unorthodox, reactionary element would do. By a stroke of luck, I was the first to denounce him. But my solemn speech, reinforced by gesticulating, was interrupted by giggles from the audience. I glowered at them in my indignation and found Zheng Zhitong sitting in the middle of the first row. He was shaking his close-shaved head superciliously, his face turned upward, as if he had nothing to do with the meeting. So, after this, the meeting was not taken too seriously. I took him to the Red Guards' headquarters.

"Trying to be different and provocative, eh?" I demanded, banging the table.

"What about you? A girl with a boy's haircut, aren't you trying to be different and provocative?" he sneered and looked at me with his piercing eyes.

I blushed, my lips blue with rage, but I couldn't find any words for a retort. A few days later, Zheng Zhitong put up a big character poster announcing that he would live and work in the countryside of Shaanxi, the sacred place of the Chinese revolution.

He and I happened to have been assigned to the same village. I felt triumphant. He had, after all, repented and volunteered to re-educate himself!

"Zheng Zhitong, you should have stayed behind for your employment prospects," I said to him, tongue in cheek, on the way to the countryside of Shaanxi. “What on earth has made you choose the Loess Plateau?”

“Do you know how the Americans developed their Western areas?” he laughed and went on. “Look at our forefathers who went to the border areas and kept watch on the frontier!”

I ignored his remarks and chuckled to myself.

Then he burst into laughter. I had never heard a laugh so strange and so loud ever since I was born. I was annoyed; but some of the schoolmates cheered him, others whistled and even stamped the floor.

“Don’t be conceited!” I cursed under my breath. “I may be a junior middle school graduate, but I look down upon those college students or even their professors. You have got nothing to be proud of. You are dull-minded, like a sturdy bull.”

Two years went by. All the political movements had not turned anything for the better. School graduates, bottles in hand, tried to cultivate influential people in order to get themselves transferred back to Peking. Those with their precious connections jeered at me and left; those without vented their spleen on me for the simple reason that I had taken the lead in upholding principles.

My enthusiasm was gradually waning, and finally 1 became disillusioned too. Since I had refused to wheedle my way back to Peking, I had no other alternative but to stick it out. I wished I were dead! In retrospect, I could not help feeling sorry for what I had done to Zheng Zhitong. So I began observing how he reacted to things around. He was no longer what he used to be: no inspiring speeches, no high-sounding comments. He became taciturn; day in and day out he farmed in the fields and didn’t say a word even at meals. All his spare time was devoted to the perusal of philosophical books or magazines, which he kept under his pillow and worn-out mattress. There was a deep frown on his brow all day long, and he was lost in thought as if he had to solve all the world’s problems.

One summer afternoon, there was a sudden rainstorm and presently water was cascading from the eaves. A thunderbolt struck an elm tree in the courtyard. Zheng Zhitong, barefooted, in his vest and shorts, was making his way down the village. Sheer danger and stupidity! I cried and rushed out into the rain, chasing him. I spotted him standing on a precipice gesticulating, looking at the sky. When I had come close, I heard him reciting a poem of the Song period:

The great river flows eastward, washing away traces of the great men, generations past …

“Are you crazy?” I ran up and caught his arm, wondering how I had plucked up my courage.Perplexed, he looked at me and said:

“You yourself are crazy, too.”

“You must have gone mad rushing into the rainstorm like this. Aren’t you trying to kill yourself?”

“Killing myself? I’m just having a rain bath in the storm!” He looked calm but serious as he uttered every word clearly. I tried to size him up agan. When he realized what I had been worrying about, he burst into his usual ear-piercing laughter.

“You are making a fool of yourself, Cultivator,” he said. (Cultivator was the name I chose for myself when I began work in the village.) “The open country, now glorying in this lightning, rainstorm and howling wind, is a poem in itself! It has bred heroes for so many generations. Why should we be scared and stay away from these testing forces of nature, here in this very sacred place of the revolution which has given us a new China? Come along, let’s have a walk!”

His romantic and warm words drove away my cold and for the first time I had a glimpse of his strength of mind and purity of heart.

We walked chattering idly, for two hours or so. Later I got a high fever, which lasted a few days. To make things I even worse, he came up sneezing and said to me, “I find that I have been sloppy and undisciplined. I should live a soldier’s, life. I’ll join the army.”

I didn’t want him to leave me; I didn’t know why. So I said to him sarcastically that he was only trying to zigzag back to Peking.

“Nonsense! Some people may do it for personal gain, but I join the army in order to know more of our society.”

In my desperation I reminded, him, “You were criticized and disciplined at school, weren’t you?”

Immediately, he bit his middle finger and wrote on a piece of paper:

"Man should go out to face the world."
He decided to present if to the army officers who were recruiting in the area.
"All right," I said with tears in my eyes. "You can all leave me. I'll kill myself."
He replied sternly, giving me a good dressing down:
"Suicide! It's very nice of you to say that! Look at those country folk. They supported the revolutionary wars whole-heartedly. And now they're still hungry. They can barely find enough black soya beans or millet to fill up their stomachs. What can they do? Commit suicide? Crawl to the cities or towns and try to live and work there? My dear Cultivator, over the past few years I have seen clearly for myself the plight of those who have a low station in life. Probably I feel more miserable than you do. The 'cultural revolution' may ruin us, but it is likely that some real fine men will come out of it. We should think hard and look into things and work for the benefit of our country and the people."
I knew him well: a man who would pursue an unswerving course once he felt he had made the right decision. So with tears in my eyes, I walked with him for three kilometres and saw him off. He left. His unit was stationed at Qaidam in Qinghai. It was extremely cold there and people had to wear cotton-padded coats all the year round. He wrote me a few letters, but they were all impersonal. My heart turned cold. And yet who could ever forget the very first person to whom one had lost one's heart?

*

The lorry raced on, leaving the fir woods far behind. After we had gone up a frozen river, there came into view a huge glistening slope and a snow-covered mountain ridge. Suddenly, the sky looked wider, with a deeper blue set off against the white sheen of snow.
In 1977 I was transferred to Peking. One winter evening I attended a party at Xiao Tian's home and danced till midnight. When I got home, I pushed open the door, which was unlocked. I found my mother moaning in bed, surrounded by my father, younger brother and sister and a soldier. Upon seeing me, the soldier called:
"Cultivator Li."
His resonant. voice gave me a start. Zheng Zhitong, it was Zhitong! He still remembered the name I gave myself when we were working in the village.
"Your mother fell down when she was trying, to get on a crowded bus and hurt her side," my father explained. It was Zheng who carried her home on his back. My mother forced herself to sit up and said:
"He wanted to leave until he heard you were my daughter."
I wondered if I was in a dream-land. He looked tall and sturdy in his uniform. His square face suggested masculine strength. There seemed to be a hunter's toughness about him. He was looking me up and down. Then our eyes met.
It was an embarrassing moment, all right, but my mother had to go on.
"Qian's still single. She snubs anyone who would mention the word marriage. How about you? Have you got a family?"
As he rubbed his hands in great embarrassment, my heart was throbbing. After a long while he stammered:
"It is a rule in the army that unmarried soldiers have a leave every two years. Our commander insisted that I not return until I have found myself a wife."
I could hardly suppress a giggle; I was relieved. My younger sister sniggered so hard that Zhitong blushed.
The night deepened, and there was not a soul in the street when I walked him out of the alley.
"Come again on Sunday."
"Sorry, I'm afraid I can't. My leave is over."
"You mean you have found a wife?" No sooner had I said this than I regretted having made such a flippant remark. Smiling bitterly, he said:
"It is hard to win the heart of a girl here in Peking. Who wants to marry a foot-slogger like me from Xinjiang?"
"Oh, come off it, officer," I said jovially, pretending to be casual. "I'm afraid you are too choosy."
"Nonsense!" he hastened to explain. "I don't want girls to be introduced to me. I prefer a girl who once worked with me and therefore understands me." His eager eyes looked into my face.
Disconcerted, I looked away, pretending to tidy my hair. Both of us stood speechless, each waiting for the other to speak, our hearts beating faster. But Zhitong was a man of remarkable self-control and, having looked at his watch, he shook my hand and left.
The day Zhitong returned to the army, I went to the railway station to see him off. On the way back his mother kept grumbling:
"Now he is deputy battalion commander, and a model officer of the engineer corps, but what is the use of that?

He is twenty-nine and still single. Nowadays soldiers are nothing but trash in the eyes of the girls. Even country girls won't have them; they were looking for city boys! Who'll follow him to Xinjiang? Alas!"

Often, in the still of the night, the twinkling stars reminded me of the old days Zhitong and I shared in the countryside. At last I could not bear waiting any longer. I wrote him a letter trying to find out how he felt. One month passed, and then another, without any reply from Xinjiang. I got so cross that I wouldn't allow anyone to mention his name.

Barely two months later, came the spring of 1978. One day after work my younger sister came home and, making face at me, said:

"Great news! I just ran into Zheng Zhitong in the subway. He is studying at a military academy. He asked after you."

"Did he? I'm not interested."

Feeling snubbed, she turned away.

That evening Zhitong turned up suddenly and he was all smiles. Indifferently, I showed him to my room, deliberately avoiding his eyes.

"I know you feel annoyed," he said, trying to make amends.

I began to yield. But when I asked him why he didn't answer my letter, his smile vanished and on his face appeared the familiar frown. After a while, he said decidedly:

"We soldiers are straightforward. I hope you don't mind what I'm going to say even if in doing so I'm making a blunder. Before the "cultural revolution," soldiers from the border areas or the northwestern plateaus were held in high esteem. They would introduce themselves readily, sticking out their chests, when they took lodgings or looked for girl-friends. 'I'm from the border areas.' For that statement alone would make people admire them. But now we have to say humbly, 'I'm from the border areas; you may not like that.'" He breathed heavily, his face reddened with rage.

"To tell you the truth, I don't need any sympathy; nor do I need charity," he continued. "When I was in Peking last time, I was fed up with the cool detachment some people displayed for soldiers. I simply can't stand such insults!" He banged at the table, his body trembling all over.

"Well, you can't stand it, so you suppose I can?" I retorted.

"Cultivator, I know it's not easy for you to be transferred to Pekiing. Why should I be in the way of your future happiness? So—"

"So what? Why bother to explain, since you think you know all?" That was all I could say. My sarcastic words silenced him. Several times, he rose to go, but dawdled and sat down again, lowering his head in great embarrassment. After I calmed down, I regretted having hurt him so much. Obviously, he had all along loved me, but he didn't like to put me in a dilemma. Probably he had suffered a great deal after reading my letter and it was long before he regained his self-control. But in the end he could come up only with a lame explanation which was more like a confession. A man of his sense of self-respect must have passed through terrible ordeals putting up with a girl's sarcasm! I began to feel uneasy.

Spring, after all, was a season for love. So let me shut my eyes and be carried away by the current of emotion. Let me be driven to where he was. I prayed that it wouldn't lead to misfortune.

*

The lorry was racing on and on. The red sun peeped out from the clouds. Its golden rays fell on the white snow, which sent back dazzling, bright lights. Newcomers naturally compared the beauty of the snow scene to that of a charming girl. Little could they imagine that at the shout of "Avalanche!" its ugly face would show itself glorying in its destructive power.

As Zhitong had foreseen, my mother, though delighted to see us in love, was worried that Xinjiang was too far away. My younger sister, however, had other ideas. She believed that Zhitong would surely be posted to work in the academy and, even if that did not work out, he could still leave the army and return to Peking. Mimi, my best girl friend, urged me to give him up. She advised me:

"Why, things have changed. It's no longer fashionable to court a foot-slogger. If I were as pretty as you, I would certainly choose a high official, an overseas Chinese, or at least a college graduate. Give him up!" Xiao Tian even went so far as to make fun of me by saying:

"Hey, why don't you let us meet your hero lover?"

Since Zhitong didn't mind my friendship with Xiao Tian, I decided to introduce him to my circle of friends. When we arrived, Mimi and some others were dancing. She said saucily, "How marvelous to have a guest from Xinjiang, a land of song and dance! Come on, give us a performance!"

The others were laughing heartily. I felt humiliated. Who would have thought that Zhitong would accept the request! Casually, he began waltzing with me. He danced with grace, following the rhythm of the sweet music, and moved lightly and nimbly almost like a dragonfly skimming the surface of the water. I was fascinated by his elegance. Gently, he gave me a sweet smile and whispered, "Shall we go to a concert next time?" Indeed, my cup of happiness was full.

Xiao Tian felt jealous. Snapping his fingers, he cried:

"That's no good. Let's have some real music."

"Let's have Good Wine and Coffee," one of them echoed. The tape recorder started playing and all at once a trembling voice, more like crying, wailed:

Who loves me?
Who will love me?

Mimi was now swaying her sensual hips, her gilt necklace rippling, and, making eyes at Zhitong, invited him to dance with her. Zhitong knitted his brows, looking very displeased. "Sorry, I must be off now." Then he swept out of the room, slamming the carved door.

I ran after him and soon caught up with him; but before I could say anything, he bawled:

"No need to explain! I won't listen anyway! That's no recreation. They are a rotten lot, bored and frustrated. What would our soldiers in Tianshan think if they saw such rot?"

Tianshan again! I was sick to death of it.

"Do you love me or your Tianshan? Your buddies may think whatever they like. It's none of my business!" I mounted my bicycle and pedaled away. He was standing there, still fuming. It served him right!

After this, for two whole weeks we didn't see each other. Often I skipped supper. I picked up an English text-book and tried to read but my mind was elsewhere. It was dreary weather. There was no wind, and the heat was stifling. Then he suddenly turned up with two pink tickets in his hand.

"There is a concert tonight. Let's go."

He seemed to be in high spirits, as if nothing had ever happened between us.

"Go away! I'm trying to get some sleep." I was lying in bed and pulled the quilt over my head. He kept silent for a long while. It was heart-rending to hear his chair creaking.

"All right," he said at last. "I'm sorry I was rude, but I do think that you have changed a great deal over the past few years. You have lost your spiritual mainstay," he said gently and every word of his touched the chord of my heart.

I had to admit that he was right. There was no need for him to remind me of the days I spent in the countryside. I had been feeling low since I returned to Peking. Work, meals and wages had somehow become the routine of my life. I felt empty after the parties at Xiao Tian's home. As a way out, I sometimes shut myself up in my room, practicing calligraphy or reading English. Late at night, lying in bed, I felt as if I were in a boat which had lost its direction, drifting away in the ocean. Sometimes I did want to exert myself and find some real purpose in life. But what could one do? True, the Gang of Four had been overthrown, but what did that mean to me? I had had a terrible time working like a slave in the countryside for six years, but some people still thought that had been a completely unnecessary sacrifice. Now look at Xiao Tian! He escaped being sent to the countryside by enlisting in the army through his influential connections. He remained in the city and even managed to join the Party. Then, once again through mysterious channels, he had found an easy job in the Tourist Bureau! My transfer to Peking couldn't have been made possible without my appeal to him—I had to put on a forced smile when I went to see him. The fact that I had taken the lead in going to the countryside was still a laughing-stock. So much for all that talk about noble ideals and revolution! What a joke!

"Well, reality is never as rosy as we would like to imagine," Zhitong sighed. Then he began to give an account of what he himself had gone through over the past few years.

"I simply thought the army a paradise when I first joined up in 1973. Shortly after I was enrolled in a company, I was transferred to the regiment's spare-time propaganda team. Every day, when the soldiers were eating their meals the chickens raised by the regiment commander would come into the mess looking for food. Very soon, their droppings were everywhere. I was hot-tempered, as you know. So I flared up and on the spot killed one of them with a big broom. Then I put up a big-character poster at the entrance criticizing the comman-der. As a result, I was made to write a self-criticism and sent back to the company 'to be disciplined.' This drove me mad. To hell with the commander! A civilian official like him would have been labeled as a capitalist-roader, pure and simple; as my thought ran wild, I came to believe that our country was a hopeless case since a regiment commander could be so rotten.

"Later, our regiment was transferred to Xinjiang. The troops had hardly entered the mountains when they were caught in an awful snowstorm. Our trucks moved along at a snail's pace. For a day and a night we covered only five kilometres. Before long, we ran out of food. The orderly went under a truck and cooked some soya beans with a blowlamp for the commander. But he gave all the beans to the drivers. He also joined us in digging away the snow and pushing the trucks. I was so moved at the time that I could have shouted: 'Long live the commander!' For me there was no doubt that his was the very image of a veteran revolutionary. Afterwards, I often wondered what sort of man he really was; but the more I thought, the more perplexed I got.

"As time passed, I gradually found the answer: the worse after-effect of the 'cultural revolution' was that our ways of thinking had become mechanical. We tended to go to extremes. When you were praised, you were nothing but good; when criticized, you were anything but good. Girls wearing a boy's hair-cut and dancing the Loyal Dance were supposed to be the most radical; at present, however, wearing long hair and dancing rock-and-roll is thought to be a sign of the complete emancipation of mind.

"Things keep changing and you will soon learn the safest way is to follow the trend of the day. But I still don't see what is wrong with going down to the countryside and what is wrong with carrying out the revolutionary drive to build up the rural areas. Are we left now with nothing but broken dreams and a bitter past? If that were the conclusion reached by the young people of our generation, what could the country expect of them? How can the country build a new spiritual life on such an ideological ruin?"

One after another, his solemn words found their way into my heart and together with the patter of:the rain outside they brought me back to the days when I was a radical student, when Zhitong and I lived and worked on the northwestern plateaus. Oh, that unforgettable night, when he had a rain bath in the storm! And here in this room were the two of us again, of the same generation but now how different from each other! Why was I so bitter and frustrated, grumbling at the social injustice I had suffered, while all along he had been unswerving in his pursuit of the truth in life and found it! Failing to control myself, I began to cry.

Zhitong lifted the quilt gently and brushed my forehead and cheeks with his handkerchief. As if coaxing a child, he said soothingly:

"Ah I see you've embroidered the English words 'Good flight' on your quilt cover. It's careless of me not to have noticed that you have been learning English and studying hard."

"Boo, you are the greatest!" I retorted.

He gently held my hand in his own saying, "I'm not good enough for you, Qian. You're still the best!"

I must have appeared like a spoilt child and after a. while putting my hands around his neck, tried to sit up.
Since then I had been madly in love with him. One day we were rowing on the Kunming Lake at the Summer Palace, I was so overcome by emotion that I dropped a hint about marriage. He told me in all serjousness that he had to rejoin his men in a few days.

"Will you like to live with me in the mountains all your life?" he asked.

I had never thought of this before and my mind began to reel again.

*

"Hold on tight!" The driver's warning pulled me back to present from my reverie. I found the lorry moving along a not properly surfaced road. Glancing at my watch, I inquired anxiously:

"Are we getting near the worksite?"

"This is the Dotted-line District before us," the driver answered, his eyes fixed on the road ahead. His short mustache twitched faintly.

"Is your battalion stationed in the Dotted-line District?"

"Yes."

"Are you very busy?"

"Not really. Two shifts a day, twelve hours a shift, not including emergency work!" His sarcasm got on my nerves. A new recruit trying to impress people. That's all, I thought.

*

The lorry pulled up before piles of frozen rock and sandstones. We had arrived at last! But I began to feel uneasy and a little confused.

Han jumped down from the lorry, his lips betraying the effects of the cold. He told me that it was already 3,000 meters above sea-level and that the Dotted-line District was so named because it was impossible to make an on-the-spot survey of the precipices and the steep cliffs and therefore they had to map it out in dotted lines.

"Wait for me here. I'm going to find the deputy battalion commander." He started off running and moving nimbly among the rocks and finally joined the soldiers on the other side. I couldn't hear what they were talking about because of the howling wind. However, I could see one of them pointing somewhere in the mid-air. I looked up.

Good gracious! What did I see but a precipitous cliff such as I had never seen before? It tilted backward menacingly like an injured wild beast and it was puffing out clouds of smoke and vapor. Barely visible in the misty clouds was a snow-covered man clinging to the cliff unsteadily against the cold wind blowing in gusts. He was trying to hit an overhanging piece of a rock with a steel pole. Any minute he could be swept away like a fallen leaf.

"Well, could it be Zhitong?"

All of a sudden, I was overcome with fear. Hastily, I ran forward to get a closer look despite my benumbed legs.

"Stop, it's dangerous!" Han yelled, running towards me.

Before I realized what was going on, the whole valley was shaken by a thunderous crash. Instantly, thick clouds of dust and snow went up and Zhitong vanished from my sight. I screamed and, covering my eyes with my hands, fainted.

I didn't know how long it was before I came to and heard a familiar voice shouting, "What's happened? Is anyone hurt?" Then the voice was filled with surprise and delight, "Oh, how come you're here?" Han and others were chuckling.

I blushed and had a quick look at him. His appearance astonished me. He was wearing a worn-out osier hat, with a broad, thick safety-belt fastened around his waist over a threadbare cotton-padded coat. His galoshes were covered with slush, his face and body with scraps of ice and rock. But for his black shining eyes, I wouldn't have been able to recognize him. I was deeply grieved.

Oddly enough, on seeing me, he did not appear as excited as I had expected. I could still remember the night shortly before he finished his study at the academy. It was eleven at night when somebody was knocking on my door. Something dreadful must have happened, I thought. But it was only Zhitong, who said casually:

"Nothing the matter, only I desperately want to see you. Don't ask me why, but I've got the premonition that we'll never see each other again." I walked with him for the rest of the night. It was not until then that I realized that he had been madly in love with me, too …

And now, it might be a woman's instinct, but I was certain that he was preoccupied by some troubles; otherwise he wouldn't have been so indifferent.

"Let Han take you to the battalion headquarters," he said coldly. "I've to look after the work here first."

"Just as you please!" was my colder answer. He hesitated for a while, and I could see he wanted to talk to me. But then he changed his mind. Stepping up to Han, he said:

"The out-hanging rock has been removed. Tell the soldiers to set their minds at ease. You must get the roadbed cleared before four this afternoon. You'll be in charge now. I'm going to call up the political instructor."

The ice and snow scraps swirling in the wind were beating full in my face. Before long, my legs were benumbed with cold, but my heart felt colder. When he finished talking with Han, I picked up my bag, getting ready to go with him. He seemed to take no notice of me, as he headed for a dug-out to make his phone call. The sympathy I felt for him was now turned into resentment. He must have heard something about what I had been doing and guessed why I had come. So he was giving me the cold shoulder on purpose!

Shortly after we parted from each other last time, his regiment commander came to Peking to attend a conference. He paid me a personal visit and urged me to get married and live in the barracks. It so happened that Mimi had been pestering me with the request to accept a date with one of Xiao Tian's classmates, who was due to study abroad and whose father was a high-ranking official. In a dilemma, I turned down both. Soon after this Zhitong wrote to me, insisting that I should break with Xiao Tian and Mimi. Alas, what a predicament I was thrown in! My younger sister, who thought highly of Zhitong, commented that he was a fine man but would make a lousy husband …

Now, so much the better, I thought. Since he had deliberately left me out in the cold, I would tell him clearly what was on my mind and then leave him in the afternoon. This damned place was not fit for living.

No, I began to change my mind. No, I'd better think it over again before rushing to a final decision. Such a break would mean a severe blow to a person's most tender feelings. What would become of him then?

Bang! Another blast somewhere. I looked at the cliff whose overhanging rock had just been removed. Zhitong came running up and, passing me his sweaty helmet, lifted my bag and turned away. Not until we were safely out of the Dotted-line District did he explain to me:

"I know you were anxious to meet me down in the hostel. I was in the worksite when Han phoned me. So I scribbled a note for the driver to take down to you. The Dotted-line District is perilously covered with scraps of frozen rock and there have been a few accidents. As there hasn't been any transport service for the past few days fuel and equipment cannot be brought here. Besides, we are running out of food supplies."

Though he tried to force a smile, his tone betrayed his great worry. I should have said something to lighten the awkward atmosphere, but suddenly I felt suffocated and was going to throw up. He looked at me and said most casually:

"You'll be all right. It's high altitude. Newcomers always feel it. As a rule, women suffer less than men."

I squatted at the roadside, fuming. I retched but didn't throw up anything, for I had not had a meal since the previous evening. He bent to pat, or rather beat, me on the back. Glowering at him, I protested:

"Not so hard!"

It was a summer's day after all. As we descended, I noticed the snow was melting. There were patches of green here and there on the slopes. Little flowers were peeping out between the icicles by the roadside; even the sun seemed warmer. Zhitong's sense of humor came back. He skipped and leapt and slid on the ice, asking me questions all the time. He was most interested in what was going on in Peking, and was filled with envy upon hearing about the recent performance of a foreign symphony orchestra.

"How very nice if one could get some live television coverage and watch the performance here in the mountains!"

Was he making roundabout references to the purpose of my coming here or dropping it hint about coming back to Peking?

As the snow melted, water kept trickling down the rugged slopes. The dripping sound could be heard everywhere. I could hardly find a dry place to put my feet on.

"You'll sprain your ankles, walking in your high-heels. Let me carry you across!"

I could not tell whether he was joking or mocking at me. Pretending not to have heard him, I lifted my foot, trying to step on a stone.

"That won't do!" he chuckled, winking at me. "You'd better put on my galoshes. I'll walk barefoot."

In a huff, I leapt forward valiantly, when a truck passed by at top speed, splashing the slush. Startled, I fell off the stone, spattered all over, my feet landing in a puddle. Zheng Zhitong laughed until tears came into his eyes.

"Serves you right! Now you know our Tianshan Mountains, eh?"

What a cruel and boisterous laugh! That was too much for me. So sneering, I retorted, "Yes, I know you only too well, don't I?"

Shocked, he ran up, all in a fluster.

"I was only teasing you. Why did you say that?"

I didn't reply, trudging mechanically along the muddy road, my mind having become a blank. He glanced at me from time to time without saying anything. He sighed audibly …

*

Their battalion headquarters consisted of only a few bleached tents pitched on a terrace leveled on a slope. At the entrance was a frame, over three meters high, made of three pieces of wood. In the middle of the horizontal piece, to my surprise, hung a big white paper flower; on each of the two vertical ones was posted a long, worn-out, sad-looking elegiac line, written in black characters on white paper. These lines read:

He shed his blood on Tianshan;
for what did he lay down his life?
For the name of his country and the army.
He lived ten years away from his wife;
where did he find happiness?
In the union of countless couples outside.

I recognized Zhitong's firm, strong handwriting immediately. He paused before it for a short while, looking melancholy again.

"Someone has died?" I was just wondering, when the political instructor came out to meet us. Promptly heads appeared at the door curtains and window flaps. It seemed as if everyone were looking at me. The messenger was staring at my sunglasses. I felt completely out of place among those smelly, boisterous soldiers. I sat at the table, without saying a word.

“Why, a girl from Peking shouldn’t be so shy, should she?”

“Stop talking nonsense! She is feeling car sick. Have some sweets, please.” Zhitong managed a smile and tried to get. me out of the embarrassment. But when they saw the sweets, they became even more cheerful.

“Good, you’re throwing a party before the wedding ceremony, eh? So much the better! We’ll visit your bridal chamber for fun, all the same! Following tradition, you know. You’d better warn your fiancée beforehand. We are a rough bunch and she shouldn’t lose her temper, when we celebrate your wedding.”

Zheng Zhitong kept nodding his head all the time. Finally, the political instructor came to our rescue. Beaming with joy, they went back to work. Then came the last straw when I overheard Zhitong and the political instructor arranging my lodgings.

“How ridiculous! The whole lot of you!” I stopped them as he was about to enter the tent.

“They teased you because they were pleased to meet you,” he explained. “You see, Han has spread the news that you are coming here to marry me!” he said, laughing to himself.

“Gosh!” I interrupted. “Who told him that I’d come to marry you?”

His face froze at my impertinent remarks; he wanted to say something but did not. He snorted, shook his head, and went out.

As the sun’s rays came into the padded tent through a small window, it was getting so hot that I took off my woolen sweater and still perspired profusely. When Zhitong came back again, he lifted the bucket of melted ice off the stove and smothered the fire by putting a layer of damp coal on it.

“That’s the weather here in the mountains. You go through the four seasons in a single day and have to change your clothes accordingly.” After washing his face, he took out a pair of slippers from under the bed, saying, “Put them on. I’ll take your leather shoes out in the sun.” So he had softened up.

“I don’t like to change my shoes,” I sneered.

“Take them off. They are soaked through. You’ll catch cold.” Then he coaxed: “You are the same stubborn girl, aren’t you? All right, I was wrong, OK?” He stooped to unfasten my shoe laces. My legs jerked and nearly hit him on his forehead. I was nervous, but he was still squatting in front of me, his intelligent and gentle eyes staring into my face. He seemed to me like a kind elder brother cajoling his mischievous little sister. I was moved.

Indeed, he looked lean and haggard! Long exposure to the sun and the storms on the plateau had tanned his skin. With sallow cheeks and a stubbly beard, he looked like a man of forty. His bright eyes were blood-shot from excessive fatigue and anxiety and his voice had become husky. Since we got to the battalion headquarters, he had been so busy looking after me that he had not thought of changing his own clothes. Now the melting ice began dripping down from his padded coat. I could not let him suffer any longer.

“Well, I’ll change my shoes, then,” I said in a reconciled tone. “You’d better change your clothes, too. How terrible you look in them!”

He grinned. “No hurry! I’ll have to see about supper first.”

“Aren’t you crazy? Take off your padded coat!” I demanded and tried to strip it off, but he quickly moved away. I felt annoyed. After a long while, he complied most reluctantly, grinning sheepishly, with his hands behind his back.

I pretended to ignore him at first and then, quite abruptly, dived behind his back and pulled apart his hands. I was stunned! Good gracious! His side had been seriously injured, his shirt was stuck to the unhealed wound, and around the blackened scabs were traces of blood and sweat. So that was why he had always been wearing a broad leather belt! He took it calmly, however.

“Nothing serious!” he said, trying to make me feel at ease. “Only a scratch, that’s all.” It was obvious that he had been working without letting anybody know about it. I dipped a towel into the hot water and loosened the smelly shirt from the skin by pressing the towel hard against it. When I applied balm to his wound, my tears kept dropping on his bare back. I didn’t quite see why he should risk his life in so wretched a place.

Zhitong was leaning on the table, listening to my complaints quietly. It was long before he spoke again.

“There was a terrible avalanche in the Dotted-line District last Sunday,” he said slowly. “Yu Haizhou, political instructor of the Fifth Company, was killed; the rock was all red with his blood. The accident happened when his wife had just come to visit him. She is staying in the tent down there.”

“So that’s the woman I met in the hostel!” My teeth chattered. Zhitong heaved violently as he nodded and then, straightening up, said:

“They married young. Their son is already two years old, but they had lived apart from each other for ten years. Yu had always been in poor health. This time all his wife wanted to bring him was a bag of Chinese medicinal herbs; who would have thought …” He broke down.

"I got injured when I was digging out the corpse. It's nothing serious. As a matter of fact, Qian, the very thought of Yu's death helps me to stick it out. You didn't write me a single word for months. This drove me mad." Excited, he turned round and grasped my hands and, biting his lips, made great efforts to curb his emotion, but his eyes were still swollen with tears.

"Qian, you must stay here longer this time. I've got so much to talk to you …"

I felt sort of choked. What should I say to him in face of his outburst of emotion? I was feeling guilty and ashamed as well as embarrassed. Unable to endure such mental torture any longer, I flung myself into his arms and cried. I wept and kept knocking my head against his broad chest as I urged him:

"Let's go back! I'll do anything so long as you leave the army. I can't bear to see you suffer so much."

He smiled. Holding my face in his rough hands, he wiped the tears off my face with his fingers and said, "That's real baby talk. Do you think I'll leave?"

"Why not?" I asked, without giving him a chance to explain, and went on. "Who knows, indeed who cares, that you soldiers are risking your lives? By hook or by crook, lots of ex-service cadres are trying to get back and work in Peking. There are people who don't want to live in their own country, too. Xiao Tian and some others are now applying for passports. Don't be a fool, Zhitong! You'd better get out of Tianshan and take a look at the outside world!" My voice had become a shout.

"Different people have different ways of looking at the world. For me, I believe some people have to build roads so that others could travel more easily. As for Xiao Tian and his like, better forget about them." Zhitong gave a grim smile and, turning to me, said warmly:

"Qian, let's talk about ourselves."

Just then the driver who had given me a lift up the mountains called for Zhitong. He went out of the tent. What a nuisance!

I leaned against the desk, my mind in a muddle. There was a faint fragrance oozing out of the snowdrops on his clean desk. My eyes fell on a photo of a smiling girl whose black eyes revealed a mixture of annoyance and conceit. It was me; Zhitong took the picture when we were rowing on the Kunming Lake at the Summer Palace. That day for the first time he hugged me tight in his strong arms. I couldn't believe at the time that a soldier like him would be capable of such passionate love. He kissed my hair, smiling:

"Why call us foot-sloggers? Are we all brawn and no brain? Actually, we understand love the most."

"Talking big, eh?" I teased him, making a face.

"It's true. One will never join the army unless one can love others." He had a heart of gold and he loved me truly and intensely. But was I that selfish and that mean? Why couldn't we play our part if we lived in the city? Didn't I deserve some happiness that I could call my own?

Zhitong came back, looking worried. He kept pacing the room, his heavy steps foreboding a storm. Gingerly, I asked him what had happened. Scowling, he bawled:

"That's really too much! A recruit who has been in the army for only one year bas applied for demob and he has been making so much fuss about it. Nowadays, men recruited from the countryside want to quit, complaining about the shortage of labor-hands in their families, now that the "system of responsibility" is widely practiced; those from cities or towns simply don't like to work in the army. Some even deserted this year. Officers don't feel at ease, serving in the border areas. Such people don't give a fig about the country's problems. They care only for themselves. Let him go and good riddance!"

After venting his spleen, he tapped at his own forehead regretfully and sat down in a chair, looking distracted.

By now the messenger had prepared a rich dinner, but neither of us felt like eating anything. The messenger was a little bewildered. To cheer me up, he brought me a marmot, which he had caught. Zhitong shook his head, smiling wrily and then beckoned me to go out with him for a walk.

*

Down the mountain, turning a bend, one could see a vast stretch of grassland. I could hardly believe my eyes. Grass rippled in the breeze and scarlet wild peonies showed off here and there against the wavy green. There in the distance many white tents were pitched on either bank of the Alstan River; from the bridge worksite came the hum of traffic and a medley of human voices.

Zhitong was in high spirits again. He inhaled deeply the fresh air and pulling me by the hand ran after a marmot. Soon I was out of breath and, clutching my chest, waved to stop him. Not until then did he stop running and throw himself on to the grass as if he were going to embrace the whole pasture.

"Qian, look at the lovely grass. After the road is built, the herdsmen won't have to worry about entering the mountains. The whole grassland will soon be turned into a mechanical stock-raising area." He was glorying in his visions.

"What is so good about living in the city? Pollution, noise, three generations of a family living in a small room; more people than flowers in parks, where two pairs of. lovers have to share one bench! Now here in the mountains, just look at this green land and all your worries, boredom and what-not will be gone in an instant. Of course, some would call me a nut. But I don't care." He flung his arms up and sat up. He hugged his legs, pondering. After a long while, he said as if to himself:

"You know, China produced a great traveler called Xuan Zang in the Tang Dynasty and again a famous navigator named Zheng He, in the Ming Dynasty. For the past century, however, our country has been bullied and disgraced. It is true that history is made by the people, but history, in its turn, can influence a nation's spirit. Are we in a rut now? Have we completely freed ourselves from the inferiority complex and obsequiousness that plague the people of the semi-colonial countries? People are usually content with things as they are and don't like to see any changes. Where is the spirit of the pioneer who works with great perseverance, the adventurer who keeps exploring new worlds, or the hero who wants to prove that his country is second to none in the world. Perhaps I'm going too far, but I do think it imperative to imbue the young people with such a spirit if we genuinely want to make our country strong each making his contribution in his own way. Don't you think so?"

I said nothing. I appreciated his words but quietly I was thinking of finding my way out. On the one hand, I realized I loved Zhitong more than I had ever before; several times I was on the point of saying I would marry him. On the other hand, I knew it was impossible to change his mind. Love was more than embraces and kisses. Separation, bringing up children, always on the move with the army—I simply did not have the spirit of an explorer. I couldn't afford to be a heroine again. Life was ruthless; I was not in a position to sum up the history of mankind and make my impact. Discussions of a nation's spirit meant to me no more than an increase of a few yuan in our bonus system. I fully accepted the simple truth that I was not born for greatness. And that it would be better for me to return to my snug nest for an easy life. What was wrong with that? But my misery drove me to despair. I really should leave him. But then I couldn't make up my mind.

The sun gradually sank behind the icy peaks. Zhitong walked on in silence. It was worse than calling me names. He stopped at Yu Haizhou's grave, overwhelmed with utter grief. I dared not glance at him.

Just then Doctor Zhao, the regiment commander's wife, turned up. She caught hold of my hand and said:

"Hey, I was looking for you up on the mountain. Come and stay with us tonight. Our clinic is not far, just beside the worksite. We've tidied up a tent for you. My old man says he wants to meet you."

"I've got only a day's leave and I've to get back today. Thank you all the same," I said to her politely, for I realized that I shouldn't stay and make Zhitong suffer any longer.

Disappointed, Doctor Zhao went away.

"Let's go! Hurry up!" Zhitong said firmly, suddenly making up his mind. "I'll have to go to the worksite at four."

Just then, the young messenger ran up, panting.

"Deputy battalion commander, the regiment commander asked me to tell you that you should stay at home and accompany"—he glanced at me and chuckled. Zhitong stopped him and said, "Hurry back and report to the commander that I'll be at the worksite soon."

"That won't do! You haven't had a meal, not even a wink of sleep; besides—"

"Nonsense! You hurry along!" Zhitong flared up suddenly, but the messenger murmured and didn't move. Zhitong was about to give him a dressing-down, but he changed his mind and, forcing a smile, said cordially, "Hurry up, will you? Don't you know there will be a meeting at the worksite?"

Disappointed, the messenger turned and made his way towards the worksite.

A bugle sounded. From the loudspeakers came the military music. Lines of soldiers, with tools on their shoulders and white flowers pinned on their chests, were heading for the Dotted-line District. As soon as I entered the barracks, I felt the solemn and stirring atmosphere. When Zhitong put on his safety-belt and took a small white flower from the drawer, something ominous shadowed my mind.

"What meeting are you going to hold? Why do you insist on going?" After hesitating for a short while, he said:

"The whole regiment is holding an oath-taking rally on the spot where the political instructor died. We'll swear to conquer the Dotted-line District. From today on I'll be acting as the political instructor of the Fifth Company. After the rally I'll take the soldiers to work. I must go, mustn't I?"

"Zhitong, you … you mustn't!"

I snatched the white flower from his hand.

"Give it back to me, Qian." He caught my hand angrily.

“No, I won’t!” Despite his fierce looks I burst out into tears and cried, “Zhitong, let’s leave this place, I beg of you. We’ll have a good talk and sort things out. I can’t live without you. I can’t.” I hugged his broad shoulders, looking at him imploringly. His chest heaved as emotion surged up within him. Through the window he gazed at the mountains in the distance. Finally, he said, weighing every word, his voice low and quivering:

“To tell you the truth, over the past six months I’ve been torn by indecision myself. I’ve suffered more than you have. There had been moments when I almost decided to quit. My mother, like you, has wept many, many times. Nevertheless, I’ve made up my mind and I must say to you that you shouldn’t mention my quitting again. Not long ago, a few officers and technicians went to inspect the roads and the patrol routes at the border. It was raining and by accident our jeep got bogged down in the mire near the watch tower across the border. When we tried to push the jeep out of the mud, they laughed, whistled and even took photos. They made their soldiers watch us pushing the jeep forward in the rain. They laughed at us for having these bad roads and poor equipment. This was an insult, not for me as an individual, but for the army and country as a whole. Isn’t it true? Now the big power to the North holds us in derision while the pint-sized country to the South tries to browbeat us. Some of our fellow-countrymen still fail to see that we are living under threats. Without a strong army, without the soldiers toiling and risking their lives to build and guard the border areas, there will be no national security, let alone the “four modernizations,” no personal happiness and sweet love. I know views on these things vary from man to man, I won’t impose mine on you. As a soldier of New China, I’d rather give up my life for our country’s modernized defence than be crushed down by the invaders’ tanks or armoured cars—”

“Oh, please, Zhitong,” I begged: “Don’t press me any more. Let me calm down and think it over again.” I threw myself into his arms, all my grievances erupting like a volcano.

Outside, a jeep horn hooted. Snow-flakes started dancing frantically again and soon the road was covered and the sky blotted out. I collapsed in the cabin of a lorry, which took me far, far away.

Bang! There came another sound of a blast. The army flag was fluttering in the cold wind and rumbling machines of all kinds made a thrilling melody. I couldn’t help sticking my head out of the cabin window. My eyes swept over the thousands of soldiers, as I tried to find Zhitong. Oh, over there in the Dotted-line District, high above on an outhanging piece of a rock was my dearest Zhitong waving to me, all white with snow except for the red star cap insignia shining liking a burning flame …

83.4 The Quadrangle Compound\fn{by Ling Chung (1945-   )} Chungking, Sichuan Province, China (F) 3

Mr. and Mrs. Hsin-tang Wei sit side by side on a Taiwan Highway Bus, speeding southward to Ken-ting National Park. Mrs. Ching-ching Wei who sits on the aisle seat is already fifty-three, but due to her constant endeavor to keep a fit figure, she retains a youthful look of early forties. Apparently she is very confident of her own appearance. Most middle-aged women would put on a loose one-piece to cover up their barrel-like figure. Yet Ching-ching puts on a thin, tight Chinese ch’i-p’ao gown; her voluptuous, curvaceous body is wrapped in brilliant bamboo green. The distinct features on her oval face remind one that she must once have been a renowned beauty. However, Time has engraved not only fan-shaped wrinkles at the corners of her eyes, but also between her eyebrows and at the corners of her mouth two vertical lines as sharp as the strokes of the Thin Gold calligraphy style.

She has suffered from the tedium of just sitting there for one and a half hours, she thinks. If she had known that the trip would be so boring, she would not have made such a fuss to take it. Two nights ago, she lay stiffly in bed and told him coldly,

“Look, we’ve been married for more than thirty years, but you haven’t taken me on one single trip. You, yourself, go on business trips, every two or three months. To Taichung, Taipei, and other places. Now our children have gone abroad to study. Have you ever once realized just how bored I’ve been?”

Staring at the water-stains on the ceiling, she envisions a black sedan, speeding on the smooth coastal highway; her husband’s superior and “Madame” leaning back comfortably on the back seat. Hsin-tang Wei is fifty-seven now. A section chief in the Civil Affairs Bureau, the position he is holding might be the highest one he can ever attain. Her dream that her husband would be promoted to a top position, with the privilege of a sedan car at his disposal, will not come true for the rest of her life.

“Where do you want to go?” he asks in a condescending, low voice.

“Madame” told her on the phone that one can enjoy the sparkling waves of the sea from the balcony outside the suite in a grand hotel. She says resolutely,

“To Ken-ting.” She switches off the bedside lamp with a snap. Turning her back toward him, she curls herself up as if this posture could keep them further apart.

"I will ask for leave tomorrow. We can set out the day after." His feeble voice crawls over the extensive darkness stretching between them.

The air-conditioner on the bus is so powerful that a chill comes over her bare arms. Looking outside the window, Hsin-tang Wei does not notice that she, shivering, is holding her arms. She says sarcastically,

"You can fetch my coat for me, can't you?"

Hsin-tang Wei stands up hastily. He is six feet tall, with lanky legs and arms. Due to his nervousness and the narrow seat, he stumbles and bounces back into his seat. Finally, he manages to stand steadily in the aisle to fetch the bag, but the bag gets stuck in the rack. She grumbles to herself,

"I've never seen such a clumsy man. His hands don't go with his legs. His body disagrees with his brain!"

He puts the coat over her shoulders, and at the touch of his bony fingers, like monkey]'s claws, the muscles of her arms tighten. She can't stand even such a slight touch.

*

When Mr. and Mrs. Wei arrive at the square of the Ken-ting Youth Activities Center, dusk has already set in. Only a few people can be found in the whole center, because it is not on a weekend. The red-tiled roofs, the white washed walls, and the streets paved with slabs are all enveloped in the gathering darkness. They look around in surprise. They used to hold opposite opinions on almost all matters, but at this moment, in their minds, as if cast under a spell, nearly identical notions emerge: without the cris-crossing alleys, the Chinese quadrangle compounds were built much too closely; all the trees here are so small that no long branches reach over the walls; the square should not be so bare and there should be a huge Yellow Fruit Tree under which a few old men sit chatting; the ground should not be meticulously clean, instead there should be dog-droppings and a chuckling hen passing by, followed by a herd of chicks. Everything about this center, which was modeled on an ancient town in China, is inaccurate, but their hearts are helplessly plunged into a profound longing for their hometown located in the central region of mainland China. Actually, they are unaware of the fact that their hometown, lurking in the subconsiousness, often sneaked into their dreams in the present form of the center: the quadrangle compounds loomed in throngs, without any human shape, nor any living creature, and only one's own footsteps trod the narrow alley …

After finishing their meal in the dining hall, they return to their compound Yin Chuan Hall and sit on the benches at a square wood table in the small living room of the west wing. Contrary to her normal behavior, Ching-ching is unexpectedly quiet. Hsin-tang Wei takes a sip of hot tea. Feeling warm, his lean face glows with a light flush. He says,

"When I was eleven, the Japanese devils bombed our town, Yao Shan. I hid under the wooden table in the hall, as our teacher had instructed us to do in case one couldn't find a better shelter. Fortunately, our compound was not blasted. My third uncle's compound was bombed. How miserable! My aunt was the only survivor."

"That very day my mother took me out of town to visit grandma. I was lucky," she says.

As recollections of childhood soften her expression, he becomes more and more at ease.

"You were only seven then, weren't you? You must have been an adorable darling!" he says.

She smiles at him with a bewitching glow which has long disappeared from her face. He stares at her and then says,

"Let's go to the yard to watch the moon."

He pushes the wooden door. It opens with a loud creak which resounds through the courtyard. As if in a trance, her soul drifts on the waves of sounds to a desolate quadrangle compound some thirty years ago. She says,

"That door in your home creaked exactly the same way. Very loud."

He studies her enchanted face very carefully and it dawns on him which door she meant. It was the uninhabited one among the many quadrangle compound in which his clan resided. Ever since his third uncle's family was wiped out, the compound has remained vacant.

"Were you frightened then?" he asks.

The details of the event arising in her mind, she giggles and says, "No, I wasn't frightened at all, but it was quite embarrassing."

In his mind, she emerges in a funny outfit: her body was wet all over, with nothing but a thin white vest sticking tightly to her skin.

They exchange hearty smiles and walk toward the center of the courtyard. The moon has not yet risen; only few stars are scattered in the vault of heaven. Since they are the only guests in the Yin Chuan Hall, the other three wings are all shrouded in darkness. They sit on their door-sill. Their adjoining shadows are cast on the pavement of the empty yard. They bend their minds in unison toward an imagined object—there should have been a decor in the center of the yard—a brown earthenware fish tank. He asks,

"I've been wondering all these years. That day when you visited our house, why on earth did you go to that uninhabited compound?"

"Well, because those men all gaped at me. The relative my mother and I visited that day was my uncle, the chief-steward serving your clan. Those who reported to him in his quarter were man-servants, drivers, and farm tenants. They stared at me in such a way that I had to slip out."

Grinning, Hsin-tang Wei is envisioning the young Ching-ching at sixteen: her figure was already curvaceous, her skin milky white and her features resembled that of Ch'en Yun-shang, the most popular movie star in the 1940's. No wonder those men stared at her lecherously.

She continues, "When I stepped into that compound, I saw in the center of the yard a fish tank in which hundreds of tadpoles swam. So I leaned against the tank to watch them. Suddenly a stone flew past me and hit the tank with a crack. I turned and saw a boy in khaki student uniform running toward the gate—"

"It was my third younger brother."

"When I turned my head, I lost my balance and fell. The water and tadpoles gushing from the broken tank splashed all over me. It happened that I did not wear a shirt and skirt, but a silk gown in off-white. Drenched, it stuck to my skin so that I looked practically naked. How could I go back like that? So, I tried all the doors in the compound. Only one door wasn't locked. I went inside and took off my gown. As I was wringing it, the door opened suddenly with a creak. Very loud—"

He interrupts her, his words full of wit, "Well, I came to look for a book. When I opened the door, a peerless beauty appeared in the darkness. She wore nothing but a brassiere in ancient style, she was, in fact, a fox spirit who came to seduce me …"

She feigns an angry look, coquettishly. "If I had known that you were such a rogue, I would not have married you. But in fact, you were very gentleman-like then. You stared at me only for a second when you entered the room. After that, you turned your head away, even when you were speaking to me. Also, it was very kind of you to help me—you stole a dress from your sister's room. I had already figured out that you must be the son, the heir of the Wei family."

She remembers the dark blue Chinese silk jacket and trousers that he wore. He looked handsome and graceful. Now—she looks at him—his handsomeness has vanished without leaving a trace. He is wearing a light blue shirt which she selected for him. But on his lean face, framed by the old-fashioned red wooden door, reappears a gentle grace that had gone for many years.

All of a sudden, his tone turns serious.

"Three days later, my family sent a matchmaker to your mother, asking for your hand. Ching-ching, was it because of my illustrious family that you consented to my proposal?"

Since her face is concealed in the shadow, its sharp lines are blurred. She has an understanding smile on her face. He looks at her with a mixed expression of earnestness and pain. She says,

"That was what was in my mother's mind. Your family was the wealthiest of the whole town. And the Communist troops were approaching our area. For her, the sooner the wedding could be held, the better. As for me, I had been frightened by men's wolf-like stares ever since I was twelve. You were the only gentleman, the only calm, stable man I had ever met. Since the moment the matchmaker pro- posed for you, whenever I thought of you, I felt composed."

*

That evening, they accomplish something they have not done for seven or eight years. The large built-in board-bed in their bedroom can hold the beddings of eight people. The boards are built high like the wooden bed in their hometown in olden days. It is below the lattice window, gently vibrated by the ocean breeze, that they make love.

83.17 1. Whistle 2. Retirement: Two Very Short Stories\fn{by Ai Ya aka Li Chi (1945-)} Szechwan Province, China (F) 1

1

She never imagined that whistling could be so difficult. After puckering her lips and blowing—phui, phui—for some strange reason she felt she had to urinate. But she could hardly be blamed for that, since she went phui whenever she tried to get little Hsiung-hsiung to pee. That was sure no whistle. She really and truly did not know how to whistle.

But no, she had to learn how, she just had to! It had all started when she decided she wanted a dog.

"I want a dog, a tiny little dog." She pleaded her case very tentatively to Ta-fa, who responded emphatically and, it seemed, without even considering her request:

"No!"

She tried to explain that she was lonely, especially after Ta-fa and his wife had left for work in the morning, leaving her alone at home from half past seven in the morning until six in the evening. It was so lonely being in such a big house all by herself. Mei-fang, who hadn't said a word all the time she was talking, banged one of the teacups hard against the tray—clang—as she was picking up the tea service, and her meaning was clear:

Lonely? If you're so lonely, why don't you keep Hsiung-hsiung home with you and take care of him yourself?

Mei-fang had said—in a roundabout way—that sending Hsiung-hsiung to a baby sitter every day cost them well over a hundred dollars a month, which, when the cost of milk powder and baby food was added in, went up to nearly two hundred. But she wouldn't agree to it. She knew that at her advanced age the pudgy little boy, with all that energy, would be too much for her to handle. She didn't dare agree to it.

"Mama," Mei-fang reasoned with her, "you're not as spry as you used to be, and who's going to take care of feeding and cleaning up after the dog? Besides, the neighbors would complain about the dog's barking."

She was right, you can't keep a dog in an apartment building.

Then, one day she noticed the little grade-school boy from across the way standing on the stairs whistling. Each whistle was answered by a series of barks—arf, arf, arf. What was going on here? The boy told her it was something called an "echo key-finder," invented for people who were forever misplacing their keys. All they had to do was whistle, which produced a series of barks in the echo sounder attached to the key, thereby giving away its location.

She asked the boy to buy one for her. It was a small thing, no bigger than a cigarette lighter. She called it "doggie" and pretended it was her very own dog. All she had to do was whistle and it would answer her, just like a real dog.

But she never imagined that whistling could be so difficult.

2

After being called in to the Personnel Office for the third time, Chang Liang-fan finally agreed to retire. (Naturally, this business of retirement was something he had considered and reconsidered.)

The Director of Personnel informed Chang Liang-fan of the factory policy of encouraging all employees to put in for voluntary retirement when they reached the age of sixty. (Using a hand calculator, the Director of Personnel figured out that his retirement pay would come to NT$970,000.) If they did not put in for retirement and there was a reduction in staff or a layoff, the less fortunate employees would really be in for some hard times. (In Chang Liang-fan's case, he would get NT$300,000 in the event of a staff reduction or NT$500,000 in the event of a layoff—the Director of Personnel had also figured this out for him.) It meant nothing to the factory if an employee had been with them for ten or even twenty years. (It was a world-wide depression!) And (at that time, there were rumors making the rounds that the factory was planning a staff reduction!) not only could he get away with his dignity intact by retiring, but could pocket NT$970,000 in retirement pay in the bargain (an increase of NT$670,000 compared to the unfortunate circumstances caused by a staff reduction or NT$470,000 in the case of a layoff)!

After considering and reconsidering the options, Chang Liang-fan finally decided to retire. (And if he didn't retire, what then? He was informed by the Director of Personnel that the youthful Factory Manager was particularly disturbed by Chang Liang-fan's age.)

By taking his NT$970,000 and putting it in the bank, Chang Liang-fan found that he could get by nicely on the interest it earned. He owed a real debt of gratitude to the Director of Personnel. (He was mindful of the fact that the Director of Personnel had taken a special interest in him because he and the Director's elder cousin, Wu Wei-ming, had gone to college together.) He had expressed this gratitude by personally taking two bottles of imported whiskey over to the Director of Personnel's official residence.

The only problem was the boredom that came with retirement! (He wasn't so old at sixty that he could be content to hang around the house and do nothing.) With so much time on his hands, he could only knock. around here and there, trying to keep as active as possible.

One day his wanderings took him near the factory where he had worked, and he decided to go in and say hello to some of his former co-workers. (Oh, how he missed them! Them and that old desk of his!)

Chang Liang-fan stood in the office, where he saw his former co-workers and that old desk of his. (As well as the new man behind that desk, about whom he had been so curious from the very beginning!) The man sitting in what had once been Chang Liang-fan's place stood up politely and shook hands. (It was a firm handshake—the man seemed so sincere.) Chang Liang-fan nearly choked.

"Wei-ming," he said, finally managing to find his voice. (He would have known him anywhere. It was the Director of Personnel's elder cousin, his very own college schoolmate, Wei-ming. He had never been more sure of anything in his life!)

Chang Liang-fan had retired only after considering and reconsidering the options, but how could he have imagined that his replacement would be Wu Wei-ming! (The same Wu Wei-ming who was his college schoolmate and was two years his senior!)

There was no one Chang Liang-fan could complain to!

111.40 Excerpt from Chen Yi Crosses The Mountain: A Folktale\fn{by Hui Zhaolong (1945-)} Yangzhou, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 2

… This was in May 1940, during the anti-Japanese War. It was in the evening and the sun was slanting steeply towards the west. On the main road running along the banks of the Yangtze river at the foot of Maoshan mountain, clouds of dust were whirled up, waves of sand were rising and falling. From afar two horses were coming in flying gallop, clippety-clop, clippety-clop. Ne-e-e-igh!

When they arrive at the riverside, the horses are reined up and their riders dismount like a wind. Look at the man in the lead! He is about forty, tall and sturdy, his face is impressive! On his head he wears a gray military cap, he is dressed in a gray military uniform, around his waist is a leather belt with a revolver stuck in it. This makes him look even more healthy and vigorous, with a majestic air and an imposing appearance.

Who is he? A man whose military genius and fame has ruined the enemy's morale, whose prestige rules north and south of the Yangtze river, the commander-in-chief of the head forces of the New Fourth Army\fn{Communist.} south of the Yangtze, Chen Yi—General Chen!\fn{1901-1972; Mayor of Shanghai (1949-1958); Foreign Minister (1958-1969).}

Behind him we find staff officer Yang from headquarters. Chen Yi is preparing to cross the Yangtze in order to build up anti-Japanese activities in the northern part of Suzhou. Now he is standing on the river dike and gazing into the distance full of pride and enthusiasm! The sun has already disappeared behind the ridge of Jiaoshan at Zhenjiang. The glow of sunset illuminates half the sky and is reflected in the lucid spring waters of the Yangtze. In front of him: the vast expanse of the Yangtze, stretching endlessly into the horizon. Just see how heaven unites with water, and water unites with heaven, the waters of the Yangtze are surging high, the white-crested waves are rolling forever. Indeed:

Yangtze river, Yangtze river,
Day and night you flow to the east.

The river, stretching more than ten li to the other side, is swept in mist: Wave follows wave, wave chases wave, wave swallows wave, the wave before joins the wave behind, the wave behind pushes the wave before, wave after wave break over in white crests: Ha-a-a-a !

When comrade Chen Yi sees this scenery, he is overwhelmed by emotion. A poem by Su Dongpo comes to his mind: Thoughts of the past at Red Cliff:

"What a lofty style! Truly:

The great river flows to the east,
its waves wash the horizon,
since ancient times fostering truly great men.\fn{Here the text of the poem has been truncated by the editors of this book.}
In stormy weather we reach the bank, enveloped in thousands of snow drifts.
River and mountains are like a painting,
Oh, what an era of heroes!

Ha, ha, ha, ha!"

"Surely, General Chen, the great waves wash the sand\fn{I.e., sift the good from the bad.} Those people who are making friends with our enemy, those small clowns who do not care about our national interests, will surely be washed into the Japanese sea by the great tide of history. Let me wish you, General Chen, a favorable wind and immediate success for your plans.

"Immediate success, ha, ha, ha, ha, I certainly do not dare to guarantee you that. But this is the third time I cross the Yangtze, and I am earnestly convinced that we shall be able to move the heart of God, God will protect us. Ha, ha, ha, ha! Well, when will we embark?"

"Everything is ready. Our liaison man has arrived. We can enter at once."

"Fine!"

At this time the sky has grown darker and darker. The river is enveloped in a gray fog, evaporating clouds of mist everywhere. While looking at the river a faint sound is discernible among the reeds: s-s-s … s-s-s … s-s-s … s-s-s, a small boat is nearing. On the boat a man is standing pulling on the oars, sque-e-eak … gurgle, gurgle … sque-e-eak … gurgle, gurgle. The small boat shoots forward like an arrow from a crossbow and lands on the riverbank. As soon as the boat has landed, the man aboard jumps ashore like a gust of wind and fastens his boat.

One can see that this man is already well beyond his forties, he is tall and sturdy. Standing on the ground he measures one meter and eighty two. He is not only tall, but also in excellent condition. He is strong. If he would stretch out his upper arm and compare it with my upper arm, you would find that his was more than twice the size of mine! His face is weather-beaten with a purple tan, so dark that it is shining, so shining that it seems sparkling! He has bushy eyebrows and large eyes, a straight nose and a square mouth. He wears fisherman's clothing: black Chinese-style coat, gown and trousers. His coat is fastened with button loops and buttons, altogether seven or eight. One button is not buttoned and the opening flaps in the wind.

Who is he? He is an old liaison man among the guerrillas of the Yangtze river. His surname is Zhang, and he is called Zhang Youfu.\fn{Lucky Zhang.} Today he has received the order to escort General Chen over the Yangtze. As soon as he is ashore, he watches General Chen with a big smile on his face and shouts with the sound of a bronze bell:

"How are you, General Chen! Ha, ha, ha, ha!" He grasps Chen Yi's hand firmly.

"Hello, Big Luck! How are you? How are you, old mate? Now we meet again! Well, everything is ready, now we are only waiting for an eastern wind to blow. When do you think we can take off?"

"Is everything ready?"

"Yes!"

"Take it easy! As soon as my boss, Hui, has given you into my hands, we shall go!"

"Fine, we should take orders and follow commands! Ha, ha, ha, ha!"

At that moment Big Luck turns round and blows a whistle in the direction of the reed grove, pi-ift! As soon as the whistle sounds, three masts are raised in the reed grove and three boats appear, three large wooden junks.

Why would Chen Yi as one person need three junks to cross the Yangtze? He brings along a Japanese horse—a Japanese battle horse—and thirty 38-calibre revolvers. For the sake of his safety, the Party has ordered thirty-six men to escort him. With horses, guns and escort, they fill up three junks.

Chen Yi grasps the hand of Staff Officer Yang and takes leave. Then he enters the small boat together with Big Luck, and from the small boat he boards the big junk, binding the small boat to the rear of the big junk. Chen Yi changes into informal clothes and goes to relax in the center cabin. Big Luck shouts his order:

"Cast off!"

"Hua-a-a-a-a-a," three large junks aim straight for the northern bank of the Yangtze. Big Luck personally holds the rudder. He is a captain on board, squeak … squeak.

Well, to escort the head commander on his expedition North is surely an honorable task, but also a difficult one. Even if you do not fear ten thousand catastrophes, you must look out for the danger that may occur once out of ten thousand times! Who would have imagined that just at this moment, when their junks are in the middle of the river, they faintly perceive the sound of a motorboat coming from afar, chug, chug, chug, chug.

My! A boat is nearing! How do they know? They see a lantern in the distance, and the lantern is moving. What kind of boat? Could it be a Japanese surveillance boat? No. Big Luck has experience. How do the surveillance boats sound? They are steamers and sound like dug, dug, dug, dug. But this one sounds, chug, chug, chug, chug. That's a different sound.

Well, if it's not a steamer, what kind of boat is it, then? They are looking intently, and suddenly they see a snow white beam of light shooting up: s-s-s-s-s-s. What light is that? A searchlight! The searchlight is very strong and presently it is directed towards their boat. Not only is the light directed towards them, but the light is put on and off at intervals.

As soon as Big Luck sees that, he knows. This is a signal, and it means: “Drop the sails! Inspection!” It is unnecessary to say any more, this is for sure an enemy boat. This is a critical moment. General Chen must be warned immediately.

Big Luck gives the rudder to the hand of another of his men, whereupon he jumps into the center cabin to report to Chen Yi …

186.198 The Story Of A Child, Working Every Day\fn{by “the mother of my friend EH” (1945-)} Hanzghou, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 1

“That day a group of ten of us set off by train, leaving the beautiful mountains and lakes of Hangzhou behind. We arrived in the great, bustling city of Shanghai, where we boarded another train to Xi’an.

“We were shocked rigoid by the bleakness of Xi’an and the poverty and ignorance of the locals. Many of the girls started crying, and some ran off back to the cities in the east.I didn’t have the nerve to run away with them, so I got dressed in my army uniform, and became a new recruit.

“I was only thirteen. I didn’t understand anything, it had never occurred to me that anything frightening would happen. From Xi’an I took one of those “sardine-can” trains they used to transport soldiers in, which took us to Urumqi, changing at every station. Altogether, the journey from Hangzhou to Urumqi took one month and seven days.

“When we saw the Gobi Desert stretching out in front of us, we were all shocked out of our wits. We couldn’t imagine how people could survive here. Most of what they ate were milk products, and the toilets were big pits beneath two slabs of wood. There were no streets or roads, and practically no lights, let alone shops.

“Later on I learned that the suffering and poverty were nothing. The worst part was the physical labour. Everyone who came to Xinjiang had to do a probationary year of labour, and mine was building reservoirs. For a city girl, working every day on the building sites, where I had to dig the ground or carry stones or earth on a shoulder pole, hard physical labour in the blistering heat of the sun … I’ll never forget it as long as I live. It’s also why I will never feel tired or overworked again in my whole life.

“We built the first Xinjiang Military Hospital in that place, and that was where I met the man who’s my husband now. In those days he was the director of the Xinjiang Song and Dance Troupe. He fell ill and ended up on my ward. He liked me a lot, and he took me to visit his two sisters, who had also been sent to work in Xinjiang. But I really couldn’t get used to his reserved style of courtship, and I didn’t much care for the way he kept combing his hair all the time—it was very unmanly. I didn’t dare to make up my mind on my own, so I asked my friends in the hospital, but most of them didn’t approve. They said that he couldn’t stop fussing with his hair and clothes whenever he came to see me, he was too capitalist, too petit bourgeois, and he was bound to end up a counterrevolutionary. I was very confused, but I still decided to marry him, because he was clean and very polite.

“We got married and had two daughters. Life in Xinjiang was very hard, so I made up my mind to go back home to Hangzhou. I was determined not to bring up two daughters in this cruel place, so I left the army and took my daughters back to Hangzhou on my own, where I got a job as a nurse in a local hospital. My younger daughter was only two then, and the other was nine. Every minute of every day was a struggle, with no help from either set of parents.

“My husband and I lived apart like this for twenty-three years, with me working and bringing up the children alone, suffering all kinds of hardship to raise my daughters. We could only get together once a year. Often my husband was busy and couldn’t come to Hangzhou, so I would have to take the two girls on the long, arduous journey of over three weeks from Hangzhou to Urumqi to see their father.

“After twenty-three years of separation, we were finally able to live together once more, but it didn’t take us long to realise we had become incompatible. My husband despised the extravagance and self-indulgence of the interior, and the constant quibbling over trifles. And I was hugely disappointed in the husband I had longed for through all those lonely nights: his crudeness, his constant grousing and shouting, his total intolerance of anybody different. It made me miserable.

“But we didn’t divorce. Both of us thought we should stay together, if only for the sake of our two daughters and our grandchildren.

“My elder daughter has a son called Haohao. He’s thirteen now, and he often quarrels with his grandfather. Haohao believes that his grandfather is dragging the dark shadow of history into his life today. He thinks that his grandfather should accept the gifts that modern society has to offer.

“But his grandfather feels wretched and angry that his grandson has such an affiuent lifestyle but understands nothing of the trials and suffering of the older generation; he\fn{The grandson} doesn't know or respect what happened in the past.

"I don't think this is just a problem for our family; I don't know what it's like for other people."

188.157 Excerpt from The Jade King: History Of A Chinese Muslim Family\fn{by Huo Da (1945-)} Peking, China (F) 11

This is a traditional courtyard-house. At one comer of its wall of polished grey bricks stands the gate under an arch, whose ridge is decorated at each end with an owl-head of simple yet graceful design, and over the rafters is a neat row of triangular drip-tiles. The gate itself is of heavy wood, painted a dark red. On each of the two panels is a brass door-knocker, the size of a rice bowl, with a ring hanging from it. Running down the middle of the panels are two lines of a couplet etched in gold, which read:

Owner of the Priceless Pearl and the Precious Jade, Lover of Brilliant Moonlight and Gentle Breezes.\fn{The Priceless Pearl refers to the pearl said to be presented to Prince Sui, a duke of the Han Dynasty (206 BC-AD 220), by a boa he had rescued. The term has since become a synonym for rare treasure, espcially in Chinese classic literature. The Precious Jade is a classical synonym for anything of rare beauty. The term takes its origin from a piece of precious jade, presented by a commoner to a king of Chu during the Spring and Autumn Period of Chinese history (770-476 BC)}

Inscribed on the two hexagonal protrusions on the door lintel are two characters Bo and Ya, one on each, meaning "broadness of knowledge and elegance in taste," which make up the name of the house—Bo Ya mansion. Unlike such trite phrases as "Longevity and Prosperity" and "Everlasting spring households fronting south overflowing felicity in families doing good deeds," commonly seen on gates, the words Bo and Ya are a subtle revelation of the taste and interest of the owner. Flanking the gate are a pair of stone drums, and leading up to the raised threshold a series of five stone steps.

As a rule, the gate is tightly shut. Should the master of the house or any visitor come, he would first have to rap the door-knocker before the gate would be opened by a house-maid coming out from the apartment on the southside of the courtyard.

A few steps beyond the gate and directly opposite it stands a tile-roofed, brick-based spirit-screen, its wall white and bare of writing and painting, pristine as moonlight. At the base of the screen a wisteria of great age curls its way like a dragon up a bamboo trellis, its vines thick and luxuriant, its lush foliage forming a green canopy draping itself all the way to the ground. In spring and summer when the plant is in full bloom, its lavender flowers dangle like strings of gems.

Between the gate and the screen is a long and narrow courtyard, contiguous to the southern wall of which is a five-roomed structure generally known as the "lower apartment." Serving as the reception-room and servants' quarters, the building is to the west of the gate. Thus the gate archway is not in the middle but at the southeastern corner of the courtyard, conforming with the architectural tradition of "house in kan (west), gate in xun (southeast)" which is supposed to ensure good fortune.

At an oblique angle with the gate archway and on the axis of the premises is a second gate. Although merely a passageway between the outer and inner courtyards, this portal, popularly known as "the gate of overhanging floriation," is of no small import. Unlike the simple and sedate door to the street, it is elaborately and exquisitely adorned. Instead of being dark red in color like its counterpart, it is painted vermilion and embellished with fine designs in white and gold, and has under its eaves an intricately carved and colorfully painted overhang similar to that of a sedan chair. The gate is a perfect specimen of the unsurpassed artistry of craftsmen of traditional architecture.

Beyond the second gate is another spirit-screen. But unlike the one in the front courtyard, it is not built of brick and tile, but carved of natural Chinese box-wood and consisting of four pasels linked together in the manner of a folding parlor screen. On the panels are four landscapes done in relief—Mount Emei in moonlight, Suzhou under the midnight moon, Lugou (Marco Polo Bridge) in the dim morning moonglow, and surging sea in the moonshine. All four scenes depict the queen of heaven, but each has its own artistic appeal and evokes a different emotion.

Behind the screen is the inner courtyard, along three sides of which are buildings—those on the east and west sides are three-roomed while that on the north, or the main apartment, five-roomed. These apartments are linked by a verandah that extends along the southern wall up to the inner gate, forming a square. Two brick-paved walks cross at right angle in the middle of the yard, leading to the gate and the doors of all three apartments. Flanking the main apartment are Chinese crabapple and pomegranate trees, which are a delight to the eye with their leafy boughs swaying in the wind from spring through until autumn.

Among Peking's courtyard houses, Bo Ya Mansion is of medium size. There are larger ones that have three courtyards or side yards or gardens. But architeturally speaking, it is far above the average and, due to the part played by the owner in its designing, has a grace and tranquillity of its own. Moreover, being ideally located, neither amidst the din and bustle of the main thoroughfares nor too far from them, one can be secluded from the outside world by shutting the gate and yet still have easy access to various places in the city; thus its inmates may sally forth abroad or enjoy quietude at will, an arrangement most suitable for those who care for both social intercourse and peaceful solitude. Obviously the couplet on the gate, the carved landscapes on the wooden screen, and the plants in the courtyard were not randomly chosen.

The present owner of Bo Ya Mansion, however, was the head of the crime-squad of the local police station, who showed neither "broadness of knowledge" nor "elegance in taste," but wore a black police uniform, toted a handgun and dealt in chains and handcuffs. It is said that before the house fell into his hands, the owner was a Qing-Dynasty scholar who, having fallen out of favour with the court, chose to live as a recluse, devoting himself to reading and painting, and taking pleasure in antiques and cultural relics, especially jades of ancient vintage, priding himself on "gentlenlanly conduct chaste as jade." As a rule, he shut himself in and shunned company, but occasionally would go out to visit shops dealing in jades and other lapidaries, where, if he found any rare and precious artifacts, he would make a purchase at all costs, or, if the price was beyond his means, would linger until he had studied the piece and enjoyed its beauty to his heart's content. And if told a certain family had rare jades, he would make a visit there to have a look even though unacquainted with the owner; for his unconventional behaviour, the old gentleman was nicknamed "Jade Fiend," in which he took pride rather than offence.

After his demise at the age of eighty, his descendants squandered away the estate and the house fell into the hands of the crime-squad leader. Nevertheless, the old gentleman's antiquarian style lingered on.

*

In the 24th year of the Republic (1935), the police officer suddenly took it into his head to sell the house and move away. For what reason no one knew, but it was conjectured that either he needed a new and larger house for the power and riches he had amassed, or he was hard-pressed for money to meet the expenses incurred in his political dealings.

The news that Do Ya Mansion was up for sale soon became a talking point everywhere. In the streets and marketplaces, in restaurants and tea-houses, people conversed about the sale with great interest, some eager to know the price to see whether it was within their means, though most were just having fun and waiting to see who could afford it. So a number of real estate middlemen made so bold as to approach the crime-squad leader, an attempt to fleece the tiger, as it were. For such people the police officer had an instinctive aversion, as he himself was a profiteer and could not bear to have anyone else put a finger into his pie. So he made it known:

"Whoever wants to buy the house, let him come to me himself. Brokers and middlemen had best keep their noses out!"

Having thus shooed away the go-betweens, the officer waited for prospective buyers to come to him. He also refused to go to the real estate exchange and look for customers.. There was no doubt in his mind that the house could be sold, that those both in the know and with money would come to make their bids.

Then one day a man came knocking at the door. After showing him into the reception-room, the maidservant went to her master to announce the visitor.

As the officer entered the reception-room, he, cast a glance at the visitor.

The man was thirtyish in age, dressed in a long gown of gray cotton, a bowler hat and black cloth shoes, and though tall in stature, was thin and frail. His complexion was darkish, forehead high, hair parted in the middle, eyebrows slightly arched, and eyes black, slightly sunken but flashing with animation, giving the impression that he was highly intelligent and competent. With years of experience in dealing with people of all types, the police officer could identify anyone at a glance. Now he was almost certain that the man before him was a junior clerk or a teacher or, at best, an accountant, whom he surmised was not a buyer but someone sent to pave the way for the deal. Annoyed at the thought, he asked the man coldly without bothering to use any term of address,

"What do you want to see me for?"

"I was told," the visitor said, "that you're finding this house too small and wish to change it for a larger one." In deference to the owner, he used the word "change" for "sell."

"Ah, yes," the officer replied, somewhat surprised by the man's choice of words. Then turning to the maid, he ordered, "Tea for our visitor."

"No, thank you," the man said. "Let us get on to the subject of the house."
Another jolt for the officer. Why, the man was wasting no time or words in getting down to business! Why so eager? Actually he himself was anxious to get down to brass tacks too. Waving the maid away, he came to the point at once:
"All right, let's not waste time and get down to business. On whose behalf are you coming to see the house? Why isn't he here himseIf!" Smilingly the visitor remarked,
"Am I not here myself!"
"Oh?"
The officer was taken aback and wondered how he had failed to see this. Hell! The fellow doesn't look like someone who afford this house of mine, he thought to himself. But then, since he's said he wants to buy it, I can't but treat him as a prospective buyer. It was at this point that he remembered to ask the visitor his name and began to mind his manners.
"Your surname, sir?"
"Your humble servant is named Han," replied the man, rising slightly from his seat,
"Mr. Han," the officer switched to the polite term of address but being wealthy and powerful enough to give himself airs, he made little change in his haughty tone, "you want to take a look round the house first or find out the price first?"
"No need to look around," the man replied. "You see, I was here before you took possession of it. Now that you intend to move away and seeing as I'd like to buy it, you have only to quote the price."
The officer was again taken by surprise. Why, he reflected, the man's long had his eye on the house and is willing to buy it without taking a look. Not a bad guy to deal with! To make a deal so readily raised the standing of both parties. The officer was pleased and thought to himself that this was indeed a fine house and decided not to let slip such a good buyer. Secretly raising his intended price twenty per cent, he said,
"When I deal with someone straightforward, I'm always fair and square. Ten thousand silver dollars and the house is yours."
He eyed the man for signs of acceptance or rejection of the bid while being ready to do some bargaining. But to his surprise, the man replied without a moment's hesitation.
"Let's call it a deal."
Another jolt for the officer. Obviously it was now impossible to raise the price. But he was quick-witted enough to add,
"But there's one point I want to make clear, Mr Han. The price is for the house only; it doesn't include the wooden screen in the inner courtyard. I intend to take that with me."
"But that's part of the house," the man said with deliberation. "When I buy the house, I buy the screen too. As to the price, we might talk it over."
"Then throw in another two thousand!" Now that he had sounded out the buyer, the officer made no bones of the matter.
"Right!" With that, the man closed the deal, adding,
"You might start moving out." And so the deal was clinched, much sooner than the officer had expected.
"Please, sir, don't move in until I've vacated the house," the officer said for fear that the buyer would change his mind. "Besides, you'll need time to get the cash ready. Right?"
"A few days' waiting won't make any difference," said the man, "so you can take your time. As for the money, you can send someone to my store for it right now. I'll pay ten thousand first as deposit. The balance of two thousand I'll settle after you've moved out. How's that, sir?"
The officer was struck dumb. Had anyone ever had such a buyer? he wondered. Why, he hadn't tried to cut a damn cent off the price quoted and was ready to pay ten thousand cash right away. Was there ever a business deal like it? Ordinarily a thirty per cent down payment was good enough! This guy … how rich was he? Who was he?
"Your surname, sir?" In his flutter the officer repeated the question he had asked earlier on.
"Han is my humble surname."
"Your given name, please?"
"Han Ziqi in full."
"Oh!" The officer cried out in astonishment at hearing this highly celebrated name.
"So, you're Mr. Han, the proprietor of the Rare Gem Studio. I've long heard of you, long heard of you! No wonder."
No wonder what, he did not say, but both of them know what that was.

"If the house goes to you, it goes to someone who knows what's what," added the officer. A change in ownership between connoisseurs is an honour for both the seller and the buyer. The transaction pleased both parties. The officer gloated secretly. As for Han Ziqi, he congratulated himself on having made this devil of a crime-squad officer move out of the house that he had long been yearning to possess.

Not long after, the officer moved out. Bo Ya Mansion became the residence of the proprietor of the Rare Gem Studio.

*

Han Ziqi's Rare Gem Studio was well-known throughout Peking. It enjoyed the same prestige as Tongretang Pharmacy, Neiliansheng Hatter's, Ruifuxiang Silk Store. Those who knew nothing of it could only blame themselves for being ignorant. The fact was, the difference between Han's studio and these other celebrated stores was that it did not carry medicines, fabrics, headgear and footwear, nor gourmet delights, but dealt in goods unrelated to daily living yet which held great attraction for all, that is, curios and jades, precious stones and jewellery. The store was located in Langfang Lane Two, a by-street west of the Zhengyangmen Boulevard and north of Dashalan Street. This vicinity was old Peking's most elite, most prosperous and most bustling business centre. It bristled with shops and stores and drew merchants from all parts of the country and thronged with shoppers and sightseers day and night. As a popular saying concerning Peking had it:

"Its east and west sids are known for residents of wealth and distinction; its south for fish and fowl, birds and flowers; and its central section for jewels and jades, silks and brocades."

This "central section" referred to the business district just outside the Qianmen Gate while the best of gems were to be found mostly in the antique shops in Langfang Lanes One and Two. Of all the different kinds of store, these shops were by far the most spectacular. Precious commodities on the market such as gold and silver are sold at fixed prices, but rare jades alone are priceless. This was a fact known to all.

As for Han Ziqi's Rare Gem Studio, it was considered the epitome of the history of Chinese fine arts, a treasure trove of the world's rarest stones, a crystallization of human ingenuity, an enigma that aroused both envy and curiosity.

The history of this ancient capital, millenniums old, is also a history of jades, for the city had amassed countless gems, nourished artisans without number, and created no end of miracles. The vast Dushan jade-jar kept in in front of the Chengguangdian Hall in the Circular City at Beihai Park is a standing testimony of the emergent jade craftsmanship in the Yuan Capital Dadu. Reputed to be the wine jar used by Kublai Khan in entertaining his courtiers, weighing 3,500 jin and having a capacity of over 30 dan, the grand vessel was carved out of one huge jade boulder and is as impressive as it is gigantic. Rare for its size and artistic craftsmanship, this tour de force is said to have taken fifteen years to carve, spanning two dynasties, the Jin and the Yuan.

In the Ming Dynasty, when the country's best lapidarists were assembled in the palace workshops, the jade craft began to flourish, reaching its zenith during the reigns of the Qing emperors Yongzheng and Qianlong. By then there was distinct division of labour—grinding or polishing the stones. Day and night the craftsmen were engaged in making wares for the court—bric-a-brac both decorative and those for daily use, jewellery, accessories for dress, carriages and horses, dinnerware, wine sets and innumerable others. In addition, an engraving workshop was set at Ruyiguan Hall that specialized in carving royal seals and jade tablets (sacrificial objects used by royalty).

But in the late Qing period, when China was torn by internal strife and foreign invasion, the jade craft declined. The rising international demand for handicraft products consequent to the revival of the European and Japanese economies after the conclusion of the First World War gave impetus to Peking's jade craft industry and pushed China's jadeware export business, begun in the late 18th century, to its peak. By the early years of the Republic Peking boasted of more than forty stores dealing in jade and other precious stones, over thirty jade workshops and some one hundred antique shops. The sound of drilling and grinding could be heard all day long in Flower Street outside Chongwenmen Gate and in Langfang Lanes One and Two beyond the Qianmen Gate, the number of lapidaries having exceeded six thousand.

*

At that time the Rare Gem Studio was a small and insignificant workshop with very little business and absolutely no hope of ever entering the rank of large, establishments. Located in Langfang Lane Two, this small cottage-industry had only two front rooms for the workshop and a few rooms at the back as family quarters. Though it had a name, it had no signboard . on the door. Except for those who had dealings with it, people took it to be a mere residence.

Actually, the owner of the Rare Gem Studio, Liang Yiqing, was a first-rate jade craftsman, a master at making all kinds of wares—vases, censers, cups and wine vessels; flowers, birds, fish and insects; warriors and other figurines; miniature architectural structures of all kinds and landscapes complete with boats and carriages. At one glance he could detennine the inner qualities of an unhewn jadestone and make the best use of its shape and coloration, miraculously turning an unsightly stone into an object of superb beauty.

Highly skilled as he was at the craft, he was dull-witted otherwise. Never having had any schooling, little given to loquacity and inept at either socializing or contending in business circles, he therefore seldom went anywhere but kept to his workbench. His wares he supplied to stores dealing in antiques and jades, especially to Mr Pu's Huiyuanzhai (Universal Jeweller's), an establishment engaged in trading with foreign firms and exporting in quantity. All these businesses sold at a handsome profit, but Liang got paid precious little in return for their orders, allowing them to fatten themselves on his craftsmanship.

Yet he never complained; he was content with his poor lot and scanty returns from his small capital and managed to make a living by keeping his nose to the grindstone. Not surprisingly, his Rare Gem Studio remained its meagre self. Over forty in age, he was without son and heir, having only two daughters by his wife whose maiden name was Bai.

The girls took after their mother, both very pretty, though the younger more so than the elder, and with lovely complexions, white and delicate as "muttonfat" jade. Equally pleasing were their names that did justice to their looks. The elder was called Junbi, or Fine Jade; the younger Bingyu, or Icy Jade. These names were given at the request of their father by the learned and antique-loving old gentleman, the master of Bo Ya Mansion, and were dotingly shortened to Jade Girl and Little Jade by Mr. and Mrs. Liang when addressing their darling daughters.

The sisters were eight years apart in age. When the younger girl was still a toddler, the elder was already a great help to their mother in housekeeping—cleaning, making the beds, sewing and mending, laundering and cooking. Jade Girl was actually cleverer than her mother. She was bright and conscientious and had a clearer idea of the family's income and outlay than her mother had and, though illiterate, was able, through mental arithmetic to keep account of the family finances. By the age of twelve or thirtren, she had relieved her mother of more than half of the household chores and was a sort of junior "bookkeeper" to her father.

Sometimes when Liang had more orders than he could handle, Jade Girl would be his assistant, receiving customers, collecting payments, delivering the wares and even doing simple jobs such as cutting up rough stones and taking measurements of unhewn blocks. But Liang never let her work on the "water-bench." For one thing, grinding and drilling are jobs too heavy for girls. For another, it is a rule with artisans to pass on their skill only to sons, never to daughters, who would eventually be married off and take away whatever skill they might have learned to their husbands' families. Without any prospect of an heir to his studio, he often sighed to his wife, in the absence of Jade Girl,

"Too bad she's a girl. If only I had a boy." He would break off in mid-sentence.

Deeply remorseful, Mrs. Liang would lower her head and, still not reconciled with reality, would pray, "Have compassion, Allah," holding on to the belief that God would someday bestow her a son, though she was already past child-bearing age.

The Liangs were devout Muslims. Among the large population of Peking, Huis were a small minority, even smaller amongst those engaged in the jade craft. This was perhaps the reason why Liang Yiqing seldom bestirred himself beyond the threshold and had no quarrel with the world and, out of an innate sense of self defence, kept to himself.

*

In the early summer of the 8th year of the Republic (1919), cries of fruit-and-snack hawkers could be heard up and down Langfang Lane Two:

"Mulberries for ritual offerings! Large juicy cherries! Big dumplings made of quality glutinous rice and dates, wrapped and tied up with the best mugwort leaves and reed grass and well-iced too!"

At the cries of the hawkers, Jade Girl and her sister Little Jade ran out of the house towards the hawker's wheelbarrow. The vehicle had large wicker baskets lined with blue cloth and filled with cherries, as well as a large jar of clear cool well-water. While calling out, "Large cherries!" the hawker kept sprinkling water on the jewel-like fruit, which were at the same time chilled by blocks of ice. The very sight of the cherries had a cooling effect on anyone who cast them a glance. How could anyone resist buying some? Jade Girl handed two coppers over to the man, who ladled out two small cupfuls of cherries on to a fresh green lotus leaf. Jade Girl took the cherries and, without eating any, led Little Jade, her mouth watering, back into the house. Liang Yiqing was bending over his work when Jade Girl called softly ftom behind,

"Pa, take a break now and have a taste of these!"

Putting aside his work, Liang turned round. At the sight of the cherries on the lotus leaf, resembling agates on a green jadeite platter, he remarked,

"Hmm, that's a beauty. I'll make one like it some day. Go ahead and eat them yourselves."

Only then did the girls pick up the cherries with their jade-white tapering fingers and put them into their mouths, sucking the icy bitter-sweet juice with relish. As Liang eyed their tender and delicate faces each adorned with a small red cherry between the lips, he conjured up another picture in his mind and forgot all his fatigue. He then resumed his long and hard toil of grinding.

The grinder Liang used is called a "water-bench." This is a very simple tool—a board supported by four legs, which has on one side a shaft with a rotary wheel and on the other side a groove that holds the emery for grinding. Below the open end of the groove is a basin on a tripod. When working, Liang would sit on a stool by the bench and keep the shaft rotating with a foot treadle, which set the wheel in motion. The stone to be ground would be held up against the edge of the rotating wheel with his left hand, while with his right hand he would keep feeding the emery on to the wheel and the jadestone. To lower the heat generated by the friction, he would keep watering the grinding wheel and the stone. Hence, the grinder was named "water-bench."

Primitive as the tools are, the technology is far from simple. To transform a crude jadestone into a finished product, wheels of different sizes have to be used one after another as the work proceeds from rough-hewing to fine-polishing, until the desired refinement is attained. Moeover, the variation in the forms and shapes of the artifact to be produced and the application of different carving methods (in relief and intaglio) rest entirely on the dexterity of the craftsman. When at work he is fully occupied, hand and foot. He must be all attention and most meticulous, his eyes riveted on the stone as if magnetized to it, his heart tugged as if by some invisible cord, even his breathing has to be slow, soft and in an even tempo. There must be absolutely no sound in the room except the humming of the grinder, which obliterates everything, swallows up everything. In short, the craftsman at work has to dismiss every thought from his mind.

Suddenly there was a knocking at the door. Without stopping work, Liang asked Jade Girl to see who it was. He knew she would recognize all the customers coming to fetch his wares or pay him.

When she opened the door Jade Girl found two strangers standing on the threshold. One was an old man, the other young. The older man was about sixty years old, tall and stalwart in build; his complexion was the color of bronze, his forehead broad, his nose high, his sunken eyes spirited, and a long white beard flowed down from his chin. He had on a white turban, a grayish-blue long gown and sandals for his bare feet. The young lad who seemed to be in his teens was of medium height, dark-skinned and handsome-looking, but his head was shaven and his cloth suit nondescript in color and patched at the cuffs and knees—the very image of a young mendicant monk. Stunned by the trampish appearance of the two strangers, Jade Girl was momentarily at a loss what to do.

"Oh!" she finally uttered and then called over her shoulder, "Pa, please come here!"

Liang put aside his work and came into the outer room. He too was surprised by what he saw. Why, he did not know them either. At this moment the elderly bowed slightly and laying his right hand on the chest, said,

"An salam al-lakun!" The surprised Liang hurriedly responded to the greeting, also putting his hand on the chest, making a slight bow and uttering,

"Iu al-lakuman salam!"

What were they saying? For Muslims, no translation is needed. The first of the remarks means "May Allah bless you with peace!" and the second, "May Allah bless you with peace also!" There are expressions of blessing between Muslims when mreting each other to show they are of one race and faith. These are greetings used by Muslims around the world So that, wherever they happen to be, they can always identify each other by the familiar words. Liang felt at once a warm current surging through him.

"Ah, Duoshti!" he exclaimed. "Please come in and take a seat."

Having shown the visitors into the front room to benches by the table, he asked Jade Girl to serve tea. The term duoshti is understood only by him and those embracing the same faith. It means "friend," "compatriot" and "brother," for Muslims the world over are brothers. Jade Girl served the visitors each a lidded cup of tea, and they drank it all. Then the old man said,

"It's just for a drink of water that I'm stopping by here without being invited. But only after I'd made sure you were a duoshti from the Arabic duo (scripture) across the lintel of your door."

This was again most heart-warming to Liang. He was moved by the implicit trust of the visitors though they were merely passers-by and had nothing to do with his business. He had been living here in this lane for many years, yet it had never occurred to him that he was duty-bound to do anything for duoshtis passing by his house, if only offering them a bowl of drinking water .

"Sir, may I know what line of business your shop is in?" the old man asked.

"Mine is a small jade workshop," replied Liang. "I'm incapable of doing anything except taking up this craft handed down to me."

"Ah, you are a pearl of Muslims, sir," the old man said with gratification. "We Muslims are closely linked with precious stones. Nephrite comes from Hetian in Xinjiang, turquoise from Persia, cat's eye from Ceylon, moonstone from Syria." Liang was astonished.

"You are a great connbisseur of jade, Venerable Sir." Smilingly the old man said,

"That's more than I deserve. I'm only quoting from the few time-worn books I've read, repeating the bits of information picked up here and there in my travels. I'm afraid I've made a fool of myself!"

"Venerable Sir, where do you hail from, if I may ask?"

"From far, far away," said the old man, "from Quanzhou in Fujian Province. It's been five or six years since I started out from there, travelling through prefectures and counties, footing it in the daytime and stopping to rest at night."

"I see!" A feeling of compassion swept over Liang for the men who had made such a long trek on foot.

"Are you coming to Peking to visit relatives or look up friends?"

"Neither. It's a long story."

*

As the old man drank his second cup of tea he closed those deep and bright eyes of his, as if recalling some events in the distant past. After a moment he broke the silence by suddenly asking,

"Have you ever heard the name Saihai I Gawamudin?"

"Yes, from my elders. It was in … in …"

Liang flushed for shame of his ignorance. He only knew that "saihai" was the title of honour for very high-ranking ahungs and had a very dim recollection of the name Gawamudin, but could not recall the date.

It was in the sa:ond year of the reign of Emperor Zhenzong of the Song Dynasty, that is, the year 295 in the Islamic Calendar, or the year 996 AD by the Gregorian Calendar, that Saihai Gawamudin came to China from the west." The elderly spoke with deliberation, without a trace of derision at Liang, for after all it had happened in the very distant past.

"The Saihai had three sons. The eldest was called Saideludin, the second Nasuludin, and the youngest Sa'adudin—all fine scholars. Their erudition was highly rated by the Song Emperor Zhenzong, who offered them official commissions, but they declined and were then appointed imams in charge of mosques. The eldest of the three brothers went to remote parts to spread the faith. What ultimately became of him is unknown. His two younger brothers were appointed by the court to set up mosques in the capital, one near the eastern wall of the city, the other in the southern suburbs, which is the mosque in Ox Street today."

"I see," Liang uttered softly and with understanding as if he had travelled through centuries of history alongside the elderly man, as if some clots long obstructing his veins had been removed, allowing his blood to flow freely. He had been a dullard up till now, ignorant of the tracks left by his ancestors.

In fact, if we trace the historical origins of Islam in China, we can date it earlier than the arrival of the old man's ancestor Saihai Gawamudin. In the first year of the reign of the Tang Emperor Gaozong (65Q-655AD), that is, the year 651 by the Gregorian Calendar, the third caliph of the Uthman Empire of Arabia dispatched an envoy to Chang'an to pay homage to the Tang emperor. But even that dates later than the time when the first Muslims set foot on China. A tombstone in Quanzhou dates a year earlier, the Arabic on which reads:

Tomb of Hussein Ben Mohammed Salatoi
Allah bless him
Died in the 3rd month of the 29th year of the Islamic Calendar that is, in 650 AD.

From that time on Muslims from the Western Regions came to China at different times and for various reasons. They settled and propagated here, forming gradually what is known as the Hui-hui nationality, now known as the Huis. However, due to negligence on the part of historians, there is no definite date for Saihai Gawamudin's arrival in China, nor for the founding of the mosque on Ox Street. To this day, all such unrecorded deeds of the early Muslims in China remain puzzles as well as subjects of interesting conjecture for their descendants. Not surprisingly, the illiterate Liang Yiqing had had no idea of all this and was left breathless with astonishment and admiration at hearing for the first time these events narrated by the Muslim elder.

"Saideludin went away to convert believers and what became of him no one knows. He's been forgotten over a millennium!" The old man sighed with re- gret.

"No one knows he, too, has offspring. I, Tuloyedin, am his direct descendant of the 25th generation." Thunder-struck by what he heard, Liang rose from his seat, murmuring,

"Ah, Saihai, Saihai." As if visited by the Holy Spirit, he was completely overwhelmed and filled with nothing save exaltation and reverence.

"No, I'm not a Saihai, just an ordinary Muslin like yourself, sir.' Tuloyedin went on with deliberation,

"These years I have been a roving dervish, visiting many an ancient mosque—starting from the Holy Fraternity in Quanzhou, thence to the Sacred Memorial at Guangzhou, the True Faith at Hangzhou, the Small Peach Orchard Mosque at Shanghai, the Pure Enlightment at Nanjing, the Tranquil Meditation at Xian, the Great Eastern at Kaifeng, the Great Southern at Jinan, the Mosque on the Qing River at Jining, the Cangzhou Temple and the Bozhen Mosques, Tianjin's Great Southern and Northern Mosques, and now I'm in Peking."

Listening to Tuloyedin reeling off in one breath a whole string of names of temples where he had left his footprints, temples which were scattered like stars throughout the greater part of China, Liang was wideeyed and speechless with astonishment.

As the two men talked, the boy who had come along with Tuloyedin gulped down the tea Jade Girl kept serving cup after cup, seven or eight of them in all, which showed how thirsty he must have been. Jade Girl, seeing how much respect her father had for the old man, was of course very polite towards the boy, filling and refilling his cup, though she was secretly amused by him. The boy, on his part, was too bashful to speak to this slim and snow-white complexioned girl. Nor did he dare to interrupt the elders, so awed by the dignified demeanor of Liang Yiqing. After drinking his fill, he sat woodenly on the stool next to the wall and glanced around the room, resting his eyes on the various jade objects that were on the table and the chest of drawers, shifting his glance at long intervals, murmuring admirations under his breath. The youth was astounded by what he saw. To him the Rare Gem Studio was a strange world that he had happened to break into, a world of novelty and mystery.

"So many places you and your boy have been to. Is the lad your grandson, sir?" Liang asked after taking a glance at the boy.

"No," replied the old man with a smile, "Allah did not bestow upon me any offspring. He's accompanying me on my travels. A yatim.\fn{Orphan} His Arabic name's Ibrahim."

The mentioning of his name roused the lad from his trance-like fascination in the jade wonderland. He turned to Tuloyedin.

"Baba, are you calling me?"

It was when the boy turned around that Liang Yiqing had a good look at the young face. Although shabbily clad, the lad was very handsome—a round face with a pointed chin, straight nose and pleasant-looking mouth, high forehead, jet-black eyebrows that were slightly knit as though he were thinking about something and the rather deep-set eyes flashing with intelligence. Liang thought to himself: What eyes! One glance was enough to tell they were the eyes of a Hui, of a person of competence! The boy reminded him of the time when he was the same age, learning the craft from his father who said to him,

"Little Qing, with eyes like yours, you needn't be taught the trade, you can learn by watching."

At the recollection he felt a tinge of sympathy for the promising lad, but he refrained from voicing it. Instead, he smiled at the boy and answered for Tuloyedin,

"No, Ibrahim, Baba did not call you. He was talking to me. Now go up for a closer look if you like." Then, turning to Tuloyedin, he asked,

"Does Baba intend to take him back to Fujian after your visit here?"

Unwittingly, Liang was addressing the old man "Baba " after the boy. In the parlance of Muslims, "Baba" is a courtesy title for elderlies and scholars, akin to "fuzi" (teacher) in the Han language, though it has come to be the tenn of address for grandfather. There was a twofold meaning in Liang's calling Tuloyedin "Baba."

"No, I have no family in Quanzhou. Ka'bah is my destination," the old man replied as he stroked his flowing beard.\fn{Ka'bah: a small cubical building in the courtyard of the Great Mosque at Mecca containing a black stone sacred to Muslims throughout the world. It is not only the chief object of their pilgrimage to Mecca, but also the sacrament in whose dircction they face when saying solat (prayers) five times a day. The English translieration of the term is "Kaaba."}

"Ka'bah! On a pilgrimage to Ka'bah, sir?" I Another astonishment for Liang. He knew that for all Muslims a pilgrimage to Ka'bah is their loftiest aspiration, their ultimate destination and their greatest honor. But Ka'bah was so very far away, at the ends of the earth. A journey that he, Liang Yiqing, a craftsman, had never even dared to imagine, and yet this penniless, wandering old man had the courage to make, and taking along a young boy at that! He could not refrain from asking,

"Is the lad going with you?"

"Of course," Tuloyedin replied calnily. "Ibrahim will go too. Without him I'd probably die before crossing all those mountains and rivers. May Allah bless our journey so that we may reach the Heavenly Hall safe and sound. If I should die on the way, at least Ibrahim won't give up. He's young; he'll certainly make it!"

At this, Liang cast a look of esteem at the lofty-minded elder Tuloyedin and the young aspiring Ibrahim.

*

Out of a strong sense of the bonds of religion and blood, Liang Yiqing insisted that Toluyedin stay longer at his place to recover from his fatigue and raise some money for the long journey ahead before setting out again. This might be their first and last meeting, he reflected. Tuloyedin accepted Liang's hospitality, but not any gifts from him. He said Muslims had no more regard for money than for drifting clouds and would be at home anywhere since all Muslims were duoshtis (brothers), and that he trusted that wherever he might be, there would always be a brother to offer him a clean bowl of rice and a clean cup of water, which would be more than sufficient for him.

At this, Liang again felt moved. He then cleaned the front room and put up beds for the visitors and himself, while his wife and daughters would sleep in the back room as usual. So the arrangement caused no inconvenience.

For the moment, Liang arranged for the visitors to bathe in the "water-room." The ghusl, or thorough ablution, is a required ritual before worshipping Allah. When they were unable to find any water during their years of roving, Tuloyedin and Ibrahim often had to resort to "token ablution"—first running their handS over the dirt on the ground and then rubbing their faces and hands in simulation of bathing, in devout Muslim fashion. Through taking "thorough ablution" here, the two travellers cleansed themselves of the filth as well as the fatigue accumulated in the course of their long journey.\fn{All this is specifically allowed in the Qur'an:H}

When the sun had sunk and night was thickening, Liang performoo salat, or worshipping Allah, after Tuloyedin. As prescribed, Muslims perform salat five times a day: early morning before sunrise (Salat al-Subh), in the afternoon (Salat al-Zuhr), at sunset (Sa/at al-'Asr), at dusk right after sunset (Sa/at al-Maghrib) and at night (Salat al-'Isha).As he was busy plying his craft all year round, Liang often neglected these all-important rites, unlike his wife and daughters who performed them every day without fail. Now that he had made the acquaintance of a descendant of Saihai, he could not but feel shame and, to amend his earlier negligence, was extra devout in performing the salat before daybreak the next day.

After the morning worship, Jade Girl set about to clean the house, front and back, a daily chore of hers. But before she had a chance to do that, the clever Ibrahim had given the workshop a cleaning already, for which he won a smile of thanks from her. Liang, however, would not take this in the same spirit. He chided her for lack of consideration for their guest and apologized to Ibrahim,

"I am sorry to have put you to such trouble. Very sorry!"

After breakfast Tuloyedin took Ibrahim out, first to pay respects to the remains of their forefathers at the mosque in Ox Street, then to visit and worship at the mosque at the Four Archways in the East City, Pushou Temple in Jinshifang Street and the Fanling Temple in Er-tiao Lane. These four great mosques of Peking were at least 500 years old and, as such, had long been held in reverence by Baba Tuloyedin.

After his guests had left to visit the mosques, Liang renewed his toil at the "water-bench." He felt as if God was helping him and found the work lighter and pleasanter than usual.

In the evening when the old man and the lad returned, Mrs. Liang served tea and dinner, at which Tuloyedin talked about his day's outing to everybody's delight. After dinner, instead of working as usual in the lamplight, Liang had very strong tea served and asked Tuloyedin to lecture on the Qur'an. The old man first recited some passages in Arabic and then explained them very clearly in the Han language sentence by sentence, word by word. For the first time in his life Liang came to know what wa'z (religious precepts) were. He had been muddling along in the dark all this time; now at the age of forty, he felt enlightened and found life more meaningful.

Without anything to occupy himself with, Ibrahim sat staring at the jade carvings. Jade Girl, who by nature was not at all shy, and never uneasy before strangers, went up to him, her younger sister in her arms.

"Have you any idea how these objects are made?" she asked.

Ibrahim was gazing at the piece Prime Fruit of the South, a cluster of fresh litchis, crimson as rubies, their jade-like flesh exposed where the shells had burst open. To Ibrahim, the litchi was particular dear, as it was native to his homeplace. Without thinking he said,

"Why, this … this isn't man-made! It must have been picked off a tree!" Jade Girl chuckled.

"You are funny! D'you really think it's real? That it's edible? Try biting it and you'll break your teeth! Let me tell you. It was made by my father. It took him three months to do it. Ibrahim could only gape in astonishment.

"See," said Jade Girl knowledgeably, "this is one large piece of agate. You know, agate may be white, red, as well as blue, green, pink and black. Sometimes a chunk may have several different colours, like this one. Before working on it, my father studied it over and over again and thought for days and days and finally hit upon this design. The parts that are red were cut into litchis, the streaks of green just right for the leaves and branches, and the white flecks that are good for neither shells or leaves, were made into the flesh of the bursting fruit. Now, isn't that a clever idea?"

"Ah."

Ibrahim was hard put to voice his admiration. Such .exppressions as "unexcelled ingenuity" and "heaven-inspired craftsmanship" were not within his vocabulary. He could only murmer,

"Made by hand? By the hands of man?"

"Of course by the hands of man." Jade Girl was proud of her father's superb craftsmanship. "There's nothing my father's hands can't make. Just take a look at this vase with a hundred chain-links!"

She was pointing at a vase carved of green jade. The body of the vase was square in shape and! bulging in the middle, its neck long and slender, its mouth small, and its surface satin-smooth without too much ornamental engraving. What was most fascinating was that the heads of two anImals on its sides were carved in high relief, each with a small ring dangling from the mouth linked to another ring, which in turn was linked to another, then another … until I they formed a chain. The vase was therefore named One Hundred Link Chain Vase.

"It's made of Dushan jade from Nanyang, Henan Province," said Jade Girl. "Isn't it a beauty? You know, these two jade chaina—"

"How are the links joined together?," asked Ibrahim after scrutinizing the vase carefully from various angles and failing to find any slits where the links were joined.

"What? The links joined together? Do you think the links were carved separately and then joined to each other? It can't possibly be done!" Jade Girl was amused by his innocence, yet she was proud in disclosing the secret.

"Just think. Jade is both hard and brittle. It can't be kneaded or welded. How could links made of it be joined together?" Ibmhim was stumped.

"1'll tell you how it's done. The whole vase is made of a single piece of jades tone; the rings are carved in a way so that they interlock with one another."

Ibmhim was astounded. Looking at the jade chains with their links separate yet interlocking, he could not for the life of him figure out what hands could have produced this miracle. He kept muttering,

"That's too difficult. Too, too difficult."

"Of course it's not easy." Racalling how her father had toiled day in, day out, she sighed with loving pity for him.

"If everyone could make an object like this, it would not be a rarity. Oh, my father, all day long he has nothing in his mind but jade, contemplates and handles nothing but jade. Grinding and polishing at the bench, spending weeks on a small piece, several months on a large one. I'm told there's a big mountain carved of jade in the Imperial Palace that took a large number of craftsmen more than a dozen years. And my Papa's Papa was one of them."

At this, Ibrahim saw in his mind's eye a long river of jade, thousands upon thousands of skilled artisans grinding away in silence until they were hoary-haired and drained of blood and life itself; grinding until the rough stones were transformed into priceless artifacts of beguiling beauty. Jade Girl's "Papa's Papa" is no more, but the treasures he created with his hands survive him; his superb craftsmanship remains alive; his descendant, Jade Girl's father, is carrying on. Yes, Ibrahim concluded, this long river of jade will keep flowing on for ever and ever Lost in thought, Ibrahim kept repeating Jade Girl's words, "Grinding, grinding" while unconsciously rubbing his hands. He was carried away by the miraculous creation of beauty .

"All jade works are produced through grinding."

Before Ibrahim, Jade Girl spoke like an experienced artisan.

"The more the grinding, the finer the piece. That's how the finished piece is so smooth and lustrous."

For demonstration, she picked up a small jade bowl next to the one-hundred-link-chain vase. Ibrahim took a careful look at the bowl. It was snow-white, lustrous and translucent, its body thin as eggshell so that the fingers of Jade Girl holding the bowl could be vaguely discerned through it.

The younger girl Little Jade reached out her hand and cried,

"I want the bowl. Let me have it!" Quickly Jade Girl withdrew the hand. holding the bowl from her younger sister, saying:

"You can't play with it. If you break it, I'll beat you, even if Papa doesn't."

Little Jade gave up, pouting in disappointment. To her, Elder Sister was the same as Papa and Mama, whom she must obey. Holding up the bowl in her hand, Jade Girl turned to Ibrahim.

"Have you any idea how jade gets to be so smooth and glossy? I'll tell you how. At the final stage of grinding, instead of using a grinding wheel, you use a bottle-gourd."

"A bottle-gourd?" echoed Ibrahim, his large jet-black eyes blinking. He could not for the life of him imagine what gourds had to do with jade carving.

"Polish the stone with gourds, that's how. And the gourds must be grown at Pony Bridge Village, those from anywhere else won't work. What's more, to polish the jade to a shine, you must apply some 'magic powder' to the gourds."

In her eagerness to show off, Jade Girl inadvertently let out the top secret. of jade craftsmanship. When she realized she had made a slip, she told herself that it did not matter as Ibrahim would be leaving in another day or two and was not in the trade anyway.

But the lad was enchanted by the almighty magic gourd and powder, by all that he had heard and seen. He felt as though he were in a fantasy land. The delicate jade bowl in Jade Girl's hand seemed to be a luminous moon veiled by flimsy clouds, shimmering softly over him and drawing him step by step closer.

"Feel it. Smooth as Little Jade's hands," Jade Girl said as she carried her baby sister up to him.

"Oh, it's smooth, very smooth." Ibrahim foolishly ran his fingers over Little Jade's small hand.

"Did I ask you to feel her hand? I mean the bowl."

Jade Girl could not help giggling, seeing Ibrahim so dense. Then holding the bowl up to him, she said,

"It's all right to feel it, really."

"Oh!" he took the bowl as if it were some sacred object. The jade bowl was now in his hands. As his rough fingers ran over its smooth, creamy surface, he felt a pleasant chill passing through his palms and thence throughout his entire body, as if he were touching the moon and stars in the distant celestial space. It seemed that this happy moment was what he had been living so very long for. He felt a contentment, excitement and elation he had never experienced before. As if he were holding not a jade bowl but some ethereal spirit with whom he was at one. He was intoxicated, transported, Ioblivious of everything, of even himself, enchanted by the jade fiend.

"Take care. Don't drop it!"

He heard a voice coming from he knew not where, a voice at once very distant and yet very close. Perhaps it was Jade Girl speaking, though he could not rocall who she was nor where he himself was. A strange noise suddenly breaking the silence of his fantasy land awoke him and he was back in the world.

Crash! The jade bowl slipped from his numb hands onto the brick floor, its fragments sheer as egg-shell scattering all over like bits of smashed thin ice in a river.

"Aiya! You, you!" Jade Girl's voice was trembling from fright.

"Oh, oh." Little Jade began wailing at the mishap.

As if struck by thunder, Ibrahim stood nailed to the ground like a wooden statue, staring dejectedly at the fragments, his eyes brimming with tears of distress and remorse. The bowl broken—broken in the twinkling of an eye! How had this happened? No more, that artifact of peerless beauty! No more, the treasure that had captivated his soul! As Jade Girl bent down to pick up the fragments, she sobbed in despair.

"The bowl is my father's love. It's his life. It's our means of living."

Ibrahim was struck dumb, his heart cut to pieces by a sharp knife. The commotion disrupted the discussion of religious tenets between the two men.

"What's happened, Ibrahim?" Tuloyedin asked as he came over.

No answer was necessary. He understood everything when he saw the shards of jade on the floor and the forlorn expression in Ibrahim's face.

Oddly, the old man only cast a stem look at Ibrahim, without scolding him at all. He stood by without uttering a word and, nonchalantly stroking his long white beard with his right hand, watched the owner of the Rare Gem Studio in silence. He was waiting to see how Liang, in the present situation, would treat his Muslim brothers. If Liang should fly into a rage, well, that would go to prove that he was a mere miser, to whom it was pointless to explain true faith and religious tenets. To Tuloyedin, material wealth was but passing clouds and worthless dirt, burdens that the vulgar clung on to for dear life.

Unexpectedly, Liang took the matter lightly. Turning to Jade Girl, he chided,

"You really gave me a start by screaming and making such a fuss. I thought something terrible had happened." With that, Liang went up to Ibrahim and, patting him on the shoulder, said without any grudge,

"It doesn't matter, my dear brother. The trinket's broken. Just let it be. I can make another by working a few extra evenings and have it ready when the customer calls for it."

Tears gushed out of the boy's eyes. Lifting his head, he said to Liang doggedly,

"I'll … pay you back for it!"

"Pay me back for it?" Surprised by Ibrahim's stubborn pride, Liang said jokingly,

"I'm afraid that's beyond you. What'll you pay me with?"

"I can pay you back. I've got two hands; I'm strong; I can do anything," said Ibrahim, chin up and chest out, holding out to Liang his two hands, which, though not fully grown, appeared aged—coarse and chapped from exposure, calloused with manual labour and so scrawny that the bones and knuckles bulged out like bamboo roots from slushy earth.

These hands Liang grasped in his own. He could barely hold back his tears. Ibrahim bit his lips and then all of a sudden burst out crying,

"Kind master, please let me stay here and serve as your apprentice!"

The plea was a surprise to himself. In that instant, the long river of jade once again appeared in his mind's eye.

Ah, he thought to himself, this is what I want to give my life to; this is where I belong!

Liang did not utter a word. He seemed to be realizing for the first time that this boy, though only half as tall as himself, had aspirations as high as his own. He felt the same blood flowing through them. But he did not know how to answer the boy. Slowly and hesitantly Liang turned around and watched the serious-countenanced Tuloyedin. After all, the boy was Tuloyedin's and the two of them had a long journey ahead, a long way to travel to Ka'bah, the Heavenly Hall.

Ibrahim wiped away his tears with his hand and fixed his eyes at the old man who had brought him up and taken him over mountains and across rivers. Falling on his knees abruptly, he pleaded,

"Baba, forgive me. I can't go with you." …

268.158 1. Eyes 2. Sleep 3. The Wave And The Shoal 4. Fire And Ice\fn{by Xiao Kang (1945-)} Funing County, Jiangsu Province, China (F) 2

1

When you lower your head,
Your long lashes
Screen the shadow;
When you glance around,
The warmth in your gaze
Brings stirring discoveries;
When you gaze,
Your sparkling eyes
Reveal a shy speech;
When you close your eyes
The universe resounds
In a soothing lullaby.
*
You are the soul's window
Storing thunderstorms.
Having you, I can bury
All squabbles and nags;
Having you, I've tasted
Honeyed silence.

*

Ah, let me look straight at you,
Listening to your eternal refrain,
Let me walk close to you, walking
From your eyes to the bottom of your heart.

2

My dear, please move away your arm
For I'm not used to, nor need
To fall asleep pillowing on it.
Don't linger in Any silken entanglement,
Don't be drowned in a
Drunkenness that ensnares like a net, just Save a little for the deep starry skies
Save a little for the rippling springwater
For sleep is a storehouse of energy
Don't let the springtime of youth
Wither in vain in the fire of passion.
*
My dear, please remove your arm,
Daytime din has ceased
Leaving only the night wind whistling
May your dream be a land on heroic shore
Forever blooming with fresh flowers and birds soaring
May my dream be a deep, deep sea
Where ships forever voyage to distant places
Then let us meet in our dreams
Ah sleep is life's germination
Let life's sweet wine be eternally
Brimming in the golden cup of new life.
*
My dear, please remove your arm
Let me say "good night"
Drowsiness has descended
Oh, I long for sleep, for sleep.

3

The small boat is grounded in the shallows
They've found the most isolated place
Everything disappears from the world
Only two souls singing,
Join the chorus of waves and shoals.
*
He silently ponders: that wave
How like a deeply loving girl
Charmed by the shoal she gently strokes his shoulders
And when she's stricken in his bosom of the shoal
How splendidly bloom the sea flowers …
*
She quietly muses: that shoal,
How like a lovesick young man

Loving the wave, he begs her to be his bride
Forever passionately in love,
Sharing one seabed …
*
Ah, lovesick shoal …
Ah, loving wave …
Her fine hair flowing in his arm's bay
He's drowned in her subtly heady fragrance.
Everything disappears in this world
Only the wave and the shoal pouring out their songs.

4

Fire are you
And ice I am
Having met you
How can it not melt
This long kept, unquenchable tenderness?
*
Fire are you
And ice I am
In the sunlight
I gaze upon
Your burning flame.
Its shine and transparency
And you, are you savouring
The snowflake's gleaming love
Pulsing beneath the light?
*
Fire are you
And ice I am
Doubting not the spells love casts
Hiding not the crazed outpourings of love
In the stillness of night
Beneath the shivering stars
It will quietly shout aloud
Crystal—
Soul's crystal
Whether it is fire
Or ice
Who can resist passionately loving —Such innocence
—Such luminescence?

1946

21.65 Hong Taitai\fn{by Cheng Nai-shan (1946-)} Shanghai, China (F) 5

Everybody called her Hong Taitai.\fn{A note reads: Taitai is the traditional term for Mrs. or wife, which fell into disuse after 1949 for being considered a very bourgeois title and was severely discouraged during the "cultural revolution." The Chinese term is retained here, rather than replaced with the English "Mrs." to call attention to this connotation which the term "Mrs." lacks.} Fifty years ago that name was celebrated throughout Shanghai society. A party marking a baby's first month of life, a wedding banquet or a birthday all fell short of perfection if Hong Taitai was not in attendance. There was a period after 1949 when the words "Hong Taitai" seemed redolent of mothballs, as if they had been shaken from a camphorwood chest. But within the circle of the few rich families in Shanghai, for example, they still carried a good deal of weight right up until the “great proletarian cultural revolution” of the 1960s. In Shanghai, one had one’s own little circle of happiness. And no matter how the storms raged outside, as long as one had three meals a day and stuck to one’s own affairs—and thanks to the government policy of buying out the bourgeoise one could rest assured of eating at the Park Hotel today, the Maison Rouge or Jade Buddha Temple tomorrow—no one would interfe.

It was a very active period for Hong Taitai. The managers of both the public and private sections of the big restaurants and hotels all knew her; she was a very warm person. If Hong Taitai came forward to do the honours for a banquet on some special occasion, it would be reasonably priced, but ample. And the food would be something special,quite out of the ordinary.

My first impression of her dates from my tenth birthday.

I was the ninth child in the family, nicknamed “Jiujiu,” or “Little Ninth.” My parents were in America. When they left they had been afraid that I was too small to make such a long trip and would be in the way. Then the situation had changed, unexpectedly and so greatly, and I was left behind in Shanghai for good to live with my eldest brother and his wife. My brother was twenty-one years older than I and often joked that he could have fathered a child my age. He did spoil me as if I were his own daughter. Fatherliness in an eldest brother has always been the Chinese way.

The day of my tenth birthday they did things up a bit on my account, though it was nothing more than noodles and a few dishes. In those days my brother and sister-in-law were rather careful of appearances. They couldn’t have competed with Hong Taitai at any rate; she was the wife of a bourgeois. Brother and his wife, no matter what, were subject to their work units, and they had to be careful. So they did no more than invite the brothers and sisters still in Shanghai over for an ordinary family dinner.

We had just sat down—we hadn’t even got around to pouring the wine—when there was a knock at the door, and a voice, vivacious and sweet, was heard:

“I’ve come to beg a bowl of birthday noodles.”

“It’s Hong Taitai!” my sister-in-law gasped, startled, and pushing back her chair she fled into her room to change her dress.

“That’s how thoughtful she is.”

My brother hastened to open the door; sisters and sisters-in-law busied themselves getting an extra bowl and chopsticks, bustling and rushing about. Thinking back on it now, this Hong Taitai’s entrance into my life was strangely like that of the domineering Wang Xifeng in A Dream of Red Mansions who always announced her arrival on to the scene with some arresting remark like: “So sorry I’m late welcoming visitors from afar!” The exact words were different, but the effect was the same. Her voice was so confident and hearty; she had an air of being completely at home.

“Hong Taitai!”

The family stood to greet her.

“Ah, I made it on time,” Hong Taitai said, removing her white kidskin gloves. She wore a square of checked wool on her head, the ends so long they fluttered with her every movement, adding immensely to her charm. When she took off her full-length cashmere coat, she was wearing a claret-coloured qipao\fn{A note reads: Traditional high-necked, close-fitting Chinese dress.} underneath, a phoenix embroidered in gold thread down the front, dazzling in its brilliance. In the 1950s such elegance had become a rare sight for anyone, let alone a child such as myself who had as yet seen nothing of the world. This sudden manifestation of such a gorgeously dressed beauty took my breath away.

She sat down next to me and pressed a red envelope into my hand. There was a shining golden character glued to the envelope—longevity—but because it was in the traditional, complicated form, it took me a moment to recognize it. At that time such red envelopes, used for giving presents of money to children on special occasions, were no longer on sale. Hong Taitai said she had glued it together herself out of red paper; the character was also her own handiwork.

“Hong Taitai, really, you shouldn’t put yourself out of pocket over Jiujiu’s birthday. She’s a child.”

My sister-in-law had changed and come back out, and though she was much younger than Hong Taitai, she looked faded beside her. The only thing one noticed in that whole room was that brilliant combination of red and gold: dazzling, but pleasingly so!

“Mr. Hong and I are old friends of your parents. I went to see Jiujiu at the hospital the day she was born. She was so alert and bright-eyed, such personality, not like most babies. When the nurse brought you in you were as pink as a glutinous rice dumpling.” She described it vividly, and I was enthraled.

“At first your parents planned to come for you after a while, but now look … They must miss you terribly. I pity you that your mother isn’t here. So though I pay no attention when one of your brothers or sisters has a birthday, Jiujiu is different; I have to come to celebrate your tenth birthday, to stand in for your mother and raise a glass to you, wishing you long life!”

Her words warmed my heart.

After the meal, my brothers and sisters put on some music: A Rose for You, a Xinjiang folk-song quite popular at the time, and the brothers and brothers-in-law all surged toward Hong Taitai. But she frowned, and with a graceful flick of the hand in which she held a cigarette, said, “Put on Bing Crosby.\fn{Bing Crosby aka Harry Lillis Crosby (1904?-1977), American popular singer.} Us old folks like the old songs.” When that bewitching voice was heard, she laid aside her cigarette and began, tripping lightly, to dance. As she danced, the side slits in that claret qipao rose and fell, now hiding, now revealing her graceful legs. I really hoped I might grow up a bit faster and be all that she was: full of life, charming, beautiful.

When all the guests had gone, I took out the red envelope she had given me and counted: forty yuan! Forty yuan in those days!

“A grand gesture. Mr. Hong is the only one who could afford her,” sister-in-law said, pouting her lower lip. “What a memory she has. How could she remember Jiujiu’s birthday, let alone that it was her tenth!”

“That’s her stock-in-trade.”

Having said that, brother added sympathetically, “Her lot is a hard one, too. If she’d been born into a good family and got an education, she’d certainly have done well, an intelligent person like that.”

Only later did I find out that Mr. Hong was in the raw silk business and when Mrs. Hong took up with him, he was already quite successful. He had a wife and family, but he rented a small house in the western district of Shanghai and lived there with Hong Taitai. She it was he took everywhere with him, thus in everybody’s mind, she was “Hong Taitai.” But there was talk, both out in the open and on the sly, some of it not very complimentary.

As for the true facts of Hong Taitai’s background, no one was able to find out. Even the Hongs’ housemaid, Ah Ju, knew only that one night, carrying a white leather bag, she had arrived with Mr. Hong and had been there ever since. It was said that Hong Taitai was a good cook, and Mr Hong had grown pink and stout under her care. Almost overnight she became well- known; Mei Lanfang\fn{A note reads: A Beijing opera star.} and Zhou Xuan\fn{A note reads: A popular film star.} both were guests in the Hong family parlor. For a time, the house was filled with important guests every day. It seemed that this Hong Taitai had “arrived” in society the same way-a white leather bag in hand. And with her arrival, Mr. Hong’s business expanded.

*

My second meeting with Hong Taitai occurred while I was in senior middle school, at Mr. Hong’s memorial service. Elder Brother was the natural representative of our family; he took me along on the strength of my having been the recipient of Mr. Hong’s forty-yuan birthday gift. The service was held at the International Funeral Home. There were leading comrades from both the Chinese People’s Political Consultative Conference and the Association of Industry and Commerce present.

As we entered, I saw Hong Taitai dressed in a black taffeta qipao with close-fitting sleeves, wearing a pair of the black leather pointed-toe shoes that were extremely popular in the sixties. Though there were indications that she was putting on weight, her graceful waist made her appear as lovely as ever. She walked composedly among those who had come to pay their condolences, greeting those who ought to be greeted, nodding to those who needed nodding to. The grief weighing on her made her seem even more dignified and noble. On the hairnet holding the thick tresses was a spray of pure white orchids,\fn{A note reads: Flowers, real or artificial, are worn as symbols of mourning.} giving her a very refined air. As soon as her glance fell on us, she hurried to greet us.

“Jiujiu, you’ve become a young lady.”

Her gentle voice dispelled the dread I felt in this venue of eternal parting.

“You’re the next generation. Wear a yellow flower.” Her soft white hand fastened the yellow bloom to my blouse. She began to speak of all Mr. Hong’s good qualities, and as she spoke she grew sad and dabbed at the tears in the comers of her eyes with a flaxen handkerchief. By comparison with the main wife, weeping and wailing to one side, she appeared to be more highly bred, more worthy of the title Mrs. Yet in the end it was mere similitude, for when the formalities began, she conscientiously peeled off to one side, a mourner who knew her place.

“Hong Taitai will suffer now! This is really difficult for her!” the other mourners commented surreptitiously among themselves.

"Yes, Mr. Hong was a man among men. But was he willing to entrust the family property to Hong Taitai? Naturally, it was safer with his wife. With him gone, Hong Taitai is left with nothing, not even a last word. It's hard for her."

Hearing such talk, looking at the lovely black-garbed Hong Taitai, I thought of Chen Bailu in Cao Yu's play, Sunrise.

Once Mr. Hong died, we saw little of Hong Taitai. In the adult's eyes, she was, after all, a woman of uncertain past!

*

In a twinkling, I was twenty years old. The celebration was still a family affair. Recalling the gaiety of ten years ago, I couldn't help thinking of Hong Taitai. I accused Elder Brother of being a snob, but he said I was naïve. As we locked horns, there was a soft knocking at the door.

It was Hong Taitai's maid, Ah Ju, a woman about thirty years old from Shaoxing. She was carrying a red-lacquered tray which held a specially prepared duck. Attached to the duck was a glittering gold shou character—longevity—exactly like the one I had received ten years before.

"Hong Taitai's indisposed, so she sent me to convey her best wishes to Jiujiu. She prepared the duck herself," Ah Ju rattled off as instructed. One could see she had learned it by heart before she came. Everyone asked after Hong Taitai, and Ah Ju stammered. "The house has been let out. Hong Taitai has a second-floor room with a balcony and a room on the first floor for me and the kitchen. It's enough for the two of us; it's fine, just fine. Goodbye now."

With that she made her escape.

Everybody began to inspect the duck. It lacked nothing in appearance, fragrance or flavour. It was then the three hard years of natural calamities. A duck such as this one would cost at least ten yuan on the black market. At the same time that we were saying what a crime it was to eat Hong Taitai's food, we were all scrutinizing the duck. It was lean. It was quite possible that it was one Ah Ju had stood in line all night to buy, in which case it wouldn't have cost much more than two yuan. Since it had been personally cooked and sent over specially, it seemed to be worth much more than that. But the gift was small after all, so she didn't appear in person.

"She's a very capable woman!" everyone agreed.

Not long after, the tempest blew up in 1966\fn{The Cultural Revolution (1966-1976) is meant.} and people could hardly fend for themselves, much less worry about Hong Taitai.

*

Two years passed and things became relatively quiet, I happened to be walking by Hong Taitai's one day, and looking up at her balcony without thinking, I suddenly spied the old familiar curtain fabric. Spurred by this, I headed upstairs. A young man wearing a work overall with work safely printed on it barred my way and asked in a rough manner, "Who are you? Who are you looking for?"

"I'm looking for Hong Taitai," I stammered out.

I regretted that as soon as it was out. To call someone "taitai" in those days was to invite criticism.

Unexpectedly, he sang out, "Hong Taitai, someone to see you," and led me upstairs.

"Jiujiu!"

Hong Taitai welcomed me with surprise and pleasure and wiped away tears, moved. How rare in those days, a genuine sigh and embrace. I leaned against her bosom and cried.

The room was still furnished with French-style furniture. The mirror was covered with pictures of leaders, the best method of protecting mirrors in those days. Ah Ju brought tea, and I had just said, "Thank you, Ah Ju," when Hong Taitai corrected me softly:

"Call her Sister Ah Ju. I've adopted her. That man on the stairs was Ah Ju's husband."

Hong Taitai was wearing a blue Chinese-style cotton jacket. With her hair cut short, in revolutionary fashion, she looked much like someone who would be principal of an elementary school.

"Thanks to their moving in with me, no one dares bother me. The house was ransacked till there was not even one yuan left and I was half-dead myself. As I was crying over it, Ah Ju came and said we should bring her man to live with us; he was a worker and no one would dare bully me then. I said I didn't want to involve them in my troubles, but she said, 'Anyway I'm a servant. Even if worst came to worst I'd still be a servant. I'm not afraid.' I'm so grateful to Ah Ju and her family!"

"Hong Taitai," Sister Ah Ju cut her short, embarrassed. "I've told you before, don't call me Hong Taitai. Call me mother."

"Ah." Ah Ju laughed ingenuously. "I can't do it. I'm not used to it."

"I get only eighteen yuan a month for living expenses, so I have to depend on the two of them to take care of me, and they have two children of their own."

Hong Taitai sighed deeply.

"Ai, how could I have come to this! If I had only gone out to work earlier on, I wouldn't have got into this predicament, no income at all!"

Hong Taitai kept me on to dinner. She hadn't been able to break that habit. With Ah Ju, her husband and their two lovely innocent daughters, plus Hong Taitai and myself, there were six gathered round the square table. It was a home-style meal of two dishes and a soup with an additional plate of scrambled eggs in my honour. The bluish glow of the eight-watt fluorescent tube shone gently on us. Hong Taitai now and again put some food into the children's bowls with her chopsticks, very grandmotherly. I thought I heard them call her "Nanna," and I found it very strange.

"They mean mother's mother," Hong Taitai explained. "I like them to call me that."

The children, seeing their opportunity, purposely raised a chorus of "Nanna," and Hong Taitai beamed. I sensed that she had never before laughed so contentedly. Her son-in-law stolidly scooped in his food without saying a word. But when I was taking my leave he dashed ahead turning on the stairway lights all the way down.

"My son-in-law hasn't any education; he's a bit rough, but he's a very good man," Hong Taitai told me softly. "There's no need to be afraid of him."

When I got back and told my brother and sister-in-law what had happened, they expressed great admiration for Hong Taitai.

"That Hong Taitai, she can take the bad with the good. What an incredibly capable woman!"

Later I got married. Tied down to housework and child, I hardly made the effort to see my brother and sister-in-law, let alone Hong Taitai.

*

In 1982, my parents made their first visit back to Shanghai from the US. All the old friends gathered; and of course Hong Taitai was invited as well. During the "cultural revolution" many of them had lost touch with each other, and they were glad to renew relationships, but though it grew quite late, Hong Taitai still didn't appear.

"Where's Hong Taitai? We're waiting for her reappearance in society."

"Ah, didn't you know, she's a famous slowpoke."

Just as we were really growing anxious, she arrived, accompanied by Ah Ju. She was wearing a downy mohair coat over a close-fitting black satin jacket, and though her hair was raven black, you could tell it had been dyed. Yes, she had aged some, but she was as graceful and refined as ever. The company rose to greet her, but she pushed Ah Ju forward.

"My adopted daughter."

When it came time to eat, no place had been set for Ah Ju.

"Ah Ju, go out and have a bowl of noodles and come back for Hong Taitai in two hours," we suggested.

"Just squeeze together a bit."

Hong Taitai pulled Ah Ju to the table and asked the waiter to bring another bowl and chopsticks. The others were rather startled; the atmosphere grew somewhat embarrassed. Though society as a whole had changed, such circles still clung to iron-clad rules. Before all the hot dishes had been served, Hong Taitai got up to leave, saying she had something to do.

The gathering fell to discussing her.

"How could she take a servant into the family? She must be crazy!"

"Well, it's not so surprising. Her own background is more or less the same."

"That's what happens when one lives with servants. You become petty and overlook etiquette."

These dreadful comments, served up with the food and drink, dropped airily from their mouths. I hastily gathered up my child and left.

*

A few days ago, a woman friend of mine moved by chance to a place in Hong Taitai's lane, and I dropped by to see her since I was in the neighborhood.

She welcomed me happily.

"Jiujiu's come!" Her silver hair made her look kinder than ever. She said she no longer dyed it.

"I'm getting old, and it doesn't turn out well any more," she said, patting her hair. Sister Ah Ju politely brought tea and sweets for me.

"Jiujiu thinks of me. Of the old crowd, you're the only one who thinks of coming to see me. How big is your son now?"

"Ten."

As I said it, I remembered my own tenth birthday and told her how struck I had been by her beauty.

She smiled wanly.

"That's past." She told me that in the beginning a few old friends still came to see her. Now everything was back to normal after the "cultural revolution." There were even mah-jong parties and dancing, but she was done with it all because her stiff old legs couldn't manage it now.

"Actually it's all a waste of money and time. Ah Ju is so busy. I can't do much to help her, but I can knit a few sweaters, to thank her for being so good to me. They're extremely frugal themselves, but they know my delicate appetite, and there's always one dish especially for me at each meal. There aren't many daughters—even natural-born ones—like that." She touched my sleeve, speaking emotionally, while her hands never ceased their work on the small sweater she was knitting.

"Mother Hong, what are you making?" A passing neighbour stopped in.

"My granddaughters having her baby any day now. I'm knitting it a little sweater."

"Well! The fourth generation! You're very lucky, Mother Hong!"

"Yes, I am," Hong Taitai replied contentedly, and she smiled.

72.90 Race Day\dn{by Bai Luo aka Bai Lecheng (1946-)} Guangdong Province, China (M) 4

On the screen, a dozen thoroughbreds lined up in their starting stalls. During the parade before the race, the blue of the ocean and the complementing green of the turf had delighted Zhang Fanzhou, but that delight was wiped out now by the tension that gripped him as he waited for horse number seven to break from the stalls.

From the instant the stalls opened, he had eyes only for number seven. Over a straight kilometer, the key to the race is the sprint finish over the last few dozen meters. His heart throbbed convulsively to the beat of the pounding hooves, an insistent rhythm that stopped abruptly as number seven sped past the finish post in first place.

He heaved a sigh of satisfaction and turned the television off. The rest of the card was of no interest to him. Two thousand Hong Kong dollars, half of his savings, had been riding on number seven.

Playing the ponies was something he had learned to do in a month or so, an indication of how well he had adapted to the local ways in the half year or more since he had fled the village school in Guangdong Province to a shack on the island of Hong Kong. But his past wagers had never been more than a hundred. This time it had felt like do or die.

His wife Mo Jinlan had gone out, taking three-year-old Xiaohao with her. She had told him she was going to Guntong to see her cousin and make arrangements to rent an apartment. Tomorrow afternoon, his parents would cross the bridge at Luowu, coming from China to share their life in the "paradise" of Hong Kong. "Paradise" for him was a cramped space between wooden slats, which he had taken for a thousand Hong Kong dollars shortly after he arrived. It was hard enough for the three of them to turn around in the few square feet they had, how could they fit another two people? Jinlan was probably right—they'd have to find some way to let the old folks live in comfort for the first while at least, then think again in a few months. That way they wouldn't be too let down when they arrived.

But what about the rent? He had his own way of looking at it. Jinlan was always nagging him, complaining that his mind had been "struggled" out of him by the village schoolchildren. The only thing those little hooligans wanted to learn was how to beat people with billy clubs and ransack homes. When they came to his house, there wasn't much for them. But they still called him an overseas Chinese bastard, and when they discovered copies of the cadre newspaper Reference News which he had stashed away under his bed, they accused him of "stealing state secrets" and gave him a vicious beating. Thus the farce was played out. Had they really beaten the sense out of him? His mind couldn't be completely useless—if it was, his boss at the restaurant would have been worried that he'd be forgetful, and would never have hired him to make deliveries.

Jinlan also nagged him about playing the ponies. But he'd only done it three times. Once the guys at the restaurant had clubbed together for a quartet. In order to get in with them, he'd pitched in fourteen dollars. They hadn't won, but he'd benefited from their loss. By putting in the fourteen bucks, he'd become one of the boys—now they called him "Ah-cheung" instead of "Mainland Cheung."

As a graduate in mathematics, he knew how to calculate whether something was worthwhile.

Another time was on his birthday. In a burst of inspiration he had tried his luck with a daily double using the numbers for the month and the date, and this time he won. He didn't make that much on it, since both horses were heavily favored, but he was in bliss for days—Zhang Fanzhou's luck wasn't so terrible after all! The only thing that was terrible was that when he told his wife about his triumph, she'd chewed him out for being "without ambition" and "never getting ahead."

The third occasion was after Jinlan had been rushed to hospital with appendicitis. It had cost them a thousand dollars, which was more than they could really afford. He had hoped that the ponies would take pity on him and let him win back the money he had spent on doctor's bills, but this time his hopes were dashed and he lost a hundred dollars. It was just as well he no longer dared to tell Jinlan, or she might have got mad enough to take a turn for the worse, and then what would he have done? That was the most miserable day since he had come to Hong Kong!

But today was his happiest day. Five hundred dollars to win on a hundred dollar stake, and five hundred to show, multiplied ten times! He did some sums in the column of the newspaper and worked out that he would be picking up seven thousand dollars in winnings from the betting shop. Shaking with elation, he looked at his wife's picture on the wall. He wanted to shout:

"Jinlan, I was only worth two grand yesterday and now I have eight!"

But in the end he said nothing. He was afraid that Jinlan would still insist there was something wrong with his head, and even more afraid that she would fly off the handle again because he had been playing the ponies, and making such huge wagers!

He remembered that time when he had come back to the restaurant from making deliveries to find he was over twenty dollars short. After he got off work, he'd told Jinlan about it and she'd scowled and told him off:

"They really did beat the sense out of you! Just a three-figure number, a schoolchild could handle it. You've got a math degree and you still screw up!"

He didn't want to give up on this one and kept racking his brains in an attempt to remember which house it was that had underpaid him. The only explanation he could come up with was that somehow he had lost it himself.

Forget those minor irritations. Today he was a different man. He walked with easy strides, whistling a little tune. Then it occurred to him that it had been years since he had whistled; hurriedly he pulled his lips in and returned to his usual expression.

After picking up his winnings at the betting shop, he folded the thousand-dollar bills up small and slipped them into a hidden pocket in his pants behind his belt. Then he went down a side street, found his boss at the restaurant, and asked for three days off. Originally he'd planned to take only one day off to meet his parents, and to let Jinlan worry about everything else. She was at home with Xiaohao anyway and was quite prepared to look after his parents. Today, with money in his pocket, he felt different. Now he thought it would be fun to show them around Hong Kong and Kowloon.

After he'd had some dinner, Jinlan and Xiaohao came home. He asked Xiaohao if he'd eaten, and the child nodded. Jinlan just frowned when he asked her about renting a place.

"Nothing suitable?"

"Rents are too high."

"Don't fret, it's bound to cost a few bucks more to live in a high-rise."

"You can say don't fret, did you get rich all of a sudden?"

He said nothing, but whipped his hand away from the secret pocket. He'd been afraid she would ask him where he was going to get all that money from. He said nothing, and Jinlan spat out her resentment:

"Just one small apartment is twelve hundred a month, and that's all you earn! Maybe the landlord will tell us we can't cook, and then we can feed the old folks on air!"

"So what do you think we should do? They'll be coming tomorrow, we've got to have somewhere for them to move into, and you keep saying that this place is …" What had seemed like a heavy weight in his secret pocket was starting to feel lighter. Twelve hundred! His eight thousand wasn't even seven twelve hundreds, how many twelve hundreds was he going to need? He watched as his wife unlocked her camphorwood chest and took out an ornate box that she kept wrapped in a silk handkerchief. Xiaohao was playing on the bed with his building blocks, but when he saw the pretty box he crawled from the foot of the bed to the head, reached up, and begged for it. Jinlan glowered at him, and the boy was well enough trained to know he should pull his hand away and go back to his blocks.

When the box was opened, a pair of glittering gold earrings came into his view, engraved with the inscriptions "heart's desire" and "good fortune;" these were followed by a gold chain with a locket in the shape of the peach of longevity. He remembered when he and Jinlan had met her father at the Overseas Chinese Hotel in Canton, after he had come all the way from Penang to see them. The wizened old man had opened the little box and said:

"Lan, the fates were against your mother; she couldn't live to see you married. I'm not much better, either—I have nothing to offer you as a wedding gift but these few pieces of jewelry. With them I wish that you will have your heart's desires and good fortune and always be happy together."

Poor old man! When they got to Hong Kong, they discovered he'd died the month before. He hadn't told them how sick he was, since he was afraid it might prevent them from getting their visas to leave China and take care of him.

He stole a glance at his wife. Tears had sprung to her eyes, touched off by the gifts and the memory of the giver. He was about to talk about it when Jinlan wiped her eyes and said:

"There's more than three ounces of gold in these, you'll get at least ten thousand for them. That'll pay the rent for the old folks for a year or so, and we can work out what to do after that."

He choked with emotion:

"How … how can we? That's all we have to remember … we shouldn't—"

She cut him off:

"We've your parents to think of, they'll be here right away. We only got their telegram a couple of days ago, and we don't have any time to raise the money any other way. If we don't rent a place now, there may not be any place later on. There's no time to hunt around. We've paid a month in advance, and bought a bed and a quilt. You can sell the jewelry first thing in the morning, then pick them up at the station and pay the landlord for another two months to secure the lease. That way they can rest easy for the evening."

Xiaohao was bored with his building blocks. Realizing he was being ignored, he let out a yell, knocked down the beautiful house he had been building, and howled for his mother to pick him up. Jinlan hugged the child to her breast, patting him gently on the bottom to get him to sleep. The child was exhausted after being out all day.

He replaced the lid on the box and wrapped it in its silk handkerchief. Maybe the sense had been struggled out of him, but he still understood her. Jinlan was a good wife, kind and upright; to be honest, she was more concerned for his parents than he was himself. Sure she complained, but who wouldn't when the rents were so high! But here she was, ready to sacrifice those pieces of jewelry that she had risked smuggling through customs in order to keep them and the memories they held. This wasn't just any jewelry!

He patted his secret pocket again but didn't dare come clean about it. She was bound to refuse to spend money that he had come by in this way, and they wouldn't be able to celebrate the fact that his good luck meant they could get out of selling her jewelry. He was starting to resent his wife's inflexibility, but he also had to admit that her judgment was seldom wrong.

His wife and son were already in their world of dreams, but he couldn't get to sleep himself. Fortunately, this week there was Saturday and Sunday racing, so tomorrow would be a race day too. Back and forth in his brain flashed the images of galloping thoroughbreds and golden rings and lockets.

Bright and early the next morning, Jinlan wrapped her treasures in their silk handkerchief and gave them to him. She instructed him to go to Guntong, sell the jewelry and bring the money home, then set out to meet his parents' train at Honghan. She figured that the train wouldn't get in till three, so they could be there in good time.

He draped his jacket over his shoulders and slipped the transistor radio from the dresser into one of the pockets. Then, after sliding his feet into plastic thongs and running his hand through his tangled hair, he trudged wearily out of the house. For all his exhaustion, he was acutely aware of two things. One was the jewelry in the silk handkerchief, which he clasped tightly to his chest. The other was the wad of banknotes, which he patted constantly to make sure it was still there.

When he got to the bustling Guntong market, he went to a restaurant for breakfast. By his watch it was only just after nine, and he knew that most of the stores would not be open yet, so he ordered another coffee and opened the paper to pass the time.

He flipped to the racing page and was instantly mesmerized. Once again, galloping horses and glistening jewelry flashed before his eyes. Now was the time to marshal his mathematical talents to assist him in his deliberations. He had more than ten thousand dollars worth of jewelry and just over eight thousand in cash. There was no way he could make a switch without Jinlan getting suspicious. He just had to get the money, right now! He wasn't going to put up with his wife sneering at his mental powers. What he needed most of all was a sum of money to get him out of his present bind. A grand sum, that would be best, enough not only to save the jewelry that had been left to them as mementos, but also for a spacious apartment for his parents, for Jinlan and Xiaohao, enough to rid them of all their anxieties. He was as exhilarated as if he were himself astride some wild steed in full gallop. He jerked himself to his feet and strode out of the restaurant.

The atmosphere of the betting shop exactly suited his mood. The booths for filling out betting slips were crowded with people, packed so tight you couldn't even get water in between them. Late-comers, convinced that the ponies would treat them well this time, hunted out a place to squat or stand, then spread out their newspapers and betting slips and decided on a plan for the campaign ahead. Those with well-thought-out strategies had already joined the ranks heading into battle. When their turn came at the window, they fired off salvos of money, confident that the receipt from the cash register would soon be transformed into the spoils of war.

He squeezed in among them, oblivious of time, like a warrior locked in mortal combat, summoning up his last ounce of courage to defeat the God of Death, and await an anthem of victory. On such a day, a stake of a thousand to win was but an outmoded dagger. Only a bet of a thousand to win plus another thousand to show in each of the first four races would qualify as the heavy artillery of modern warfare. His firearm was primed, now he must set forth with guns blazing, to return only when the enemy's general was killed and their standard seized.

For all his modest appearance, there was something so manifestly heroic in his posture that it caused a stir in the line. Those close enough to witness it looked as if they would burst out cheering. His mind was set on the first four races of the day: if he could only win a succession of victories in these skirmishes, he would go home loaded down with booty—twenty thousand, thirty thousand, maybe even more! Intoxicated with the thought, he lurched forward, hardly aware of the direction he was headed in.

On he tramped, on and on, and when finally he looked up, an opulent aura of pearly light shone from the window, spraying his face with myriad jets and splashing him into wakefulness. From his torrid fantasy he returned to cold reality: his wife had instructed him to go to the goldsmiths and sell her jewelry. She had told him to be back by lunchtime and go with her to meet his parents. How was he going to manage it—racing didn't start today till one! How could he have failed to realize there would be a problem with the timing! He scratched at his head and cried out in anguish: It's true! With all their struggling, they've made me crazy!

If he were just to step right into the goldsmith's, the transaction could be completed in a couple of minutes, and he'd be able to get home in time with the money in his pocket. But how could he part with the "heart's desire" and "good fortune" rings and the longevity pendant, and never see them again? It had pained Jinlan so much to part with them, could he leave her with only an empty case? He couldn't sell them! He couldn't!

Suddenly decisive, he strode into a restaurant across the street and dialed a number. He spoke into the receiver without a pause:

"Something just came up, it's urgent. I can't come home right now. You and Xiaohao go ahead to the station, and I'll meet you there." He slammed the phone down before his wife had a chance to answer.

Never before had making a phone call taken so much out of him. Bone-weary, he slumped down on a stool. Maybe because there was racing today, it was quiet for a Sunday, so quiet he could hear his own heart pounding. He needed the peace for a while to sort out the chaos in his mind.

The waiter brought him a glass of water. Idly he glanced at his watch. It was almost one, so he might as well have something to eat. Which reminded him he should turn on his transistor. He fished it out of his pocket and held it to his ear. The familiar voices of the commentators were chattering away, giving their listeners the returns on the various stakes and introducing the horses. The voices were like an entrancing melody to him, instantly capturing his full attention.

The waiter brought a bowl of borsch and croutons. Mechanically he stirred it around with his spoon. The sense of hearing had taken command of his body, reducing the sense of taste to a vassal status.

The main course was spaghetti; this too he just pushed around on his plate. His pushing and stirring came to an abrupt halt; his fork stopped in mid-air, the noodles it had carried flopped to the table. The campaign had begun in defeat. He had lost the first race.

The tangle of spaghetti on his plate was knotted like his stomach. But to his ears came the sound of the beacon fires being relit; the prospect of the renewal of hostilities rekindled the hope in his heart. The waiter, who was bringing the dessert, was unperturbed. Such shows of temperament were commonplace on race days.

Dessert was a dish of pineapples in syrup, but he didn't even glance at it. He leaned back, eyes closed, waiting for them to come under the starter's orders. At the words "They're off" his body hunched forward involuntarily. His spoon lifted the morsels of pineapple into his mouth to the rhythm of the commentary, now slow, now fast, now slow again, then clattered from his hand to the table in final despair.

Half the empire was lost, but his valor was still as great as that of Xiang Yu, the hegemon of Chu. For all his conviction, he couldn't help feeling just a little panicky. He found himself starting to plead for mercy. He was going to call to the waiter to bring something to drink when he discovered a cup of black coffee had materialized on the table beside him to revive his sense of taste. He only realized as he lifted it to his lips that it was bitter; he had forgotten to add sugar.

The bitterness had at least aroused his taste buds, breaking the absolute supremacy of the sense of hearing. Gradually he regained his other senses; the return of sentiment triggered in his brain the image of Jinlan. Through a haze he saw his parents standing at his wife's side, the four members of his family peering anxiously into the crowd, desperately looking for him.

He hung his head and prayed to High Heaven to protect him, to change his luck, to see defeat turn to victory in the next race before it was too late. He let his mind go blank for a moment, waiting for the moment when his luck would change. The atmosphere was stifling, like a lead weight on his heart. But he survived his suffocation, and the time came! Within a minute, the beautiful bubble was burst again.

Hysterically he poured the whole cup of bitter coffee down his throat, lurched to the till to pay his check and blundered out of the restaurant. He stumbled toward the goldsmith's store across the street and pulled out of his breast the little package that Jinlan had given him. He unpinned the package, set the handkerchief aside, and with a trembling left hand took hold of the golden jewelry, which sparkled all the more in the sunlight. He closed his eyes. Then, just as he was about to step into the goldsmith's, a piercing sound erupted from the transistor radio in his jacket pocket:

"And now for the next race! The next race!"

Eyes agog, he recoiled and whipped the stub of his betting slip out of his jacket pocket. In a final burst of lucidity he said to himself: They still haven't run the fourth! I still have the fourth! His strange behavior aroused the suspicion of the man in the goldsmith's store and attracted curious glances from inquisitive bystanders. But he just stood there staring at the jewelry in his left hand and the betting stub in his right, as if he was trying to judge their weight, unconscious of the world around him.

The sight of a policeman's billy club jolted him from his daze like an electric shock. Everything in his hands fell to the ground.

"What's your game?" demanded the policeman. "Got your I.D.?"

His eyes clouded over, he was dumb. The policeman lost patience:

"Put your hands up, I'm going to search you!"

"Clubs … still the fourth race … my … mind," he moaned, before he too fell to the ground.

The policeman pulled out his I.D. and notebook. Then he gathered up the betting stub and the items of jewelry one by one, went into the goldsmith's and made a call. One of the shop-clerks said a word to him. He walked back out of the store and picked up the silk handkerchief that lay nearby. The white silk was muddied by feet that had stepped on it.

A siren sounded.

The ambulance had arrived.

73.31 No Cha In The Investiture Of The Gods\fn{by Shi Song (1946-   )} Shanghai, China (M) 7

It was a summer afternoon. The River of Nine Bends seemed to have been pressed shallow by the sultry heat. The ink green shades of the leafy willows on both banks had thus indulgently invaded one third of the water. The river flowed smoothly and calmly below the willows. When sunlight flashed on it again, it seemed to have reached up and joined the azure and immense expanse of cloudless sky.

The indistinct cries of peddlers selling vegetables and wares at Chen-tang Pass were borne over the mile-long distance by the leaf- rustling breeze, in accompaniment with the sparrows flitting among the streaming branches of the willows.

T'ai Yi sat on a blue-green rock, his snowy white hair flowing over his shoulders. One foot was drawn over his thigh. The other rested lightly on the grass. A white flaxen Taoist robe hung down carelessly from his shoulders in numerous folds. Its broad and long sleeves covered the straw sandals on his feet. Bending over slightly, he seemed to be enjoying the wild lotus growing in the shallow midstream waters.

It was May. The wild lotus was in full bloom. But his countenance was expressionless, and his eyes vacant. For the whole morning he had been sitting there without the least movement, like a chessman left forgotten. A green grasshopper had been resting on his foot the whole morning, showing no intention to leave.

The lotus-blossoms bobbed, the willow leaves rustled, while the willow blossoms drifted dustily about. The river looked still, yet it was moving. Time seemed to be a copy of yesterday, yet it was changing. Revolving repeatedly in Tai Yi’s mind were the words his favorite disciple’s voice had uttered in a dream the night before. The voice said pleadingly:

“Master, I am finally free, free to the point of tears …

“Sometimes I drift with the winds; sometimes I seem to reach everywhere, as if stretching in a deep yawn after a long sleep which has vanished like a streak of gray smoke. My memories and the scent of blood in my memories are both fading into the distance. But, oh, how empty is the void … If I have cast aside my body of flesh and bones because of the superiority of the soul, I still have to find a final resting place …

“I wish, master, to be a lotus in the river.”

T’ai Yi woke up in the morning, the dream still vivid in his mind. He hurried to the residence of General Li Ching, commander of the Army, and walked directly to the hall. Nobody stopped him. It all happened exactly as it had fourteen years before when No Cha had been born and T’ai Yi had taken him as his disciple. T’ai Yi, who had many times been summoned to the residence to tell fortunes by interpreting the signs in the heavens, was led by a guard to the hall decorated with pots of flowers and floral drapery.

It hardly seemed that fourteen years had already passed. T’ai Yi could still recall the haunting fragrance, heavy and unsettling. General Li sat there after a sleepless night, handsome and dignified as ever, but looking now as lifeless as a wax statue. An attendant was sent to bring the new born boy from the chamber. Though tranquil as a piece of drift wood, T’ai Yi was terribly shaken at the first sight of the boy. The boy’s head, twice the size of an ordinary baby’s, was already covered with hair. And that face! How much it resembled an old man’s! His cries seemed to be bursting from a chasm of internal darkness and the flailing limbs, hardly contained in the terrified attendant’s arms, struck out confusedly in the air; he seemed like a wild hare trapped in a net, ready to leap away and escape.

The attendant’s face paled. Even the general, his beard trembling, seemed to be bewitched as he stared at the restless creature that was his son.

“Ah, Priest, tell me, isn’t this an ill omen? Or could it be luck? The birth of this boy last night was a nightmare, many strange things happened—”

“My lord, birth is always an event to be celebrated, T’ai Yi said haltingly.

Then, T’ai Yi was told of the lady’s prolonged pregancy, her recurring and inauspicious dreams that were repeated day after day, the strange brightness of blood at childbirth …

“Shining scarlet,” the General had said. “For a moment, my eyes were dazzled, and involuntarily, I unsheathed my sword, and was about to cleave that red thing in two. But the crying, those dreadful cries enfeebled my hands. I was bathed in a cold sweat. Ah, Priest, when confronted with charging enemy troops and chariots, I am calm and unmoved, but this thing …”

At that point, Li Ching had turned back the florid blue silken quilt in the attendant’s arms. The bright reflection of the red sash wrapped around that baby’s belly made the pale face of the father glow.

“The strangest thing is that he was born with this sash.”

T’ai Yi was struck as he stared at the blood-red sash.

“My lord, was it the period of Ch’ou?”\fn{A note reads: Period of Ch’ou, the 2nd character of the 12 earthly “branches,” i.e., the period of night from 1 to 3 a.m.}

“Why, yes …”

*

With the color of blood lingering in his retinae, T’ai Yi once more entered the hall. The morning sunlight came through the carved lattice of windows and cast elaborate patterns on the slate-gray ground, brightening it gently. No one was there. Everything in the hall remained the same as it had been fourteen years ago. To reflect on last night’s dream, T’ai Yi sat down lightly on a small wooden stool and turned his eyes inward, beginning to put his confused thoughts in order.

A voice rose gently as a silken thread, as if in response to his expectation. It grew stronger, lingered and, finally, stopped with a buzz. T’ai Yi’s lucid eyes darted precisely to a place on the ground in the center of the hall. There, between shadow and light, a green-headed fly was sucking greedily from the earthen floor, where he saw blurred bloodstains …

“Master, my birth was a mistake whose cause remains a mystery. As far back as I can remember, I have sensed it through my mother’s indulgent love and my father’s exacting expectations. It seemed to me that they could not face the reality of my existence, but tried desperately to fit me for a pattern they had designed.

“My father had hoped that, like my two brothers, I should become a great scholar and general through literary and military pursuits. I exceeded his expectations in every way. Thus, not only were my brothers jealous of my extraordinary strength, but even my father's frigid praise would sometimes flow from behind a mask of increasing hostility. I could see that behind his thinly disguised pleasure there was something strange. My mother, on the other hand, always treated me as if I were a babe in swaddling clothes, one who needed protection and security. I tried to make her happy, and always stayed by her side except when I had to go for my lessons or practice in the field. I did not go out for wild pleasures with friends of my own age. I would hasten to her, not to kneel and salute, as was the custom, but to nestle on her soft lap and let her enjoy the pleasure of cuddling me. However, I realized that in her pleasure there was a touch of uneasiness that she herself would not admit—'Why is this child so different from his brothers?'

"The truth is, I lived a life of contradictions and illusions, and, beneath it all, lay deep bitterness …"

*

A chanting interspersed with sobs had dispelled the dim vision of the boy kneeling on the ground. Then T'ai Yi tried to clear his mind. He stood up and paced back and forth by a pillar huge enough for two men with outstretched arms to encircle. Now dawn had broken. Birds were singing vigorously, and the peonies and osman thus were fresh with dewdrops. T'ai Yi saw No Cha's crippled attendant Ssu-mang sitting on the earthen slope at the corner of the wall by the blooming flowers. Idiotically, he sat there with his hands clasped on his deformed and twisted knees, shaking forward and backward, eyes vacant, humming some incomprehensible song. It was quite a while before Ssu-mang realized T'ai Yi's presence; he scrambled up and prostrated himself before T'ai Yi. Tears rained down on the dry, red earth.

"Ah, your Grace, your Grace, my young master is gone. I saw him ascend on a red cloud to the Western Paradise. Far, far up in the sky, he beckoned to me, saying with a smile: 'Don't worry, don't worry, some day I will come back to take you with me, and teach you great magic powers, to fly like the swallows, run and leap like the antelope.' Your Grace …"

T'ai Yi looked at the narrow, bowed head of Ssu-mang, at the awkward posture of his twisted knees that could not be brought together even in kneeling, while his tears continued to fall and vanish into the red earth.

"I know, Ssu-mang, I know all about it. Now rise!"

As if obstinate in anger, Ssu-mang would not turn up his hideous face.

"Your Grace, I have always known that my young master was a deity sent down to earth to live among us because he was so perfect and beautiful! The first time I saw him he was scarcely seven years old, and I was still a humble gardener. Watching him draw the bow with a touch of his father's manner, I was completely taken with him. He didn't at all look like a boy of seven. You could not tell his age from looking at him. He had snow-white skin, ink-black hair and eyebrows, powerful muscles, and those slanting eyes radiating calm and intelligence. When he turned and saw me, he fastened his stare on me without blinking. There was even a trace of a smile on his face. I must have been struck dumb; there I stood with some young plants in my hand, self-conscious about my own awkward figure which had never been looked at seriously because of its unworthiness. His stare scared me, and I thought that he was going to punish me severely because of my deformities and ugliness, but then I realized that his eyes were full of compassion and forgiveness …

"I fell on my knees, not before a child, but before a deity …

"Later, he asked my lord for me to be his attendant. What an honor it was for me! How willing I would have been to be the carpet that he walked on but I knew I was unworthy. Sometimes when the sun shone bright on the earth, I only dared to walk at a distance behind him to the field, afraid that the persistent presence of my ugly shape might incur his displeasure.

"I would hide in a shrub and watch him, stripped to the waist, shooting wild geese wit:h his ivory bow. I would watch his arrow go through the delicate head of a goose, and see the bird fall like lead to the ground. It was as if infinite strings of power radiated from his youthful body. He never missed anything. Watching him, I could not help clapping my hands in admiration and uttering cries of joy. Once, while picking up a gorgeously plumed goose from the ground, he heard me, and turned his head. How cold and sad was his stare; it made me run back to my hiding place in fear.

"My young master would hang up the birds and animals he had shot, and gaze at them for hours without any expression. Nor would he say a single word. I, so puzzled and listless, would try to find a word of praise for his skill as a hunter, but all my words choked in my throat. None of them was adequate for my master …

"One day, my lord the general brought home a young officer from the headquarters. He was said to be the best lancer in the regiment, an outstanding young man of nineteen. My lord told our young master to practice lancing with him. This pleased him very much, because he had very few playmates; thus, he soon got acquainted with the young man. They started practicing in the garden. My master used a short spear, while the young officer used his lance. When watching attentively, I suddenly heard the young officer utter a cry and saw him fall holding his leg. The entire short spear had been plunged up to its hilt into his calf. Blood was spouting like a fountain to the ground. My young master was so frightened that he started to cry. I had never heard him cry. Though blood always frightens me, his cry was more frightening. I recklessly threw aside all scruples and ran to him and held him in my arms—I, an ugly cripple, would dare to hold the master in my arms! His shivering body was utterly cold, and I said, 'Master, don't cry, don't be afraid. He is an ordinary man made of clay; you are a deity from heaven. How could an ordinary human man fight with a god. He deserves his wound.'

"The master in my arms was all in tears and I also cried for a while. Then my lord came, his face stern and severe. He first gave orders to have the young officer properly treated. Then, he ordered his men to pull me aside, and without saying a word, gave me about a dozen boxes on the ear until my face was swollen to twice its normal size. You don't know how proud I was! It. was actually the most glorious moment in my life. I had held my young master in my arms and had received punishment for him. I hoped that the swelling on my face would never go down and I would lift my head very high for everyone to see—this was the proof, the proof of my special relationship to the young master …"

*

Another scene passed across T'ai Yi's mind.

"Master, I think that you must be the only person on earth who understands me. Otherwise, why did you teach me nothing but to look at the floating clouds in the sky when I was depressed? 1 know that now the brigands on the eastern plains are plotting a rebellion and my two brothers are waiting anxiously for battles in which they can distinguish themselves. The poverty-stricken people are huddling in their wretched hoyels. Women are baring their limbs and roaming about with hungry and seductive eyes. Oh, master, I am afraid.

"I often sat in my room upstairs, with my hands tightly clasped together and my knees drawn up, just waiting for the floating clouds to drift past the eaves. In this manner, I passed the time listlessly. At times, I would forget that I was growing up, and vaguely felt a sense of joy. Then an occasional flight of wild geese would cross my line of vision and shatter my tranquillity to pieces. The beautiful geese, on outstretched wings, struck so often by my arrows, ah, how they fell! When I saw the geese fly into view, the muscles of my arms would jerk against my will, as if urging me to take up the bow, to pull out the arrows, to taste fresh blood shed by my might. Cold sweat would trickle down my brow.

"How I love those geese flying gracefully in the sky, the carefree animals in the woods, and the companions I once had! But the birds and animals have become carcasses. And my companions were either frightened away or hurt by my strength. I simply don't realize my own strength and it has betrayed me. My mind has been shaped by the training and exercises of my body—a body whose contours spell only the word 'mental defective.'

"And now I know that no goose flying before me can go on unharmed. Any living thing—man or beast—that comes within my sight must die. In the deepest dark chamber of my memory are hung as trophies the dead bodies of everyone I ever loved, including the young officer who died of loss of blood after being wounded by my short spear.

"The only creature that still survives is the idiotic and muddy-headed Ssu-mang, whose limbs are clubbed like a lion's and whose face is deformed. I acquired him just out of sheer disgust. Poor Ssu-mang, when life became monotonous for me, I would make fun of him and frighten him. Ah, master, did you know that sometimes your cherished disciple could be very cruel? One afternoon about two months ago, Ssu-mang had kept watch at my door for the whole afternoon. He finally peeped in to see what I was doing. It was what I was waiting for; I captured him with my gaze, concentrating all my might in that stare, which penetrated his eyes, and pierced his heart. There I found cowardice, dread, and disappointment … He said, 'I am trying to keep you company, my young lord.' I said, 'Are you worthy?' He burst into silent tears, and trembling all over, he stammered, 'No, I am not.'

"But, in fact, Ssu-mang was worthy. That he had lived by my side for seven years is a proof. He is the embodiment of my mental deformity, and I could not hurt him.

"Realizing my own deformity, I could no longer go on deceiving myself by pleasing my parents.

"My father and two brothers drilled vigorously everyday. I could hear from afar the rustling sound of soldiers marching swiftly. But, on this particular occasion, I was incapacitated by illness—it was the only excuse for me not to join them. I knew that my father's displeasure with me had grown to the bursting point. He avoided seeing me, lest he should be carried away by some great rage.

"My mother would come up a dozen times everyday; sometimes she would not venture to say anything, and only sat by my bedside. Sometimes she would ask me tenderly, 'My son, aren't you too hot with such heavy covers in this summer heat?' Indifferently, I would answer, 'No.' 'My boy, don't you want to joia your brothers?' All I said was still, 'No.' Pondering for a while, she would say with some relief, 'It is better this way, so you don't have to take part in war and bloodshed.' At that I would simply cover my head with the quilt.

"On that fatal afternoon, every bad omen possible occurred. It became hot without warning, and in the air there was not the slightest stirring. Amid the noisy cawing of crows in the garden could be heard the crunching sound of troops being drilled on the drill ground. The muffled sound of their marching to the rhythm of drum beats came across the distance, as if trying to break the monotony and to goad me on my way. While I was tossing and turning restlessly, a gleaming green shadow flashed over my fevered brow like an icy cold hand. I began to desire to go to a river, with which I seemed to have an appointment of long standing. Then I ordered Ssu-mang to saddle my horse.

"We slipped out of the back door of the garden without being noticed. The small pond and the pavilion outside the garden were enveloped in the misty, shimmering heat; even the fish in the pond were dozing in the shade of rocks. We sneaked quietly out of the city gate. When we were still not far from the city, peals of thunder burst in the sky, and the overhanging bluish-gray atmosphere broke into millions of raindrops as though coming to slake my thirst and my anxiety. As I reined in my horse and rejoiced in the rain that soaked my hair and clothes, I looked across the expanse of open field stretching before me. The hissing earth whispered its gratitude to the rain. Ssu-mang, awed, hid below the belly of the horse. When the storm was over, the overhanging bluish-gray air became crystalline, translucent and cool. One mile away, I could see clearly the River of Nine Bends which had been flowing long before I was born, slithering along like a snake through the gleaming grass to the distant horizon. A sense of piety suddenly took possession of me and drew me to the river.

"I dismounted near the river, and told Ssu-mang to ride the horse among the willow trees to cool it off. Poor Ssu-mang was so clumsy that he could hardly mount, and I had to push him up onto the horse's back. I gave the horse a slap on the rump. Ssu-mang went galloping away, struggling to remain in the saddle. I was elated. As I drew nearer and nearer to the river, the rippling water welcomed me as if numerous fish and minnows were murmuring their greetings. I took off my clothes as I walked along and dropped them beside the path. By the time I reached the river bank, I was entirely naked except for that red sash around my waist. When I walked into the river, the sash floated up, light as a cicada's wings. It was only then I noticed it. I had always taken it for granted and neglected it. It suddenly struck me that it was senseless to wear it all the time. The water reached up to my chest, the red sash loosened itself from my body as if knowing my wish, and drifted away from me. It was strange, Master, that at the moment of our separation, I felt that everything in me became insignificant. All the depression and sullenness that had been with me so long had gone with it.

"Then, I saw someone. At first I thought it was an illusion, or my own reflection on the river. He rose from the shallow river among the densely grown reeds and lotus blossoms, and swiftly fished up the red sash in his hand. Bright water-drops streamed down his chest which was slightly blue and reflected the lotus leaves. He wrapped the red sash around his waist, and smiled mischievously at me, showing all his fine white teeth. As if deliberately trying to shatter my illusion, he spoke in a metallic voice, 'Is this your gift to me?' 'No, it is my gift to the river.' I said. 'I am the river.' he laughed out loud, and rushed at me.

"Against the blue vault of the sky, his outstretched arms sprayed water drops sparkling like the hues on the wings of butterflies. I also laughed, but then he jumped on me.

"Master, oh, master, even at this moment I can not believe it. It was impossible. After only a few rounds in the water, his arms loosened their grip. His body floated up limply. He was already a corpse! …

"The water in the river became piercingly cold in the sultry heat of May, and my bath was ended. The sparkling current carried away a body wrapped in a red sash …

"Master, I had not been able to control my lust for the blood of the wild geese in the sky, and the animals in the woods. But this time, my mind seemed to be blurred. I could not recall how it all happened. Could it be that I killed an unknown youth on that afternoon only because I desired to take a bath in the cool water of the river? Having pieced together in my mind all the details I could recall, I felt I would have to pay dearly for what had happened."

The sobbing that had echoed in the gloomy valley became fainter and fainter. Here was Ssu-mang, still muttering monotonously to himself. T'ai Yi did not pay too much attention to what he was saying, but then his memory was drawn back to the garden of the general's residence as Ssu-mang suddenly raised his voice:

"It was a magnificent horse, shiny and black with its hoofs all white, so he was named Snow Treader by my young master. He was taller than a man. No one except my young master would dare to ride him. On that afternoon, I was told to ride him among the willow trees to relax him. My gosh, it seemed to me that I was riding high up in the clouds or fog. My legs have been crippled since childhood; walking has been torture to me. And now, for the first time in my life, I felt that I was flying; the landscape and willows reflected on the river were blown backward. But when Snow Treader slowed down, I saw a strange scene. Two young men stood in the shallow water of the river still as a picture, staring at each other. Even the huge and splendid loaves of cloud seemed to be motionless. I could see very well that one of them was my young master. The other, your Grace, how could I describe him! Every one knew that the river god governing the rainfall of Chen-tang Pass was the son of the Dragon God of the Eastern Sea. It had to be him! Otherwise his skin could not have been so blue in color and covered with fishy scales. Then a quarrel seemed to break out between them. I could not dismount from the horse, and it was too far for me to distinguish their words. I saw him jump at my young master, and my heart nearly leaped from my mouth. The water, foaming white, splashed high in the air as my young master struggled with him in the water …

"Snow Treader gave a long and loud snort, reared up and threw me off his back. When I stood up, dazzled, my young master already had his clothes on. His countenance was as pale as if etched on paper, and drops of water dripped from his face and hair. No, they seemed to be tears from my young master's eyes and they foretold disaster. Nevertheless, a voice within me whispered comfortingly that my young master was a deity. Nothing could hurt him. And the river was so tranquil that what I saw a moment ago could only be an illusion due to being tossed from that horse. It was only much later that I finally realized my young master had actually killed him …

"When we returned it was already evening. My young master went back to his room without saying a word, and I sneaked into the garden. A few guards with lances were alertly stationed by the laurel trees, and I sensed that something serious had happened. No-one answered the questions I wouldn't stop asking, until a friendly sergeant told me that my master had done something disastrous.

"The slanting sunset shone on the huge white plaster walls. Its reflected rays brightened the empty halls and porticos. A moment later, my lady, supported by her maids, hurried past me. I saw them enter the hall from the back door and hide behind the screens listening to the conversation in the hall. My lady was exceedingly pale, she looked as if she had been weeping. Then, I became bold enough to peep in through the lattice of a window. What I saw was strange. My lord, whom I had always regarded as pre-eminent, was now sitting to one side. In his seat of honor, sat a bearded middle-aged man in a white robe.

"The setting sun gleamed ferociously on the newly washed wall of white plaster. It moved inch by inch to the hall until the scarlet light gradually moved to the face of the white-robed man. Suddenly he took out a red sash from his lap, his thin and stern lips curved, and he shouted aloud:

"'Look at this! Now, what can you say to cover your guilt?'

"My lord paled and his voice trembled. It was strange to see him, the most hot-tempered man I had ever known, humble himself and soften his voice, trying meekly to convince the visitor that since my young master was ill and in bed, he could hardly have gone out and killed anyone in the river.

"I was scared out of my wits. Could it be that Ao-kuang,\fn{A note reads: Chinese god of rivers, often portrayed in dragon form.} the Dragon God of the Eastern Sea, had come to revenge the death of his son? I looked carefully again, the white-robed man appeared to me an ordinary gentleman. But once when I talked with the keeper of the silkworms, she told me stories of the Dragon God. If he had come to the city, how could he appear in human form?

"At that moment, the light in the hall became stronger and stronger. The last rays of the setting sun intertwined as they were reflected against the walls on the four sides of the yard and shone full into the hall. In the light, the white-robed man seemed to grow in size. His white robe fluttered as if blown by the wind, and from his menacing aspect, it seemed he was about to envelop my lord in his dragon image. As a matter of fact, my lord looked shrunken and was shaking with forebodings.

"My young master must have heard what was going on in the front hall. With his favorite jade-inlaid dagger, he came swiftly through the corridor to the hall. His hair was still wet on his forehead. A murderous look on his face had given a sinister twist even to his noble features and his eyes squinted frighteningly. I grabbed his sleeve, crying. I begged him not to go in and fight with the Dragon God. He shoved me aside.

"The light in the hall turned to a cinnabar red, and I had not the courage to look any longer, afraid that the Dragon God might show his true self. Humble as I am, I knew I could not look upon him and live. I even clamped my hands over my ears. However, I could hear my lord cursing my young master and declaring that he had brought destruction upon the house … that my young master had been a curse on the family since he had been born with the red sash …

"Then I heard a woman's voice, feebly crying and calling the name of her son. I knew it was my lady behind the screen. Against her insistent weeping, I could hear my young master, speaking, slowly and clearly, as if biting off each word with his teeth:

"'I am guilty. Nothing I have done has fulfilled my parents' expectations. But what i have done today will be my own responsibility. I am concerned with this earthly body only because it is loved and cherished by my mother and I owe this frame of bones to my father who has expected me to succeed in the world. And now, since this crime has disgraced my parents, the only way to ease my mind is to return to you the flesh and bones I received from you.'

"I heard a scrape, the sharp sound of a dagger drawn from its case; I hastened to the lattice, and in the blood-red rays which illumined the entire hall, I saw my young master kneeling in the center of the room, his chest and waist stripped bare. The dagger in his hand was raised high and the jewels on the handle sparkled. The sunset rays seemed to flash with a final brightness. Then the hall was enveloped in darkness. I heard a shriek. I do not know whether it came from my throat or from someone else's. I do not know whether it was my eyes that blacked out, or whether the sun had suddenly dropped behind the mountain."

*

"Master, my tears are no illusion—though, at this moment, I am lighter than a speck of dust, and thinner than the wings of a butterfly. I am drifting in the void without direction, but my heart still lingers in the world, held there by love. To me, the birds flying in the sky, the animals procreating on the earth are burdens too beautiful to be borne. I know wars are approaching on the eastern plains and my two brothers, both brave men, are going to lead their troops into the battlefields. When my red sash is unfurled, thousands of dead bodies will be seen piled on one another. There will be throngs of weeping wives and children, and vultures circling overhead. All these, they say, are the foundations for a better world tomorrow. But what will the faith of tomorrow be? I see prostitutes, driven by hunger and lust, wandering over the land beyond the city walls. If only there were a magic panacea to satiate their cravings, they would not have to appear day after day on the muddy street corners to reproduce another generation of craving. … When I was freed from my earthly cares, I realized how blue the sky could be, but beneath this blue sky …

"That day, as I went to the front hall with my dagger, I was determined to achieve my freedom. To my amazement, my attendant, old Ssu-mang, all in tears, grabbed my sleeve and said to me, 'My young lord, my young lord, you can not go, you are a god, please don't leave me alone.' I could not restrain my tears. My pitiable, deformed Ssu-mang! I said, 'Ssu-mang, I am a god, and gods have their ways to follow. When I am gone I will not forget you. Someday I will teach you magic powers, to fly like the swallows in the sky; and run like the antelopes in the fields …'

"My blood finally repaid all owed to this short life on earth and I have gained my ultimate freedom. I can now look down upon the earth. Timeless and limitless space had become a single flat plane. I see only harmony everywhere. I should be happy, but, master, as you now hear, I am crying, the uncontrollable tears make me long to return to the imperfection of the human world. Through my tears I still see the gleaming river, exactly as it was on that May afternoon …"

*

Ssu-mang raised his head. His tears were dried. The small, swollen eyes shone beneath his scanty eyebrows. He had now resumed his sitting posture by the blooming red flowers, and began to rock forward and backward, humming a sort of chant that mingled with some unintelligible soliloquy. He seemed to have forgotten the existence of T'ai Yi.

"My young master has abandoned his body of flesh, and gone riding on a vermillion cloud. He may have forgotten poor Ssu-mang in his happiness, but only Ssu-mang knows. I know that he was a god sent to earth for a time. This is my song, a song about him to sing to the children in the streets:

Many many years ago,
The lady of the Commander at Chen-tang Pass
Delivered a bright red ball,
From which emanated rays three feet long.
To gain some higher magic power,
He returned his flesh to his mother,
His bones to his father,
And has gone smilingly on a cloud from the earth.

Ssu-mang suddenly stopped his singing, and tilting his face, he asked himself in doubt:

"No, the body of my young master was left in the bloodstained hall. What, then, is gone on the cloud? Let me think …”

*

Since early morning T’ai Yi had been sitting in the shade of the willow trees by the River of Nine Bends like a leftover chessman. Neither did the green grasshopper on his foot show any intention of leaving.

The willow blossoms floated in the air like light dust, the new willow leaves swayed in the wind, the lotus bobbed. The river seemed motionless, and also seemed to be flowing. Today seemed a repetition of yesterday; and yet it was totally different …

“On that afternoon, I took off my clothes, and left them along the road as I walked. I waded into the shallow river bed. The chilling water and reeds caressed my chest. The gleaming water seemed to swell before my eyes. I would have walked on, but the fragrance of the lotus detained me. If I still have the right to linger, if I may yet cherish a desire amid this total freedom, master, make me a lotus—a naturally blooming and withering lotus in the river where I sinned.”

Thinking of Ssu-mang’s unfinished song, T’ai Yi broke into a broad smile. He stood up, brushed off the light dust that had gathered on his knees. Walking to the river bank, he plucked a red lotus that was blooming magnificently near the shore. He stripped off its petals one by one, and laid them in the shape of the Primordial Triad\fn{A note reads: According to I Ching*, or Book of Changes, there is the primordial triad of Heaven, Man, and Earth. They are represented by diagrams which bring out the meaning of Yin-Yang, the two ultimates in Chinese cosmography*.} on the bank where the sand was washed white and clean. He broke the lotus stem into the pattern of bones and joints, and arranged them in order: upper, middle, lower—Heaven, Man, Earth—a diagram of Power. Then T’ai Yi stood stock still, pondering the diagram for a long, long time.

“No Cha, my beloved disciple! Even at this stage, you are still asking your master for a form! Here, laid on the ground, is the body for you to step into. And now Ssu-mang’s song will have a beautiful ending:

No Cha left his body of flesh,
And is embodied in a lotus.
He has become a deity with illimitable magic power.

No one could tell how long he had stood there. It gradually grew chilly. Breezes blew against his robe. Shadows fell and buried T’ai Yi’s eyes and the bridge of his nose. Standing before the diagram of lotus petals, he waited and waited. He waited for the descent of No Cha’s soul. Birds had returned to their nests, and the night air was tranquil and quiet. Slowly, in T’ai Yi’s left eye a lotus came into bright being. In his right eye was reflected yet arother lotus of consumate beauty. And the two aligned precisely to form a single flower, a lotus that bloomed by the pool of immortality.

79.86 The Woman Who Wears The Trousers\fn{by Wang Runzi (1946-)} “in a village in Wendeng County,” Shandong Province, China (M) 8

Sixty-year-old Suocheng had been timid and oversensitive all his life. His wife, Li Giulan, wore the trousers in the family. As head of the household, her name was entered in the household register instead of his, and her seal was used for the grain and money they received from the production brigade. When Suocheng came home after the day’s work in the fields, he ate his supper, wiped his mouth and then turned on the radio. He loved listening to news broadcasts and special programs for farmers and had no use for songs and operas on the air. The programs he followed, he said, opened his eyes and widened his vision. That was all he did every day, and he left to his wife all the household chores, big or small, such as cooking and tending poultry.

Of late, the craze among the farmers far and near had been the sinking of pump-wells, which instantly gave them water for washing so near their homes. Many families in Suocheng’s village had sunk such wells. When asked about his opinions, Suocheng merely said, “I’ll have to consult my wife.”

Ris wife's answer was:

“We’ll sink one too. What others can do, we can too. We’re just as sound in mind and limb as they are!”

So he told his neighbors with all the confidence in the world, “Of course we will! If you can do it, we can too.”

Suocheng sang his wife’s praises with deep admiration in his heart, for she was indeed a very capable woman. She had big feet and wore her hair in a bun at the back of her head. Ten years younger than her husband, she had a glib tongue and deft hands. She attended to everything inside and outside the house—getting proper clothes ready before the weather changed with the seasons, thatching roofs, penning piglets. She took care of everything, paying attention to the last detail. Over the years, she had been extremely good at handling their accounts, not wasting a single cent, and yet she could be more generous than any man when necessary.

The evening before the well-sinking, Suocheng pushed away his chopsticks and the rice bowl, sat back with crossed legs, lit his pipe and turned on the radio. At first, he listened attentively enjoying it all, but then he suddenly switched it off.

Qiulan had been enjoying the program, too, while she was washing dishes in the outer room. She stretched out her hand, still wet, and pulled the string hanging from the wall in the inner room to turn the radio on again. She strained her ears as she continued her washing-up.

Annoyed, Suocheng went on smoking his pipe. After knocking the ash out of the bowl for the third time, he turned off the radio again. Qiulan was exasperated. She rushed in and, wiping her hands on her apron, shouted, "Honestly, that's the limit! You may not want to listen, I do."

"I've a headache," he murmured. "I want to get some sleep."

Qiulan's anger instantly melted away and she reached out to feel his forehead. "No temperature. Do you feel sick?"

He muttered, "Ummm …"

"I'll make some mung bean soup for you. You are always free from care and don't have to worry about anything. Now you're ill!"

After a few moments, she brought him some bean soup, sweetened with two spoonfuls of sugar. Suocheng finished two big bowls. It made him sweat profusely. He lay down, but the whole night he was turning and tossing in bed and could not get to sleep. Now and again, he got out of bed and smoked, knocking the ash out of the bowl onto the window-sill. By dawn, unable to contain himself any more, he woke his wife.Rubbing her eyes, she asked:

"You don't feel any better?"

"I want to talk to you about something."

"Go ahead."

Suocheng cast a glance at her and then lowered his head. He stuck his pipe into his tobacco pouch but couldn't fill it for a while. Impatient, Oiulan sat up and put on her clothes as she asked:

"Have you lost your tongue?" Pulling himself together, Suocheng blurted out:

"Let's not sink the well."

"Why not?"

"Didn't you hear what they said on the radio?"

"What did they say?"

"You know as well as I do."

Qiulan pushed aside her quilt and got out of bed. "Keep it to yourself!"

He clutched her arm. "Don't get so worked up. All right. I'll tell you."

"Out with it! I've no time to waste."

He drew closer and whispered, "The former landlords and rich peasants at Haoshan aren't classified as such anymore, not even Zhao Baiwan, who had been in prison for eight years."

"I know."

"They're in luck now; they're on an equal footing with us former poor peasants and hired hands."

"Yes." Qiulan bit her lips.

Suocheng lit his pipe and started puffing away. "So, we won't sink a well. Perhaps it would all be labor lost."

"Why?"

"You're a woman with a one-track mind. Let me be plain and honest with you. This house of ours was owned by landlord Liu Jingui. He's still alive. I hear that his son is a rich hotel owner in Japan and he has given our county government a car, a television among many other things. Even if Liu Jingui had died, his sons and grandsons would be able to claim back this house of ours. We'll lose it some day. You just wait and see."

"You're imagining things."

"Me, imagining things? No. Don't you know that our government's policies change all the time? You shouldn't be too sure of yourself."

Qiulan lowered her head and could not say anything.

"I've always let you have the final say in our family affairs. But you must listen to me this once. You'll have nothing to lose for that."

Qiulan burst out laughing.

“What’s so funny?” Suocheng was puzzled.

Qiulan split her sides as she thumped her husband with her fists.

He hastily covered her mouth with his hand, saying, “Don’t be silly. The walls have ears. You don’t want to wake up our neighbors, do you?”

Qiulan stared at him. “Idiot! I’ve wasted my bean soup on you. I don’t believe that the sun will rise in the West, nor can I believe the Communist Party will plunge us back into misery. Stop dreaming of problems and go back to sleep.:

It was already broad daylight when Qiulan got up. She called to the opposite room, “Aren’t you going to get up, Xin. huai? The sun is shining on your buttocks!”

Her unmarried youngest son, Xinhuai, entered buttoning his clothes.

“Do you, want me, Mum?”

She handed him some money. “Go and buy me some firecrackers.”

“What’s the occasion? We’re not building a house,"”Suocheng said.

“I just want to hear them crack,” barked his wife.

It was customary for peasants to let off firecrackers when they started building a house. No one had ever done so for sinking a well. But Qiulan insisted. She told her son to stand in the middle of the courtyard holding a pole from which hung a long string of firecrackers. Then she asked her husband to light them. Poor Suocheng struck several matches but failed to set them off. Qiulan grabbed the matchbox and lit the firecrackers herself. The noise drew a large crowd into the courtyard, while children ran here and there picking up the unexploded firecrackers. Bits of paper drifted in the smoke, making it a thrilling sight to see!

“Hold the pole higher, Xinhuai,” cried Qiulan.

The onlookers whispered among themselves, wondering why a frugal housewife like Qiulan was throwing money away for no purpose whatsoever. Just as the last ones exploded, Qiulan handed Suocheng a spade and said in a loud voice, “Begin digging, Xinhuai’s father!”

Somehow, not quite knowing why, Suocheng began digging with vigor.

*

When the well was dug twenty feet deep, they struck rock. As there was still no sign of water, Suocheng wanted to fill up the hole. But Qiulan would not hear anything of it, saying that since the well-site was on the same line as their neighbor’s they would sooner or later reach water. It was probably just under that rock. She called a stonemason in to blast it off.

When the explosives were ready, the loudspeaker called for Qiulan to go to the brigade cashier on account of some important matter. As she was busy sticking paper-strips on her glass windows to prevent them from cracking in the dynamiting, she said to her husband, “Go and see what it is all about.”

“But it’s you they want to see,” retorted Suocheng, rubbing his hands in bewilderment.

“Don’t be silly. Can’t you even take a message?”

Suocheng returned after a while and pulled his wife into the inner room. “Xinhuai’s mother, Liu … Liu … Jingui has … come back!” He was so nervous that he could hardly speak.

Stunned, Qiulan leaned against the door.

“He’s staying in the county guest-house. He said he’d come to see his old house tomorrow. You can guess what he has in mind.”

Oiulan was tongue-tied.

“What shall we do? Somebody has come from the county. He looked like an important official, and spoke like one too. Right now, he’s talking to the Party secretary in the accounting office; he said he’d be coming here in a minute.”

“What for?”

“To see our house. They’ll entertain Liu Jingui here, he said. There’s a truck outside the office. It is piled high with armchairs, carpets and wooden beds—much more impressive furniture than what Liu Jingui had before.”

Qiulan thought for a moment. “Are you afraid?”

“Of Liu Jingui? Hm,” Suocheng spat. “I wasn’t afraid of him when we reasoned with him at the mass meetings in the days of the land reform, so why now? I’m just afraid that we may not be able to get any support this time in our fight against him. The official sounded as if Liu were an emperor and me a mere poor country bumpkin.”

“Don’t tell me about that pitiful sight! Leave everything to me. Just go and tell the mason to get cracking.”

When Suocheng hesitated, Qiulan snapped, “This is our house and our courtyard! We can do whatever we like with it. Why should we be afraid?”

Looking out of the window, Suocheng saw people entering the courtyard! He pulled her sleeves and whispered, “Here they are. The one in front is the official.”

Qiulan brushed back a lock of hair hanging low over her brows, walking confidently out of the room and, leaning against the door, strained her eyes to size up the visitor.

The man in front was Sun, Director of the Administrative Office of the county government. As soon as he entered the courtyard, he looked around like a fastidious inspector and said, “What a dirty place! What’s the point of sinking a well now? It won’t do any good.” He walked cautiously to the edge of the well and peered down. Then he turned and asked the old Party secretary, “Can they finish it by tomorrow?”

“No. It will take another four days at least.” Sun thought for a while and said with an air of finality, “Then fill it up. A messy place like this is not fit to be seen by our honored guest. No people in other countries would sink wells in such a primitive way. It’s a disgrace for us Chinese if they see it.”

“They have already put in an enormous amount of work.”

However, Sun was insistent.

“Fill it up. Overall interests should come before partial interests. Now, let’s see the house.”

He was heading for the house when he suddenly found an angry woman blocking his way, with each of her hands holding on to either side of the door frame. She was staring fixedly at him with her narrowed eyes.

Sun was stunned. The Party secretary introduced them to each other. After this little ceremony, Sun broke into a smile.

“So you’re Comrade Li Qiulan. I’ve heard a lot about you.” He stretched out his hand politely.

However, Qiulan ignored it and refused to move, her face remaining impassive. “Whom do you want to see? Don’t you know this house has an owner?”

Sun gaped while Suocheng was pulling her sleeves from behind. Qiulan brushed his hands aside. Looking at Sun squarely in the face, she demanded, “If you know this house has an owner, you should have introduced yourself first. I’ve never seen such an intruder like you, poking your nose into other people’s business in their own house! Who is the owner of this house, I’m asking you?”

Sun blushed. His blood boiled, but then he thought as an important official, it would be beneath his dignity to reason with such a ignorant country woman.

“Director Sun is here on business, Qiulan. You should try to understand,” said the old secretary.

“I’m a frank person. As far as work is concerned, I’ve always cooperated with my leaders ever since the land reform movement. While people didn’t feel it proper to look the Lius up in those days, they could nevertheless call at my house any time. I have never kept any watchdogs. Liu Jingui may call on us, now as before, but I’ll not receive him as his humble servant! I treat everybody the same, officials or no officials. A couple of days ago when County Party Secretary Zhang came, he swept my courtyard as soon as he entered it. But Director Sun thinks it’s too dirty. This is no bachelor’s house. How can our courtyard not be messed up by poultry droppings and broken tiles and bricks? Why must we fill up the well? Just because of Liu? If you think my home is a disgrace to you, then take him to the foreign-style houses in the county town. You can entertain him there as an honored guest. If you bring him here, he should respect me as the mistress of the house. And that’s that.”

The Party secretary listened in perfect silence, while Suocheng had disappeared in the inner room.

Sun was annoyed, but he controlled himself.

“Comrade Qiulan,” he said with a forced smile, “I appreciate how you feel. But you mustn’t cling to your old peasant mentality. Mr. Liu Jingui is now a patriotic overseas Chinese. To modernize our country—”

Qiulan cut in, “You know state affairs better than I. Just tell me what you want me to do.”

There was a lot of hustle and bustle as people unloaded the furniture from the truck and brought it into the courtyard. Pointing to the beds and armchairs, Sun said, “Do your rooms up with these to show Mr. Liu how good life is in our socialist villages.”

Qiulan studied the extravagant furniture.

“Well, how do you like it?”

Qiulan asked with a sly smile, “You mean all that furniture will be mine after this? Good! I’ll keep it for my Xinhuai when he marries."

“No, no.” Sun shook his head vigorously.

Qiulan laughed but then her jaw fell again. “Then why did you bring it here? Just to show off? I’ve no use for it.” With a wave of her hand, she ordered, “Take the furniture away! I don’t want it. My courtyard’s too dirty. My house isn’t a show window.”

“Qiulan!” There was a note of severity in the Party secretary's voice.

Sun stamped his foot in anger.

"Leave it here. The well must be filled up right away!"

"Right away? Trying to step over me in my house?" Qiulan ran over to the edge of the well and shouted down to the stone mason.

"Light the fuse!"

"O … K" the answer trailed off from below. The onlookers were stupefied.

Suocheng stumbled out and pleaded with his wife, "Don't be so stubborn. Let them have their way."

She pushed him aside. "You're not as alert as you were. Keep off the well now." Then she climbed on to the wall of the pigsty and, cupping her hands over her mouth, cried out at the top of her voice:

"We're lighting the fuse, neighbors. Open your windows so the glass won't break."

The fields echoed, "Light the fuse!"

Sun turned pale with rage. "Take the furniture away. Quick!" he shouted to the men who had come with him.

Secretly amused, the old secretary left.

A muffled boom sounded. The ground shook. There was a surge towards the well-site. Qiulan stood under a tree, and tears were rolling down her lined face.

*

It was heavy snow one day many years before all this. At dusk, a carriage was rolling along a road, with bells jingling on the neck of the horse. The young driver, clad in rags, was shivering in his seat, holding his whip in his arms.

The carriage suddenly halted, and the driver jumped down and poked with the handle of his whip at something covered with snow in the middle of the road. Then he squatted down and pushed the snow away with his hands only to find a little beggar girl, stiff with cold, and there was an empty basket on her arm. A face shouted from inside the carriage:

"Get a move on!"

The driver came back with the little girl in his arms and called respectfully to the carriage, "Sir …"

The window curtain parted briefly to reveal two blinking eyes.

"Put her down," ordered Liu Jingui behind the curtain.

"Please save her, Sir. She might live," pleaded the young man.

"If she dies, will you buy her a coffin?"

The young man pleaded again, his eyes all in tears.

Liu swore. "What an unlucky thing to happen before the Spring Festival. Throw her away!"

Gritting his teeth, the young man put the girl back on the road and carefully covered her with his padded jacket. He cracked his whip over the horse and the carriage rumbled over the frozen ground. It was dark when they reached the village. After tethering the horse to a post, the young man hurried back to the same spot where he had left the girl and carried her to his hovel. As there was no fire, he held her close in his arms the whole night to keep her warm. At dawn she opened her eyes.

Excitedly the young man ran to his master.

"She's alive! She's alive!" he cried, his eyes glistening with tears of joy. He begged Liu to keep her, offering to work for him in return for, the whole year without pay.

Short and thin, the ten-year-old Qiulan—this was the little girl's name—had to work hard all day long, grinding wheat, milling flour, washing clothes, cleaning vegetables … Liu lorded it over her. Even his dog barked threateningly at her. She went about her chores jitteringly. She found warmth only when she returned to the little hovel, where the young driver, Suocheng, had been like a big brother to her. Fate had bound them together.

Seven years later, Qiulan had grown up.

One day she asked Suocheng, "You're almost thirty, Brother Suocheng. Why don't you get married?"

Suocheng replied honestly, "No one will ever marry a poor hired hand like me."

"Do you like me?"

Suocheng was taken aback.

"Marry me if you don't dislike me."

"No, no!" Suocheng protested.

Her eyes brightened as she continued, "Marry me, Brother Suocheng. Let's leave here and set up our own home. I'll devote all my life to you."

He stopped her and his heart was beating fast. "Don't say any more. The master will hear us."

"So what? I've had more than enough here. I would rather go begging."

With a sigh he got out.
One day, Liu asked him, “You want to marry Qiulan, Suocheng?”
“No … No.”
Liu laughed.
One evening, when Suocheng came back on an errand, he heard Qiulan crying in the hovel. He went in and saw a bald old man pulling at her and Liu, with one hand holding a water pipe, was pushing her. Qiulan refused to move, her hands clutching at the door frame. At the sight of Suocheng, she freed herself and flew into his arms crying, “Save me, Brother Suocheng!”
Holding her, Suocheng stared at Liu blankly.
Puffing at his pipe, Liu said, “You’ve come back at the right time. Say good-bye to your sister. She’ll soon be married into a good family and will live a happy life. This is Mr. Li.”
“He has sold me,” Qiulan wept.
It was a bolt from the skies.
“Sir, you …” Suocheng could not go on.
Liu continued puffing at his pipe, his head bent.
The bald man looked at Suocheng suspiciously and then asked Qiulan fiercely, “Who is he?”
Liu answered, “Her brother.”
Qiulan said nothing but bit her lips.
Mr. Li reached out and held Qiulan’s chin up. “Did you sleep with him? Speak up!”
Qiulan elbowed his hand away and replied at the top of her voice, “Yes. I’ve slept with him for seven years. I belonged to him long ago.”
Liu Jingui was stupefied.
Ashamed, Suocheng stammered, “You … you …”
Qiulan buried her head in his arms, weeping bitterly. Suocheng broke down too.
Mr. Li laughed coldly.
“Mr. Liu, you want to palm this whore off on me and ask such a high price for her?” He produced the indenture from his pocket, tore it into shreds and turned to leave. Liu tried to stop him but he strode off without casting a glance behind. Pale with rage, Liu grabbed Qiulan by the hair and hit her on the forehead with his pipe.

*

The smoke had dispersed from the courtyard.
Unconsciously Qiulan raised her hand to touch the scar left on her forehead by Liu Jingui’s pipe. It still seemed to hurt, Liu might have forgotten the wrongs he had done her, but not Qiulan …
At her gate she looked at the tiled arch over the entrance. She had spent the better part of her life here, in days of the past as a maid, now as the mistress. She had been poor but now, though far from being rich, she was happy. The day she had dashed out of Liu’s home with a bleeding forehead, her poor fellow-villagers had helped her to set up a little shed, where she had married Suocheng. The next day, while he had left to do odd jobs, she went out begging again. She was happy to have her own home. When the village was liberated in 1947, the peasants settled their old scores with. Liu. The chairman of the Peasants’ Association, now the old Party secretary, took Suocheng and Qiulan to Liu’s house.
“From now on this house belongs to you,” he said to Suocheng. “You’ve earned it with your sweat and blood. It will be yours, your sons’ and your grandsons’.”
Qiulan threw herself upon the black gate and cried. Since then it had never occurred to her, not even when the situation looked threatening, that the house could ever be taken away from her. In 1948, when the Kuomintang attacked the key liberated areas and the landlords’ “home-coming” corps returned, the timid villagers gave back to Liu everything they had received in the days of the land reform. But Qiulan didn’t. And Liu Jingui was too cunning to make any rash move. When the Kuomintang troops withdrew from the mainland, he and his son fled first to Taiwan and later went abroad. In 1962, when the Kuomintang sent small armed bands to harass the coastal regions, Suocheng became nervous. But Qiulan hadn’t been afraid, believing that the Communist regime could never be shaken. Now all the landlords and rich peasants had been reclassified, not put in the same class as before. This was only reasonable, since they had been downtrodden for years and many of them had turned over a new leaf. But what did Sun have up his sleeve? Had he taken his cue from the Communist Party?
Qiulan felt hot and heavy in the head. Instead of going to the well, she went straight to her room and flung herself on the bed. When Suocheng offered to send for a doctor and cook her some mung bean soup, she said, “Why make such a fuss? Just give me a massage.” Suocheng put his thumbs on her forehead and began massaging it.

When the Party secretary came in the evening, Qiulan asked him, "Is it true that the old order is being restored?"

He lit his pipe and sat on the edge of the bed. "I wonder why a strong character like you asked such a question!" he replied with a smile.

Suocheng added, "Qiulan's right. It looks like the political wind is blowing favorably on the rich and powerful again."

"Don't be silly, Suocheng. Remember this is a Communist state."

"I have no respect for a Communist like Director Sun."

"Why, then, didn't you argue with him yesterday?"

Oiulan glared at her husband. "He's too chicken-hearted to speak up."

The Party secretary laughed when he saw Suocheng blush.

Then Qiulan continued, "But Sun came here as a Communist official."

The tobacco in the bowl glowed as the secretary puffed at his pipe.

"You've a point there. The prestige of our Party has been undermined by unworthy Communists like him, and people now are not so sure of themselyes as they used to be. Sun and his like know only how to sail along, following the political wind. They'll use their power to bully others, all right. None of them is any good. And we mustn't judge the Communist Party by what they do or say. Isn't that right, Suocheng?"

"I agree with you." Qiulan bit her lips, lost in thought.

The Party secretary knocked the ash from his pipe. "What do you think, Qiulan?" he asked.

"What shall we do tomorrow?" she countered, smiling. "You're the hostess. We'll let you run the whole show and do whatever you like." He told them that a county clerk had called a moment before to inform him that Zhang, the county Party secretary, had reprimanded Sun, telling him to let the villagers decide how to receive Liu Jingui, who was coming only for a visit. The county government would provide a car for Liu the following day and he would come without the company of any county official.

Qiulan heaved a sigh of relief.

"To be honest, at first I just couldn't see why we should treat our old enemy as an honored guest," admitted the secretary. "Later, I realized that I was behind the times. We can't always look back and see things in the old light. We've treated people like him as enemies for many years. That's unfair. If they behave themselves and support the Party and socialism, it's not right to discriminate against them forever. Besides, Liu Jingui is a patriot. He's a Chinese."

Suocheng listened with rapt attention. Raising her head, Qiulan said, "Please call Secretary Zhang and tell him that I also have the conscience of Chinese and won't let the Communist Party down. And please … invite Liu here for me."

The secretary smiled happily.

"What shall we do with the well?" Suocheng asked.

"Go on with your work."

*

Beside the well was placed an upturned barrow, whose wheel was being used as a pulley for Suocheng and his family to lift baskets of stone from the bottom of the hole. They worked in unison, with Oiulan chanting, "One, two, pull!"

The courtyard was bathed in the morning sunlight. The pigs had eaten their fill and were rubbing themselves against the wall of the sty. A big white rooster was crowing, holding its head up high. As the wind blew, the dew-drops fell from the leaves of the gourd plants that entwined the thatched roof of the hut. The corn hanging under the eaves glittered in the golden rays. When the empty basket was lowered to the bottom, Oiulan wiped the sweat from her forehead and murmured to herself,

"It's more than thirty years. He must look old now."

"He was born in the year of the dog. He must be seventy-one now," Suocheng echoed.

"Perhaps I won't be able to recognize him when I see him."

"Did he get married again in Japan?"

"I don't think he did, from what I heard."

"Why has he given up his comfortable life over there and come back? To get his property back? Secretary Zhang said he had come only for a visit. Do you believe it?"

"It's hard to leave one's homeland. Some of our neighbors saw him weep when he left. Poor man …"

"Why must you pity him while he never showed any pity on us?" Suocheng was indignant. .

"It was all past and done with. Why not let bygones be bygones?"

Words of progress of the sinking of the well were being passed up from below:

"We've reached damp earth!"

"We can see a trickle of water now."

After three days of hard work the well had been dug thirty feet deep. At nine o'clock, a car engine was heard. Suocheng whispered nervously, "He's here."

Qiulan thought for a moment, and then said, "Xinhuai's father, you go and change into clean clothes. They're under the cushion of the bed." When he was gone, she told her son, "Get, your bike and go and buy me some lean meat in the East Village. I'll make him some dumplings with meat stuffing. That's his favorite." After Xinhuai had left, she picked up a packet of cigarettes from the window-sill and dropped it down the well, shouting to the stonemason below, "I am sorry I've a guest coming. Please call me when you see water." After making all these arrangements, she dusted her clothes and made for the gate.

A shaky, small old man entered, followed by a crowd of children. Was he the arrogant Liu? His head was bald with only a sprinkling of white hair and his eyebrows had almost gone. Visible on his shriveled face were the age spots. His legs were weak and he had to hold on to his walking-stick, with his back bent. His left hand was still clutching a water pipe, from which a wisp of smoke was curling up.

Qiulan shivered when she saw the pipe.

Liu stopped at the black gate, squinting at the woman standing beside it. He smiled awkwardly and then shook his head, showing no sign of recognition. Suddenly his hands trembled and his pipe dropped to the ground. He closed his lack-lustre eyes in pain, when he saw the scar on her forehead.

Her lips quivering, Qiulan gripped the door frame so hard that her nails almost sank into the wood. Neither could speak a word.

One of the children was yelling, "Look, the old man has dropped his pipe." The others laughed.

Qiulan was torn by a mixture of feelings. She shooed away the children, who dispersed and watched from a distance. Then she walked over and picked up the pipe for him. It was still the same one; only his fingers had left more marks on the copper. After so many years, he must have changed too.

Liu held out a trembling hand.

"You are Qiulan if I am not mistaken. I'm so glad to see you and my native village again …"

Qiulan's eyes were a little moist with tears as she wiped the dust from the pipe and handed it to him.

"Please come in. Suocheng has some good tobacco for you."

"How is Suocheng?" Liu took the pipe with both hands.

"He's fine. It's all thanks to the Party." Qiulan called over her shoulders: "Xinhuai's father, we have a guest."

Buttoning his jacket, Suocheng ran out but halted at the sight of Liu, and for a while remained speechless with amazement.

Liu shook his head with feeling. "You've grown old, too."

After a long time, Suocheng said, "I was born in the year of the rooster. I'm now sixty."

Qiulan laughed.

The tension was gone and they entered the courtyard. When Qiulan told him about the well, Liu nodded in approval. "The water underground is good. I did want to sink a well when I built this house, but I changed my mind for fear that it might bring misfortune to my family." He was laughing at his old superstition now.

"Water; water!" came the voice from the bottom of the well.

Oiulan clapped her hands in excitement and rushed over. Peering down the well, she asked, "Is there much water?"

"Yes. It's gushing out of a tiny hole."

Gillian turned and called to her husband, "Fetch me a ladle."

Suocheng put a gourd ladle in a basket and lowered it into the well. When he pulled it up again, it was full of water.

"Taste it, Xinhuai's mother. See if it's sweet or salty."

Qiulan took the ladle and offered it to Liu. "Please taste this water from your home village."

Liu was moved but did not dare take it.

"Come on," urged Qiulan. "We'll have plenty of it to drink later."

"Go ahead. You are our guest," Suocheng chimed in.

Liu took the ladle with his trembling hands and began drinking at large gulps, not bothering to wait for the dust in the water to settle. He savored it, with his eyes half-closed.

“Sweet?” asked Suocheng.
Liu put the ladle to his mouth and took a few more gulps; tears were streaming down his cheeks.
Her eyes filled with tears, Qiulan quickly turned away …

82.37 Tale Of Two Strangers\fn{by Yuan Jen aka Wang Li-teh (1946-)} Hupei Province, China (M) 12

1

Just what season of the year is it, anyway? Sitting there in the car with nothing to do, fighting sheer boredom, Chi Kan-sheng suddenly felt the question jump out at him. In a world like this, it was hard to fix a definite answer to questions even so simple like this. What season is it? When you’ve really got to be clear about something, the thing to do was figure out just precisely where you were at the moment. Follow the path back to the beginning, he mused. And so there he was again, stuck in the sand of his question mark. And as for getting back to where it had all started—that was no simple thing to do.

If it weren’t for the taxi driver turning on a cassette recording of Copland’s Appalachian Spring,\fn{Composed in 1944 by the American composer Aaron Copland (1900-1990).} would that sudden intuition about the changing seasons of the year have occurred to him? What a taste for music the fellow had!

The human mind was a damn strange thing. Most of the time it was a container mysterious and deep, and the truth was you could never put a lid on it. And then sometimes it was more like a piece of embroidered cloth, the various pieces of fabric all silky and fine: it wasn’t that it was woven improperly, but rather that all the threads followed one another and twisted and turned until in the end they lay buried in a dark and sad mass of confusion. The present moment was an example of that. Copland was unleashing this magnificent array of spectacular wonders and colors of the universe, but if he looked outside the window, what did he see? Nothing but a sheet of chilly dull gray. Winter had all but finished its song. And spring? There wasn’t even a hint of its faintest notes.

The kaleidoscope world inside the car and the dreary cold outside the window were as real to him as they were deluding, and how could he, a lonely wanderer who had not found a place to plant his feet, a home he could call his own, manage to comprehend it all? These moments he was passing through seemed to say it well. As he sped along, he knew his life was unfolding before him like a far flung journey, the road before him calling for decisions. But what world had he spun out of in the past, and what land was he rushing toward now? One thing he was certain of: there would always be so much he would never completely understand.

*

That place called Wu-ho didn’t have any snow in the winter, and naturally it was much warmer than here. Wouldn’t spring just be starting to show itself now? Wu-ho didn’t have any real mountains, but there were hills as far as you could see. If you took all that glory in Appalachian Spring and could put it aside for a minute, well, wouldn’t a celestial melody like that capsulize the beauty of this dreamland of the East? It was not something he had complete control of. The very name Wu-ho stirred images of his father reminiscing, and set a flame alight in his imagination.

There was a tree that Wu-ho was famous for, called a tung oil tree. Wu-ho had so many tung oil trees! They were big and tall. Were they taller than mango trees, he asked.

“Much taller! This place doesn’t even know what a tall tree looks like!” his father replied with haughty con-empt befitting a tough veteran army officer, even though what he had commanded was only an infantry company. The tung tree fruit had an oil you could extract. The fruit was a green color at first, but then it got yellow, and finally it became red. It was the prettiest thing you could imagine! You could squeeze that oil out and use it for all sorts of things. This bit of information was what his father had told him, but the geography books agreed.

There were also bushes called “oil cha” trees. The plains were just covered with them. They weren’t as tall as a human being, and they produced a fruit about the size of small tomatoes. They began as a bright glow when green, and deepened to a rich red, and when they were completely ripe, their skin burst at the seams. The seeds had an oil you drew out, a very important, useful cooking oil.

“Did it taste good?”

“Ah! A little oily but not bad. A lot of folks on mainland China couldn’t even get their hands on two ounces of oil in a whole year.”

He realized that back then their Wu-ho was considered a wealthy place.

“Mountains everywhere, well, are there rice paddies that slope on the sides?” According to the geography books, that's the way Shechuan province was.

"No, the incline on the sides isn't steep enough. In the middle of the plain you can plant and harvest. Rice paddies are all over the place there, and good for two crops a year."

His father used the lid of his tea cup to stir the foam that had floated to the top from the jasmine leaves. He pursed his lips, and then his eyes and voice fluttered off into the distance.

"What you use to till the fields are water buffaloes. There aren't many oxen, and they're for pulling carts. The weather in the old country's real good, the different seasons—four of 'em!—are just about perfect for farming. In the spring there's the spring rains. You have to wear the right head gear the farmers use, and the big rain coats. Looks like it's too hot inside for you, but in fact it's cool and comfortable."

He took this talk and let it roll around inside his head. Well, more or less, isn't it like "this place here?"

"Not the same! Oh no, not the same!" A determined note jumped back into his Father's voice. "In the old country there was so much bamboo, and the buildings were all taller, and no matter what you laid your eyes on, hell—it was twice as good as here!"

*

He was well acquainted with spring time in Taiwan's countryside, and he thought of it often.

He had tested into a well known middle school run by the county, and his father insisted on blurting out his pride in a unique "Did I tell you what school my boy got into?" fashion without a flint of sensitivity for his "Ah Dad, don't am-bare-ass-me-again, please, Dad!" feelings. Once school began, his father kept bringing up his intention to call on his teachers, to pay them the equivalent of an official parental visitation. He fought the idea doggedly, hoping to deter him by stiff resistance and gloomy silence.

But not long after the second semester began, he opened his eyes one morning to find his father all dressed up and ready to go. There he sat on the edge of the bed, smoking a cigarette. It was obvious he had taken excruciating care to choose just the right ensemble to wear. The clothing he had gotten himself into was immaculate to the degree of absurdity, and it waved a sort of fairy-tale-like wand over his entire countenance. His haberdashery clashed mightily with the tone of his skin, which was dark and leathery tough. His shoes were polished to a frightful gloss, his hair brushed straight back and worried into a hat-like formation, and his posture was absolutely rigid. Everything about his father was a loud announcement that he was a walking taro plant let loose from the boonies for an excursion to the big city.

He heaved a sigh of resignation, "Let it be!"

At that time, the city limits were not very well defined, and the school was on the edge of downtown. After getting off the bus there was still quite a way to walk, and then finally, after a good spell, you got to the middle of the springtime fields.

He led the way, the two of them using a path that served as a short cut, but one that was so narrow they could not walk side by side. That fact made it at least a little easier on him. His father clomped along in back of him, and complained with every step about the poor quality of the road. He knew full well that the real reason for the grumbling was he was afraid of scuffing up his shiny new shoes. His father's irritation gave him a distinct shot of pleasure. Even the harsh, unrelenting rays of the morning sun above seemed a portent.

There were freshly planted rice paddies close by, and the fields were squared off in individual terraces, with the tips of the rice shoots poking up through the surface of the glistening water. Men were working in some of the paddies, they were bent over at the waist, and they seemed to grow right up out of the water. Off in the distance a team of water buffalo stepped along in yoke and harness; they turned around and began their treck all over again.

He didn't know a thing about working the rice paddies. His impression was that even after they left the fields behind them at the end of the day, the backs of the workers were still bent in their labor, and the water buffalo continued to plod up and back, and back and up, as if to say, "Why not, the gods won't give us our rice for nothing, you know!" He could not see if the men or their animals were happy or sad. He felt simply that they were there, that their lives were hard, and that they were the focus of the portrait.

His father was probably already in an advanced state of discomfort because he wasn't accustomed to wearing the shoes. He kept stopping to stare off in all directions. So the son had to stop then too. He felt the length of the shadow his body cast in back of him, the top of it falling over his father's feet as he stood stock still in the road, knocking the mud loose from the soles of his shoes and then hobbling ahead another step or two. Eventually his father pointed off into the distance.

"Look over there at that mist floating over across the way! It's like that classic literary verse, 'Mist as soft as the dust left by wild horses scampering over the horizon.'"

The mist looked like floating dust all right, but "wild horses?" What bullshit! It was always that sort of thing.

As usual, he responded by silence.

At school his father hurried off to find the student advisor, and then after seeing him, he went back home. He didn't disturb class-time, which was a great relief to him. The advisor was the Chinese Literature teacher, also from the China mainland. The two of them probably talked together very easily. Afterwards he called him aside and said with a chuckle, "I had no idea he would be so familiar with classical sources. You can read extra articles and get a lot of added instruction from him." Of course the advisor did not know that at home there was scarcely a word exchanged between father and son. And as far as his father's classical roots were concerned, he couldn't care the less about them.

One step into their house, and it leapt off the wall at you—a great white poster with four lines of pudgy Chinese characters drawn in the style of the celebrated Tang dynasty calligrapher Yen Chen-tzu.

Asleep in the midst of spring
Dead to the rising of the sun
Hill and valley filled with the chirping of birds
Nights with sounds of wind and rain drops
Breezes gently humming
Who can count the leaves that tumble free and fall to the ground?

It's not enough to write it all down; you've got to plaster it back up again too. And not only that you plaster it up again, you've got to read it out loud too! And that word chu, you have to pronounce it with a twist of the vowel to make it almost a chi. And the yeh isn't yeh at all! It's got to be yah! After supper there was his cup of tea, and then he'd drag him all through the whole rigmarole again. He would listen with all his might, but by God, there was no getting around the rumble of chu-ah, chu-ah, until it leapt up inside him from the marrow of his bones, and all he wanted was to shout back at him,

"All right, all right! This place here: if it's no good, why don't you just go on back to the old country then, huh? Chu-ah! Go ahead and go back!"

*

The taxi had just turned off the highway, and he was approaching the airport now. The angle of the curve caused his body to shift to the left, and he cradled the bundle on his knees, steadying it with his hand. An exit ramp loomed ahead, the sides of the road were strewn with trees. The tops of the trees bunched together, tip to tip, and over the very edge of their heads the lofty tail of a plane poked out. Yes, that was it. People could go back home with something to show off that they had made their mark in the world. But he had not. Maybe he could grab a seat in the back of the plane, right over the tail lights, then he would be literally "clinging to the tail of an illustrious party" as the classical proverb puts it. It would be outrageous for him to brag about coming from a long line of erudite scholars. But hadn't he inherited something from his father after all? Otherwise, where did this ready wit come from?

Springtime in the Appalachias quickly turned into clouds on the horizon. What season was it that was coming so soon? Copland didn't really say, and now he did not want to ask.

2

When a person is looking for something, what they need is light. When they're looking for themselves, what they need is darkness. Chi Kan-sheng was well accustomed to laying awake in bed, and he had come to enjoy darkness and the kind of clarity it offered him.. That flash of an instant at the very threshold of birth, and the final seconds before death, perhaps those were the moments that offered the most luminous of lights? He guessed so.

The darkness of the sky, a dark so utterly desolate and deep, so overwhelming and vast that it could erase everything. Suddenly an impulse sprang to life inside him. If he could break the window next to him, if he could take out the urn with those ashes that were as white as snow, what would they look like? If every secret could be completely revealed, if all of everything could be poured back into the universe—well, there was no harm in that.

That day was the first time in his life he had ever seen the ashes of a human body. Alas, a person's ashes could never only be ashes, and they could never completely match the color of other burnt out things. How very different it was than what he had imagined! To get them out of the contraption at the crematorium, they had to pound the bones into a powder of the finest and purest quality, and then this stuff took on a texture that was eerily light and puffy. Until now he still felt it beyond his wherewithal to connect his father's face with the white stuff in that urn he was carrying.

After his mother died, the government granted his father leave to retire from the service and raise his orphan. He found a piece of land in the middle of the countryside on the edge of a military compound in central Taiwan, and built them a place to live with his own hands. Then the two of them, father and son, settled down there. In time the house, though small, acquired a certain celebrity status because it was indeed a very unusual place. Except for support beams, it was made entirely of bamboo, and, what's more, it was a remarkably tall structure, but a building without an upstairs: the upper level was not for living in at all! And so the tallness of the place seemed to have some poignant intention in itself.

"There's not a thing wrong with it, all the houses in the old country were built just like that."

The house was well built, his father told him. As he stirred his tea, the inflection of his voice seemed to send it afloat into a far off horizon.

But the people in the locale just could not get used to it, and they called it the Ie house after the Taiwanese word for "tall." The house became more famous than the military compound itself. Later the students from all around the area called him Ie, despite the fact he was actually rather short. This of course increased the cut of the nickname.

"Making a bamboo house isn't anything to talk about. The men in Wu-ho, you just handed them a clump of bamboo and a knife, and they could make anything out of it." That's how his father talked when people came to see their bamboo house. The end result was they accumulated some more stacks of bamboo.

Later he would come to know the meaning of "standing tall with bamboo pride." All the same, there was a great gulf between the deep and the shallow. With near sleight of hand artistry, his father wove together bamboo slats of just the right shade and hue, and he worked the corners meticulously. Even the outer edges of the drubbing had strips in three tones, managing in the end to look like fancy lace embroidery. Talk about a thing of beauty! It seemed as if it should have been shipped out of the country side for a public exhibition. But it was for his own enjoyment, and nothing more. In the beginning no one gave any thought to a couple left over pieces of bamboo siding. Except for the pleasure you could get from them, what use were good looking things like that?

Around the four sides of the house, circling the open space, his father built a bamboo fence, and then along the back border he set up a lattice, also made of bamboo. One morning his father went out before he even left for school, and when he came home that afternoon after classes, he found him home already. It was pleasantly cool inside the house, but his father lay on top of his bed as if there wasn't an ounce of energy left in his whole body. When he heard him enter, he blinked his eye a time or two, and spoke listlessly. He poured his father a drink of water, and through the back window saw a pair of sturdy bamboo poles with an elaborate lattice arrangement underneath, and the ensemble struck him as a sight both magnificent and beautiful. And yet somehow there was a feel to the scene much like the sensation of gazing at a strikingly attractive woman whom you knew with a single glance could not be trusted. It was disturbing.

At the far side of a large storage crate there was a tract of land, and a fence that formed a border. He saw a strip of newly sectioned off ground and a linking of bamboo rings. He thought to himself, before they moved here, didn't he once hear his father raise a certain topic with one of his buddies, something about this area perhaps having a position open, and he might start his own refuse gathering business? The phrase his father used was "refuse gathering." The children in that military compound called it "picking up garbage." Local kids termed it "trash collecting."

Army veterans used to be dark in color. After he became a professional—that again was his father's choice of words—a professional, his father's skin got darker every year. The truth is he looked as if he'd been painted over on purpose. His father said that back in the old country, once people got into their middle years and had made their mark, they made sure to get themselves a good coffin. And then with each passing year they'd throw on another coat of lacquer. If a man was blessed with a long life, that coffin shone so brightly that all you had to do was flick a tiny drop of paint onto the surface, and you heard a ping like a flake of gold clinking merrily against a hard flint stone. He knew it was blasphemous, but sometimes he couldn't repress the sensation that the color of his father's skin reminded him of that eerie custom back in the old country, and he felt nothing but contempt for the people there.

Although in his last years he had dropped the trash collecting, his father was still darker than most people. Who would have thought that he would in the end be reduced to a pile of lily white ashes? As he thought about it, he smiled wryly. He chuckled, and though the sound wasn't enough to outdo the bottomless darkness outside the airplane, it bounced against the window beside him like a pebble, sending back an echo that was dry, crisp, and chilly. It unnerved him some.

*

Wang Chao-nan, better known by his nick name "Old Ah-nan," came in from his school on the outskirts of the city to visit him. He had just taken him out for a meal at a popular beef and noodles shop, not expensive at all, only six kwai a bowl, and the servings the kind that made you doze off at the table the minute you finished eating. What probably happened that day was his dormitory was so full he couldn't offer Old Ah-nan a place for a nap. So they ended up wandering around on Roosevelt Road. It was one of those bright sunny days in winter. Ah-nan hadn't seen anything but rain on his campus for a long time, and he couldn't help but look up in wonder at the sky, which was as blue as an ocean.

"Hey, Old Le! Since when have you become an authority on midwifery?" Ah-nan suddenly snickered. It occurred to him that the old nick name was a reminder of how close they'd been all through the years. An-nan lifted his head and looked right into a sign that was blinking at them. It read, The Kan-sheng Gynecology Clinic. In a flash Ah-nan picked up on the coincidence.

"Hey, Kan! Will you just look at that name! Same as yours, isn't it, Kan? Kan-sheng, Kan-sheng. Fuck-a-baby, fuck-a-baby. That's it all right!" And then he fixed on his name and harped away at the rhyme it made with a certain memorable word. "You fucker, Kan, go ahead, Fuck-around-Kan, fuck around all right, Kan, and you'll get a baby, pal! Hey, the joint's named after you!"

He laughed along with the joke, but later he thought of Wang Chao-nan's own name, and more than that, he thought of Ah-nan himself. He and his name both seemed low. A university man ought to be above that sort of humor. These kids around here!

It was only much later that he came to understand that his father's calligraphy was really quite good, although at the time he thought he was just showing off. Later he saw his father's words, "Asleep in the mist of spring, dead to the rising of the sun." It was the first time his father's scripting of characters made an impression on him.

Those bamboo crates his father made, the ones that had five different colors: water marks from the rain eventually made the lettering fade away into a single mellow yellow. Actually it wasn't a bad color, not too deep, not too light. It more or less helped to alleviate people's attention. But good things can't last forever. One day when he came home from school, what did he find but two of the crates with fresh red lettering on them. Kan-chi, kan-chi—four characters, each more blatant than the other. He had drawn them on all sides, so they couldn't be missed, and sure enough he had them front and back, belly and behind, so you saw them from every angle.

Even a junk collector has to have a logo!

"Hey, Le! Your old man a clever old fucker, huh? He'll scribble that name of yours all over his garbage bins. Kan ju chu, kan ju chu. Kan Refuse Collecting! What a name! Might as well write: Fuck-er Kan, fuck-er on in, fuck-er on out, huh?"

He threw up his fists and went at Ah-nan.

The word kan itself wasn't listed in our textbook. How did Ah-nan know it? Once the fight happened, of course all the boys in the class knew the word. Well, he was short and thin, and from then on he took a lot of pounding; but he also handed out his share of bloody noses and black eyes.

"Wasn't I born in Taiwan? Why did you call me Kan-sheng?"

People had called him this all this time, and only now did he find out the name's all wrong. He resolved that regardless of the consequences, there was no way he wouldn't ask his father.

"Your mother got pregnant when we were still in the old country. We were only here two months when you were born. Of course your name was Kan-sheng. It has a very filial meaning!"

But he would not surrender. For once he would forge ahead all the way to the bitter end. His father had no inkling of what he had done in joining the double meanings of this Mandarin word kan with its counterpart pronunciation in Taiwanese dialect. He would sure as hell tell the stupid old son-of-a-bitch the suffering and God damn shame he had put him through. He would do it carefully, indirectly even, but he would do it. He wanted him to know.

"Don't pay any attention to them! These kids around here! They can't do a damn thing!"

You're the only one who can do anything right. You're the garbage collector.

But he only dared to talk like that to himself.

Couldn't I have gotten inside her eight months later? Couldn't I have the name "Chi Tai-sheng"—meaning "born in Taiwan"? Impossible. His father would never give him a name with a meaning that connected his birth with Taiwan. Unless he were named with the chi that meant "stay for a while," and not the one that meant "remember."

Chi Tai-sheng … Chi Tai-Sheng, stay for a while in Taiwan, stay only for a while. Yes, that's it!

His father's calligraphy didn't only win him a name in the neighborhood, "Bringing glory to a humble home," as the proverb puts it, later it literally "glorified" the door frames of their house. He didn't know when it began, but for a succession of Chinese New Year holidays the rhymed couplets were hung at door frames of the house. On flashy red paper the famous old saying was proclaimed:

Every year comes as trial and challenge, but every year we get by;
Not a home anywhere in sight, yet every place is a home for me.

Across the top of the door were the words:

Floating Life is a stopover.

That's the way it was. The father had stopped as a guest of honor, and the son shared the hospitality. One more year in exile makes for still another year. And what began as a visit turns into a lifetime.

They probably teach it to you while you're still in the womb. Those eight months of darkness had been exerting a decisive influence on his life ever since. Or, to put better words to it, they made it impossible for him to ever make a decision about anything.

He thought he spoke Taiwanese like a native, but Hsueh-hua poo-pooed it the very first time she heard him.

"Since I got out of college, I've used it less. I think I must have forgotten some of it." He fumbled for an excuse, and it was an unhappy thing, for it felt as if he'd lost something he thought was really a part of him. He was considered a good speaker of Mandarin Chinese when he lived in Taiwan, being a "Mainlander." Yet the first time he saw Yuan-li—talk about loss of face!—he wanted desperately to think he had handled it well, but he knew he had made a complete ass of himself.

"You're a Taiwanese? Listen to your accent and you know right away. Peking pronunciation is the basis for Mandarin, but it's not the same as Mandarin."

He tried to find an excuse for himself. He had said shih very smoothly, but had forgotten to curl his tongue back on chu, and he was sure Yuan-lin heard it. Not only could he not avoid feeling himself a fool, but this time he wasn't even sure what he had done wrong.

He had never really put into words the reason he let Hsueh-hua go to marry Yuan-lin, but in the beginning he felt it at least had something to do with comforting his father, a kind of compensation for the past. Yuan-lin was from Peking. When she was a child she had moved around with her refugee parents, and she happened to live in their neighboring region for six or seven years. For all practical purposes she was half a native to the area. Well, so his father felt an immediate sense of kinship with her from the moment he met her. There was no need for explanation. They talked warmly of the Chiang-hsi province he had heard of since he was a child, and it was almost like meeting someone from your home town in a far off and very foreign land. Not even ordinary grass and trees can be denied their emotions!

But it was not the same for him. There was no way in the world he could measure up to Yuan-lin in her way with the language, for example. Stretching back to the very beginning of his life, why, he'd never spent a single day over there.

And there was Hsueh-hua saying that when you really came down to it, he really knew very little about actual Taiwanese thinking and customs. Her judgment on the matter:

"Your Mainland origin probably influenced you some."

This was a shock to him, because after all, she had never even met his father. And that was another thing that was good. Hsueh-hua really was a local girl. He couldn't imagine what she and her father could find to talk about.

After darkness, calmness; and after calmness, tranquillity. With tranquillity there is the awareness of cessation. The jetliner was still moving along, but he sensed it had already come to a standstill. The body of the craft melted into the night, and the night faded into darkness. He was like an unripened seed planted in the midst of the darkest night. He felt clear-headed, but he did not know what night it was, or where he was.

Knocking down a drink or two, singing a song
Who knows the length of our days?

Let the booze give you courage! Come on, show us that voice of yours!

It was the traditional farewell ritual at the end of university days, and not an easy thing for a sensitive one like him. There he was with his classmates, the girls along with the guys, partying the night away. Four whole years, gazing out the same windows of the same classrooms, but together not all that often, mostly just fooling around.

And now the time had come to say farewell. Everyone shouts that it's his turn. No getting around it, now, got to sing the song now. "Only the booze can take away the sadness."

Tsao-tsao leads soldiers by the million all the way to An-nan, oh, so full of confidence at that time, that line of the song, one more time, let's go! You couldn't miss that rush of emotion. The old university gang: it was like a fleet of sailboats heading out to a brightly lit sea. Thoughts of those carefree days now long distant, how could you not feel a little sad! With his left arm covering his face, and drawing back his sleeve and hiding behind it, he lifted the glass with his right hand. He leaned his head back dramatically and downed every last drop.

High on the fringe of yonder tree top.
See the birds circling round and round
Never can they land or rest
No place do they find

The same windows, the same rooms … together we forged our way, together we took our rest, nothing special about any of it … it's only when you must face a farewell that you see the beauty of true friends. Ah, the lustrous sparkle of those marvelous days, but—you just can't go back to them, can't go back.

"The Duke of Chou worked so industriously that he earned the devotion of all the people in the world."

Your body's stuck in a tight little corner, but your mind can hold the whole wide world. His father said it well: only such a virtuoso as Yuan Shih-hai was able to recapture the heroic ambition of that ancient hero.

Everybody was so young then. It's all gone now, it's so damn sad. But he still should look out at the world with eyes held high, and his vision set on the far horizon. By the time he got the final refrain out, he felt as if he had never had a moment that happy in his entire life. His eyes were burning, and he slumped forward and bowed his head.

Excuse me everybody, please, for my lousy singing—no, ah, can't sing at all. He had to get hold of himself.

Expressions of deep emotion like that were out of character for him. He probably was a little tipsy. A performance like that was almost overdone. And Li Yo-lan was there too. Once he had felt a pang of yearning for her, oh, just imagine! Never again, never again. There'll never be another time.

Slowly he raised his head and made as if he would pour more into his glass. But all of a sudden the air in the room seemed weird to him, as if someone had sucked out its chemical base. There was no going back now. He looked around at everyone, but their expressions weren't natural at all. There was Old Fish Head already at the end of a cup of coffee, his hands toying with the china on the table, and people's voices, what was wrong? They seemed to clatter in the air. The side of Li Yo-lan's face had the final vestiges of a smirking little smile she couldn't rid herself of. And Wang Cheng-hsiung, a guy he had never managed to get along with at all, was trying to put on the kindest expression as if to make up for him.

His stomach was in an uproar, his throat felt like it had prickles stuck in it, and his face had taken on the gradual but rising effects of burning alcohol. He was not only angry with himself, he was ashamed too. He felt like a girl who had let love show for the first time, and gotten herself pushed away by a cruel lover. The early afternoon sun cast its shadow over the slippery hard surface of the floor. The rays spread out smoothly from his feet, the part above his shoulders concealed in a shadow. He thought of the paths running beside the rice paddies that spring, and of the wild horses kicking up their dust. Again he faced the rising of the sun, and saw the long shadow at his back, and his father's leather shoes. One thing rolls into another, and then it all happens over and over again. You can't get away from it, you can't break free.

"One—all right, turn—bright light—moon—the three—principles of the people. Can you hear it now? Concentrate! It's actually a four beat times two, one heavy, three lights, like the national anthem."

Studying it with minute care, and his father leading him on even more carefully yet, they tapped out the tune with their fingers as they went along. It was as if their hands not only kept time against the arms of the chairs they were sitting in, but were actually concocting that delicate magic in the air, that incredible thing so difficult to achieve between father and son, which the instruction manual termed, "Tenderness easily broken."

A tree takes ten years to grow, and a pair of mu-ma-huang trees his father had planted with his own hands now dwarfed the front entrance of the Le House. Still visible however were his banners which proclaimed poetic ideals. Beneath the shade of the trees in front there sat father and son, each on a single great rattan chair. They were listening to Yu Shu- yen's The Inn.

He couldn't find any tutoring work that summer vacation, and so he lived at home. But life back home wasn't all so easy. Time dragged; after all, he couldn't study every minute, and his father couldn't spend all his time collecting garbage, either. The two of them had no way to avoid meeting each other. So what could they do? Study some Peking Opera! He found a way out for himself, and one for his father as well.

"One, two, three, four …" Without even thinking about it, there he was, wagging and bobbing his head with the tune,

Knocking down a drink or two, singing a song
Who knows the length of our days?

*

Yu Shu-yen was gone, and Yuan Shih-hai had his turn on stage. He was such an expert at those complicated and delicate gestures, all the vocal intonations, oh, he was a great one, that frail and fragile old fogy. But the sound of his voice had gotten to sound like a bully.

They mastered about one half of The Inn, his father said, but the deepest of its meanings was not something you could rush into. He understood it himself, but naturally finding the words for it was another matter. The trees hummed with the soft music of the cicadas, but they couldn't disguise the fragile nature of those moments. In all of their life together, didn't it only come down to a single fleeting summer?

Singing Composing a Poem in the Heat of Battle was so very much more than only getting the words out and swaggering around all puffed up with the role. Tsao-tsao was a crafty schemer, cunningly aggressive, just two steps ahead of the enemy every time in his strategies. The essence of the poem Tuan-ke hsing was that even when the words spoke of sorrow and nostalgia, down deep he was full of pride and complacency! The thing was to be faithful to your inner self! When you chanted the verses, the thing to do was to maintain the equilibrium, knowing when to let go, and when to hold your emotions in check. His father fixed his tea cup aright and used its topper to stir the tea leaves. He moved it back and forth, and when he realized his son did not look impatient with him, he took his hands off the cup and continued with his explanation. First he took him through those memorable old peaks and valleys of the Battle at the Red Cliff fought in the era of the Three Kingdoms and then he talked of the brilliant Su Tung-po and his famous essay, Reflections Beneath the Red Cliff. It was gradual, this awareness that the boy was not pretending an interest, and so he went on and on and spoke not in mere generalities, but quoted the text line by line.

He was mightily impressed by his father on that day, he was nothing short of hugely magnificent in his eyes. He looked up in fine admiration, and saw that the old man had risen so high that he could hardly catch sight of him.

His father finished his lecture and rearranged his tea paraphernalia. In the end he said,

"That's the way Peking Opera is. The background is all long ago and far away. The essential meanings go all the way down to the bottom. And not only that, do you see, there isn't a single sound that is not also a musical note, or a gesture that isn't part of a dance. So a chapter or an episode, why, you can see it a hundred times and not be bored! Now this local Taiwanese opera is just a bunch of noise, you don't know what the hell they're singing!"

It was as if the local shows were like weeds or worthless flowers in a foreign land, and you might just as well pick up your feet and stomp all over them.

The soft gentle singing of the cicadas, the luxuriant front courtyard. He had an impulse to sing or play a flute. In his whole life he only learned to sing one section of the Peking opera of Tsao-tsao's Composing a Poem in the Heat of Battle. But from that moment on he could never get himself to look at a Taiwanese opera again, or hear anyone say a negative word about Peking Opera.

Outside the window there had been an undiluted darkness, but now it seemed to have softened, and you could catch a glimmer of faintly colored sheet-like darkness behind. Perhaps behind that light there was again an incredible darkness.

His mind regained awareness of the plane in motion. But perhaps because he had been gazing at the dark for too long, for some moments he couldn't tell where the plane was headed.

*

The dark sky looked so limpid that it seemed it might never turn solid again. A chemist would term its rate of solubility high, its permeability low. It was like young love—strong and violent up till a certain moment, and then quite ready to spend itself into exhaustion, and slowly die off and diminish. It advanced from all sides and wrapped itself around the essence of every existing thing, and then it grew dim and faded away. It was its fate to embrace the height and depth, the shape and substance of everything that was, as if it were a great round ball. It would transform itself into still another new force and then would burst forth into the spectacular light of a new day.

As the first rays of the early morning sun poured through the window, Chi Kan-Sheng suddenly became aware that although he and his father had been flying along for a good long time, still they had not quite left the world behind. Not a few people surrounded them, and not a few matters of practical concern still needed to be smoothed away. He didn't want to sleep any longer, just closed his eyes. Realities stood firmly fixed, but the light pouring in offered no guidance for his inner self. It helped him only to see more vividly the turmoil that was closing in from all sides.

He pushed his father along to the French window. The snow that lay on the ground beneath the pale tree branches was scattered and thin. Across the pond of frozen green he saw the shimmering reflection of the sun. A wild duck flew through the air from the opposite shore, and found a slippery landing upon the surface. Its little rear end flipped over backwards, and the two of them laughed. The hour was near sundown, and they were alone, father and son, and suddenly each recognized the singularity of the moment. A chill passed over him.

His father did not have many days left now, and he would come to the hospital to be with him whenever he had the time. He felt his body was there, but his mouth was someplace else. He just could not find the words.

"Ah, ahem … should take this chance, just the two of us here, Chi-sheng. There's something here to, ah, take care of with you."

So finally it was the sick man who took the initiative to break the silence. There was a solemn note in his father's voice, and it made him feel uneasy. The curious look on the face he saw reflecting back in the window made him fidget.

"When I made the arrangements about that piece of land and talked with you about it in that letter, you didn't offer any opinion. Later I found some people who were willing to invest, together we had an apartment building constructed on that piece of land and I got two floors for it. Well, later I sold that off for cash. When all that happened, you were still quiet about the thing. It was a little like you didn't want to get involved. And now the situation, well, now you don't have any choice. I fixed up your name in the paper work, and the legal briefs and my seal are all in my briefcase. Later on now, you just go ahead and take it all out. Whatever you want to do with it, you just go ahead and do it. Well, another way to look at it—that saying, 'With a little thrift comes a little fortune,' that's it. Your old man had a dirty job, but his money ain't dirty."

He moved his eyes from the lake outside the window, and his eyes dropped slightly downward. From the chilly window pane he saw a reflection of his father's face, with that indignant look.

As the sun prepared to drop from the sky in those years, he used to sit at his desk by the window doing his homework, and he'd lift his head and watch his father picking through his trash and separating it with meticulous care. He saw him weigh it up into two kilo stacks, and then saw how he threw himself into a ritual of shining and polishing and polishing and shining. If somebody had only given him a scale, he would have looked like a merchant fussing over precious jewels. He had two storage containers for his trash, and inside them he stored everything devotedly away. Every few days he would drag his treasures out and sell them to this or that specialist.

A few years passed, their life improved, and he began to hear people in that military compound connect his father's name to the Chiu-chiang River area back in mainland China.

"That Old Chiu-chiang," they said, "he's one sharp old geezer."

Wu-ho was such a tiny little place, and here his father had found more celebrity in a famous nearby city Chiu-chiang. His classmates from the nearby towns would josh him in Taiwanese dialect,

"Hey Le, your old man picking up hunks of gold or something?"

Indeed, when he took another look at the way the whites of his eyes flashed against the dark of his face, something whispered to the boy that his small fortune wasn't coming from thrift alone.

His father never let him do anything to help, just passed on to him all the pocket money he needed. At school he was acutely sensitive to other people's reactions, especially the sympathy given him by teachers aware of his family background. But he had far and away more money for personal spending than anyone around him. His comfort and his shame both sprang from the same well, and it was impossible to keep the two apart. It was only after he went abroad to study, only after he was established with a home and career that he could get his mind off that well.

Over a ten year span, he went back only twice. He felt his status as a guest much more deeply on the second trip. "The Tall House" had become a ten story apartment building. There were four families to a floor, and his father had two floors of his own. He lived in the middle unit. The front entrance belonged to everybody in the place, so his father had lost the privilege of posting banners of Chinese New Year Blessings over the doorways.

The capital coming in from garbage collecting had come to an end long before, and his father's financial situation had sky rocketed.

The whole piece of land had originally been public property. But by squatter's right, his father claimed it as his private estate. And after long years of fight and squabbles private estate. And after long years of fights and squabbles with the authorities, he won. It turned out that "this place" may never be like the old country, but it wasn't too hard for him to build himself a career of sorts here. As the Chinese call the shrewd people of Chiu-chiang, the old man was one sharp old geezer, all right.

Actually everything was quite perfect. The neighbors and friends treated him well, they were all model hosts. But still he felt like an interloper. He couldn't lay a finger on anything, or say a single word that didn't leave him feeling he'd somehow broken a taboo. His father was like a spoiled guest who enjoyed every scrap of profit he could glean from excessive hospitality lavished on him for a good long time by his kind host. And he in turn was his father's guest. Although neither had anything to complain about, in the end both sensed a certain desolation they could not put a name to. The father became an uprooted guest of honor for life, and he inherited the hospitality. It was all predestined.

And so the moment arrived. Before his father passed on, there was a farewell gift he wanted to offer him. He felt it made no sense for him to accept it, and yet he could not summon the courage to say no either. And so here he was, making this journey long and arduous, to receive something his father wanted him to accept.

"Just take it with a smile," as the Chinese often put it when urging someone to accept a gift. But how can he smile? It was such an absurd joke that he wanted to laugh. But at that moment all he could do was close his eyes and quietly chuckle to himself, for the darkness that had offered him comfort and protection was already gone.

3

He made his way slowly toward the door of the plane. Losing sleep was not a new experience for him, but lying there all cramped up, and then unfolding his body and forcing it to walk again accentuated his exhaustion. Between the cumbersome overnight bag draped over his right shoulder, which shifted and tossed with every step, and the urn of ashes in his hands, which required careful and respectful vigilance, he felt like a clumsy country bumpkin on a pilgrimage to the Holy Mountain. His father was his father, and after dying, still a burden on his hands. He thought about it dimly, and a sudden surge of nausea rose inside him, and with it, a hunger pang. Then it seemed to not be that either, but only a pit of anxiety he didn't want to think about.

"I can make a decision about it after I reach Tokyo."

Before he stepped out the door, that is, what he said to Yuan- lin. It was a moment that made them break out in laughter, because they both knew he was the sort of man who dreaded making decisions. And there he was. In Tokyo. Should he head west? Or go south? He had no idea.

"Dad let you talk him into it. He really wants to go to Wu-ho and take a look around."

"You'd better think about what's best though. I think he got used to living in Taiwan," she blurted out. "And going back, he'll be disappointed for sure. And there's no way he can stay there."

"It was you who kept talking all the time about how fabulous the old country was, how great and terrific it was, blah, blah, blah. And now that you've got him all worked up about it, you sing a different song. Well, you change his mind!"

"Oh, he is an old man now. I was just trying to cheer him up! He kept criticizing Taiwan up and down the floor —the economy was all twisted out of shape, no more standards in society, they were all a gang of crooks, that kind of talk. All right, so I did glorify it a little for him. I told him the old country was the Taj Mahal, the Golden Paradise, okay, okay. Let him keep his dream."

He was long accustomed to her sharp tongue, but every time she pushed her words all over the place like that, it still caught him off guard.

"I must say you have been very successful. He hasn't been only cheered up. Now he wants to consign his ashes. He says that he was young when he left, and now he'd be old going back, and who would know him in Wu-ho anyway? If he went back, the thing he'd have to do is find a grave site, and then when the time comes, he could lay himself at rest, kind of, well, return to his roots."

He used the cap of his cup and stirred the floating tea leaves. He stopped abruptly, lifted the cup for a sip. Recently he had discovered he had taken on more and more of the mannerisms of his father.

"Influence, influence. It was like a shadow following his shadow, an echo to his voice." His father pursing his lips at the taste of the tea, and then leading him ploddingly through another explanation of poetry, punctuating his sentences with the topper from his tea mug. The two of them fused together in a single silhouette beneath the light of the lamp. How marvelous the term of influence was coined.

"It's something you'd better mull over slowly."

Yuan- lin was speaking in that Peking accent of hers. She paused and sat beside him. He could tell from the way she talked that she was trying to be patient.

"Those people over there don't care much about these spiritual notions. They look at the dead differently. When I was in Chiang-hsi, when people died, they were just pulled outdoors and thrown any old place. We'd be out doing our things, and we'd see the bones and whatever, and nobody thought much about it. If he went back and spent money on a grave, well, maybe it would be different. But the first thing is there'd be no one he could count on to manage these arrangements, and secondly, you can't be going back there all the time yourself. Who knows who would take care of it in the future? That's just the simple truth, you know. The best thing is for you to find some way to sit down and talk it out with him."

Well, "finding some way to sit down and talk" was no easy matter. He might get started all right, but hitting upon the right words was beyond him. But soon enough Yuan-lin herself managed to finagle an opportunity to do it. He was appreciative, and then afterwards, he felt guilty because his father stopped his glowing remarks about the old country. Besides that, he became more aloof towards her. From that time till the very end, his father never once raised again the question of going back to where he had come from.

It was as if he realized that there was no way for him to fight what was told him. And for things not told, he had no decision in the matter.

Just off the plane, he was making his way along in the exit chute, heading toward the stewardesses, who were dispensing the ritual good-byes to the passengers. His one hand cradled the urn of ashes, and the other poised itself to ward off the swirl of people around him. All of a sudden he sensed the strap of the carry-on bag catch up against someone's passing coat sleeve. He couldn't quite shoot his hand upward quickly enough to steady it, and for a fleeting split second there was panic all around. The young woman in front of him caught a quick glimpse and hurriedly stepped closer, thinking she could grab it for him. But her desperate lunge threw him all the more off balance, and heightened a palpable sense of crisis in the air. It was too late—the precious treasure had already been pushed into someone else's hands, and he sensed keenly that for someone else to touch such an object was grossly improper. He wanted to take it back, but somebody else was holding it now. The moment passed, and he felt more lost than ever. Simply put, it was a disaster.

The urn fell on the ground and was broken.

*

Chi Kan-sheng sat alone in the reception room with the package wrapped in golden paper before him on an end table. When he thought of how respectful and dignified it had looked when he began, and when now he looked at its torn and battered condition, he wondered how he would ever be able to raise his head again, so great was his shame. All the requisites of propriety, of decency, respectability, of filiality itself—all of that was broken now, and gone forever.

He leaned closer to the tea table. He placed his hand on the package. He couldn't fathom why it gave him such an uneasy feeling. He let the question roll around in his head, and then rose to his feet. He brushed out the wrinkles of his coat and solemnly bowed his head, as was customary in ceremonies of final respect. Then it occurred to him that as a matter of fact he hadn't done anything wrong. He stepped closer. Hadn't he taken great pains with every last detail, wrapping it with great care for the long journey, tying as securely as possible all those ribbon-like pieces of twine? Just now he had unloosened the knots. It caught a person by surprise, the way the shards of wrapping fell back and unfolded like petals of a wondrous yellow flower.

He examined the broken fragments. Though it was in five or six pieces, the urn had more or less regained its original shape. The powdery white ashes were still a shock, and when he observed the tiny flakes of black in their midst, he supposed it was his hair. When you're alive, it doesn't matter much if you've got a lot of it, or only a little. But after you die, it becomes something rather marvelous, doesn't it? It adds a rather pleasant mix to the pure white of the ashes. The softly resplendent strips and ribbons of wrapping paper embraced the urn and fell back upon themselves gracefully, as if leaping up in undulating waves. And in the bottom right corner there gently nestled several pieces of emerald green porcelain. It was like gazing at a magnificent creation of a master artist, a painting with every stroke the epitome of delicacy and harmony. Such was the impression given by the edges of the shattered porcelain that reflected back at him in the light. The pure white ashes formed a heart at the center of the setting, and made the deep green appear to glisten.

He leaned forward and gazed even more intently. He got closer and closer, pouring all his heart and mind into it. Finally he reached forward and gently stirred the powder with the tip of his finger, as if he might unearth a clue to the mystery buried there.

He had no memories of his father taking him by the hand when he was young, and the truth was that once he had grown up, father and son had never touched one another. Even eye contact was difficult for them. Once the funeral ceremony was over with, it had dawned on him that the only truly incisive impression he had of his father's physical self was that unusually dark skin of his, and the equally extraordinary whites of his eyes. Now that he dared to face his father unflinchingly, to take his full measure as it were, the fact was that the only thing he could picture were those two colors of black and white. Suddenly tear drops fell; they rolled straight down his cheek into the white and the black resting amid the scraps of yellow paper. The tear drops formed a ring that spread rapidly, becoming in an instant larger than the black and white powder.

He embraced the urn from the corner of his eye, more convinced than ever that he could consign the ashes back to the universe, and in so doing release both the dead and the living.

There was a knock at the door. A woman stepped in, accompanied by a middle aged man in a handsome suit. He saw it was the woman named Jui, the one who said the accident with the urn was all her fault. When the two of them saw the porcelain vase now completely unveiled, they at first steeled themselves for his anger. A glance told him they were terribly anxious, just positively withering in embarrassment. In an instant Miss Jui was crying so pitifully she couldn't even speak.

He was almost beside himself with discomfort for them. Why should she take it so seriously, trouble herself so? He was about to blurt out, "Oh you know how accidents can't be avoided, please don't think anything of it," when he realized for a son to even contemplate such words was simply absurd. He didn't know why it had to always be this way, that regardless of time or place, he was doomed to never do the old man right. And just thinking of it in those terms and in the present circumstances made it all the more ridiculous. Was his father supposed to take responsibility for this failure of a son even after he was dead and gone?

Then his thoughts spun off into another direction. Added to his distress was a sense of cavernous shame, making it all the harder for him to find a way out of it. He pictured himself as a prisoner unable to tolerate more torture. He would rather fall dead at that very moment, or just pass out and then regain consciousness, minus an arm or leg if necessary. At least then he'd be beyond this.

This gentleman was an executive. He fumbled for words, kept stuttering all over the place trying to be polite, and he hardly heard a word of it. Looking quite at the end of his rope, the fellow said that time hadn't let him procure the right sort of vase to offer in exchange, and he didn't know if perhaps he could ever find it in his heart to forgive them? With the words still hanging in the air, he reached into a bag and drew out an urn quite similar in color to the original one, but a fair bit smaller. It was only after he pulled out still a second porcelain jar of the same type that he fully grasped his meaning.

His silence put unnamable pressure on the man, who dropped his head in a gesture of helpless embarrassment, and not until he summoned the courage to lift his eyes, that he noted a friendly face looking back at him. He paid no attention to his discomfort, but simply said quietly he was happy to accept this form of compensation. Then he politely voiced a request. He had just made a decision to go on to the China mainland after a week in Taiwan, and he wondered if they might be able to help him with the travel arrangements.

After they left the room, he sat down alone again before the table.

The human mind is a very complicated thing. You give free rein to a single nuance of an idea, and it may spin into a thousand orbits. You'll never drag it back down again. And if you manage to trace a path back to the very first trickling of it all, what you find is: it makes no sense.

Carefully he scooped up a small amount of the ashes in his hands and brought them over to the open rim of one of the urns. He held his palms upward, and let the powder drop gently between his fingers, as if it were sand flowing into an hour glass. The soft flakes fell to the bottom without a whisper, like seconds slipping away in time, melting into the long river of eternity. The lamp light sent its rays downward to embrace the oval inside his hands, caressing a shadow there. He pictured the scene below as a delicate waterfall, and a fleck or two of ash brushed across his chest. A human life cannot be called brief, but all that's left at the end, in a few handfuls, can be sent dropping into two very even paragraphs.

He stared dumbly at the pair of urns and marveled at nature's truths. The bones and limbs of a body will not be pushed about here and there, but after death, they disintegrate and blend together, and the one becomes the other. That was how it was. His father had often remarked, "Spirit gives breath to the soul; the soul gives shape to the spirit."

Now the breath is extinguished, and the bones, reduced to powder, will find a final resting place on both sides of the Taiwan Straits. Freed at last, one half of his ashes will journey back to the land of his dreams, and the other half will stay in the beautiful island, Formosa. Those thoughts of the old land over the course of forty years belong now to the universe. No more cares, no more worries.

But for himself, before him he saw nowhere to go, and behind him he could find no road leading to where he stood. Though blessed with fullness of body and breath, what was the good of it! Oh, what was the good of it!

151.36 The Get-Together\fn{by Gan Tiesheng (1946-)} Peking?, China (M) 5

With the passing of the autumnal equinox, it was by turns rainy and cold. The potatoes were harvested from the fields. The big green grasshoppers, whose clacking noises are only heard in autumn, had soared up from the fields and glided down again. Another year was just about over.

It was at this time that I got a letter from her, sent to the little mountain village where I was team-hitching.\fn{Sent ("hitched onto") a rural productation team.}

September, 1975

Xiong Chang:

Do come to our village. On the last day of September, we are planning a jolly get-together. Banish all unhappy thoughts, and come.

I miss you.

Qiuxia

I did not write back. I even repressed all thoughts of her so as to make the coming meeting more "delicious." It wasn't easy! After all, my classmates—my fellow team-hitchers—had all dispersed, leaving me all alone. I had hoped to enter the university this year, but had once again been eliminated owing to problems with my family background. Then my bunch of egg-laying hens caught the chicken pest and died off one after the other; only my big strong rooster survived, but his characteristic clarion call was reduced to a pathetic croak. When the autumn wind blew, and the leaves scuttled, he would awaken from his lethargy and charge about panic-stricken in search of his mates. That woeful sound was enough to make one weep. . . .

I was enduring, desperately holding out—I did not write or think about her.

At last, the last day of September arrived! I was sure that she would be waiting for me at the gate of the compound. Why not? For one thing, she loved me. For another, of the thirty-odd team-hitching youth, only five or six remained, and half of them were permanently absent in Beijing while another two just roamed about. A couple of girls were all that were left in the once bustling compound! Thirdly, she had also failed to make it in to the university. In a word, our situations were too identical!

And yet, all there was to greet me at the gate were bunches of weeds, blowing in the wind. From within came frolicking noises! I walked through the doorway and was struck dumb: a girl dressed in a pink sweater was shrieking with laughter, stuffing a handful of chicken feathers into the mouth of a young fellow who had fallen on the grass. The fellow kept rolling to get away, while seven or eight young people looked on, clapping and hollering and laughing.

The girl caught sight of me. She walked over to me, wiping away her tears of laughter, and said:

"Oh, he is here. What is this? You didn't bring a thing? Come here to scrounge for food, have you? Off with you! Go get some wine!"

It was she—Qiuxia! Tiny teardrops still clung to her long eyelashes.

"I am not going!" I said laughing, but hating her a little inside.

"In that case, I shall have to dispense with courtesy!" she said in her loud, clear voice to those around, beckoning them with a waving handful of feathers.

The crowd closed in on me, rubbing their hands and rolling up their sleeves. Ah ha! They were the "long departed." They were the heroes "of great renown" in our county: Huo Bo, nicknamed Niuer,\fn{Second Ox.} had once carted off all the old belongings left behind by educated youth who had left the village, and auctioned them off in front of the County Educated Youth Office! Tall Wang Cheng once shook the county by traveling all around the country without a penny to his name! The two girls—Xiao Xiu and Xiao Lan—even the person least familiar with them could tell you ten exploits of each! The others—chess champion Wang Guoxiang and Yao Ben the tailor—now they could pass for the well-behaved …

"Oh, haven't seen you for ages! The absolute dregs have surfaced; the bottom of the barrel has been scraped!" I clasped my hands in greeting to all.

The pink woolen shirt flashed, and Qiuxia was at my side.

"You spoilsport! I am telling you, if you break the taboo again, I'll throw you out!"

The rowdy crowd gathered around, but with a haughty wave of her hand Qiuxia stopped them all. She dragged me away from the crowd and said in a low voice:

"The few remaining hitchers in the county are all extremely sensitive. It is best not to touch on issues concerning our situation. We badly need some fun!"

The kitchen was filled with the aroma of meat. She pointed at the wok big enough to cook a meal for thirty, and said:

"Ten chickens—how about it? You've never treated yourself this way?"

I was suddenly overwhelmed with tenderness. I wanted to have a few private words with her. But that rowdy Niuer came into the room, followed by Guoxiang and Wang Cheng. They stuck next to the chicken pot, as if the soup had cast a spell over them.

"Shall I get wine to go with this?" Reluctantly, I grabbed a five-catty jug.

"Bring some money."

We went into her dormitory. She gave me a furtive glance as she pulled money from under her pillow.

"You must have noticed! Let's not be so intimate …"

"Come on, what does it matter?" I protested.

"Of course it matters!"

"What?"

"People will be jealous, or it will trigger old memories … you understand? Let us have a happy get-together, to wash off the unpleasant—"

"It can't be washed away, nor is there any need to! You show such Buddha-like compassion for the others, but who cares about us?"

I grabbed the outstretched hand that was giving me the money, and conveniently pulled her onto my lap. Like an agitated cat, she darted away, and said with annoyance,

"How can you be so insensitive! Selfish devil!"

The door shut. Then I heard her laughter in the crowd. Anyway, I could not get excited anymore.

I had to admit that using a plastic sheet to cover bed boards for a table was quite a sophisticated idea. Yet I yawned. My gaze listlessly rested on the bowl of wine. I took a mouthful, and it was as if I had swallowed a hot, stinging little dragon. Wine, sweet potato wine—light purple—never had I tasted such stuff in Beijing. It was really strong! Who had covered the lamp shade with a piece of green gauze, saying that it signified freedom and joy? What a fantasy! I suppose I was still all right. The green gauze reflected in the wine was like water weeds, floating, floating—so much like water tinted red by the setting sun!

It reminded me of the reservoir near their village. There, Qiuxia and I had swum … the green algae getting tangled up with my legs—how awful. And what about the shallow banks? Stepping on that soft, sticky warm mud. Bah, that sickening feeling was so much like this "feast." I turned up the volume of the radio at the head of the bed to its loudest. Li Yuhe was singing … lofty aspirations and great ideals are surging high …

I changed the channel—it was Long Jiang Xiong. There, the debate was heated over the issue of "sacrificing the pawn to save the chariot."\fn{\fn{Pieces in a Chinese chess game.} Another channel. Oh, finally, there was a voice:

… Confucianism … Confucian scholar … Old Man Kong … Capitalist roaders …

My head swam. I was just about to block my ears when Xiao Xiu screamed angrily:

"Can't you shut that off?!"

"Spare us!" the gang yelled at me. I wanted to enjoy myself too. I turned the radio off.

"Ahh …" I yawned again.

"Six six six wa!"

"Three horses ah!"

"Five bright heads ya!"\fn{Chinese drinking game.}

"Hey, we are happy, right!"

"Cheers!"

The room was filled with smoke. Someone tired of drinking. A match was struck—the wine was lit. The light blue flame caused a wave of exclamations. The bowl cracked. Blue flame raced along the table. Confusion. Suddenly everyone became a firefighter. Xiao Lan leaned her head against Wang Cheng's shoulder and said in an affectedly delicate tone:

"Oh, I am fainting …"

Qiuxia's pink figure flashed around.

"Eat, do eat." She served food to one. "Drink, do drink." She poured wine for another. "Don't be in a daze, be merry!" she whispered to chess champion Wang Guoxiang in a soft voice. And so Guoxiang woke up with a start, shouting:

"Cheers! How come I blanked out?" Thanks to her efforts, witty conversation,\fn{The text has: conservation.} humorous stories, and hilarious gossip, the party livened up again. But who was quietly sighing,

"Every festival day, you miss your dear ones even more."

No matter how carefully the voice dodged the crowd, the sadness and anxiety somehow crept into everybody's eyes. And so again the pink flash of a figure moved around again. She narrowed her eyes into a smile, shook her head, and said with sympathy in her voice:

"Drink, drink, eat! Let's play the drinking game! Niuer, do start!"

She was attentive to everyone but me. Pouring wine and serving food, she walked past me as if I were not there. I could not tolerate it any longer. Quietly I stood up, quietly I pulled open the door, and quietly I slipped outside. Gazing into the dark blue evening, I had the urge to shout songs to the stars! But I could only take a few deep breaths of the clear, cold air.

Suddenly, the door opened. Judging from the breathing and those familiar steps, I knew that Qiuxia was standing right behind me.

"Don't you feel that what you are shouldering is too heavy?" I asked. "How could you think up such a cruel game? You are urging the prisoners to dance by cracking a whip!"

"Nobody thinks of it the way you do," she said in a low voice.

"I cannot tolerate … all this," I said.

We were silent. There was the sound of autumn insects weeping in solitude.

"You should tolerate it. You should help me." Her tone carried a note of sad pleading.

"I … want to return to my village."

She did not say anything. A moment later, I could tell that she was heading toward the door.

"Qiuxia!" I turned, and dashed to her side. "Let's join each other! I shall come to your village, or you come to ours."

She was undecided.

"Then we would have to go through so much—start a new network of personal relationships, give dinners, hand out gifts …\fn{All of which would have to be done in order to facilitate getting officiasl permission for a transfer.} You know, I am so fed up with all of that … though it is awfully lonely here." She coughed. "Why bring that up again? Let's not talk about this, at least no tonight. Do come in."

"Then I shall go," I stubbornly insisted.

In the moonlight, she stared severely, straight into my eyes. Then she determinedly pulled open the door and went inside. I had gone beyond the door of the compound, but I returned. Inside, Qiuxia was vigorously beating the table with a chicken claw.

"Quiet! Quiet! I propose that each of us tell about the happiest thing that has happened in his life. Nobody is spared! If it is good, we will give three toasts; if not the person must empty six cups!"

The atmosphere in the house suddenly became like an examination hall—nervous, solemn, quiet.

Xiao Lan's eyes sparkled with a glowing memory. When asked to speak, she declined, saying:

"Happiness can't be spoken of."

Guoxiang was picking his brain to decide on the best of numerous happy incidents. After much hesitation, he gestured, smiled, and said:

"Nothing could be more exciting than knocking the loser's head after a game of chess—thump, thump, thump —all it takes is three knocks to make a huge bump on the head."

Niuer, the fellow who did not care much about anything, talked about a romance he'd had when he was twenty, acting out the affectionate gaze and smile of the girl in his memory. One didn't know whether to laugh or cry at this kind of acting. Watching his strange act, and the premature wrinkles on that thin, dark face, I could not help but shiver.

"Where is she now?" Qiuxia was always so concerned about others. Niuer's face was twisted. He stared at tailor Yao Ben, and in a muddled voice said:

"Where? It … doesn't matter. Some people don't even have as much as this memory!" Yao Ben hastily held up the bowl of wine.

"Oh … I have lived for a quarter of a century. 'Sewing wedding clothes for others' is my pleasure. Forget it, I have nothing interesting to say." He gulped down two mouthfuls, and began to retaliate:

"However, I do want to hear about present happiness. Niuer, when you were auctioning off others' leftovers in the county, your heart must have been—"

"You broke the taboo!"

Qiuxia interrupted Yao Ben with a bang on the table. This, however, did not stop the onset of silence. Obviously, it was again Qiuxia who, afraid that this mood would spread, blurted out in a loud, incongruous voice:

"All right, I shall talk about present happiness! You all know that I love to read at the dam of the reservoir. Several days ago, I was reading alone on the dam. I discovered a squirrel-like animal climbing skillfully on the dam wall, just like Pidefu\fn{A famous acrobat.} speeding on his motorcycle. I stared at it blankly, because it reminded me of life: if you are not skillful, you will drown, fall to your death. Suddenly I heard loud shouts: 'Miss, miss—' I lifted my head, it was the old fellow who was tending sheep over the hill. Shouting, he ran over desperately: 'Miss, miss—' 'What is it?' I asked. Panting, he said: 'Miss, miss … I heard that on the plain a girl hitcher drowned herself in a well … I, I wanted to mention this to you … She was so foolish, so young to take her own life …' I suddenly realized he was afraid that I was going to jump! Instantly, my heart swelled with emotion, that during such a desolate autumn there could be a stranger who cared about me."

Silence. Nobody said a word. I stared at her intensely, my temples throbbing. Qiuxia took a cigarette, but before lighting it she suddenly spat it on the ground, yelling,

"Damn! I broke the taboo! I shall drink six cups!" She scooped up the wine cups, filling one after another, and then drank each down in one gulp.

"Are you out of your mind?" I went forward and snatched the cup away.

"You'd better stay away from me!"

Without looking at me, she grabbed the cup again. I was embarrassed. But I still tried to take her cup away.

"What do you think you are doing?!" She glared at me.

"I shall drink for you!"

"Can happiness be substituted? Young man, be prepared to talk about your own happiness! Nobody can substitute for anyone else! Right?" She turned and asked the others loudly. She was getting drunk.

"Certainly."

"The role of the sorrowful ghost fits him well."

"Drink to get drunk!"

"It is not your turn yet to be chivalrous."

"Who needs you to help drink the stuff!"

"Make him talk!"

I was anxious. I did feel that I could help her! No, I was not going to talk! I did not have anything I felt happy about! I refused to beat my face until it was swollen to look plump! I did not want to lash out under the pretense of drunkenness! I … I was just going to yell when I caught sight of Qiuxia's face deliberately hidden behind the wine cup to block it from the others' line of vision. The look she gave me was so full of pleading, so full of painful patience, of a pure, self-sacrificing glow. She was asking for help from me with her eyes! I would be together with her, and shoulder the responsibility for generating fun!

But with this kind of party, what could I do? I returned to my seat, downcast. Time dragged on this way to a tasteless end, like that green light filling the whole room. The feast was dying down; the wine was nearly exhausted. Qiuxia looked miserable. She realized that her efforts had been wasted; she was disappointed, sad. When Niuer grabbed the last piece of chicken breast, I said,

"Wait!"

"What for?"

"See how much wine is left?"

Niuer emptied the wine jug—exactly a full bowl!

"The chicken breast belongs to whoever gulps down this bowl!" I said

"Is this shriveled piece of breast worth a week's headache? You don't even know how to bet!"

Sure enough, nobody took the bowl of wine.

"Didn't you want to get drunk anyway?" I teased Niuer. "'A thousand glasses are not enough for bosom friends.' That is an old saying. Somehow it does have a point." Niuer glanced at Qiuxia.

"Man is solid; fire, insubstantial. To put up a front, to create an atmosphere artificially, is self-defeating—"

"Bet! Let's bet!" Abruptly, I interrupted Niuer, "Whoever empties this bowl in one gulp, I … I will help him transfer back to Beijing!"

The room was silent for a moment. Then they clamored:

"Ha, what big talk!"

"Bragging isn't taxed!"

"Having a fantasy, are you?" Obviously, they did not believe my words.

"It is true. I bribed a channel. The people promised to arrange it all. I will let whoever drinks this bowl of wine have my chance. What about it? Nobody dares to take me on? I'll count to five: one, two, three"—I raised my voice, pretending to be resolute—"a chance missed, and that's it! Four—"

"Wait!"

Niuer rushed forward.

"He is finally speaking the truth after a few drinks—I shall drink it! It would be great to be able to drink heartily and then be transferred back to Beijing! Only a fool would not do it!"

"But there is one condition. There," I lifted the grate on the windowsill, "take this to the graveyard, straight inside, and put it on the tenth grave. If I don't help you transfer to Beijing, you can lynch me!" Niuer made a face, and to the others said,

"This bet of his is really weird! Let me tell you, this bet goes beyond the limit. There won't be anyone—"

Abruptly, Qiuxia pushed Niuer aside, and with a solemn air lifted the bowl, took a deep breath, and let the wine gush down her throat. She boldly flashed the bottom of the bowl, wiped her mouth, and, amidst cheers, grabbed the grate, pretending to balance herself without much effort, and walked out of the house:

"Wait till I come back before you take a torch to look for this—this … gra—grate …"

The crowd that remained, barely suppressing its laughter and curiosity, stealthily followed her. I took Niuer into the shadows, and spoke a few words to him. He then announced to the others:

"The compound is empty—1 shall stay and watch." He left.

A village night. The moon was so desolate. The rustling wind accompanied distant barking. Qiuxia dragged a long shadow with her, humming some tunes to keep up her courage and occasionally burping. She walked through a patch of melons, wound her way around a wheat field, jumped over a ditch. Beyond was the graveyard.

She leaned against an old willow tree at the edge of the graveyard, looked back at the road she had taken, gave a long sigh, and headed on.

An owl suddenly cried—it sounded like a child. The crowd that had scattered to hide now quickly came together. It was so creepy: the swaying tree shadows over the graves, the flashing light on the tombstones, a moist rotten smell, made everyone hear his pulse throb.

Suddenly, big Wang Cheng and Yao Ben yelled; Xiao Xiu and Xiao Lan covered their faces and fell paralyzed to the ground. A strange white figure sprang out from the dark graveyard and lightly and noiselessly danced around! Qiuxia made a startled noise and turned around to run. Instead, she stumbled headfirst into the ditch that went through the graveyard. The strange creature took a few leaps to the edge of the ditch, and cried with a hoarse voice:

Cats and rabbits are dancing together,
They step one, two, one.
Cats and rabbits are dancing together,
They step one, two, one.

I rushed over and pulled off the white bedsheet:

"Enough! Niuer!"

Niuer howled with laughter: "Marvelous! Absolutely marvelous! Dear fellow, incredible! You are now spared from the crime of lying!"

I pulled Qiuxia from the ditch.

"Ai, I am scared to death. I am really scared to death!" Devastated, she fell weakly into my lap.

I half carried her toward the house. The crowd gathered around Niuer, who was choking with laughter and giving an account of his stirring game.

Suddenly Qiuxia started to vomit. I stroked her back. Finally, she let out a few miserable cries and quietly wept. But immediately she restrained herself, only to lift her head up weakly, looking for the moonlight. Tears flowed silently down her cheeks. I said,

"You must feel wretched. Let it all out. You will feel better afterwards." But she shook her head, straining her neck to look back at the excited, chattering crowd.

"They were all, all very happy, weren't they?"she asked.

"No, more than that! Simply exhilarated!" I said with annoyance. I refused to turn my head to look at them.

"Cold, I am cold. I am really cold …" She folded her arms around her trembling shoulders.

My heart tightened, and an immense sadness surged up in me. I hastily took hold of my jacket—but a sweater had been thrown around Qiuxia, followed by a patched blue jacket, and then a third … They had quietly gathered With a calm look that covered her misery and anxiety, Qiuxia gazed into Xiao Lan's frightened eyes:

"I am not cold … really! Now, now … you … you, you had fun, right?"

She tried to act composed, struggling to pull the clothes from her body to return to them, but her trembling hand only clutched her own pigtail. Xiao Xiu rushed into Qiuxia's lap with a loud wail and broke down crying. Then they wept together. Niuer sank heavily onto the ground and punched his own head. Then he fiercely tore at his hair. Big Wang Cheng leaned his face on the rough old bark of the willow. I slowly lifted my head. The moon, through my tear-filled eyes, was a ball of angry fire …

*

Soon enough, another September arrived. We gathered together again, not at their compound but on the hill near our village. It was drizzling that day. Xiao Lan and I stood before the newly planted willow-staring at her grave. She had died. She had been alone, reading on the dam, and somehow had fallen and drowned. I buried her there. I tied some wild autumn flowers into a bundle, and placed it in front of her grave. The colorful flowers were covered with rain, like tears, like mourning. Xiao Lan looked at the soaked tombstone and over and over said:

"It will pass, everything will pass eventually, but nothing will be forgotten!"

Through the misty ranges of Taihang Mountain in the distant horizon, in the rustling autumn chill, a tint of light blue suggesting a gleam of hope stretched over the peak of the hills.

"It will pass! Over there it is already clear. Can it be far from here?" I said.

Xiao Lan gave me a silent glance. She did not say anything, but with sincere yearning she watched the patch of blue with its suggestion of hope.

That was the last day of September, 1976—only a few days before the fall of those four historic criminals.\fn{Jiang Qing (1912-   ), a one-time actress and the third wife (from 1939) and widow of Mao Tse-tung (1893-1976), and Zjamg Chunjao, Wang Hungwen and Yao Wenyuan; all of them sincere believers in Perpetual Revolution, who attempted to seize power upon Mao's death and were arrested and thrown into prison within a month of that event.}

181.8 Autobiographical Statement\fn{by Gena Chen (1946-   )} Hangzhou, Zhejiang Province, China (F) 5

I was born in Hongzhou, China, on January 3, 1946. When I was six months old, my parents, who both went to music school (my father was a violinist and my mother a soprano), went to Taiwan to look for jobs and never had a chance to go back. That was how we stayed in Taiwan, even though that was in 1946, three years before the Communist takeover in 1949.

My father got a job in Taipei Symphony Orchestra and my mother taught music at a high school. They liked their jobs and settled down. Why did they choose Taiwan over other places? I thirik one of their professors went to Taiwan and recommended they go there.

My paternal grandfather, Chen Shizhe, was born in 1891 in Nanan County, Fujian. He was a revolutionary and joined Sun Yat-sen's 1911 Revolution. He was very well-liked by the1ocal people. In 1925, he was arrested and executed by a Chinese warlord. My father, who was then five, and his sister, who was eight, were raised by their mother alone. After my grandfather died, people in his county erected a big monument commemorating him for what he did for the area. During the Communist regime, the whole monument was knocked down.

In 1989, my aunt, my father and some relatives made the government donate some money to rebuilt the monument. When the new monument was erected, it was a big event, a big celebration, and a book was written about my grandfather.

My maternal grandfather, Xie Touba, was an artist. He was born in 1902 in Xiamen, Fujian. He was fond of drawing at an early age. In 1919, he went to Philippines, studying fine arts at Philippine University. He graduated in 1925 but continued to study painting at Philippine University. During the afternoons and evenings, he taught at a local Chinese school. In 1928, he was sponsored by his cousin who resided in Vietnam to go to France to study western painting. He enrolled in a fine arts college and graduated in 1934. It was very unusual that he went to Paris for ten years when he had family in China.

Then he returned to China, taught at Fine Arts Academy of Xiamen, Fujian Normal School, National Academy of Fine Arts at Hongzhou, and Fujian Normal University. He served as dean of Hongzhou Yizhuan.\fn{National Academy of Fine Arts of Hongzhou} He passed away just two years ago. I have a large scroll that was presented to him by one of his students at his ninetieth birthday celebration. People say "Bei Xu Nan Xie." Xu is Xu Beihong (a famous painter of Chinese style); Xie is Xie Touba. He had many students who guided the art world in China. I also have a painting, which I have had for over ten years, created and sent to me by one of his students who went to Taiwan. When we moved to St. Louis, we hung it up in our home.

My father, Chen Dunchu, was born on November 20, 1920, in Fujian. He graduated from National Fujian Music Academy in 1940, specializing in violin. My mother, Xie Xueru, was born on May 22,1926, in Hongzhou. She also studied at Fujian Yizhuan.\fn{Fujian Academy of Arts}

In the 1950s, even though Taiwan was not very prosperous, we did not feel poor. We had all we needed. We had two servants who were from the countryside, one taking care of the kids, the other doing household chores. It was quite common for people to have servants. My father worked at the Taipei Symphony Orchestra as a violinist. He later became concert-master and conductor. Later, he did not want to conduct, and so he became manager for the Taipei Symphony Orchestra for many years. He did many things for the orchestra, one example being the Taipei Music Festival. It was very successful.

President Li Denghui was Taipei's mayor at the time. President Li was a very serious classical music lover. One of the things they did during the Taipei Music Festival, rather than traditional concerts, was that they promoted a lot of traditional Chinese music, and folk Taipei music and opera. At the festival, President Li translated for Faust (the German Chancellor) a huge work from Chinese to German. His German must have been excellent in that he could translate the whole opera into German. President Li had his early education in Japan, and it was probably there that he learned German.

I have four siblings, and I am the oldest. Next comes my brother, Chen Langu, born in 1950. He is four years younger than me. I have two sisters: Chen Hongqi born in 1954, and Chen Baiqi born in 1956. We all work in the music world. My brother is a violinist, educated at Yale and Columbia University. Both of my sisters are cellists. One also graduated from Yale, the other from the Music School Of New York.

In the last generation, children did not have a choice to do what they wanted to. They all listened to their parents. That was what happened to us; our parents made the career choice for us. At least I know my parents made the choice for me and I like it very much—I do not know about my siblings. Between my siblings we have a large age gap. When I came to the United States, my brother and my two sisters were very small. My brother and I are five years apart, and my brother and other sisters are another five years apart. I came here when I was seventeen. Therefore, I do not know if they fell into music willingly or not. However, they are all doing very well.

My brother just came back from Beijing. The first time he was there, he could only stay for two days to give a lecture. Some of my mother's teachers had retired from Beijing Yinyue Xueyuan.\fn{Beijing Music Academy} but he met some of my parents' teachers. They were very moved seeing their students' child now lecturing at Beijing Yinyue Xueyuan. I am really happy that people of both sides (mainland and Taiwan) could come and go very easily.

My mother did not see my grandfather for about thirty years. When they met [again], it was very emotional for both of them. My mother went to China every year and every time she went, she just stayed at home to give my grandfather company. My grandfather was living in Fuzhou and passed away three years ago. My grandmother had died several years earlier. This is a historic tragedy for all the families. However, it is getting better, so I am very encouraged. I know I have a lot of aunts and uncles in mainland China, scattered all over the country. They [the government] send you to work in a certain place. I am not very familiar with my family history because my parents did not want to talk about it before. I think now they are more open to say things. However, one of my aunts did go to Taiwan to visit with my mother five years ago.

When I started playing piano at six, I had a lot of practice, about two hours everyday, very regimented. Practicing was part of my daily schedule. Because we lived in the staff housing area for the symphony people, all the children there were practicing music. Therefore, you do not question when you hear your next-door neighbor practicing. It was, in a way, a very good environment. You do not feel you are left out because everybody was outside playing [some musical instruments]. Every day, I was at home practicing. I had a very nice childhood. My practicing did not affect my academic work; I did very well at school. I went to Taipei First Girls High School. It was very hard to get in. After junior high, my parents already realized that my life would be going in a musical direction and that the high school work would hamper my practice time. However, I did take the Liankao, the high school entrance examination, and I did get into high school.

I then went to Taipei Yizhuan (The Taiwan National Academy of Arts) to concentrate more on music. There I had fewer academic demands and more time to practice. Taipei Yizhuan was like a high school. Most people went there after junior high, at fifteen, like me, but others went after high school. It is a five-year academic program, focusing on music in my case. They also have arts-related subjects, such as painting, fine arts, and movie making. It is not equivalent to a BA; instead, you get an art diploma. I stayed there for two years and then I came to the United States.

I first came to New England Conservatory of Music in Boston in 1963 when I was seventeen. At that time in Taiwan it was true and it is probably still true that you can not come to the United States as an undergraduate. I was the second one from Taiwan, after the government enacted a new law, called Tiancai Ertong Chuguo Banfa,\fn{The Measure for Talented Youth Studying Overseas} to encourage talented musicians to go abroad after rigorous exams. They say you should go to develop your skill rather than wait until graduate school. I received permission from the government by taking a lot of tests to prove that I was worthy. I got four scholarships. At that time, the Taiwanese government only encouraged graduate students to study overseas. If you were a male, you could go overseas only after you served in the military.

I was quite prepared when I came to America. Other than English, where we had to study Shakespeare, no courses gave me a hard time. I had no problem at all with musically-related subjects. Because my foundation in Taiwan gave me a jump-start, I was much more prepared than a lot of my classmates. Before I came to America, I had learned two or three years of English in my regular high school English class. However, the Boston accent gave me trouble. I did tape a lot of lectures. I also had a lot of helpful classmates. I would listen to lectures several times. I would study my friends' notes and my notes and usually I ended up having better grades.

How was life besides academic work?

I had no life. It was academic work and practice, period. I was probably very naïve, unlike many American girls or boys at seventeen. I had never spent a night away from home before then. I had led a very sheltered life and did whatever I knew how to do, which was study and practice. I basically did the same thing in America, except everything was in English. I was not very different from what I was in Taiwan, but I did miss my family. I really realized I was away from home when I went back to my dorm and saw that my bed was still not made, because the servants made my bed at home. That was first time it hit me hard. I was sad for a while. However, after a while, I was okay. I just accepted it and did the best I could.

I stayed in Boston for five years. After I graduated from the New England Conservatory of Music, I went to Mills College in Oakland, California, which had excellent teachers there. It was a good time. It was during the Berkeley turmoil, and so I experienced things like sit-ins. I did not participate; howeyer, it was an exciting time for a young person.

Did I have any social activity?

In Boston, I participated in Chinese student choirs that are found at several colleges in Boston. I did the same thing at Berkeley. There was a choir company for the Chinese students there. My life was still mostly work, study, and practice, however. I do not think I was a very social person. As I get older, you may see me gradually becoming more outgoing.

I met Frank in Boston. He was at MIT;\fn{Massachusetts Institute of Technology} there was a student activity and we met there. We met again when we were at the UC San Diego during our separate careers. I did not know he was there, but when we met again, it was good. We started dating. I was in a PhD program and had my committee proposal prepared, but I did not finish my PhD. I was probably one year away from finishing it, but my focus was not on a career then.

Because Frank had to do his postdoctoral studies at Johns Hopkins University, we moved to Baltimore. We wanted to have children and I had some health problems. Otherwise, I might have finished my program. I do not regret what I did. I know I can still go back to finish it, but it is not that important to do it, because I like what I do now. I knew I always wanted a family. I think my generation is a cross between the old traditional values and the new options. Some people are very torn because they could see both sides. However, in my case that was not a problem, because I know I am not idealistic enough to pursue a performing life. I always wanted to have a family. I knew that kind of life could not accommodate a nice family life. It just worked out well in my personal case, even though I did have a choice, because I chose not to go the other route. I still have a professional life and I enjoy it very much. [By teaching], I can make a direct influence on a one-to-one basis. People I am fortunate to have worked with over long periods of time say that I have made a huge difference in their lives. I find it very rewarding for me personally, and this way I do not have to be torn between family and career. Hopefully I do both well. You can only try your very best and deal with whatever is given to you.

When my children were younger, their demands on my time were not as great, so I continued to give recitals. When they got older, they became involved into all kinds of activities. With these factors, in addition to my teaching, it became unrealistic to keep a set schedule. I have two boys, Gregory is twenty-one and Jeffery is twenty. It has been a long time since I have seen them; when they do come, it is only for short periods of time. They are both in California. They are involved in the liberal arts; they are not going into science or music. One is interested in business, the other is interested in law, but they may change.

Gregory has a girlfriend, Michelle, a very nice girl. Michelle is white. He was, like me, a late bloomer. He never dated in high school. I think, this is his second girlfriend. His first relationship did not last very long. Gregory and Michelle have been dating for over a year. I do not care what race his girlfriend or future wife is, as long as they have the same values, they are good people, and good for each other. I am sure I have preferences, but it is not up to me. I do not let them know what my preference would be. I always tell them they have to fmd a nice person that is good for them, that is more important.

But my second son told me, without me asking him, that he definitely wants to marry someone Chinese. He is not dating seriously but somehow got this idea. My sons are so close to each other in age and come from the same family, yet they have different preferences.

They both speak Chinese fluently, though they cannot read and write Chinese as well. But they both went to Chinese school and they took Chinese in college. They grew up in Baltimore, where we lived for twenty-two years before we came to St. Louis. There were Chinese language schools there. My husband was very active in all these affairs. He was the chairman of the board for the Chinese language school for eight years. The Chinese language school was just taught one day of the weekend for two hours, just like the Chinese language schools here in St. Louis. I think in Washington DC there might have been more intensive Chinese language schools, but not in Baltimore. My husband insisted that we speak Chinese at home. He is very good in this way. He came here to America at the age of five, so that is even more incredible.

I have a very nice, very admirable mother-in-law. When they [my in-laws] came, they were the only Chinese family in Denver. They came to the United States in February 1948 with their two boys—one five, one three. They both had student visas, which I thought was highly unusual. Usually one spouse would come and the other would stay behind. I guess my mother-in-law is a very capable person. She was born at the wrong time—thirty years too early. They stayed in Denver until my husband went to college. My father-in-law had another job, so they moved to Buffalo, New York, then retired to Fremont, California. They are involved in math or chemistry, more traditional Chinese subjects. They are very interesting to historians. My mother-in-law would give daily Chinese lessons in history and geography. She was very persistent. Before her sons were allowed to go out to play with their friends and do their regular homework, they had to learn Chinese. They had to go through each book made available to them. I found my husband's drawing of what provinces the Changjiang (Yangtze River) flows through. My mother-in-law did not work when her children were young. When they were older, she taught at a high school for sixteen years. All three children—although the youngest one, Jerry, was born in United States—speak perfect Chinese, which was unusual for that time. My husband speaks Chinese with a Peking accent, while I speak with a Taiwanese accent. His family was from Jiangsu Province. But his parents went to Nankai Middle School, a boarding school in Tianjin. Then they went to Xinan lianda (the Southwest Associated University) during the Sino-Japanese war.

Am I a strict mother or a lenient one? I would say half and half. I am not very strict in a traditional Chinese fashion. We usually talk about reasonable discipline when we need to. I even do not remember if they had to sit in time-out\fn{A punishment where the child is forced to remain stationary somewhere for a certain period of time} or were not allowed to watch TV; though my children probably remember. Even if it did happen, it was very rare. They did not go through a teenage rebellion. They were okay, not as bad as people predicted.

I think my boys and I are as close as possible. Being boys, they tell me things that they think I need to know; no more, no less. They write e-mails, they know to call every Sunday. They do not discuss problems they had with me. At their age, they make a decision and then they tell us. Sometimes they ask our opinion, but we do not tell them what to do at this point. My husband is very westernized in this way. Sometimes, between him and me, we have different ways of looking at things, and he is very democratic. I think it's too much—just let them decide—it's definitely not the Chinese way. He has high standards such as honesty, integrity, and a sense of civil pride, which he wants to instill in them. Choice of lifestyle is a personal choice. It's up to them. I didn't participate in any social organizations. I was very busy with Peabody where I taught and I had a lot of responsibilities. I taught part-time at first, and gradually I became full-time as my children's demands lessened. I also participate in a lot of statewide or local music clubs and organizations.

I taught one-on-one at Peabody; I also taught enrichment classes. That's a repertoire class, teaching students from various stages. Once a week different students would come. I taught a couple of classes for students, a combination of music theory, music history, and ensemble. We played for each other; that's why we call it enrichment class. There were usually six students in each class and the parents also would come.

These students came to Peabody after their regular school. They call it prep school. Prep schools have many missions; they can prepare people who want to go into music, but they can also accommodate people who just play an instrument for enjoyment, not necessarily to go into music as a career. We had a full range of students, and also a full range of ages, from child to adult.

When taking students, I select parents. When children are young, everybody can be educated. It depends on the parents' dedication, whether they have the right expectations and the right kind of attitude to guide their children. I feel that if I can get along with the parents, if we have the same kind of values, the children would definitely come easy. There were cases in which parents needed to guide the child. I enjoyed being very close friends with the parents because we all have similar outlooks. Students and parents became long-term friends. Basically I teach children between ages four and seventeen. I had fifty students when I was in Baltimore. Now I teach no more than fifteen students, because I want to practice more for my personal growth and accommodate my husband's job.

My husband moved here because he wanted to do biomedical engineering. There is good support here at Washington University from chancellor to dean. It was also a good time, because our children were old enough to go to college. We didn't have to worry about uprooting them.

I think Johns Hopkins is a very conservative place, and my husband's career was at its pinnacle over there. There was certainly a glass ceiling. He was named the medical school's full professor ten years ago. He was the only Chinese American to be named to this position in over one hundred years of Hopkins history; after him, no other Chinese American has been named, which I think is not logical at all. I am sure there are many deserving Asian Americans, but people still have very tight-knit outlook of others. There he reached the highest he could go, but he feels that he can make a big difference.

He is also very concerned with making sure there are role models of Asian American professionals in his position. He wants his children to know that you can be a leader and that you should be assertive. He also mentors a lot of other friends' children, and they seek his advice, so he feels it is important for him to be a chair in a very good program. Maybe indirectly, it allows other people to have some role models.

I am very proud of his determination. A lot of time we say that you have to be twice as good in order to compete with the mainstream, which shouldn't be. Unfortunately, sometimes even twice as good is still not enough.

His work now is wonderful. He has wonderful support. They are determined to make biomedical engineering the top priority at Washington University. He is very happy. Washington University is the third-ranked medical school in the country, and all the top biomedical engineering programs are associated with very top medical schools. Right now the program is just in its first year, and it's already ranked number twenty-two. He got his degree in the late 1970s in biomedical engineering; he was among the first wave of scientists involved in biomedical engineering development. In a way, the field has been in existence for almost twenty years, and it has become extremely important. They have wonderful students, all graduate-level, which is exceptional.

His job is demanding. He stays at work very late, but this is no different from before. He always works hard. It's definitely not a nine-to-five job. He has to recruit faculty, which takes a lot of time. He has to write a lot of grants and find the right kind of people for students to work for, so all of this takes time. He is involved in the lab as well. He enjoys it. His office is at the engineering school and his lab is at the medical school. He spends more time doing administrative work than writing grants and doing research. It is no longer a research job in which he tells his research fellows what to do. They correspond with him from Baltimore on how to use and maintain their grants. This is different from what he did before; it is more administrative; he manages the department. He wants to make a big difference at all levels, from undergraduate education to graduate students. He does this not just for himself but for every area where he feels he should be. He is a pioneer in this place.

He enjoys the administrative work more than he thought he would. Before when people approached him for that type of position, he wasn't ready and he thought he wasn't interested in it. He is very good with figures, very determined and methodical, the scientific type. Some people cannot do administrative tasks, He is very good, because he has been doing a lot of that anyway. In a big way, doing grants is similar to administration.

In the family affairs, I influence him a lot. We are very good at compromising if we have differences. If I feel strongly, I still do it my way. If he feels strongly, certainly he will do it his way. If it concerns our children, we defmitely have the same idea. We talk about it away from the children. We come to one decision. We don't tell them different things.

Do I have any religion? No. But this is also funny. This has probably been very Chinese. My parents decided I would live away from home, since I never spent a night away from home in Taiwan, and it was decided that I should go to Boston rather than New York, because in my mother's mind (and it's probably true), Boston is a safer place than New York, even though she has never been outside of Taiwan. She somehow found out that Boston is a Catholic town.

I was converted, I went through the training of how to become a Catholic, and became one in name. My mother felt that it was a way she could protect me—send me to a safe place and have me join the majority religion. It's very moving actually, when you think about it because that's all she could do for me being physically away so far.

In name I am supposed to be Catholic, but I never practiced it. My religion is very much a Chinese kind of thing, which is just being a very nice person, trying to be helpful, and living the way your conscience leads you. That's my religion. My.husband doesn't have any religion either. I have to come to peace with my own conscience.

What is my typical day? In the morning, we get up very early. After my husband has breakfast, we will talk about our day. He sometimes gets up at five-thirty. I will get up at seven. After he leaves, I practice, then do yard work. By that time, it is almost noon. Then I run errands. I will start teaching in the afternoon. Usually the class goes from early afternoon to late afternoon. The day goes by very fast. I might spend two or three hours at piano, two hours in the yard, do a couple of errands, start teaching, and cook dinner when my husband comes back. Sometimes, I cook dinner before I start teaching.

I cook every day. Very seldom do I take orders out. I enjoy cooking, so it's not a problem. Before the children came, I did a few cooking classes. I enjoy food. After dinner, we spend some time together. During the school year, we are out a lot of time on weekdays, either recruiting or going to school related functions. So we have a lot of social events. This is another reason why I can't teach a lot, because I have to go out on a couple of nights when I have class. I noticed that, last year, I had to go out often on Wednesday nights.

They do keep us very busy. For instance, last week, we were out four nights. We often invite people, senior members, trustees, or potential donors, into our home. I cook for those occasions. I coordinate department functions, such as dinners with graduate students and faculty; I deal with schedules and catering.

188.54 Living In A Big Cage\fn{by Fu Jiqing (1946-)} Shanghai, China (F) 2

I was born in Shanghai on December 26, 1946. I graduated from senior high school in 1966 at the start of the brutal Culrural Revolution.

My father was subsequently labelled a member of the "Six Black Categories," and our family was persecuted and all of our property confiscated. As the offspring of a "Six Black Category" member, I lived under awful conditions. The government had abolished the entrance examination for higher education, so after graduation I found a job as a factory worker. My entire generation of young people had been sacrificed for the Cultural Revolution. We were deprived of opportunities to further our studies and seek personal happiness.

By the time I was accepted by Shanghai's University of Transportation in 1979, I had already become the mother of a child. After graduation, I was assigned to the Shanghai New Electtical Factory, where I got to know a co-worker called Feng Suying and her husband the writer Wang Ruowang, both of whom are now living in the United States. It was under their influence that I gradually became part of the democratic movement.

Beginning in 1986, I often assisted Wang Ruowang in editing and copying out his essays and materials on different political subjects. In 1989, I participated in the democracy demonstrations in Shanghai. In July 1989, when Wang was under supervision and was prohibited from leaving his house, I continued to visit and keep him informed of what was happening in the outside world.

On September 8, 1989, Wang was arrested. On the same day, the Public Security Bureau detained me in connection with, as they called it, "Wang's crime of counterrevolutionary propaganda and incitement." Police officers searched my home and office, confiscating, among other things, my passport which had an Australian visa in it. I was therefore deprived of my right to travel abroad. Despite my innocence, the Public Security Bureau continued to summon me for questioning and search through my things. I have been living in fear ever since.

In 1991, Feng Suying established a journal called Democracy Forum in cooperation with the Hong Kong Alliance. I supported and assisted her in this. On April 18, the Shanghai Public Security Bureau launched an extensive campaign to arrest people related to the democratic movement, to Democracy Forum, and the Shanghai Human Rights Association. Eleven people were taken into custody. I was detained and subsequently interrogated for more than 30 hours. During the interrogation, I was asked the same questions again and again as a callous investigator banged on the table and shouted at me. Once again, the Public Security Bureau searched my home and office.

The Party Secretary of the factory where I worked demoted me from my job as an engineer to a position as a worker in the machine shop. Feng Suying was forced to retire from her job. They sent people to keep watch on me and give regular reports on my activities to the factory's Office of Labor and Security. My living and working environments felt suffocating: my every actions was under surveillance. I had absolutely no freedom. Whenever I made a phone call or wrote down something, someone's head would lean over to watch me. I was angry, but there was nothing I could do.

In 1994, one of my colleagues picked up a large pile of "communications reports" by accident. In the pile were reports on me written by my supervisor in the Labor Protection Section. This was clear evidence of the tyrannical control imposed on me by the factory. Every time I thought of the huge pile of reports on me, I felt as if a weight were being placed on my shoulders.

Living with this kind of pressure, I began to feel that my life was not much different from that of an animal: I had nothing but the right to survival

In 1992, Wang and his wife lefr for the United States. They continued to keep in touch with me and in February 1993, I helped them establish the Shanghai branch of the Chinese Democratic Party. We also decided at that time to show our support for Fu Shenqi, a Democracy Wall-era dissident who had just been arrested at the time. On March 1, the Shanghai Public Security Bureau detained me and Sun Un, a former journalist who had also been keeping in touch with Wang Ruowangin the U.S., at Shanghai No. 1 Detention Center.

I was put in a cell with women who had been charged with murder and told that people like me were even worse than murderers because we wanted to overthrow the Communist Party dictatorship. In the eyes of Party officials, their primary enemies are those who hold different political opinions.

On the same day, the Public Security Bureau ransacked my home again, for the third time. My family could no longer lead a normal life; my mother-in-law was lying in bed because of her bad back as a group of police officers came in and took things out of my drawers and closets. They confiscated my son's materials for applying to study in the United States. They even made my son go to the police station and asked him to say what crime I had committed. After questioning him, they told him that he was not permitted to tell anyone about the interrogation; if he told anyone, they said, he would have to bear me consequences.

I was detained for a month and a half. Before I was released, they wanted me to promise that I would not have any contact with Wang Ruowang and Feng Suying. If I did, they said, I would be sent to Tilanqiao Prison. When I went back to my factory, I saw a notice that said:

"Fu Jiqing was involved with the activities of overseas counterrevolutionary organizations and organized counterrevolutionary activities in this country. She has been questioned, detained and punished by the Public Security Bureau. In accordance with the regulations of this factory, an administrative demerit will be placed in Fu's file and she will be docked six months of her annual salary, bonus and monthly salary."

After that, most of my colleagues kept their distance from me, afraid that any association with me would link them to a "counterrevolutionary organization." I was absolutely isolated. The only thing I could do was to work very hard, doing the jobs that others refused to do. But my salary did not increase according to the mandatory rate and I was deprived of the benefits I deserved. In the factory, my mail from overseas was opened and read; at home, my telephone was tapped; and my visits with friends supervised. The Public Security Bureau could ask me to go to the police station at any time and required me to "voluntarily"show them my mail from overseas and report to them any telephone conversations I had wilth friends or journalists.

Under Chinese Communist rule, I did not have any rights or freedoms: I had no sense of security because I had to worry about being arrested or my h9ome beingsearched at any given moment. It felt like being under a sentence of life imprisonment. I had been released from detention, but in reality I had simply moved from a small prison to a big jail cage from which my protests went unheard.

In February 1994, I saw a beam of hope.

I received an invitation from a company in the United States to attend a conference. As a Chinese citizen, I had the right to take a private trip to the United States, but the Public Security Bureau and the factory only said, you have the right to go, but in fact tried to prevent it. For example the factory and the head of my section postponed the issuing of the recommendation letter I needed to get my passport, did not validate my documents with an official seal, and sent along my “black materials” together with my other documents. No matter which department I went to, the chief would immediately know that I was a counterrevolutionary.

Often the Public Security Bureau officers would inadvertently give my case description. back to me after reading it and when I saw what they said about me in these “black materials,” I realized that I would not have a life as long as I lived under the Party’s rule. The Public Security Bureau continually postponed the date for issuing my passport. I had to face many problems and go everywhere to ask for hdp and it still took me half a year to get a passport while others could get one in a month.

But by the time I received the passport in July, it was already too late for me to get a U.S. visa as the conference date had passed. The Public Security Bureau knew that I would not be able to leave the country even though I had a passport.

In mid-August 1994, without the knowledge of the factory or the Public Security Bureau I began looking for other ways to leave the country. I was finally given a U.S. visa on September 16. On September 17, I got a plane ticket and on September 20, I left Shanghai secretly.

I had thought everything through seriously: if I continued my democratic activities and got in contact with my friends Wang Ruowang and Feng Suying while I was abroad, then the Tilanqiao Prison would be waiting for me once I went back to China; all the suffering would begin again. I would not be able to live in peace, but would be persecuted and denied any human rights or freedoms. This was not mere speculation, but the way I knew the Party would deal with me if I went back. So many people in past generations have died from persecution. If I had not had such a strong desire to get out, I too would have eventually died under such persecution.

When the plane took off, I felt mournful. I thought of how I loved my country, but I was scared of what the Communist Party could do to me, and would rather escape from that certain persecution.

268.138 1. I Am An Apple 2. Sweat 3. Evening Dewdrops Glimmering 4. The Sun River 5. To My Child 6. I Am A Man 6. The Last Bus: Six Poems\fn{by Fu Tianlin (1946-)} Zizhong County, Sichuan Province, China (F) 3

1

I am an apple,
A small bright red apple.
*
My smile swings on a child's face,
My sweetness flows into an old man’s heart,
I satisfy the hunger of a sailor on a long voyage,
I quench the thirst of a traveller in the desert,
I restore the health of a patient who has lost faith,
I give the healthy a more delightful life.
*
I am an apple,
A small bright red apple.
*
I am the daughter of the sun and earth,
I am the chorus of the flowers and leaves,
I am the moon and stars that can be plucked,
I am the pearls and shells that can be picked up,
I am the hardened sweat, the frozen dew,
I am the fire of hope and passion.
*
I am an apple,
A small bright red apple.

2

I've praised you with such sincerity
—You glistening sweat!
You're like dewdrops on grass at sunrise
Reflecting sun's radiance
Mirroring hills' jewelled greenness.
I've glorified you with such fervour.
—You glistening sweat!
Like streams crushing through cliffs
You cling yourselves to my forehead,
You slide down my back.
*
Today, tractors dash across the field
A thousandfold more efficient than the hoe!
I see the workers' faces sweltering
With the same glistening sweat.
You trudge close to all lives that toil,
Sometimes you're exalted, sometimes disdained.
When hard work is combined with wisdom,
You are round glowing pearls;
When hard work is joined by ignorance,
You are only tears, bitingly bitter.

3

Evening dewdrops spring from earth,
Upward from the foot to the top of trees;
Are they truly dewdrops or
Are they the day's sweat wakening at night?
*
Clear and gleaming upon wakening,
Quickly transformed into good rains,
For a harvest rich with fruits on branches,
How ardent and dedicated they are!
*
This moment moonlight has lit the lamp
To show me the true life of the orchard.
Drop by drop the wakened sweat moistens the soil
Quickening the growth of leaves, the probing of roots.
*
With care I pick up a drop of evening dew
And watch it sparkle
But it quietly slips through my fingers
Hastening to refresh the green, green orchard …

4

Chasing others in the fields, singing in the ditch
Jumping in green leaves, and gleaming on the branches
*
Ah, litchis have reddened, pineapples grown golden, and betel nuts turned emerald.
Ah, love's ripe, life's sweet, and desires consummately beautiful.
*
Lovely Island of Hainan, how can you sparkle so!
A sun in the sky, a sun in the river.

5

From the rubbish heap
I retrieve your lump of clay that
I’ve thrown away.
By the oil lamp
I begin again to mould
That which I have shattered—
Your dreams,
Your small cars, your small house,
Your small, small spacecraft.
*
Perhaps,
They are too distant
From your mother’s needs.
When I went downhill with the hoe heavy on my shoulder—
How I wished you had cleaned the house,
Lit the stove,
And steamed a pot of rice …
*
Weeping,
You retorted:
“Why must you write poems and sing songs?”
*
Ah my bright son
I chew over your words.
Are they sweet? Are they sour?
*
All is deep in sleep,
But your mother’s heart is like
Your muddled lump of clay,
Forgive me, my child,
Let me kiss away your sullen tears.
Let me light us this lamp of night …

6

If a sudden storm rises tonight
Don’t be frightened, Mama.
I am the man in the house.
I’m already six years old. I am a man.
I can raise the long whip of my top
And chase
The naughty wind to the dark corner
And punish it to stand still there.
*
Today is not Sunday and Papa won’t be home.
But don’t you worry, Mama
I am a man.
I know how to use Papa’s saw and axe
To split firewood for your stove.
Uncle says a man is great
And Mama you do have a man.

If you ever receive a wire
Sent from heaven,
That must be from your son, the great man
Who wants to pluck a bright star
To shine for you as you write deep into the night.

6

The last bus arrives at midnight
*
Snowflakes fall on us
As my brother and I stand here waiting
Waiting for someone to return from a hundred li away
Today she must do so many things that have to be done
Must travel the road that has to be travelled every day
*
My brother's padded cap turns white
My white scarf grows thick
The lady on night shift
Urges us indoors to warm ourselves by the fire
Saying it's twenty minutes before the last bus
*
No, no
We want to stand at the top of the stone steps
Stand beneath the street lamp
Beneath the street lamp stand two snow-children
We want to be spotted by her
The moment that last bus turns into the station
*
We'll take her by the hand, one on each side
Pouring out whatever comes to mind
She'll be surprised to see that we've grown up
We've learned to tidy our rooms, wash our clothes
And our homework has been signed
I've signed my brother's
And he's signed mine
But there is one thing we will keep secret
(We've put a hot-water bottle in her quilt)
*
Snowflakes are falling on us
The last bus arrives at midnight

1947

79.69 Old Sun Sells His Donkey\fn{by Zhao Benfu (1947-)} Fengxian County, Jiangsu Province, China (M) 7

Nothing in this vast world of ours is so strange that it does not occur somewhere, sometime. It was just such an unexpected event which finally made up Old Sun's mind:

"I'm going to sell that donkey!"

It happened one day when Old Sun had gone to the county town to deliver some goods for the purchasing station. By the time he had delivered the goods, and picked up something for someone in the village, it was getting late, and with sixty li ahead of him he hurried his donkey out of town and was on the same road whence they had come.

Old Sun was getting on in years. That morning he was out of bed at four o'clock, on the road by five, and had to climb quite a few stairs in the department store. No wonder he was feeling drowsy even before his cart left the town. Walking alongside the cart, already half asleep, he noticed that once out of the town there were very few people on the road.

"I still have quite a long way to go," he thought to himself. "The cart is empty, and the donkey knows this road; why don't I just take a quick nap."

No sooner said than done. He hopped on the cart, and, holding his whip in one hand, fully clad, he fell asleep to the clump, clump of the big black donkey's hooves as it made its way along the road.

As it happened, not far ahead was a small gray donkey pulling a flat-bed cart. A corpse was lying on the cart and on either side walked the sobbing relatives of the deceased. Seeing a fellow donkey of the opposite sex, our big, black donkey was struck with a sudden and unreasoning passion, and, putting all other considerations aside, stepped up his pace to keep up with his mate, who was heading straight for the crematorium. Meanwhile, Old Sun had fallen sound asleep and was dreaming peacefully.

A number of corpses were lined up in the courtyard, in beds, stretchers, carts and the like, waiting quietly. The gloomy relatives were scattered about, squatting or standing, and they looked up blankly at the new arrivals. The big, black donkey, following close at the tail of his little gray friend, pulled up and got into line with the most well-behaved of manners.

Perhaps because these two carts arrived together, everybody assumed that two people from the same household had died. The two carts were immediately surrounded by a group of sympathetic and curious onlookers, whose questioning stares soon, turned into direct inquiries:

"Are they from the same family?" The relatives shook their heads and said:

"It started following us a while back."

This was odd, especially as the other cart was accompanied by neither driver nor relatives. A few plucked up their courage, and silently crowded around Old Sun, stretching their necks to have a better look into the cart: his face was ruddy, his expression serene; in fact, he did not look at all like a dead man. And, listen! The sound of breathing!

For one dreadful moment, the crowd stood stock still as if they had seen a ghost. The sight made their flesh creep and their hair stand on end. Then suddenly they drew back in a confused mass. What was going on?

The donkey, perhaps frightened by the crowds, or perhaps because it suspected they were going to take advantage of its master, threw back its head and began to bray loudly. This sent the other donkeys present into an accom-panying chorus of "hee-haws." The hitherto solemn atmosphere of the crematorium had suddenly become that of a lively donkey market.

Old Sun woke up in alarm and sat up to see what was going on. He rubbed his eyes. Where was he? Why was he surrounded by all these people, each wearing a different expression of horror or surprise, and some looking as if they were about to flee in terror. He steadied himself and looked around again. What was he doing in the crematorium? He was shivering all over. My God! What a lovely place to wake up in! And, these people think I am a ghost come back to life.

Old Sun was furious. He leapt from his cart as if to beat his donkey, then reconsidered. No, this was not the place. He had better wait until he had left this inauspicious crematorium. Without so much as raising his head, he turned the donkey around and whipped him out the gate.

To anyone else, this incident would have been a joke, but to Old Sun it was a matter of great significance. He maintained that this omen of ill-fortune only confirmed a premonition that he had been feeling for quite a few days.

Most of the people in the village would not have believed that Old Sun had something on his mind. Everyone knew that he had made a small fortune transporting goods for the purchasing station. Furthermore, with the new responsibility system, his wife could stay at home, while his son and daughter worked. However, all these chan-ges in the last couple of years made him uncomfortable. Surely, there was a hitch and he was not sure if the recent wealth of his family was a sign of good luck or coming misfortune! True, it was good money for the family, but it was money hard-earned. In fact, his job working as "the legs" of the purchasing station involved more hardships than most people would ever realize.

Old Sun's home was not far from the Yellow River, in a poverty-stricken and out-of-the-way corner where three provinces met and which the authorities had paid little attention to. The land was poor, but there was a certain kind of cogongrass\fn{A coarse grass used for thatching.} which flourished in and along the old course of the Yellow River, stretching as far as the eye could see, and it was as if, like this grass, the people of the area had learned to make do on this barren terrain. In addition to farming, most families raised livestock, and under the blue skies of summer and autumn, with the sheep and cattle grazing among the blowing grass, one had the feeling of being in the vast grasslands north of the Great Wall. The raising of livestock had become an important source of livelihood for these peasants.

The county heads had set up a purchasing station. When enough sideline products such as sheepskin and wool had accumulated, a truck would be sent to take all the goods to the county town. However, livestock could not be left to accumulate, and, since the county found it could not afford to send in a truck every few days, "leg power" became absolutely essential for taking these animals into town as soon as they were ready to sell. This was considered a supplementary form of state-financed transportation.

Although the pay for "leg power" was relatively high, it was not easy to find people willing to do the job. A trip to the county town and back involved one hundred li in traveling time, which meant getting up at five, only to return late at night. Very few people were prepared to put up with such trying conditions, and, furthermore, few families could escape their household chores long enough to leave the village. The most tiring aspect of the job, however, was that because it was difficult to get anything in this out-of-the-way place, people were always requesting things from the county town: one family wanted some cloth, another needed some sugar, the production brigade was buying a water pump or fertilizer and would like to have it carted back, and so on. With more than one hundred families in the village, there were always some such requests. No one wanted to take on this much responsibility even though the job would bring home extra money. What was more, several years ago during the movement to "let mass criticism inspire great efforts," Old Sun, "the legs" of the purchasing station, had been publicly criticized and labeled a "self-interested" element, making the position even less appealing. Those who had the energy for the job felt that they could put it to better use elsewhere.

Old Sun had faced more than half a year of public criticism. Now, as a result of his constant running back and forth, his old case of rheumatism flared up. His left leg was permanently paralyzed by the long illness, and trembled when he tried to walk. Once a talkative and fun-loving man, he had now become silent, almost dull-witted. It was enough to bring tears to anyone's eyes.

In the fields a half-disabled worker like Old Sun could do very little to improve production, while, on the other hand, the purchasing station felt his absence sorely. If the sheep were not taken to the county town in time, they often became thin, sick or even died and the once-profitable purchasing station was now running at a loss. When the people of the village wanted to buy things, they could no longer ask Old Sun to pick them up on his way back home. Instead, they had to make a special trip themselves, wasting a good many labor hours. As time went on, everyone hoped someone would come forward to take on the job, but nobody volunteered. Before long, the people's thoughts began to turn to Old Sun again, but no one dared say anything for fear of reopening past wounds.

Old Sun was by nature happiest when he was helping others. When he saw the looks of appeal on the faces of his fellow villagers, he realized once again the trust they had in him. His feeling of abandonment began to disappear and his old enthusiasm returned. To everyone's delight, as soon as the government policies began to loosen up two years ago in the spring, he immediately borrowed money and bought himself a big, black donkey to start his second term as "the legs" of the village.

Yes, Old Sun had taken up his old job again, but not without careful consideration. He had suffered greatly in the last few years, barely escaping death, and who could be sure that the new government's policies would not take a turn for the worse any minute. He considered and reconsidered, but finally decided that not only he would benefit from the job, the villagers and the country would benefit as well. This should be nothing to be ashamed of! And so, for the last two years, throughout the sweltering heat of summer and the bitter cold of winter, this old man of sixty with a half-disabled leg had been working harder than most people do in a lifetime. His thirty-year-old son had got himself a wife, and the daughter he had originally planned to marry off in exchange for his son's wife had found herself a husband she liked. He even had plans to pull down his old house and build himself a new one.

Now, just as he was beginning to feel pleased with himself, as if he could again provide for his family, he began to hear rumors that the government's policies were going to tighten up again. Every night a small crowd would gather outside Old Sun's house to discuss one topic: when would things ever settle down and leave them to get on with production, a question which nobody could answer. All of this, of course, was only based on hearsay and what these words "tighten" or "control" really meant, whether or not transportation would be forbidden. Old Sun had not the slightest idea nor the ability to think clearly about the question. The government's policies over the last few years had, been constantly changing, so that something permissible one day might well be forbidden the next, and the very word "change" now struck terror into his heart.

A few days after the rumor had begun, the brigade leader notified everyone that the commune was to have a new secretary. This new secretary happened to be the same Vice-Section Head Han of the county standing committee, who had been responsible for labeling him a "self-interested" element only a few years before. Old Sun felt he had no small cause for alarm, for he had no way of knowing whether this leader named Han still wanted to "let mass criticism inspire great efforts." He remembered one criticism session at which someone had accused him of forgetting the basic principles of Communism. Old Sun had disagreed with him, at which point Vice-Section Head Han had frightened him nearly to death by announcing over the megaphone for all to hear:

"You are taking the capitalist road, and if you continue, that road can lead to only one place: death!"

From that day forth, it was as if he had been placed under a spell, and he muttered the words "road to death" to himself for the next half a year. Even today the memory made, his hair stand on end. The more he thought about it, the more nervous he became, until finally he worked himself into a state of absolute terror.

It was in the midst of this terror, of constant apprehensions and suspicions, that this omen of ill fortune appeared. Where had the big, black donkey taken him—and nearly succeeded in getting him "cremated alive"—if not down the "road to death!" Man is most likely to revive discarded beliefs in superstition when he feels his own life is out of his control: at this point, Old Sun was so jumpy that the slightest hint of trouble left him quivering with fear.

Having driven the cart out of the crematorium and back onto the proper road, Old Sun's fury came to a head. He yanked the cart to a stop by the side of the road, and standing in front of the donkey, began to whip him head-on. All of Old Sun's pent-up ire came raining down on the back of the poor beast, who reared wildly in the air and had soon got himself tangled in his harness. Covered in sweat and gasping for breath, Old Sun stopped and went around to the donkey's buttocks, tapping at its hoof with the other end of his whip.

"Lift your foot up!" he yelled.

But, the donkey had no way of understanding that Old Sun simply meant to untangle the harness, and, fearing another beating, lifted his leg and gave Old Sun a swift kick in the forehead. He cried out in pain, pressing his hand against the wound to stop the blood which was already seeping between his fingers and down his arm. It seemed Old Sun's troubles would never end. Another flick of the whip to the donkey's head sent it galloping off, pulling the cart behind. It did not take more than one hundred steps for the cart to go careening into a ditch with a great crash, but it took a good deal of effort, and the help of a good many men to get it out again. By that time the donkey had thrown its hip out of joint.

Returning home, Old Sun went straight to bed, where he lay, tossing and turning, for three days. He thought about every detail of what had happened from beginning to end. He was troubled by the thought that fate was simply playing tricks on him. Eventually, he came to the antiquated conclusion that life and death were decided by fate, wealth and poverty by the gods and there was nothing he could do about it. He began to feel that the black donkey was a kind of godsend warning him that misfortune lay ahead. If he gave up his job now mightn't he avoid catastrophe?

Old Sun had already hardened his heart to the idea of selling his donkey, but in its present condition he would have to accept a large cut in price, and he did not like that. As soon as the wound in his forehead had healed sufficiently, he led the limping donkey to the commune veterinarian.

Dr. Liu of the veterinary station was as eager as he could be to help, but unfortunately his skill did not match his eagerness. Ten years ago the excellent doctor Wang Laoshang had lost his job simply because he had once served as a horse doctor under the warlord Zhang Zuolin. If only he were here now, he would certainly be able to do something for this poor donkey! Dr. Liu circled around the donkey, and then asked Old Sun to tie it into the sling. Grabbing hold of its disjointed right leg, he tried to lift it a couple of times, panting and puffing with the effort, but he could not fit it back into position. Finally, wiping the sweat off his forehead, he said:

"It's no good! You'd better slaughter it."

"Slaughter it?" Old Sun would not allow that! He suddenly remembered all the things he liked about this donkey. After all that time together, wasn't it natural to feel some compassion for the poor beast. No, he was not going to have it slaughtered!

"Let me try my luck at the Liuzhen Fair," he thought. Perhaps someone would buy it, and if the donkey was properly taken care of Old Sun could rightfully say that he had saved a life. As for taking a cut in price, he was determined not to let it bother him.

Up at four o'clock, Old Sun fed the animal, made himself a little something to eat, and then led the donkey slowly to the street. By the time he had traveled ten li, some people were already on their way back home having finished their business in town.

Old Sun entered the town, and half-heartedly led the donkey to the north in the direction of the animal market. This market was located in a thickly-shaded willow grove. Every kind of livestock imaginable was for sale here:

oxen, horses, donkeys, mules. The market was comparatively quiet, except for the occasional whinny or bray of the animals. The buyers circled around looking over the livestock and each other in silence, quite different from the deafening atmosphere of a street market. In this kind of animal market both buyer and seller are experienced peasants, silent and calculating. According to the tradition of the market, all bargaining is done by means of eye contact and hand signals, and all prices are counted off on the hands.

Old Sun selected a crooked willow tree and tied his donkey to it. Then he brought out his tobacco, and squatted down to wait.

The peasants here thought of livestock just as they thought of the land, that is, with a special intimacy and tenderness. Ever since raising and selling private livestock was permitted, the animal market of the Liuzhen Fair had become a big attraction. One look around was enough to convince anybody that few people were buying animals for purposes of transportation; instead, most people were buying for domestic use. Any money these peasants had saved would be spent first on a horse or donkey, and not on a bicycle, for bicycles were of limited use, and they depreciated in value with wear and tear. A donkey on the other hand, had many uses: you could ride it if you needed to go somewhere—and on the sandy soil of the Yellow River valley it was no slower than riding a bicycle. But, of course, its main use was in farm work. The villages in this part of the country were scattered, and sometimes as much as ten li separated house from field. For carrying night soil or collecting crops, a donkey was as convenient as a boat in a region with many rivers or lakes. Furthermore, livestock produced nightsoil and after you had raised a baby donkey or calf for two years its price doubled. In comparison, the bicycle had virtually nothing to offer. Indeed, a first-class economist could hardly have analyzed the situation more thoroughly!

Old Sun took a look around him: today the buyers outnumbered the sellers. He felt extremely optimistic. It was not long before a man who seemed nothing but skin and bones walked over to Old Sun's donkey:

"Hey! Is this donkey for sale?"

Though Old Sun had seen this man coming from afar, he pretended not to have noticed him. He sat quietly smoking his pipe. Hearing this old man's question, he looked up at him for the first time and casually nodded his head. He planned to drive a hard bargain. Knowing that the buyer and the seller are engaged in a contest of will and of the ability to size up their opponent, too much eagerness to sell would certainly look bad. He was applying the old military tactic of leaving someone space, the better to trap him in later. Who could be sure: perhaps Old Sun was a descendant of the brilliant military tactician of ancient times, Sun Wuzi!

However, Old Sun's opponent was no amateur. He opened the donkey's mouth, then snorted, "Hmmm. Four years old," but from his tone of voice it was clear that he had taken a liking to this donkey. It was not until he stood silently stroking his long, mountain goat's beard and examining the donkey's frame that he noticed the slightly hanging back leg.

"Hmmm? Is it lame?"

"Disjointed. It's nothing. It'll heal good as new." Old Sun had managed to squeeze three sentences out of only eight words. Perhaps, the less he said the more likely the old man was to believe that the problem was a small one. But when Old Sun turned around, he found the old man had already gone. He stood up with a sigh, and yelled after the old man:

"Are you blind? This donkey can outwork ten horses. I'm not kidding!"

The old man did not even look back.

Just as Old Sun was beginning to feel discouraged, he felt a heavy tap on his shoulder, and turning around, recognized Hu Er from the local butchery. Hu Er gave him a nasty grin and said,

"What are you shouting about? Why don't you sell me your old lame donkey and I'll make it into soup!"

Old Sun would have preferred not to pay any attention to him, but he knew this fellow was hard to deal with and so, turning to him he asked coldly:

"What's your offer?"

"Heh, heh," Hu Er began to chuckle. "Would I cheat an old neighbor?"

Hu Er pulled out a cigarette and threw it in Old Sun's direction, but Old Sun threw it promptly back, pulling out his own bag of tobacco.

"I'll smoke my own," he said. He had a suspicion that the cigarette had its price. Apparently deciding not to bother with formalities, Hu Er lit his own cigarette, then cocked his head, one hand arrogantly clutching his lapel, and said to Old Sun:

"How about fifty yuan?"

Old Sun blinked with irritation: a nice-sized donkey like this—for only fifty yuan! A complete rip-off! He gave Hu Er a menacing look and turned his back on him without a word.

"Fifty-one." Hu Er maliciously upped his offer by one yuan.

"You can up the price ten yuan if you want, but you're not going to buy yourself an animal from me," said Old Sun with a shrug. He thought to himself: "You little twerp. You should be careful who you try to cheat: Old Sun's been around, you know."

Seeing the situation was beyond negotiation, Hu Er gave a "Hmph!" and left.

One by one people came over to have a look at the big black donkey, but one by one they left as soon as they noticed it was lame. For these peasants, buying an animal was like being blessed with a son: who needed one who ate more of the family grain than he could ever earn back in labor?

It was almost noon, and the marketers had for the most part entered the bargaining stage. Buyers had selected the animals they wanted and were no longer looking for new possibilities. The managing personnel were busy helping the two sides strike a bargain, usually after several prices had been indicated by hand, back and forth, with the middlemen's commission growing steadily at each exchange. Already, satisfied buyers were leading their livestock out of the market for home.

Old Sun's casual calm of earlier that morning had turned to uneasiness as he watched for potential buyers. He waited, but still no one approached him. Leaving a nearby acquaintance to keep an eye on things for him, Old Sun walked off to survey the scene for himself. He reckoned there were about seven hundred head for sale that day, and at least four hundred had already been sold. Donkeys and oxen were the most popular, though to Old Sun's surprise, some people were buying mules or horses as well. Apparently, the local peasants were fully confident that the government policies would not change for the worse, or at least the rumors of tightening up had not discouraged them from buying.

The trust and confidence of these peasants came as a shock to Old Sun, and for the first time he wondered whether the torment he had put himself through during these last few days was warranted.

As Old Sun wandered about in this half-daze, he suddenly heard the sound of cheering. He followed the noise to where a crowd of people were gathered around a black mule, all oohing and ahing in admiration. A short, pudgy fellow was pulling the mule through the crowd, his face flushed with self-importance. Hey! Wasn't that his son's uncle on his wife's side? He felt a surge of irritation: this little rat had bought himself a mule? When Old Sun was facing public criticism during the "cultural revolution," this coward had come to see him only once, and in the evening too, probably afraid to be seen! Old Sun had always held him in utmost disdain, but today, suddenly, he felt far inferior to this brother-in-law of his. With all those people crowding around clucking in admiration, no wonder Old Sun felt jealous. Suppressing his mixed feelings of disgust and admiration, he turned his back on the crowd and wandered away. He was certainly not going to exchange greetings with his relative under these circumstances.

It was in this state of turmoil that Old Sun returned to find his donkey surrounded by a small crowd. Was there, a buyer? Excited, he elbowed his way through the crowd, sizing them up as he said:

"Who's interested? I'm the owner."

All eyes were now on him as he tried his best to collect himself, wondering with irritation why he could not control his heavy breathing. A man of about seventy pressed forward. He had a clear, humane look about his face, with a black mole on his left cheek and a flowing white beard. On his right shoulder, rested a long, bamboo-joint pipe. Old Sun was filled with a feeling of great respect for this kind old man. Somehow he felt that he had seen this face somewhere before, but he could not remember where. This man had apparently already looked the donkey over thoroughly, for he approached Old Sun immediately and asked politely:

"How much are you asking?"

"How much are you offering?"

"Hmmm—I can't give you a counter-offer if you don't give me an offer," the man answered, smiling.

"I'll consider this much." Old Sun stuck out first one finger, and then five more.

"Such a fine donkey; I wonder why you are selling it." The old man seemed in no hurry to set a price. He acted as if he were simply chatting with a friend.

This comment struck Old Sun right where he was the most vulnerable, but doing his best to hide his uneasiness, he bluffed"

"This donkey … aah … this donkey is too hard to handle." He rubbed the scar on his forehead as if providing some sort of proof, at which the crowd burst out laughing. He added earnestly, "but, when it comes to work, this animal can't be beat."

"That's right!" the old man nodded in agreement. "Animals with strange temperaments are always good workers." Then walking around the donkey's hindquarters, he said casually:

"Leg out of joint?"

"Easily fixed. The donkey man can fix it in a minute," Old Sun explained, a bit too hastily. Some people in the crowd laughed again, and the old man smiled as he stroked his beard. Then he went on:

"It's hard to say. With a dislocated joint, if it is the kind that can be fixed all it needs is one switch of the whip, but if it is the kind that can't be fixed, all the yelling in the world won't help."

A strange diagnosis! This man must be an expert. A thought flashed through Old Sun's mind, and he asked abruptly:

"May I ask, your name is—"

"Wang Laoshang."

"Ahha!" Old Sun's guess had been correct. This was the same miracle doctor whom the veterinary station had got rid of ten years ago. No wonder he looked so familiar! Then, thinking of the comment about "the donkey man" which he had just made in front of all these people, he felt utterly embarrassed. He hurried over to shake Wang Laoshang's hand, saying distractedly:

"Excuse my poor memory. I haven't seen you for ten years. Mr. Wang; have things been going well for you?"

Wang Laoshang lost his job ten years ago, and had been sitting at home with nothing to do until just last year, when he was rehabilitated. As he was already getting on in years, the only convenient thing to do was to advise him to retire. His health and spirits had improved a great deal recently, and he had opened a small clinic in his house. It occurred to him, however, that anytime an animal outside the village was seriously ill he would have to pay a house call, and so, having made up his mind to buy himself a donkey, he had come to the market today.

He added that it would not be bad for business to put in an appearance at the livestock market. After buying a nice little donkey for himself, he had agreed to help some of his acquaintances to select livestock of their own. That was how he and his group of friends had come to consider this donkey.

With this introduction, Wang Laoshang pointed to the small group of old men and said politely to Old Sun:

"They are the people I'm helping. Why don't you suggest a price?"

Old Sun was deeply perplexed. Seeing so many peasants buying their own draft animals weakened his determination to sell the donkey. Giving up the animal now seemed very rash indeed. And now, hearing that Wang Laoshang had started his own private practice, he grew even more excited. Now, at last, this man could fully exercise his talents. As for himself, wasn't working for the four modernizations the same as fighting the Japanese had been in his day? And I have almost nothing to offer—just a whip and six legs, me and my donkey, to help the country and my fellow villagers as best I can! How selfish to always be worrying that a change in government policies will bring me misfortunes! If the policies had not changed in the last two years, would I have dared buy a donkey in the first place? Haven't I been able to find a wife for my son? Why was I so ready to believe any rumor that I heard? And, so what if there are changes! Things can only change according to what the people want.

Old Sun's mind was made up: he would be damned if he would sell this donkey! However, it was going to be difficult to back out now; having said he wanted to sell, how could he change his mind at the last minute?

He stood muttering to himself. Ahha! He had. an idea. He had originally aimed to sell the donkey for one hundred yuan, but he had changed his strategy. Holding out two fingers he said to Wang Laoshang:

"Here's my price," he thought to himself. "This will scare them away."

"Two hundred!" A few onlooker gasped in amazement. This old man was not playing fair.

Just then, a rough voice was heard from outside the circle of people, as a man elbowed his way to the center:

"How much? Two hundred for this rotten animal? It's an out and out crime!" It was the furious voice of the butcher, Hu Er.

"Fine! If you're not interested, that's your business," retorted Old Sun coolly. So saying, he untied the donkey and made as if to leave.

"Wait a minute! We're interested."

Wang Laoshang stepped forward, blocking his way. He grabbed the rope from Old Sun and turned to his friends:

"Who wants to buy?"

They stood nudging one another, nobody daring to open his mouth, each doing his best to retreat quickly and quietly. It was clear that they had not the slightest interest in buying the donkey. Old Sun chuckled to himself. Knowing perfectly well what was going through everyone's head Wang Laoshang laughed.

"I see everybody thinks the price is too high, but if the leg were healthy, I'd say it was too low, I think it's worth about"—he held out three fingers.

"Three hundred!" The onlookers gasped again. The group of old men still hesitated.

Wang Laoshang's smile suddenly disappeared, and he began rolling up his sleeves, warning those gathered around to see the fun:

"Everyone back up a few steps, please. Make room, please, make room."

Taking the whip from out of poor confused Old Sun's hand, he hid it behind his back. He told Old Sun to support the donkey's dangling right leg, while he walked slowly to the donkey's left front side. The crowd of onlookers was growing, all curious to see what sort of magic Wang Laoshang was about to perform, and they stepped back in silence to give him room. One could have heard a pin drop.

For about thirty seconds, Wang Laoshang stood quietly facing the donkey's left side. His eyes seemed kind, as he waited for the animal's apprehensions to disappear. Then, suddenly, with a great "Hey!" he gave the donkey's left ear a sharp thrash with the whip. Taken completely off guard, the donkey reared up, thereby placing the entire weight of its body on its left hindquarters, which made a slight crunching sound. When it had calmed down and placed all four feet firmly on the ground, the left hind leg had been forced back into its socket and was now the same length as the other three.

This technique, called "the magic whip," was well known but rarely seen. It simply used the animal's own body weight to force the bone back into the joint, and had proven far more effective than the usual rubbing technique.

Returning the whip and taking the rope from the hands of Old Sun, Wang Laoshang led the donkey twice around the ring formed by the onlookers. It limped only slightly from the pain; which had not yet had a chance to subside, but in every other respect the leg was as good as new. The onlookers sent up a cheer and broke into a round of applause.

At this point the people who had asked Wang Laoshang to help them buy a donkey came rushing forward, jostling one another for position.

"I'm buying!"

"I asked Mr. Wang first!"

"No, I'm buying!" The buyers were arguing heatedly when Old Sun suddenly shouted out:

"I'm not selling!"

Silence fell upon the crowd. All eyes were fixed on this old man with his donkey. Old Sun looked as red as a chicken which has just laid an egg. In one swift movement he snatched the rope from Wang Laoshang's hands and turned to leave.

So, the seller had gone back on his word! The crowd's mood changed abruptly. They looked from the face of the seller to the faces of the buyers and back again. What was going to happen?

One of the prospective buyers was an extremely thin old fellow, the same man, in fact, who had approached Old Sun initially. With a look of determination, he yelled to Old Sun:

"You've already set a price, and now you're not selling? Why the hell did you offer in the first place?"

A few others shouted in agreement, "You've got to sell now! What do you people say?" someone yelled to the crowd of onlookers.

"He'll sell after a good knock on the head!"

"Take the donkey first!"

And, with a cry, the small group of men rushed forward to wrestle the rope from Old Sun's hands.

Just in the nick of time, Wang Laoshang stepped up to the small crowd of buyers to call a truce and try to reason with them:

"Don't be ridiculous! There're plenty of donkeys for sale; go look for another one." He gave them a conciliatory smile, while the crowd joined in his efforts to calm everybody down.

As for Old Sun, having got what he wanted, he decided the best thing to do was to slip out of the mess as quickly as possible. Pushing through the crowd, as if deaf to the quarrel he was leaving behind, he threw himself onto the donkey's back, and with a loud "Gee-up! Go!" he was gone.

81.108 Sand River\fn{by Chung-hing Gosselin (1947-)} Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, China (F) 2

In the dark of night the long street pulsated like an icy river. Patrick was a bit late because the holiday was near, and traffic in the city had been so jammed. By the time he wheeled his fourteen-seat van up to la place Denfert Rochereau, people were already beginning to line up for soup.

Since the arrival of winter Patrick had already joined the charity group's soup kitchen several times, but it had always been at the city's north side location. This however was the south side site, and tonight was his first time.

He was still the one in charge of the temporary emergency shelter for the homeless. With the weather so cold (and it had been that way all winter) the season had already claimed the lives of several drifters.

Among the service workers this night, there were two Patrick already knew. In the grip of the frigid cold, beneath the glow of the street lights, he saw the folds and wrinkles on face after face, like slash marks left by the haphazard blade of an axe. Several reeked of alcohol, and a few were so drunk they weaved back and forth, seeming about to tumble into gutters by the wayside of life.

He put bowl after bowl of hot soup into the hands that stretched out to him in the dark, hands that were red, gnarled, and swollen. He then looked out at the bright and sparkling lights that shone with holiday spirit over the streets not far from la place Denfert Rochereau. He cast his eyes up the long and bustling street.

Patrick lifted his head from the steam that rose from the soup and saw a tall, good-sized man standing across from him. His back looked bent, but still he was big and tall. Hard to say how old he'd be. Maybe sixty-something? His face had so many lines it looked like he'd got a net draped over it.. The front of his head was half bald, and dirty gray hair hung down to his shoulders like the ancient mop-head of a fallen old witch. His two hands when he reached out for a bowl of soup were like a broken umbrella. They flashed several rings, one of which had the deep red hue of dried blood.

This bunch of wanderers with no roof over their heads had a thousand and one oddballs, and from early on Patrick had seen so many that they no longer looked strange to him.

They stood around in twos and threes in the cold wind, and chatted as they ate their supper and soup. He noticed the fiercest murmuring and sharpest voice belonged to the tall fellow with the white hair. He had no idea why such a group of men with troubles finding a place for sleep at night were actually talking about snow skiing and resort areas on snow covered mountains.

"That's kid stuff. I once put up a whole resort complex in a first rate fancy ski area …" The white-haired fellow's hoarse voice pierced the air and then fell. Some of the men were arguing, some laughing strangely, and some offering off-the-wall answers.

"This old codger comes here every night; says he used to be a successful architect, built a string of important things." An aide next to Patrick by the name of Jean-Louis shrugged his shoulders indifferently as he said the words in a low voice to Patrick.

Patrick couldn't help perking up his ears, because he was an architect himself. Economic conditions were far from normal, and things had been going down for a number of years. In a group like this, surely a number could have come from different professions and from warm homes and families. Lots of them had lost work, gotten divorced. First one drifter, then another, it really could happen, could knock them to the ground, make it impossible to get back on their feet again. If one of them had actually been an architect, well, it wasn't totally impossible.

"But this guy, hey," continued Jean-Louis, "he's a crazy dreamer. Makes no difference how you look at it, there's no way he was an architect. Well, I could believe he was on a work crew at a construction site." He took a deep breath. "There are lots of people around whose whole lives have collapsed. And even more with mental problems. A lot of folks claim they used to be the father of the Emperor, you know." Here and there were patches of two and three drifters standing around, eating, drinking and talking loudly in the cold wind. The voice of the white-haired one was the loudest, and seemed increasingly to ring like a cracked bell from the depths of time. It was a voice that relied on memories to clang out answers from empty caves.

"He says he and his partner, a fellow architect, used to have an office by the Champs-Élysées, in the most classy area. Later he and his partner had a falling out and finally everything just fell to pieces …" Jean-Louis was gathering things together as he rambled on. Suddenly startled, Patrick's mind flew like a bee line to the white-haired man's words.

"Call me Tandourin. On the Alps, I built the Cîmes 2000. Then on the Côte d'azur, I built the Flots Bleus. Who hasn't heard of those?"

Patrick didn't hear his name clearly, but his heart leapt in his chest. Things were more or less cleaned up now, and he purposely stepped closer to hear what he was saying.

"The Val des Rois on the banks of the Loire River and the Escapade Verte in the Vosges Forest." The voice continued to hollow out a space amid all the noise. People on four sides of him didn't bother to even listen, except for one man, that is.

"And also Corsica Island's 'Napoleon Garden,' Normandy's 'Apple Village' …"

These names first welled up inside Patrick's heart before he heard them on the lips of the old white-haired man. "Did you say your name was Tan so and so?" Patrick leaned forward to ask him. He stared closely at the man's face, and by now his heart was pounding. "Tandourin," he answered. Patrick's heart was hammering as he heard the man murmur, “Hey old Brother! Not one of them heard a word I was saying. Nobody knows this famous architecture.”

“I’ve heard of it.” Patrick said it softly, and his voice dispersed like bone ashes in the cold air. But the old white-haired man didn’t even hear Patrick’s words. It wasn’t that he was drunk, only befuddled, like someone who had all but vanished in the thick of river made of quicksand. He stood there almost comatose before the middle-aged man staring at him.

Patrick looked him straight in the face, and saw how the wrinkles and lines fell across its texture like a many-sided net. It was like searching among the ruins for the scars of glory. Surely it was he! The thick bushy eyebrows, the aquiline nose, he who once appeared as nothing less than a classical carving no one dare touch, the one he worshipped as his idol …

That year Patrick turned twenty-one. He was studying architecture in college and was looking for a temporary summer job but didn’t have the faintest idea where to start. Through the help of friends, he landed himself a job at a master architect’s office near Champs-Élysées. Work at the office was already a whirl of motion, not to mention the “Napoleon Garden” project which was behind schedule. Aids were needed, and that was how Patrick got his first job.

Patrick had come from a quiet, simple town nearby, but this was a place of bustle and bustle, with traffic a constant roar and snarl. His eyes were dazzled. Business was booming at the master architect’s office. One project came along, and then another. Patrick’s colleagues were brilliant, efficient, and incredibly busy. His two bosses were both master builders in their forties. The short thin one’s specialty was design, and the big tall one’s, management. He was especially adept at handling clients. He wore his hair shoulder length, and dressed in the latest vogue, keeping abreast with the times. On his hands he always wore an assortment of large rings. This gave him the touch of an artist, and hinted at a knack for social relations. Seeing him with a champagne glass in hand, and with the champagne the sparkling color of gold, laughing his way through a company of well-dressed and coiffured guests, shining like a celestial star, shy Patrick was dumb-struck.

They built many a vacation resort in places known for their natural beauty. The tall boss was always flying off somewhere, to some towering mountains and great seashores, places Patrick had never been to. Looking at the blueprints and the scaled models of the building projects, Patrick felt transported. The fact is, at that time he had never even sat in an airplane. Patrick was thoroughly impressed by the tall brilliant boss. So it went on—everyone would work peacefully back in the office, when the tall one would return from afar. The doors would bang with commotion, the sound of loud laughter would ring in the air, and there would follow an exchange of hellos and how-are-yous. One time he marched in with his arms full of flowers freshly picked from down south, and handed them out to the women employees. It was as if he held the sun in his hands. Another time he rolled in from the east coast with bottles of white wine and shared them with everyone in the office … When we had a rare chance to sit down and chat with him, he’d offer a briefing on a series of flourishing, dazzling building plans.

“Life is in the palm of our hands, and we’ve got to give it the spark it needs to turn into a roaring flame.” When he threw words around like that, it was always in a comical, half-joking manner, and yet he seemed to have the flair and solid stature to support their meaning, as if he could make it happen. There was nothing arrogant about him, but he was in this constant circle of never-ending motion and never noticed the existence of a young man burying himself in the maneuver of levels and triangles.

Patrick worked for the company for two or three months. It was really an eye-opening experience, but he never heard from the company afterwards. Many years had since passed by. Now when he sat down in a train heading back to the suburbs at sundown, carrying with him the weariness of the day, watching the rice paddies and farmhouses quietly recede outside the window, day in and day out, month after month, year after year, Patrick couldn’t help dreaming what it might have been had his life been a story of success and glory. and wondered if he might have brushed with destiny but missed his chance to soar high. Then in his mind there would appear a form both tall and large, with chest outstretched, and hail; down to the shoulders. The eyebrows were thick, the nose long. The hands would glow with rings of many a hue and shape. He would carry the conversation with chatter and laughter, like a master magician juggling his life like a tiny round globe in his palm … Tandourin.

In this moment, as he stood opposite that face in the fierce cold wind, he felt he was recognizing a corpse. It was obvious that Tandourin hadn’t the faintest memory of the young fellow standing in front of him. What kind of crazy wind was this that beat him into such a decrepit state, anyway?

Patrick had a sudden thought: perhaps Tandourin could recognize him if he showed him his driver’s license with his twenty-year old photograph still on it. So he reached into his pocket and touched the leather billfold with his IDs in it. Yes, inside was his picture at twenty, frozen in time like fossils sealed in rocks. It would have reminded this old man of his lost paradise. Then in a fleeting instant, he decided not to bring the picture out.

Nor did he say another word. The old man bobbed and weaved as Patrick steadied him into the van. Patrick passed the side of Jean-Louis and said in a low voice:

"He's not crazy. He used to be a successful architect, really."

Jean-Louis was surprised.

The air seemed to be filled with very thin ice. The bronze lion statue stood motionless in the center of la place. The colorful lights shone furiously. Patrick was accustomed to shuttling those whose lives had been a losing streak. But, tonight, his cargo seemed particularly heavy.

181.132 Excerpt from A Generation Lost: China Under The Cultural Revolution\fn{by Zi-ping Luo (1947-)}
Shanghai, China (F) 7

… Let me start when I was born.\fn{This novel constructed as a series of letters; I have edited away that framework as not germain to the subject at hand:H}

I rushed to meet the new world with the first rays of dawn in the year 1950. The enormous midwife brought me to my exhausted mother, saying cheerily,

"Congratulations, Mrs. Tan! It looks like you'll be buying another pink dress!"

My mother stared at me in disappointment. Since she already had a daughter, she had wanted a boy; instead, she had a less-than-appealing baby girl. The eyes were spaced too far apart and, although the head was round enough, the face had a distasteful flatness about it. While she couldn't make out the exact shape of the nose in the dim light, she could tell that it was not a pleasing one.

The midwife left the delivery room to inform the waiting family. After expressing his joy and relief that both mother and daughter were safe, my father turned to the little girl who sat next to him on the bench, dangling her legs playfully.

"Rei-qing, you have a new sister! How do you feel about it? Are you happy?"

My sister, four years older than I, quickly nodded yes. The midwife went back to check on my mother. Instead of finding the fatigued woman she had left only moments before, she saw that my mother was refreshed and strong.

"Look," my mother said. "She already knows how to smile!"

*

"We'll call her Xi-ou," said Chun-pu Chu, the most renowned artist of the age. As my father's mentor, the task of naming me fell to him. From a large red envelope that he had designed and painted, Chun-pu Chu produced a piece of silk twine strung with washer-shaped pieces of copper symbolizing ancient Chinese currency. The ornament was a traditional gift to wish the newborn long life and prosperity.

"This way, she'll have two names. You can name her Xi-ou, but at home, she can be 'Shiou' Tan." When pronounced as one syllable, the word is Mandarin for "beautiful."

"She was certainly born at the right time," he continued, "at the birth of the People's Republic of China. Xi-ou: the bird of hope, the dove of peace. She is the hope for the future, the fighter for freedom and equality."

My mother's wish for a boy came true three years later with my brother, Jian-nan. He was followed by another, Chi-kai, three years later. Still, every time I heard stories about my birth from my parents, I thought I heard my mother say,

"Look, she already knows how to smile!"

*

But life did not smile back. In 1958, when I was seven, my father, the editor of an encyclopedia at a prestigious publishing house, was branded a Rightist during the Anti-Rightist Movement that began in 1957. Though he had spent most of his life working for the revolution, jealous colleagues manipulated him into a vulnerable position. He was exiled to the isolated province of Qinghai, near Tibet. My mother, a journalist and novelist, also came under accusation. She was kept in Shanghai as a forced laborer so that she could take care of her four children.

Two years later, when I was nine, my father returned. The high altitude of Qinghai had taken its toll; he came home almost dead from anemia. I accompanied him on his visits to the Party chiefs to obtain the necessary papers allowing a permanent move back home from Qinghai. These officials were often rude or belittling, so one of the first things I learned in life was endurance, whether it was for embarrassment in school, society's vicious discrimination, or the harsh poverty forced upon me.

*

On a cloudy May morning in 1966, when I was fourteen, my sister and I went to the courthouse to eavesdrop on a trial. A man named Ji-wang Bai allegedly had conspired with two other people to defect to Hong Kong. He had confided in his sister and brother-in-law, who strongly urged him against it, but, unheeding, he attempted to cross the border in secret. The friends with whom he had planned to escape betrayed him, and he was arrested before the train had left the outskirts of Shanghai. The sister and brother-in-law were charged with failure to report the incident.

The trial had lasted a year and a half, and today, at last, the sentence would be handed down. Ji-wang Bai was my uncle, and my parents the sister and brother-in-law in question. Trials were not open to the public; only my uncle, mother, and father were present besides the magistrate, the court recorder, and two or three people from the Public Security Office.

Rei-qing kept guard while I climbed up the walls to find the room where the trial was being held. I grasped the bars on the window and pressed my ear to the wall to listen. The verdict was long, full of legal jargon and Communist Party propaganda. When the magistrate read that both of my parents were to be sentenced to seven years, I nearly lost my grip. My father was granted clemency to see doctors, but my mother was to be put into jail immediately.

The words exploded in my brain: For 2,555 days I would be a child without a mother.

Although we waited in the lobby for a full hour after the verdict was read, Father did not appear. Already very late for school, I could wait no longer. I had missed all of my four morning classes. When I raced through the school gates, the clock read 1:10. I pushed through the door, perspiration beading my forehead. Teacher Peng was writing something on the blackboard. At the sound of the door opening, he turned, drawing his eyebrows together in disapproval.

“Xi-ou Tan, why are you so late?” he asked sternly.

“I, I …”

Fifty-four pairs of eyes stared at me, and my stomach tightened.

“Very well, take your seat and explain it to me immediately after class.”

Teacher Peng turned back to the blackboard and continued writing his three questions. His handwriting’s slant to the right mirrored his body’s slight disfigurement. First he wrote,

“Why is Tan’s paper so much better than the others?” The second comment was,

“What made Tan’s paper so much more vivid and touching than any other even though everyone was working with the same subject matter?” The third and final comment was,

“What in particular demonstrates the superior writing quality of Tan’s paper?”

I opened my notebook and started to copy the questions, but my mind was still a thousand miles away. The words did not make any sense to me, and Teacher Peng’s handwriting did not help matters. Who was “Tanspaper?” I nudged my neighbor with my elbow and asked,

“What is he talking about?”

My best friend and seatmate, Ah-di Chen, giggled and opened her mouth to speak, but before she could tell me, the teacher had already turned around to find the disturbance. Ah-di jotted down something on the corner of a piece of paper, quietly tore it off, and passed it to me.

“Tanspaper means ‘Tan’s paper’—Xi-ou Tan’s paper!”

In today’s class, Teacher Peng would be commenting on the essays we wrote for the previous week’s assignment, People’s Good Servant, Jiao Yu-lu. Just as my mind began to reorient itself, the dismissal bell rang.

“Now,” Teacher Peng said, “I have mimeographed Xi-ou Tan’s paper and am giving each of you a copy. After break, we will divide into small groups and discuss it. For the last twenty minutes, I will give my own views on it.” He walked over to my desk and fixed his small, penetrating eyes on me.

“Xi-ou, this was an outstanding composition. I am going to recommend that this paper be entered in the Shanghai middle-school writing competition.”

I managed a faint smile. Sweat had pasted my hair to my forehead and my cheeks still burned from the long run from the courthouse. My heart had not yet slowed to a normal pace, and I was petrified Teacher Peng would ask me why I was late. Luckily, I was rescued when Old Man Xue, a former faculty member who was doing forced physical labor after being denounced in the 1957 Anti-Rightist Movement, appeared at the door. He bowed subserviently to Teacher Peng.

“What’s the matter with you?” Teacher Peng asked impatiently, making no move to invite the old man into the room.

“I would like to take some time off to go to the hospital to see an eye doctor.” He raised his head, exposing a badly blackened right eye.

"What is it this time?" Teacher Peng asked in rage. "Today it's a black eye, last week it was a broken thumb, before that you broke three ribs. Tomorrow you'll probably come in with a gash on your check! Why do you always want to go to the hospital? Are you trying to avoid doing your share of manual labor?"

"No, no, Teacher Peng, I would never malinger! I was careless before; I promise I'll be more careful in the future."

Teacher Peng grabbed the excuse form and quickly signed his name. He was the chairman of a committee appointed to make sure that Old Man Xue was not performing any anti-Revolutionary activities.

*

The bell rang, ending the afternoon break. The students filed in and took their seats, and the discussion began. The room buzzed with voices as all the students tried to make their points at once. My thoughts were lost in the morning's events and I became oblivious to what was going on around me.

I was startled back to my surroundings by a shout.

Xiao-yi Wu now held the attention of the entire class.

"Here in this composition, Xi-ou says, 'Anyone who has ever made a mistake but corrected it is a good comrade.' What does this mean? Is Chairman Mao a good comrade? Has Chairman Mao ever made a mistake?"

Teacher Peng patiently tried to explain.

"Comrade Jiao Yu-lu was trying to unite all the comrades who had made mistakes in the past but had corrected them in order to further the cause of the Revolution."

"Don't try to avoid my question!" Xiao-yi Wu interrupted. "Answer me! Is Chairman Mao a good comrade? Has Chairman Mao ever made a mistake?"

The sensitive nature of the question terrified Teacher Peng, and he had difficulty formulating a response.

"Well, of course, Chairman Mao is a good comrade, and he has always been great and wise—"

"Don't beat around the bush! Tell me! Has he ever made a mistake?" Xiao-yi Wu demanded.

"Of course not, of course the Chairman has never made a mistake," Teacher Peng said automatically, as though he were raising his arm to block a blow to his face.

"Well, all right then. In that case, this composition is anti-Revolutionary," Xiao-yi Wu said confidently, and rose to his feet ready to leave. "I refuse to join this discussion!"

The classroom was silent.

Teacher Peng, a master teacher and Party member for more than ten years, dispelled the controversy with a wave of his hand.

"Well, class, Xiao-yi Wu has raised a very important question. Your discussion groups will now go over the question that he has brought up." He looked at his watch and continued,

"There are only twenty minutes left, and I had planned to summarize the discussion, but now I think that it is better if all of you continue. Tomorrow, I will use the first twenty minutes of your Chinese composition class to summarize." He paused and asked,

"Xiao-yi, what do you think of this arrangement?"

Xiao-yi Wu shrugged his shoulders nonchalantly and sat down, obviously satisfied with himself. Because his father was a high official in the Revolutionary government, Xiao-yi Wu was one of the young people honored by the title Son of the Revolution. This automatically made him a leader and a powerful threat. He was popular with the girls in the class, and many of them tried to catch his eye. I found nothing attractive about him, and I despised the way he looked down on other people. I was not surprised by his behavior, but I was shocked by Teacher Peng's handling of the situation.

*

While Teacher Peng frequently humiliated people like the Rightist Old Man Xue, he was generally a good judge of character and did not base his opinions on people's backgrounds. My parents had been labeled Rightists just like Old Man Xue, yet he was still supportive of me. Why such a secure and intelligent man should back down rather than confront Xiao-yi Wu was hard to understand.

My temples throbbed as I raised my hand to speak. I had once been comfortable arguing a point in public, but after 1957, when my parents were branded as Rightists, I preferred to stay in the background. I feigned shyness to deflect the jealousy of two girls who were class president and chairman of the Youth League. When we began middle school together, we were on the same level, but within a few years, I had surpassed them academically. When I resigned my post as class vice president in charge of studies, I lost all of my opportunities to distinguish myself, which deflected the envy of the two girls for a while. However, since I had more time for study, my schoolwork improved even more.

The chairman of the Youth League sat behind me. Whenever she sharpened her pencil, she blew the graphite dust onto my spotless white shirt, chanting,

"Let one half be white, let one half be black, let one half be clean, let one half be dirty."

Ah-di would get angry, but I would laugh it off. For eight years I had been taunted by my classmates, and there was no more harm anyone could do me. Today, however, the controversy confronting me was far more serious, one I could not brush off as a prank. If I did not stand up now, I would be sealing my own political fate as well as that of my parents, who were already in trouble with the authorities.

I decided to fight back.

"I disagree with Xiao-yi Wu's point of view. All I wanted to say in my essay was that it is a good thing to see a mistake and correct it. When I wrote this paper, I had no intention of saying anything critical about Chairman Mao. This has nothing to do with the Chairman, and I don't know why Xiao-yi Wu is bringing him into the picture."

"Let me ask you," Xiao-yi Wu interrupted. "Is Chairman Mao a good comrade?"

I ignored the question:

"Those who make mistakes and correct them are good comrades, but this doesn't mean that good comrades necessarily make mistakes. If you understand the logic involved, then this statement is not wrong, even as it relates to Chairman Mao." Before Xiao-yi Wu could respond, the chairman of the Youth League rose abruptly and burst out,

"Xi-ou is trying to sneak out of this. There is a severe class struggle going on right now that everyone in the room should be aware of."

Teacher Peng obviously had lost control, and his sudden inability to deal with the situation in the classroom irritated him. The bell rang, signaling the end of the school day.

"Very good, class, tomorrow in our Chinese composition class we will continue the discussion."

*

After class, I ran home at full speed to see if my father had actually been released. When I entered the house and found him and my sister sitting face-to-face, I burst into tears. My father took out a handkerchief and handed it to me.

"After the sentencing, I went to the judge's chambers to see if he would release your mother in my place on the grounds that she is more essential to raising you children than I am. I also pointed out that she was still recovering from a major operation that left her very weak. The judge rejected the request, but I'll submit a formal written request later."

I was furious.

"Father, why do we have to accept this ruling? Can't we appeal?" He shook his head.

"No, if we ask for an appeal, things will only be worse. I remember back in 1957, the people who had asked for appeals after being convicted as Rightists were immediately condemned as enemies of the people. They were exiled to Mongolia or Qinghai, as I was, where they died of hunger and exhaustion. Appealing would just be beating our heads against the wall."

I quietly put down my schoolbags and went into the kitchen. I was so hurt by the realization that we would be without my mother that, for the first time in my life, I did not relate the day's events over the dinner table. I did not want to add the terror of the class debate to the family's worries.

My two brothers were too young to understand what was happening. Father and Rei-qing were so absorbed in discussing the wording of the formal request for Mother's release, they did not notice my mood. After we finished eating, I cleared the table and asked permission to be excused to do my homework. When I finished, I browsed through the books of Marx, Engels, Lenin, and Mao Zedong to find ammunition for the debate.

I had trouble sleeping that night. If I could not prevail the next day, I would be branded as anti-Mao and most likely sent to reform school for my political heresies. My family would certainly suffer ostracism forever. It was late, and the world was quiet. I opened my eyes wide and stared at the dark sky outside my window. The hours slipped away and I heard my neighbor's white kitten knock over a windowbox. I jumped out of bed and scribbled in my notebook,

"A cat has four legs, but everything with four legs is not necessarily a cat."

*

The next morning, several girls avoided me in the schoolyard. My nervousness increased, but when I entered the classroom, Ah-di's bright smile helped calm me.

Ah-di was from a working-class family. Instead of doing homework, she preferred to spend her time at the opera, where one tragic scene could make her cry for hours. When she began sitting next to me in class, I realized that she was not stupid, as she would say, she had just never learned to study. I taught her a few of my tricks, and her grades improved. We became close friends, and I learned from her a way of life far different from my own.

"Three generations of my family made bricks in a kiln," she told me. "When my sister entered ninth grade, she took me to the examination center so I could take the test to get into school. She met a boy there and quit school to marry him. He catches fish in the lakes around Shanghai and brings them into the city to sell. He makes a lot of money that way. I'm the intellectual of my family."

How romantic, I thought, to bake bricks and catch fish and quit school and get married! For a moment, I longed for a life without complications.

"What about you? What's your family like?"

I looked away briefly. Ah-di knew that I came from a bad, intellectual family, but she never allowed her pure working-class blood to get in the way of our friendship. The sister who had quit school to get married had the privilege of returning whenever she wanted and could continue her studies as long as she did not fail. On the other hand, my sister, Rei-qing, who had won a citywide competition in mathematics, took the university entrance exam twice and was turned down.

After the second refusal, she went to the Shanghai Office of Educational Testing and Admissions to find out her score. The administrator would not see her, but she later received the following letter:

> Comrade Rei-qing,
>
> We have received your request for admission to the university. We are denying it.
>
> It is clear that you either do not understand the concept of loyalty to the Party or are acting selfishly in seeking to advance your own goals rather than the goals of the Party. You should understand by now our concept of "one red heart, but two life paths." Our criteria for admissions are not based solely on scores.
>
> Regardless of this, you should be prepared to go where the Party tells you, to follow the life path the Party has chosen for you. Your duty is to go to the remote countryside and work there.
>
> The Party has made its decision. Do not submit another request.
>
> Revolutionarily yours,
> The Committee

I felt sick. If I told Ah-di that my sister could not get into college because of her scholastic ability, she would know it was a lie. If I told her that it was because of a bad family background, that would lead to a series of embarrassing questions.

"Do you have a sister?" Ah-di asked.

"Yes, I do. I also have two brothers." I stood up quickly. "I'm going to the library," I said, and left the room. I went into the bathroom instead, closed the door, and cried. When I returned to my seat, Ah-di asked me why I was crying.

"I wasn't crying," I lied, blushing with shame. "I just had something caught in my eye."

*

When the bell rang to begin class, the principal entered, along with the Party secretary overseeing the operations of the school. As a loyal Party member, Teacher Peng had reported yesterday's incident to his superiors. His nervousness exaggerated the slant of his body as he wrote the "controversial" statement on the blackboard. At the class president's command, the entire class rose. Ah-di reached over and grasped my hand firmly.

Teacher Peng cleared his throat.

"Secretary, Principal, students, yesterday we discussed Xi-ou's essay on People's Good Servant, Jiao Yu-Lu. Xiao-yi Wu has excellent political acumen. He made a deep interpretation of the statement referring to the man who corrects his mistakes, and he expressed his doubts as to its political acceptability. We appreciate such comments. I reported yesterday's events to the secretary and the principal, and they have chosen to attend our class today to observe our discussion. Everyone will have a chance to participate, as our visitors are interested in each individual's opinion on this matter. First, let us welcome our Party Secretary Zhang and Principal Chen and show our appreciation for their taking time out from their busy schedules to be with us today." Teacher Peng applauded and the class joined in.

Xiao-yi Wu repeated his statement that my essay was anti-Mao and the class president and chairman of the Youth League rose, belligerently parroting Revolutionary slogans. When the commotion subsided, I raised my hand.

"Very well," Teacher Peng said. "Now we listen to Xi-ou's opinion. I hope that after hearing the wisdom of her classmates, her understanding will have been elevated."

His noncommittal opening remarks dashed my hopes. My sole comfort had been the knowledge that Teacher Peng was on my side—that of reason, not ignorant mob rule. Now I was on my own.

"I have read over my composition and feel that I have progressed in my understanding of the meaning of this particular sentence. I am glad to say that I can explain it more clearly. I stand by what I said yesterday, 'One who makes mistakes and corrects them is a good comrade, but a good comrade does not necessarily make mistakes.' This is an example of a converse statement. Comrades who make mistakes and correct them are only one type of good comrade. The other type of good comrade is one who never makes mistakes. There is no unique correspondence between 'good comrades' and 'those who make mistakes.' Therefore it does not follow that good comrades have necessarily made mistakes.

Another example is a cat. All of us know that a cat has four legs, but we also know that many things have four legs, and yet are not cats, such as cows, sheep, and dogs. If we say, 'Tables have four legs' can we then also conclude that a table is a cat?"

The classroom was silent. Teacher Peng seemed to be thinking so hard that he forgot to ask me to sit down. Only when Ah-di raised her hand to ask permission to speak did his attention return to the class. Teacher Peng snapped uncharacteristically,

"Ah-di, you also want to speak? Just stand up; Xi-ou, sit down."

I was surprised. Although Ah-di could be boisterous with her friends, she scarcely uttered a word in class, and then only when asked. For her to raise her hand was something novel indeed.

"Xiao-yi Wu infinitely extrapolated Xi-ou's remarks to extend to Chairman Mao, and it was unfair. I am angry with Xiao-yi Wu for doing this!" She sat down.

Xiao-yi Wu stood up, panting like a hungry wolf who has just seen its prey escape into an unseen hole.

"You, you …" he began. "You are subservers to the Revolution!"

He had actually meant to say "subversive," but Xiao-yi Wu's mastery of language left much to be desired. Teacher Peng was mortified by his pupil's incorrect usage of Chinese, especially in the presence of the principal and the Party secretary. He had no choice but to correct him.

"Xiao-yi Wu, you meant to use the word subversives to accuse them of being anti-Revolutionaries. What you actually said was that they are loyal followers of Chairman Mao!"

The class laughed uproariously.

"You bourgeois intellectual!" Xiao-yi Wu shouted. "You are repressing Revolutionary students!"

Xiao-yi Wu had a sidekick named Zheng-gou Wang, who sometimes acted as his adviser. Zheng-gou was from a bourgeois family that was particularly looked down upon, so he sought every opportunity to ingratiate himself with the Revolutionaries in the class. He came from Canton and thus acquired the nickname of Canton Kiss Up.

Canton Kiss Up rose, cleared his throat, adjusted his glasses, and drawled:

"Recently, all the important newspapers and magazines have begun a very serious discussion of our loyal comrade Yao Wen-yuan's exposé of the anti-Revolutionary conspiracy. Such anti-Revolutionaries use their novels and plays to falsely accuse Chairman Mao and the Party's Central Committee. Therefore, there are some people who wish to use literature for their own anti- Revolutionary ends. There are also some people who wish to protect these enemies of our Revolutionary society."

The class murmured in confusion. Canton Kiss Up surveyed the reaction to his address, smiled with malicious satisfaction, and sat down. Teacher Peng checked his watch. Forcing a smile, he addressed the secretary and the principal, who were seated in the last row of the classroom, and asked them deferentially,

"Secretary Zhang and Principal Chen, do you have anything you wish to add?"

The administrators put down their notes and waved their hands to signify that they had nothing to say.

"Well, class, after these two in-depth discussions, we have clarified many issues in our minds. Such discussions are very healthy and beneficial to all pursuing the furthering of the Communist Revolutionary Ideals —"

Xiao-yi Wu interrupted yet again.

"Well, who is right?"

"Who is right is not what is important. What is important is the raising of consciousness brought about by this discussion."

"But, it's the difference between the Revolutionary and the anti-Revolutionary! How can you say it isn't important?"

"After class, I will be glad to discuss this further with you."
"A Communist is not afraid to openly express his point of view. Wen-shai Peng, we demand a direct answer."
Teacher Peng smiled and dismissed the class. …

192.91 Eight Hundred Metres Below\fn{by Sun Shaoshan (1947-)} Shandong Province, China (M) 7

The earthquake stranded four men in a shaft eight hundred metres below ground where they were squashed into a corner by a huge rock fall. Eight hours later they had hewn out a path with their picks only to find all exits to the surface blocked. They were practically buried alive. As they had come to this particular shaft to do a quick job, nobody knew they were there. What could anyone do even if they knew their exact location? It would take six months to reach them with the normal methods.

They could only wait for death to come. Their lives would ebb away slowly through cold and hunger. Death would only take them when it got tired of toying with them. Despair gnawed at their hearts. Someone began to groan.

Zhang Kun, the foreman, was a small man of fifty-five. His eyes were bleary from having worked forty years underground but they had a fierce expression. Now their steely coldness was menacing. He fixed them on everyone in turn before saying,

"Keep cool. We aren't dead yet."

That gave them a shred of hope. According to Zhang, if he remembered clearly, behind the wall of coal was a deserted seam from which all the coal had been mined dozens of years back. If they could make their way there, they could escape though an air shaft, that is, if it hadn't collapsed. Anyway, it was a forlorn hope.

Leng Xijun, a miner in his thirties and the strongest among them, threw all his weight behind his pick, sending sparks and bits of coal flying, permeating the area with the smell of sulphur. He wielded his pick tackling the wall of coal, despair and fear transformed into hatred. To live he must break through it, but it was harder than rock. With only his pick, it was an impossible task even in normal circumstances.

Wang Jiang, the youngest, was barely twenty. He was a despondent middle-school graduate, who had failed to pass the university entrance exam four months previously.

The middle-aged man with a long neck like a grasshopper was nicknamed "Chatterbox" because he talked non-stop and was a poor worker. He was amazed at Leng, who hadn't eaten all day, hacking away for all he was worth.

Leng admired only Zhang, a man who courageously faced any hardship, but he was getting old. The task of finding a way out naturally fell on his shoulders.

*

Suddenly, Leng was asked to stop. Startled he halted. His three friends put their ears to the opposite wall listening hard.

Thud, thud, thud!

Such a rhythmic sound could only be made by man. Surprised, he walked over and knocked the wall with his pick. He got a response. The sound of knocking can carry through a twenty-metre thick wall of coal. Judging by the loudness of this sound, the wall was only two to three metres thick. The sound of a voice, however, can only carry through a thickness of half a millimetre, so they could not find out who was on the other side. Chatterbox straightened up and announced,

"I know who it is."

"Who?"

"Li Gui."

Doubtless it was that rascal, no, thief! No one else could be in the area. They were a team of five men. At the first tremor, Li Gui had run off with all their bread, and was cut off from them when the roof collapsed. He must have thought the earthquake was a cave-in, in which case he would wait until rescued, eating everybody else's bread. He had never dreamed of being stuck in such an impasse and now had to beg help from those he had robbed.

Everybody fell silent. The man had stolen their means of survival eight hours ago. Did they want to save him? The ticking of their watches could be heard in the silence. Zhang commanded,

"Break through it!"

He pointed at the wall separating them from Li. There was no response from the tall miner.

"Did you hear me?" the old man demanded.

He was an absolute authority in this world of darkness. Even the mine director obeyed him when Zhang led a rescue operation after an accident, his short arms waving vigorously as he snapped out orders left and right like a general commanding an army. The tall miner replied bluntly,

"Nothing doing!"

"Why?"

"You know why."

"My orders don't count any more?"

"Of course they do. You were appointed foreman by the mine Party committee and the bureau Party committee agreed. But, as things go now, we're all facing death and death is the great leveller. It's hard to say who should give orders."

"But remember, we miners should always die together. We can't leave a man to die!"

"I don't want to die with him."

Nowadays the younger generation had minds of their own and could best their elders in arguments. Exasperated, Zhang shouted to the rest of his team members,

"What are you doing then? Take his pick." He forgot he had only two men under his command now, and neither was Leng's match.

"I dare you!" Leng looked murderous, raising his pick above him. Embarrassed when no one made a move, he confessed,

"I'm not being mean. But we're like clay buddhas crossing a river. We've no guarantee we'll survive, so who wants to be lumbered with that bastard? Let's put it to a vote. If the majority are prepared to die for him, I'll do the same."

No one was over-anxious to save Li Gui. What kind of a man was he? Let's examine his relationship with others.

*

As luck would have it, the first day the unfortunate middle-school graduate Wang Jiang began working in the shaft his path crossed Li Gui's. Wang's tub was derailed and, try as he might, he couldn't get it back on the track. Li, the only one behind him, looked on with folded arms and a smile. When Wang finally gave up, he walked over and said,

"Don't you want your coal any more?"

"No," replied Wang, utterly helpless.

"Sorry about that, little brother. I'll take it."

Strong as an ox, Li heaved and righted the tub and slowly hitched it to his own, leaving the gaping Wang rooted to the spot. They were on piece work. Wang had pulled the tub and filled it with coal and now would not get a cent for his back-breaking work since Li had just appropriated it. Furious, he felt he couldn't bear to be a miner. Later Li often taunted him,

"Might means right down here, little one." Once, when Li was pushing his tub too quickly down a slope Wang warned him,

"Take care, somebody's walking ahead."

This only prompted Li to give the tub a sudden shove so that it rumbled down even faster. If the man hadn't nimbly leaped out of the way the tub with its load of half a ton of coal would have sent him flying. Wang was almost scared out of his wits while Li remarked flippantly,

"It went so fast, I couldn't brake it!" Wang indignantly exposed him, but he retorted,

"If I hadn't let go of the tub, who would make way for me?" Then he tried to appease Wang by giving him a friendly tip.

"Nowadays everyone looks after number one."

Yes, he was only thinking of saving his own skin when he grabbed all their bread. Had the world really come to that? The apprentice miner wondered.

*

Chatterbox was filled with a sense of satisfaction knowing that Li was trapped. Heaven is just, he thought. The rascal has got what he deserved. His long thin neck had suffered a lot at Li's big hands. Whenever a quarrel arose, Li would pin him down, clutching his neck with his pincer-like hands, almost breaking it and demanding,

"Tell me, Chatterbox, do you dare to argue with me?"

"No, I don't."

"Who's in the wrong?"

"I am." Chatterbox only dared to curse under his breath behind his back.

"Son of a bitch! Some day you'll die a violent death if Heaven is just."

Li was cunning as a fox. The accidents he had been in maimed his work-mates but never him. He always came out in one piece.

"This time the old fox is caught," thought Chatterbox. "Thank heavens!"

Everyone is pleased when a bad person is punished. But if one is given a rod and told, "Teach him a lesson!" it isn't so easy. Now Leng's suggestion of voting was like putting a rod in everyone's hands. Chatterbox, who since childhood had been used to receiving blows instead of giving them, did not know what to do.

*

Leng had first seen Li in a bathhouse soon after he joined this team. A large, dark, naked man was groping about in the public baths.

"There are more wolves than meat," he cursed. "I just dropped a big cake of soap. Which bastard picked it up?"

His knotted muscles intimidated even Leng, who was six feet tall and a basketball player. When Leng happened to step on the cake of soap, he hesitated and then refrained from saying anything or picking it up for him. But that episode made him wary of Li.

Strong as Li was, no one wanted to be his partner. His temper drove everyone away, so he had to work alone. If somebody brushed against him or inadvertently stepped on his foot, he would pay him back right away. When the other man explained he had done it accidentally, Li would retort with a glare,

"Me too!"

At the break one day, a piece of coal falling from the roof had hit his head. He jumped up and his eyes narrowed, scrutinizing everyone. But he kept calm. The following day, Leng found him sitting all by himself in the same spot throwing coal at the roof, trying to figure out who had taken him unawares the day before. Leng shuddered.

No one dared to stop Li when he pushed his rumbling tub like a tank. Even the tall basketball player was all nerves, wondering if he happened to get in Li's way, should he step aside for him like the others? He was afraid to cross his path, yet at the same time he longed to pit his will against Li's. He felt that sooner or later, they would clash. But it had never happened. Li had cunningly sensed the tension between them and greeted Leng cordially every morning. Leng had told people more than once,

"Three years with Li in one team is enough to turn anyone into a beast."

He had snatched up a pick to attack Li when he was dirty enough to steal all the bread. But a stronger tremor had separated them. Now he was asked to save Li with the same pick. Hell, no!

*

At the end of 1980 there was a lot of talk when the bonuses were being handed out. The workers each got three hundred yuan, while members of the revolutionary committee got nine hundred. The workers complained that the cadres had grabbed too much money, while the cadres retorted that the workers were greedy, not satisfied with getting three hundred yuan for nothing. Li was the only one who considered the division reasonable. He said,

"Listen, when good cadres grab money, I support them. They're at least practical. Everyone likes money. Beware of those who don't reach out for those crisp notes. They're ambitious like Lin Biao and the Gang of Four. They want more money. They're really bad, devouring people without even spitting out their bones This is what the world has come to."

Old Zhang, who happened to hear this, was infuriated. He wasn't a money-grubber. A Party member for thirty years, he was the only one of the thirteen leading cadres to give up his bonus, feeling his good salary was ample reward. He didn't want a lot of money and he was not ambitious. He was due to retire after three months. He had cried,

"You're talking rubbish, Li Gui! So anyone who refuses to take the bonus is a follower of the Gang of Four?" Not knowing his foreman had not accepted the money, Li added ingratiatingly,

"It's the truth. Honestly, when I see money, I want to pocket every cent. Nowadays,.what leader isn't after money?" Zhang knew he and Li would never see eye to eye, so there was no use arguing with him. So Zhang mocked,

"You seem to know the situation quite well, young man. How much of the world have you seen anyway? Is it a long time since you were wet behind the ears?"

"I haven't seen much. Still, it's thousands of li around."

"You find things the same everywhere?"

"More or less. My hometown was poor and there were no bonuses. My county built a few new socialist villages, which were known all over the country. The newspapers carried articles about them; the radio made broadcasts. People even came from Xinjiang to learn from them. Travelling by car they saw blocks of nice brick houses along the straight streets. Anyone would think that the villagers were living in paradise. No one knew their actual state of poverty. I bought my wife a pair of woollen trousers when we got married. As I forgot to buy her a belt, she had to use a piece of cloth instead. Can you believe that? Two years after all the publicity, our county Party secretary was promoted to the provincial level, while the villagers had to leave home to make a living.

"Before I left, my weeping mother sewed five yuan in the lining of my padded jacket. I travelled three thousand li without touching it. When I was caught bumming a ride on a train, I was made to get off at a small station. I was so scared of that god-forsaken spot that I pleaded on my knees for mercy. One man pushed me off the train with a swift kick to my behind. It was night and the station was on a mountain far from anywhere. I hated the world and made up my mind right there to get rich."

Because of this, Zhang was not. as surprised or indignant as the others at his action. It was natural for a man who had only seen the seamy side of life.

Li feared neither the Party secretary, nor the mine director but only Old Zhang, knowing that he stood to lose if he offended him. Although a foreman was not a high official, he had certain powers such as giving extra work for more money, allocating easy work or turning a blind eye when Li slacked. Strong as he was, Li always flattered this little man whom he could knock out with one blow.

Zhang, who had worked in the mines since he was fifteen, knew of Li's weakness for money. He never ticked Li off when he played a trick, but let his pocket suffer\fn{Docked him some of his wages} making sure Li realized it was a punishment. Since it conformed to the rules and regulations Li couldn't complain. As soon as he repented, Zhang would find ways for him to make up his loss.

Li feared and hated the old man, while at the same time admiring him too. Zhang liked Li for his spirit, never sparing himself where money was concerned. He called the young men in his team lazy, claiming that miners in their forties would sweat for ten cents while they wouldn't lift a little finger for one yuan. When they called Li a money-grubber, Zhang scolded them,

"What do you know? If nobody wanted money there would be no mines in the world."

"You mean socialism depends on people like him?"

"It can't depend on you, coddled as you are. You don't work a hundred days a year, and drown yourselves in booze all day long, drinking as if you were going to kick the bucket sooner than we. And you have the nerve to mock him!"

The old man could do nothing with those who didn't care if they were demoted or fined. No one could be fired after all. In comparison, Li had his merits. Although Leng hated Li, Zhang admired his work. Even a black sheep was better than no sheep at all. Leng's disobedience annoyed Zhang, who was used to giving orders. Now at this crucial moment, his words fell on deaf ears. What the hell was this voting business? He was furious.

*

Leng solicited opinions.

"What's your idea, Xiao Wang? You speak first." The young apprentice was in very low spirits.

"I don't mind what you do. You're older than me. You decide."

"What about you, Chatterbox?" Leng fixed his gaze on his peer, who hurriedly replied,

"All right. I'll say something. Li is selfish, cruel and mean. He makes me puke. He's such a rat that today he stole from all of us. Let him stew in his own juice!" He stole a glance at his foreman and then hedged,

"But, to leave him is too … too … well, even if we did, we're not to blame. It's his own fault. Whatever we do, we're in the right "

"You haven't said a thing, damn you!" Leng was furious. Chatterbox, who had been bullied about by Li was now vacillating. Banking on a quick vote Leng became impatient. Neither Zhang nor he had won any support yet.

Zhang was moved. He realized no one wanted to risk their lives for Li or voice their opposition right away. As foreman he was responsible for everybody's safety. So he tried to persuade them, using a coaxing tone he had never used before in all his years underground.

"I know Li can be a swine, but he's not an enemy. We don't know whether we'll come out alive, but if we do we'll regret not having tried to save him when we see his wife and children. You're young. He'll be on your consciences all your lives. Life won't be worth living. That's why people die together in the mines. No one ever hesitates to save another." Chatterbox chipped in,

"Right. That's exactly what I said." Leng cut him short with a glare.

"What did you say?"
"I mean it, although I did not say it; we ought to think of his wife and children."
Leng threw the pick down.
"You do what you want. I won't lift a finger. Wait till he joins you. He may turn cannibalistic and eat you up too when he gets hungry!"

*

The digging began. While one worked, the others turned off their lamps and sat in the dark. Once the batteries were used up, they would be doomed.
A soft moan pierced their hearts. They knew who it was. The more the man tried to control his sobs, the harder it affected them. He was only twenty, so young. Zhang felt so harassed, his breathing became difficult. If they missed their chance of survival because of Li, he would be killing the youth. But what could Zhang do? How could he console him? Certainly not by saying,
"Don't worry, we'll cqme out alive." How could he guarantee that?
"It's glorious to die for the revolution."
That didn't hit the right note either. There were so many middle-school graduates; why had he been chosen to work here? If that was such an honour then the sons and daughters of the officials, who were given other surface jobs, were not doing glorious work. Zhang knew Yang had been assigned to his team because his father had offended some leaders. Why should he pay for his father's mistakes? Zhang couldn't think how to comfort him.
Chatterbox tried to crack a joke. He couldn't ask the boy, "Do you miss your wife?" so he joked at his own expense.
"My wife will miss me tonight. She'll have to sleep alone."
"Don't worry," Leng sneered, "someone will look after her. If you do go home, don't forget to cough at the window." His spirits rising, Chatterbox offered,
"Let me tell you a funny story."
In the darkest place in the world, the foulest language was habitual. A newcomer, who found it shocking at first, would gradually get used to it and appreciate the raciness. Chatterbox began,
"In my son's language class, the teacher wrote the word 'blanket' on the blackboard and asked my boy to read it. My darling son only stared at it. So his teacher prompted him. 'What's on top of the mattress in your home?' Blinking stupidly he answered, 'My mum.' His fellow pupils laughed. Then the teacher prompted again, 'What's on top of your mum?' 'My dad.'"
The !rapped men laughed uproariously until they grew hysterical
"Shut up! Stop that cackling!"
The old man shouted to no avail. He turned on his lamp. The madly laughing faces horrified him. To bring his men out safely, he must make sure they remained in a normal state of mind and kept their will to live. Excessive excitement could cause a nervous collapse and total apathy. Most of the time, people broke down not from a lack of energy but a lack of morale. He must stop them.
One by one he slapped them. Shocked, they grew quiet. Their eyes, wild with laughter, scared themselves. Leng jumped up to curse Chatterbox.
"You skunk! You stole the story. I've heard it many times. You pretended it was your son's."
He was covering up his agitation and his gratitude to the old man. Leng grasped the pick and attacked the rock with a will.

*

Another eight hours passed. The sun would be shining on the mine. Though darkness reigned eight hundred metres below the surface, everybody felt fresher out of habit. Li on the other side had a very good tool and the sounds he made showed that they were getting nearer.
When Leng's turn came again, he struck through with a hard blow. Air gushed in as Li made a small hole with his pick.
If it had been any man but Li, Leng would have made a big opening for him right away. As it was, his energy flagged.
"Crawl through yourself!" he called into the hole, threw the pick down and sprawled on the ground. The three other men moved over. No one stirred on the other side. Wasn't it Li after all? Why didn't the man speak? Then a loaf of bread appeared in the hole. A brown, round loaf. Their eyes and mouths watered as the maddeningly sweet smell assaulted their senses. Four pairs of eyes followed the bread as it rolled over. All of them leaned forward, but none picked it up.

Then a huge hand pushed another loaf through. It was Li. Thank god the heel hadn't already eaten up all the bread! He had saved some for them. Happiness filled their hearts, not because of the food, but because Li had proved himself human. They hadn't wasted their efforts. One by one the loaves kept rolling through until they counted ten.

The entire lot. Li's portion was still untouched. What will-power he had shown!

Anxiously they all reached out together to pull the big burly man through. The small opening tore his clothes at the shoulders. His high cheekbones were streaked with sweat and coal dust. He got to his feet and looked alertly at his mates. There was no hatred, only concern, warmth and pleasure. Tears welled up in his sunken eyes. He squatted down, his hands covering his face, and broke into violent sobs. The tears poured down between his fingers.

No one uttered a word. In the silence that followed, it was as if a strong ray of sunlight had pierced the cold dark pit. Warmth drove away hatred and estrangement. They felt a closer tie than they had ever felt above ground. They would give their lives to achieve such a closeness. They were united into an organic whole, which would never be destroyed whatever happened.

Silently, the old foreman passed out the bread.

*

People crossing oceans, deserts and forests are prone to lose their bearings. In a mine one doesn't use the points of the compass either. Relying on his memory, or the instincts of the old, Zhang led his men on. Exerting the little strength they had left, they groped their way forward, sometimes having to crawl on all fours, helping and encouraging each other. Each was not fighting for himself alone, but for the group. Individually, they would have given up long ago. After five days, they finally found the air shaft. Chatterbox, the last to reach the opening, looked up at the patch of sky.

"My darling wife," he cried with mixed feelings, "you're not fated to be a widow!"

Like a broken stalk, his head hung on his narrow neck. He crouched down and wept. Tears rolled down the faces of these men who had cheated death. Eight hundred metres above were the blue sky and clouds. The sun shone brightly on the earth where the green mountains rolled and the leaves rustled in the trees. How beautiful life was!

*

After resting for a while Leng, exhausted, began dozing off. They were safe now, he thought. They could sleep a little before starting the difficult ascent. Sleep was what they needed and wanted most. He closed his eyes. Zhang shouted hoarsely,

"Get up, damn you! All of you get up!"

He called them all sorts of names, but nobody heeded him. Leng closed his eyes, ignoring him totally.

"Get moving! Heaven gave you a big body, so put it to good use. When I was a young man …"

"Why is he picking on me?" Leng thought. "What's got into him? Has he gone crazy?"

This was Zhang's favourite beginning when he wanted to give the young people a piece of his mind: "When I was a young man: Leng's retort, "You were damn all. After so many years you're just a little foreman," would drive the old man crazy.

Leng wouldn't take that now. As he jumped up angrily he saw stars and his head throbbed with an excruciating pain. Startled, he realized that the foreman was trying to save them. Past experience told him that if they lay down for half an hour, they would never get up again. Zhang didn't want to scare them by telling them directly.

After an earthquake, all the gas from the broken coal seams seeped out of the mine through the air shafts poisoning anyone in the area. They daren't linger. Leng gave Zhang a hand in pulling everyone to his feet. He grabbed Wang's hand, urging him,

"Buck up and get a move on. You can rest when you're out." The boy flopped down like a noodle when Leng let go and pleaded,

"I'm so sleepy. Let me rest, you go ahead. I can find my way now." The foreman bellowed,

"Shit! You're useless! No wonder you had to come here. Did you sleep during your exams?"

The young man leapt up like a scalded cat. He had never expected Zhang, whom he respected, to taunt him like that. Quivering with fury, he dashed towards the air shaft. Groaning, Chatterbox went after him.

"You go and get someone to come and help me out," Zhang told Leng.

"No."

"Why not?" the old man demanded impatiently.

"You know why." Leng was worried. "Before someone could rescue you … you'd be …"

"You …"
The truth was like a blow. The old man dropped his head. Presently he straightened up.
"Get going and stop talking. As long as I …"
His efforts to rise were unsuccessful. He stumbled, bumping his head. Leng was appalled. He thought that Zhang had only lost confidence, but he was, in fact, totally drained of all strength. For forty years he had worked in the mines and now he had used up all his energy for others. He had none left to save himself. In desperation, Leng wanted to throw his arms around the old man and cry. Zhang stopped him with a severe glance, standing firmly with his head leaning against the rock.
"Quit it! Get going!"
Leng looked around at a loss. Only then did he notice Li was still there. Li tore up his trousers and made a rope.
"I'll carry you," he told the old man. "We'll stick together."
Leng tied Zhang on Li's back. They began the climb. Ordinarily the two men could have easily carried Zhang any distance. Now it was different. Li moved his legs with difficulty, slipping down when he had made a little advance. Leng crouched down and cried,
"Stand on my shoulder! I'll push you up!"
Li hadn't the heart to put all his weight on Leng's shoulder. Leng cursed in fury.
"Lost your guts? Stand on my shoulder! That's it!"
Leng straightened up, pushing Li and the old man up bit by bit. .
The two enemies had united together to save Zhang's life. It could not be done alone. Each step took them that much closer to life and that much farther away from death.
"People die together in the mines. No one ever hesitates to save another."
They pushed and climbed, advancing along the air shaft towards a new life.

1948

21.70 The General And The Small Town\fn{by Chen Shi-xu (1948-)} Jiangxi or Kiangsi Province, China (M) 6

In a small town like ours, miles from anywhere, the slightest change attracted great attention.
"Hey! Does anyone know why they're putting up a new house near the prison at the foot of Ringworm Hill? Who does it belong to? Are they enlarging the jail again?"
Ringworm Hill, about two li from the town centre, was actually a large rocky mound.
"You're all so dim!"
The owner of this mocking tone popped his head out from behind the door of a shop. He was the barber. He was bald on top, though his few remaining hairs on the sides of his scalp were carefully oiled and combed. Known as a newsmonger, he was an important figure in the small town. Though confined to his shop, he seemed to have his fingers on the pulse of the town and was the first to know of any new development. When passing on news, people often started with, "According to the barber …"
The barber liked to add a touch of drama to the news. If he heard something important, he never announced it in his small shop. He would, like now, step out and go to the crossroads where there were all kinds of stalls.
"I bet you've no idea. The house is for a general who will soon come here to live."
"What? A general? Come to live with us?" The news caused quite a stir. In a backwater like ours, the coming of a general was sensational news. It was indeed a great honor bestowed on us.
The barber cleared his throat and warned, damping their enthusiasm: "But don't raise your hopes! In fact, it's nothing special."
The listeners craned forward, their curiosity aroused, asking why.
"Why? Humph! Listen, but this is for your ears only. Don't let on. Strictly confidential! The general's been dismissed! He's been exiled here!"
"Exiled! Why?"
"He was a renegade."
People gaped in astonishment. Like a bolt from the blue it struck at their vanity. They were disappointed and downcast.
"In name he's a retired officer." An ingenious propagandist, the barber regained the listeners' waning attention. "He still keeps his rank of general." Then he continued in a low voice:

"He was allowed to keep either his army rank or his Party membership. I may as well tell you all about it. People like us are just ordinary citizens, that's all. But he was an officer and a Party member. Now why do you think he chose to remain in the army?"

He stopped abruptly, letting them ponder over this question. Holding their breath, they looked at one another, not knowing what to say.

Then a young porter from the transportation team, having put aside his barrow and elbowed into the crowd, broke the silence.

"In my view, he should have kept his Party membership. It's an honor!" Quite a few people seconded him.

The barber pursed his lips disapprovingly.

"No, it's better to remain in the army," an old tailor observed prudently. "A man has to eat. Where can he get money from if he is demobbed? What can he live on if he's no income? He's probably no skills and you can't expect an old man like ruin to till the land, can you?"

"Right, you've got a good financial brain," remarked the barber, patting him hard on his shoulder. Excited, the tailor grew red, feeling greatly flattered.

"That's just what the higher-ups thought too, so they pensioned him off, allowing him to wear his anny uniform." He paused to glance at the young porter and went on. "Don't you know, as a high-ranking officer he gets a fat pay?"

People exclaimed in admiration. But talking of money reminded the barber that he hadn't started work yet and he hurried back to his shop.

But someone caught his coat tail, asking, "Tell us, when will he come?"

"Haven't you anything in that thick head of yours?" He was obviously impatient. "Don't you see that house? When it's completed, he'll certainly move in there."

Reluctantly, people scattered, munnuring their guesses and predictions or sighing over the ill-fated general, taking the news to all the corners of the town.

*

Now, with the listeners departing, let's have a look at this lovely little town.

The town had two streets only wide enough to allow the passage of one jeep. Six hundred meters long altogether, they crossed at the center of the town. The streets were paved with flagstones here and there, while paint peeled from the jutting-out buildings. All these showed its antiquity.

A stream, only ankle-deep, meandered around the town. Unfortunately, on its banks were heaped piles of rubbish and debris.

It was really surprising! People gaped when they first set eyes on the general. Everybody thought the same.

"No wonder he was dismissed. An old duffer like him doesn't deserve to be called a general!"

What would a general look like then? Though we'd never met one before, he didn't fool us. A general should have grey hair, straight eyebrows, and perhaps a paunch. He must be tall and strong, looking impressive and awe-inspiring like in the ftlms. But this man was small, wizened and wrinkled. Moreover, he was slightly hunched and lame in one leg.

Far from being broken by his unlucky circumstances, he paid great attention to his appearance as if to make up for his poor physique. Whenever he walked in the streets, his uniform was always well ironed without any creases, and he held himself straight like a soldier. The red star on his cap and his two red collar insignia stood out brightly. No matter how stifling the weather, he kept his jacket collar buttoned. Though lame in one leg from an old war wound, he walked steadily.

However, all this unfortunately reminded us of his disgrace.

We often watched him, not in awe or contempt, but out of curiosity. He didn't seem to mind at all. On the contrary, he walked about, though with some difficulty, the second day after his arrival.

Leaning on his shining wooden stick, he limped from one end of the street to the other. Or sometimes, he strolled along the dry stream bed strewn with litter. Someone said, tongue in cheek, that the old man kept moving habitually because he had walked all over China!

After a short period, he began to make some unfavourable comments about our small town, in which we had lived happily for a long time. He asked, for instance, "Why don't you spend some money on putting a tarmac surface on the two streets?" or "Why don't you dig a large pit on the other side of the stream for your rubbish so that it can be made into compost?" Our sophisticated and clever local cadres would excuse themselves saying, "Where can we get the money for it? Our salaries are pretty low!" or "We're simply too busy!" Their listeners would chuckle, catching that dig at the general.

Our feelings towards this queer general were rather mixed. Though disgraced, he still got a decent pay. We all felt his criticisms and suggestions were well meant, yet no one was willing to befriend him.

Apparently, he soon noticed our mood, for he stopped making any more embarrassing criticisms. Instead, he found himself a place at the crossroads. There under an old camphor tree, whose top had once been struck by lightning, just opposite the barber's shop, he stood upright sometimes for hours, supported by his stick. Blinking his bleary eyes, he stood musing silently. No one knew what was in his mind.

His posture was really amusing. Vendors nearby raised their heads to glance at him from time to time, and even passers-by lingered to look at him before continuing on their way. Behind the glass windows of his shop, the barber gazed at him standing in the dusty street and joked cheerfully, "What do you think he looks like?"

"A sentry?" someone said. The barber shook his head.

"A traffic policeman then," said another. He shook his head again. After some further exchanges, the barber said matter-of-factly:

"Have you ever been to Hankou? At one end of Sanmin Road, there's a bronze statue of a figure standing erect and holding a walking stick. Just like him. Exactly!"

Gradually, people got used to seeing the general standing there, like a bronze statue. He became like the coppersmiths, cobblers and tinkers at the corners of the crossroads. If you didn't see one of them for a couple of days, you would feel there was something missing.

But he was not a statue, he was a man, and one with a shrewd mind moreover. And one day people would discover that he was also possessed of a hot temper.

One Sunday, there was a great commotion in front of the butcher's, as some young rascals with baskets on their backs fooled around, enjoying making a racket.

The general stood as usual viewing the scene, while his hand holding the stick trembled slightly and the veins in his temples swelled in anger. Suddenly he limped across, raised his stick and tapped a soldier on the back. Wet with sweat, he was squeezing his way through the crowds and shouting boisterously. Turning his head abruptly, he met the old man's blood-shot gaze. He withdrew from the throng at once and asked, "Anything I can do for you, sir?" Though a new recruit, he decided that the old man must be a high-ranking officer.

"Tidy yourself up before speaking to me!"

Darting a timid, worried glance at the general, the cherubic-faced soldier quickly righted his cap, did up his collar buttons, rolled down his sleeves, and finally lowered his head, staring down at his shoes.

"Which unit are you from? What's your job?"

"I'm a cook in the mess of the garrison stationed here."

A few brief seconds of silence followed.

"Attention!" the general suddenly shouted. This professional harsh order immediately silenced the noisy crowd. Heads turned to look at the two soldiers, who seemed oblivious of everything around them. Panting, the old man gave a second order:

"Turn left! At the double! Quick march!"

Still holding himself erect, the general breathed heavily, gazing at the retreating figure.

All was very quiet now at the crossroads. As though checked by some strange power, the jostling, noisy crowd automatically fell into line. At that moment, they felt the might of the old man, who had once commanded thousands of troops.

*

Not long after, another incident shocked the small town, making those who were inclined to side with the weak realize that something was wrong with their present situation.

It was inevitable that the old general, who had been through hard times, had had his health impaired. Apart from the care of his wife, once a head nurse in a large hospital, the general was permitted regular check-ups in an army hospital some fifty Ii away. A sign of charity perhaps. He could also go to the town's hospital in an emergency.

One day, he became pale and ill, breaking out in a cold sweat. As he was entering the local hospital, supported by his wife, a country woman who had been sitting on a bench by the consulting room suddenly tugged at his coat, begging, "Please save my child! I hurried over thirty li to get here before dawn, hoping to see the doctor as soon as possible, but …"

Inside it was so dim that they could hardly see each other. The general felt the boy's forehead, then started.

"Hurry up!" he shouted. "Take him to the doctor at once!"

Then he tore into the consulting room and said to the doctor seated at a desk:

“Doctor! Here’s an urgent case!”

Sitting behind the desk was the doctor, the wife of the town mayor and head of the hospital. Her occupation, social position and the way she carried herself served to demonstrate that she was the most important woman in the town. At that moment, she was listening to the heart of one of her distant relatives and chatting with the patient about her daughter’s dowry. She was so engrossed that she forgot to remove the stethoscope. Interrupted by the general’s cry, she glared at him and said:

“Register first.”

Then she turned back to her relative, all smiles.

“He registered ages ago!”

“Then you’ll have to wait …” “—Yes, it’s worth having a daughter.”

“But he was registered first.”

She turned abruptly and asked:

“Little Wang, did you call number one?”

“Of course!” replied a young nurse, bent over, giving an injection.

“See,” said the doctor and, turning to the peasant woman, she added, “you weren’t here when your number was called. You'll have to join the queue again:

“But I was here! Our village doctor told me that my boy was suffering from acute pneumonia …” The woman, carrying her child in her arms, broke off, out of either nervousness or disappointment.

“She probably didn’t hear you clearly,” said the general.

“Then she can learn a thing or two about our regulations. A country has its laws and a hospital its rules. If we don’t stick to the rules, there’ll be chaos, won’t there?” Throwing her stethoscope on the desk, she shot the general a reproachful glance.

“But this is an urgent case! You can’t be so rigid! Now, what number was this patient?” asked the old man, pointing to the relative.

“Hmmm! So you’ve come to make trouble today, eh? Are you the kid’s father or grandfather?”

“You should be ashamed of yourself!”

“What? Ashamed? You old fool! Why should I be ashamed? Am I anti-Party or a renegade?”

The general raised his stick

The cocky woman screamed, protecting her head with her arms.

It was so quiet that you could hear a pin drop in the room. Her relative was flabbergasted. Nobody came out to grab the general’s stick. It remained quivering in mid-air. People hoped it would strike the doctor’s snub nose.

But the stick did not fall. Instead, the old man stretched to grab the other end and snapped it in two.

Turning with difficulty, he asked his wife, “Is there any medicine at home?”

She nodded, knowing that he meant medicine for pneumonia.

In a trembling voice, he asked the peasant woman, “Do you trust me? Then follow us!”

The news of this incident soon got around. Now even timid people dared to show their dissatisfaction.

It was true that we were rather cut off from the world and, as a result, we were rather easily cowed. But it was precisely this that made us rely on our own judgements. If a “renegade” helped others in difficulty while a “Communist” bullied the people, shouldn’t their titles be exchanged?

For a couple of days, there was no sign of the general under the camphor tree. People began to anxiously whisper about him. It was said that his condition had taken a turn for the worse. And since the incident in the consulting room, he had been deprived of the right to use the town government jeep to go to the military hospital.

Late one night, some fine young men led by the porter came to the general’s house. They put the old man on a stretcher and hurried him off to the military hospital.

*

1976 began terribly. It was bitterly cold. Overhead the clouds were hanging thick and heavy, while the ground was muddy and slippery. Our little town looked more desolate than ever.

As if favoured by fate, despite the bad weather, the people in the town had the monotony broken by some encouraging news.

Just after the New Year, the barber came to the crossroads with an air of importance. No doubt, he had something vital to announce. People gathered round him at once. Having cleared his throat, he began:

“You know what, the general’s no longer a renegade! His case has been cleared!”

“Are you sure? How do you know?”

“You don’t believe me?” chided the barber, glowering at the questioner. He never tolerated any doubts about his information. However, he went on, “If you don’t believe me, ask him.”

“I told him,” admitted the porter, elbowing his way forward. Not used to speaking in public, he blushed.
“When we were in the hospital, two men from the general’s original army came and said that the general’s record before he joined the Red Army had been cleared. He never betrayed the revolution.”
“Humph! Ridiculous to have wronged a veteran revolutionary for such a long time,” the barber butted in with his comment. “I said long ago that the general was every inch a damn good man! Indeed …”
“Indeed, sufferings test a man,” people sighed, sympathizing with the general.
“Then he’ll soon leave us, won’t he?” the tailor raised his question hesitatingly.
A far-sighted man! When the inevitability of this was forced into their minds, the townsfolk again became depressed.
“Well,” the barber said after a sigh, scratching his bald head, “it’s only natural. Ours is a small town. How can a little temple house a big Buddha?”
People felt sad. It was always the same: you realized a thing’s worth only when you had to part with it.
“What a mean lot you are!” the porter snapped in anger. “The Party and the State need him badly. You always wished him good luck. Now it’s come, you’re miserable. Isn’t that selfish?”
Yes, it was. The general had his work to do, which was of vital importance. After all, we couldn’t ask him to be our mayor, could we? So his leaving would be something worth celebrating.
People looked expectantly in the direction of the hill, hoping that the general would come and stand under the camphor tree as before. They longed to see him, and if possible, have a chat with him.
The desire to see the general grew stronger. Then someone suggested that everyone should go to call on him, since he had come back the previous day and was still unable to walk about.
Why not? So the crowds headed for Ringworm Hill. The desolate, rocky hill became a lively spot. Normally people steered clear of it, if they could. There was neither wood to collect nor grass to graze cattle. Moreover, for centuries, it was where those executed had been buried. If you had to pass this ominous hill, you’d certainly give it a wide berth.
But now, the house beside the prison was like a sacred place for pilgrims.
As they were swanning around the door, they saw the general inside, hunched over and looking thinner. They halted, not daring to cross the threshold, filled with shyness and awe. Even a wag like the barber was lost for words. Only when people nudged him did he mutter in a fluster:
“General!”
But it was inaudible, even to himself.
For some time, the general did not know what to say either, his eyes wide open in surprise. But when he soon realized their intention, tears brimmed over and streamed down his lined face.
Although Ringworm Hill was not far from the town, this was the first time that people had seen it joyfully. They were also astonished to find rows of pits for planting trees on the slope behind the general’s house.
“Are you going to plant so many trees, general?”
“Yes. I hope to change the color of this mound before meeting Marx in the nether world. It’s a pity that fruit trees won’t grow here. Still, we’ll make do with pine trees.”
“Do you mean to live here as a hermit?”
“Hermit?”
“Yes.”
“What an idea Ha! Ha!” The general laughed heartily until he was seized by a fit of coughing. Then he went on:
“My aim is to safeguard the small trees until they’ve grown big enough. When you’ve some time, we’ll divert the stream too, build some irrigation canals and a reservoir. This will help your fields. The hills will be green and the stream will retain water all year round. If we plant some flowers, and keep some birds and animals, we’ll have a fine park. I’d like to be the park keeper. And you, young man,” he patted the porter on his shoulder, “can bring your beautiful wife there and have fun. I assure you I won’t close the gate ahead of time!”
“Then promise not to hit them with your stick if you catch them kissing each other behind your house,” the barber teased, as the people roared with laughter.

*

How shall we say goodbye to him? What shall we give him as a keepsake? How can we keep in touch with him? Those were the questions everyone in the town thought and discussed. Some even quarrelled over the order of inviting the general to dinner.

But all of a sudden, the town was overshadowed by the death of Premier Zhou.\fn{1976; Mao Tse-tung died later that same year.} He died at a time when he was most needed. The morning that his death was announced, the general, supported by his wife, suddenly appeared under the camphor tree at the crossroads.

The sun was up, pale and dull. It was extremely cold. The small town looked more bleak and gloomy, silent as death, as if frozen numb by cold and sorrow.

The general, standing in the cutting wind, looked very pale and sallow, his deep-set eyes circled by dark shadows, his face grim. He stood erect, as solid as a bronze statue.

"Comrades!" he shouted in his hoarse voice. It sounded so unfamiliar that many stopped to listen to him. The old man bent down and unzipped his bag with an effort, revealing black mourning arm-bands. Raising his head, he uttered, swallowing hard. "Please …"

There was no need to say any more. People, one by one, took the bands and put them on their arms.

"Whose idea was this?" A hand, its fmgers brown from too much smoking, suddenly touched the shoulder of the general. It was the mayor.

The general was silent.

"We've already told you that no one is going to hold any mourning ceremony. What are you up to?"

The general did not even raise his eyes. Turning round, the furious mayor bellowed at the crowd:

"Don't move, any of you! Take off your arm-bands!"

But no one complied.

"Disobeying, eh? Old tailor, you take it off first!"

The tailor was stunned. Looking at the mourning arm-band and then at the mayor's angry face, he trembled for a second. Before dawn, the general had knocked at his door and given him a roll of black cloth. The bad news had upset him dreadfully, but he had realized at once what his visitor wanted him to do. Together, they sat down to work, grief-stricken. Now this indignant petty official was trying to force him to throw his band on the ground in shame. But it was not merely a matter of an arm-band, but of a heart loyal to the late premier. Could anything be more insulting? Clever, scrupulous and law-abiding, he never did anything harmful to others. Though he had bitter memories of being insulted and humiliated, none was worse than this. He would not swallow it.

He looked up and met the general's burning eyes, which scorched his heart. With quivering lips, he said slowly:

"Is it against the law to mourn Premier Zhou? Do what you like to me. I'm a tailor. I won't die of hunger wherever I go. Sorry, I won't take the arm-band off."

"To mourn Premier Zhou isn't against the law!"

"We won't take our arm-bands off!"

Those docile, unambitious people had gone mad! They stood united in rebellion! The sense of justice, buried in their hearts, had been aroused by a general in exile, shattering their traditional timidness and humility.

Nonplussed, the mayor turned to the general. But the old man did not even glance at him. Calm and concentrating, he seemed to be commanding a battle.

Only his wife knew the mental and physical pain racking his frail body. Despite his strained nerves and aching muscles, he stood erect. She dared not say anything, though her heart was torn.

"You'll pay for this!" snarled the mayor, his face distorted by rage. Then he took to his heels and disappeared round a comer.

Suddenly, the general gasped, short of breath, and collapsed.

A few days later, the barber heard the shocking news that the general would live in the town for the rest of his life as an "honorary" general, because of his new "mistake." This was the first time that the barber kept a piece of news to himself. He had no heart to pass it on.

*

Just like the changeable weather in early spring. the people became depressed once more after their few days of happiness.

Ringworm Hill was again silent. Crowds came to see the general every day, their faces showing no trace of joy.

The general never again left his bed after his collapse. In and out of a coma, he sometimes ran a high temperature, staring at the ceiling with glazed eyes, raving deliriously or muttering away.

One day, suddenly his mind cleared. Scanning each anxious face, which showed momentary delight and surprise, he said with difficulty yet distinctly:

"I … I will not leave you. I'll look after the park and … you must plant trees … repair the roads … dig a canal. You won't drive me away, will you? Good …"

The general died. But his noble character had left an indelible impression on the people.

Then came an order from the authorities: the body of the general was to be cremated on the spot. No notice was to be given to his relatives or mends and there was to be no obituary, no mourning ceremony. It was a stupid decision, but they wanted to have everything under their control.

In fact, no one complied with it.

The people were calm, yet stubborn, and did it their way. A mourning committee was elected, and it decided at once to hold a traditional, grand funeral.

Quickly, the townsfolk went into action.

The oldest citizen contributed his cypress coffin, the only one still remaining in the town; the tailor made the shroud that night; the barber spent a long time giving the general a face-lift. When the corpse was put into the coffin, incense and an oil lamp were lit. The boy whose life the general had saved, and his parents, had tramped thirty li to join the funeral. Dressed in mourning, he served as a filial son. People not only from the town but also from the surrounding villages came to present their wreaths and mourning streamers. The huge wreath sent by the nearby garrison, whose cook had once been scolded by the general, was particularly eye-catching.

The dawn sky was overcast on the day the funeral took place. Heavy clouds hung low over the town and open country. According to his will, the deceased wanted his ashes to be scattered over the hillside. However, the long funeral procession first headed for the town. With the bier at the head, carried by sixteen stalwart young men, people marched through both short streets, which nevertheless took them the whole morning. Finally they stopped under the camphor tree, and many people made memorial speeches expressing their grief, regrets and vows.

But two people were strongly against such a funeral.

One was the general's wife. She argued that her husband had been a Communist and a revolutionary soldier and had asked in his will to be cremated. Before she could finish, people pleaded with tears in their eyes. "The general would understand. He wouldn't complain. We've no objection to his being cremated later. But please let us have our way for the time being.

She closed her eyes with an effort, fighting back her tears.

The other was the mayor, but he could do nothing except peep through his screened window. Furiously, he vowed through clenched teeth, "Wait till I deal with you!"

*

One year later, the Gang of Four fell. It was not the barber or the old tailor, but the mayor and his followers, who were disgraced at last.

When the people began to modernize their small town, they first put the general's wishes into practice.

In the last three months of that year, pits for tree-planting were dug all over Ringworm Hill and some other hills near by; the rubbish dump by the stream was removed; and the two streets were given a tarmac surface. Diverting the stream was already included in the town's water conservancy plan, and the first phase of the project worked on by several thousand people was completed before the Spring Festival.

Everything went well and smoothly but, of course, there were occasional quarrels, too. Once, however, there was a bitter one which shook the whole town.

It was about whether or not they should build a monument in memory of the general under the camphor tree.

The porter and his mates were all for it, while the barber was in two minds. As people argued heatedly, the tailor picked his way into the crowd. Raising his hand, he pointed to the tree and said in a choked voice:

"Look here, what's better than this tree in memory of him? It's old and its bark has peeled, but its roots are still alive. Look at the new twigs and the lush leaves …" He faltered, swallowing hard.

Suddenly the townsfolk felt as if the tree had turned into the general wearing his green uniform buttoned at the collar, with a bright red star on his cap and red insignia on his collar. Leaning on his stick, he stood erect and blinked his eyes from time to time, silently watching the changes in the small town.

Imagining this, they forgot all about their disagreement.

39.160 & 40.21 1. The Nine Palaces 2. The Way Of Heaven—Beginning Of Autumn: Two Short Stories\fn{by Zhang Cheng-zhi (1948-)} Peking, China (M) 14

1

Han Thirty-eight\fn{In the very small villages of a few hundred to a few thousand people, it may happen that, over the centuries, just a single exdtended family has come to live there, the rest dying out or moving away, all peacefully enough; and so commonly the family name will be retained, of course; but the individual surnames will be reduced to numbers, since why bother about such things when everyone can easily remember what a person looks like by an assigned number; which, after all, in a small village of a few hundred or even a few thousand people, is the purpose behind personal identifications in the first place.} ran into that shaggy-haired fellow from the city right when the sun was burning up the desert with its blinding glare. After he got off the tractor, the young fellow had seemed like he wasn't sure where to put his feet, stopping and starting as he walked slowly along. Han Thirty-eight took one look at him and figured that he was planning to find an inn or a guest house among the handful of adobe huts in this tiny hamlet. Without stopping to exchange any greetings with Shaggy Hair, Han Thirty-eight went directly into the fields where he tended to his stand of corn, right there under the harsh, scorching rays of the sun.

That was about three or four days ago.

Today Han Thirty-eight was again working in his cornfield. The time had come, and the drought was so bad, he couldn't wait any longer to water the crops. For some time now he had been worrying about how he'd be able to repair the irrigation ditch. With his gimpy leg he could manage ordinary chores all right, but a big project like this was more than he could handle. While he was working in the field on the edge of the desert, he noticed that the shaggy-haired stranger was also wandering around nearby. Reckon he's found a place to stay, Han Thirty-eight thought to himself. I wonder who he is.

Between the highway to the north and the desert to the south, this was the only settlement for hundreds of kilometers around. Back when he was a lad Han Thirty-eight had once traveled to the next village, a whole day's journey by tractor. If his father hadn't given him a little plot of land so he could find a woman in that village to marry, he probably would have never even set foot outside this patch of red clayey soil. Ever since that trip he had spent all these years right here, standing watch over this field of red earth and looking out on the pale sands of the vast endless desert, day after day after day.

It wasn't just his leg that was lousy but his whole body—scrawny arms, with hardly any muscle on them, that tired after just a little work, joints that would grow stiff and crackle loudly when he tried to straighten up. Holding on to the sturdy cornstalks for support, Han Thirty-eight looked up for a moment and saw that shaggy-haired fellow again. I wonder what he does, he thought to himself.

Just then the fellow looked in his direction and gave him a sheepish grin.

Han Thirty-eight hurriedly cracked a smile in return, then went back to his chores.

The fiery sun continued to beat down on the tiny patch of silted ground at the northern edge of the desert. The clayey soil was so scorched it began to give off a reddish powder that wafted up into the brilliant blue sky. The desert lay all around, empty, arid—nothing but glittering yellow sands as far as the eye could see. With the rocky wasteland on one side and the endless desert on the other, the highway threaded through the landscape like a go-between, though no one quite knew where it led in either direction.

Rubbing his sore and watery eyes, Han Thirty-eight turned away from the scorching desert and resumed the task of leveling clumps of red clay with a shovel, and slowly, slowly, a rectangular plot began to take shape, its sides as straight as a ruler. Ever since he became lame from that childhood illness, he had had to do his chores in this fashion—slowly, unhurriedly. People in the hamlet were always teasing him, especially the tractor operator, Ma Zhuang'er, who would tell him that when he worked in the fields he looked like one of those actors singing a female part in Shaanxi opera. Actually he and Ma Zhuang'er had been friends since they were children, and he knew it was none other than Ma who had the greatest respect for him. Their fields lay right next to each other's on the alluvial plains of red clay, and every autumn Han's tall stands of corn would cut Ma Zhuang'er down to size. Whenever Han Thirty-eight thought about this his heart would be filled with a delicious tingle. Thick and sturdy, his cornstalks would flutter in the breeze like a grove of trees, their big fat leaves rustling loudly in the clouds of sand stirred up by the wind, and when the wind died down the leaves would again be a deep emerald green, almost the color of ink. The sight of it would so cow Ma Zhuang'er that far into the winter he would still be listless and droopy eyed, and he would spend all his time tinkering with his walking tractor until he looked like a regular grease monkey.

It was time to rest for a spell. Reaching for the earthen jug full of water that he had set down on the edge of the field, Han suddenly remembered the shaggy-haired fellow and turned around to look for him. Where did he go? He turned to look at the dirt road leading into the village, but that was empty too, and the only things he saw were the adobe huts and the mud walls around the vegetable patches, all coated with a thin layer of dust, squatting there in a rosy blur under the sun. Where did Shaggy Hair disappear to? Han Thirty-eight felt rather puzzled. In the shade of the cornstalks, he picked up the earthen jar and drank a mouthful, and as the cool water slowly moistened his insides he began to feel refreshed—even his burning eyes felt soothed.

The thing that really worried him was this eye disease of his. It had got to the point where if he so much as opened his eyes and looked around a field that was baking in the sun, drops of salty, bitter tears would run from his eyes in an endless stream. Sometimes all he had to do was glance at the parched red soil and his eyeballs would smart as if from the stings of a needle. Nobody paid any attention to an eye disease, it was not like a gimpy leg that was there for all to see. Actually nobody cared about a gimp either. There was a lame old man in the hamlet who made his living as a trader, leading his camels on foot from village to village in the outland. His woman was left to take care of the crops with the children hanging allover her, and whenever she was upset she would curse that good-for-nothing gimp of hers for not walking any faster to get home. She had every right to curse, Han Thirty-eight thought, having to drag around five or six kids while trying to farm thirty hectares of land, her hard life turning her coarse and dark like a lump of iron.

Picking up the pot again, he drank some more water, and that was when he saw Shaggy Hair. That fellow was going into the desert! He was so astounded that he set the jar down. No doubt about it, the young man was really walking away from him and onto the gleaming white dunes, dragging his dark shadow behind as he trudged along, his feet sinking into the sand with every other step.

How strange, Han Thirty-eight thought to himself as he caressed the clay pot. In this quiet and remote little village they never saw anybody from the outside. To the north, on the other side of the huge and ominous-looking expanse of wasteland, there was a string of Uighur settlements, all connected by the highway. But this was an isolated hamlet, far from the hustle and bustle of caravan traffic. And yet, somehow, for some reason, that stranger not only came here, but was now heading into the desert for a walk. Watching the tiny figure receding in the distance, Han Thirty-eight shook his head disapprovingly. That's an ocean over there, a big ocean, its waves of sand go on and on forever, what are you doing wandering around in there?

But he decided to stop worrying about what the stranger was up to, and, setting the water pitcher down on the ground, went back to smoothing out the soil in his rectangular plot.

On the edge of the gritty, lead-gray wasteland sat a reddish-brown hill of sand and gravel, and it was from this hill that the muddy red water ran down into the desert, ran and ran until, after so many years, it had managed to build up a fan-shaped delta of red clay between the barren gravelly flats and the desert to the south. Han's village was built right on this patch of red earth. Generations ago people began to bring in the clay by the river's edge to build their mud dugouts. As the adobe dried in the sun, it would turn a wretched shade of red that stung the eyes.

But Han Thirty-eight didn't mind this patch of poor, sourish red earth. Working on his little plot, he would wield his shovel evenly, accurately, breaking up the clods of sticky mud until they were spread out in a smooth powdery layer. For as long as anyone could remember, the Hans had made their living off of this patch of red clay and the two precious crops it produced—cornmeal that was white as snow, and big, luscious, golden-yellow apricots. Anyone who wanted to live comfortably in his old age would also have to look to this red earth for a little extra pocket money. In autumn, even old women in their seventies and eighties would hobble into the fields to help snap off the fat and sturdy ears of corn. At times like that, there was not a soul who did not feel happy and content, no one who thought this soil too parched, too sour, who found its burnt-red color irritating to their eyes.

And so Han Thirty-eight always worked diligently and conscientiously. When the fields were being irrigated he would never sneak home to sleep like the others; instead, he would squat in the fields all night long, keeping his crops company as they quenched their thirst. With his shovel he would dam and stop up the ditch here and there, diverting the water smoothly and evenly so that all his crops would get their fill. Right now it was an idle time in the fields, and all around not a soul was to be seen—except for Han, who was already working away quietly and steadily, leveling the ground and straightening the pathways between the fields, trying to get a head start because of his handicap. He was afraid of losing heart, afraid that, with his gimpy leg and his eye disease, he would fall apart while still a young man.

Squinting to avoid the brilliant glare of the merciless sun, Han Thirty-eight looked over at the desert. Beyond the haze of red dust hovering over the fields, he could see a shimmering vapor rising from the flat horizon far in the distance. That shaggy-haired fellow has disappeared, he's really gone into the desert, Han thought.

Dragging his crippled leg into place and steadying himself, he began to prod the ground deftly with his shovel. The soil was so sticky it had to be crumbled up into tiny pieces, and each field had to be laid out in a broad rectangular plot. He harbored a secret plan: next year he wanted to switch all his fields over to wheat. The size of his plots was best for planting wheat, he figured; he would plant twelve rows in each, and there would be room enough to use a walking tractor for the seeding.

How long can Shaggy Hair stay in there before he has to turn back? No matter what that fellow was up to, Han was rather curious about how long he would last in the desert. Have you ever seen an ocean? he asked that fellow silently. Whether or not you have, that's an ocean in front of you. Having lived all his life on this patch of red earth, Han Thirty-eight had never seen an ocean himself. But he did walk into the great desert once upon a time—for three days, on the strength of his whole heart and soul, he had wandered around inside. Three days of walking in the endless waves of sand, and ever since then he'd felt as if he had seen the ocean.

A hot, dry wind began to stir, and the leaves of the cornstalks rustled in reply. Smoldering in the fiery sun, the desert to the south lay stretched out in an unbroken line all the way to the horizon, where, just above the rim, a dazzling bright light shone and glittered.

*

Shaggy Hair finally collapsed next to a stand of red willows. It wasn't so much that he couldn't as that he didn't dare to go on anymore. Everything seemed calm and quiet, but that was only the feeling one had when nightfall first came upon the desert. That feeling belongs to a newborn calf who doesn't know any better, he thought to himself, it is the feeling of an arrogant, mad fool. So quiet—pulling his knapsack over, he laid his head down on it—so quiet that it really makes you feel as though you've left the world behind.

But at the moment waves of terror were washing over him, and every single strand of hair ached—they were all standing on end as if they would never ever lie down again. The night hung black and low over the desert. Forget about the ruins, even these trees might be the only stand around. You're lost, he thought, you don't even know whether you're still walking south. You can't wander around like this, if you want to find the ancient city you've got to know your bearings first of all. You didn't come here to fool around, you came to look for Toghuz Serai.

Actually there had been so many topics to choose from, including quite a few where the fieldwork would have been a snap. And then there were those topics that bore no relation to the real world, no more than a child's game of building something out of toy blocks. More than half of the dissertations in the journals were like that. So what if he found Toghuz Serai?—Shaggy Hair thought, knitting his brows—even that wouldn't be anything really creative. Perhaps it was because the pitch-black night hung so oppressively, because there was no moon or a single star shining through the darkness—whatever the reason, he found himself in a foul mood.

There was a famous ancient city mentioned in the history books, and in the geography texts there was the name of a site. That name was Toghuz Serai, and he had had a hunch that it was none other than the ancient city. But right now there was not even a flicker of phosphorescence in the desert at night—though there should have been, and not only phosphorescence but also huge forests of dead trees, dried-out waterways after the seasonal rivers had changed course and wooden beams sticking out of the sand dunes under which the ancient ruins were buried.

Sure, and buried in the sand there should also be a lovely two-thousand-year-old maiden whose beauty would be unblemished after all these centuries—he began to laugh at himself—her cheeks soft and rosy, her body swathed in silk and satin, she would be buried right next to this stand of red willows, and as soon as you arrive she would spring to her feet and begin to dance. What would be so significant about finding Toghuz Serai? That so-called historical geographic method—what an out-dated, useless crock.

He was exhausted. When he passed by that patch of red earth on the edge of the desert earlier in the day, he should have asked for some water from that young fellow working away silently in the field. He shook his water bottle gently, then ran his fingers through his tousled hair. Half a canteen left, he'd better save it for tomorrow.

Just yesterday he had been barely able to contain his impatience. After three or four days of being holed up in that tiny village of the Han clan his frustration had reached the boiling point. There were only about twenty-odd families in the hamlet, all of them living in those red adobe huts that were dug halfway into the ground. From the map it appeared he had made the right decision to get off at this place: going south from the village one should run right into the fabled Toghuz Serai.

But the villagers all seemed to be in a daze, never managing to say anything without first going "aw-aw-aw" for what seemed like forever—perhaps the fierce sun had gone to their heads. There was neither a village chief nor a headman, and the women, all flustered and jittery, would scamper to shut their doors as soon as they saw him.

When he finally got around to asking about Toghuz Serai it was even more ludicrous. The villagers looked him up and down through squinting eyes, their gaze finally settling on the hair on top of his head. They must be sunstruck, he again concluded, just think, their brains must have been fried by that hot sun, the same fireball that has been roasting the earth until it gives off plumes of dust even on an absolutely windless day.

He turned over, and a stream of sand swished down his collar while another rivulet flowed into his shoes. With a start, Shaggy Hair admonished himself: don't forget you're in the desert, a huge desert that's like a dead sea, so stop woolgathering and watch out for sandstorms. If the wind rises the sand will cover you, layer by layer, until it has fashioned a nice round tomb over you. Then you wouldn't be able to gripe about the Hans' village anymore, then you would have no choice but to look underground for that two-thousand-year-old sleeping beauty.

On his guard now, Shaggy Hair did his best to stay awake, keeping watch in the deathlike silence that covered the desert. But the desert was fast asleep in the deep, dark night. Not a breeze stirred, and the sand dunes stayed where they were, not moving an inch. After midnight a few stars appeared in the sky.

This was the first time since Shaggy Hair took up his present occupation that he felt he was going to fail. Before he joined the museum as a researcher he had been a furnace attendant in the neighborhood factory for quite a few years. Back then he liked to work the night shift, and even when he didn't feel like reading he could always stare at the warm glow from the furnace, where the dense yellow flames would dance brightly in front of his eyes. He was never able to make one of those translucent, pale blue fires—his were always like a wood fire, hot, dry and intense. Anyway there was plenty of coal, and he loved to toss big shovelfuls of coal chips into the furnace and watch his own gigantic shadow flicker in the vast emptiness of the boiler room. What an enormous shadow that was, he thought, lost in a reverie. Back then, when he used to sit in front of the furnace watching that huge shadow dance on the wall, he would always fall into a brown study too.

Now those days of living by the sweat of his brow are gone forever—but in the last few years there has not been a single place, a silent, empty spot all to himself, where he could be lost in his own thoughts. Gone, too, are the mysterious flickering shadow and the incandescent flames that had seared his heart—instead all he has now is this life of running around with the aid of a compass and a map. He didn't want to think about those lovely furnace fires with such wistful longing. When he opened his eyes, however, and looked around at this corner of the great Taklimakhan Desert in which he was almost buried, it seemed to him full of hidden dangers and a secret restlessness—not something that would evoke any fond memories.

Hitching a ride on the walking tractor with that fellow named Ma Zhuang'er didn't turn out to be such an auspicious beginning after all. The village of Han was a genuinely godforsaken little hamlet. It didn't even have a travelers' tavern, though in the end he was allowed to lodge at the elementary school, and he spent the next three or four days trying to find out about Toghuz Serai. But all he learned was there were no camels, no donkeys, no cars or trucks, no means of transportation whatsoever. This village is at the edge of the world, the villagers would say to him. The desert? No one can go in there! As for camels, there are only two, and they've been gone almost a year.

At times like this all the hairs on his head would stand on end. How he came by this trait he had no idea, but whenever he made up his mind to go all out for something his hair would stand up in a tousled, shaggy mess. Back home in the city people often laughed at him because of this. His friends nicknamed him "Exploding Hair." Once, when he was still working in the boiler room, he was chatting with a girl he had just begun to date when she asked, very casually, how come he didn't know a single word of a foreign language, and right then and there his hair exploded. Later, when he ambitiously took the examination to become a researcher at the museum, his hair exploded again. The last time before this that it had exploded was when he tried for a promotion in the museum.

But this time, this time it's not working, he ruminated morosely, this time the smartest thing to do would be to turn back. This is an ocean—he thought to himself as he stared at the dark, foreboding sand hills lurking all around him—a dead ocean. And I don't even have a donkey, let alone a camel or a car. Nothing but a map and a canteen of water—a profound sense of grief came over him—and now the canteen is only half full, while the map, well, it turns out that the real function of a map is to lure you into a dead sea.

The young fellow who drove the walking tractor had told him that a long time ago everyone in the hamlet had been surnamed Han, but that later they began to take as brides young women from the clan of Ma, also ethnic Moslems, and so eventually there came to be two family names in the village—Han and Ma. Actually the roots of the Han clan were different: They were once the Salars of Qinghai province.

The Salars? he thought to himself, why did they come all the way here to the edge of the great Taklimakhan Desert? Surely not because of the crops one can grow on this red clay. He could tell just by looking at the fan delta at the mouth of the muddy red stream that the soil was quite acidic. What a shocking shade of bright red, he thought, it's a miracle they can get any crops to grow here at all. Right on the desert's edge, far away from any traffic and other human habitation, yet standing watch over the entrance to Toghuz Serai—what a strange place this is, this village of the Han clan with its red adobe huts. Why do the maps show it guarding the route to the legendary Toghuz Serai? he wondered.

One thing is for sure, though: this blazing, pitiless sun can definitely wreak havoc with a person's nervous system—perhaps he's already been out in it too long. For the last few days he had been feeling rather sick, as if that dazzling sun had scorched him until he too had fallen ill. Smoothing his tangled hair, he tried his utmost to think calmly, dispassionately, to not let himself be upset by those dark sand dunes crouching menacingly nearby. Maybe he's not sick—after all, that fire raging in the furnace had been damned hot, too.

"But those days are over and done with," he heard himself saying out loud.

Just then another star appeared in the sky.

Shaking his flask, Shaggy Hair listened to the water sloshing around inside and again thought, I should have asked for some water from that young peasant working away so silently on his plot of land. He seemed to remember seeing an earthen jug on the ground next to the fellow, its gray color standing out bright and sharp against the field of red clay. Even under the fierce sun the young peasant had seemed so calm, so good-natured that he had left a profound impression. Watching him wield his shovel steadily, evenly, Shaggy Hair sensed that here was an honest and solid fellow, someone so accustomed to working under the burning sun that not only did he not find it torturous and wearisome, he seemed to actually take a certain pleasure in it—perhaps he was even humming a little tune to himself.

If only I had asked him for some water then, Shaggy Hair thought. He had charged into the desert on a burst of energy and enthusiasm, completely forgetting what anyone—even a schoolgirl in the city whose favorite pastime was munching melon seeds at the movies—could have told him: water is the essence of life in a desert. Well, it's too late now. If he were to press on into the desert with only half a canteen of water he might as well commit suicide right then and there. With the most vicious words he could think of he cursed himself roundly before finally calming down. Then, as he lay peacefully in the sand, he began to feel that, improbable as it seemed, the tension and restlessness were fading from the desert night. He continued to lie there motionlessly, waiting for himself to figure it out.

A corner of the sky began to stir, and as the commotion continued the intense pitch-blackness began to lighten little by little. Then a smooth crack appeared in the darkness, and, almost imperceptibly, a faint white streak emerged.

Straightaway he found his bearings. North, the direction he was facing, was also the way back. Some time during the night his tousled, unruly hair had calmed down somewhat. He smiled ruefully to himself. Actually you knew this would happen when you started out, that's why you only brought one container of water. You knew all along that with the likes of you, any attempt to find the ancient city of Toghuz Serai in the vast desert was doomed to failure.

He got up and started on the road back, his head hanging low, his feet trudging through the soft, loosely-packed sand. To his right, the ribbon of early morning light was beginning to spread.

*

Han Thirty-eight came to the fields again, leaning on his spade as he walked slowly along. The next task was repairing the irrigation ditch—it was really in terrible shape. When he went to examine the trench that twisted and turned as it snaked from the river to his fields, he had found it overgrown with weeds and so full of gaps that water leaked from it all along the way, turning the clayey soil on both sides a sickening shade of bright red. I've got to dig it out again, Han Thirty-eight mused as he leaned on his spade. He'd heard tell that this old ditch was dug by their ancestors many generations ago, but now it just looked like a long, long worm with blood trickling out from allover its body. Not like the big trench, the one that had just been dug and was lined with gray-green cement, where the water gushing in from the river would swirl around and splash up in the air in a crystal-clear spray—what a beautiful sight, enough to make anyone feel all refreshed and cool inside.

But it's only the old gully that comes close to my land, Han Thirty-eight thought to himself as he knitted his brows. The big cement ditch was too far away to irrigate his fields. That Ma Zhuang'er is something else, so slick it's like he has slathered himself from head to toe with rapeseed oil soap. At the thought of Ma Zhuang'er he began to feel irritated and anxious. Today at lunch he had wolfed down his food without enjoying it one bit and then had rushed right back to the fields. Now, slowly sitting down on an embankment between two plots, he stared blankly at his beautiful strips of cropland and the battered old ditch, so dilapidated and cracked it was like a muddy rut. Han Thirty-eight turned his face away abruptly, he couldn't bear to look at it any longer. It seemed to him that the sun was purposely beating down on that old ditch to make it even more dried out and cracked, just to spite him. Those stinging drops of tears began to ooze out of his eyes again.

Scouring and splashing against its muddy banks, the river flowed in a southerly direction until it seeped into the dry, hazy desert. Though its channel was narrow the long-running stream had never once dried up. Year after year it would trickle through the fields and quench the thirst of the parched corn seedlings, pushing before it the silt it brought down from the mountain until, at the edge of the desert, it ran right up against the line of gleaming yellow dunes, which stopped the advance of the moist red clay and forced it to spread out like a fan. Sitting on the raised border of his field, Han Thirty-eight looked into the distance at this red fan made from layer upon layer of silt. Reckon it was thanks to this piece of land that our hamlet had come to be in the first place, he thought, and then had managed, by hanging on to this bit of earth, to get a firm foothold on the edge of the desert.

He glanced back at his tiny village. The adobe huts baking under the sun were all dusted with a layer of dull red ocher. This most certainly is not that place called The Nine Palaces, the city of glazed blue tiles inlaid with emerald and jade that the old folk were always talking about. Nothing here but barren flats of gravel and a huge desert, except for Allah's little patch of red day and stream of muddy water. Our forefathers sure had gumption, he marveled to himself, they took root here on this poor barren soil in spite of everything.

Picking up his spade, he got onto his feet and walked over to the ditch. In the distance, barely visible through a shimmering vapor rising from the ground, the entire village appeared to have taken on a pale reddish tint, while a blurrily incandescent sun hung motionless above the desert, sending down wave upon wave of infernal heat onto this mortal earth.

Before he began digging, Han Thirty-eight cast his eyes over the lay of the ditch and then drove the sharp edge of his spade into the roots underneath a clump of weeds. Hoisting his good leg, he planted it on the shoulder of the spade and carefully balanced himself so that when he pushed down on the spade, his gimpy leg would be barely touching the ground. Then he gave a low grunt as he scooped up a big lump of clay with the roots still sticking out of it, and, making use of the momentum, swung the burnished spade handle up across his knees and dumped the heavy clod of mud onto a gap in the side of the ditch. Immediately, as the moisture evaporated rapidly from the damp clay, the deep red color began to fade from its exterior, and a whitish crust spread over the beveled gouge marks left by the spade.

Without a pause Han Thirty-eight heaped another spadeful next to the first and watched as the two lumps of soft mud settled into each other. Taking care to nurse his gimpy leg, he tossed pile after pile of heavy wet clay onto the clefts in the ditch, panting heavily as he worked, his arms straining until every muscle was stretched taut. Little by little, a length of ditch that had been an eyesore began to improve in appearance as the gaps in its sides, which had looked like missing teeth, became filled and smoothed out with clay.

Pretty soon the beads of perspiration on his brow turned into salty rivulets that washed over his sore and swollen eyes. His damp cheeks felt feverish and tight, as if a fieriness within were being suppressed and sealed in by his skin. But Han Thirty-eight paid no attention to any of this and continued to wield his spade evenly, serenely. Chunk after chunk of red mud squeaked as it was uprooted, then lay meekly on the embankment above the ditch. He could feel his sweat-soaked cotton tunic being dried by the sun, then becoming drenched again with the perspiration that welled up continuously. But he didn't mind the wear and tear on his clothes—besides, for a peasant a worn tunic was mostly a means of warding off the sun.

The important thing was to repair this old ditch. Every other family in the village would be able to irrigate their crops with water from the new cement ditch except for him and Ma Zhuang'er—their fields were too far away. Trying to get out of his share of the work, Ma Zhuang'er had told him that he had to drive his tractor to Hotan tomorrow, and even took the tractor apart right then and there and began to work on its grimy, oily parts like a grease monkey. Han Thirty-eight couldn't help laughing at this—ever since they were kids he'd been wise to Ma Zhuang'er's tricks. His cornfields were behind Ma Zhuang'er's, and were the last to be reached by the old ditch. Ma Zhuang'er knew very well that whoever was at the end of the line would have to make sure that the sections of the ditch before his were also in good repair, otherwise he wouldn't get any water at all. That lazy rat, Han Thirty-eight thought diffidently, as soon as I finish repairing the ditch all by myself and bring in the water he'll show up again, and then all he'd have to do is scratch an opening somewhere and there'd be water for his crops.

It was getting late. Hanging low in the western sky, the sun cast its slanting rays over the wide open desert, and the contours of the undulating dunes were etched in stark outlines of light and shadow. The village, a long stretch of dullish red, was still enveloped within the shimmering vapor rising from the ground. Squinting a little through his sore and swollen eyes, Han Thirty-eight continued to dig away at the ditch, steadily, single-mindedly, stopping only to grab the earthen jar for a drink of water. Turns out it's no big deal that Ma Zhuang'er has sneaked off to Hotan, he thought to himself. When he went to talk things over with Ma Zhuang'er last night he had been quite upset. Actually you were worried that with your gimpy leg you wouldn't be able to do the job alone, and you were hoping Ma Zhuang'er would lend you a hand.

At the thought of this, Han Thirty-eight chuckled out loud. How ridiculous he had been the night before! The important thing was not to lose heart.

He finished filling in another gap, and began to walk slowly along the bottom of the ditch. Even if you're in a hopeless situation, as long as you don't lose heart you'll find a way out. You're still a young man, no need to worrying yet about the eye infection and the bad leg.

According to the stories told by the old folk, the Han clan hadn't always been part of the Hui Moslems. They were originally Salars from the twelve villages of Xunhua, in Qinghai province. Then, in one of the many persecutions during those times, troops sent by the Manchu emperor swept through the villages killing everyone in sight. A few families managed to escape this massacre, and, gritting their teeth, crawled out of the piles of dead bodies and fled along the edge of the Great Desert until—thousands of miles later—they arrived here. Eventually they became assimilated into the Huis, but at least those few families did not die out.

You can't lose heart, that's all, Han Thirty-eight thought to himself as each motion of the spade became more and more vigorous. It's no easy thing trying to make a living: digging a ditch, building a house, finding a wo-man—none of it is easy. But just hold steady, one step at a time, first switch your cornfields over to wheat, then you can send for the woman, and when you've got some money, maybe you can even build some brick houses with tile roofs right here on this red earth.

Lost in his solitary reverie, Han Thirty-eight continued to work evenly, rhythmically, digging up clod after clod of the sticky mud at the bottom of the ditch until twilight began to settle in all around him and smoke was beginning to rise from those blurry huts far in the distance. Above the desert, the setting sun—having turned a dusky red—seemed much more gentle now, and the dark green leaves on the cornstalks were glistening with a golden yellow light.

Just as Han Thirty-eight picked up the jar for another drink of water, he was again stunned by what he saw: there in the twilight, on the undulating, dark brown horizon of the desert was a human figure. It was only after he had searched his brains for some time that he remembered the shaggy-haired stranger who had walked into the desert around noon yesterday, all by himself. Under the setting sun, the desert lay stretched out to the south in gentle crests of soft round curves, and the slopes that were still in the light appeared smooth and clean, with not a single speck of impurity in sight. Squiggling along on the sand dune directly facing him, the diminutive figure stood out in sharp relief, looking like a tiny insect.

It's him! Han Thirty-eight thought in surprise. Yesterday that fellow walked into the desert without a word to anyone, and by now he's been in there almost two days and one night. It's time he came back, he must be so thirsty even his skin is burnt. What are you looking for in there? That's an ocean, I tell you, one that neither god nor man can go across. Han Thirty-eight gave the earthen jar a little shake: it was still half full with clear, cool water. That time I was even more hotheaded than you—three whole days and three whole nights I stayed in there.

He began to reminisce about something that had happened far in the past, something that now seemed as vague and hazy as if it had taken place in another life. He had no idea what that shaggy-haired fellow from the city did for a living, but he reckoned that the guy must have a lot of gumption. Well, you can't let that gumption get out of hand though. In silence he rubbed his fingers back and forth over the earthen jar, then set it down again in the shade of the cornstalks before going back to the ditch to work some more in the cool of the evening dragging his gimpy leg as he went. A soft warm breeze wafted slowly by, brushing lightly against his cheeks and giving him a pleasant feeling inside.

Bracing himself on his good leg, Han Thirty-eight bent forward from the waist and pressed the weight of his whole torso onto the sharp edge of the spade, his hands tightly gripping the slippery handle. With a squishing noise the spade sliced through the roots of the weeds and thrust straight down into the sticky mud. The faint but unmistakable sensations of wet earth sticking to the back of the spade and of roots being chopped by the blade traveled up to him through the smooth wooden handle. Han Thirty-eight continued to work silently, the evening breeze penetrating his tattered, sweat-stained tunic to caress the muscles on his chest.

I'll save that half jar of water for that stranger, he thought to himself, he must be all dried out and burnt. Again a remote feeling of blistering thirst wandered through his memory. What people are capable of if they have that strength of heart, that gumption, he mused as he panted for breath. Legend had it that when their forefathers escaped from Qinghai they suffered untold miseries and hardships along the way, but they kept their minds on Allah and on a place called the Nine Palaces. He remembered listening to his grandfather tell of the place: an unsullied land, with green grass that covered it like a carpet, and nine palaces of glazed blue tile standing in a row.

Vigorously tossing the last spadeful of red clay onto the side of the ditch, Han Thirty-eight turned around for a look. Before his eyes was a trim and tidy length of ditch, the newly-dug channel deep and even, the spine arrow-straight, the walls filled and sealed tightly with mud. Just a half day's worth of work and I've already covered so much ground, he thought with satisfaction as he panted heavily. Another three or four days and I can irrigate my crops, and Ma Zhuang'er—well, he could almost see Ma Zhuang'er chortling as he comes up and scrapes an opening in the ditch to water his own land.

Han Thirty-eight chuckled and shook his head. That was the way Ma Zhuang'er was; he'd known him well ever since they played together as kids, and by now he was completely used to it.

He looked over at the desert, where the perfectly round disk of the sun was now nestled against the horizon. Below it the earth was a dark expanse through which a layer of deep red was still visible. The waves of sand holding up the setting sun seemed to have solidified, looking like an ocean that had gone to sleep. The tiny figure was still wiggling along, and now Han Thirty-eight could see that the fellow was walking stiffly right in his direction.

He sat down in the shade and felt around with his fingers for the water jar. I'll wait till that shaggy-haired fellow has had a drink of this cool water before I go. It doesn't matter if I get home a little late. He must be dying of thirst, Han thought, he was too hot-headed, too carried away with his heart's desire. Even our ancestors, those staunch and unyielding folk, in the end even they couldn't find those nine palaces of glazed blue tile and green jade, even they had to endure their grief and the injustices against them in silence and settle down on this bank of red clay.

He let out a sigh as he tore off a leaf from a cornstalk and began to wipe off the mud sticking to his spade. The figure shambling out of the desert was drawing closer and closer.

*

Kicking the sand that challenged him at every step, Shaggy Hair gritted his teeth and stumbled along as his feet kept sinking into the soft sand. There was no way he could walk any faster. He had tried vigorously running a few steps, but he ended up wallowing in sand up to his knees. So he went back to the "camel step": lifting up the rear foot gingerly and taking as big a step as you can. And the desert went back to that lazy, monotonous rustling noise, as if it had all the time in the world to torment him. He scratched his head and glared balefully at this yellowish, hazy, endless trap. Right away the desert became silent and still, as if it were sneering maliciously at him. At first, perhaps helped along by the cool of the early morning, Shaggy Hair had walked in a straight line, plowing through dunes and hollows alike, forging ahead in long, swift strides, and in the semidarkness the desert had seemed to step aside and retreat before him, hurriedly opening itself up to expose its wide flat underbelly.

And Shaggy Hair had seemed to hear the desert swishing and whispering tauntingly under his feet: So you think you won, so you think you're some hero! When he took out his canteen for a drink of water, the desert had snickered behind his back, and when he screwed the cap back onto the bottle a gust of wind toyed with the flowing sand and hissed: have some more, drink it all up! And again he heard the sand screeching and laughing shrilly at him. But once the sun was high up in the sky, the desert gradually erased the insidious look on its face and, abandoning all restraint, began to torment him openly, ruthlessly.

Within the first hour after the sun became broiling hot, he was already feeling as if every last drop of moisture in his body had been sucked dry by those shiny golden needle-like rays of the sun. His skin felt like a parched and charred sack, drawn so tightly and painfully over his face and hands that he thought it would crack open at any minute. In that same hour he began to lick his blistering lips strenuously and repeatedly, but the desert, turning violent and wild under the fierce sun, was absolutely merciless as it seared his lips and left them encrusted with a layer of dried blood. Then, at about ten o'clock in the morning, a dry wind arose and swirled around him, leaving his mouth and throat so parched he couldn't even make a sound.

When he fell headlong into the sand, he clutched his water bottle for dear life.

No, I can't drink any now, I've got to save some for the afternoon, he told himself. He knew that in the afternoon it would be even more unbearable, but the desert was so delighted it began to shriek with joy, violently hurling sand and grit allover his body while screaming at the top of its voice:

Drink it, drink it all up!

But Shaggy Hair knew very well that this was just an ordeal he had to go through. The desert could not make him lose his bearings: each time the sun rose a little in the sky he would anxiously check his directions again. Using his watch, his compass and the sun, he was absolutely sure that he was walking step by step toward a green oasis, or perhaps he should say a red oasis, thinking about that peaceful patch of red clay. He had merely penetrated the outskirts of the desert, and even from this periphery he was now beating a retreat.

With cool detachment he trudged on, stubbornly saving the half bottle of water for the afternoon. Against the swirling yellow sands that obliterated heaven and earth as they assaulted him head on, against the blistering sun that burned him with its cruel flames—he fought back with all his strength, all the while laughing coldly at himself. He felt an indescribable sorrow. First the retreat, then this life and death struggle even after his defeat—all this filled him with a deep sadness.

Actually there's no real danger, he told himself, I'm sure I can get out of the desert and back to that red adobe village before it grows dark. Stumbling with almost every step, he trudged wearily through the sand, ignoring his cracked lips and his burning eyes, oblivious to the incandescent disk above his head. Toghuz Serai, Toghuz Serai, he thought to himself despairingly, I will never be able to find you now. After the two days he had just spent in it he was finally beginning to understand the desert, even as his eyes, burnt by the glare from the glittering yellow sands, had lost all feeling in them. I will never be able to reach Toghuz Serai, he repeated over and over to himself as he walked slowly along, mechanically moving his legs one in front of the other.

He remembered a magazine that he had once come across. In it was an elegantly written article, amply illustrated with photographs and charts, about the French scientist Teilhard de Chardin's expeditions in China.\fn{Pierre Teilhard de Chardin (1881-1955), French Roman Catholic priest, geologist, palentologist, and philosopher-theologian, one of the participants in the discovery of Peking Man.} The photographs showed several strange-looking vehicles, specially built for archaeological fieldwork, crawling across a mountain pass in Xinjiang province and lumbering beneath Dongsipailou, one of the decorated archways in old Peking. The mountain pass was full of jagged, grotesque-looking rocks; the antique archway was ornate and refined looking.

Angrily, Shaggy Hair bit his still-bleeding lips. What a first-rate vehicle that was! It had nonskid tires in front, caterpillar treads over its double wheels in the rear, and hanging from its front bumper there was even a metal pulverizer. It was a tank, an iron bear with a steamroller between its teeth, it was a monster. What was there to be afraid of if you were equipped with that? As for me, in this modern day and age almost a hundred years after Teilhard de Chardin, I can't even find a little donkey!

Clenching his teeth furiously, he continued to plod along, occasionally falling into deep sandpits, leaving behind him a zigzagging pathway amid the sands. The clumsy shapes of those strange field vehicles lingered for a long time in his mind: He could see them rumbling past with their road rollers lifted high up in the air, while in the background was the archway at Dongsipailou in turn-of-the-century Peking.

He had shown the magazine to the gray hairs at the museum, enthusiastically suggesting that the museum should also have a few of these vehicles specially made for their research. He would never forget the look the grayhairs gave him as they took in his shaggy hair, a look that even seemed to warn him not to forget his past as a furnace attendant. That's right—he told himself, wearily lifting his sand-filled shoes, his heart filled with a heavy sadness— made a mistake, you'e asking for the impossible.

By the time the sun began its descent in the west and the air had turned a little cooler, he was feeling as though he would soon collapse under the weight of this profound pessimism. Several times he wondered whether he had become sick from the relentless torture by the cruel desert and the harsh sun. Retreat, just beat a thorough, clear-cut retreat. The more expert, the more knowledgeable one was about maps and fieldwork, the more clearly one would see that this was the only way. In the last few years, ever since he started working at the museum, he had spent a lot of time doing research in the field, and underneath that thatch of exploding hair there was actually a cool head. He knew the way only too well. Under these circumstances—he thought to himself, angrily, bitterly—the only person who wouldn't know when to quit would be one of those silly girls who let their fantasies run wild, imagining herself to be the damsel in some romantic novel, inspiring her knight in shining armor to ever more daring feats.

All of a sudden he thought of his girlfriend. What would she say? he wondered. Most likely she'll send me a telegram of encouragement. Actually this savage and hideous desert may well turn out to be the one who really understands me. It's true—he smiled to himself, forcing his lips apart with great difficulty—the desert is the only one that really understands everything.

The long unbroken line of dunes glimmered in the twilight as deep shadows spread across the dark side of the slopes. Suddenly Shaggy Hair had a feeling that these dunes were the last ones he would have to cross. See how the ridge stands there like a thin, flimsy screen, he thought, its every undulation making it seem not only frail but —he knitted his brows as he tried to fathom the sandy ridge straight ahead—gentle as well. See how its color has also turned weak and flabby, no longer dazzling and irritating to the eye, see how it's looking at me quietly, thoughtfully.

Oh, hell, this must be a genuine case of desert sickness, he thought. He just couldn't stand it any more, all these crazy, absurd ideas of his, one after another: now finding fault with his girlfriend, now looking upon this evil desert as his closest friend, the only one who truly understood and appreciated him. I must be sick, he thought. All this has been such a blow, it must have been too much for me, and now I am sick.

When Shaggy Hair reached the crest of that line of dunes lying across his path, he breathed a sigh of relief. It was just as he expected. See, the patch of red soil was right there in front of him. The distant hills straight ahead were already enshrouded in the evening haze, but he could still make out a gash that came zigzagging down from the mist and ended in a little motley patch of red and brown soil shaped like a fan. That's the river, those are the croplands, and over there is the hamlet of the clan of Han, he whispered to himself, identifying each in turn.

In the fading light of day he struggled to bestir himself, and then began to walk toward the settlement. The ground, suddenly turned hard and rough, rubbed painfully against his heels. He had no wish to turn his head, no wish to take another look at the desert.

*

Han Thirty-eight felt rather pleased as he watched Shaggy Hair gulp down the water. The two of them had not exchanged a single word, not even after the fellow had finished drinking all the water in the earthen jar, not even after his breathing had returned to normal and he had had plenty of time to stare into space, lost in his own thoughts. By now exhaustion had crept over every part of Han Thirty-eight's body-even his eyeballs ached and throbbed. He had only been waiting here for Shaggy Hair, and now that he had given him the jug of water, there was nothing else Han wanted to say.

Shaggy Hair sat in a corner of the cornfield and stared rather ruefully at the jar, almost as if he were in a trance. His face looked like it had been smeared with greasepaint—it was shiny and red, and the skin over his cheekbones was burnt and peeling. Without a word this peasant had given him some cool water to drink, which took him a little by surprise.

Han Thirty-eight was waiting quietly for this stranger to begin talking. Around the villagers he was known for keeping to himself, for never being the one to strike up a conversation. It was getting dark now. This was such a small village that he felt obliged to invite this young fellow to come home with him for dinner and to spend the night. The dull red sun was barely peeping above the rim of the sand dunes, and the Taklimakhan Desert, after having glittered brightly the whole day long, was already a dark shadowy expanse. The corn leaves began to rustle noisily as the first cool breeze of evening fluttered by. Some grains of sand flew against Han Thirty-eight's iron spade and struck with a few soft, metallic notes.

It was time to go home, Han Thirty-eight decided. Just then Shaggy Hair spoke:

"Mister, are you going back to the village?"

"Uh-huh, just about. And you, sir?" Han Thirty-eight asked.

Staggering a little, Shaggy Hair got onto his feet.

"Let's go," he said, as, with some effort, he hoisted his knapsack to make it hang more comfortably from his back. Exhausted as he was, he was all the more touched by the friendly manner of this peasant, and rather hoped he could stay in his company for a little while.

"Don't call me sir," he said. "You saw me coming out of that desert?"

"I saw you when you went in yesterday," Han Thirty-eight answered. "You've had a hard time these last two days," he said, looking sympathetically at Shaggy Hair's swollen eyes and blood-encrusted lips. "It's not easy to be out on the road. Come home with me, have some soup and noodles with us."

Shaggy Hair looked gratefully at the peasant's simple and honest face. He made an effort to fight off his weariness.

"That over there," he said, pointing at the desert with his chin, "have you ever been inside?"

To his surprise, the peasant nodded in reply.

"Went in there once for three days. But then I couldn't take it anymore, I had to come back out. It's wicked in there, just an ocean of sand, a dead ocean"—he paused—"and so I had to turn back."

Stopping in his tracks, Shaggy Hair stared intently at Han Thirty- eight as he asked:

"In the desert, is there a place called Toghuz Serai?"

Han Thirty-eight looked at him blankly.

"Never heard of it."

"In this village here, can I find a—a camel or a donkey?"

"No"

"A car? A tractor? Anything that can go in the desert?"

"No. Why do you want to go into the desert?" Han Thirty-eight asked innocently, gesturing with his upturned palms.

Becoming more and more agitated, Shaggy Hair almost shouted:

"Then do you have any bus service? Any kind of transportation? How do people get around?"

His guileless eyes wide open, Han Thirty-eight answered:

"No, no transportation." Then, after some thought, he added:

“There’s only Ma Zhuang’er’s walking tractor. He got that year before last. But he has to take it on a long trip, he told me that yesterday, said he has to take his tractor to Hotan tomorrow. He’s home today cleaning and oiling the parts, most likely he’s really going to Hotan tomorrow. Once he goes, there won’t be any transportation in the village at all.”

Han Thirty-eight gave Shaggy Hair the whole story. Then all of a sudden he remembered something:

“Wait, we have camels. Old Gimpy Leg has camels.”

Shaggy Hair grabbed him by the arm:

“Camels?!”

“Two of them,” Han Thirty-eight answered. “Old Gimpy Leg took them with him last year when he left, we haven’t seen any of them since. They’ve gone to Ningxia, I hear, Old Gimpy’s kinfolk are in Ningxia.”

Shaggy Hair walked along in silence, his head hanging low. By now the sun had already been swallowed up by the vast desert lying dimly to one side of them, and on the horizon nothing was left but a swath of fiery red clouds. The desert seems to be saying goodbye to me, he thought, or maybe it’s just taunting me. Well, there’s nothing more I can do. Didn’t you hear this peasant say, I have to turn back.

The village was drawing nearer. The low-hanging rooftops of reddish clay hugged the ground solidly, while wisps of white smoke from cooking fires floated among the dark green trees. What an interesting village, he thought to himself—hiding in the middle of nowhere, far away from any traffic route, hanging on for dear life to this patch of red earth firmly rooted at the desert’s edge. Well, it may be humiliating to turn back, but even that’s not easy, they don’t have any transportation at all in this village.

Han Thirty-eight walked alongside the fellow from the city, his spade hoisted over one shoulder. Somehow he began thinking back to his own journey into the desert. He was only a teenager then, brash and high-spirited. The legend told by the old folk was like a flame that scorched and licked at his heart. How terrible had been the atrocity his ancestors suffered, how deep their sorrow! It was said that in the prefecture of Xunhua the blood of the dead flowed like a river. The emperor had decreed that the Han clan was to be wiped out completely, and there was no one left to turn to, no place on earth where they could pour out their troubles and hope to find justice.

So they kept their grief to themselves and kept on walking, they would go to a place called the Nine Palaces, an unsullied paradise where, on a carpet of green grass, they would find nine palaces of blue glazed tiles and green jade, standing all in a row. But, the old folk said, when their ancestors reached this patch of red earth they found this ocean of sand lying across their path. Again and again they charged at it, but each time they failed, and no one who went into the dead ocean came back alive. Finally their ancestors plowed up the red clay and sowed their seeds in the furrows, built their holes in the ground of red adobe bricks, and, burying their heart’s desire, squatted here on the edge of the desert. As time went on they forgot their native dialect, and then, as they began marrying girls from the clan of Ma, they gradually became part of the Hui nationality. In the end the clan called the Salars disappeared, and in its place was the village of the Hans. He was just a teenager, Han Thirty-eight remembered, when, his heart burning from this story he had been hearing ever since he was a kid, he walked right into the desert carrying nothing more than a leather sack full of water. That was many years ago now, he thought to himself—back then the old ditch was still wide and deep, back then it didn’t need any repairing at all.

They had arrived at the door to his house. Putting down the spade, Han Thirty-eight pushed the door open for his guest and said:

"Go in, have some hot noodles in vinegar broth, it will really quench your thirst. Go on, and give me your knapsack.”

Inside, Shaggy Hair scooped some water into a basin and washed his face while Han Thirty-eight’s mother and younger sister bustled about in the courtyard. Then, after Shaggy Hair had taken a seat at the adobe table in the yard and guzzled down a bowl of salted tea, Han Thirty-eight walked over to him slowly—carefully favoring his crippled leg—with a big steaming bowl in his slightly tremulous hands.

“Eat, eat, there’s more when you finish this. And then you’ll bed down right here. After all, you’ve been in the desert, you must be dead tired,” he said cheerfully as he set down the bowl of noodles and vinegar soup on the table in front of Shaggy Hair. Then, folding his arms, he stood on one side as he waited on his guest, his eyes wide with attentiveness and concern.

Shaggy Hair felt rather embarrassed. What a simple, honest fellow, he thought to himself, he hasn’t even asked me who I am and where I’m from.

“I am an archaeological researcher at a museum, I came here to do some field work,” he said, by way of self-introduction. “Sorry to have troubled you like this. Look at me, what a good-for-nothing I am, the first thing I do is sit down and eat. I didn’t even accomplish what I came here for, and now all I do is sit at the table and eat,” he said as he looked at the big steaming bowl in front of him.

Han Thirty-eight picked up the chopsticks and presented them to him with both hands.

"You've had a hard time, now please make yourself at home. This work you talk about, do you have to go into the desert to do it?"

"I'm looking for an ancient ruin called Toghuz Serai," Shaggy Hair explained, then, pausing to gulp down some hot broth, he added:

"'Toghuz Serai," don't you know what that means? It's Uighur for 'the nine castles.'"

"The nine palaces?" Han Thirty-eight cried out in surprise.

"That's right, But I wasn't up to the job, I didn't find it."

Suddenly Shaggy Hair remembered that huge shadow he used to see when he tended the furnace, That shadow was very big, he thought, and I was fooled by it.

Of course you couldn't find them, Han Thirty-eight thought, even our ancestors didn't, and there were none so brave as they, I carried a sheepskin pouch full of water, went into in the desert for three whole days, and I didn't find anything either. Well, well—he thought to himself as he looked closely at this shaggy-haired stranger covered with the dust of his travels—so this young fellow came here to look for the Nine Palaces. Shaggy Hair was busily wolfing down his food. This fellow is one of us, Han Thirty-eight thought as he stared at the head of tousled hair. No doubt about it, anyone who remembers the Nine Palaces must be one of us.

"Cheer up, Take your time, don't eat so fast. Want some hot peppers?"

Han Thirty-eight pushed the jar of hot pepper oil toward his guest.

"That place, Allah has hidden it, and we can't find it anymore. Here, have some peppers."

Sweating profusely, Shaggy Hair put away bowl after bowl of noodles until, so full he couldn't stuff another morsel into his belly, he waved his hands wearily and mumbled:

"Can't find it, that's right, nothing I can do. Why don't I go back, tomorrow I'll go back."

Han Thirty-eight hastened to remind him:

"The only way you can do that is to hitch a ride on Ma Zhuang'er's tractor. He's going to Hotan tomorrow on his tractor."

As he said this, Han became a little worried.

"Let me go talk to him, he'll do what I say. Otherwise, once Ma Zhuang'er leaves on his tractor tomorrow, there'll be no way to get out of here."

Shaggy Hair was silent for a long while. Finally he said:

"Let's go find Ma Zhuang'er."

Night had already fallen when the two of them walked out of the courtyard behind the low adobe wall. The sky above the little village was perfectly clear, as if nothing—no clouds, no water vapor, nothing—separated the village below from the brilliant black sky studded with clusters of sparkling silvery stars. Sloping this way and that, the adobe huts squatted silently as here and there an oil lamp cast a flickering orange-yellow light. To the south was a dark, shadowy expanse where nothing at all could be seen, though one could feel the desert's deep breathing on the night wind.

Han Thirty-eight limped along as he led Shaggy Hair past one compound after another, going ever deeper into the village.

Now and then a few grains of fine sand caught up in the breeze flicked against them as they walked.

2

Beginning of Autumn 1990 was a very mysterious day. Year after year, at the end of spring the people of Peking have come to wait in terror for the onslaught of summer—stewing every single day, until this year when they stewed every single moment. The cruel, incessant Peking summer had quite simply reached its extreme.

Time dragged hour upon hour—impossible to read, impossible to sit at a table. Not only in the broad daylight; the nights were also indescribably stifling. Burning in the pitch blackness was truly fearsome.

Sometimes I would sit by myself in this black heat, like a cinder in a stove not long since put out. Burning in my heart, a red red spark, constantly irritating me. Only as if everything depended upon it could one even begin to contend with this enormous dark heat. Sitting for ages in confrontation with it, sweat streaming down my back, conscious of the cold smile on my face.

In the few hours after dawn the world sinks once again into the brutal fry-roast. Rain is useless: running along the road your eyes see the rain drops as hot water hitting the ground. Under a raincoat, sweat seeps through your shirt. God knows why people still wear raincoats.

Could anyone ever fully understand our cruel summers? Foreigners on the street, faces full of ignorance, covered in perspiration.

The taste of getting through the summer; Chinese people cannot describe it.

Later, even hotter, even more scorching, bit by bit I lose hope. If the heat persists even I will begin to doubt the Way of Heaven.

*

But that day was Beginning of Autumn. In the morning I walked imperviously into the fry-roast, my mind filled memories of sunny days in summer. On the wide steppes of Inner Mongolia the ultra-violet rays of summer were like paint, in one afternoon they could stain your cheeks red. One year when we were out on the grass, a student had returned from Peking, everyone had laughed; his little white face among a crowd of round red faces. The next day his face was red too. From then on I understood how the ultra-violet could burn.

But the ultra-violet rays thar burn skin are nothing like the summer days in Peking. The summer heat in Peking is repulsive, irritating, shameful, fills you with hate, though you don’t know what for. I was thinking about this as I walked into the dazzling sunlight, my mind a little shut off, weakened a little by the tiresome heat. So, as the moment drew closer I wasn’t paying very much attention. I hadn’t held much store by the calendrical divisions for some time, and couldn’t believe that Beginning of Autumn would ever come at the end of this Peking summer. I was derermined to hold out against this noxious day. There is an ancient poem: Until the end of time I will stay with you. I could really appreciate its poetry now. I should have written that moment down as it happened, but there was not the slightest need to record anything. It was printed on every calendar hanging in every home: August 8th 1990, “Beginning of Autumn.” But I hadn’t any idea it was coming. I wasn’t awaiting it in any way, hadn’t imagined the pleasure it would bring. In the long age of the fry-stew, foresight and intelligence, even imagination, had all wilted.

The morning of fire had passed.

Even at midday I had no notion of it. Just madly doing what I like doing best. It’s the only way of getting through life: to grasp firmly in the depths and testify with all one’s might. In the horrific sweltering heat everything assumed a ruthlessness, and a beauty which is hard to describe. This act was a religious ritual for me, body and soul were cleansed, transparent, it even felt as if life was exhausted.

As I walked into the afternoon sunlight I saw people’s shadows bending. I felt the sense of victory sweep over my face. Life has triumphed again, I thought to myself, here where one lives as a warrior.

The afternoon sunlight began to blaze with color, so beautiful one forgot the ruthlessness; there was almost the illusion of a thread of gentleness. As if a railway signalman in the middle of the Gobi desert suddenly heard behind him a soft, gentle sound like the beckoning voice of woman. Even if it was like that … at that moment I was not aware of it.

*

Suddenly, the moment I felt the “cool freshness” I stopped dead. The soft, gentle call seeped slowly, gently out, and in an instant—unimaginable—the unending stream of sweat pouring down my back dried. I looked around in surprise, and found that the people on the street—the people of Peking were all looking around too. Then, although there was no wind, the leaves of the lush trees quivered high up in the sky, a message passing between the crossing branches. I could have shouted out loud, everything was being taken by surprise, and in that one second the fresh air filled heaven, earth and the human world.

I all but wept. The cruel, age-long grilling really could come to an end, Beginning of Autumn was a reality. I was still for a moment, then the freshness in the sky began to move, swiftly. Like an enormous, formless hand pressing down a formless Way-of-Heaven-switch, sending down compassion and fairness, together with the cool freshness, into this cruel hard world. The blue sky suddenly lost that dazzling brightness, and was pure blue now; and the wind rose higher. Even the leaves on the tips of the branches were deep in contemplation, but the gushing cool freshness came filling the sky and land, and in this one moment all the cruel heat was wiped out.

I stood in the middle of the road, so moved.

I shouted aloud in silence. I am a witness, I testify to the reality of the Way of Heaven. The freshness is melting me, caressing me. It is a witness, it testifies that I have held out till today.

Beginning of Autumn. China’s terse conclusion, right. Suddenly I understood what the ancients meant: their bitter experiences, their patience, their feelings and judgements, found their way into their distinctions and conclusions. Beginning of Autumn, these three words, divide heat from coolness; they show a regular pattern, year after year they tell us stupid descendants—there is order in the Way of Heaven, everything is in the embrace of something much larger.

From that Beginning of Autumn—I should say after that Beginning of Autumn moment—the people of Peking and I began to enjoy the pleasures of the cool freshness. Everyone was calmer and friendlier, waiting for the next even happier calendrical division. Northerners and Southerners\fn{Northern and Southern Chinese are meant.} alike could share in this pleasure. The rule of Beginning of Autumn had been upheld throughout China. I once heard of a foreigner who said in excitement, You Chinese people, your calendrical divisions are spot on! I think this is perhaps the last thing you can teach to a foreigner.

I thought back over the many years but couldn't remember. Every year Beginning of Autumn had come, but I had no feelings that I could remember. Maybe there'd never been such a ruthlessly cruel summer like this one past. Maybe I'd never learnt enough about the Way of Heaven.

For a long time I was moved by the great, gentle, cleansing infusion of the cool freshness. From that Beginning of Autumn moment to this day I am reminded, every instance of every day, of Beginning of Autumn's power. I will no longer react slowly, I will no longer mistake it, I will use body and soul to savor it, drop by drop, and make a record of it. I want to testify—the Way of Heaven does exist—although I already perceive the difficulty of bearing witness.

For China has long since concluded its testimony, in language so terse that only three words were used.

41.144 & 186.33 Excerpts from A Chinese Winter's Tale: "Wedding Night" ; "First Acquaintance" ; "Off To The Northeast—And Into A Marriage!" \fn{by Yu Luojin (1948-)} Peking, China (F) 11

1

… "Let's get to bed!" It was barely nine o'clock when Zhiguo hurried me in this way.

There was something shifty about the slightly coy and bashful expression in his eyes—it made me uneasy. What was the hidden meaning behind that look?

Right up to this day, we hadn't exchanged a single word about love; we hadn't even held hands! It was a perfect case of "marry first, love later"—typically Chinese! I myself was Chinese, and had nothing against Chinese custom. But that wasn't to say that I was happy about it either. I didn't love him at all.

Tonight, I would have my first lesson in marriage—what was to be the content of this lesson? What form would it take? What would it feel like? My mind was a complete blank on the subject. I'd never read medical books; my parents had never talked to me about it; my schools had never taught me anything about it; my friends were all like me, we'd never discussed the topic.

It wasn't until I went to the labor camp that I got any inkling of what it was all about, from the foul language the louts hurled at each other when they were fighting amongst themselves, hollering loud enough for the whole compound to hear. It was unfortunate that I'd received my first "sex education" from their dirty mouths! But our "reactionary" group didn't live with them or work with them; and the people in our group never talked about it. So it was no wonder I was still a complete ignoramus in this respect at the age of twenty-four.

And here I was, suddenly married. I was making the bed, when all of a sudden the foul talk from the camp came flashing into my head—was it really like that? But I quickly put a stop to this unpleasant train of thought—surely a decent person couldn't act like that? Zhi-guo certainly wasn't a lout.

"Put the quilts together," Zhi-guo ordered when I'd just finished making the bed—again, that strange look in his eye.

I rearranged the bedding compliantly, feeling more and more uneasy. Zhi-guo was washing his feet in the outer room. I took off my jacket and lay down without waiting for him.

This was the experience every young girl had to go through. Was it really my turn today? My heart was beating wildly.

Was there any joy? … No.

Was I shy? … No. Happy? No.

Content? No.

Afraid? Yes.

Worried? Yes.

Was I in pain? Did I have any illusions? I turned my face to one side, not wanting to see the lust in Zhi-guo's eyes as he came in— it was so coarse! I closed my eyes, and quietly, lost myself in my own fantasy …

We were sitting under the warm quilts in our pyjamas with our jackets draped over our shoulders, in a tender embrace. I was expecting nothing, there were no thoughts in my head. I felt only happiness and contentment; I was as happy as an innocent child. All my past suffering was going to be tenderly soothed away in this one night. All my suffering. I had lost my job—my four years training as a toy-maker had been wasted—I'd been labelled a "reactionary"—I'd been put behind bars—the spark of my first love had been quenched before it could break into flame—my family had been deprived of its happiness—my beloved brother had been shot—and on top of all of this I had been compelled to abandon all sense of shame and sell myself in the Great Northern Wilderness—oh, after all this, after all this suffering, didn't I deserve some tenderness from my husband—from the man who'd "bought" me? Even though our union might look like some sort of deal, I wasn't a maid, a servant, or a whore! My marriage had been a humiliation, but still I cherished the hope that my humiliation would be dispelled by his tenderness, and that I would find some reason, however small, to love him.

I imagined us lying under the quilt, holding hands in friendship—it was the first time we'd ever touched each other. He took me gently in his arms, stroked my hair and my face and gazed at me fondly, treating me like a poor little child. It was right that he should comfort me like this, because he had suffered much less than I had. And I felt a deep contentment and a sweet happiness in this wordless expression of love. All the unhappiness and pain in my heart was melting away into nothing. The pleasant sound of his breathing was cleansing me of all my humiliation and pain. I was falling asleep in this tender embrace, dreaming sweet dreams the whole night through. And then the next day, the day after, and many more days would pass by, and this person who'd "bought" me treated me so tenderly that I came to love him more and more with each passing day, until the time came when I felt I must prove my love for him. And then, I said to him: "I want to have your child"—and after that, we would be truly married. How beautiful that would be! We just needed a bit of time, to fall in love

I imagined my gratitude and respect for him growing ever stronger with all the tenderness and love he gave me; no matter how many faults I might find in him, I would excuse them all, if only for the memory of these first nights …

Suddenly, a large foot landed on the quilt beside me, and I opened my eyes, leaving my fantasies behind. It was a size 46 foot, enormously large! I looked up at him timidly, and there he was—a six foot giant standing on the kang undressing himself He was bending slightly to loosen his belt. The lustful glint in the corner of his eye when he glanced at me was a million miles from the gallant knight of my dreams!

He sat down to take off his trousers, and proceeded to strip himself stark-naked, looking at me all the while.

What an ugly sight it was! I involuntarily closed my eyes, drew myself in, and clutched at my padded quilt, my heart cold as a sheet of iron.

I could feel his large hand lightly lifting up the quilt before he slid under it. His ice-cold feet and his hard, bony legs hurt me. My beautiful dreams were gone like fire-crackers, exploding into nothingness.

He began thrashing around with his arms and legs, roughly and clumsily stripping off my pyjamas and underwear and throwing them hurriedly aside; I just lay there like a terrified puppet, like a fish about to be killed, offering no resistance. Why did my life have to be so full of pain?

Before I could gather my wits about me, the whole weight of his body was pressing down on top of me; two large rough hands were gripping my head. I closed my eyes.

Oh God, his sticky tongue was frantically trying to push its way into my mouth! Oh God! I struggled with all my might to turn my face away, but I couldn't escape his "passion" however hard I tried. I felt a sudden pain in my crutch, as if I'd just been brutally attacked. This indescribable agony only lasted about a minute, when suddenly he loosened his grip and collapsed onto the pillow, panting convulsively. I tried to get myself free of him and then sat up, my whole body a mass of pain. I leaned forward and spat on the ground over and over again—my mouth felt unspeakably dirty!

I was about to put on my clothes and go and rinse out my mouth and wash myself, when I suddenly saw a patch of wet blood on the bed—I was horrified!

"What's that?" I gasped in alarm.

Zhi-guo raised his head. When his weary eyes alighted on the blood, he burst out triumphantly:

"Do you really not know?"

Suddenly he became all excited again, he clutched me in his arms and pressed me down on the kang, murmuring in my ear:

"The Golden needle pierces the flower of the peach.
The Silent maiden frowns to stifle her screech.

"—or so the saying goes. Ha, ha, ha."

Even as he laughed, his wet tongue was coming at me again. God! I pushed him off with all the strength I could muster, and got down from the bed.

"You …!"

I kept spitting on the floor, my face going white and then red with rage.

"What are you saying! You filthy brute!"

I washed myself thoroughly with hot water, and found some clean pyjamas to change into.

Zhi-guo stared at me in bewilderment all the while, with his mouth open. I didn't want to look at him at all. One more look at him and my eyes would be blinded by the filth.

But however much I might wash myself, I felt that I would never be clean again, as if countless poisons were eating into my body. I could never be clean again! What was inside my body was no longer completely my own; there was also something of him. And what did he represent for me? Love?—No! Shame and vulgarity, meanness and filth! I had hoped for love and tenderness that night, but instead I got a double sense of shame and humiliation! Pain and disgust, foul language, repulsive kisses, those were his gifts to me! Was marriage really like this? Would every night from now on be like this? I would rather die, I would never give in!—Just thinking of this, all the blood in my body seemed to be welling up inside—that cursed moment! How I wished I could strangle him! I simply could not bear the thought of his continued existence! In an instant, I opened the lid of the trunk and whipped out a pair of scissors which I'd recently bought for making clothes—the sharp blades flashed a ferocious blue in the silvery moonlight. Grasping the scissors in my right hand, I leapt onto the kang glaring fiercely at him, and spit out these words one at a time:

"Now listen here, Zhi-guo. If you dare lay a finger on me ever again, I'll kill you!—even if it means paying for it with my own life. You'd better beware!"

His mouth opened wide with fear and astonishment, and he stared at me dumbfounded as I pulled my bedding away from his side and put it at the other end of the kang. It was a long while before he got his breath back and mumbled in a baffled and choked voice:

"What have I done? … you're a strange one!"

I put the scissors under my pillow—from now on, they would never leave my side! I buried myself from head to foot under the quilt, but was constantly aware of the big black hairy ape sleeping at the other end of the kang. I didn't even want to hear the sound of his breathing. My mind was hopelessly confused, I couldn't think straight, I couldn't disentangle a single one of my thoughts. Sleep just would not come …

It felt like a long time before I calmed down. The big ape seemed to be asleep. I slowly lifted the quilt and sat up. Soft moonlight filled the entire room. I looked at him with disgust; his mouth lay slightly open in his sleep, it still made me feel sick. Even sleeping, he still wore that stunned and puzzled expression. I quickly turned my face towards the window and looked out into space.

Moon! Was this the happiness you had in store for me?

What did he know of love? Absolutely nothing! This was all he'd wanted out of me when he'd hurried me to bed—as if this was all the love he had to give, as if he wanted me to know that this was how he would be loving me for ever after. And in return, all I had for him was my pair of scissors—if I even chose to live after this. That moment was the sum total of our union; it was also the beginning of our separation. I would never acknowledge him as my husband, and I would never consider myself to be his wife.

A hundred years of bitterness and humiliation were contained in that cursed moment! How he had defiled the word "kiss!"

Ever since I first started nursery school at the tender age of three, the teachers were always telling us that the mouth was a breeding-place for infections and germs. I vividly remember when I was five, my father once kissing my cheek and leaving some drops of saliva on my face. I immediately ran to the inner room to wipe at it again and again with a wet towel, feeling very angry but at the same time afraid that my father would be hurt if he saw what I was doing. So far as I knew, the mouth was for eating, for talking, and for singing. At the labor camp, I'd learned that it could also be used for swearing, for words you couldn't even find in The World Dictionary. I'd read in novels that the mouth could also be used for kissing, but I'd never imagined it would be like this! There were quite a few kissing-scenes in films and novels. They neither offended me, nor excited me. I doubted the accuracy of the "burning hot lips" described in books—how could the body's heat be concentrated in the lips when someone was aroused? Had anyone ever measured them with a thermometer to prove that they were "burning hot?" This kind of cliche only reflected the personal taste of those particular authors. (Of course, it is my personal feelings on the subject that I'm writing about now; but I have no intention of imposing my views on others.)

Supposing we accept "burning" or "hot," I'd still not come across a single sequence in a film or a single passage in a novel which indicated the need to use the tongue when kissing! Where had Zhi-guo got that from? Did some people go even further? Did something as sacred and as pure as love have to take place in a hotbed of germs? Was that the only thing that gave it excitement? Ugh! It took an oaf to love in this oafish fashion!

What was love in Zhiguo's case? For him, animal desire had taken the place of love, brutishness the place of tenderness, and coarseness the place of nobility. But the blame for all my bitterness could not really be laid at Zhiguo's door. I myself had chosen to come to the Great Northern Wilderness! I could only hate myself, be disgusted with myself. Who else could I blame?

